<sup>201</sup> Apparently without sufficient knowledge, Dr. Lanigan thought, that Nemthur is not the true spelling of the place, where St. Patrick was born, according to Fiech.

<sup>202</sup> It states: "Natus est igitur in illo oppido, Nempthor nomine, * * * * * Patricius natus est in campo Taburne."—"Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. i., p. 11.

<sup>203</sup> It reads: "Natus est igitur Patricius in illo oppido Nemthor nomine: * * * * * Patricius natus est in Campo Taburnie."—"Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. i., p. 21.

Clude—now understood to be Strath Clyde—and that he was born, in Nempthur, which town was on the Taburnian plain.<sup>205</sup> This Life is of very ancient date, and it seems to indicate some old Irish tradition, concerning the saint's birth taking place in France.<sup>206</sup> The Fifth Life is thought to have the merit of being even more explicit; <sup>207</sup> for, it states, he was born at Bannave Tiburniæ, in the Nentria—interpreted the Neustria—province.<sup>208</sup> Here, it is asserted,<sup>209</sup> we may observe the same confused tradition, regarding the saint's French origin; since, Neustria<sup>210</sup> is said to have been a name, during the Merovingian period,<sup>211</sup> for that whole district, comprised between the Meuse and the Loire. The Sixth and best-known Life, by Jocelyn,<sup>212</sup> has Nempthor, and the village of Taburnia, near the Irish Sea; and, apparently set down in a manner, to correct a mistake of previous authorities, on this subject. In fine, the Seventh Life<sup>213</sup> declares, that St. Patrick belonged to the Alclud Britons,<sup>214</sup> and that his birthplace was Nempthur.<sup>215</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life calls it Nemtur.<sup>216</sup> The Breviaries repeat many of the foregoing names, very vaguely, and with little attempt to fix the actual localities, where they are now to be found.<sup>217</sup> We have already seen, that one Irish Manuscript Life<sup>218</sup> of St. Patrick states, he was born at Eptor—probably a misspelling of Emptor—placed in Provence, France.<sup>219</sup> Thus, it will be observed, that in the principal authorities presented, there is a concurrence, in accepting the locality, so variously denominated, Nempthur and Emptor. The localities, called Enon,—most probably a corrupt version for the word “enim,”—and Benaven Taberniæ, a rethought to be named, by St. Patrick himself. Furthermore, there is no appearance of certainty, in the minds of the different writers, as to the exact sites of those places mentioned. No one

<sup>204</sup> It adds, “juxta Thyrrenum possidet.”

<sup>205</sup> It says, “Sanctus ergo Patricius in oppido Nempthor nomine; * * * Quod oppidum in campo Taburniæ est, qui Campus tabernaculorum dicitur,” &c.—“Quarta Vita S. Patricii,” cap. i., p. 35.

<sup>206</sup> Such is the opinion advanced, by Mr. John Cashel Hoey; yet, we consider it hardly sustained by the statements, contained in the Fourth Life.

<sup>207</sup> According to Mr. John Cashel Hoey.

<sup>208</sup> It states, “Brito fuit natione: * * * de vico Bannaue Tiburniæ regionis, haud procul a mare occidentali: quem vicum indubitanter comperimus esse Nentriæ provinciæ, in quâ olim gigantes habitasse dicuntur.”—“Quinta Vita S. Patricii,” lib. i., cap. i., p. 51.

<sup>209</sup> By Mr. John Cashel Hoey.

<sup>210</sup> It is thought, the name Neustria or “New-land” may have originated from its having been a newly-conquered country. See Baxter, at Neustria. This name is said to have begun with the Franks, and to date only from the death of Clovis.

<sup>211</sup> See Hadrian Valesius, at Neustria, in “Notitia Galliarum.”

<sup>212</sup> He states, “Brito natione in pago Taburnia vocabulo, hoc est, tabernaculorum campo, eo quod Romanus exercitus tabernacula fixerit ibidem, secus oppidum Nempthor degens, mari Hibernico collimitans habitatione.”—“Sexta Vita S. Patricii,” cap. i., p. 65.

<sup>213</sup> It states: “De Britannis Alcludensibus originem duxit Sanctus Patricius.”

<sup>214</sup> See Rev. William G. Todd's “History of the Ancient Church in Ireland,” p. 6.

<sup>215</sup> Thus, it is interpreted, “quod ex vocis etymo cælestem turrem denotat, * * * patria et nativitatís locus fuit.”—“Septima Vita S. Patricii,” pars. i., cap. i., p. 117.

<sup>216</sup> See Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack's “Life of St. Patrick,” p. 372.

<sup>217</sup> The Breviary of Paris, printed A.D. 1622, says: “in Britannia natus * * * piè educatus in oppido Emphthori,” noct. ii., lect. iv. The still older Breviary of Armagh states, “in illo Britannæ oppido nomine Emptor,” lect. i. The old Roman Breviary, printed at Venice, A.D. 1522, says simply “S. Patricius, genere Brito,” lect. i. The Breviary of Rheims, printed A.D. 1612, states, “in maritimo Britannæ territorio, quod Hiberniam respicit,” lect. iv. A still more ancient Rheims Breviary has “in maritimo Britannæ territorio natus,” lect. iv. The Breviary of Rouen is said to read “In Britannia Gallicana.” The Breviary of the Canons of St. John of Lateran, printed in 1635, states, that the Irish Apostle was “ex Britannia magna insula;” while a still more ancient one, printed at Bruxelles, A.D. 1622, has “Patricius ex Britannia magna insula.” See Colgan's “Trias Thaumaturga.” Appendix i., pp. 189 to 196.

<sup>218</sup> Transcribed by Michael Mahony of Ardee, in the county of Kerry, A.D. 1821.

<sup>219</sup> See Chapter i., n. 227, of this Life.

of them ventures to name that exact district, or diocese, where Enon—a doubtful locality—or even Emptor, Bonaven and Tabernia are to be found.

It is probable enough, that a perusal of the Jesuit Father Malbrancq's historical work,<sup>220</sup> and some fancied topographical coherences, guided Dr. Lanigan to his conclusion, that St. Patrick must have been a Continental or Gallic Briton, by birth. When speaking of Britain, in his own Confession, and when living with his parents there,<sup>221</sup> it is thought, St. Patrick could only have meant Gaul,<sup>222</sup> and such, too, was the presumed opinion of some early writers of his Acts. Here, likewise, it has been asserted, the early topographical names may be discovered.<sup>223</sup> In later times, the Gallic Britain of St. Patrick's birth, it is alleged, became confounded with Great Britain.<sup>224</sup> Certain reasons have been adduced,<sup>225</sup> for identifying Bonaven with Boulogne; and for making Taberniæ<sup>226</sup> agree with a city,<sup>227</sup> very famous in those French wars, waged during the middle ages. This latter word has not only mystified Colgan, but certain authors of those Lives, whose authority he chose to follow. While they left out Bonaven, because it did not agree with Nemthur, they retained the word Taberniæ, or, as they choose to write it, "Campus Taburniæ."<sup>228</sup> They endeavoured also to account for this etymon, by making it a district, that got its name, because they assumed it had been the site for a Roman camp, in which there were tents or tabernacles.<sup>229</sup> To sustain his identification, however, Dr. Lanigan supposes a mistake of spelling, and that for Taburniæ, we should rather read Tarveina.<sup>230</sup> St. Gregory

<sup>220</sup> See "De Morinis et Morinorum Rebus," Tornaci Nerviorum, A.D. 1639, 1654.

<sup>221</sup> He says: "Iterum post paucos annos in Britanniiis eram cum parentibus meis." "Confessio S. Patricii," p. 9. Ware's edition. The Bollandist edition, and that of Father Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva, have "in Britannia." See Dr. O'Connor, in Prolegomena "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," who has Britanniiis, tomus i.

<sup>222</sup> "Pergere in Britannias, etsi libentissime paratus irem, quasi ad patriam et parentes; et non id solum, sed eram usque ad Gallias visitarem fratres meos, ut viderem faciem sanctorum Domini mei." See "Confessio S. Patricii," cap. iv., sect. 19, p. 203. Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula." This seems to indicate a more distant situation from Ireland, when St. Patrick wrote, than Great Britain presented.

<sup>223</sup> It may be observed, that Dr. Lanigan does not attempt to identify, the two localities, called Enon and Nemthur. The former he has regarded as being too insignificant, while the latter, he did not believe, had any existence, as a town, but rather as a province.

<sup>224</sup> To prevent such a misconception, in the lessons for St. Patrick's Office, the corrector of the Rouen Breviary inserts: "In Britannia Gallicana ortum." See the Bollandists' Commentarius Prævius, sect. v., at St. Patrick's Acts, tomus ii., Martii xvii., p. 522.

<sup>225</sup> By Rev. Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>226</sup> While Dr. Lanigan accounts for a change, in the verbal structure, by considering the usual transmutation of b into v, he overlooks the letter r, and its force. This letter does not, by any means, so easily glide into the changes of dialect.

<sup>227</sup> Dr. Lanigan has confounded Therouanne, lying at some thirty miles from Boulogne, with another town, at least twenty miles still farther removed. Most certainly, Therouanne did not stand in the near relation he has supposed to Boulogne. Yet, Malbrancq, who appears to have been Dr. Lanigan's chief authority, does not omit to mention, that Tervanna and Taruanna are two entirely distinct places. Tervanna had been the old Roman name, given to the town, now known as Saint Pol: while Taruanna was that which formerly applied to Therouenne, as now called. See "Comitum Tervanensium Annales Historici," Collectore Th. Turpin Paulinate. Ord. Predicat. 1731.

<sup>228</sup> After telling us, that St. Patrick was born at Nemthor, the author of his Second Life professes to give us the reason, why it bore such a name, "campus autem Tabernaculorum, ob hoc dictus est, eo quod in eo Romani exercitus quodam tempore tabernacula sua ibi statuerunt hyemali frigore."—"Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. i., p. 11. The Third Life has almost the same words. See cap. i., p. 21; and, in substance, the Fourth Life quite accords. See cap. i., p. 35. The Sixth Life agrees. See cap. i., p. 65.

<sup>229</sup> So understand all the ancient writers of St. Patrick's Acts, and the old Commentators on them.

<sup>230</sup> See more on this subject, in Hadrian Valesius, "Notitia Galliarum," at Gessoriacum and Tarvenna Morinorum.

<sup>231</sup> It may be objected, that "Tabernia" of Tours has called the inhabitants, by the denomination, Tarabannenses.<sup>231</sup> Under the name; Civitas Morinorum, it has been frequently alluded to, as having been a principal city, belonging to the Morini.<sup>232</sup> Boulogne was also situated in this region,<sup>233</sup> and it was so connected with Tarvanna,<sup>234</sup> that both places anciently formed only one episcopal See. Thus Jonas,<sup>235</sup> writing nearly twelve hundred years ago, calls Audomarus,<sup>236</sup> Bishop of Boulogne,<sup>237</sup> and of Tarvana.<sup>238</sup> We must adopt, notwithstanding, the meaning of the old biographical writers, "Campus Taberniæ," or "Taburniæ," meaning "the plain of tents;" and, it seems the most natural conclusion, to be drawn from this special investigation.

In St. Patrick's Confession, his father Calphurnius, or Calpornius, the Deacon, is said again to have been a priest of the town of Bonaven Taberniæ.<sup>239</sup> Near the town, it is thought, he had a small villa, called Enon,<sup>240</sup> where St. Patrick became a captive.<sup>241</sup> Here, however, we find neither a town, nor a province, called Nemthor, nor Alcluit. It has been supposed, by Dr. Lanigan, that St. Patrick's probable reason for distinguishing Bonaven,<sup>242</sup> by the adjunct Taberniæ, was, lest it might be confounded with the Italian Bononia, now Bologna, or with a Bononia, in Aquitain; as, in the same manner, to avoid is a different name from "Tarvanna." Owing to the usual commutation of b for v, however, and, vice versa, we might read "Tavernia." Thus, Tarvanna was called by some "Tarabanna."

<sup>232</sup> Malbrancq says, this capital of the Morini got the name of Tarvanna, from a prætor Tarvannus, in the time of Augustus. He writes, "Tarvannæ nomen accepit, quod etiam ad circumjacens territorium sese extendit." He quotes, from the frontispiece of its old cathedral, this verse: "Ex Morinis Tarvana vocor prætore volente." See "De Morinis," lib. ii., cap. 4.

<sup>233</sup> Bucherius maintains, that Boulogne was an ancient See, and that it had a bishop, in the time of Constantine, or, at least, when his sons flourished. See "Belgium Romanum," lib. viii., cap. 15.

<sup>234</sup> To account for a difference of name, the transposition of a syllable, or of a letter, may have occurred. This has frequently been admitted, in old words; and, particularly, in writing the names of places. The two first syllables, as often happens in old records, are transposed. See Hadrian Valesius, at Gessoriacum. So we find, Linerensi for Liriniensi, in an old tract on the Liturgy, quoted by Ussher, p. 343. Nogesia, the name of a town, became Genesia; Dunbritton has been modified, into Dunbertane, Dunbarton, Dumbarton.

<sup>235</sup> In his "Vita S. Eustacii."

<sup>236</sup> He writes "Bononiæ et Tarvanensis oppidi præsulæm."

<sup>237</sup> Some writers have said, that the See of Boulogne was first established, A.D. 1566. This is a mistake, founded upon a practice, introduced in the middle ages, of denominating the See from Tarvanna or Terouanne alone, on account of its greater local dignity. But, after the destruction of Terouanne, by the Emperor Charles V., in 1553, the See of Boulogne was restored. See

Hadrian Valesius, in the passage already cited.

<sup>238</sup> The old diocese of Terouanne contained 800 parishes, in the countries of Flanders, Artois, and the Boulonnais.

<sup>239</sup> Probus agrees with the Confession, except that, according to Colgan's edition, for Bonavem Taberniæ, he has "de vico Bannave Tiburniæ regionis;" and, he adds, that it was not far from the Western Sea, or Atlantic Ocean: "haud procul a mari occidentali," lib. i., cap. i.

<sup>240</sup> The Armagh and Cotton MSS. have simply enim; but, this is said to bear no correct meaning. Ware has it, Enon, and this is guessed to be the true reading.

<sup>241</sup> He says: "Patrem habui Calpornium Diaconem, filium quondam Potiti Presbyteri; qui fuit e vico Benaven Taberniæ villam enim (Enon) propè habuit, ubi ego in captivam decidi."—"Confessio S. Patricii," cap. i., sect. i. Villanueva's Edition, p. 184. Some verbal differences are to be found, likewise, in other versions.

<sup>242</sup> We may easily suppose, that some errors of transcription might have crept into Probus' text; yet, as to Bannave, there is no material difference between it and Bonavem. Ban might be used for Bon, (Baxter, Glossar, &c., at Bonium), and the final m, which has a sort of nasal termination, as it is still with the Portuguese, could be omitted, so as to write for it Bonavem, or Bonauen—v and u being one and the same letter—Bonaue. Probus' addition of "regionis," is thought worthy of notice, since it corresponds with what Dr. Lanigan has advanced, concerning "Travanensis regio." See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. vii., and nn. 70, 71, 72, pp. 94 to 96.

<sup>243</sup> According to Mr. John Cashel Hoey—who adopts this opinion of Dr. Lanigan—Dr. Rock entirely mistakes St. Patrick's

a similar confusion, the French call it, at present, Bolougne-sur-Mer,<sup>243</sup> in Picardy. The Romans knew it under the denomination of Gessoriacum. However, about the reign of Constantine the Great, its Celtic name Bonaven, or Bonaun, or otherwise Bonon, Latinized into Bononia, is said to have become more general.<sup>244</sup> Again, it has been authoritatively stated,<sup>245</sup> that Am, or Aven,<sup>246</sup> signifies a river, in the Celtic language, and, therefore, the town was so called, from its having been situated, at the mouth of a river.<sup>247</sup> Bon signifies, "mouth," while on, or avon, means a "river;" wherefore, it has been observed,<sup>248</sup> that Bononia can be no other than Bonavon,<sup>249</sup> or Bonaun; for, aven, avem, avon,<sup>250</sup> and aun, are pronounced in a similar manner. As for the addition of Taberniæ, it designates the district of Tarvanna, or Tarvanna, otherwise Tarabanna, which was a celebrated and an ancient city, not far removed from Boulogne.<sup>251</sup> If Dr. Lanigan had been enabled to perfect the proof, and to follow it up, by local research and by the light lately cast on the geography of Roman Gaul, this matter should have come in a far more complete form, from his erudite pen, as Mr. John Cashel Hoey modestly observes; but, failing the conditions, it became a fair subject for his own discussion. He suggests, what must be thought very remarkable, in the neighbourhood of Boulogne, towards the close of the seventeenth century, an old tower was to be seen; and, D'Anville, with other writers, has asserted, this was identical with a tower, erected by Caligula for a lighthouse, on the northern coast of France.<sup>252</sup> Eginhard speaks of Charlemagne repairing the Boulougne tower, which, even then, must have been of ancient construction. It seems quite possible, the Pharos, or, turris arduus, may not only be identical with the monument described;<sup>253</sup> but, that it may even have corresponded, with the Nemthor<sup>254</sup> of St. Patrick's Acts. Another consideration must be taken into account, that our Apostle is generally regarded, as having been Roman by descent, as likewise by his education, received in a province, where Roman civilization and government had long prevailed, where the Latin language was spoken, and where the privileges of the Roman Empire extended. In like manner, he was Roman by the possession of nobility, which he himself declares. Of this circumstance, his name affords a curious illustration.<sup>255</sup> In addition, he was of Christian parentage, and yet a Celt of Confession, in objecting, that a wilderness must be sought for at this place. See his work, "Did the Early Church of Ireland acknowledge the Pope's Supremacy?" answered in a Letter to Lord John Manners," p. ix. The wilderness alluded to lay between St. Patrick's landing-place, after his exile, and where his friends dwelt.

<sup>244</sup> "Gessoriacum Gallî circa Constantini maximi principatum mutato nomine Bononiam vocare cœperunt."—Hadrianus Valesius, in his "Notitia Galliarum," at the word Gessoriacum.

<sup>245</sup> By Bullet, in his "Dictionnaire Celtique." See "Memoires sur la Langue Celtique," tome ii.

<sup>246</sup> See at Am, Aven, Avon, On. Ibid., pp. 39, 104, 105, and tome iii., p. 218.

<sup>247</sup> Ibid., tome i., p. 55, at the word Boulogne.

<sup>248</sup> "Gallorum Bononia eodem pene est etymo, quasi dicas Bon-avon sive Bon-aun." See Baxter, Glossar. AA. Britan. ad Bonum.

<sup>249</sup> Originally it may have been written Bononen, to signify Bononenses Taberniæ, according to Mr. Hoey.

<sup>250</sup> Even in England, Avon has retained its Celtic signification, and it means "a river."

<sup>251</sup> Under the modern name of Terouanne, the ruins of this place are even yet traceable; while its name had been extended to a considerable district surrounding it, and thence, "pagus Tarbannensis," or, "Tarvannensis regio," had been applied to this locality.

<sup>252</sup> See Suetonius, "Vita Caligulæ."

<sup>253</sup> See Sir Francis Palgrave's "History of Normandy and of England," vol. ii.

<sup>254</sup> Taking the authority of O'Brien's "Irish Dictionary," might not Ailcluide be formed from Ail, "a rock," and Cluaide, "a cliff."

<sup>255</sup> Gibbon says, "At this period, the meanest subjects of the Roman Empire assumed the illustrious name of Patricius, which by the conversion of Ireland has been communicated to a whole nation."—See "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," v., vi.

<sup>256</sup> The great military importance of Boulogne may be assumed, even before the Britain, by blood. The fact, that the district between Boulogne and Amiens, about his time, had been inhabited by a clan, called Britanni, may have misled those writers, who supposed he must have been born in the island of Britain, as likewise those who held that, if born in France, he must have derived his origin from a part of it, subsequently called by the name of Brittany. Now, supposing, that Dr. Lanigan had rightly succeeded in his conjecture, regarding Boulogne, we must endeavour to discover, whether other places, named in the Confession, in St. Fiach's Hymn, and in the old Acts, can be identified with localities, still existing, within a proper circumscription of the Roman military occupation, around that city. These must likewise bear a certain and an unquestionable antiquity, at least nearly approaching St. Patrick's time.<sup>256</sup>

The effort of Dr. Lanigan, to identify the Taberniæ of Bonaven, or of the supposed Boulogne, with Therouanne, is not a successful one, according to Mr. John Cashel Hoey. But, this latter writer holds, that it seems no very difficult matter, to identify its site with Desvres,<sup>257</sup> which, to the eye and on old Maps, has the vestiges of a great Roman military position. It was a vast place of arms, and it has tracings of fortified walls, a fosse, with lines of circumvallation. Hard by, on the forest edge, are the Sept Voies, or Septemvium. Here has been traced the meeting of seven great military roads, leading from and to various other principal strongholds, which maintained the Roman power, throughout Northern and Western Europe. Any person, who carefully examines the Chart of Roman Roads in the Department, Pas de Calais, as published by the Commission of Departmental Antiquities,<sup>258</sup> cannot fail to perceive, how this present obscure village—which certainly had never been raised to the rank of a Roman city—nevertheless became at one time a great nucleus of Imperial power. The fragment of an ancient bridge is still known, as the Pont de César. The Septemvium, with its remarkable concentration of roads, is alone sufficient to indicate its local military importance. There is one road, leading straight to Amiens; another, that reaches the sea, by the mouth of the Canche stream; another, that runs into the harbour of Boulogne; one road joins the highways from Saint Omer, and from Tournehem, while it carries them on to Wissant,<sup>259</sup> and Sangate, the period of which we treat. It was the point, from which England had formerly been invaded, in the time of Julius Cæsar. It was the principal military Roman settlement, in Northern Gaul. Julian the Apostate held his head-quarters there, shortly before the birth of St. Patrick. All around its situation, the surface is marked by roads and mounds, which exhibit the peculiarities of Roman construction. In a recent Essay, by M. Quenson, an accomplished scholar of Saint Omer, it has been stated, that eighty-eight different works have been written, in order to settle the site of the Portus Itius, whence Cæsar embarked to invade Britain. No less than nineteen different localities have been assigned, for this debarcation. M. de Laulcy wrote a work, since Mr. Quenson published his Essay, and the latest researches seem to have finally determined the controversy, on this point. The absorbing interest and great ability, with which this difficult problem has been investigated, in a country where such zealous and learned scholars are to be found, leaves an inquirer somewhat still to glean, in places which are farther inland from the famous Port, they have so long laboured to identify, and especially as referring to our subject, that most engages the Irish ecclesiastical historian's attention.

<sup>257</sup> Its position, relative to Boulogne, will be found, on the "Atlas de l'Histoire du Consulat et de l'Empire," dressé et dessiné sous la direction de M. Thiers, par M.M. A. Dufour et Duvoitenay, gravé sur acier par Dyonnet. Carte No. 24. Paris, 1859, 4to.

<sup>258</sup> See "Statistique Monumentale du Département du Pas de Calais." Publiée par la Commission des Antiquités Départementales. Arras: chez Topino, Libraire, 1840.

<sup>259</sup> Portus Itius, or Witsand, has not yet supplanted the ancient Gessoriacum. In the early part of the Roman era, and until the end of the reign of Claudius, it was the accustomed point of transit, between Gaul and England, for the embarkation of the Romans. See a critique, in the Gentleman's Magazine, for June, 1857, on Sir Francis supposed Portus Itius<sup>260</sup> and Portus Inferior ; a fifth road extended to Terravanna and Arras ; the sixth ran to Taruanna ; while the seventh reached Saint Omer.<sup>261</sup> Not unconscious of its difficulties, Mr. John Cashel Hoey approaches the etymology of Desvres, which in the Latin of the middle ages,<sup>262</sup> is spoken of as Divernia Bononiensis.<sup>263</sup> The name, Desvres, has evidently undergone some strange, yet traceable, variations and modifications.<sup>264</sup> Its first appearance, as a French word, is Desurennnes.<sup>265</sup> This

Palgrave's "History of Normandy and of England."

<sup>260</sup> The Reviewer already quoted shows, that Sir Francis Palgrave has identified Portus Itius with Wissen, now standing inland, at a distance of about four miles from the Sael water. Froissart speaks of Wissen, as a large town, in 1346. The Reviewer refers, also, to an able article on this subject, by Mr. George Long, in Dr. Smith's "Dictionary of Ancient Geography." See vol. ii., pp. 99, 100.

<sup>261</sup> "Would so many roads," enquires Mr. John Cashel Hoey, "communicating with places of such military importance, have been concentrated by a race of such a centralizing talent as the Romans, anywhere except at the site of a great city, or a great camp? On the ancient maps, indeed, the country, which lies between Desvres and Boulogne, along the Liane, is simply marked Castrum."

<sup>262</sup> See "Notice historique sur la ville de Désurène, Divernia, aujourd'hui Desvres." Par M. d'Ordre. Boulogne, 1811.

<sup>263</sup> There is the epitaph of a churchman, born in the place, and which says on his behalf:—

"Me Molinet pepérit Divernia Bononiensis."

A local historian, Baron d'Ordre, speaks of the place, as "Desurene, Divernia, aujourd'hui Desvres."

<sup>264</sup> "It is a very curious fact," remarks Mr. John Cashel Hoey, who reasons very ingeniously on etymological affinities, "that in England the Roman camps seem to have been always known as "Castra," while in Gaul the Tabernæ is the name which generally adhered to them. Lanigan says, and correctly, so far as I have been able to discover, that there is no trace of a Roman station called Tabernæ in England, while the affix chester is the most common in its topography. In England, it may be said the Romans encamped: in France, the Tabernæ meant a more settled and familiar residence, as familiar as the Caserne of the Empire. It would be interesting to inquire whether as many cities in France do not derive their origin from these military stations, as England has of Chesters. But the student who attempts this task will be sure to find the Latin word almost defaced beyond power of recognition, by the etymological maltreatment which it has sustained in that conflict of consonants, which has resulted in the present high polish of Academic French. I may mention one or two instances, to show how little violence I do to French philology in identifying the Divernia Bononiensis of the middle ages with the Tabernæ of Boulogne. Saverne, in Lorraine, is well known to be the Tabernæ Triborocorum. It was known, in a semi-Germanic form, as Elsas Tabern. Gradually the sibilant ss of the first word invaded the second ; and it has long settled down into one word, in the form of Saverne. The Tabernæ Rhe-nana, on the other hand, retained the hard b instead of converting it into v, as inevitably happened in the south, and instead changed the T into Z, Rhein-Zabren. In ages which had no hesitation in changing the pure dental T into the sibilant dentals S or Z, it will not be considered surprising, that it was sometimes changed into D—the only other pure dental sound. Indeed of all the transmutations of letters, those of d and t, and those of v and b, are notoriously the most common. The Irish d, says O'Donovan, 'never has such a hard sound as the English d.' Again, 'in ancient writings, t is frequently substituted for d.' Again, 'it should be remarked that in ancient Irish MSS. consonants of the same organ are very frequently substituted for each other, and that where the ancients usually wrote p, c, t, the moderns write b, q, d.' Decline the Irish word Tād, father. It becomes Ei dād, his father ; Ei thād, her father ; by nhād, my father. We carry the tendency into English. The mistake is one from which certain parts of Ireland, as well as certain parts of France, are not exempt even to the present day ; and, in Munster, one may still hear, as in the times when the ballad of 'Lillibullero' was written, the letter d occasionally used where the tongue intended t or th. Nor is this vagary of speech confined to the Irish. Why do the Welsh say Tafyd for David ? It is the most frequently recurring of that systematic permutation of consonants, which is one of the chief difficulties of the Cymric tongue. The Welsh d and t turn about and wheel about in their mysterious alphabet without the slightest scruple. In German, the convertibility of the same letters is also very marked. The German says das, for that, dank, for thanks, durst, for thirst ; and again Teufel, for devil, tanz, for dance, theil, for dial."

<sup>265</sup> "Il n'y pas 50 ans, que la nom de

seems to have been derived, from Desvres sur Enna, or Desvres, upon the ancient Fluvius Enna<sup>266</sup> of the Romans, and now called the Liane. This particular stream flows past Boulogne, giving its name to a little village, Enna,<sup>267</sup> built near the forest. By derivation, however, only the first two letters of the original word, Desvres, are left. How do they disappear, it may be asked, or why do they re-appear, in the modern form of the word? What may have been its original name, also, is a matter for historic investigation. About eight miles distant from Desvres, and towards the north, within the military circumscription, of which it is the centre, a river, called the Em, or Hem, flows by a village, Tournehem,<sup>268</sup> having a great antiquity. This, Mr. Hoey thinks, may be identical with the Nemptor, or Emtor, of St. Patrick's Lives. In the ordinary geographical dictionaries, we find it recorded, that Julius Cæsar slept at Tournehem, while on his way to embark for that well-known event, in his military career, the invasion of Britain.<sup>269</sup> This town now contains a Roman arch, with the ruins of a Roman tower. From the latter circumstance, this village, likewise, derives its name, Tournehem, or, as it was written in Malbrancq's time, Tur-n-hem. The tower, in conjunction with the river, is thought to show the derivation of the word, at a glance. But, the exigencies of Irish verse, in St. Fiach's Hymn, it is said, simply caused their transposition. Now, regarding the commutations of letters in French, the Dictionary of the Academy<sup>270</sup> and that of Bescherelle<sup>271</sup> lay down this principle very plainly—that t is a letter, which requires a lingual and dental effort, to pronounce like Desvres a prévalu sur celui de Desurenne que cette ville avait toujours porté auparavant."—M. L. Cousin, "Mémoires de la Société des Antiquaires de la Morinie," vol. iv., p. 239. M. Cousin's papers, on Monthulin and Tingry, in the Transactions of this Society, are in general accord, with what has been said about the ancient military importance of the whole district around Desvres.

<sup>266</sup> By Malbrancque, its Latin name has been so written.

<sup>267</sup> That we may presume to identify St. Patrick's Enon, with this undoubtedly Roman Enna, is thought warrantable, when such a similarity and coincidence of place and circumstance survive so many centuries. Thus, the locality, Enon, has been interpreted "River House," or "River Lodge," from Enn "a habitation," and On, "a river." See Bullet, at Enn.

<sup>268</sup> "Ce lieu existait lorsque les légions romaines pénétrèrent dans la Morinie, l'an de Rome 697, ou 57 ans avant l'ère vulgaire, et consistait alors en un château fort garni de tours, d'où est venu, selon Malbrancq, la dénomination de Tournehem, du latin à Turribus. Cæsar s'empara de ce château et y fit quelque séjour pour l'avantage de sa cavalerie. Environ deux siècles et demi après, c'est à dire en 218, Septime-Sévère, autre empereur romain, fit camper dans le voisinage de Tournehem (sur la montagne de Saint Louis) une partie de son armée destinée pour une expédition contre la Grande Bretagne, qu'il effectua glorieusement la même année."—P. Collet's "Notice Historique de Saint Omer, suivi de celles de Therou-

anne et de Tournehem," Saint Omer, 1830. Both M. Collet and Père Malbrancq, however, overlook the obvious derivation of the word—though both note the name of the river, which flows through the town, and which M. Collet calls "la rivière de Hem ou de Saint Louis."

<sup>269</sup> M. H. Piers, in the "Mémoires de la Société des Antiquaires de la Morinie," Saint Omer, 1834, says, "César après s'être emparé des forteresses de la contrée s'y rendit de Therouanne, Sithieu et Tournehem, l'an 55 ou 56 avant l'ère vulgaire, pour subjuguier la Grande Bretagne." In the same volume, there is an interesting paper, by M. Pigault de Beaupré, on the Castle of Tournehem, which, he says, was partially rebuilt by Baldwin II., Count of Guines, in 1174, and it continued to be a principal residence of the Dukes of Burgundy, at so late a date as 1435. But, the vastness and solidity of the works, which he describes—some of them subterranean roads, evidently used for communication with other fortified works—clearly indicate their Roman character. Baldwin—a prince far in advance of his age—seems to have attempted to revive Roman ideas, and to rebuild Roman works, wherever he found them within his dominions. The castle of Hâmes, near Calais, which he rebuilt, and which he ceded to the English, as part of the ransom for King John of France, was, also, as M. Pigault de Beaupré shows, of Roman construction.

<sup>270</sup> See "Dictionnaire de l'Académie Française."

<sup>271</sup> See Bescherelle, "Dictionnaire National," Paris, 1857.

d, its correlative, weaker and softer. With such a letter, it is frequently confounded, not alone in the German dialects, but in the greater number of languages. In Latin, this letter t is frequently substituted for d: thus, attulit for adulit. Formerly, Latin writers had set, aput, quot, haut, instead of sed, apud, quod, haud.<sup>272</sup> Some of our Irish writers had interpreted the word Neimtur, to mean "Holy Tower," thus, Neim "holy," and Tur, "tower;" until the late Professor Eugene O'Curry concluded, when compiling his valuable Catalogue of those Irish Manuscripts, existing in the British Museum, and after a minute examination of a Manuscript, which is supposed to be the oldest copy of St. Fiech's Hymn in existence, that the word has been misspelled,<sup>273</sup> and should really be written, Emtur.<sup>274</sup> Other Manuscript Lives of St. Patrick have Emtor, Eptor,<sup>275</sup> Emptor and Empter.<sup>276</sup> However, as Mr. John Cashel Hoey observes, the n, was not merely inserted, as Mr. O'Curry imagined, to fill up a hiatus in the line; but, it was obviously a part of it, and a copulative, quite as common in Celtic words, as de is found in modern French. Besides, it has precisely the same meaning.<sup>277</sup> In addition, a modern writer of St. Patrick's Life has explained Nemthur, by Holy Tours, i.e., the city of Tours, in France. Thence, he concludes, also, that our Irish Apostle had been a native of that city.<sup>278</sup> However, this inference can hardly be reconciled with the supposition, that St. Patrick's family lived very near the sea, nor can it accord with some other important circumstances, which will be shown, in a subsequent part of this Life.<sup>279</sup> The existence of such a town or village as Nemthor<sup>280</sup> is not believed, by Dr. Lanigan; still, he thinks, it may be resolved, by a series of changes, into Nevthur, Nephthur, or Nepthur,<sup>281</sup> from Irish vocables. He supposes it to have been a province or territory, well known, at the time when St. Fiach's Hymn had been composed; and, he proceeds to show, that it comprised an extensive tract, be-

<sup>272</sup> The conversion of v into d is even more common. We find a familiar illustration of this change, in the old Latin name for Ireland. As almost every student knows, our island was variously written, Ibernia, Ivernia, Hibernia, Juvernica, and Iernia. However, the English word Tavern, which is exactly derived from the Latin Taberna, is a still more apposite illustration, as regards the present enquiry. The intermediate vowel swayed in sound, with those consonants, which enclosed it. As the primary Latin t changed into the softer and feebler d, and the d into v, the intermediate a lost its full force. Mediæval Latin melts it into an i, in the word Divernia. Again, the modern French form, Desvres, brings it back, towards its place, at the head of the alphabet. Nor does it run the whole vowel gamut, as from Ibernia to Juvernica.

<sup>273</sup> It is stated, that N is but a prefix introduced, to fill a hiatus in the text, while Emtur is the proper verbal form. This word, then, means, not Holy Tower, but a tower, belonging to some place or person, indicated by the word Em.

<sup>274</sup> It is said to be even so spelled, in some of our Breviaries.

<sup>275</sup> In one Manuscript, this is said to have been in Provence, France.

<sup>276</sup> See nn. 226, 227, 233, 234, in the First Chapter of this Life.

<sup>277</sup> "Ballynamuck, for example," says Mr. John Cashel Hoey, "means the town of, or on, the river Muck. Tulloch na Daly (whose swelling dimensions the French afterwards curbed into the famous name of Tolland) is a more apposite instance."

<sup>278</sup> See Lynch's "Life of St. Patrick," chap. v., vi. This is thought the more probable, as his assumed relative, St. Martin, was Bishop of Tours. However, it cannot be made to agree, with the text of St. Patrick's Confession. That city, in our saint's time, was so respectable and celebrated, that had the Irish Apostle been a native of it, nothing could have been more easily expressed. Nor would there have been any necessity for adding the name of the district, such as Taburnia. Neither could such a city as Tours have been denominated vicus. Besides, Tours was never comprised, in any part of Armorica; nor could it be referred to that province, for it lay at too great a distance from the sea.

<sup>279</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. vi., and nn. 55, 56, pp. 91, 92.

<sup>280</sup> Colgan is deemed to be responsible, for a mistranslation of its meaning.

<sup>281</sup> When Jocelyn spells Nemphor or Emphor, with þ, in the "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. i., xi., Dr. Lanigan says he should have omitted the letter m.

tween the Loire and Meuse, in ancient Gaul. Consequently, Boulogne lay within this territory, usually called Neustria, but frequently also known, as Neptricum, or Neptria. We are told,<sup>282</sup> that long after St. Fiach's Hymn had been written, the name Neptria or Neustria became confined to a smaller part of this great province.<sup>283</sup> That Bannaue or Bonavem, St. Patrick's birthplace, was in the province of Nevtria,<sup>284</sup> has been asserted by Probus.<sup>285</sup> According to these writers of the Third and Fourth Lives, however, Nemthor was in Taburnia, and Jocelyn says, that Nemthor was near Taburnia. This does not well accord, with Dr. Lanigan's theory, about Neustria, or Neptria. This ancient name, he states, was applied to the old Britain; but, in course of time, and when the Normans began to invade various parts of north-western Gaul, the name Normannia was used indiscriminately for Neustria.<sup>286</sup> They were so identified, that, as one of them happened to be limited to a smaller extent of country, the other was likewise circumscribed; so that, when writing in Latin, Neustria is the term applied to Normandy, by modern writers.<sup>287</sup> The circumstance of St. Patrick calling his country Britain is regarded as affording intrinsic evidence, respecting the antiquity of his Confession; for, the saint well knew the name of his own province, and he also took into account, that it must have been known, by the people, to whom he wrote, under a like name. After the denomination Neustria prevailed, that of Britain fell into disuse.<sup>288</sup> However, in his erudite and ingenious Essay on the birthplace of St. Patrick, Mr. John Cashel Hoey concludes, by identifying Divernia Bononiensis, with the Tabernia Bononiensis, while he thinks Tournehem must be identical with Nemtur, or Fmtor, and Enna he makes synonymous with Enon. If it were necessary, he says, to push his proofs a step further, there is the district, called Le Wicquet, which is undoubtedly derived from the Latin, "Vicus,"<sup>289</sup> and, which might naturally be the vico Bonavem Tabernia, of which the Confession speaks; yet, the historian of Desvres, Baron d'Ordre, already cited, disputes this derivation. He maintains, the word is Celtic, and that it comes from Wic, a Celtic term for "wood," like our word "wicket." Both may be right, for Vicus may be a Latin form of the same word.<sup>290</sup> We have thus fairly analysed some of the best inferential proofs, from topographic names occurring, for France, and especially for its northern parts, as having a presumed connexion with the birth and with the early childhood of our glorious national Apostle.

<sup>282</sup> By Rev. Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>283</sup> Other names had been applied, for various portions of it. See Hadrian Valesius loc. cit.

<sup>284</sup> This is one of the passages, which induced Colgan to dislike Probus. The Bollandists blame him, for having used the word Nevtria. They say, he should have called it Nemthuria, and not have made a province of it, since it was only a town.

<sup>285</sup> "Why should Probus not make Nevtria a province," asks Dr. Lanigan, "having just before mentioned the town Bannaue? Was he to say, that the town of Bannaue was in the town of Nevtria? They respected, however, Probus as an author, and have defended him against an unwarrantable attack of Stanihurst. Some others, among whom Harris (Bishops, p. 6), have endeavoured to depreciate the authority of Probus, who, in spite of their wish to support the fable of Nemthor in Great Britain, is vastly more respectable than their favourite Jocelyn."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. x., and notes 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, pp. 101, 102.

<sup>286</sup> Hadrian Valesius writes, "Pagum Pontivum vitus liber de vita S. Judoci vocat; vocat et liber vetustissimus de vita B. Fursæi abbatis; et ambæ vitæ Haimonem ducem in eo pago sedem habuisse tradunt." See "Notitia Galliarum," at Pontivus pagus.

<sup>287</sup> Hadrian Valesius, at Normannia. In the Dedication of the "Geographia Sacra," speaking of Caen in Normandy, Bochart calls it "Cadomum Neustrie ocellum."

<sup>288</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xv., pp. 117, 118.

<sup>289</sup> According to M. Jean Scoti, Lieutenant particulier de la Sennechaussée de Boulogne.

<sup>290</sup> Among the names of villages, in this district, of the history of which Mr. Hoey could find no trace, one was called Erin, the place where Blessed Benedict Joseph Labre was

The opinion, that St. Patrick was a Scotchman, has been held, by many of our most respectable authorities, and it has nearly the unanimous assent of all the Scottish historians<sup>291</sup> and antiquaries.<sup>292</sup> Various Chronicles and Martyrologies have been quoted, by Dempster,<sup>293</sup> to prove, that St. Patrick had been born in Scotland. Among the chief writers, who are in favour of this theory, may be named Ussher,<sup>294</sup> and Colgan. A special Dissertation, on the birthplace of St. Patrick, has been inserted, by the latter.<sup>295</sup> Sir James Ware, and his editor Walter Harris,<sup>296</sup> the Bollandists,<sup>297</sup> Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>298</sup> Rev. James Wills,<sup>299</sup> Rev. Daniel Rock, D.D.,<sup>300</sup> Rev. Dr. James Henthorn Todd,<sup>301</sup> Alfred Webb,<sup>302</sup> as, also, various other writers, maintain this view. Special Treatises have been written, by the Rev. Duncan Macnab,<sup>303</sup> J. A. Turner,<sup>304</sup> and Very Rev. Laurence Canon Toole,<sup>305</sup> to establish this claim for St. Patrick's nativity in Scotland.

Certain comments upon St. Fiech's Hymn, and which, for the first time, had been published by Colgan,<sup>306</sup> state, that Nemthur was a city in Northern Britain. They call it Alcluid, or Alcluida;<sup>307</sup> and, the name Nemphur is also translated, as meaning "heavenly" or "holy Tower."<sup>308</sup> However, the born. The Commissioners for the Topography of Gaul, as established under the authority of the late Emperor of the French, A.D. 1858, in addition to the topographical surveys and excavations, which they have carried on, have published an oro-hydrographical map of Gaul, in four sheets; a map of Cæsar's campaigns, now out of print; a map of Gaul under Cæsar's proconsulate, in four sheets, like the first; as also some parts of an archaeological Dictionary of Gaul. The Celtic Period contains forty-two quarto sheets, and forty engraved folio plates, giving a résumé of the archaeological history of each locality, the name of which is set down; a map of Gaul, indicating the site of dolmens and megalithic monuments, as also that of inhabited caverns in pre-historic times; a preliminary map of Gaul, referring to the fifth century B.C.; and instructions for correspondents of the Commission. They have also in contemplation a map, showing the geographical distribution of the Gallic tribes, and a Dictionary of Gallo-Roman archaeology, from the reign of Augustus, to the period of the Frankish kings. The non-private publications of the Commission, and such as are not out of print, can be had, at the Librairie Militaire de Dumaine, in Paris. In an issue of the Academy, A.D. 1873, M. Henri Gaidoz calls special attention to the very interesting results, then reached by the Commission.

<sup>291</sup> See James Walsh's "History of the Catholic Church of Scotland," chap. iii., pp. 40, 41.

<sup>292</sup> See William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland: a History of ancient Alban," vol. ii., chap. i., pp. 19, 20.

<sup>293</sup> See Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum, tomus ii., lib. xv., num. 1001, p. 521.

<sup>294</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 426, 427.

<sup>295</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. ii., pp. 221 to 224.

<sup>296</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," pp. 5, 6.

<sup>297</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., xvii. Martii. De S. Patricio, Episcopo, Commentarius prævius, sect. ii., pp. 518, 519.

<sup>298</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other Principal Saints," vol. iii., March xvii.

<sup>299</sup> See "Lives of Illustrious and Distinguished Irishmen," vol. i., part i. First Period, pp. 85, 86.

<sup>300</sup> See his book, "Did the early Church of Ireland acknowledge the Pope's Supremacy? answered in a Letter to Lord John Manners."

<sup>301</sup> See "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. ii., pp. 355 to 361.

<sup>302</sup> See "A Compendium of Irish Biography," p. 430.

<sup>303</sup> See his "Archæological Dissertation on the Birthplace of St. Patrick," read in St. Margaret's School-room, at Airdee, on the 25th of September, 1865. Duffy's, Dublin: 1866, 8vo.

<sup>304</sup> See "An Inquiry as to the Birthplace of St. Patrick," read before the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, 8th of January, 1872. Edinburgh, 1872, "Archæologia Scotica," vol. v., part i., No. x., pp. 261 to 284, 4to.

<sup>305</sup> In an admirable Paper, "Where was St. Patrick born?" read at the Catholic Academia, Manchester, 1876. The learned author has kindly lent his Manuscript of this valuable Tract—yet unpublished—and it has been used with great advantage, in discussing the present question.

<sup>306</sup> See his "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>307</sup> See ibid. Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ, n. i., p. 4.

<sup>308</sup> Colgan has it, "Neamthur sive Nemptor, i.e., Cælestis turris appellatur." —Ibid., n. 2, p. 6. The Fourth (cap. i.) and the Seventh (lib. i., cap. i.) Life of our saint have the same interpretation. See pp. 35, 117.

writer adds, in another note, that St. Patrick and his family removed from Alcluda,<sup>309</sup> and they went, for the transaction of business, to Armorican Lethania, or Letha.<sup>310</sup> This latter word, as we are informed, has nearly the same meaning as Armorica, being styled by the British Celts, Llydaw, i.e., litoralis, or "upon the shore." The First,<sup>311</sup> Second<sup>312</sup> and Third<sup>313</sup> Lives of our saint have nothing to indicate the situation<sup>314</sup> of Nemthor, and nothing whatever about Alcluda, or Alcluide; while the Fourth Life brings his parents from Armorica,<sup>315</sup> to the region of Strato-Clude, Anglicised, Strath-Clyde, where he was born. The Fifth Life has it, that Patrick's birth took place, among the Britons; that he belonged to the village Bannaue, of the Tiburnian district, and of the province of Nentria.<sup>316</sup> The Sixth Life states, that he was born and brought up, in the village, called Taburnia, near the town of Nempthor.<sup>317</sup> Again, the Irish Tripartite Life has it, that St. Patrick's origin was from the Britons of Alcluide.<sup>318</sup> Nemthor is said to have been the place of his birth.<sup>319</sup> This place, if not the other localities here alluded to, must be sought for in Scotland, to furnish the requisite evidence, that she may claim St. Patrick, as one of her many distinguished sons.

The neighbourhood of Glasgow has been generally accepted, as the probable spot, to be assigned for St. Patrick's birthplace. Here it is thought should be found that ancient North Britain city of Nemthor, otherwise called Alcluide.<sup>320</sup> Now Alcluaid or Erclud has been translated<sup>321</sup> "upon an <sup>309</sup> Dr. Rock has asserted, that the writer of St. Fiech's Hymn and its Commentator had assigned the British city, Alcluih, under the poetical name of Nemthor, as the birth-place of St. Patrick. See "Did the Early Church of Ireland acknowledge the Pope's Supremacy?" answered in a Letter to Lord John Manners," p. iii. Yet, there seems to be little similarity, in those names, in sound or meaning.

<sup>310</sup> Camden seems to confine Letha, or, as some writers of the middle ages call it, Letavia, to that tract, now denominated Britany. See "Britannia," col. cxxxi.

<sup>311</sup> See "Hymnus seu Prima Vita S. Patricii." Strophe I, p. 1.

<sup>312</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. i., iv., p. 11.

<sup>313</sup> See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. i., iv., p. 21.

<sup>314</sup> Except, indeed, that it was situated in a plain, afterwards called "camp-field," because a Roman army had there wintered, for awhile; and, hence the spot was called Tabern, "Campus Taburni, id est, campus tabernaculorum."

<sup>315</sup> We find added, "juxta mare Thyrrenum." However, as Colgan remarks, this latter denomination means the Tuscan or Lower Sea, while the emendation he suggests for "Thyrrenum" is "Gallicum," as the Gaulish Sea was near Armorica. See "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. i., p. 35, and n. 4, p. 48.

<sup>316</sup> See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. i., p. 51.

<sup>317</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. i., iv., p. 65.

<sup>318</sup> See Sister Mary Francis Clare Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 372.

<sup>319</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. i., p. 117.

<sup>320</sup> According to the Scholiast, on the Hymn, attributed to St. Fiach. Again, in "The Four Ancient Books of Wales," edited by William F. Skene, there is an old Poem, copied from a Manuscript, formerly belonging to a Priory of Black Canons in Carmarthen, suppressed in the reign of King Henry VIII. This Poem professes to be a conversation, between Merdyn and Taliesin; and, it describes a battle, between the Britons and their northern enemies, who were routed. In the first line of the third stanza, the town of Nempthor or Nevtur is mentioned:—

"Rac denur inentur y tirran."

"Before two men in nevtur will they land."

Mr. Skene, in reference to this Poem, says: "There is one allusion in it which marks great antiquity—that to a place called "Nevtur"—which can be no other than Nempthor—the most ancient name of Dumbarton, and one not applied to it, or indeed known, after the eighth century."—Vol. i., chap. xii., p. 222. John Hardyng, who lived in the fourteenth century, wrote an English Chronicle, in verse. Relating the historic legends of that time, he says, a king, named Ebranke, who lived 800 years B.C., built the castle of Alclude:—

"In Albany he made and edified, The Castle of Alclude, which Dumbritayne,
As some authors by Chronicle hath applied, angle or a corner.”<sup>322</sup> But, according to other writers, this denomination is resolvable into two compounds, Al, or Ail,<sup>323</sup> “a rock,” and Cluid, the name for the present River Clyde. Hence, the compound word might mean, “the rock on the Clyde.” According to this derivation, Alcluid should be in Albain or North Britain. It is supposed, this may be identical with the Petra Cloithe,<sup>324</sup> mentioned by Adamnan.<sup>325</sup> From the Clyde, also, is derived the name of that district, Strathclyde,<sup>326</sup> through which it flows; while, we are told, that the level land, on the bank opposite to Dumbarton, had been called Ara-cluide, or “shore of the Clyde.”<sup>327</sup> The place where its insulated rock stood is described, by Venerable Bede, as on the right hand of the western gulf, which formerly divided the Picts from the Britons. There was the strong city Alcluith, where the western extremity of the Roman Wall ended.<sup>328</sup> The Irish version of Nennius, we are told, describes it, as the Cathraig, in Leamhain, or “the Rock on the Leven,” as found in the “Book of Ballymote.”<sup>329</sup> This again, is said to have been known as Dun-Britton,

Dumbarton Rock and Castle, Scotland.

And some sayen on the Pight wall
certayne,
At the west end it stood, that now is playne.”

After the thirteenth century, the name of Alcluid was supplanted by Dun-breatain, now Dumbarton. Very Rev. Canon Toole's Manuscript, pp. 30 to 34.

<sup>321</sup> See Martin A. O'Brennan's “History of Ireland,” p. 441.

<sup>322</sup> See Dr. Todd's Irish version of the Liber Hymnorum.

<sup>323</sup> See Edward O'Reilly's “Irish-English Dictionary,” under either form of the word. In Cormac's “Glossary,” translated and annotated by the late John O'Donovan, LL.D., and edited, with notes and indices, by Whitley Stokes, LL.D., Alt is rendered “a cliff” or “height.” See p. 4, Calcutta, 1868, 4to.

<sup>324</sup> Meaning, likewise, “rock on the Clyde.”

<sup>325</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's “Life of St. Columba,” lib. i., cap. 15, p. 43.

<sup>326</sup> For a detailed account of the Strathclyud Britons, see Chalmers' “Caledonia,” vol. i., pp. 235 to 249.

<sup>327</sup> Manuscript of Very Rev. Laurence Canon Toole, pp. 24 to 26.

<sup>328</sup> See “Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum,” lib. i., cap. i., xii.

<sup>329</sup> According to Canon Toole's Manuscript, p. 27.

<sup>330</sup> See Fullarton's “Imperial Gazetteer or "the British fort," because it was regarded as one of their chief strongholds, against the assaults of their enemies. The site is thought, also, to have been a Roman naval station, under the name of Theodosia; and, it appears not improbable, that the rock was occupied, by a Roman fort. It has an interesting history. The rock is an erupted trappean mass of basalt, protruding through beds of red sandstone, having a double peaked form, and cleft towards the summit, by a narrow, deep chasm. It rises sheer up, from the circumjacent low, flat, marshy tract, and, it stands completely isolated, from any other elevations. This is said to have been the capital city of Strathclyde.<sup>330</sup> To-day, it is known as Dumbarton, a very notable land-mark, on the north bank of the River Clyde.<sup>331</sup> A castle, and a small garrison, with the governor's house, occupy this position, from which the view is truly panoramic and gorgeous.<sup>332</sup> It must be observed, while endeavouring to prove Nemthur identical with Alcluide, or near it, Colgan was yet puzzled, to find the exact locality for such a town.<sup>333</sup> None of those writers, treating on this subject, have succeeded, by identifying St. Patrick's birth, with any single ancient locality, about or near Dumbarton, and named in original documents. Nor, in the course of carefully examining this district, by consulting recognised authorities concerning its topography, is it possible to obtain any acceptable evidence, in corroboration.<sup>334</sup> By some authorities,<sup>335</sup> of Scotland, Topographical, Statistical and Historical," vol. i., p. 413.

<sup>331</sup> Colgan has even quoted Jocelyn as his authority for Taburnia having been situated, near to the Clyde, and on its south bank. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xi., pp. 66, 67, and Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. ii., p. 223.

<sup>332</sup> The accompanying view of Dumbarton Rock and Castle has been drawn on the wood, from a photograph, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>333</sup> See his Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. ii., pp. 221 to 224. "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>334</sup> However, Mr. J. H. Turner—recognising the difficulty of determining the true character of Nemthur, as a town, or as a district—remarks, that besides meaning etymologically "the heavenly," or "the holy tower," or "mount," it may also mean, "the vaulted tower," or "the tower of Nen." Thus, the old Gaelic noem, modern noam, is "holy," neam, or neamh, is "heaven;" while the Cymric nen—possibly the word on which the name was formed—means "a vault," and hence, metaphorically, "heaven," the corresponding adjective being nenni. But Nenn, Nann, and Nem were all Celtic proper names. Thus, Ninnias, or Ninian, the name of the great Pictish Apostle, under his cognomen of St. Ringan, is the same with Nennius, and both names mean "heavenly." The Cymric tor is either a pointed hill, or a tower. Hence, the name Nentria or Nemthur is susceptible of various explanations. Some have been disposed to identify Nemthur with Nemphar, an ancient township or village, close to the burgh of Lanark. We find a Nenthorn in Berwickshire. In the Upper Ward is the River Nethan, a tributary of the Clyde, which may even have given name to the district or province. In this latter supposition, it is easy to perceive, how the name may have been mistaken for that of a town, by persons who were not acquainted with the localities, and who were misled by a plausible and obvious etymology of the word. It is thought, that Nentria may have been the primal or archetypal name of Strathclyde district, and that it was probably derived from the Cymric nant, "a valley," and, dwr, "water," or combined, "the valley of the water;" for, the Clyde, along the greater part of its course, flows in a dale, between chains of hills, through which it appears to have formed a channel for its course, so that the name Nentria, taken in such a sense as the foregoing, has a peculiar appropriateness, as applied to the territory of Strathclyde. Again, in allusion to the words, "which giants are said formerly to have inhabited;" however ludicrous, this seems to have reference to the Attacots or Attacoti, who were inhabitants of western Scotland, and who lived "not far from the western sea." In its original Gaelic form, their tribe-name was Aithaich-coilteach, which may signify, either "inhabitants of the woods," or "giants of the woods;" and, it would seem, that Probus, having heard or read of their prowess in arms and ferocity, like the Anakim or giants of the Old Testament, chose to interpret their name in the latter sense, supposing their physical stature corresponded with their wild and savage character. See "Archæologia Scotica," vol. v. No. x. An Inquiry as to the birthplace of St. Patrick, part ii., pp. 276, 277, and notes, read before the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, 8th of January, 1872. The Rev.

Emtur<sup>336</sup> ought to be written for Nemtur, or Nentur ;<sup>337</sup> while, the whole difficulty, regarding these forms, is said to have arisen, from the use of agglutination,<sup>338</sup> and from ignorance or imperfect knowledge of the Celtic language.<sup>339</sup> Thus, em is thought to be only the Celtic definite article, represented by an or am ; although em, or am, is not always now the definite article, for when it comes between the preposition in, or ann, and a noun, it is frequently only what grammarians call an euphonic particle, but which appears to be used like an indefinite article.<sup>340</sup> Again, the Irish text of St. Fiach's Hymn requires consideration,<sup>341</sup> while, we are told, after all, that there is no word, in Celtic or Gælic, beginning with Nemp, or Emp, that it is barbarous Latin, and a proper name, made from a common noun. It is guessed, that Emptor—or, as sometimes rendered, Empthoria—is easily detected, in barbarous phonetic corruptions of the Latin word, Emporium, “a market town.” By the Rev. Duncan Macnab, its site is thought to be Chapel Hill<sup>342</sup>—beside the village of Kilpatrick—and where Scottish antiquaries are agreed, that there was not only a Roman fort,<sup>343</sup> but a station for troops, at the end of the wall built by Antoninus. The name Taburnia, or Tabernia,<sup>344</sup> as applying to any part of Great Britain, cannot be found, it is stated, in Ptolemy ; nor in any of the old Roman Itineraries ; as, for instance, in that, which goes under the name of Antoninus.<sup>345</sup> Neither is it to be Duncan Macnab is inclined, however, to give the name of giants—as understood by the Scottish bards and historians—to the heroes of Ossian's Poems. See “Archæological Dissertation on the Birthplace of St. Patrick,” pp. 30 to 32.

<sup>335</sup> Professor Eugene O'Curry found the correction, Emtur, in the oldest extant Manuscript of St. Fiach's Hymn, preserved in the British Museum. It is also in some of the Breviaries. The Rev. Duncan Macnab approves it.

<sup>336</sup> This means simply “the tower.”

<sup>337</sup> Meaning “of the towers.”

<sup>338</sup> By this technical term, pronouns are joined to verbs, and sometimes, also, the auxiliary verb to that which it helps to form ; prepositions are united to nouns, and they also coalesce with pronouns ; while, occasionally, the last letter of a word is prefixed to the succeeding word. See Max Müller's “Lectures on the Science of Language,” p. 303.

<sup>339</sup> See “Archæological Dissertation on the Birthplace of St. Patrick,” p. 12.

<sup>340</sup> The euphonic particle an, or am, is inserted between the preposition ann (in), and a noun singular or plural, used indefinitely—as Ann an tigh, in a house ; Ann am baile. Before the article or relative ann is written anns, as anns an tigh (in the house). Very often the preposition is elided, as am' bail eile, in another town. The ellipsis is always left unmarked ; but, as an and am may in this connection be mistaken for the article, they should be written 'am, 'an, for the sake of distinction ; as am bail' eile, the other town ; 'am bail' eile, in the other town. See Munro's “Gælic Grammar,” p. 194.

<sup>341</sup> Dr. Charles O'Conor gives it thus : “Genair Patraic i Nemthur,” which he translates, “Natus est Patricius Nemturri.” See “Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores,” tomus i. Prolegomina, pars i., p. xc. Freed from agglutination, the Irish text should stand, “Genair Patraic in em thur ;” or, as corrected by Professor O'Curry, “Genair Patraic in em tûr.” This means literally, “Genitus est Patricius in turri,” in English, “Patrick was begotten in the tower.” There is no reason for setting down the em here in question, as anything else than the definite article, according to the Rev. Duncan Macnab ; especially, as we have no means for knowing the euphonic ideas, entertained by St. Fiach and the Irish Celts of his time.

<sup>342</sup> Here sepulchral stones, coins, and other Roman remains, have been discovered.

<sup>343</sup> Nempthor is called an oppidum, or a walled and fortified town, by Jocelyn, and by three other biographers of St. Patrick, and by two of the Breviaries. Indeed, these of Armagh and of Paris tell us expressly, that Emptor or Empthoria was in Britain ; and, we have seen, that St. Fiach's Scholiast places it at Alcluth, in North Britain.

<sup>344</sup> The Rev. Duncan Macnab says : “Tabernia is as clearly Celtic as Hibernia—I-Erin—i.e., the island of Erin. Tabh-Erin, or Tab-Erin, i.e., the sea of Erin. Tabernia may also, though not so naturally, be resolved into Taob-Erin ; for, in Taob, a side, ao is a diphthong whose sound according to the different provincial dialects or accents is approximated by the Latin a or u, but cannot be expressed by ao pronounced separately and distinctly.”—“Archæological Dissertation on the Birthplace of St. Patrick,” p. 9.

<sup>345</sup> The places, where Roman camps were established in Great Britain, had been usually designated, by the adjunct castra. Wherefore, chester, or cester, is a form, in which we find the names of very many cities and towns, especially in England, to have their termination.

found in the "Britanniæ Chronographia," written by the anonymous geographer of Ravenna.<sup>346</sup> No mention of it occurs, in Ricardus Corenensis,<sup>347</sup> nor in William Camden,<sup>348</sup> nor in John Speed,<sup>349</sup> nor in Horsley,<sup>350</sup> nor in any other known authority. Although Ussher himself had illustrated,<sup>351</sup> or noted, the list of old British towns, as given by Nennius;<sup>352</sup> yet, he has not attempted to identify those places, alluded to in the Acts of St. Patrick. Still, it is hard to believe, that a British topographical denomination could have wholly disappeared from history, and have been lost to tradition; especially, in a locality, where Celtic designations of places have so numerous come down from olden ages. However, the ordinary disturbing causes of time and change have frequently induced disguises or alterations in nomenclature; so that the ingenuity of etymologists or theorists need not necessarily be at fault, in finding the requisite equivalent. In the first instance, it seems from the historic evidence cited, that St. Patrick was captured, but perhaps not born, at Bonaven Taberniæ;<sup>353</sup> and, again, if it were necessary to find his birthplace so denominated, it could not be unreasonable to suppose, that the "River-mouth," and the "Tabern,"<sup>354</sup> or "hut-plain of encampment,"<sup>355</sup> were identical with the estuary of the Clyde, at Dumbarton, in Scotland.<sup>356</sup>

<sup>346</sup> However, he gives Memanturam as one among several name-places, in North Britain. "If we suppose the initial M to have been substituted for N," says Mr. Turner, "this would be the Latinization of Nemthur." Again, the anonymous writer mentions Nemeton, stating it lies where Britain is narrowest from sea to sea, and that it was connected with other towns named. Owing to the fact, that he wrote in barbarous Latin, and from the circumstances related, the Rev. Duncan Macnab infers, it may possibly be identified with Emptur or Nemphor. See "Archæological Dissertation on the Birthplace of St. Patrick," p. 37, and n. 63, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>347</sup> See "De Situ Britanniaë."

<sup>348</sup> See his "Britannia."

<sup>349</sup> See his "History of Great Britain."

<sup>350</sup> See "Britannia Romana."

<sup>351</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. v., p. 59, and the following pages.

<sup>352</sup> See their names, in the Irish Version of this author, edited by Rev. Dr. Todd and by the Hon. Algernon Herbert, pp. 28, 29 and note (x.)

<sup>353</sup> The Rev. Duncan Macnab states, that, in Celtic, Bonaven Taberniæ means the mouth of a river flowing into the Irish sea. He adds, there is a slight difference, between what Probus states, that the birthplace of St. Patrick was not far from the western sea, and what Jocelyn writes, that it was contiguous to the Irish sea, but these relations are easily reconcilable. See "Archæological Dissertation on the Birthplace of St. Patrick," pp. 43 to 45.

<sup>354</sup> This word may probably be regarded, as identical with the Irish ṭabairne, "a tavern."

<sup>355</sup> In the seventy-seventh Psalm, we find a nearly similar form, "in campo Taneos."

<sup>356</sup> Mr. J. H. Turner, while despairing of being able to localize, with certainty, Bannaue or Bonaven, as also Tiburnia, Taburnia, or Taburne, yet finds, that Bannave might answer admirably to denote the mouth of the Leven, where it joins the Clyde; whereas, Taburnia or Tiburnia is a designation, most appropriate for a river-district, or a ross, placed between two streams. It is thought, that of all the existing names, in western Scotland, Bunaw, or "the mouth of the Awe," where it falls into Loch Etive, is that which most closely represents the Bannaue of Probus. Thus, the most probable site for it is the confluence of the Aven or Avon, with the main stream of the Clyde, near which the present town of Hamilton stands. Tabernia or Taburnia, the same writer derives from the Gaelic taibh, and tobair, gen. tobair, "water," Cymric, dwfr. The n is accounted for, from the assumption of the Ge. aon, "country," or "district," as the conjoined word tobair-aon. Eliding ao, and adding an appropriate termination, the result is Tabernia, the appellation. This should be the present district of Strathaven, or the upper course of the Clyde itself, which might well be so designated, in reference to the Falls, presenting one of the most striking combinations of natural beauty and grandeur. Mr. Turner thinks, that the explanation of Tabernia, by the monkish writers of St. Patrick's Lives, as campus tabernaculorum, "the field of tents," is a mere paragram. See his "Inquiry as to the Birthplace of St. Patrick," part ii., pp. 275, 276, with notes. See, likewise, Sir Samuel Ferguson's "Congal," notes, pp. 35, 197.

<sup>357</sup> See the "Statistical Survey of Scot-

We are informed, that a rock in the Clyde bore the name, "St. Patrick's Stone," and that the figure of a man, said to have been St. Patrick, was to be seen on an antiquated tombstone, at Old Kilpatrick churchyard.<sup>357</sup> It lies contiguous to Chapel Hill.<sup>358</sup> A local tradition of this having been his birthplace,<sup>359</sup>—which yet prevails—although few at present insist on it, could hardly have arisen, it is contended, unless the belief in his having been a native of the district had been strongly rooted, in the minds of the population.<sup>360</sup> Lastly, a place, nearly resembling Enon, in etymology, has been sought for, near Dumbarton, yet, with indifferent success.<sup>361</sup> However, as Enon is a doubtful reading for "enim," this search, perhaps, is only a mere waste of time and labour; but, as few very old Manuscript copies of St. Patrick's Confession remain,<sup>362</sup> and these, for the most part, apparently not older than the eleventh century, we can hardly determine this matter, by reference to their respective readings. Although, not attempting to identify with exactness, all those places named, as connected with St. Patrick's nativity, we think, notwithstanding, the preponderating weight of evidence should determine that event, as occurring in Strathclyde district, and within the present kingdom of Scotland.

St. David's Cathedral, Wales.

That he was born, in the vale of Rosina, in the country of Tibornia, or Neutria, in the village of Banava, and in the county of Pembroke, in Welsh land," vol. v., at Old Kilpatrick, and Garnett's "Tour," vol. i., p. 6.

<sup>358</sup> See Rev. Duncan Macnab's "Archæological Dissertation on the Birthplace of Saint Patrick," p. 39.

<sup>359</sup> This is mentioned, by Mr. John Dillon, in a Paper on St. Patrick, which was read to the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, on the 25th of November, 1816.

<sup>360</sup> See J. H. Turner, "An Inquiry as to the Birthplace of St. Patrick," part ii., p.

276.

<sup>361</sup> See Rev. Duncan Macnab's "Archæological Dissertation on the Birthplace of St. Patrick," pp. 46, 47.

<sup>362</sup> The oldest known is that, in the "Book of Armagh," referred to the ninth century.

<sup>363</sup> See "Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis," tomus i., pars. ii., p. 90. By the Welsh, our Irish Apostle was called Padrig Maenwyn, son of Mawon, and he is Britain, is an opinion, held by John Pitts,<sup>363</sup> and apparently founded on a statement, in the "Aurea Legenda," as interpreted by Caxton, who relates, that the country of the Irish Apostle was Pendiach, or Pependiach, near the vale of Rosina. William Camden<sup>364</sup> and Humphry Llyud<sup>365</sup> adopt this statement. According to one account, admitting his birth to have been in this locality, the village of Taburnia, was hard by Emptor town, now called St. David's,<sup>366</sup> otherwise old Menevia. Here yet stands a stately Cathedral of the middle ages;<sup>367</sup> but, there is no evidence of any value to show, that St. Patrick was born in this locality.<sup>368</sup> However, such a notion may have arisen from the circumstance, recorded in some of his Acts, that before embarking for Ireland, he stood in the beautiful vale of Rhos, or Rosina.

Touching the diversity of opinions, respecting this point, the writer of the English Martyrology<sup>369</sup> considers Bristol, in England, to have been the place of his nativity.<sup>370</sup> This latter city, it is said, lost the name of Cær Britton soon after St. Patrick's time, and then it appeared as Brit-stow, Brightstowe, or Bristol.<sup>371</sup> It is supposed, that the old denomination of this latter place being unknown to St. Fiach's Scholiast, he identified Nemthor with Alcluit, otherwise bearing the Roman-British etymon, Cær-Britton, now Dumbarton.<sup>372</sup> said to have been born in Cwrt-y-Carn, Glamorganshire.

<sup>364</sup> See his description of Pembroke, in "Britannia," vol. ii., col. 756. Gibson's edition.

<sup>365</sup> See his "Britannicæ Descriptionis Commentariolum," &c., fol. 61.

<sup>366</sup> See the English translation, by W. P., Esq., of Father Peter Ribadeneira's "Lives of Saints," &c., part i., p. 156. Dublin edition.

<sup>367</sup> The accompanying illustration of St. David's Cathedral was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>368</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. ii., p. 221. In this connection, it may be permitted to remark, that Benevento in Italy is thought to be identical with Bonaven, and the district around it, as corresponding with Taburnia, by Rev. Richard Doyle, Pastor of St. Brigid's Church, Liverpool. This opinion, he thinks, might be deduced from an ancient Map of Italy, which he examined, and there was a mountain, in that neighbourhood, to which Virgil alludes in his Georgics:—

"Juvat Ismara Baccho
Conserere, atque olea magnum vestire Taburnum."

—Lib. ii., vv. 37, 38.

The fact of St. Patrick's Latin origin, on the father's side, is also mentioned, in a letter written to the author, and dated, March 18th, 1875.

<sup>369</sup> When treating about St. Patrick, at the 17th of March.

<sup>370</sup> It is said, that while Dumbarton in Scotland bore the name of Cær Britton, the city of Bristol, in England, had a similar name. In an Appendix, to the Latin Version of the "Historia Britonum" of Nennius, we find Kær-Bristow, and again, Cair-Brihton, to which the editor Thomas Gale attaches the following comment: "Quæ Huntingdoniensi et Cambd. pag. 173. est Cair-Briston, id est, Bristolia. Melius forte Dun-Britton Alcluid olim dictum." In the text, two of the British cities are called Cær—the other distinguishing epithets being omitted. See "Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, Anglo-Danicæ Scriptores XV.," pp. 115, 135, 138. In the Irish copies, one of the British cities is called Cær-Breatan, and the other Cær Brut. See the Additional Notes to the "Irish Version of the Historia Britonum" of Nennius, pp. iii., iv.

<sup>371</sup> See vol. ii. of "Ancient Laws of Ireland." Senchur Mór. Part ii. Preface, p. xiv. The editors' names attached are W. Neilson Hancock, and Thaddeus O'Mahony.

<sup>372</sup> The openings of the two rivers, near Bristol, and where the Frome meets the Avon, in the tidal part of the latter, have some points of resemblance with the estuary, near Dumbarton, near where the Clyde and Leven unite, in the tidal part of the former. Great Roman military stations were near Dumbarton, as also at Cær Baden, (Bath) where there were wealthy Romans, as colonists, by whom it was called "Aquæ Solis et Thermæ." At Clifden, on the Avon, at Rownham, and at Abbotsleigh, traces of Roman encampments have been found. "And so Bristol, Glastonbury, and the Tor of St. Michael or Nemphor, would be all situated in a district of encampments, which some have thought to be the meaning of the name Taberniæ or Tiburniæ, which occurs in the description of Bonavem or Bonaven Taberniæ, the place where St. Patrick's father resided at the time of his capture. This place is also said to be near the western

Again, with apparent want of accuracy, others aver, that St. Patrick belonged to Cornwall; but, it is probable, he has been confounded with St. Petroc, a native of this district.<sup>373</sup> In the Second Volume of Ancient Laws of Ireland, the Irish editors of the Senchus Mor have considered this interesting question,<sup>374</sup> and have arrived at the conclusion, that St. Patrick was born at or near Glastonbury,<sup>375</sup> in Somersetshire, under the shadow of the Tor of St. Michael.<sup>376</sup> A traditional account refers the Christian foundation here, to St. Joseph of Arimathea, and to eleven other disciples of St. Philip.<sup>377</sup> Arviragus, a British king, is said to have furnished a rude and an uncultivated island, with other lands, for their purpose.<sup>378</sup> It was a tradition at Glastonbury, that before he came to Ireland, the great St. Patrick, our Apostle, had there enrolled himself among the monastic brethren.<sup>379</sup> Nor was he the only Irish saint connected with its religious life.<sup>380</sup> It must be acknowledged, this sea, or the Atlantic ocean, a description which is much more applicable to the position of Bristol than to that of Dumbarton, and it is not unreasonable to assume, that the place of St. Patrick's birth (Nempthor), and that of his father's subsequent residence, were not far distant from each other."—Ibid., pp. xvi., xvii.

Glastonbury and the Tor of St. Michael, England.

<sup>373</sup> Such is the very reasonable supposition of Very Rev. Canon Laurence Toole in his Manuscript, "Where was St. Patrick born?" pp. 44, 45.

<sup>374</sup> The theory, that St. Patrick was born and resided with his parents, in the vicinity of Glastonbury and Bristol, is considered by them to be consistent with the particulars which he has given us, regarding his capture and his subsequent escape to his friends and home. See Preface, pp. xix. to xxii.

<sup>375</sup> According to the poetical legend,

"Where the winter thorn Blossoms at Christmas, mindful of our Lord."

Again, it is related, that there Joseph of Arimathea lived, and that after death he deposited

"The Cup, the Cup itself from which our Lord
Drank at the last sad supper with His own."

<sup>376</sup> The accompanying illustration of Glastonbury, almost buried under the surrounding hills, and the prominent object on the right, known as the Tor of St. Michael, are copied from an old engraving of Hollar, and have been drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman. Our engraving is by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>377</sup> See Johannis, "Glastoniæ Historia." Hearne's edition, vol. i., pp. 1, 48.

<sup>378</sup> See Collinson's "History of Somersetshire," vol. ii., p. 239.

<sup>379</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Early Irish Missions," No. 1, pp. 18, 19.

<sup>380</sup> See the interesting illustrations and was no unfitting or unworthy birthplace for the birth of this immortal Confessor of the Christian faith.

Among the modern authors, who have treated Scottish ecclesiastical history,<sup>381</sup> one writer seeks—but in vain—to assign the exact period, for the introduction of Christianity, among the Scots of North Britain. In alluding to the birth of St. Patrick, however, he does not undertake to decide the question, as to whether it took place in Scotland, or in any other different country. Yet, it is asserted, that from St. Patrick's statements, in his Confession, and in his Epistle to Coroticus, it may fairly be inferred, that he was born in the Island of Britain. In the first-named tract, our Apostle speaks of going "in Britannias"<sup>382</sup>—thus using the plural number;<sup>383</sup> and, in the time of the Romans, these invaders distinguished the portion of that insular country, subject to them, by the name of Britannia Romana,<sup>384</sup> while the other parts, beyond their sway, were designated Britannia Barbara. But, the Saxon conquest, which commenced in St. Patrick's lifetime, probably obliterated the old Roman denominations; and, yet, he would naturally refer to those British provinces, in the plural sense, as connected with his special allusion, in the treatises already quoted.

CHAPTER III.

THE PARENTS AND FAMILY OF PATRICK—EXAMINATION OF THEIR RECORDED NAMES, AND OF OUR SAINT'S GENEALOGY AND PEDIGREE—DIFFERENT OPINIONS REGARDING THE YEAR OF HIS BIRTH—HIS BAPTISM—MIRACLES THEN WROUGHT—ST. PATRICK'S EARLY CHILDHOOD.

ACCORDING to a received notion, St. Patrick was the son of a Gallic or British official, employed in the Roman service, at an extreme outpost of history of Glastonbury, in Sir William Dugdale's "Monasticum Anglicanum," vol. i., pp. 1 to 79. London edition of 1817, folio.

<sup>381</sup> See Rev. John Cunningham's "Church History of Scotland from the commencement of the Christian era to the present Century," vol. i., chap. ii.

<sup>382</sup> See Father Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. S. Patricii Confessio, cap. iii., sect. 13, p. 197.

<sup>383</sup> Thus, too, Gallia is often written for Gallia, as Britannia for Britannia. Catullus has them both in one line:—

"Hunc Gallia timetis et Britannia?"

—"Carmina." In Cæsarem, xxix., v. 21. However, no part of Great Britain could be called a Roman province, in the time of Catullus, who wrote before its invasion by Julius Cæsar, and who died about 710, U.C.

<sup>384</sup> Thus, at an early period, Britannia Romana was divided into two provinces; one south of the Thames and Severn, and one to the west of the Severn and Dee, which included Wales. "These provinces were called respectively Britannia Prima and Britannia Secunda, a mode of distinguishing them similar to that which we have adopted in the appellations of Upper and Lower Canada. In the course of time other provinces were added: Maxima Cæsariensis comprised the central parts of England; Flavia Cæsariensis lay to the north; and Valentia included that portion of the extreme north of England and the south of Scotland, which lay between the Roman roads or walls, one of which extended from Carlisle to Newcastle, and the other from the Frith of Clyde to the Frith of Forth. From the division of the empire by the first Christian emperors down to the time of St. Patrick, Britannia Romana was divided into these five provinces."—"The Ancient Laws of Ireland." Senchur mor. Part ii., vol. ii. Preface xiv., xv.

CHAPTER III.—<sup>1</sup> According to some writers, the Scoti and the Scuthi, or Scythians, have been confounded, in reference to the traditional accounts of their settlement, in Scotland. In the opening chapters of "Vita B. Cadroe Abb. Valciodorensis," written by an anonymous author, in the eleventh century, there is a curious account of the early adventurers of Southern Europe, who came to settle in Ireland and in Scotland. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hi- their colonial dependency, in the north of Great Britain. It must be borne in mind, that long before his time, the Scoti,<sup>1</sup> and Picts, or Cruthenians,<sup>2</sup> from Ireland,<sup>3</sup> had settled in the south-western parts of Scotland. These people must have spoken some dialect of the Gaelic or Irish language,<sup>4</sup> and not very divergent from the mother tongue. For the reason, that British Christians and the old Scots could understand each other, without an interpreter, it has been supposed, the latter were first taught Christianity by the former.<sup>5</sup> However this may be, although, perhaps, derived from distinctive races, both the parents of St. Patrick appear to have been Christians.

That our saint belonged to a very respectable family may be inferred, from those accounts, which have come down to us.<sup>6</sup> In the aforesaid Emp-tor, near Bonaven, Taburniæ, or in Alcluaide of the Britons, lived one Calpurn, or Calphrainn,<sup>7</sup> Latinized Calphurnius, called a deacon, and a noble berniæ," vi. Martii, cap. ii., iii., iv., v., pp. 494, 495, and nn. 3 to 40, pp. 501, 502.

<sup>2</sup> The legendary account of these people—derived from Thrace—may be seen, in "The Irish Version of the Historia Britonum of Nennius," edited by Rev. Dr. Todd, and by the Hon. Algonon Herbert, sect. xxvii. to xxxii., pp. 120 to 167, with accompanying notes. Their expedition to Ireland, and settlement there, are related, with their subsequent departure for Ile, or Ilay, and Alba, or Scotland, where their sway was established. There is also a legendary history of the Picts and Cruithnians, taken from the "Book of Lecan," fol. 141, a, col. 1, and fol. 286, b, col. 2, in the Additional Notes, No. xviii., pp. lxxv. to lxxiv.

<sup>3</sup> About A.D. 360, the Picts and Scots began seriously to disturb the Roman settlements, in North Britain. They were afterwards joined by the Attacotti and Saxons, in general assaults on the Roman colonists. From A.D. 369 to 387, the Romans made reprisals, and drove back the Picts and Scots, to their native fastnesses. See an interesting account of those events, in William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland: a History of Ancient Alban," vol. i., chap. ii., pp. 97 to 105.

<sup>4</sup> Thus, St. Columba, in the sixth century, is represented, as freely conversing with the Pictish King Brude, with Broichan, his Magus, or Druid, and with the king's messengers, without the aid of an interpreter. Again, when preaching the word of God, an interpreter was required: this seems to indicate some dialectic differences, between the Scottish and Pictish languages. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," book i., cap. 33, p. 62, and book ii., cap. 33, 34, pp. 146 to 148.

<sup>5</sup> See, Mr. David Calderwood's "History of the Kirk of Scotland." Edited by the Rev. Thomas Thomson, vol. i. Preamble, p. 37.

<sup>6</sup> The following notice of St. Patrick is given, in a MS. of T.C.D., classed, H. 3. 18, p. 520:—in pūten, in lappair, ocuī in ūa loḡmar, ocuī in locharinn lann-neppōai pō mōrchair [i. pō comuillir]

īarēar in beḡa .i. Sanctuī patriciū. patrāic ōm, ōi bṛetnāib, āilcluaroe ā bunauir, Calpurno ainm ā achar .i. uapal pacart, fotio ainm ā penathar, deochon ādacomnāic .i. āt comāim. It is translated: "The radiance, the blaze, and the bright gem, and the brilliant lamp that illumined, i.e., gave light to, the western world, i.e., Sanctus Patricius. Patrick now was of the Britons, Ailcluaide was his native place, Calpurn was his father's name, i.e., a noble priest; Fotid was his grandfather's name; Deochan his family name, i.e., his surname."—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv. March, 1868, n. (d), pp. 283, 284.

<sup>7</sup> In Professor O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish," vol. ii., pp. 166, 167, and n. 197, we find the following curious genealogy of Saint Patrick, ascribed to Flann of the Monastery:—

*patrāic āb eīenn uile mac Calphrainn, mic fotāroe, mic Deirre, nar ōiḡ ōo lūb, mic Cormāic moir, mic Leirbriūt, mic Ōta, mic Ōirpuc maī, mic moiric, mic Léo in lannraī, mic Maximī, maīḡ na flonn, mic Enepercta āiro ālaimo, mic rīlirir rērr ār āḡ cāc, mic ferenī ḡan ānrat, mic bṛican, ōo bṛa mara,
ō tāit bṛetain bṛetmāra.*

It is thus rendered into English:—

"Patrick, Abbot of all Erin,
Son of Calphrainn, son of Fotide,
Son of Deissé,—not liable to reproach,—
Son of Great Cormac, son of Lebriuth,
Son of Ota, son of Orric the good,
Son of Moric, son of Leo, full of prosperity,
Son of Maximus, why not name him?
Son of Encretta, the tall and comely,
Son of Philisti, the best of men,
Son of Fereni, of no mean repute,
Son of Brittan, otter of the sea, priest. Yet, there are various renderings for the names of St. Patrick's ancestors, not alone in different authors, but even in different copies of the same authors' writings. Thus, in Colgan's version of St. Fiach's Hymn, St. Patrick's father is called Calpuirn;<sup>8</sup> in the Third Life, Calburnius;<sup>9</sup> in the Fourth, Kalfurnius;<sup>10</sup> in the Fifth Life, Calpurnius Diaconus;<sup>11</sup> in the Sixth Life, Calphurnius;<sup>12</sup> and in the Seventh Life, he is said to have been Calphurnius, who, after the birth of his son, was a noble priest.<sup>13</sup> Now, according to our Irish Genealogies,<sup>14</sup> on the father's side, Patrick's pedigree is thus derived: Calphurnius<sup>15</sup> was the son of Fotitus—more correctly called Potitus,<sup>16</sup> Potid,<sup>17</sup> or Potit, a priest<sup>18</sup> or deacon<sup>19</sup>—son to Odissius,<sup>20</sup> son of Cornelius, son to Liberius, son of Mercutius, son to Oda, son of Oricius, son to Muricius, son of Oricius, son to Leo, son of Maximus, son to Oiracius, son of Erius, son of Pelistus, son to Ferinus, son of Britanus, son to Fergusius Leth Deirg, son of Nemetus,<sup>21</sup> &c. This genealogy has verbal alterations, and even some omissions, in other accounts. The Britons are said to have derived many of the foregoing Latin names, from the Romans, to whom they were subject, and among whom they lived, for a long time before

From whom the passionate Britons descend."

<sup>8</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." In the second stanza, we find Calpuirn, which in the Latin is rendered Calphurnius. The Scholiast thus weaves our saint's genealogy: Patrick was the son of Calphurnius, the son of Potitus, son to Odissius, son of Gornia, son to Menchridius, son of Leo, son to Maximus, son of Hencretus, son to Ferinus, son of Britus, from whom the Britons are named. Hymnus, seu Vita Prima S. Patricii, pp. 1, 4, n. (d.) The book of Hymns, in Trinity College, Dublin,—a Manuscript between the tenth and twelfth centuries—reads: maic alpuirn maic otide ho a deochain otuiri. It is thus Englished: "Son of Alpuirn, son of Otide, grandson of deacon Odisse." See "Facsimiles of National Manuscripts of Ireland," edited by J. T. Gilbert, F.S.A., M.R.I.A., part i. No. xxxii. The Second Life has no account of the names of St. Patrick's parents.

<sup>9</sup> See ibid., cap. xii., p. 22.

<sup>10</sup> See ibid., cap. i., p. 35.

<sup>11</sup> See ibid., lib. i., cap. i., p. 51.

<sup>12</sup> See ibid., cap. i., p. 65. The writer, Jocelyn, observes, that after Patrick's birth, the parents of our saint were advanced in years, and by common consent, they practised chastity, until they rested in the Lord. Calphurnius long served the Almighty, as a Deacon, and then ended his life, as a priest.

<sup>13</sup> See ibid., pars. i., cap. i., p. 117. Such, too, is the statement of Florence of Worcester, at A.D. 394, and of other writers. It presupposes, that he had been previously a Deacon.

<sup>14</sup> Especially, Selbach, the "Psalter of Cashel," and the "Sanctilogic Genealogy," chap. i.

<sup>15</sup> In the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record,"

we find a comment, "Alpuirn, i.e., qui fuit sacerdos." In the Scholiast's comment, in the Franciscan copy of St. Fiach's Hymn, contained in the "Liber Hymnorum," we have the following genealogical pedigree: Patrick Mic Calpuirn, Mic Potit, Mic Odissi, Mic Gorend, Mic Mencruid, Mic Ota, Mic Muric, Mic Leo, Mic Maximi, Mic Heneriti, Mic Ferin, Mic Bruti, a quo sunt Bretani nominati.

<sup>16</sup> In Colgan's copy of St. Fiach's Hymn is Otrve, Latinized, Otidius. The same reading is in the copy, published in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," and there Englished, Otilus. To this is added the comment, Otide, i.e., presbyter.

<sup>17</sup> In the Irish Genealogies, we usually read, pacpuic mac Calpuirn, mic potit. In Irish, ph is pronounced like f, and hence this name has been resolved into Fotit. Again, the letter f being aspirated, or fh, in Irish, has no pronunciation, so that Fotid, or Fotit, became changed into Otid, or Otit.

<sup>18</sup> The illustrious St. Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, when he was chosen to fill that office, about A.D. 353, had a wife named Apra or Abram, then living; but, from the time of his ordination, he lived in perpetual continency. See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other Principal Saints," vol. i., January xiv., and "Breviarium Romanum," noct. ii., lect. iv., at the same day.

<sup>19</sup> See the Irish Tripartite Life, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 372.

<sup>20</sup> In Colgan's copy of St. Fiach's Hymn, we read ho deochain otuiri, Latinized, "Nepos Diaconi Odissii." In the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record" version, we have ho a deochain otuiri, Englished, "grandson of Deochain Odisus." To this is added a comment, "i.e., presbyter."

<sup>21</sup> As the northern Britons derive their origin from this ancestor, the matter is

St. Patrick's birth.<sup>22</sup> It is thought, some ancestors of St. Patrick took orders, after the voluntary separation or death of their respective wives; because ecclesiastical celibacy was then in force, as it is at the present time. Hence, we may well suppose, the acceptance of Holy Orders, by these progenitors of our national saint, was strictly in accordance with that law.<sup>23</sup> His father was a Decurion,<sup>24</sup> and probably he held some landed property; for, in virtue of his rank, he was entitled to aspire to municipal or magisterial honours. The Decuriones, or Curiales, exercised important functions, in the various Roman colonies.<sup>25</sup> The saint himself states, that he was of noble birth.<sup>26</sup> A Gaulish or Frankish lady, named Conquessa,<sup>27</sup> or Conceis, and said to have been a relation of St. Martin,<sup>28</sup> Archbishop of Tours, in France, became the wife of Calphurnius. She is extolled, for her elegance of form, and for her exemplary morals. Cochmas<sup>29</sup> and Conchessa<sup>30</sup> are forms of her name; the latter, it is said, resting on the authority of St. Patrick himself.<sup>31</sup> She is also stated to have been called Conches,<sup>32</sup> the daughter of Dechuisus; but, the Scholiast, on St. Fiach's Hymn, has given her father's name, as Ocmusius.<sup>33</sup> Probus calls our saint's mother Concessa,<sup>34</sup> while, the author of the Tripartite Life sets down her father's name, as Ecbatius.<sup>35</sup> Her name is written Concha, by some; but, this is said to be an incorrect rendering. In the "Leabar Lecan,"<sup>36</sup> we find the name of St. Patrick's mother inserted Coinceas.<sup>37</sup> The verbal differences, however, are easily accounted for, owing to the natural mistakes of copyists. Certain writers state, that the Irish Apostle's adduced, that St. Patrick must have been a native of Great Britain.

<sup>22</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Vita Prima S. Patricii, n. 10, p. 8, and Quinta Appendix, cap. iii., p. 224, ibid.

<sup>23</sup> The 4to paper MSS., in the Royal Irish Academy, No. 2, 4, contains a Pedigree of St. Patrick.

<sup>24</sup> The title Decurio comes from De Curia, or belonging to the municipality, the members of which body were called Curiales or Decuriones. See Bingham's "Origines Ecclesiasticæ; or, The Antiquities of the Christian Church," book iv., chap. iv.

<sup>25</sup> For an account of their office and powers, the reader may consult Dr. William Smith's "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities," Articles Colonia, Decura, Decurie, Judicium, Decuriones, Exercitus, Judex and Judicium, pp. 313 to 320, 388, 481 to 511, 646 to 651. Second edition, London, 1849, 8vo.

<sup>26</sup> "Ingenuus sum secundum carnem; nam Decurione patre nascor. Vendidi autem nobilitatem meam (non erubescor, neque me poenitet) pro utilitate aliorum." — Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. S. Patricii Epistola ad Christianos Corotici Tyranni subditos, num. 5, p. 243.

<sup>27</sup> See Jocelyn, or Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. i., p. 65, and n. 7, p. 109. Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>28</sup> See Surius, "De Probatis Sanctorum Historiis," tomus vi. For an extended account of him see Vita Beatissimi Martini, Turonensis Episcopi, &c., pp. 258 to 288.

<sup>29</sup> The poem of Flann of the Monastery, already cited, states:—

Cochmas a matar malla, nemthor a baile baga,
Don muman in cael a curu,
Ro fador ar fuadar patraic.

These lines are thus rendered into English, by Professor O'Curry:—

"Cochmas was his modest mother,
Nemthor was his native town;
Of Munster not small his share,
Which Patrick freed from all sorrow."

—"Lectures on the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish," vol. ii., lect. viii., p. 167, and n. 147.

<sup>30</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. i., p. 35. Also Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. i., p. 117.

<sup>31</sup> The Fourth Life states, "Patre Kalfurnio ex matre Conchessa; ut ipsi testatur lib. Epist. Ego sum Patricius Kalfurnii filius, matrem habens Conchessam." These words are not found in the copies I have seen of the Confession, nor in the Epistle to Corotici.

<sup>32</sup> See ibid. "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xii., p. 22, and n. 11, p. 30.

<sup>33</sup> See ibid. "Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ," n. 5. e., p. 4, and Colgan's note 11, p. 8.

<sup>34</sup> See ibid. "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. i., p. 51.

<sup>35</sup> See ibid. "Septima Vita S. Patricii," pars. i., cap. i., p. 117.

<sup>36</sup> This Manuscript is preserved, in the Royal Irish Academy.

<sup>37</sup> In the Tract, attributed to St. Ængus

mother was a sister, or a niece, to St. Martin.<sup>38</sup> Although, by tradition, some sort of relationship has been presumed,<sup>39</sup> still there is no well-founded ancient account to establish it, as a fact. St. Patrick himself gives us no hint whatever regarding it.<sup>40</sup> His mother is related to have been the daughter of Ocmuis, or Ocbasius, or Secbasius.<sup>41</sup> It is possible, as St. Patrick, after escaping from servitude, spent some time with St. Martin, at Tours, an idea of relationship, existing between them, might have originated; and, as it could not be traced, on the father's side,<sup>42</sup> probably the inference was drawn of its occurring in the maternal line.<sup>43</sup> It is stated, by the very ancient author of the Fourth Life of our saint, that Patrick was reported to have deduced his origin from the Holy Land. After our Redeemer's Passion, a Roman army, as if to avenge that deed, laid waste the country of Palestine, made the Jews captives, and sold, or otherwise dispersed, them, over the world. From some of these captives, transported to Armorica,<sup>44</sup> our Apostle is said to have descended.<sup>45</sup> Allusion is made to this dispersion, apparently, in one of his epistles.<sup>46</sup> However, his parents afterwards emigrated to Strato Clude, or Strathclyde, in which country the conception and birth of St. Patrick took the Culdee, on the Mothers of the Irish Saints, some doubt is expressed on this matter, where the Treatise begins, Incipit Senchar naom Ereno anoroir, fol. 89 a.

<sup>38</sup> See The Tripartite Irish Life. Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 372. There, too, she is called Conches, and daughter to Ocbas, of the Gauls or Franks. See, p. 375. In the territory of Evreux, in northern France, there was a town, called Conchæ, now Conches. "However bold the conjecture may appear," says Dr. Lanigan, relying on his theory of St. Patrick's French descent, "yet it is not unreasonable to suspect, that his mother, who was called Conchessa, might have got that name from having been a native of Conchæ."

<sup>39</sup> The Tripartite Life says, "soror, seu cognata." The Irish account calls her "Siur Martuin;" but, this leaves the question still ambiguous, as the word "Siur," is either "sister," or "kinswoman." Jocelyn alludes to her, as a "consanguinea," in this connexion. Some writers have it, that she was a niece, on the mother's side to St. Martin. Those authorities, who make her a sister to St. Martin are Siebert, in his "Chronicon," A.D. 491; Florence of Worcester, at A.D. 394; Harpsfeld, in "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. 21; Pitsæus, "De Scriptoribus Anglorum," num. 21; the Breviary of the Lateran Canons and another Breviary of the Canons Regular, lect. iv.; as also Sir Henry Spelman in his Preface to the Synod of St. Patrick, "Concilia Britannica," p. 51. Most writers, however, only contend for a probable relationship, as Werner, "In Fasciculo Temporum;" Jocelyn; the Tripartite Life; the Breviary of Armagh, lect. iv., and Ussher, "In Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 822.

<sup>40</sup> Neither do we find it mentioned, in St. Fiech's Hymn; nor do we meet with it, in the Second, Third or Fourth Lives of our Apostle, nor in Probus. There is no account of St. Patrick's mother, in the Confession, as found in the "Book of Armagh;" but, his father is thus noticed:—

patrem habui calpornum dia conum filium quenotam potitri filii sotiri pperbyteri qui fuit uico bannauem
Taberniae uillulam enim prope habuit.

This text being Latin, in the Irish characters—from which that of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, copy, Fell. 1, fol. 7, differs only in few vowel changes—calls St. Patrick's father Calpornus, son of Potitus, a priest, (son of Odissus), being prefixed in the original, as a comment, at the latter word. See "Fac-Similes of National Manuscripts of Ireland," edited by John T. Gilbert, part ii., plate LII, and Appendix III. A.

<sup>41</sup> See the long dissertation on St. Patrick's relations in Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. iii., iv., pp. 224 to 231. All the old Irish writers agree, that St. Patrick's mother belonged to some part of Gaul. See Ussher's "Primordia," p. 822.

<sup>42</sup> St. Patrick's father and grandfather had always been regarded as Britons; but, St. Martin of Tours is known to have been a native of Sabaria, in Pannonia. See "Breviarium Romanum," Die xi. Novembris.

<sup>43</sup> In the Lives of St. Martin, by Sulpicius Severus, Paulinus and others, we find no mention of brothers or sisters having accompanied him to Gaul. His father remained a Pagan, while his mother became a Christian, when he quitted the army, and went to visit his family, settled at Pavia, in Italy. See Sulpicius Severus, "Vita B. Martini," cap. 4.

<sup>44</sup> To this account is added, "juxta mare Thyrrænum."

<sup>45</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga,"

place,<sup>47</sup> The pedigree of his father indicates, as much a British, as a Roman, origin;<sup>48</sup> and, it is possible to conceive, he may have been one of those naturalized provincials, who served the Empire, in some important military or magisterial position. Those, who enjoyed the rank and privileges of Decurions,<sup>49</sup> were formerly very distinguished in society, and were expected to discharge various highly honourable public and civic duties.<sup>50</sup> The name and distinction are still held to be highly respectable, in many cities of Italy; and, to be a Decurione is considered a proof of no ordinary nobility. It may seem somewhat strange, however, that such an office could be compatible, with the aggregation of St. Patrick's immediate progenitor to the clerical state.<sup>51</sup> Yet, provision seems to have been made for clerics escaping penalties imposed, in the time of Theodosius I.,<sup>52</sup> provided they were ordained, before A.D. 388, or if ordained after such date, that they procured proper substitutes, to serve in the councils.<sup>53</sup> Otherwise, they should surrender their estates to the Curia, at the time of their ordination.<sup>54</sup> Our saint appears to speak of the Romans, as his fellow-citizens;<sup>55</sup> and, in the old Catalogue of celebrated saints, connected with Ireland, many bishops, belonging to the first order, and contemporaneous with St. Patrick, are stated to have been Romans,<sup>56</sup> as also there were some belonging to other distant nations. Hence, a probable inference has been drawn, that his family was originally of Roman extraction; especially, as it would seem, the names of himself, his father, and grandfather, are Latinized, at least in form. However, the subjects of Rome

Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. i., p. 35, and n. 2, p. 44.

<sup>46</sup> The text of this is thus given, by the author of the Fourth Life: "Quod ex libris Epistolarum, quos ipse composuit, intelligi potest; ubi dicit Nos dispersi sumus in ultimos fines terrarum propter peccata nostra, eo quod præceptum Domini non custodivimus, et mandata ejus non observavimus." This Epistle now seems to be missing; for, although a passage, somewhat similar, is to be found in the Confession, still the sentence is altogether differently constructed.

<sup>47</sup> In the Seventh Life, according to Colgan's version, a curious legendary account of a visit, made by a son of the king of Britain and by his wife, to St. Patrick's mother, is related. This, however, appears to be an interpolation; for, we do not find it, in the Irish version, in Miss Cussack's "Life of St. Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland." It is too ridiculous, moreover, to be seriously given; while, it is to be regretted, so many of our saint's biographers deemed themselves warranted, to insert those foolish popular traditions, concerning him, and current in their time.

<sup>48</sup> Judging by the names, and from the earliest named paternal ancestor. The author of the Fourth Life states, that Tabern is a word of British origin.

<sup>49</sup> "I believe," remarks Dr. Lanigan, "it would be difficult for the sticklers for St. Patrick's birth in North Britain, to find a Curia or Decurions in Kilpatrick, or any place near it, in the fourth century." However, there seems to be no very good reason, for doubting such to have been the case, at that period. On the contrary, the Romans had their institutions well established, in Scotland, before St. Patrick's birth, as Dr. John Stuart informed the writer, in Edinburgh, during a visit there, in June, 1874.

<sup>50</sup> Under the Roman empire, in provincial towns, these answered to members of the Roman senate. See that very accurate and beautifully illustrated work, Dyer's "Pompeii: Its History, Buildings, and Antiquities," part i., chap. ii., p. 33.

<sup>51</sup> Constantine the Great had enacted laws, which prohibited certain persons and classes, from assuming Holy Orders, and those laws subjected them to penalties, in case they did. Yet, such laws, were not always enforced, or they were modified, at various times, by succeeding Emperors. See, Bingham's "Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church," book v., chap. iii.

<sup>52</sup> His reign is set down, as extending from A.D. 379 to the 17th of January, A.D. 395, in John Speed's "History of Great Brittain," book vi., chap. lii., pp. 274, 275.

<sup>53</sup> The loss of property and rank, however, in the disturbed state of those times, may well account for the freedom or opportunity of Calpurnius to enter the clerical state.

<sup>54</sup> See Cod. Theod. Lib. xii. Tit. i. de Decur. leg. 121-123. Dr. Lanigan states, where St. Patrick mentions his having sold his nobility, the expression refers to his having forfeited his rank and estate, when he entered into Holy Orders.

<sup>55</sup> "Non dico civibus meis, atque civibus sanctorum Romanorum, sed civibus dæmoniorum."—Epistola ad Coroticum. See Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum often assumed Latin names;<sup>57</sup> but, generally modified, we may assume, from the native dialect, or acquired through some peculiar circumstance, which influenced the change.

The immediate family connexions of St. Patrick are next deserving of some preliminary consideration.<sup>58</sup> It is related, that he had two brothers, named Diaconus Sannanus,<sup>59</sup> according to one account,<sup>60</sup> and Ructus, according to another statement;<sup>61</sup> and, besides, he is said to have had five sisters. These are called Tigris or Tigrida,<sup>62</sup> Darerca,<sup>63</sup> Liemania,<sup>64</sup> Lupita,<sup>65</sup> and Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., pp. 241, 243.

<sup>56</sup> "Hi omnes episcopi de Romanis, Francis," &c.—See Ussher's "Primordia," p. 913. Dr. Lanigan considers, that by placing the Romans before other nationalities, it was probably meant, St. Patrick sprung from a Roman family, settled in Belgic Britain.

<sup>57</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xvii., and nn. 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 168, 169, 171, 173, pp. 122 to 125.

<sup>58</sup> Colgan has endeavoured, with great care and research, to solve the difficulties, attending this enquiry, in the "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. iv., pp. 224 to 231.

<sup>59</sup> Otherwise called, in Irish, Oeochain Sannan. Ussher supposes him to have been really the brother of the Irish Apostle, called Patrick the Elder, and the father of Patrick Junior, who was the nephew and disciple of our saint, and who, after his uncle's death, went back to Britain, where he departed this life, in turn, at Glasgow—as the first edition reads—or, at Glastonbury—as a MS. related. There he was honourably buried, in the church. Jocelyn has it, "in Glasconensi Ecclesia sepultus est honorifice." See Sixth Life, cap. clxxxvi., p. 106. Colgan wishes piously to believe, that it was after his son's birth the title of Deacon Sannan had been applied to him, and he thinks it possible, that this Sannan may be identical with a St. Seanan, venerated in Cornwall, and who gave name to a seaport and town in Cornwall. See n. 13, p. 8, to the "Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ" of St. Fiach. St. Patrick Junior seems to have been buried in Glastonbury, and his feast is usually assigned to the 24th of August.

<sup>60</sup> That of the Scholiast to St. Fiach's Hymn.

<sup>61</sup> That of Probus, in the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xii., p. 48. But, Colgan accounts very ingeniously for this mistake of Probus; for, he seems to have confounded Ructus, with Succat, the original name of St. Patrick, as may be discovered by comparing the allusion in Probus, and the story related, in the Second Life, cap. xvi., p. 12, in the Fourth Life, cap. xx., p. 37, and, in the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. xxi., p. 120.

<sup>62</sup> Jocelyn has assigned a most numerous family of sons and daughters to Tigrida viz., seventeen sons, all of these being either holy bishops, or excellent priests or monks, as also five daughters, who as nuns ended their days in the repute of great sanctity. The names of those bishops were Brochadius, Brochanus, Mogenochus, and Lumanus, who came from the Britains to Hibernia, and who laboured here, on the mission. See the Sixth Life, cap. l., p. 76. However, Jocelyn is the only known author, who attributes the number of seventeen sons and five daughters to Tigrida. Her husband is named Gollit or Gallus.

<sup>63</sup> According to our Irish Calendarists, Darerca is said to have been the mother of seventeen sons, and by some, these are all called bishops, as also of two holy virgin daughters, Achea and Lallocka. Hence, it would seem, that Jocelyn erred in attributing this family of children to Tigrida. But, there is a great difficulty experienced in naming the sons of Darerca: some authors attributing certain names to the parentage of Liemania, or of Tigrida, or of Darerca. Now, in the "Opuscula," attributed to St. Ængus, lib. iv., cap. vi., fifteen bishops, sons of Darerca are named, viz., Bishop Mel, Bishop Melchus, Bishop Munis, Riach of Inis-bofinde, Crumanus of Leccan, Midgna, Mogenocus, Lomanus of Ath-truim, Lurachus Duanaire of Doire-lurain, Loarnus of Kill-chunna, Kieranus, Carantocus Bishop, Columbus, Brendanus Fine, Bishop Mochallaus, Brocanus and Brochadius. Besides these, two nuns are named, viz.: Echea, and Lallocka of Senlios, behind Badhgna. Some of the foregoing names, Colgan thinks, crept into the original. Thus, Jocelyn makes Saints Loman, Mogenoc, Brocan, and Brochad, the sons of Tigrida, another sister of St. Patrick. Nor does Colgan believe, that Saints Kieran, Brendan, Loarn, Lurach, and Columba to be of British race, but rather of Irish, as these names indicate. Other names recorded seem to be British, and, it is remarkable, that one of the sons, Secundinus, said to be of Restitutus and Liemania, is stated to be of Restitutus and Darerca, in another account. Hence, Colgan supposes, that Liemania may have been confounded with Darerca, who is called the wife of Restitutus, in the Tripartite Life, pars ii., cap. xxi. Again Darerca's husband is called Conis. See p. 133. The latter is supposed to have been a Briton, and to have had for sons, Richella.<sup>66</sup> Three of these sisters, whom he brought with him to Ireland, became nuns, moreover, according to a received tradition. Others assert,<sup>67</sup> however, that St. Patrick had only three sisters, Lupita, Darerca and Tigrida;<sup>68</sup> nor can rigid criticism discover a greater number, when rejecting the accounts of some writers, led away by mistaken calculations, or clerical errors.<sup>69</sup> But, we may take it for granted, there are many accounts, not altogether reliable, in the traditions and records, relating to the various members of our saint's Saints Mel, Munis, and Rioch. Perhaps, the other sons and daughters of the family were the children of Restitutus and Darerca; although Rioch may not be different from Dario, or Morioc, one of the sons assigned to Restitutus. Again, Colgan remarks, that besides the fact of no festival being assigned to Liemania, we find a St. Monennia—otherwise called Darerca—whose feast occurs on the 6th of July, and who may have been confounded with Liemania, in this way. Darerca is probably derived from Diar-shearc, signifying “constant” or “firm love,” or from Der-shearc, denoting “love of tears,” indicating her true service of God. Now, the letter s, occurring as a middle prefix, not being pronounced in Irish, Dais-hearc, or Der-herc, may have been rendered into Darerca. The feast of St. Patrick's sister, so named, is entered at the 22nd of March. Different festivals are assigned, for the happy progeny of this saintly woman, and Colgan endeavours to discriminate them, where he treats about the brothers and sisters of St. Patrick, with their holy children.

<sup>64</sup> There are good reasons for suspecting, that Liemania and Richella were not St. Patrick's sisters. Colgan thinks, that Richella had been substituted for Ri-chenna, “royal Cenna,” who had been substituted, in turn, for Cenne-naomh, “holy Cenne.” Again, at the 19th of May, there is a feast of St. Richella, the Daughter of Attractus. She is mentioned, in the Life of St. Dagæus, cap. xviii., and he lived, in the middle of the sixth century. St. Cenne, the daughter of Euchod, Prince of Orgiell, has a feast, at the 1st of February. She was, indeed, contemporaneous with St. Patrick, but, it is evident, from her parentage, she could not have been his sister. About Liemania other difficulties arise, especially in trying to discover, who were her children, or if she were at all to be distinguished from Lupita, venerated at Armagh, on the 27th of September, as some Martyrologists state. The feast—if there be one—of Liemania is not known, but, in our Calendars, possibly she is alluded to, by her Irish form of name, as Lemna, or Lemhna. Different Irish Martyrologies state, that her husband was Restitutus Hua-baird, or Longobardus—referable to his race—and by him she had two holy sons, named Secundinus and Nectanus. But, an old Scholiast, on the Martyrology of Tallagh, at the xiv. Kalends of April, or at the 19th of March, assigns the following seven sons to Restitutus of the Lombards, viz.: Secundinus, Nectanus, Dabonna, Mogornanus, Dario, Auxilinus, and Lugnath. Again, the Tripartite Life adds two others, viz.: Diermitius, and a Comitius, or Connetus. See pars ii., cap. vi. and xviii., pp. 130, 131. Nor have we any statement, that he had been married to any other woman than Liemania, so that if we credit those accounts, we may assume she had been the mother of nine sons.

<sup>65</sup> In the “Opuscula,” lib. iv. of St. Ængus the Culdee, num. 4, it is stated: “Lupita soror S. Patricii mater filiorum Hua-baird, nempe Secundini, Nectani, Dabonnæ, Mogornani, Dario, Auxilii et Lugath Præsbyteri.” It is remarkable, however, that no other author makes her the mother of these sons, and in num. 64, of this same tract, these words occur: “Liemania filia Calphurni, soror S. Patricii, fuit mater S. Nectani de Kill-vnche.” Again, our Martyrologists make Liemania the mother of Nectan and of Secundinus, while Lupita is represented, not as a widow, but as a virgin, by our Martyrologists, and by the writers of St. Patrick's Acts.

<sup>66</sup> While the Scholiast on St. Fiach omits St. Richella's name, and substitutes therefor Cinnenum, alias Cinne-naemh, Colgan cites an Irish poem, to prove our text enumeration the more correct list. The Irish he thus renders into Latin:—

“Lupita et Tigris fervida (ut jam numeravi)
et Richella;
Darerca et Liemania togarum dives; quæ amplexus sunt vitam arctam cum fervore;
Nomina hæc sunt clare proposita, sororum Patricii magnarum Ecclesiarum Patroni.”

Colgan observes, that he found no hagiographer to call her a mother; and, yet, he could not be sure, but that she was the parent of three deacons, nephews of St. Patrick, on his sister's side, who are alluded to—but not named—in the Tripartite Life, pars ii., cap. cxvii., p. 145.

<sup>67</sup> As for instance, Jocelyn and the author of the Tripartite Life.

<sup>68</sup> All of our Irish writers agree, that these were really the sisters of St. Patrick, although there is much diversity of opinion, regarding their respective children.

<sup>69</sup> Thus Ussher, citing the Annals of Connaught at p. 823 of his “Primordia,” and family.<sup>70</sup> Moreover, we may well doubt the accuracy of those statements, regarding the numerous progeny of St. Patrick's sisters, or their respective children, who are said to have embraced a religious life. Accounts are conflicting and contradictory, in too many instances, to warrant very safe conclusions; nor, is it easy to reconcile their Patrician relationship, with correct chronology. Nor can we glean, from the saint's own writings, any positive proof, or reasonable inference, that he had such near relatives, residing with him in Ireland, at that late period of life, when his epistle to Coroticus had been written. When he expresses an anxious desire to see his relatives,<sup>71</sup> it seems plain, they must have lived far away from Ireland; yet, it may be objected fairly, that this was only true regarding a number of them. Again, when he has declared, he did not know the multitude born of our race or generation,<sup>72</sup> it is certain, he alludes to those converts to Christianity, made through himself or his assistant missionaries. He applies the phrase, in a spiritual, rather than in a carnal, sense. Yet, the ancient mode of calling ladies in religion, sisters, is conjectured to have been one of the most probable reasons to advance, for old writers mistaking such denoted females, living in St. Patrick's time, and for confounding them, with his own natural sisters. Ussher<sup>73</sup> and Colgan<sup>74</sup> have treated, concerning the Irish Apostle's sisters, and their offspring, who are said to have been with him in Ireland.

The parents of St. Patrick lived together, in great sanctity and perfection.<sup>75</sup> They were found just before God; they walked in his justifications, and commandments, without blame. Faith, hope and charity made their conjugal state a happy one. In process of time, it pleased the Almighty, to bless them with a holy, and an illustrious issue. During the period, he had been borne in his mother's womb, to that of Patrick's birth, miracles are recorded, as if serving to indicate the wonders of his subsequent career. A stone, on which he is said to have been born, was afterwards held in popular esteem, and persons swearing falsely on it found, that their perjuries were the Annals of Roscrea, at A.D. 447, states, that a sister of St. Patrick was named Culmana, said to have been the mother of St. Secundinus. But, this shows, that Liemania, his reputed mother, must have been meant. Hence, Culmain was probably substituted for Liemain.

<sup>70</sup> Thus, in addition to what has been already stated, it is said a sister, or a female relation, of St. Patrick, had a son, called St. Aidus, of Inis-Lothar, his father being Colman, of the Hi-Bressail family. See the Tripartite Life, pars. iii., cap. lxxvi., p. 163. Colgan arrives at the conclusion, that St. Patrick had only one brother, four sisters, and thirty-one nephews or nieces, consecrated to God, and numbered among the saints.

<sup>71</sup> As St. Patrick seems to have been far advanced in life, at that time when he wrote the Confession, it is much more probable, that the term parentes, in the passage referred to, is to be understood, not of parents, in the English sense of the word, but of relatives. This acceptance of parentes had crept into use, so far back as the time of St. Jerome. Hence, the Italian parenti, and the French parents. Owing to this expression, an etymologist might possibly derive some proof, for our saint's French origin.

<sup>72</sup> He writes: "omnes virgines Dei simi-

liter faciunt, non voluntate patrum suorum, imo persecutiones patiuntur, et impropria falsa à parentibus suis. Et nihilominus plus augetur numerus, et de genere nostro quæ ibi (Christo) natæ sunt, nescimus numerum earum, præter viduas et continentes." —Confessio S. Patricii, cap. iv., num. 18. Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," p. 202.

<sup>73</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., pp. 429 to 431.

<sup>74</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. iv., pp. 224 to 231.

<sup>75</sup> According to Jocelyn, St. Patrick's mother, Conquessa, was a kinswoman to St. Martin, Bishop of Tours: she was taken away from Gaul, to the northern parts of Britain, as a slave, and purchased from her father, by Calphurnius. The eldest sister accompanied her, and she was married to a man, who lived in the town of Nemphor. The good morals and beautiful mien of Conquessa, it is stated, caused Calphurnius to elevate his slave, to the more honourable distinction of becoming his wife.

<sup>76</sup> According to Jocelyn, St. Mel testified, that he had frequently witnessed this miracle. Hence, Colgan infers, that Jocelyn borrowed likely to be detected, in a supernatural manner, for, in such cases, water seemed to flow from its surface,<sup>76</sup> as if that hard rock was weeping, on account of their tainted testimony.<sup>77</sup>

The chronology of St. Patrick's birth, as indeed of the many subsequent events in his career, has given rise to much controversy, and it has been placed at dates of very considerable divergence.<sup>78</sup> The Annals of Connaught have set it down, so early as A.D. 336,<sup>79</sup> and the statements of Giraldus Cambrensis<sup>80</sup> oblige us to refer the date to 338; while a Scholiast on Ninius,<sup>81</sup> would place it at A.D. 352; but, nothing can be more incorrect, than to assign his birth, to so early a period. Other writers give us very inexact data.<sup>82</sup> Stanihurst,<sup>83</sup> Father Peter Ribadeneira,<sup>84</sup> and other earlier writers,<sup>85</sup> state, that our Irish Apostle's nativity took place in 361; while, according to Matthew of Westminster's calculation, it must have been in the year 369.<sup>86</sup> St. Patrick was born, A.D. 370, according to Jocelyn<sup>87</sup> and John Pitts.<sup>88</sup> It has been assigned to A.D. 372,<sup>89</sup> by Florence of Worcester and by Ussher.<sup>90</sup> It has been placed in the following year, A.D. 373, by Colgan, and on the 5th of April.<sup>91</sup> The same date has been adopted by Harris,<sup>92</sup> but, he has not stated, on what day, or in what month, St. Patrick's birth took place. Having found a festival of St. Patrick's baptism, in Ireland,<sup>93</sup> set down in the Irish Calendars, at the 5th of April, this statement, from a Life of St. Patrick, written by St. Mel. The latter biography, therefore, cannot be any one of those Seven Lives he published, since no such statement is therein to be found. See Sixth Life, cap. iii., p. 65, and n. 10, p. 109.

<sup>77</sup> See the Second Life, cap. ii., p. 11, the Third Life, cap. ii., p. 21, the Fourth Life, cap. ii., p. 35, the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. iii., pp. 117, 118. In the English-Irish version of the latter biography, this is called "a flag-stone," (see Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 372); but, in none of the writings, here quoted, do we find it bearing any particular name, although apparently having a traditional site and veneration, when those had been compiled.

<sup>78</sup> St. Patrick's old Acts are singularly deficient in dates, and consequently furnish us with no evidence to determine the question.

<sup>79</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 429. They state, St. Patrick's birth to have occurred, in the reign of the Emperor Constans. However, according to Eusebius, Sigonius and Socrates, his father Constantine the Great only departed this life, on the 22nd of May, A.D. 337.

<sup>80</sup> See Giraldi Cambrensis' "Opera," vol. v. Topographia Hibernica, Dist. iii., cap. xvii., p. 163. Edited by James F. Dimock, M.A.

<sup>81</sup> Author of the "Historia Britonum."

<sup>82</sup> Thus Hanmer tells us, he died, during the reign of Aurelius Ambrosius, in Britain—calculated at from A.D. 466 to 497. See John Speed's "History of Britaine," book vii., chap. xii., pp. 331, 332. St. Patrick was 122 years old at the time of his death, which should make his birth fall, between A.D. 344 and 375. Hanmer states, also, that St. Patrick died, during the reign of Forthkerrus, Monarch of Ireland. See the "Chronicle of Ireland," p. 89. No such monarch is known, however, in the list of our Irish kings.

<sup>83</sup> See "De Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., p. 17.

<sup>84</sup> In his "Lives of the Saints," as translated by W. P., Esq. See part i., p. 156.

<sup>85</sup> Such as Probus, according to Ussher's computation, and that book, in which the Antiquities of Glastonbury Church were written, as William of Malmsbury says.

<sup>86</sup> See "Flores Historiarum," at A.D. CCCCXCI., p. 176.

<sup>87</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxci., cxcvi.

<sup>88</sup> See "Relationum Historiarum de Rebus Anglicis."

<sup>89</sup> That he was born about this year is stated, in the "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," vol. ii., p. 20.

<sup>90</sup> In his "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," Index Chronologicus, A.D. CCLXXII. to CCCCXIII., assuming that St. Patrick lived fully 120 years. See pp. 512 and 524. His dates are therefore based, chiefly on such a supposition, in the pages of his "Primordia."

<sup>91</sup> As a tradition prevailed, that St. Patrick had been born and baptized on a Wednesday, he has calculated, that Wednesday fell on the 5th of April, in the year 373. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. viii., pp. 234, 235. This writer infers, also, that St. Patrick died, in the 120th year of his age.

<sup>92</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 7.

Colgan was led unwittingly into a miscalculation. Yet, it would seem, this feast only referred to the first baptism, which was performed in Ireland, by our great Apostle.<sup>94</sup> Again, while following the mistakes of Colgan, and while the latter does not give the full complement of 120 years to St. Patrick's life—18 days being wanting to complete that age—Harris thought our Apostle should have lived to 121 years, if his birth took place in 372, as Ussher calculated. This writer, however, does not pretend to mention day or month for St. Patrick's birth.<sup>95</sup> To the year 372, or 373, the Rev. Robert King refers this event.<sup>96</sup> Father Villanueva<sup>97</sup> seems to adhere to A.D. 373, and this, too, is the assertion of Rev. William Bullen Morris,<sup>98</sup> in his lately-published biography of our Apostle. In an old record, known as the Book of Sligo, St. Patrick is said to have been born, to have been baptized, and to have died, on a Wednesday.<sup>99</sup> But, as various opinions, regarding his exact age and the year of his death, have been advanced, so it must be found rather difficult, very closely to obtain an approximation to the year when he was born. It has been conjectured, that as many of our old writers were fond of instituting a parallel, between the Irish Apostle and Moses, 120 years became the favourite term for their assignment of his existence.<sup>100</sup> This has been thought convenient, also, for dividing St. Patrick's life, into four even periods of 30 years each;<sup>101</sup> and, a division of the first sixty years into thirties has been proposed by Ussher.<sup>102</sup> Another division of St. Patrick's presumed 120 years, into three parts—each portion making 40 years—has been <sup>93</sup> This refers, not to St. Patrick's own baptism. Again, in A.D. 373, the 5th of April fell, not on Wednesday, but on Friday; nor is it likely, that St. Patrick had been baptized, on the very day of his birth.

<sup>94</sup> St. Ængus, in his Festilog, at the 5th of April states, "Baptismus magni Patricii cœpit in Hibernia." The Martyrology of Tallagh has, "Baptisma Patricii venit 'ad Hiberniam.'" See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. v., p. 232.

<sup>95</sup> Harris' objection would have force, had Ussher stated St. Patrick to have been born, in any time of the year, previous to the 17th of March; but, if it occurred after this date, as a matter of course, he must have come into the world, A.D. 372, having completed the term of 120 years, at the time of his death. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. i., and nn. 1, 2, 3, 4, pp. 129 to 132.

<sup>96</sup> See "A Primer of the Church History of Ireland," vol. i., book i., chap. iii., p. 17.

<sup>97</sup> See "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., n. 6, p. 217.

<sup>98</sup> See "The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," &c., chap. i., p. 44.

<sup>99</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 882. Ussher was wrong, as to the baptism. See a previous note, and other notes which follow.

<sup>100</sup> In four respects, St. Patrick resembled Moses. First, he heard an Angel from the flames. Secondly, he fasted forty days and forty nights. Thirdly, he lived 120 years in this life. And fourthly, no one can tell where his remains lie. Tirechan is here quoted by Ussher, in his "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 887. Nennius writes, "Quatuor modis æquantur Moyses et Patricius."—Ibid. Then he goes on, stating the same conformities, except in his adding, at the second, that they both fasted on a mountain. Matthew of Westminster, at A.D. 491 has followed Nennius. Although elsewhere, lib. iii., cap. ciii., p. 168, the Tripartite writer says, that St. Patrick died in the one hundred and twenty-second year of his age, being pleased with his pious parallels; he has given them to his readers, and he has even added some others to those mentioned. See lib. ii., cap. lxiii., p. 138. "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>101</sup> Ussher's Tripartite states, that being sent by Pope Celestine, in the sixtieth year of his age, to preach the Gospel in Ireland, the most blessed Archbishop entered upon his mission. Then, he spent sixty other years, in Hibernia. For thirty of these years, he was engaged, preaching and baptizing, through the different provinces of Ireland; while, during thirty other years "in suis cellis et in monasteriis theoricè vixit." See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 873.

<sup>102</sup> The following verses are taken from a spurious tract, called St. Patrick's Testament. They are thus translated into Latin:—

"Ter denis annis versatus in æde Saballi,
Ter denis aliis peragravi lætus Iernam;
Centum et vicenos annos vivendo peregrî attempted, by a Scholiast on Nennius.<sup>103</sup> That most unreliable writer of the saint's Acts, Jocelyn, making our Apostle attain to the increased number of years 123, has divided it into irregular epochs, respectively consisting of 55, of 35, and of 33, years.<sup>104</sup> This computation is thought to have been derived from the 132 years, assigned by Probus, by inverting cxxii. into cxxiii.<sup>105</sup> A Breviary of Rheims states, that St. Patrick died, when he had attained the 132nd year of his age. Closely approximating to this calculation is 131 years;<sup>106</sup> while a MS. copy of Marianus Scotus, Sigebert, and other chroniclers, recount, that he reached 122 years. The Annals of Boyle have 120,<sup>107</sup> and William of Malmesbury<sup>108</sup> diminishes his term of life to 111 years, while Stanihurst reduces it to 97, Marianus Scotus to 92,<sup>109</sup> and Baronius<sup>110</sup> thinks even this to have been an incorrect reading, for 82.<sup>111</sup> We thus see how conflicting are the accounts of ancient writers; while such circumstance materially interferes with perfect accuracy, in pronouncing on the date of our Apostle's birth. Henry of Marlborough refers it, to A.D. 376, in Great Britain. The Bollandists place St. Patrick's birth, at A.D. 377,<sup>112</sup> and they endeavour to arrange the chief incidents of his life chronologically;<sup>113</sup> but, conjectures too often are substituted for arguments, or supply the want of historic facts. Porter<sup>114</sup> very closely follows their chronological calculations. Relying chiefly on the calculations of Le Sieur Le Nain Tillemont, a learned investigator of his history, after showing with much ingenuity, that the date of St. Patrick's first capture may probably be referred to A.D. 403, hence draws the inference, that his birth must be assigned, to A.D. 387.<sup>115</sup> It is remarkable, that March the seventeenth fell on Wednesday, during the latter year. This may help us to understand the drift of that passage—found in the Book of Sligo—assigning St. Patrick's birth to a Wednesday. According to the usual style of Martyrologies, the 17th of March used to be marked, as the Natale, or Natalis,—denoting the requies, or death,—of St. Patrick. That meant, of course, the day of his heavenly birth, or of his first appearing in Heaven. Such a manner of speaking, not being understood by some persons,

Præsentem ad noctem hanc seculum producitur istud."

—See ibid., pp. 386, 387, and Ware's "Opuscula Sancti Patricii," p. 109.

<sup>103</sup> The statement there runs, that he was forty years old, when he escaped from his captivity; that he learned to serve God for forty years; and, that he preached for forty years. During these three forties, St. Patrick equalled Moyses. For, Moyses was forty years a captive, in the house of Pharaoh; forty years an exile in the land of Madian, and forty years engaged in preaching. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 886.

<sup>104</sup> See Jocelyn's "Vita S. Patricii," cap. exci., p. 107. Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>105</sup> This is the supposition of Dr. Lanigan, and, for support, he refers us on these subjects to Ussher, pp. 879 to 885, and to Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," p. 232 et seq.

<sup>106</sup> The statement of an Anglo-Saxon Martyrology, quoted by Ussher.

<sup>107</sup> See John D'Alton's "History of Ireland and the Annals of Boyle," vol. ii., p. 72.

<sup>108</sup> He flourished, in the reign of King Stephen of England.

<sup>109</sup> In his "Chronicon."

<sup>110</sup> See "Annales Ecclesiastici."

<sup>111</sup> "Ussher did not attempt to draw any consequences from what is said of the birth and baptism; but he availed himself of the datum that St. Patrick died on a Wednesday, and thence, in opposition to various jarring computations, which he had met with in the course of his reading, concluded, that the year of the saint's death was 493, whereas in that year the 17th of March fell on Wednesday. It is indeed true, that not only Jocelyn, but, what is of much greater weight, the Annals of Ulster had assigned it to that year."—Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. i., p. 131.

<sup>112</sup> They state: "Anno Christi cccclxxvii non valde propecto nascitur S. Patricius apud Britannos Alcludenses."—"Acta Sanctorum," toms ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo Apostolo et Primate Hiberniæ. Commentarius prævius, sect. v., p. 522.

<sup>113</sup> See ibid. and sect. vi., pp. 522 to 525.

<sup>114</sup> See "Compendium Annalium Ecclesiæ Regni Hiberniæ," sect. v., cap. i., pp. 122, 123.

<sup>115</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiasti-

probably gave rise to a notion, of his coming on that day, into the world.<sup>116</sup> Hence, as Dr. Lanigan considers, the 17th of March may have been regarded, as the anniversary of his birth.<sup>117</sup> The opinion that St. Patrick came into this world, A.D. 387, has been very generally followed, by later writers, such as Thomas Moore,<sup>118</sup> the Rev. M. J. Brenan,<sup>119</sup> the Rev. James Wills,<sup>120</sup> the Rev. Michael J. O'Farrel,<sup>121</sup> D. P. Conyngham,<sup>122</sup> and the Rev. Thomas Walsh.<sup>123</sup> To the decline of the fourth century, the nativity of our renowned Apostle has been referred, by the Rev. Alban Butler;<sup>124</sup> and, this general statement probably includes about the safest rendering, for that event.

Accounts vary, regarding the priest's name, from whom St. Patrick received the baptismal rite. He is named Gornias,<sup>125</sup> Guornias,<sup>126</sup> and, again, Gormas,<sup>127</sup> by Jocelyn.<sup>128</sup> He is said to have been blind, from the time of his birth; but, this is manifestly inconsistent with the statement of his having been a priest. It may be treated as a fiction, as also that account, regarding the infant hand of St. Patrick having traced a sign of the cross on the ground, whence water flowed,<sup>129</sup> and when with it washing his face, sight was restored to the blind man. It is likewise said, he was able at once to read the baptismal service, although previously unable to obtain a knowledge of letters. He is called Gornias, in the Irish Tripartite Life,<sup>130</sup> as also in the Latin version of it,<sup>131</sup> as published by Colgan. He is said to have been of smooth face. The well, in which St. Patrick received baptism, flowed, at the place, where the triple miracle had been wrought.<sup>132</sup> It is stated, that the people of that neighbourhood afterwards built a church, over this well, that it flowed near the altar, and that either the latter, or the former,<sup>133</sup> had the shape of the cal History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. iv., pp. 137, 138. Also Le Sieur Le Nain Tillemont's "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xvi. Art. ii. S. Patrice.

<sup>116</sup> See Ussher, "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 820. Also, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. ii., p. 221.

<sup>117</sup> As this could not answer for his year 372, Ussher probably passed over this matter. Nor would it do for Colgan's A.D. 373; since, in neither of these years, did March 17th fall on a Wednesday. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. iv., n. 18, p. 138.

<sup>118</sup> See his "History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. x., p. 211.

<sup>119</sup> See his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," chap. i., p. 8.

<sup>120</sup> See his "Lives of Illustrious and Distinguished Irishmen," vol. i., part i., p. 86.

<sup>121</sup> See "A Popular Life of St. Patrick," chap. iii., p. 36.

<sup>122</sup> See "Lives of the Irish Saints, from St. Patrick down to St. Laurence O'Toole," St. Patrick, sect. i., p. 31.

<sup>123</sup> See his "History of the Irish Church," chap. iv., p. 15.

<sup>124</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other Principal Saints," vol. iii., March xvii.

<sup>125</sup> In the Second Life, cap. iii., p. 10.

<sup>126</sup> In the Third Life, cap. iii., p. 21.

<sup>127</sup> In the Sixth Life, cap. ii., p. 65.

<sup>128</sup> The latter does not constitute him the baptist of our saint, however, but only the recipient of sight, at the infant's hands.

<sup>129</sup> To this incident, allusion is made in Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick:—"

"The blind priest took that infant's hand :
With that small hand, above the ground

He signed the Cross. At God's command
A fountain rose with brimming bound."

—"The Baptism of St. Patrick," p. 1.

<sup>130</sup> See Miss M. F. Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 372.

<sup>131</sup> See the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. iv., p. 118.

<sup>132</sup> Thus, first, a fountain, miraculously bursting from the earth, touched by St. Patrick's hand; secondly, one, blind from his birth, having been restored to sight; and, thirdly, one, hitherto ignorant of letters, being able suddenly to read the baptismal form.

<sup>133</sup> Jocelyn removes this constructive ambiguity of meaning, in the previous Lives, when he thus states, in the Sixth Life: "Fons vero præfatus profluvio profusiori dilatatus usque in presens perspicuas emanans aquas, S. Patricii nomine insignitur, haustu dulcis, gustuque salubris, ut dicitur, variis incommodis laborantibus sospitatem aut levamen impartitur. Oritur enim sæcūs limbum maris, super quem posteriorum diligentia edificavit oratorium, habens altare in modum crucis extractum."—Sexta Vita S.

Holy Cross.<sup>134</sup> By some, it is reported, this well is yet to be seen at Kilpatrick,<sup>135</sup> near Dumbarton, in Scotland. It is said to be called Trees' Well,<sup>136</sup> in the immediate vicinity of the present church, erected on the site of a more ancient one; but, the modern church does not cover the well, both being separated by the public road, leading from Dumbarton to Glasgow.<sup>137</sup> We are told, St. Patrick was born in Valentia, near the end of the northern wall;<sup>138</sup> and, it is even probable, the Romans extended the stations of their province, on the north bank of the Clyde, to form têtes de pont, against the Pictish incursions. It need only be added, that we find a notice of St. Cairnech, as being the reputed author of the Senchus Mor.<sup>139</sup> According to another account, the Irish Apostle is said to have been baptized, by Cairnech, also called Carantac, or Carantacus.<sup>140</sup> However, the agency of Gornias, or Gormas, in this function, has the greater weight of authority to support it. When we deem St. Patrick to have been, in all likelihood, a British Celt,<sup>141</sup> it still remains to be discovered, whether he was one of Scotian or of Irish origin,<sup>142</sup> an Albanian of Pictish blood,<sup>143</sup> or one of the Strath-Clyde Cymri, or Cumbrians.<sup>144</sup>

If we are to credit the statement, in St. Fiach's Hymn, the parents of our holy Patron first gave him the name Succat, or Succath,<sup>145</sup> which means "warlike."<sup>146</sup> In those primitive times, and in the nation to which he belonged, martial prowess was held in high estimation. Again, the Second Life remarks, Succet was his first name;<sup>147</sup> while the Third Life writes it Suchet,<sup>148</sup> and Probus informs us, that Sochet was he called, as well as Patrick.<sup>149</sup> In the Latin Tripartite Life of our saint, it is also said, that the first name, given to him by his parents, was Suchat.<sup>150</sup> Stanihurst<sup>151</sup> calls him Suchar, or Patricii, cap. ii., p. 65. The Irish and the Latin versions of the Tripartite Life distinctly state, that it was the well, which bore the shape of a cross.

<sup>134</sup> The Second and Third Lives add, "ut periti aiunt." The Third Life has, "ut loci periti illius dicunt."

<sup>135</sup> This place derived its name, from a church dedicated to our saint, and it was formerly very richly endowed. See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," vol. ii., p. 20.

<sup>136</sup> It is situated, to the south, and in the west corner of the graveyard, in which the church stands.

<sup>137</sup> See the Rev. Duncan Macnab's "Archæological Dissertation on the Birth-place of St. Patrick," pp. 40, 41.

<sup>138</sup> See John Hill Burton's "History of Scotland," vol. i., chap. i., p. 40.

<sup>139</sup> See "Ancient Laws of Ireland," vol. ii. Preface, pp. v. to viii.

<sup>140</sup> Ibid., p. viii.

<sup>141</sup> The student will find a very able dissertation on the primitive races of Scotland in the "Irish Version of the Historia Britonum of Nennius," by the Hon. Algernon Herbert. Additional Notes, No. XVII., pp. xxix. to lxiv.

<sup>142</sup> Known generally as the Scoti, Gael, or Gwyddyl, as called by the Welsh.

<sup>143</sup> Some of the Southern Picts had embraced Christianity, at least, in the fourth century.

<sup>144</sup> According to the coloured Map of Prydyn, or Y Gogledd, prefixed to William F. Skene's "Four Ancient Books of Wales," this race took in the district of Arecluta and the fortress of Alclud. See, also, chap. iv., v., pp. 42 to 76.

<sup>145</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Hymnus, seu Prima Vita S. Patricii, Succat Δ αινμ ητερυβηαο, stanza, 2, p. 1. It is thus translated, by Colgan, "Succat nomen ei primò impositum erat." In the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record" version, the letter h, prefixed to the latter word, is omitted, and the English translation thus runs: "Succat was his name, it is said," &c. See vol. iv., pp. 282, 283.

<sup>146</sup> According to the Scholiast on St. Fiach, and he tells us, the word is British, having in Latin the meaning, "Deus belli," i. e. βθεσσαιρ ρειν ουρρ ουρρ belli Δ λατεν. See ibid., n. 4.

<sup>147</sup> It reads: "nam primum Succet vocatus est," cap. xii., p. 12.

<sup>148</sup> "Patricius igitur, qui vocabatur et Suchet," &c., cap. xii., p. 22.

<sup>149</sup> He has, "Sanctus Patricius qui et Sochet vocabatur."—Probus or Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. i., p. 51.

<sup>150</sup> There we find it stated, "Primum fuit Suchat, a parentibus impositum."—Pars. i., cap. xvii., p. 119. In the Irish version, the same account seems to have been given; but, from the Bodleian and British MSS. of the Irish Tripartite Life, a leaf is here missing. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 376.

<sup>151</sup> See "Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., p. 17. We Socher.<sup>152</sup> This, as given at the time of his baptism, was only one of the four names he received.<sup>153</sup> For, when during after life, he was a slave in Ireland, our saint was called Cathraige, or Cothraige, because he was obliged to serve four different families. Next, was he named Magonius, owing to his wonderful actions, when under the discipline of St. Germanus.<sup>154</sup> Again, we are told, that the title, Patricius, was given to him, at the time of his ordination, and Celestinus, the comorban, or the successor of St. Peter, bestowed this name on him. These accounts, which are to be found in the Scholia on St. Fiach's Hymn, are also repeated, in the Second<sup>155</sup> and in the Tripartite<sup>156</sup> Lives of our saint. Yet, it must be remarked, that in his own writings, we find, he never calls himself, by any other than by his received name of Patricius. It has been supposed, likewise, that this title was conferred, in consideration of parting with his nobility, through a motive of charity, as mentioned, in his epistle to Coroticus.<sup>157</sup> However, we shall most generally adhere to its use—as most familiar to his devout admirers—throughout the subsequent pages of his biography.

While he was a mere child, the various Acts of St. Patrick record many miracles, as manifestations of the glorious destiny that awaited him. When he was in the house of his mother's sister, it was flooded with water, but this he removed, in a most wonderful manner. He, also, in the winter season, converted ice into a blazing fire, to afford warmth for his nurse. While engaged with his sister, Lupita, tending a flock of sheep and lambs, she fell against a stone, receiving a very grievous wound, on the head, and from it, blood flowed profusely; but, Patrick, making a sign of the cross, on the abraded skin, removed all pain, and only a mark showed, afterwards, the part healed. A sheep, taken away by a wolf, from a flock he had charge of, and some cows gored to death, were miraculously restored to life, and his nurse experienced great joy, in consequence. Again, the husband of his mother's sister, who was accustomed to carry the infant, Patrick, on his shoulders, suddenly dropped dead, in a court<sup>158</sup> or hall; then his wife, in great distress, said to Patrick, "Why, O boy, hast thou allowed this death of thy fosterer?" Running forward, and throwing his hand, around the neck of the prostrate body, he cried out, "Arise, and let us go." Immediately the dead man was are further told, that in the Irish language, so-cair means mildness, ease, and also "plain," "smooth," &c. Hence, it may have been given, to indicate our saint's character for meekness. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. v., p. 141.

<sup>152</sup> It is said, in low Latinity, Succa signifies a linen garment, worn by bishops in public. See Du Cange, in "Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis," sub-voce. Hence, Dr. Lanigan conjectures, that the title St. Patrick received, in Irish, might probably have been derived, from his wearing a succa. This supposition is not in accord, however, with the statements, that his name was British, and more especially, that his parents first gave it to him, in baptism, which he received while an infant.

<sup>153</sup> Such is stated, in the last quoted authority; as also, by St. Fiach's Scholiast, in the Second, and in the Seventh, Life.

<sup>154</sup> St. Fiach's Scholiast compares his several names, to a custom, prevailing among the Roman nobility, when he adds:

"Succat primum nomen ejus in Baptismo à parentibus suis: Cathraige nomen ei inditum servitutis tempore in Hibernia: Magonius, i.e. magis agens quam cæteri Monachi nomen ejus tempore discipulatus apud Germanum: Patricius verò vocatus tempore suæ ordinationis: et Cælestinus, Petri Comorbanus sive Successor, est qui hoc ei nomen indidit." See Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ, n. 6, appended to the Prima Vita S. Patricii, p. 4.

<sup>155</sup> See cap. xii., p. 12,

<sup>156</sup> See lib. i., cap. xvii., p. 119.

<sup>157</sup> See S. Patricii Epistola ad Christianos Corotici Tyranni subditos. Villeneuve's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., num. 5, p. 243.

<sup>158</sup> The Latin word used, in the Alen MS., is curia.

<sup>159</sup> See the Second Life, cap. v., vi., vii., viii., ix., x., pp. 11, 12, and nn. 8, 9, 10; the Third Life, cap. v., vi., vii., viii., ix., x., pp. 21, 22; the Fourth Life, cap. v., vi., vii., viii., ix., x., pp. 35, 36, and n. 7, pp.

restored to life.<sup>159</sup> Other miracles are even added.<sup>160</sup> These are of the legend class, which were popularly told, and probably long after his age, to illustrate the early promise of his future great missionary career. It is said, the admirable progress this holy child made, in the course of virtue, far exceeded his tender years; for, his loving breast abounded in Divine gifts, while it was enriched and stored with all virtues. During the slippery career of youth, he did not fall into any faults, that might stain the spotless robe of chastity; such was his care, in keeping the integrity both of soul and body unblemished. While the inward motions of grace instructed and directed him, in all his actions; yet, when he came to competent years, his parents took care to train him up in learning. The child applied to his books very diligently. He most particularly desired, to learn psalms, hymns and spiritual canticles. These he committed to memory; as even from the prime of youth, he was wont every day to repeat the whole Psalter. His tender body was chastised with fastings, watchings, and other exercises of devotion. He presented it, as a living holocaust, holy, and pleasing to God. He likewise represented, in his mortal flesh, the life of an angel, as if living without any body. Such are the accounts of Jocelyn,<sup>161</sup> and of some, among St. Patrick's more recent biographers; but, they seem to conflict, with that statement of the Apostle himself, as to how, during the earlier years of life, he was negligent in discharging his religious duties, as he acknowledges,<sup>162</sup> and in keeping God's commandments. In the true spirit of humility, however, St. Patrick thanked the Lord, who regarded his lowliness, who had compassion on the ignorance of his youth, and who had preserved him, before he knew the Creator of all things, or before he could distinguish good from evil; by admonishing and consoling him, also, as a father does his child.

CHAPTER IV.

THE EARLY DIALECTS OF THE BRITISH ISLANDS—THEIR DISTURBED SOCIAL RELATIONS—ST. PATRICK'S YOUTH AND HIS ERRORS—THE EVENT WHICH LED TO HIS FIRST CAPTIVITY, ABOUT THE AGE OF SIXTEEN—NIALL OF THE NINE HOSTAGES—MISFORTUNES OCCURRING TO ST. PATRICK'S FAMILY—HE BECOMES A SLAVE TO MILCHUO, IN THE NORTH OF IRELAND—HIS MANNER OF LIFE THERE—HIS ESCAPE FROM CAPTIVITY AND SUBSEQUENT ADVENTURES.

WHETHER St. Patrick lived amid the Picts or Scots, as a highlander or lowlander, has not been decided. Notwithstanding, it is probable, he first learned, in North Britain, that Scottish or Gaelic language, which, in after life, enabled him, to converse with and preach so eloquently, to the people of 48, 49; the Sixth Life, cap. iv., v., vi., vii., viii., ix., pp. 65, 66; the Seventh Life, part i., cap. vi., vii., viii., ix., xi., xii., pp. 117 to 119.

<sup>159</sup> Such as those of converting water into honey, to refresh his nurse, who had been sick; of raising a dead boy to life; of having an angel to labour for himself, and for his nurse; of obtaining butter and cheese from snow, to pay a tribute for his nurse, to the king. The miracle of the angel, aiding St. Patrick to cleanse the king's stables, is said to have occurred, at Dunbreatan, as called in the British tongue, or "Mons Britorum," as Latinised, in the Vale of Clud, according to Jocelyn. The Tripartite Life, also, identifies the place, as Alclud. See Fourth Life, cap. xi., xii., xiii., xiv., pp. 36, 37; the Sixth Life, cap. x., xi., pp. 66, 67, and n. 12, p. 109; the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. x., xiii., xiv., xv., pp. 118, 119.

<sup>161</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xii., p. 67.

<sup>162</sup> See "Confessio S. Patricii," cap. i., num. i. Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., pp. 184, 185. References to this passage of his Confession are to be found, in the Second Life, cap. xi., p. 12; in the Third, cap. iv., p. 21; in the Fourth,

Ireland.<sup>1</sup> So far as we can glean, two great distinctive dialectic differences existed, in the Celtic languages, even at that remote period. These were the Gaelic—now represented by the Irish, Manx, and Scotch Gaelic tongues; and the Cymric, consisting of the Welsh, the Cornish and the Breton dialects. The three Gaelic languages have a closer affinity, towards each other, than the three Cymric dialects; but, each one of these classes possesses in common great distinctive differences, which separate it from the other, while there are, also, analogies so close, vital and fundamental, as to leave no doubt, all those varieties are but children of the same common parent. Another anciently-spoken and now lost Celtic dialect, in these islands, was the Pictish. In the anti-Christian period, the diversity of Celtic languages was probably very great, before the introduction of writing, which raised the standard of their cultivation, chiefly through the agency of that great civiliser, the Christian Church.<sup>2</sup>

Near the northern outposts of the Romans, in Great Britain, we suppose Patrick to have spent his early youth; and, surrounded by a perpetual clangour of arms, his education must have been often interrupted, owing to the exigencies of this situation. His defective instruction the saint deplored, in after life, complaining, that he could not explain with conciseness of language what his feelings dictated, and what his mind, sense and affections demonstrated; while blushing for his ignorance, and for his unpolished style of writing, especially when departing from the vernacular. Latin, to him, appears to have been an unfamiliar tongue.<sup>3</sup> Fire trieth gold, however, and the fire of tribulation just men; but, to the end, that Saint Patrick's virtues should become more illustrious, and his crown of bliss more glorious, he was exposed, to the assaults of the tempter. The saint confesses and deplores his transgressions, with their causes; for, he declares, that he had withdrawn from God, and did not keep his commandments, and was disobedient to his priests, who advised him on the affair of salvation. To these errors, the humble servant of Christ attributes those temporal afflictions, which overtook him, while he was yet a mere boy, and before he could well understand, what he ought to desire, or to avoid.<sup>4</sup>

Towards the close of the fourth and the commencement of the fifth centuries, frequent inroads were made on the British shores, by expeditionary and piratical vessels, sailing from the coasts of Ireland.<sup>5</sup> The Second Life<sup>6</sup> of our saint would lead to the inference, that some of these half-military, half-cap. i., p. 35, and in the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. v., p. 118. It is remarkable, that in the Irish Tripartite version of the latter, this passage seems to have been borrowed nearly verbally from the Second and Third Lives, and the original Latin is introduced. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 373.

CHAPTER IV.—To Very Rev. Laurence Canon Toole of Manchester is the writer indebted, for calling his attention, in a letter, dated St. Wilfrid's, April 14th, 1877, to the mistakes of many preachers of St. Patrick's panegyrics, viz.: that the saint's captivity in Ireland first taught him a language, so very different, from what he had learned while a boy, and that his slavery was a providential means, destined to make him, in the future, a master of the Irish language.

<sup>2</sup> See William F. Skene's "Four Ancient Books of Wales," vol. i., chap. viii., pp.

120 to 140, for further most interesting explanations on this subject.

<sup>3</sup> In allusion to his Confession, he writes, "nam sermo et lingua nostra translata est in linguam alienam."

<sup>4</sup> See Confessio S. Patricii, cap. i., num. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, pp. 184 to 189. Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c.

<sup>5</sup> See William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland. A History of Ancient Alban," vol. i., book i., chap. ii., pp. 105 to 109. The poet Claudian also alludes to these frequent raids, where he writes:—

"totam cum Scotus Iernen Movit, et infesto spumavit remige Tethys."

—"De Laudibus Stilichonis," lib. ii., vv. 251, 252.

<sup>6</sup> According to one account—but not ap-

marine, adventurers brought him a captive, into Scotia, with a sister, and a hundred others,<sup>7</sup> of either sex, while he was living in Britain. The Fourth Life confirms this account, adding, that his sister Lupita was borne away with him, by the pirates of some particular fleet.<sup>8</sup> However, a different version of the occurrence is found in the Tripartite Life, where it is said, that among others, who left Great Britain, and the River Clyde, were Calphurnius and Conchessa, with their son Patrick, and his two sisters, Lupita and Tigrida, who visited Armoric Britain, for the purpose of seeing their kindred, living there at the time.<sup>9</sup> Now, the sons of Rethmit,<sup>10</sup> King of Britain, according to Probus, or the seven sons of Fechtmagius, King of the Britons, according to the Tripartite Life,<sup>11</sup> when banished from their country, created a great disturbance, in the district of Lethania,<sup>12</sup> and in Armoric Britain. Plunder and burnings marked the traces of this invasion; and, Calphurnius, with his wife, Conchessa, are stated to have been murdered, by those freebooters. They also took Patrick, and his two sisters, Lupita and Tigrida, prisoners, for the purpose of making them slaves. Following this statement, we are obliged to acknowledge, that St. Patrick was living, with his family, in Armorica, at the time of his captivity. Jocelyn is silent on this subject, although he admits our saint's mother to have been born in Gaul, whence she and a sister had been carried as slaves to North Britain.<sup>13</sup> But, Probus, a much more ancient and respectable authority,<sup>14</sup> calls St. Patrick's country, and the town where his family dwelt, Arimuric.<sup>15</sup> It will be easy to observe, that the word in no respect differs from Armorica. St. Patrick himself informs us, that he was captured, when he was about sixteen years of age.<sup>16</sup> He only alludes to this single captivity. He acknowledges, that he was ignorant, at the time, of the true God; but, by this we are to understand, some neglect of his duties, overlooked by himself, or by his parents. He intimates, that many thousand men shared his captivity, in Ireland, and probably we must infer, these were reduced to servitude, when our saint had been made a captive. This latter proved by the writer who refers to his Confession—St. Patrick was only seven years old, at this time. See cap. xi. p. 12.

<sup>7</sup> The Apostle himself says in his Confession "adductus sum in captivitate cum tot millibus hominum."

<sup>8</sup> See cap. xv., p. 37. The Fifth Life only states, that St. Patrick was then captured, with many others, but, this is noticed, as a first capture. See lib. i., cap. ii., p. 51. Jocelyn, or the Sixth Life, is equally brief, in this account. See cap. xiii., p. 67.

<sup>9</sup> See chap. xvi., p. 119.

<sup>10</sup> Or Rectmitius. In some Manuscripts, they are called the sons of Sectmacius.

<sup>11</sup> The Scholiast on St. Fiach's Hymn has a like statement, but their father is called Factmudius. See n. 5, a. In the Irish Tripartite Life, their father is named Fechtmad. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 376.

<sup>12</sup> Rather was Armoric Britain called Letha, or Leatha, by the Irish, and Llydaw, by the Celts of Great Britain. See the Additional Note, No. xi. to the "Irish Version of Nennius' Historia Britonum," edited by Rev. Dr. Todd, and by the Hon. Algernon Herbert, p. xix. The name is found Latinized, Letavia, and sometimes simply, Letha. However, in the Vita S.

Gildæ Badonici, cap. xii., it is called Lethania, being a maritime district of British Armorica.

<sup>13</sup> See Sixth Life, cap. i., p. 65.

<sup>14</sup> See, Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., pp. 822, 828, where he seems to have followed Jocelyn's authority, in reference to this matter. Yet, acknowledging Probus to be an older authority (Ibid., p. 817) this learned man quotes him on another occasion, when seeming to approve St. Patrick's Armoric descent. See ibid., p. 833.

<sup>15</sup> "Cum adhuc esset in patria sua cum patre Calpurnio et matre Conchessa, fratre etiam Ructhi et sorore Mila nomine, in civitate eorum Arimuric, facta est seditio magna in partibus illis. Nam filii Rethmiti regis de Britannia vastantes Arimuric," &c. See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. xii., p. 48. "Trias Thaumaturga." In a note, Colgan says, that "civitate eorum Arimuric" is wrong, because Arimuric, or Armorica, was the name, not of a town, but of a large territory. See n. 9, p. 62, ibid. Yet, he might have known, that the epithet, Armorica, could and actually used to be applied to the towns, in that maritime range of country.

<sup>16</sup> "Annorum eram tunc fere sedecim." See "Confessio S. Patricii," His Acts

event is placed so early as 352, according to the Annals of Connaught,<sup>17</sup> it occurred in the year 388, if we credit Florence of Worcester;<sup>18</sup> by others, it is placed at a much later period.<sup>19</sup> A sister of St. Patrick, and who is named Lupita,<sup>20</sup> shared his captivity, according to one account; while the captive is named Mila,<sup>21</sup> by Probus,<sup>22</sup> and he mentions a brother named Ructhi,<sup>23</sup> made captive, at the same time. But, their names do not occur,<sup>24</sup> in any other notices of our saint.<sup>25</sup> Tigris or Tigrida has been made his companion in servitude, according to other writers. However, their accounts, in the opinion of Dr. Lanigan, do not deserve the slightest degree of credit. Although St. Patrick speaks of some devout females, who were persecuted for their faith and made captives,<sup>26</sup> and specially describes his own misfortunes, he has no allusion whatever to any sister or sisters, sharing his exile and state of slavery. If we allow St. Patrick to have been born in Scotland, on the weight of evidence; we ought to deem Armoric Britain, the place where he was captured, for the like reason. But, as we can find recorded in history no king of Britain, named Fechtmagius, or Fechtmad, or Rethmit,<sup>27</sup> about the commencement of the fifth century, we may well doubt, if Patrick had been captured by his sons, or that these had killed his parents, at that time.<sup>28</sup> Nay more, the saint himself speaks of the Irish, as having been his captors;<sup>29</sup> and, by some writers, these were thought to have been pirates; but, it would seem, on this occasion, as his misfortune was shared by many thousands, this circumstance has given rise to the opinion, that a large and well-appointed expeditionary force carried them prisoners, away from their own country.

Some of our historical writers have sought to connect this event, with the generally agree, in reference to this age. "A child of sixteen years (was he) when he was taken into bondage;" is the statement made in the Hymn of St. Fiech.

<sup>17</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 432.

<sup>18</sup> See "Chronicon," at A.D. CCCLXXXVIII.

<sup>19</sup> About A.D. 403. See Thomas Moore's "History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. x., pp. 211, 212. About this period, his captivity seems to accord best, with the series of his Acts.

<sup>20</sup> According to Ussher, she was buried, and venerated, at Armagh. See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 824. Also, the Scholiast on St. Fiach's Hymn.

<sup>21</sup> This is thought, however, to be a mistake for Lupita.

<sup>22</sup> See the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xii., p. 48.

<sup>23</sup> It is supposed, however, that this is a mistake for Succet, the first name for St. Patrick.

<sup>24</sup> See ibid., n. II, p. 62.

<sup>25</sup> That passage of Probus, in which those persons are spoken of, bears evident marks of interpolation, according to Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>26</sup> "Sed et illæ maximè laborant, quæ servitio detinentur; usque ad terrores et minas assidue perferunt (al. perseverant)."—Confessio S. Patricii, cap. vi., num. 18. Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," p. 202.

<sup>27</sup> In some copies of Probus, we are told, this prince is called Rethmaig Rethmet; by Venerable Bede, he is Reuda; by the Scots, Rether; and by Nennius, Hista-reuth. He ruled over the Ultonian Dalriada, and as he conducted several military enterprises, both by sea and land, against the Dalreudian colonists of Scotland, as also against the Romans and Britons; from his enemies, in North Britain, he got the appellation of Fommaire, or Fammaire, the word foğ-maire, in Irish and Erse, meaning "a pirate," or "a depredator at sea." Dr. Langhorne supposes the foregoing names to be applicable to this person, as being a depredator of the Reudians or Dalriadians of Ulster, and not of Britain. This prince is said to have had seven sons, who were commanders of the fleet, and who served with a commander of his land forces, named Gauran, under King Niall of the Nine Hostages. See Patrick Lynch's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. viii., pp. 90 to 92.

<sup>28</sup> Dr. Lanigan suggests, that as our saint was known to have been taken and brought to Ireland by pirates, it may be conjectured, that wishing to save the honour of his country, some writer strove to throw the blame of that act on the Britons, and thus, he gave occasion to what has been said about the seven sons of King Factmudius.

<sup>29</sup> In his Epistola ad Coroticum, St. Patrick says: "Numquid piam misericordiam ago erga gentem illam, quæ me aliquando ceperunt."

<sup>30</sup> Yet the author of the Tripartite Life reign of King Niall of the Nine Hostages, which commenced A.D. 379.<sup>30</sup> After a sovereignty of twenty-seven years over Ireland, he was slain, A.D. 405.<sup>31</sup> Our Irish chroniclers relate, that towards the close of his reign, after he had ravaged the coasts of Wales, this king carried his arms into Gaul, whence he took away St. Patrick, with many other captives, to Ireland.<sup>32</sup> Nor does the story seem to be true, that our saint had been taken prisoner, by a British king, in the first instance. We have no good authority for Niall of the Nine Hostages having visited Gaul, until the closing period of his life ; and, this is a well-noted event, in the annals of our country.<sup>33</sup> King Niall's expedition to Gaul, in the ninth year of his reign,<sup>34</sup> and the consequent captivity of St. Patrick, at that time, can hardly be considered as worthy of credit.<sup>35</sup> At a later period of his career, it was more likely to be true. That celebrated Irish warrior, after having ravaged the coasts of Great Britain and Gaul, was killed by Eochod, the son of Ennius Kinsellaich,<sup>36</sup> who had laid a revengeful plot to take the monarch's life.<sup>37</sup> This happened, in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, or about the year 405,<sup>38</sup> near the Portus Iccius, in Gaul.<sup>39</sup> Roderick O'Flaherty adds, that Niell was killed, near the Loire,<sup>40</sup> by a poisoned arrow, which had been shot across that river,<sup>41</sup> while he was engaged prosecuting a war in Armorica.<sup>42</sup> Lynch mentioned the Loire, likewise,<sup>43</sup> but he has omitted other circumstances,<sup>44</sup> given by O'Flaherty, whose account of the place, where those transactions occurred, is quite contradictory. It seems probable, that the death of King Niall occurred, A.D. 404 ; for, in the following year, Dathy,<sup>45</sup> his successor, ascended the throne.<sup>46</sup> Most makes his reign commence, in 352. Ussher has him on the throne, A.D. 360. See his "Index Chronologicus," ad A.D. CCCLX., and "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xv., p. 306, 307, 370, and p. 512.

<sup>31</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 126, 127.

<sup>32</sup> See, Keating's "General History of Ireland," book i., p. 320. Duffy's edition.

<sup>33</sup> In his "Ogygia," Roderick O'Flaherty has a pretty full account of this monarch's reign, from A.D. 379 to 395, pars. iii., cap. lxxxv., lxxxvi., pp. 393 to 412.

<sup>34</sup> According to the ancient writer, quoted by Keating.

<sup>35</sup> Yet, this has been stated, in a Manuscript, quoted by Dr. Jeffry Keating. See "General History of Ireland," part i., p. 320. Also, it is in a passage, as given by Ussher, from his Tripartite copy of St. Patrick's Life. The author thought, that St. Patrick's captivity happened, in the first year of the Emperor Julian's reign. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 432. Julian the Apostate died about A.D. 363, so that his period does not synchronise, with the reign of Niall of the Nine Hostages.

<sup>36</sup> He was King of Leinster.

<sup>37</sup> Eochod is said to have been held as a hostage, by Niall, and to have been permitted to visit his father. Having violated this parole, Eochod also wasted the lands of Lædghen, a bard to Niall, and killed his son to avenge a slight received, on his way home. The incensed monarch thereupon burst into Leinster, with an army, and insisted on Eochod's return as a hostage. This latter adventurous prince contrived to escape once more from his guards, and he tracked Niall on his Gallic expedition.

<sup>38</sup> Or A.M. 5604, according to Gratianus Lucius. This was Dr. John Lynch's computation.

<sup>39</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Vita S. Columbæ, n. 33, p. 449. This place derived its name from the Icht or Iccian Sea. It is now known as the Strait of Dover.

<sup>40</sup> O'Flaherty incorrectly quotes Ussher, to show, that the Mare Iccium extended so far as the Loire.

<sup>41</sup> The words are "venenata sagitta trans Ligerim jacta propter mare Ictium confossus est."

<sup>42</sup> See "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxxv., p. 403.

<sup>43</sup> See "Cambrensis Eversus," vol. i., chap. viii., p. 497. Rev. Dr. Kelly's edition.

<sup>44</sup> Lynch should have written Liania, for Liane, instead of Ligeris, for the Loire. The Liane is a small stream, that falls into the sea below Boulogne. Across that river, a man indeed might have shot an arrow. But no person could be found strong enough to make an arrow fly, from one side of the Loire to the other, and near to where it joins the ocean. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. iv., n. 20, pp. 138 to 140.

<sup>45</sup> He was son to Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Muighmheadhoín.

<sup>46</sup> See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxxvii., p. 413.

likely, some delay about his being recognised as king occurred, in consequence of Niell's having fallen far from his own country. Some time was requisite, therefore, to take proceedings necessary for appointing a new monarch.<sup>47</sup>

Uncertain as to whether or not, St. Patrick had first visited our shores, as a captive on board that Gallic expeditionary fleet; we cannot wholly trust the account given, by the Scholiast, on St. Fiach's Hymn.<sup>48</sup> It states, likewise, that with his sister Lupita, Patrick had been conveyed to Conall Murthemne,<sup>49</sup> identified by Colgan,<sup>50</sup> with the present county of Louth.<sup>51</sup> The Second Life<sup>52</sup> and the Fourth Life<sup>53</sup> nearly accord with the foregoing account. The Fifth Life merely tells us, that when a boy of sixteen, Patrick, with many others, was brought to our island of barbarians.<sup>54</sup> Their captors are called pirates, by Jocelyn.<sup>55</sup> Again, the Irish Tripartite Life<sup>56</sup> is so circumstantial as to relate, that the seven sons of the pirate British King Fechtmad, when putting out to sea with these captives, went around Erin northwards, and there landed on the coast, when they sold Patrick to Miliuc, son of Buan, i.e., to the King of Dal-Araidhe. The pirates and their crew then appear to have visited Conaille-Murthemhne, where Lupait and Tigris are stated to have been sold as slaves, while these sisters and their brother were mutually ignorant of their respective conditions, in servitude.<sup>57</sup>

The blighting influences of slavery darkened even the errors of Paganism, among the Celtic nations.<sup>58</sup> Yet, the light of Christianity was destined to dawn upon Ireland; and a slave<sup>59</sup> was to become the chief minister, under God, for proclaiming Gospel truth, and for entering an earnest and exemplary protest, against the abuses of slavery, at that time so generally prevailing, among the most enlightened people in the world. According to the account left us, in St. Fiech's Hymn,<sup>60</sup> our saint was obliged to serve four different families,<sup>61</sup> who were Magicians,<sup>62</sup> or as others relate, four brothers;<sup>63</sup> and,

<sup>47</sup> See on this subject Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. x., pp. 61 to 68.

<sup>48</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ, n. 54, p. 4.

<sup>49</sup> We are informed, by Ussher, that the Campus Murthemne, in which the race of Conall chiefly lived, had been called Magheri Conall, in his time. See his "Primordia," cap. xv., pp. 705, 706.

<sup>50</sup> He calls it, the plain of southern Ultonia, extending from Mount Breagh, near Drogheda, to the sea of Dun-Delgad, near Dundalk.

<sup>51</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 16, p. 8.

<sup>52</sup> See cap. xii., p. 12. Here his sister's name is not given. The Third Life only states, he was sixteen, when, with others, he was taken away to Ireland. See cap. xiii., p. 22.

<sup>53</sup> This remarks, that St. Patrick was captured, and brought away with Lupita in an Irish pirate fleet, accustomed to prey on the Britons. The author attributes his captivity to a dispensation of Providence, whereby he was enabled to learn in his youth the language of that nation, for which he was destined to be the future Apostle. See cap. xv., p. 37.

<sup>54</sup> By such a term were the Christian writers accustomed to describe Pagan people. See lib. i., cap. ii., p. 51.

<sup>55</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. xiii., p. 67. St. Patrick is compared with Joseph, who at the early age of sixteen was brought as a captive to Egypt, and from being a slave he was afterwards elevated to the highest dignities and power in the country, where he once served in so lowly a station. See Gen. xxxvii., xli.

<sup>56</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 376.

<sup>57</sup> See the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. xvi., p. 119.

<sup>58</sup> In Ireland, and Britain, the strange Druidic rites and doctrines that prevailed, at this period, and a prophecy, that one should come from Britain into Ireland, in a fleet, to overthrow the Pagan idols and temples, are alluded to, in Stanihurst's "Vita S. Patricii Hiberniæ Apostoli," lib. i., pp. 18 to 20.

<sup>59</sup> See Le Comte De Montalembert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome ii., livre ix., chap. i., p. 453.

<sup>60</sup> There do we read: baṭur ille Cothraige, cethar tpebe via rognao. Thus it is rendered into English: "Cothraige he was called, for as slave he served four families." In a comment, attached to this passage, it is explained "i.e. because he used to do the work of four tribes." See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 284, 285, and n. 13.

hence, he was called, by a servile name,<sup>64</sup> distinct from his own. Our saint was found perfectly docile and faithful, in discharging his humble offices. In fine, one of his taskmasters purchased him from the others.<sup>65</sup> Hence, Patrick received the denomination Cothraige,<sup>66</sup> because he served four families.<sup>67</sup> The name of his last purchaser was Milcho, Milchon, or as sometimes called, Miliac, or Milcon mac Cubuain.<sup>68</sup> The Confession of St. Patrick affords no clue to his rank, circumstances, or profession; for, in it, that person for whom he wrought, during the six years of his captivity, is merely called a man.<sup>69</sup> Some writers relate, that he was a Magus; and, as a consequence, devoted to Pagan superstitions. Again, he is called a king,<sup>70</sup> or rather a little potentate,<sup>71</sup> or chief, who lived in Daleradia.<sup>72</sup> He is represented, as having been a harsh man. Patrick was obliged to herd flocks or cattle,<sup>73</sup> according to his own Confession; while other accounts have it,<sup>74</sup> that the saint was entrusted, with the care of a drove of hogs.<sup>75</sup> These animals were probably roving through the mountains, vallies, or woods, and feeding on acorns, roots, grass, or whatever else might fall in their way.<sup>76</sup> By Milchuo's appointment, according to Jocelyn,<sup>77</sup> and the Tripartite,<sup>78</sup> our saint was condemned to the servile task of keeping swine—a very menial employment for such a tenderly-reared boy. According to his own words, the holy youth spent his time, on a mountain in Hibernione—as he constantly writes the name of our island. The truest and most reliable version of the captivity, to which St. Patrick had been subjected, may best be gleaned

<sup>64</sup> See Fiech's Hymn, strophe 3, p. 1. The Tripartite Life has a similar statement. See lib. i., cap. xvii., p. 119.

<sup>65</sup> Tirechan writes: "Cothirthiac servivit quatuor domibus Magorum; et empsit illum unus ex eis, cui nomen erat Miliuc Mac Cuboin Magus." See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 829.

<sup>66</sup> See the Fourth Life, cap. xv.

<sup>67</sup> See Fiach's Hymn, strophe 3, p. 1, and n. 6 f., p. 4. Also the Second Life has it Quotiriche, cap. xii., p. 12. The Third Life has Coithrige, cap. xiii., p. 22. The Fourth Life has Quadriga, cap. xv., p. 37. The Seventh Life has Cothraige, lib. i., cap. xvii., p. 119.

<sup>68</sup> The Second Life states, that the saint, being brought into the Dailaraidian country, served four substantial masters, with all the devotedness of his heart. One of them named Miliuc, seeing that he was a faithful servant, bought St. Patrick from the other masters, to serve himself alone. See Secunda Vita S. Patricii, cap. xii., p. 12.

<sup>69</sup> Dr. Todd has a paper on the meaning of this name, in the "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. vi., p. 292. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 376. Here, there is a hiatus, in the manuscript Tripartite Lives of the Bodleian and British Museum Libraries.

<sup>70</sup> Colgan observes, that in order to spell it correctly, the word should be, Ceothirtegh, from Ceothir, four, and tegh, a house. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Secunda Vita S. Patricii, n. 15, p. 17.

<sup>71</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Appendix Secunda ad Acta S. Patricii, p. 196. Tirechan states, that St. Patrick served this master for four years, in the most laborious manner.

<sup>72</sup> See "Confessio S. Patricii," p. 6. Ware's edition.

<sup>73</sup> Probus says nothing about the four families. But, he relates, that St. Patrick was on his arrival in Ireland, "apud quemdam gentilem immittem regem in servitute detentus."—"Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. ii., p. 51.

<sup>74</sup> Jocelyn calls his master, a petty Pagan king, called Milchon, ruling in the northern part of the island. See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xiii., p. 67.

<sup>75</sup> Fiech's Scholiast states, that he was called Michul, or Milchuo, the son of Hua Buan, and king over northern Dal-aradia. See Scholia 8. "Prima Vita S. Patricii," p. 4. Dalaradia is the eastern and maritime part of Ulster, taking its name from Dal, "a part," or "portion," and from Aradius, a King of Ultonia, belonging to the race of Fiach. See n. 18, p. 8.

<sup>76</sup> He says, "quotidie pecora pascebam."—"Confessio S. Patricii," cap. ii., num. 6, p. 190.

<sup>77</sup> Thus, Harris very incorrectly makes St. Patrick state, that his constant business was to feed the hogs.

<sup>78</sup> Jocelyn says, "Patricius porcorum custodiæ mancipatur."

<sup>79</sup> Unacquainted with this practice, which is so general to this day in the old and new world, Harris thought, perhaps, that the saint was employed feeding them in troughs.

<sup>80</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xiii., p. 67.

<sup>81</sup> See pars. i., cap. xviii., p. 119. Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

from his own Confession. It has not been complicated with those incidents, which have found insertion, in the works of subsequent writers. That mountain, where he tended flocks, is said to have been in Dalaradia. It is called Mis,<sup>79</sup> at present Sliebh-mis,<sup>80</sup> or Slieve Mish, a wild and an elevated peak, in the county of Antrim.<sup>81</sup> Here, he passed many an hour in solitude, but even then, he held communion with the Lord.<sup>82</sup> The love and fear of God grew within him, while he felt not the traces of evil, nor of idleness, as Divine Faith and the Distant View of Slieve Mish, County of Antrim.

Holy Spirit glowed through his soul. In devotion, and in the care of his salvation, St. Patrick exercised himself, bearing in patience God's own dispensation. Frequently, during the day, did he prostrate himself in prayer, before God; nearly one hundred times did he recite some form of entreaty, on some special days, and nearly as often during the night. The spirit of the Lord was so fervent within him, that he arose before the dawn, to engage in those pious exercises, even when frost, snow and rain covered the ground.<sup>83</sup> Even then, psalms and hymns were frequently recited by the pious youth.<sup>84</sup> Jocelyn goes still further; for, he says, that St. Patrick, from a very early time of his life, used to read the Psalter every day.<sup>85</sup> While enduring six years of oppressive captivity, the blessed saint, with incessant tears and fervent prayers, did not cease to solicit the Divine Majesty to procure his

<sup>79</sup> Near it was a valley, named Arcuil.

<sup>80</sup> To the Rev. John Lynch, P.P. of Ballymena, the writer is specially indebted for procuring a photograph of Slieve Mis Mountain, as seen from his library window, and at some distance. From the photograph in question, William F. Wakeman produced the accompanying illustration on wood, and it has been engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>81</sup> See, Fiech's Scholiast, n. 9 i., p. 4, and the Tripartite Life, lib. i., cap. xix, p.

120.

<sup>82</sup> The holy Apostle says, "et etiam in silvis et monte manebam, et ante lucem excitabar ad orationem."—"Confessio S. Patricii," cap. ii., num. 6, p. 190.

<sup>83</sup> See ibid.

<sup>84</sup> "Frequenter enim psalmos et hymnos ruminabat."—"Probus," Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. ii., p. 51.

<sup>85</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xii., p. 67.

freedom, and a return to his country, to his parents<sup>86</sup> and to his friends.<sup>87</sup> No doubt, with these prayers were united petitions for his own deliverance, as also for the conversion of his master and of the Irish people. As regarded his fasts, they were excessive for his time of youth, as he lived on roots, herbs, and such other coarse food, and even oftentimes, he supported life, without any corporal sustenance.<sup>88</sup> Nor could the rigour of the seasons, inclemency of the weather, or any other circumstance, cause him, at any time, to intermit his devotional exercises.

The saint does not hesitate to aver, that when a boy, he had been careless, in reference to the fulfilment of his religious duties.<sup>89</sup> But, in his state of slavery and exile, this youth, of naturally good parts, reflected on his mis-spent time, and felt truly contrite for his former follies. Afflictions were the salt, that preserved him from an indulgence in youthful pleasures, and they became a means for reviving the inspirations of Divine Grace, in his soul. From his Confessions, we learn to appreciate that spirit of profound humility, through which he compares himself to a stone, lying deeply buried in the mud; and, he was grateful to the Almighty, who afflicted him, because he also received support in this affliction.<sup>90</sup> From such acknowledgments, we may best judge, what opinion must be formed concerning those recorded boyish miracles, attributed to St. Patrick,<sup>91</sup> by some of his biographers. Before his liberation from slavery, other miraculous occurrences are said to have taken place.<sup>92</sup> On a certain day, being engaged at prayer, according to one account, an angel, who is called Victor,<sup>93</sup> appeared to him, and assured him, that his fasts and prayers had ascended before the sight of God, and that his release was very near.<sup>94</sup> Then, in a dream one night, he heard a voice saying :

<sup>86</sup> According to Jocelyn, St. Patrick returned "propriis parentibus," who were, following his account, then living.

<sup>87</sup> St. Patrick speaks of himself, as having been an exile, at the extremity of the world, as Ireland was thought to have been, according to the geographic notions of that time. He also speaks of his family, as living far away from Ireland, and this seems inconsistent with the supposition, that he had been captured in Scotland, or that his family had returned there, at any time during his captivity.

<sup>88</sup> To this privation, the Hymn of St. Fiach alludes : maípe doine nírcóimleo. It is thus Englished, "human food he ate it not." See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 284, 285, and nn. 11, 12.

<sup>89</sup> See Father Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Confessio S. Patricii, cap. i., num. 1., p. 184.

<sup>90</sup> See ibid., num. 5, p. 188.

<sup>91</sup> Fiach's Hymn, the Scholiast, and Probus, do not make mention regarding them.

<sup>92</sup> One of these seemingly fanciful inventions is the story of Milcho desiring Patrick to interpret his dream, in which the master's children and his house seemed to be consumed to ashes, himself alone escaping from it, while the flames spread through all the rest of Ireland; and, the interpretation given by Patrick, that the saint was to spread the flame of Faith in Milcho's household—himself only remaining incre-dulous—while it should also extend, through the captive's instrumentality, over our whole island. Again, the romantic story, that St. Patrick was destined for wedlock, with a female slave, whom he found to have been his sister, deserves not any serious recital. See the Second Life, cap. xv., xvi., p. 12; the Fourth Life, cap. xix., xx., p. 37; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xii., p. 48; the Sixth Life, cap. xiv., p. 67; the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xx., xxi., p. 120. Milcho is said to have had a son, afterwards St. Guasacht, Bishop of Granard, whose feast occurs at the 24th of January; and his two daughters, each called Emerica, are said to have had a festival on the 1st or on the 11th of December. See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, nn. 36, 37, p. 100. Also, Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 269.

<sup>93</sup> Thus do we find the circumstance related, in St. Fiach's Hymn, árbeirt tictioy fú gúao míl, eontepreo fúo conna, which is Englished, "Victor said to Milcho's slave: 'Go thou over the sea.'" See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 284, 285, and nn. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19.

<sup>94</sup> The Scholiast adds, that he came to him in the form of a bird. See Vita Prima S. Patricii, n. 9, p. 4. "Trias Thaumaturga." We find the same account, in the Tripartite Life, lib. i., cap. xix., p. 120, ibid. It is coupled with a statement, that the saint was accustomed to enjoy daily and familiar conversations, with that angel. The Second Life calls the angel Victoricus; and

"Well dost thou fast, and soon shalt thou return to thy country."<sup>95</sup> Again, after a little time, he heard an answer given to him, and intimating, that the ship was ready, nor was it near, being distant about two hundred miles.<sup>96</sup> He never had been in that place, nor had he any knowledge, regarding its inhabitants. Skerry,<sup>97</sup> so called from its basaltic rock—on which a footprint was shown<sup>98</sup>—is held, in tradition, to have been that identical spot, where St. Patrick heard the angel Victor's advice.<sup>99</sup> Here, in after time, and probably to commemorate his miraculous release, St. Patrick built a church,<sup>100</sup> and it became a famous place for pilgrimages. Jocelyn has furnished a picturesque description of the Angel, Victor, who appeared to our saint, under a human form. He also relates a part of the conversation, which took place. This angel declared, that St. Patrick was peculiarly deputed to his custody, while on all occasions the angel would be ready to relieve and assist the unfriended captive. Moreover, this heavenly messenger told him, that at the nearest haven, there was a ship, bound for Britain, and which by God's appointment could not have a favourable wind, without his embarking in it.<sup>101</sup> Then, this angel—by some called Victoricius or Victoricus<sup>102</sup>—directed our saint to a place, which the swine are said to have rooted up, and where he was to find a sum of gold, wherewith to pay his ransom.<sup>103</sup> This treasure he found, and with it, he purchased freedom from his master. Next did he hasten to the port, where the ship awaited his arrival.

Following the Confession and various other accounts, Patrick remained a slave for six years,<sup>104</sup> and during this time,<sup>105</sup> spent in a foreign country, he the Third Life calling him Victor, follow St. Fiech's Hymn. See ibid., cap. xiv., p. 12, and cap. xiv., p. 22. The Fourth Life also introduces the angel Victor, as acting on that occasion. See Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xviii., p. 37, ibid. It seems strange, that Dr. Lanigan says, the author of this Life does not give the angel's name. But, it is most probable, Dr. Lanigan meant the Fifth or Probus' Life, to which his remark would fairly apply.

<sup>95</sup> St. Patrick does not state in his Confession, where this vision took place; but, in Tirechan's collections, it is said to have occurred, at the mountain Scirte, recte, Scirre, now Skerry, beside Slemish. The print of the Angel Victor's foot remained there, almost to the day when Tirechan wrote. See Sir William Betham's work, "Antiquarian Researches," pp. 349, 384.

<sup>96</sup> "Ecce navis tua parata est; et non erat prope, sed forte habebat ducenta millia passuum."—Confessio S. Patricii, p. 6. See Ware's edition.

<sup>97</sup> The townlands of Skerry East and of Skerry West are in the parish of Kilconway, and in the barony of Newtown Crommelin. They are shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 24. The parish of Skerry, however, and to which allusion here occurs, is in the barony of Lower Antrim. See Sheets 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 32, 33. Ibid. The Tripartite Life calls this place Schirec Archaille, lib. i., cap. xxii., p. 120.

<sup>98</sup> To this legend, allusion seems to be made, in St. Fiech's Hymn: forpuirb a choir for-

puirb leicc, mapair aer in bhonna. Thus translated into English: "He placed his foot upon the Leac (stone): its trace remains, it wears not away." See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 284, 285, and n. 20.

<sup>99</sup> "At a few yards distance from the N.E. angle of the church is a patch of rock, on the edge of which is a depression, having a faint resemblance to the print of a shoe, which the Ord. Survey agreeably to the ancient tradition notices as "St. Patrick's footmark."—"S. 33." See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," p. 84, n. (c.)

<sup>100</sup> The ecclesiastical ruins here are described, in the work already noticed. Ibid.

<sup>101</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xv., pp. 67, 68.

<sup>102</sup> Dr. Lanigan says, it is worth observing, that the author of the Fourth Life, who gives no name to the angel, calls the man, that appeared, as if coming from Ireland, not Victoricius but Victor, in cap. xxv. The reverse of this mistake occurs, in the Second Life, cap. xiv., where the angel is called Victoricius. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. vii., n. 41, p. 146.

<sup>103</sup> The Scholiast on St. Fiach has such an account. See n. 94, p. 4. The Second Life, cap. xvii., p. 12; the Third Life, cap. xiv., p. 22; the Fourth Life, cap. xxi., pp. 37, 38; the Sixth Life, cap. xvi., p. 68; the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xxii., p. 120; all relate this legend.

<sup>104</sup> So states the Hymn of St. Fiach: bai

thoroughly acquired a knowledge of the idolatry, the customs, manners, temperament, language and habits of the people; all this, as he says himself, "was the work of God." Here, too, he suffered those trials and hardships, which trained him in Christian patience, fortitude and humility. Adversities serve to remove effeminacy and cowardice of soul, while they have an invigorating effect, on the youthful constitution, and habituate the body to endure great fatigues, during the after struggles of heroic minds. The Fourth Life and Probus have seven years of servitude.<sup>106</sup> This computation must be understood, however, not of these years having been completed; but, that the saint's release occurred, in the seventh year of his captivity. Again, the Tripartite Life states, that there was a law, in Ireland, and according to it, slaves should become free, in the seventh year.<sup>107</sup> We are told, moreover, that this was conformable to the practice of the Hebrews.<sup>108</sup> But, those writers forgot, that the privilege granted in the Mosaic law to slaves, as to their being freed in the seventh year, was not applicable to foreigners, but relative only to native Hebrews.<sup>109</sup> Patrick was not in the same situation, however, with regard to the Irish chieftain, as a Hebrew servant must have been, relatively to his master.<sup>110</sup> In opposition to the Confession,<sup>111</sup> and to various authorities, which might be quoted, the Scholiast on St. Fiach makes St. Patrick travel only sixty miles, or, he adds, as others say, one hundred.<sup>112</sup> Other accounts have it at two hundred thousand paces.<sup>113</sup> The Scholiast on St. Fiach relates a ridiculous story about Kienan,<sup>114</sup> who sold the fugitive to certain sailors, for a brazen chaldron.<sup>115</sup> When Kienan received a manifesre bliadna i rognam. It is thus translated into English: "He was six years in slavery." A comment is subjoined, 1pog-nam .i. pointamuil na ubile bicce Ebpeonum. It is translated: "Ijognam, i.e., according to the little Jubilee of the Hebrews."—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 284, 285 and n. 10.

<sup>105</sup> It is strange, that Butler's account of St. Patrick has six months, instead of six years. See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii. March xvii.

<sup>106</sup> St. Fiach's Hymn, stanza 3, p. 1, the Tripartite Life, lib. i., cap. xviii., p. 119, and other accounts agree, as to only six full years. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 830, and Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xvi., p. 37, and Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. iii., p. 51.

<sup>107</sup> "Gentilis enim ille populus solebat servos septimo servitutis anno manumissos, libertate donare, nisi ipsi sponte velint amplius servire."—See ibid., lib. i., cap. xxi., p. 120.

<sup>108</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xii., p. 12, and Fourth Life, cap. xvi., p. 37. The Seventh Life of St. Patrick says, "more Hebræorum." See lib. i., cap. xviii., p. 119.

<sup>109</sup> See Leviticus, xxv., 39 to 46.

<sup>110</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. vii., n. 43, p. 147. Were this the law in Ireland, Dr. Lanigan thinks, it must tend to strengthen General Vallancey's theory, regarding the eastern origin of the Irish nation.

<sup>111</sup> It states, treating about the ship, in which he escaped, "Et non erat propè, sed forte aberat ducenta millia passus, et ibi nunquam fueram, nec ibi quenquam notum de hominibus habebam."—Father Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula." Confessio S. Patricii, cap. i., num. 6, p. 190.

<sup>112</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Prima Vita S. Patricii, scholia 9, p. 4. Fiach's Scholiast brings St. Patrick near a church or monastery of Kienan, on the northern bank of the River Boyne, while endeavouring to effect his escape.

<sup>113</sup> The Second Life states "forte aberat ducenta millia passus," &c., cap. xviii. p. 13. The Third Life has, "quasi ducentis millibus passuum." Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. xiv., p. 22. The Fourth Life, quoting, in like manner as the Tripartite, from St. Patrick himself, has "spatium 200 mille passuum erat usq; ad locum," &c. Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxi., p. 38. Probus follows the Confession, nearly word for word, and he has also, "200 millia passuum." See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. iii., p. 51. Jocelyn says, that the place was distant, "ducentis millibus passuum." Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xv., p. 68. The Tripartite Life, quoting the Latin text of St. Patrick, has "forte habebat ducenta millia passuum." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. xxii., p. 120. Ibid.

<sup>114</sup> Afterward Patron of Duleek. His feast occurs, at the 24th of November.

tation of his false conduct, he repented, and Patrick was set at liberty by them.<sup>116</sup> Afterwards, the commentator adds, that Kienan was baptized by St. Patrick.<sup>117</sup> But, this conversion, which occurred during our Apostle's mission, appears to have been confounded, with the time of St. Patrick's escape from captivity. Harris altogether omits the distance of that place, where the ship was lying, although professing to follow the account, contained in St. Patrick's Confession. He merely says, that St. Patrick made all the haste he could to the sea-side, and found a ship.<sup>118</sup> This would naturally make the reader think, that the vessel lay within no great distance, from the place of the saint's captivity.<sup>119</sup>

After leaving the district of his captivity, the power of God directed Patrick's steps to a place, called Benan.<sup>120</sup> In Sir James Ware's edition of St. Patrick's Confession, it seems to be written Bonum.<sup>121</sup> In their edition of the Confession, instead of Bonum, the Bollandists have Benum.<sup>122</sup> They interpret it, as the River Boyne,<sup>123</sup> the mouth of which was formerly called Inver Colpa, by the Irish.<sup>124</sup> According to Ptolemy, the Latin name of the Boyne<sup>125</sup> seems to have been Buvinda, not Boandum, as Colgan writes it. Ussher sometimes calls it Boinum, in compliment to modern readers. It opens on the Irish sea, about three miles from the present town of Drogheda.<sup>126</sup> The Scholiast on St. Fiach does not say, however, that it was at the Boyne St. Patrick embarked. The ship and mariners, that afforded him an opportunity for escape, are supposed by Rev. Dr. Lanigan to have been lying, in some port on the south coast of Ireland, and in a harbour, or river, convenient for a passage to Gaul. He raises an objection, that the Boyne <sup>115</sup> Many of these chaldrons have been dug out of our Irish bogs or soil.

<sup>116</sup> Another version of this story is in the Fourth Life, cap. xxii., p. 38, and in the Tripartite Life, lib. i., cap. xxiv., pp. 120, 121.

<sup>117</sup> See Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ, n. 9 i., pp. 4, 5. Ibid. There is found, also, that foolish story of St. Patrick having miraculously discovered a lump of gold, which served to pay his ransom to Milchoo. It is followed, by the Second Life, cap. xvii., xviii., pp. 12, 13, the Third Life, cap. xiv., xv., p. 22, the Fourth Life, cap. xxi., p. 38, the Sixth Life, cap. xv., xvi., pp. 67, 68, the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xxii., xxiii., p. 120. Yet, there was no necessity to invent such a story in order to justify the fugitive's escape, from his captivity.

<sup>118</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 8.

<sup>119</sup> Harris was aware, that the circumstances of a ship, destined by Providence for carrying St. Patrick back to his own country, and of its being placed about 200 miles from Antrim, could not well be reconciled with his hypothesis, about St. Patrick being a native of Scotland. This country was so near the Antrim coast, that Ireland and Scotland can be seen from each other, on a clear day. Between both lands, there could not have been wanting frequent communication, with opportunities for crossing to either side, even in boats. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. vii., n. 42, p. 147.

<sup>120</sup> Dr. Lanigan considers this to be the true reading.

<sup>121</sup> "Et veni in virtute Domini, qui viam meam ad bonum dirigebat."—"Confessio S. Patricii," p. 7. Dr. Lanigan doubts, whether bonum means here good, that is, a good end or purpose, or whether it should be taken as the name of a place.

<sup>122</sup> The passage is thus given: "in virtute Dei, qui viam meam dirigebat, veni ad Benum."—"Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., cap. ii., num. 7, p. 534.

<sup>123</sup> Whoever wishes to become thoroughly familiar with the history and topography of its various romantic windings must consult that scholarly and charmingly-illustrated Guide-Book, written by Sir William R. Wilde, "The Beauties of the Boyne, and its tributary, the Black Water," Dublin, 1849, 8vo.

<sup>124</sup> Thus noticed, in Canon Toole's Manuscript, "Where was St. Patrick born?" p. 49.

<sup>125</sup> Our engraving, by Mrs. Millard, presents a view of the Maiden Tower and the Lady's Finger, which were mediæval landmarks, or beacons, for mariners, at the mouth of this river. The subject was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman.

<sup>126</sup> That part of the barony of Drogheda, in Louth County, containing 4,498 a., 1 r., 26 p., is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Louth," Sheets 21, 24; while, that portion in Meath County, containing 1,203 a., 2 r., 29 p., is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheet 20.

could not be deemed two hundred miles from Slieve Mis ; and, he considers, that Bentraighe,<sup>127</sup> or Bantry Bay<sup>128</sup> was more likely to have been the place, where Patrick found the ship.<sup>129</sup> Or he thinks it possible, that if Bonum, as in Ware's edition, was a proper name, it might signify the river, now called Bandon,<sup>130</sup> which falls into the sea, at Kinsale. This harbour was quite convenient for intercourse with Gaul. The distance of about two hundred

Mouth of the Boyne.

Roman miles answers very well, to account for St. Patrick's escape, by his taking a straight line, through the central parts of Ireland.<sup>131</sup>

The wanderer, guided on his way<sup>132</sup> by Divine aid, feared nothing, until he came up to the ship, which was manned with Gentile sailors. But, when he was at the port, the vessel had gone from its place, and Patrick asked for means to set sail. The captain, however, was displeased, and he answered with great indignation : " Do not you dare ask to come with us ?" <sup>133</sup> When

<sup>127</sup> See Miss Cusack's "History of the City and County of Cork," chap. xvii. Topographical Guide. An elegant engraving of Bantry Bay faces p. 352. See, likewise, Smith, in his "History of the County of Cork," vol. i., p. 39; and, also, Seward, in his "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," at the word Bantry.

<sup>128</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks, Benum agrees much better with Bantry. Its ancient name, or rather that of the district, or, of the barony, was Bentraighe. According to Lhuyd and Shaw, in their Irish Dictionaries, thraigh means "shore," and the other compound means "of the Ben." This latter might have been Latinized into Benum, as a name for the bay; while Bentraighe might have been that of the adjoining territory.

<sup>129</sup> Near the bay, there is a place, called Adragoal, or Ardgoal. Dr. Lanigan is of opinion, that it may have been probably so named, from a colony of Gauls, that settled there. This circumstance, together with its favourable position, he says, might have made it a resort for Gallic navigators.

<sup>130</sup> Dr. Lanigan remarks, that a and o are used indiscriminately, as by Baxter, at the word Bonum.

<sup>131</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. vii., n. 44, pp. 148, 149.

<sup>132</sup> The Fourth Life calls it "itinerarium sive odæporicon," and states, that no one acted as guide to St. Patrick. Colgan remarks, that the latter word, which means "directorium vite," was found as an interlineation, but whether written by the original copyist, or added by a commentator, he could not pronounce.

<sup>133</sup> Probus makes the master of the ship say : "Nequaquam tu nobiscum ibis sine nauo." See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. i.,

Patrick heard these words, he separated from them, to take refuge in the hut, where he lived, and, on the journey, he began to pray. Before he had finished this prayer, he heard one of the sailors, crying loudly after him: "Make haste, for these men are calling you." Immediately, he returned to them, and they began to say: "Come, for we have received thee, in good faith,<sup>134</sup> and we wish to enter into friendship with thee, so far as thou art willing." That very day, he embarked on board their ship. Nevertheless, he had little hope, that they would say to him: "Come to us, in the faith of Christ," because they were Gentiles.<sup>135</sup> All this toleration, however, he obtained from them, and immediately they set sail.<sup>136</sup> At this time, according to some, he had an angelic admonition that he should seek Italy, to become a student of the Holy Scriptures.<sup>137</sup> Jocelyn<sup>138</sup> tells us, as also the Tripartite Life,<sup>139</sup> that St. Patrick sailed to Britain, meaning to Great Britain.<sup>140</sup> Yet, for this supposition, there are thought to be no just grounds, and, it is said, that the course of the vessel was rather directed to the coast of Gaul. Although Dr. Lanigan—a stickler for Patrick's nativity in France—does not guarantee, as probable, a narrative of Probus, in reference to a third captivity of our saint; yet, on such authority, he maintains, that it was to his own native country, the sailors brought him,<sup>141</sup> when escaping from Ireland.<sup>142</sup>

After a prosperous<sup>143</sup> sail of three days, they landed.<sup>144</sup> According to one account,<sup>145</sup> however, a storm arose, and St. Patrick miraculously quelled it.<sup>146</sup> About this time, the Franks and Saxons had been ravaging the Norman coasts. Towards the end of the third century, Carausius had been waging war with them.<sup>147</sup> For about one hundred and fifty years, the Franks

cap. iv., p. 51. It appears his reason, for not giving St. Patrick a passage, as Probus states, was because the poor fugitive had acknowledged, he had no money to pay for it. This circumstance is certainly very probable, although the saint himself does not mention it.

<sup>134</sup> "Veni quia ex fide recipimus te."—"Confessio S. Patricii." Ware's Edition, p. 7. The expression, "ex fide," probably may be understood, of their giving him a passage, on his promise, or credit, and, that they would wait for payment, until his arrival in Gaul.

<sup>135</sup> We are told, by Probus, that Patrick preached the faith to them, the very day he embarked.

<sup>136</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xviii., p. 13, the Third Life, cap. xvi., p. 22, the Fourth Life, cap. xxi., p. 38, n. 11, p. 49, the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. iv., v., p. 51.

<sup>137</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xviii., p. 12. This seems, however, to be an anticipation of the event in narrative order.

<sup>138</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. xvi., p. 68.

<sup>139</sup> See the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xxv., p. 121.

<sup>140</sup> The Fourth Life has it, "ad Britannicos sinus pervenerunt."—Cap. xxiii., p. 38.

<sup>141</sup> Thus, Probus has given the words of an angel, "iturus es ad patriam tuam," (lib. i., cap. iii.), and, again, the heavenly messenger is stated to have said, "vade ad hereditatem tuam, de qua venisti."—Lib. i., cap. xiii., pp. 47, 48.

<sup>142</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xv., n. 157, p. 119.

<sup>143</sup> The Fourth Life remarks, "elevato velo prospero flatu."—Cap. xxiii., p. 38. Jocelyn says, that the wind was very fair; "Ventis ad vota spirantibus, vela committentes post triduum applicuerunt."—"Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xvii., p. 68.

<sup>144</sup> The Confession states, "Protinus navigavimus, et post triduum terram cepimus." Dr. Lanigan conjectures, that this was merely the regular time of passage, with a fair wind, from Bantry Bay, or Kinsale, to any of the ports in Normandy, or in Brittany. Harris has a preconceived idea, that, as St. Patrick was going to his own country, his voyage must have been directed towards the west of Great Britain. Accordingly, he tells us, that St. Patrick "is said to have had a bad voyage, having been three days on sea."—Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 9.

<sup>145</sup> Neither St. Patrick himself, nor Probus, says anything about unfavourable winds. But, in Probus' Life of St. Patrick, lib. i., cap. xiv., p. 48, a voyage, clearly distinct from the one now treated of, is mentioned. During a part of this passage, the wind was contrary; and, that voyage is stated to have been prolonged, for twelve days. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., cap. iv., sect. vii., pp. 149, 150.

<sup>146</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xv., p. 121.

<sup>147</sup> See Eutropius, "Historia," lib. xix.

continued those incursions.<sup>148</sup> The Vandals, the Alans, the Suevi, and other hordes, ravaged the whole of the Gauls, during A.D. 407, and the following years.<sup>149</sup> Succeeding civil wars augmented this desolation.<sup>150</sup> Until A.D. 417, Gaul was constantly plundered.<sup>151</sup> St. Patrick informs us, that many thousands of his countrymen had been captured and dispersed, amid various nations.<sup>152</sup> It seems probable, that many parts of Gaul were then wasted and uninhabited. A learned historian, Rev. Dr. Lanigan, thinks, St. Patrick may have landed at, or near, Treguier,<sup>153</sup> a port in Britany. This French tradition, as found in some Breviaries, may account for the statement of his arrival in Great Britain. Through mistake, some accounts have mentioned Tours,<sup>154</sup> as the place where he disembarked; but, this city is far from the province of Bretagne.<sup>155</sup> However, Probus calls the place of his landing Brotgalum<sup>156</sup>—supposed to have been identical with Bordeaux—where he arrived as a slave,<sup>157</sup> but where the Christians purchased him from his master, and restored him to liberty.<sup>158</sup> For twenty-eight days,<sup>159</sup> St. Patrick and his companions journeyed through a desert.<sup>160</sup> Both meat and drink failed.<sup>161</sup> The famine was increasing upon them, and one day the captain<sup>162</sup> said to St.

Madame Dacier's edition, Paris, 1683. 4to.

<sup>148</sup> See L. P. Anquetil's "Histoire de France," sect. iv., pp. 29 to 41.

<sup>149</sup> As this journey, and Patrick's escape, occurred possibly from A.D. 409 to 410, the saint and his fellow-travellers might have preferred taking their course, through the most unfrequented tracts. Thus might they best avoid falling in with some of those ferocious hordes, then roaming probably through various provinces of that country.

<sup>150</sup> See Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," chap. xxx., xxxi.

<sup>151</sup> See Ruinart's "Annales Francorum." Tillemont's "Memoirs pour servi a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome x., p. 555.

<sup>152</sup> See "Confessio S. Patricii," pp. 1, 2. Ware's edition.

<sup>153</sup> Near the extreme northern cape of the present Department, Côtes-du-Nord.

<sup>154</sup> In the older Rheims Breviary, there is an error of the press, "Turonensem," for "Trecorensem." This mistake is quite palpable; for, the text goes on thus, "Turonensem minoris Britannie urbem vectus."—Lect. iv.

<sup>155</sup> Such is the statement, found in the Breviary of Rheims, the latest of which has been published, in the year 1612. There we read: "Gallie mercatoribus; qui ipsum advexerunt ad Trecorensem minoris Britannie civitatem."—Prima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, lect. iv. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," pp. 194, 195.

<sup>156</sup> This is presumed to have been a mistake for "Burdigalam," the Latin name for Bordeaux.

<sup>157</sup> Probus has it, that when St. Patrick came to a city called Arciennacte—which Colgan interprets to have been on the borders of Meath, near Drogheda—he was sold to a sailor bound for Gaul, and the price paid for him was "solidos scilicet triginta."

<sup>158</sup> Probus states, "venit cum Gallis post dies duodecim ad Brotgalum."—"Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xiii., xiv., and nn. 13, 14, pp. 48, 62.

<sup>159</sup> See "Confessio S. Patricii," p. 7. The Second Life, cap. xix., p. 13, and the Fourth Life, cap. xxiii., p. 38, have the same statement. The Third Life has thirty days, cap. xvi., p. 22. The Fifth Life brings him to Brotgalum, after a journey of twelve days. See lib. i., cap. xiv., p. 48. The Sixth Life has him wandering in the desert for twenty-four days, twenty of which continuously he spent without food. See cap. xvii., xviii., p. 68. The seventh Life tells us, he wandered in the desert for twenty-five days. See pars. i., cap. xxvi., p. 121. These days, with the three spent on the sea-voyage, make twenty-eight in all.

<sup>160</sup> Some have conjectured, that the saint passed through Wales and England on his way to France. He says, he was received by the Britons, as if among people, who were his own clan and kindred. Doubtless, there was close relationship of race and language, between the insular and continental Britons. But, it does not seem likely, that his companions abandoned their vessel, for this overland journey: it is rather more probable, they brought it direct to a Gallic port. In case Treguier were the harbour where he landed, it will be easily granted, in allowing for some necessary halts, that twenty-eight days could have been no more than a reasonable time for a journey thence, on foot, to Boulogne.

<sup>161</sup> Some writers of St. Patrick's Lives add circumstances to the matters more simply related, in his own Confession, while escaping to his home. Thus, according to Probus, St. Patrick preached in various towns on the way, and made many converts. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. ix., p. 51.

<sup>162</sup> St. Patrick designates him by the title

Patrick : "What is the matter with you, O Christian? You say your God is great and powerful; why do you not, therefore, pray to him for us? Beg for us, as we are perishing with hunger, and scarcely shall we see mortal man any more." But, St. Patrick confidently said to them : "Be converted to the Lord, my God, with your whole heart, for there is nothing impossible to him. He will send us meat this day, on our journey, until we are comforted, since abundance belongs to him." By the assistance of God, it so happened; for, behold, a herd of swine came before them on the road, and they killed some. There they remained two nights, with abundance of refreshment; their dogs were surfeited, and many of them were left half dead upon the road. After all this, the wanderers gave great thanks to God, and St. Patrick became very estimable in their sight. From that time forward, they had abundance of meat.<sup>163</sup> They found even wild honey, which one of them offered to the saint, with the words : "This has been immolated to God, give thanks."<sup>164</sup> But, Patrick then refused to partake of it; probably, because that man meant to say, that he considered it as a libation, offered, in the first instance, to his God, which was only an idol.<sup>165</sup> On this occasion, the holy youth adhered to the injunction of St. Paul.<sup>166</sup> St. Patrick does not state, indeed, that his companions sacrificed the swine's flesh to idols, although this is mentioned, by some writers of his Acts.<sup>167</sup> This same night, Satan assailed him with violent temptations, which he long remembered. While dreaming, a huge fragment of a rock seemed to fall upon him,<sup>168</sup> and to paralyse all his limbs. But, he called, Elias, Elias,<sup>169</sup> with all his might, and behold the brightness of the sun fell upon him,<sup>170</sup> and dispersed all uneasiness.<sup>171</sup> He therefore of "gubernator." This was also the epithet applied to the head man of the ship, who at first had refused to take him on board.

<sup>163</sup> The stories, told of St. Patrick's infancy, and of his escape from Ireland, will be found related, more at length, in "Irish Folk Lore," by Lageniensis, chap. xxxiii. Saint Legends, pp. 295 to 299.

<sup>164</sup> "Et unus ex illis dixit, hoc immolatum est : Deo gratias. Exinde nihil gustavi."—"Confessio S. Patricii," p. 8. From the context, it would appear, that "immolatum" was relative to the honey. The term may be used, either for sacrifices, or for libations.

<sup>165</sup> Probus has given a strange turn to the narrative. He says, that our saint's fellow-travellers asked him to take some wild honey, whereas he used not to eat flesh-meat. See Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. vii.

<sup>166</sup> Although he teaches, that idols are nothing, and that, without asking questions, it is lawful to eat whatever is sold in the market or laid before us; yet, the Apostle of the Gentiles lays down the following rule : "But if any man say : This has been sacrificed to idols; eat not of it for his sake that told it, and for conscience' sake; Conscience, I say, not thy own, but another's."—I Cor. x., 28, 29.

<sup>167</sup> See Jocelyn, or the Sixth Life, cap. xviii., p. 68, the Tripartite Life, cap. xxvii., p. 121.

<sup>168</sup> Butler was much mistaken, in making a great stone really fall upon him. See

"Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii. March xvii.

<sup>169</sup> The Second Life relates this matter in the following Irish sentence : "Dar ligh in tromlighi foir, corod muich fri thalmhuin é : ro guidh Eli indarput uadh, comdia in mud rigail." * * * *—Cap. xx., p. 13. In a note, Colgan remarks, that this imperfect sentence proves the writer to have been an Irishman. A Latin translation is then given; and, we are told, that in the St. Hubert and Alen Codices, the passage is found to be defective, although its meaning and sequence can be supplied from other sources. See n. 22, p. 17.

<sup>170</sup> There are some very interesting remarks, in connexion with this subject, in Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. ii., pp. 370 to 373. A Hymn, in praise of Christ, has been published by Muratori, from the Irish Antiphonary of Bangor, and it occurs, also, in Dr. Todd's "Liber Hymnorum," p. 152. It has been attributed to St. Hilary of Poitiers, and there this word El is applied to Christ. St. Hilary was contemporaneous, too, with the Irish Apostle. In the old Matin lessons of the ancient Breviary of the church Vales-pirensis of Catalonia, in Spain, it is stated, that after the birth of a daughter, St. Hilary of Aquitain left the world and its enjoyments, to become initiated in sacred orders. See that very learned and scarce work of John Tamayo De Salazar, Priest, and intitled "Anamnesis sive Commemoratio Omnium Sanctorum Hispanorum, Pontificum, Mar-trusted that Christ, in reality, had regard for his prayers, and that the Holy Spirit cried out, and assisted him. As the Lord had said to his Apostles, "For it is not you that speak, but the spirit of your Father that speaketh in you,"<sup>172</sup> so St. Patrick believed, that aid came from heaven, in the hour of his tribulation.<sup>173</sup>

Our Apostle speaks of his journey, in such a manner as to insinuate, that he had some companions during the whole way. It seems probable, that these fellow-travellers of the saint were not sailors, in our acceptation of the word. According to the general custom of ancient traders, those navigators had gone themselves to Ireland, with the view, there to dispose of their goods. After having purchased some articles in exchange, it is likely they were returning to their homes. We may easily suppose, their vessel had been a hired one; while the managers and directors of its course were those roving merchants. It would seem, that some of those navigators belonged to our saint's own native place.<sup>174</sup> According to his own narrative, it seems clear, that they received him as a friend, and brought him as a fellow-passenger; hence, it is incorrect to state—as some have done—that St. Patrick had been sold to these merchants. His adventures, after arriving in his own country—which means that in which his friends dwelt—are variously related. Thus, while some of his Acts simply relate a return to his parents,<sup>175</sup> others state, that he endured a second captivity before he reached them.<sup>176</sup> That his parents were then living, and that they received Patrick with great joy, on his escape from Ireland, are accounts, which we find in some of his biographies, and these are corroborated, likewise, by his own narrative.

tyrum, Confessorum, Virginum, Viduarum, ac Sanctarum Mulierum," &c., tomus i., Januar., Dies xiii., p. 143.

<sup>171</sup> "Et dum clamarem Heliam, Heliam, viribus meis, ecce splendor solis decedit super me, et statim discussit a me omnem gravitatem."—"Confessio S. Patricii," p. 8.

<sup>172</sup> See Matt. x. 20.

<sup>173</sup> See the foregoing account in the Second Life, cap. xx., p. 13; the Third Life, cap. xvii., p. 22; the Fourth Life, cap. xxiv., p. 38; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. viii., p. 51; the Sixth Life, cap. xix., p. 68; the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. xxviii., p. 121.

<sup>174</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. viii., nn. 50, 51, 52, pp. 151 to 153.

<sup>175</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xxi., p. 13, and the Fourth Life, cap. xxv., p. 38.

<sup>176</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xviii., p. 22. It states, he was then a prisoner for two months. The Fifth Life has it, that this occurred, many years after his first capture, and that he was then brought into a very distant country, to the language of which he was altogether a stranger; that a heavenly message was conveyed to him, which announced he should only be in slavery for two months, and that he should then return to his country, where a third captivity was destined for him; afterwards, he was to visit Rome, and thence returning, he was to subjugate the country, where he lived—apparently Ireland—to the Gospel. Kings and princes were to obey him. He was to baptize people, in Scotia, Britain, Anglia, Normandy, and in other islands. On the sixtieth day, he was released from the hands of those barbarians; and, flying, with other captives, the Providence of God supplied them with food, fire, and dry weather, until on the tenth day, they came among the people of their own country. See lib. i., cap. x., pp. 47, 48. As usual, Jocelyn adds something to the previous account, as that the Angel Victor was the messenger employed to announce his release. Then, we are told, that the saint was sold for a chaldron, which afterwards could not receive heat from the fire, and the more of this latter was applied, the colder the water within became, until it was quite congealed. Then the seller of our saint demanded the return of St. Patrick to captivity; but, when the chaldron boiled beneath fire again applied, this miracle was acknowledged, and the saint thus obtained his liberty. See cap. xx., pp. 68, 69. It is probable, in reference to this legend, the following curious popular adage remains: When a man uses foolish means to effect an end, they say of him in some parts of France—"It is like the miracle of St. Patrick, who heaped an oven with snow." The Tripartite Life makes our saint endure a third captivity, after he returned to his country, and had remained there three months. The Britons were his captors, and the devastators of his country; but, they only detained him two months, when the Angel Victor procured his release. See lib. i., cap. xxix., p. 121. His own

CHAPTER V.

ST. PATRICK'S AGE AND THE TIME WHEN HE ESCAPED TO GAUL—HIS SECOND CAPTIVITY—HIS VISION—HIS RESOLUTION TO EMBRACE THE CLERICAL STATE—HE SEEKS THE MONASTERY OF TOURS, TO PREPARE FOR IT—LIFE AT MARMOUTIER—ST. PATRICK'S PROMOTION TO HOLY ORDERS—HIS HEAVENLY INSPIRATIONS—HE STUDIES UNDER ST. GERMANUS OF AUXERRE—HIS LIFE IN ITALY—THE TYRRHENE ISLANDS—THE STAFF OF JESUS.

OUR saint is generally considered to have attained the age of twenty-two, at the time of his return to Gaul from Ireland, which must have occurred about the close of the first decade in the fifth century. There, his sad experiences had rather matured his judgment, although they militated against his literary improvement. His parents and friends were greatly rejoiced, at his restoration to them, and they desired, that he should no more leave them. However, Patrick had certain internal illuminations, that called him to a higher destiny. He seems to have resolved on embracing the clerical state, as one of choice. He did not enjoy, perhaps, for any great length of time, the society of his parents' or friends.<sup>2</sup> It is probable, St. Patrick had been carried off the second time, by some marauding Franks, who captured prisoners, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, or of extorting money from friends, for their ransom.<sup>3</sup> But, it is not easy to determine the exact period, to be assigned for such detention. After sixty days, he escaped from his captors.<sup>4</sup> From his own Confession, and from various old Acts, several modern writers have supposed, that all the vicissitudes of St. Patrick's captivities<sup>5</sup> preceded those periods, when his education and preparation for the sacred ministry had seriously commenced. Following the Tripartite Life,<sup>6</sup> his second captivity is referred, by the Bollandists, to the period of three months, after returning to his own country.<sup>7</sup> Dr. Lanigan, who questions their accuracy in stating the time and place, is of opinion, that this second capture ought to be assigned to a period, after our saint had spent his four years of study at Tours.<sup>8</sup> A comment on St. Fiach's Hymn states, how an angel having declared to St. Patrick, that he must cross the sea to study, the place

Confession seems to insinuate, that after having been some years, at home, he was captured a second time. An inspiration was given him, on the first night, that he should be two months a prisoner, and after sixty days he escaped from his captors. See Father Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Iberorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Confessio S. Patricii, cap. ii., num. 10, pp. 193, 194.

CHAPTER V.—<sup>1</sup> Whether the saint intended to state, many years, or, not many years, seems somewhat doubtful. Ussher followed the Armagh reading, "annos multos." See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 834. Yet, strange to say, he reckons "annos multos" at two years. See also the "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. 395, and at A.D. 397. The Bollandists, too, leave this a doubtful reading.

<sup>2</sup> In his Confession, the saint says, "Et iterum post annos non multos adhuc captivam dedi." Probus has "post multos annos," when describing St. Patrick's second captivity by strangers. See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. x., p. 51. It is to be observed, that "non" was wanting in the Armagh MS. of the Confession, consulted by Sir James Ware. See his marginal note, "Opuscula S. Patricii."

<sup>3</sup> Of such unprincipled men, St. Patrick himself speaks, in "Epistola ad Coroticum."

<sup>4</sup> St. Patrick says, "Nocte illa sexagessima liberavit me Dominus de manibus eorum." — "Opuscula S. Patricii," p. 9. After these words, a few lines succeed, in Ware's edition. Evidently these have been displaced. What is contained in them belongs to an account of the saint's return, from his Irish captivity. The whole of this text is much better edited, by the Bollandists.

<sup>5</sup> In Probus' Acts, there is a confused account of a third captivity endured by St. Patrick. But, although this has been called he third, in reality it was the first bondage. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 833.

<sup>6</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxix., p. 121.

<sup>7</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. "De S. Patricio Episcopo," &c. Commentarius Prævius, sect. v., p.

intended for his instruction was Gaul.<sup>9</sup> Here, it would seem, he had a very remarkable vision, which indicated the will of heaven, in reference to his future Apostolate. The saint himself relates it, as occurring after his return to his parents. Then, one night, he had a clear revelation of that glorious mission, for which he was destined. He beheld, in a vision, a man presenting a comely appearance, as we are told in his Confessions. He is called Victricius,<sup>10</sup> or in some texts, Victor,<sup>11</sup> or Victoricus.<sup>12</sup> This ghostly visitant seemed to bring many letters from Ireland.<sup>13</sup> Giving St. Patrick one to read, our holy Apostle recognised a proof of God's Providence, for his future direction. When he began to read this letter, he found written, in the very beginning of it: "Hæc est vox Hibernigenarum," which may be interpreted in English, "This is the voice of the Irish nation."<sup>14</sup> Having read this opening announcement, and intending to go on with the rest, it seemed to Patrick, that he understood in spirit, how the Irish people, from the wood of Foclut,<sup>15</sup> near the western sea, cried out to him with a loud voice:<sup>16</sup> "We 522. This event is referred by them to A.D. 398. They have even recounted a third captivity, at Bordeaux.

<sup>9</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. x., p. 159.

<sup>10</sup> See "Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ," nn. 97., 107., pp. 4, 5.

<sup>11</sup> Perhaps we may here understand St. Victricius, who was a great missionary of the Morini, at the end of the fourth century, and he afterwards became Bishop of Rouen. See Malbrancq, "De Morinis," lib. ii. Again, Franciscus Pommeræus, in his History of the Bishops of Rouen, says, that St. Victricius was also sometimes called Victorius and Victoricus. He had been preceded, as an Apostolic man, by St. Victoricius, who suffered martyrdom, with Saints Fuscien and Firmin, at Amiens, in the year 286.

<sup>12</sup> A favourite disciple of St. Martin, and called Victor, was sent to St. Paulinus of Nola. See S. Paulini Nolani "Opera," Epistola xxiii., in the "Patrologiæ Cursus Completus" of J. P. Migne, vol. lxi. Paris, 1847. See, also, the two epistles of St. Victricius, who with St. Martin persuaded Paulinus to withdraw from the world. Mr. John Cashel Hoey has a suspicion, that the disciple of St. Victricius, named in these epistles, now as Paschasius, now as Tytichus, or Tytius—the name being evidently misprinted, but there being no doubt, as the Bollandists say, that the two names refer to one and the same person—may have been in reality St. Patrick. St. Paulinus refers to the accounts he had heard from this young priest, regarding the anxiety of St. Victricius, for the evangelization of the most remote parts of the globe, and then speaks of him as a disciple, in every way worthy of his master: "In cujus gratia et humanitate, quasi quasdam virtutum gratiarumque tuarum lineas velut speculo reddente collegimus."—Epistola xvii.

<sup>13</sup> The person, referred to in the Confession, more probably is St. Victricius, who was an exact contemporary of St. Patrick. He was engaged on the mission of Boulogne, at the time of our saint's escape, and he is said to have been a French Briton.

<sup>14</sup> It has been appropriately remarked, that this passage, from a very authentic period of antiquity, strongly supports the claim of the Irish to an early knowledge of the art of writing. See Mrs. M. C. Ferguson's "Story of the Irish before the Conquest," p. 134.

<sup>15</sup> "Rogamus te sancte puer, ut venias et adhuc ambules inter nos."—"Confessio S. Patricii," p. 9, Ware's edition. It would seem, that instead of "puer," some of the old writers read "pueri," as if it were, "we, boys, treat thee, O saint." St. Fiach's Hymn, strophe 8, p. 1, the Third Life, cap. xx., p. 22, Probus, lib. i., cap. xviii., p. 48, and the Tripartite Life, lib. i., cap. xxx., p. 121, speak of the voice, as if it came from children. Some of the accounts have it infants. See "Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ," n. 15, p. 5. The Fourth Life, cap. xxv., p. 38, for "sancte puer," has "sancte Patrici," and so has Probus. See lib. i., cap. xviii., p. 48.

<sup>16</sup> The Scholiast says, that it was in Hy-Amalgaidh, now Tirawley, in the county of Mayo. See "Scholia Veteris Scholiastæ," n. 15, p. 5.

<sup>17</sup> In the Hymn of St. Fiach, we see this vision alluded to, in these lines following:—

7. Oochuim neheann doofetiu, aingil De hi fichiu;
menice acchichu hi fichiu, dofnicepo apuchiu.
8. Ro bo chobair doono ehuun tichu pacraic forochlao;
Ro clor cian fon a garma, macparoe Gaile pochlae.

They are thus Englished:—

7. "To Ireland he was brought back in visions by the angels of God:
Often was he in vision solicited to return thither again,

pray thee, O holy youth Patrick, that thou come, walk among us and set us free.”<sup>17</sup> The saint could not read any further, but awaking out of sleep, he was sensibly touched with the earnest prayer of those unbaptized persons.<sup>18</sup> He rendered thanks to God. By reason of this vision, he was persuaded that our Lord called him to convert the Irish nation. Its inhabitants seemed to crave and most earnestly to desire his presence, and he longed to return as a missionary of the people, among whom he had lived as a slave.<sup>19</sup> Being desirous to know further the Divine pleasure, touching this matter, he consulted his own heart, his relations and friends, while he had special recourse to God, in prayer. A union of influences confirmed his devout purposes. By the Angel Victor, the Almighty commanded him to prepare himself for a seminary of ecclesiastical discipline, there to be trained up in Christian learning and piety.

In almost all his biographies, the saint is said to have been a nephew to St. Martin of Tours.<sup>20</sup> This fine old city of France is on the River Loire, in the present Department of Touraine.<sup>21</sup> As generally believed, by various writers, St. Martin was a near relation to our Irish Apostle. This, if true, was probably an additional inducement for his parents to entrust their child, during his tender years, to the care of teachers, who had been St. Martin's disciples. Although stated to have been a Celt of Pannonia, during his military and early ecclesiastical career, Martin was certainly stationed, at one time, in or near Boulogne. The well-known legend, about dividing his cloak with the beggar, is alleged to have taken place, at Amiens. It is recorded, that he was baptized at Therouanne, where the first church was raised to his honour. The principal missionaries, in that district, are said to have been his disciples. Evidently the people there entertained a deep devotion towards

8. “Salvation to Ireland was the coming of Patrick to Fochlaidh ; Afar was heard the sound of the call of the youths of Caill Fochladh.”

—“Irish Ecclesiastical Record,” vol. iv., pp. 284 to 287.

<sup>17</sup> This well-remembered tradition has been elegantly rendered into English verse, by Thomas D’Arcy M’Gee. It will be found, in the edition of his collected poems, admirably edited, by Mrs. Sadlier. This piece headed, “St. Patrick’s Dream,” first appeared in the New York Tablet, and it is dated Montreal, March, 1868, a short time previous to the author’s tragic death. The scene of this vision, however, is placed in the cell of St. Martin’s Monastery, at Tours. We can only quote, here, from the poem, those lines, referring to this passage, as given in the text :—

I.

- “Come ! holy one, long pre-ordained—
For thee the Swans of Lir are singing ;
Come ! from the morning, orient-stained,
Thy Mass-bell thro’ our valleys ringing.

II.

- “Man of the hooded hosts, arise !
Physician, lo ! our souls lie dying—
Hear o’er the seas our piteous cries,
On thee and on thy God relying !

III.

- “Come, prayerful youth of Slemish hill !
Come, in the name and might of Rome !
Come with the psalm that charms from ill—
Cross-bearer ! Christ-preparer ! come !”

<sup>18</sup> Speaking of the Irish Pagan youth, the Hymn of St. Fiech says :—

ḡadatar cotirrao innoeb, aranmthireo Lethu, aru tirtarrao ochloen, tuatha herenn oo bethu.

These lines are thus Englished :—

9. “They prayed that the saint would come, that he would return from Letha,
To convert the people of Erin from error to life.”

—“Irish Ecclesiastical Record,” vol. iv.,
pp. 286, 287.

<sup>19</sup> See Mrs. M. C. Ferguson’s “Story of the Irish before the Conquest,” p. 134.

<sup>20</sup> Hugh of Kirkstead relates, that St. Patrick was St. Martin’s nephew, and by St. Martin initiated to a religious life. See Ussher’s “Works,” vol. vi., p. 393.

<sup>21</sup> The accompanying illustration, from a French photograph, has been drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved by Mrs. Millard.

him. Even yet, there are abundant evidences,<sup>22</sup> to establish this statement. St. Martin<sup>23</sup> died a year or two after the death of Pope Siricius,<sup>24</sup> or about the beginning of the fifth century. As to what has been said, regarding our saint going to St. Martin,<sup>25</sup> it cannot be understood personally of this holy bishop, who for some years had been already dead.<sup>26</sup> Wherefore, the Bollandists have remarked, it must be applied to St. Martin's monastery, according to a manner of speaking, often occurring in ecclesiastical documents.<sup>27</sup> It

The Bridge and City of Tours, France.

<sup>22</sup> Of the 420 churches, comprised in the ancient diocese of Boulogne, 82 had St. Martin for patron. We also find several there dedicated to the Irish St. Maclou and St. Kilian. Yet, strange to say, not one has been dedicated to St. Victricius.—See "Histoire des Evêques de Boulogne," par M. l'Abbé E. Van Drival, published at Boulogne, A.D. 1852.

<sup>23</sup> Ussher refers his decease to A.D. 401; while Colgan places it in 402 or 403. In his notes to the Roman Martyrology, Baronius assigns very cogent reasons, for having it, at A.D. 402. It was on the night of the 11th of November, that St. Martin of Tours happily went to bliss.

<sup>24</sup> He departed, on the 26th of November, A.D. 398. See Rohrbacher's "Histoire Universelle de l'Eglise Catholique," tome vii., p. 372.

<sup>25</sup> Some of St. Patrick's biographers state, that immediately after he landed in Gaul, he became the disciple of St. Martin. Thus, the two Rheims Breviaries, following the statement of Probus, have such an account. The Third Life, cap. xxi., xxii., pp. 22, 23, postpones this instruction, until he had first studied with St. Germanus. See the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xiv., p. 48. Jocelyn says, our saint lived some time, with the Blessed Archbishop Martin. See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxii., p. 66. Also, the Tripartite Life, pars. i., cap. xxxii., pp. 121, 122. These two latter authorities place his stay at Tours, after his visit to St. Germanus. See Prima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pp. 194, 195.

<sup>26</sup> Thus, Fiach, the Second Life, and the Fourth Life, have no mention of him, as our saint's instructor. Harris states, that St. Patrick, after his second captivity, spent about two years with his parents. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 9. This second captivity is placed by Ussher, at A.D. 397, and he then adds "post paucos annos, in Britanniam ad parentes rediit."—"Index Chronologicus," at A.D. CCCXCVII., p. 513.

<sup>27</sup> Thus we say, ad S. Petrum, for Rome; but, this mode of expression seems not to have been rightly understood, by Probus, and by some other writers.

<sup>28</sup> As when the learning and sanctity of a monk had been very remarkable, or when permission had been obtained, to ordain a monk for monastic services. The bishops is very probable, that St. Patrick had been initiated into the ecclesiastical state solely, while at Tours. This seems consistent, likewise, with his future proceedings. Generally speaking, at this early period, the duties of a cleric and of a monk were deemed incompatible; although, in exceptional cases, both professions were found united.<sup>28</sup> St. Eusebius of Vercelli first introduced collegiate monasteries into the Western Church.<sup>29</sup> In these, a bishop usually lived, in common with some of his clergy, or with persons, who separated from the world. Here, also, young men were educated and prepared for the sacred ministry. Certain rules, resembling those of regular monasteries, were observed in such houses, and therefore they were often confounded with monastic establishments, and so denominated. St. Martin appears to have been a great promoter of those educational institutes, which he brought into Gaul.<sup>30</sup> We have a description of his establishment, which was partly a monastery, strictly speaking, and partly a college or seminary, for the education of ecclesiastical students. St. Martin had a cell to himself, and some of his brethren dwelt in cells, excavated in the mountain.<sup>31</sup> Various observances of strict discipline, such as abstinence from wine, were followed. The coarseness of their dress is noticed; and, it is remarked, that it was wonderful to see how the monks submitted to their monastic rules, particularly as several of them belonged to noble families. Many of these religious, afterwards, were elevated to the episcopal rank. Here, we have an exact picture of an ecclesiastical seminary, united to a monastery. St. Augustine presided over a nearly similar institution.<sup>32</sup> He and his clergy seemed to have everything in common, while they lived in the same house.<sup>33</sup>

The illustrious Archbishop of Tours, St. Martin, had established, near that city, his celebrated Monastery of Marmoutier,<sup>34</sup> in the midst of a desert. It was enclosed, between the Loire's right bank, and scarped rocks, which overlook the course of that river. It could only be entered, through a very narrow pathway. There, the holy Bishop Martin inhabited a cell, which had been made of interlaced branches. It was like that one, which he had for too short a time, occupied at Ligné. Those eighty monks, whom he had collected there, for the most part, dwelt in very small caves, hollowed in the rock, while they were attired in camel-skins. Among them, many noble Gauls dwelt. These were afterwards drawn from their retreat, to be consecrated bishops, like St. Martin himself, and much against their own desire.<sup>35</sup>

The earliest transactions of St. Patrick are those most confused or misconceived, by his biographers; and they are consequently most perplexing to the modern writer, or reader, who seeks an order and a congruity, in their relation.

rarely conferred Holy Orders on men, devoted to regular religious observances. St. Jerome says, "Alia monachorum est causa, alia clericorum: clerici pascunt oves, ego pascor."—"Opera," Epistola I. Ad Heliodorum.

<sup>29</sup> See St. Ambrose "Opera," Epistola lxxii. Ad Ecclesiam Vercellæ.

<sup>30</sup> See Cardinal Baronius' "Annales Ecclesiastici," at A.D. 328. Num. 22.

<sup>31</sup> Sulpicius Severus thus writes:—"Discipuli vero octoginta erant, qui ad exemplum beati magistri instituebantur." Again, he says, "Nemo ibi quidquam proprium habebat." He also observes, "Ars ibi, exceptis scriptoribus, nola habebatur, cui tamen operi minor actas deputabatur."—See "De Vita S. Martini," cap. vii.

<sup>32</sup> See S. Augustini "Opera," Sermo,

xliv. De Diversis.

<sup>33</sup> See Possidius, in Vita S. Augustini, cap. xxv.

<sup>34</sup> It was only a little while before the death of the holy Bishop of Tours, that the future apostle of southern Scotland, St. Ninian, returned from Rome, and became an inmate of the monastery of Marmoutier. See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii. Notes on the Life of St. Patrick, sect. ii. No. 28. January, 1867, p. 195.

<sup>35</sup> See Le Comte de Montelambert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome i., liv. iii., p. 228. The accompanying view of Marmoutier Abbey, taken from an accurate French engraving, has been drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman. It was engraved by Mrs. Millard. This gives a fair idea of its present appearance.

Thus, while some accounts<sup>36</sup> state, that on a certain occasion, Patrick visited St. Martin, and in due reverence remained with him, for forty days,<sup>37</sup> other writers assign a residence of four years,<sup>38</sup> for him, at Tours. Probus<sup>39</sup> adds, that he had received tonsure, and perhaps some minor orders, in this place.<sup>40</sup> Indeed, St. Patrick's promotion to the priesthood is placed by Probus several years later.<sup>41</sup> Some writers have stated, that the future Apostle embraced a rule of regular discipline, at this time;<sup>42</sup> however, there seems to be no valid reason for supposing, that he intended to become a monk,<sup>43</sup> in this, or in any other, institution. His sole object, in entering that house, and remaining in it, was to prosecute his studies, with the advantage of receiving a religious education, in a monastery. The records, of our Apostle's life, during his stay at Tours, commemorate very few incidents. It has been mentioned, moreover, that his actions corresponded with the habit of his holy profession, while he perseveringly devoted himself to the practice of monastic austeri-

Abbey of Marmoutier, France.

<sup>36</sup> These are said to be, according to Irish books. See Ussher's "Works," vol. vi., p. 391.

<sup>37</sup> An old copy of the Tripartite Life and in John of Tinnuth. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 834. The same writer quotes some corroborative pieces, and he alludes to an ancient Life of St. Patrick.

<sup>38</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xxii., p. 22. Probus agrees with this account. See lib. i., cap. xiv., p. 48. See, likewise, the Rheims Breviaries, lect. v., vi. Prima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pp. 194, 195.

<sup>39</sup> This writer calls our saint simply a "clericus," meaning, according to the style of his times, that St. Patrick was not even a deacon. See lib. i., cap. xiv., p. 48.

<sup>40</sup> This writer states, "tonso capite ordinatus est ab eo in clericum, et tenuit lectionem et doctrinam ab eo."

<sup>41</sup> See the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xvii., p. 48.

<sup>42</sup> This story is only told in Jocelyn's, and in the Tripartite Life. That clerical tonsure, mentioned by Probus, has been changed, moreover, in the Tripartite Life, into a monastic tonsure. See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," pars. i., cap. xxxii., p. 121.

<sup>43</sup> The First, Second, Third and Fourth Lives have nothing about it.

ties.<sup>44</sup> The Tripartite Acts of St. Patrick state, how he set out for Tours, to visit St. Martin, that he might receive monastic tonsure. Until that time, it is said, he had only the tonsure of servitude.<sup>45</sup> When he received the monastic tonsure, he abandoned all the cares and pleasures of this world. He devoted himself entirely to prayer and abstinence. It is even said, that he took a resolution, never more to taste flesh meat.<sup>46</sup> Some of the Gaulish monks regarded this practice, as a trial too rigorous for their northern constitutions, however well it might be borne, by the monks of Egypt and of Asia Minor.<sup>47</sup> It is possible, the young scholastic may have shared these opinions, especially on one occasion. St. Patrick was tempted, it is said, to renounce this severe abstinence. He procured a portion of meat, which he carefully concealed, until the time for repast should have come. Scarcely had he done so, than he was favoured with a vision. This checked his desire for eating, and rendered the law of abstinence ever after light and pleasing to him. A man appeared to him, bearing two faces. While our saint gazed at him, in amazement, the apparition said, "I am a servant of God; with one face I contemplate the ordinary actions of man, but with the other, I view a monk, who, yielding to self-indulgence, conceals some meat, lest perchance he should be discovered." Saying these words, he disappeared. As the ancient record adds, the young religious was struck with sorrow of heart, and prostrated himself upon the ground, praying for a long time. He humbly asked pardon from God, for what appeared to him a heinous crime. Then the angel, Victor, coming to him, said: "Arise, and be comforted, for the Lord hath cancelled your fault." Our saint, then arising, renounced the use of all flesh meat. Thenceforth, it is added, that he inviolably abstained from it until his death. In punishment for his fault, our saint was commanded to bring forth that meat, in the presence of his other fellow-religious. He humbly did so, and, in obedience to the superior, he cast it into water. His docility and humble spirit were rewarded, by a manifest prodigy. Immediately, the meat was found to be changed into fishes.<sup>48</sup> Often, in after times, St. Patrick commemorated this fault, in the presence of his faithful followers. He mentioned to them this vision, with which he had been favoured, to deter them from ever violating their holy rules.<sup>49</sup>

St. Patrick's industry and piety greatly promoted the pursuit of his studies, <sup>44</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. xxxii., p. 66.

<sup>45</sup> This would indicate, perhaps, that Conquessa had been a slave, and therefore the mark of servitude was perpetuated, in her offspring. We read, that Sulpicius Severus, a wealthy nobleman of Aquitain, was a friend, biographer, and disciple of St. Martin. About this very time, of St. Patrick's return to Gaul, Sulpicius had given up the world, his fortune, and his bar practice. He sold his patrimony, and he chose for a dwelling one of his villas, in Aquitain, among his own slaves, who had become his brothers in religion. They all lived together, praying and labouring, sleeping upon straw, while eating only brown bread and boiled herbs. See Le Comte de Montalembert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome i., liv. iii., p. 229.

<sup>46</sup> However, Dr. Lanigan states, that he cannot find any sufficient authority, for this assertion, and he thinks, that St. Patrick, although he might have observed the rules of such religious communities, as he lived with, at times; yet, during his mission, and when preaching the Gospel, in various parts of Ireland, our saint probably followed that rule, given by our Saviour, of eating whatever was laid before him. However, he would not violate the general ecclesiastical laws, relative to abstinence. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. viii., n. 53, pp. 153, 154.

<sup>47</sup> See the Dialogues of Sulpicius Severus, lib. i., cap. iii.

<sup>48</sup> In Jocelyn's Life of the saint, this story occurs, in the twenty-third chapter. The writer adds a very singular practice, in his time, on St. Patrick's day, regarding some bad fasters among our ancestors, and what they called Patrick's fish. See the Sixth Life, cap. xxiii., p. 66.

<sup>49</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," pars. i., cap. xxxii., pp. 121, 122.

<sup>50</sup> See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol.

at the school of Tours. He always entertained a great veneration for its holy founder. So cherished was St. Martin's memory, that his beautiful memoir, composed by Sulpicius Severus, was one of the few tracts borne about by our Apostle. It was copied, by his own hand, and for this reason, it was subsequently preserved, with such jealous care, in the "Book of Armagh."<sup>50</sup> After his departure from Tours, he applied most fervently to practices of piety.<sup>51</sup> As distinguishable from the vision, which urged him to undertake his mission among the Irish, the saint relates the following, as a sequence: "And on another night—God knows, for I know not—I heard within me, or beside me, some persons, singing in the spirit, the most beautiful words, and I knew not who they were, nor could I understand what I heard, until, at the end of their prayer, they thus spoke: 'He who gave his life for you.' And, again, I awoke. And, again, I heard one praying within me, and it was within my inward man, and he prayed fervently with groaning. In the meantime, I was stupified, and I wondered and considered, who this could be, who was praying within me. But, at the end of his prayer, he said he was a spirit; and I remembered the words of the Apostle, saying: 'The spirit helpeth the weakness of our prayer. For what we ought to pray for, we know not, but the spirit himself asketh for us.' This was said, with unspeakable groanings, which I cannot express in words."<sup>52</sup> Thus do we find, from his own simple and pious soul, that St. Patrick's convictions taught him to regard such visions, as direct messages from heaven.

It is not so very clear, that St. Patrick formed his design, for preaching the Gospel, in Ireland, at the time of these visions.<sup>53</sup> Nor can it be known exactly, at what date, these occurred; although, they may be assigned, to about A.D. 417, if it be true, as some writers of his life assert, that he was about thirty years old, at this period.<sup>54</sup> It might appear, from various parts of his Confession, that St. Patrick did not understand the drift of that vision, until at some later period. Then, he was informed by our Saviour, concerning the task, which he had to undertake.<sup>55</sup> The circumstance of various distinct visions seems to have been confounded, by certain writers. While some of the saint's Lives<sup>56</sup> altogether omit the name of St. Martin, as his instructor, others have it, that Patrick had visited that great bishop for forty days,<sup>57</sup>

iii. Notes on the "Life of St. Patrick," sect. ii. St. Patrick at Tours. No. 28. January, 1867, p. 195. An account of the ancient monastery of Marmoutier will be found in "Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, Religieux et Militaires," tome v., part iv., chap. vii., pp. 61 to 65.

<sup>51</sup> See the Breviary of Rheims.

<sup>52</sup> See Father Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Confessio S. Patricii, cap. iii., pp. 194, 195. One account states, that St. Patrick was a priest, at that time, when he had the vision. See the Fifth Life, cap. xvii., xviii., p. 48. Therefore, he was thirty years old, in all likelihood; since the Council of Agde required that age, for the ordination of priests, as well as of bishops. "Presbyterium vel episcopum ante triginta annos, id est, antequam ad viri perfecti ætatem perveniat, nullus metropolitanorum ordinare presumat."—"Canon," xvii. It would also accord well with the probabilities of chronology, as referring to our saint. Long before the Council of Neocaesarea, this ecclesiastical regulation prevailed. That it had been observed in the Gallic Church, prior to its being confirmed by the Council of Agde, appears pretty certain.

<sup>53</sup> Not to quote some old writers, Harris mentions this resolution, and then he makes St. Patrick commence his travels. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 9.

<sup>54</sup> The Second Life states, that he was then "incipiens quasi annorum triginta." See cap. xxi., p. 13. Again, we read: "Erat autem tunc quasi annorum triginta." See "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxv., p. 38. Again, according to the Tripartite Life, lib. i., cap. xxxi., p. 121, "annum jam ætatis attingens trigessimum."

<sup>55</sup> See Sir James Ware's "Opuscula S. Patricii," Confessio, p. 11.

<sup>56</sup> Such as Fiach's Hymn, the Second Life, and the Fourth Life.

<sup>57</sup> Such is the statement made, by the anonymous writer of his Life, in three Books, as cited by Ussher, in his "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 835. Jocelyn has it, "cum B.

while the more probable accounts state, that he lived four years,<sup>58</sup> in the celebrated monastery, at Tours.<sup>59</sup> In various tracts, St. Patrick's repairing to Tours, and there spending four years, we find placed, before the time of his going under the direction of St. German of Auxerre. Others invert the order of his studies.<sup>60</sup> A legendary account states, how an angel said to Martin, that Patrick should go to the island of Tamara.<sup>61</sup> This seems to have been that island, where hermits dwelt, between the mountain and the sea.<sup>62</sup> Jocelyn commemorates this vision of the angel to St. Martin. He says, however, that it was St. Martin himself, who was commanded to go to Tamara, while St. Patrick returned to the Blessed Germanus, with whom he spent some days.<sup>63</sup>

The Bollandists state, under the year 414, that St. Patrick attached himself to Amator, then Bishop of Auxerre,<sup>64</sup> and, that he had been for some time there, with that prelate. This is not improbable, and we might suspect, that it was by the latter, our saint had been ordained a priest.<sup>65</sup> However, Probus<sup>66</sup> relates, that St. Patrick had been ordained priest, by Senior, a bishop, who lived on the mountain Hermon. This lay, at the right side of the ocean.<sup>67</sup> Again, he tells us, that Senior's city was protected by seven walls.<sup>68</sup> Placing Patrick's ordination in 410,<sup>69</sup> the Bollandists follow Probus, with regard to Senior. They consider, he was bishop, perhaps of Pisa. They supposed, moreover, that St. Patrick had been then and there in Italy. It has been thought, by others, that Probus did not allude to any part of Italy, as he

Martino Turonensi Archiepiscopo aliquanto tempore demoratur."

<sup>58</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xxii., p. 22; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xiv., p. 48. However, after Probus gives St. Patrick these four years of residence, the angel of the Lord is said to have warned him, to go among the solitaries, who made no use of shoes, and that he remained with those eremites for eight years. See ibid., cap. xxv. Colgan's text of Probus seems to be interpolated, however, to such a degree, that St. Patrick's actions have been thrown out of their original order, in this narrative.

<sup>59</sup> See this matter treated, in Colgan's Fifth Appendix to the saint's Acts, chap. xi., p. 236.

<sup>60</sup> Thus, Colgan was induced to think, that Germanus had been our saint's first preceptor, after his Irish captivity. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xiii., pp. 241 to 245.

<sup>61</sup> The Third Life says, "ut irit Patricius ad Tamerensem Insulam." See cap. xxii., p. 23.

<sup>62</sup> See ibid., nn. 19, 20, pp. 30, 31. See also the Fifth Life, lib. i. cap. xvi., p. 48.

<sup>63</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. xxii., p. 66.

<sup>64</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo, &c., sect. v., p. 522.

<sup>65</sup> This may account, for what Probus and others state, about his having been ordained bishop, by one Amator, and not long before his setting out, for the Irish mission. Those writers, however, might have confounded one ordination with another. Having heard of an ordination, by Amator, they possibly understood it, in reference to his episcopal ordination, of which alone they make mention.

<sup>66</sup> See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xvii., p. 48.

<sup>67</sup> Probus writes, "in dextro latere maris Oceani." This phrase must be understood, as meaning the south side, according to the ancient Irish phraseology. In the same manner, we are told, the nations of the East, called the South the right, and the North the left. That rock, adjoining the ocean southwards, must be sought for, as Dr. Lanigan thinks, in the great promontory of Britany, or close to some of the bays of Normandy. At first sight, it might seem probable, that Hermon was one of those rocks, near St. Malo. Perhaps, this was Aletum, or Aletha, a place of considerable note, and, from the patron saint, it got the name of St. Maclovius' town. Afterwards, it was corrupted into St. Malo. That point, where the sun rises, was considered as the leading one formerly, in fixing geographical and astronomical positions. See Vallancey's "Collectanea de Rebus Hibernicis," vol. ii., p. 269 and Dr. O'Brien's "Irish Dictionary," at Deas.

<sup>68</sup> Aletum was a garrison town, and the residence of the Prefect or commander of soldiers, called Martenses.

<sup>69</sup> At this time, our saint should have been, according to them, about thirty-three years of age, for they placed his birth, in A.D. 377. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo, &c. Commentarius prævius, sect. v., p. 522.

places Senior's residence near the ocean, which Dr. Lanigan considers to be the Atlantic. The whole passage is very curious, he allows, not that we are bound to believe what it contains, but because it may be worth while to search for that place, to which Probus alludes. The name, Hermon, signifies "a great rock," being a compound of two Celtic words, Her, "great," and Maen, "rock."<sup>70</sup> This rock or mount is thought, by Rev. Dr. Lanigan, to be the present Mont St. Michel. It might justly be called Hermon, as it is really a stupendous rock, situated in a bay, between Avranches and Dol, at the points of Normandy and Britany. It has the sea towards the north, and so close to it, that in times of high water, the rock becomes an island.

Mont St. Michel, France.

It was a celebrated place, long before that period, when Probus lived. Some writers maintain, that it was an episcopal See, even before the time of St. Maclovius.<sup>71</sup> A church had been erected, on that insulated rock, in honour of St. Michael, A.D. 709, by Autbert, Bishop of Avranches.<sup>72</sup> It might be objected, that there seems not to have been any town, or church, at Mont St. Michel,<sup>73</sup> in St. Patrick's time. But, Probus and other ancient writers before him, not adverting to chronological dates, probably thought it had been a monastery,

<sup>70</sup> See Bullet's "Dictionnaire Celtique," sub voce, Hermon.

<sup>71</sup> See Hadrian Valesius, "Notitia Galliarum," &c., at Aletum. The name of St. Malo, together with the See, had been transferred, in the twelfth century, to the present St. Malo. See Pierre le Bayd's "Histoire de Bretagne," &c., chap. i., p. 7. It is situated, about a league's distance from Aletum, the ruins of which are still to be seen, under the name of Quidaleth or Guichaleth. See ibid., and Martinère, at Aleth.

<sup>72</sup> Hadrian Valesius says, that it is thought to have been built by Paterne. His feast is kept, on the 15th of April. He was bishop of Avranches, in the sixth century, and he died, A.D. 565. His Life was written, by St. Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers. See the Benedictine "Histoire Litteraire de la France," &c., tome iii., vii. Siecle S. Fortunat, sect. ii., p. 478.

<sup>73</sup> It is in the Department of Manche, and in the Fifth Arrondissement, of which the chief city is Avranches. This latter gave title to a bishop, from about A.D. 400, until A.D. 1791, when the See was suppressed, and united to the diocese of Cou-

when our Apostle was living. It is possible, likewise, that to enhance the respectability of that holy rock, a story had been circulated, concerning our saint having spent some time there, particularly as it was inhabited of old, by hermits, before Autbert's time.<sup>74</sup> He established clerics there, to sing the Divine Office. A Benedictine monastery, in their stead, was afterwards founded, A.D. 966, by Richard, Duke of Normandy,<sup>75</sup> and a considerable town grew up, at the base and sides of the rock. It was much resorted to, by pilgrims, and it was supplied with a numerous garrison.<sup>76</sup> Its natural strength was increased, by fortifications, in an almost impregnable manner. From the bottom upwards, various ranges of walls traversed the sides of St. Michel's rock. Including balustrades around the church, on its summit, the walls may fairly be computed, at the number of seven.<sup>77</sup> It may naturally be objected, that it was not an episcopal See. This is easily obviated, however, on reflecting, that we often find bishops residing in monasteries, as was the case in Ireland. Here, the monastic superior was very often both bishop and abbot. No bishop, bearing the name of Senior, is to be found living at Pisa, in Italy, nor do we find any such name, among the bishops of Gaul, in St. Patrick's time.<sup>78</sup> According to Dr. Lanigan's hypothesis, the Senior of Probus is not to be taken, perhaps, as a proper name. It might be intended to signify, "aged," or "old," on the supposition, that in the west of Gaul, a monastic state of living then prevailed, similar to that subsequently brought into Ireland.<sup>79</sup>

The saintly Bishop of Auxerre, Germanus, was born at Auxerre of noble parents, about the year 380.<sup>80</sup> He was a mere layman, for several years after St. Patrick's first return from Ireland to Gaul. The Emperor Honorius created Germanus a Duke, and a military leader, in his own province. Afterwards, he embraced the clerical state, and he became a bright ornament of the Gallic Church. From a secular administration, he was appointed to succeed Amator, who died on the 1st of May, A.D. 418. Until this year, therefore, St. Patrick could not have become his disciple; and, many think their first interview took place, during that very year, when Bishop Germanus had been consecrated. Yet, led astray by some passages in Ussher's work,<sup>81</sup> Colgan places our saint, at Rome, under the tuition of Germanus, so far back as A.D. 396. Then, he is brought to St. Martin. Others state, that Patrick was thirty years of age, when he came to Germanus.<sup>82</sup> One account has it, that he spent, according to some writers,<sup>83</sup> thirty, or, according to other authostances. See Charles Knight's "English Cyclopædia," Geography, vol. i., col. 754, and vol. iii., col. 688.

<sup>74</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. x., n. 75, pp. 164 to 167.

<sup>75</sup> In 1622, the Benedictine monks here were united to the Congregation of St. Maur. After the French Revolution, this place was made a prison for nobles and priests. At present, however, this Abbey has been transformed into a state prison. See the Abbé Migne's "Dictionnaire des Abbayes et Monastères," &c., col. 563, 564.

<sup>76</sup> A deed of Lewis the Pious, and dated A.D. 817, names this establishment, among the great monasteries of France.

<sup>77</sup> See Martinière, at Mont St. Michel, and also Hadrian Valesius.

<sup>78</sup> A St. Senior, or St. Senator, was a fellow-hermit with St. Paternus, and he is said to have succeeded in the See of Avanches.

<sup>79</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. x., n. 45, p. 167.

<sup>80</sup> His festival occurs, on the 26th of July, although he died on the 31st of this month, A.D. 448, after having ruled his diocese for thirty years and twenty-five days. See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. vii. July xxvi.

<sup>81</sup> See his "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 837 and the following pages.

<sup>82</sup> See the Fourth Life, cap. xxvii., p. 38.

<sup>83</sup> See the Second Life of St. Patrick, cap. xxii., p. 13; the Fourth Life, cap. xxvi., p. 38. In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, lib. i., cap. xxxiii., p. 122, we have a nearly similar account.

<sup>84</sup> But Colgan shows, in his notes, the in-

rities, forty years with St. Germanus,<sup>84</sup> while he was employed, in diligently studying the Holy Scriptures. However, the Third Life states,<sup>85</sup> that Patrick was only four years with St. Germanus, and, that then he lived nine years, in an island, called Tamerensis. Afterwards, it is said, he went to Rome. Again, St. Erric of Auxerre speaks of eighteen years, as all passed by St. Patrick, under St. German.<sup>86</sup> Many who wrote after his time adopt this statement. Rigorously taken, however, this could not be true. From the words of Erric of Auxerre, it might be inferred, that St. Patrick was the constant companion of St. Germanus.<sup>87</sup> It was during this time, that our Apostle is said to have got the name of Magonius, or, as Nennius has it, Maun.<sup>88</sup> Not in Gaul alone, but likewise in Italy, St. Patrick is introduced, as being under the guidance of St. Germanus,<sup>89</sup> who spent much of his time, with the imperial ruler at Ravenna. Here, too, he died, and St. Patrick was probably under his guidance there, as in many other places, where he may have received instruction. This seems consistent, with what we read, in various tracts.<sup>90</sup> He is said to have crossed the mighty Alps,<sup>91</sup> and to have visited the south-east of Italy, to learn wisdom and religion, from the Bishop Germanus.<sup>92</sup> By one learned authority, it has been advanced, that the four years of St. Patrick, passed in St. Martin's monastery, should precede those years he spent in the island.<sup>93</sup> And next, in chronological order, ought to follow those other four years, he remained under the immediate direction of St. Germanus. Thus, it might happen, at thirty years, that Patrick could have placed himself, under the guidance of so holy a bishop, who recommended him to study in a suitable place, and who afterwards received his missionary services, until the Irish mission had been thought deserving our Apostle's ultimate charge. The practical duties of a pastor and the administration of the sacraments were a necessary part of this preparation.<sup>94</sup>

In the Irish version of Nennius<sup>95</sup> it is said, that Patrick went southwards to study, and that he read the Canon with Germanus.<sup>96</sup> Other Acts of the correctness of such an assertion. See cap. xxii., and nn. 26, 28, pp. 13, 17, "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>85</sup> See cap. xxi., xxii., pp. 22, 23.

<sup>86</sup> These might in some manner be accounted for, as being added to 414, they make 432, the presumed date when St. Patrick commenced his mission in Ireland.

<sup>87</sup> See "De Miraculis S. Germani," lib. i., cap. xii.

<sup>88</sup> If there be any truth in this story, it has been conjectured, that Maun might be the same as Maen, a rock, by which metaphorical appellation, St. Patrick may have been recognised.

<sup>89</sup> Probus, who has been classed among the most accurate of our Apostle's biographers, represents him, as having been in Gaul and Italy. Thus, our saint is made to state, that he had been "per Gallias atque per Italiam." See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xix., p. 48.

<sup>90</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., pp. 833 et seq.

<sup>91</sup> From the Hymn of St. Fiach, "Liber Hymnorum," we read this translation, by William M. Hennessey:—

"He sent him across the mighty Alps,
It was an illustrious course,

Until he left him with Germanus, Southwards in the south of Letha."

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii., No. 25. October, 1866. On this last word, there is added this ancient gloss: "id. Italia ubi fuit Germanus." See p. 9.

<sup>92</sup> See the "Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," edited by Dr. O'Donovan, p. 413. Taken from a fragment of St. Patrick's Life, as found in the "Leabhar Breac."

<sup>93</sup> The diversities of narrative and the chronological difficulties found in St. Patrick's Acts—especially in reference to this period—have induced the Rev. John Francis Shearman and other writers to suppose, that those statements must have reference to more Patricks than to the traditional Apostle of Ireland. See Father Shearman's ingenious essay in "Loca Patriciana," part xiii., pp. 409 to 468, in the "Journal of the Royal Historical and Archæological Association of Ireland," vol. iv. Fourth Series. July, 1878. No. 35.

<sup>94</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xi., pp. 169, 170.

<sup>95</sup> Published by the Irish Archæological Society, in 1848.

Irish Apostle sustain this statement.<sup>97</sup> The testimony of the Tripartite Life is quite explicit, on this head. It says, that having been admonished, in many visions, St. Patrick journeyed across the Iccian Sea, until he came to France.<sup>98</sup> Here, we can hardly doubt, he had a conference with St. Germanus, when he revealed to the holy bishop some of his own sublime purposes and aspirations. To the Alps, and to southern parts of Italy, he went from France, continues the Tripartite; and, there he found St. Germanus. With him, St. Patrick read the ecclesiastical canons, even as Gamaliel, at the feet of the Apostle Paul. He there served God in labours, and in fasting, and in chastity, in contrition of heart, and in the love of God and of his neighbour. In collecting dates, from the confused evidences now at hand, if we regard St. Patrick's first introduction to Germanus, as occurring about A.D. 418, thirteen or fourteen years of study and of missionary labour probably occupied the interval, until A.D. 432. Then, as pretty clearly established, St. Patrick commenced the active pursuit of his Irish Apostolic labours.<sup>99</sup>

The life of St. Patrick was—according to his most enlarged Acts—a stirring and an adventurous one. Some of the writers merely commemorate the fact, that he spent some time in Italy. Others subjoin various incidents, connected with this period. The bleak and barren isles, that rise out of the Tuscan Sea, from Serino to Lipari, were chosen by Anchorets, for the place of their voluntary exile.<sup>100</sup> Here, too, the Irish Apostle sought a congenial retreat, for a time, in the Tyrrhene Islands.<sup>101</sup> It does not follow, however, that he there received instruction from St. Germanus in person,<sup>102</sup> although said to have been with him,<sup>103</sup> in Southern Latium.<sup>104</sup> We are told, that after

<sup>96</sup> The Hymn of St. Fiach likewise states :—

Ἐγὼ αἶψα καὶ τὸν ἱερεὺς Γερμανὸν, ἵππεύοντα ἑλθόντα.

It is thus translated into English :—

“He read the canon with Germanus : it is this that history relates.”

—“Irish Ecclesiastical Record,” vol. iv., March 1868, pp. 284, 285.

<sup>97</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xx., p. 13 ; the Third Life, cap. xxi., p. 22 ; the Fourth Life, cap. xxvi., p. 38 ; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxi., p. 48 ; the Sixth Life, cap. xxii., p. 66.

<sup>98</sup> See “Septima Vita S. Patricii,” lib. i., cap. xxxi., p. 121.

<sup>99</sup> See Colgan's dissertation on these matters, in “Trias Thaumaturga,” Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii,” cap. xiii., pp. 241 to 245.

<sup>100</sup> See Gibbon's “History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,” vol. vi., chap. xxxvii., p. 233.

<sup>101</sup> The Hymn of Fiach states, in reference to St. Patrick :—

Ἦν ἰνὸν τῶν νησιῶν Τυρρηνίαν, αἰνῶν ἰνὸν τῶν νησιῶν.

It is thus translated into English :—

“In the islands of the Tyrrhene Sea he staid : therein he meditated.”

—“Irish Ecclesiastical Record,” vol. iv., pp. 284, 285.

<sup>102</sup> The author of the Third Life places those four years, passed at Tours, between the four other years, spent with St. Germanus, and that time, when St. Patrick went to the island. Dr. Lanigan remarks, likewise, that this statement must be a Hysteron proteron, or in other words a reversal of order, by placing the latter incidents of narrative the first, as meeting the reader's attention.

<sup>103</sup> St. Germanus, however, did not reside, nor hold a school, in any of those islands, near the south of France. Yet, some writers have supposed, that the account, given in St. Fiach's Hymn, related to one uninterrupted chain, as a part of St. Patrick's life. Accordingly, they placed St. Germanus along with him, in the island or islands of the Tyrrhene Sea. Probus says of our saint, “sicque permansit cum insulanis illis novem annis.”—“Quinta Vita S. Patricii,” lib. i., cap. xvi., p. 48.

<sup>104</sup> The Scholiast here remarks, that Latium means Italy, and that it was so called, because Saturn “ibi latuit,” when flying from Jove. He notices, however, that Germanus was living in Gaul. “In insulis maris Tyrrhene mansit, uti memoro, is probably an error for the word, “memoratur.” The word “remansit” can mean leaving Ireland, St. Patrick crossed the Alps,<sup>105</sup> and how he remained with that master, in Southern Letha.<sup>106</sup> Colgan has incorrectly translated the Letha of St. Fiach's Hymn, by Latium, according to Rev. Dr. Lanigan;<sup>107</sup> probably, he was not aware, that while Armorica, or Britany, went by such a name, when distinguished as Southern Letha, the denomination applied, likewise, to Italy.<sup>108</sup> Arelanensis<sup>109</sup> is the name given, to this island of St. Patrick's residence, by some authorities;<sup>110</sup> while, it is added, that he spent there thirty years of his life, under St. Germanus.<sup>111</sup> However, such a statement is surrounded with too many inconsistencies. By Colgan, it has been supposed, that thirty-eight years elapsed, between St. Patrick's captivity and his Irish mission.<sup>112</sup> But, the latter account seems only the visionary dream of those chroniclers, who wished to advance the age of our saint to sixty years, when he came as a missionary to our country. It has been conjectured, by Colgan,<sup>113</sup> that Camargue, at the mouth of the Rhone,<sup>114</sup> was the place, to which allusion has been made. In some part of the Mediterranean, and near the western coast of Italy, that island is thought to have been situated. Lerins is said to have been the place.<sup>115</sup> It has been doubted, however, by some, that St. Honoratus<sup>116</sup> founded his seminary there, during the early career of our saint.<sup>117</sup> Various writers, and among others, the Bollandists, relate, that St. Honoratus founded his monastery, about the year 375.<sup>118</sup> only, that St. Patrick spent some time with St. German, before he went to the islands. The word, comdhfargaibh, which Colgan has rendered, "remansit," in Dr. Lanigan's opinion, ought rather be translated, "visited," or, "conferred with."

<sup>105</sup> The Hymn of St. Fiach states:—

Do fadó tar éirfa huile de marb ba amru petha
Conno farrsgaib la German, anoe moeirceat Letha.

It is thus translated into English:—

"He sent him across all the Alps: over the sea marvellous was his course, Until he staid with Germanus in the south, in southern Letha."

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv.,
pp. 284, 285.

<sup>106</sup> See the Hymn of St. Fiach. For Alpes, which Colgan's translation has, at stanza 5, he tells us, in a note appended, that we are to read Albion, according to an old marginal remark.

<sup>107</sup> In the Second Life, cap. xvii., the voice, announcing to St. Patrick his liberation from captivity, is made to say, that a ship was ready for him that he might go to Italy. Dr. Lanigan thinks the author, or, perhaps, his translator, mistook Letha for Latium, and imagined, it has been assumed, his text should have been better understood, by his writing Italy.

<sup>108</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks, likewise, that translating the Letha of St. Fiach's Hymn, for Latium, confused Colgan's calculations, in reference to St. Patrick's time spent with St. Germanus. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xiii., pp. 241 to 245.

<sup>109</sup> It is rather curious to find, what confusion has been caused, owing to the name of St. Patrick's island having been written Tamerensis and Arelanensis. Colgan would read "Arelatensis" for "Arelanensis." Elsewhere, he makes Tamaria a different island, from Arelanensis. See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 27, p. 17, and nn. 19, 20, pp. 30, 31.

<sup>110</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xxii., p. 13, the Fourth Life, lib. i., cap. xxvi., p. 38, and the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xxxiii., p. 122.

<sup>111</sup> The Bollandists have distinguished likewise, Tamarenis—by which they mean Ireland—from "insula Arelanensis." See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Apostolo Hiberniæ. Commentarius prævius, sect. v., p. 522, sect. ix., p. 528. But, this difference may have been caused, by the circumstance of various readings occurring for the same place, as found in different MSS.

<sup>112</sup> To find the respective places, in which so many years were spent, proves no easy task.

<sup>113</sup> See his "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 27, p. 17.

<sup>114</sup> See Carolus Stephanus, "Dictionarium Geographicum."

<sup>115</sup> In certain stories, concerning St. Patrick's insular proceedings, there occur circumstances, that have a sort of similarity with some, which are said to have taken place at Lerins.

<sup>116</sup> The feast of St. Honoratus, Archbishop of Arles, occurs on the 16th of January. He died, A.D. 429, and from Arles, his remains were translated to Lerins, now called St. Honoré, A.D. 1391.

<sup>117</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii. p. 836.

<sup>118</sup> See also Tillemont's "Memoirs pour

Most probably, his building at Lerins may be referred, to the beginning of the fifth century. At any rate, by many years, it must have been prior to A.D. 418, when St. Patrick is supposed to have visited this island, for the first time.<sup>119</sup> There many holy and learned men had received their training.<sup>120</sup> The authority of Probus and his description are cited, by the Bollandists, for the probability of such an opinion.<sup>121</sup> The Island of Lerins lies near the coast, and the mountains; while, it may be regarded, as situated in the Tyrrhene Sea. While St. Patrick was in the island, he is said to have banished a huge beast, that used each year—the month of May excepted—to hinder the islanders, from getting water, at a certain fountain.<sup>122</sup> This is somewhat like a story, concerning St. Honoratus having driven a dragon out of Lerins Island.<sup>123</sup> Yet, more than one island is said to have been honoured, by St. Patrick's presence.<sup>124</sup> Near Lerins, there was another, known as Lero, now Sainte Marguerite.<sup>125</sup> The pious student might have visited it. He might have wished, even, to hold intercourse with holy recluses, who inhabited some islands, lying near him.<sup>126</sup> By some writers, the island of St. Patrick's residence is called Tamerensis.<sup>127</sup> This has been incorrectly identified with Capraria, now Capraia.<sup>128</sup> But, Ussher indulges a conjecture, that Tamaria was Camaria, or Camargue,<sup>129</sup> near Arles.<sup>130</sup> And Probus, when relating the angel's message, intimates, that island, in which St. Patrick's instructors dwelt,<sup>131</sup> lay between the mountains and the sea.<sup>132</sup> But, although many monasteries had been established, in other parts of Provence,<sup>133</sup> we are not aware of any religious house having been founded at Camargue.<sup>134</sup> The Bollandists start an absurd conjecture, that the "insula Tamerensis" was no other than Ireland itself.<sup>135</sup> Opposite the mouth of a river, Tamar, that flows in England, into the Irish Sea, this Insula Tamarensis has been placed, by another writer.<sup>136</sup> Yet, this river, at Plymouth,<sup>137</sup> does not enter the sea inservir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xii., at St. Honorat. Art. vii.

<sup>119</sup> Persons of various nations and tongues lived at Lerins. See ibid.

<sup>120</sup> See ibid., tome xv., p. 395.

<sup>121</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo, &c. Commentarius Prævius, sect. ix., pp. 528, 529.

<sup>122</sup> See Probus' or Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. xvi., p. 48.

<sup>123</sup> See Tillemont, in the Article already quoted.

<sup>124</sup> See Fiech's Hymn, strophe 6. Tirechan has a similar statement.

<sup>125</sup> See Tillemont's "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xv. Art. S. Eucherius.

<sup>126</sup> See, St. Ambrose, Hexam. lib. iii., cap. 5. Also, St. Jerome, Epist. 30 ad Oceanum.

<sup>127</sup> See, "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxii., p. 23. The same name occurs, in Ussher's Tripartite. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 435.

<sup>128</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," nn. 19, 20, pp. 30, 31. But, it is quite evident, Colgan misapprehended a passage in Ussher. This writer, however, when speaking of certain islands, inhabited by the monks, mentions Capraria in his "Primor-dia," cap. xvii., p. 836; but, he does not identify it with Tamaria.

<sup>129</sup> An island, formed by the mouths of the River Rhone.

<sup>130</sup> See "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. ccccix.

<sup>131</sup> The matter was thus understood, by the compiler of the Tripartite Life. After mentioning, that St. Patrick was "in mari Tyrreno," or rather in an island of that sea, the writer says, that there he went to certain persons, who dwelt in a cavern, between a mountain and the sea. See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxxiv., p. 122.

<sup>132</sup> "Vade ad illos, qui sunt in insula inter montes et mare." See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xvi., p. 48.

<sup>133</sup> See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," liv. xxiv., sect. lvi.

<sup>134</sup> Patroclus was Bishop of Arles, about this period. See Tillemont's "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xv., p. 54.

<sup>135</sup> They seem to think, a clerical error has here occurred, and that for Tamerensis may be read Temoriensis, because Temoria was the capital of Ireland. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Apostolo Hiberniæ, sect. viii., num. 52, p. 527.

<sup>136</sup> This conjecture has been offered, by dicated, nor is there an island at its embouchure. The period, spent by St. Patrick in those islands, and elsewhere, during his studentship, has been variously estimated, by different compilers of his Acts. Yet, it cannot be discovered, from his own writings, how long he lived in the chief island, although, the contrary has been asserted.<sup>138</sup> The Tripartite Life states, that three other Patricks<sup>139</sup> received him, and that they lived in a solitary cave, on the Tyrrhene Islands. Our saint there miraculously banished a monster, from a fountain, that was near; and, loaves of bread were sent to the four Patricks from heaven. These also established a bond of holy friendship and alliance. The period for our saint's dwelling there has been stated as seven years.<sup>140</sup> Another account<sup>141</sup> divides these years, between the Tuscan Islands, and other localities of Gaul and Italy, as also, to make up the interval, including his journeys by land and sea.<sup>142</sup> During this time, the fear of the Lord was ever before his mind, as related in the Book of Armagh,<sup>143</sup> and it was the guide of all his proceedings.<sup>144</sup> This account,<sup>145</sup> as found in Tirechan, is rendered absurd, however, by the immediate announcement,<sup>146</sup> that Patrick lived for thirty years,<sup>147</sup> in Aralanensis. It is to be regretted, that we have not clearer lights, regarding the places named, about this period of his career, such as the Thyrrene Sea,<sup>148</sup> the Tuscan Sea, Letha, Capua,<sup>149</sup> Latium and Hermon.<sup>150</sup> The Tripartite Life has no account of Capua, but it retains the name Hermon.<sup>151</sup> Colgan knew not what to do with a mountain, or rock, called Hermon, Arnon, or Morion. He could make out no such place, bearing that name, in Italy.<sup>152</sup>

Porter, in his "Compendium Annalium Ecclesiasticorum Regni Hiberniæ," p. 123.

<sup>137</sup> See Camden's "Britannia," col. 25. See, likewise, Lewis' Maps of Cornwall and Devonshire.

<sup>138</sup> It is not defined, in the Hymn of St. Fiach, in the Second Life, in the Third Life, in the Fourth Life, in the Fifth Life, in Jocelyn's, nor in the Tripartite Life.

<sup>139</sup> Colgan conjectures these were probably St. Patrick of Auvergne, venerated at the 16th of March; St. Patrick, Bishop of Nola, venerated on the 17th of March; and St. Patrick Senior, venerated at the 24th of August. See his note 22, on the Hymn of St. Fiach, p. 7.

<sup>140</sup> Colgan thinks this arose, from a copyist's error, by writing seven for nine. See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," n. 28, p. 30. Also, see "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxxiv., p. 122, and n. 16, p. 171.

<sup>141</sup> That of Tirechan.

<sup>142</sup> This account, as found in Tirechan, adds, "ut ipse dixit in commemoratione laborum suorum." See also Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 835.

<sup>143</sup> According to "Dicta S. Patricii," in the "Liber Armacanus," fol. 9.

<sup>144</sup> See Dr. Petrie's "Essay on the Hill of Tara," p. 35.

<sup>145</sup> It is said to have been received, from a Bishop Ultan, by some thought to have been over the See of Ardrbraccan, in the seventh century.

<sup>146</sup> After "laborum," as seen in Ussher's allusion, "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 835, the text thus runs: "Erat autem in una ex insulis, quæ dicitur Aralanensis, annis xxx.

<sup>147</sup> Dr. Lanigan suspects, that "thirty" had been inserted for "three" years, which, perhaps, formed a part of the total "seven," spent at his studies, and on his travels.

<sup>148</sup> It is said, "Et Angelus duxit eum ad montem Arnon ar mair (? muir) Lethe supra petram maris Tyrreni, in civitate quæ vocatur Capua."—"Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxv., p. 23.

<sup>149</sup> Dr. Lanigan states, that after the word petram, in the Life by Probus—he should rather have said the Third Life—something had been added, by a bungler, who was striving to interpret the Irish words ar muir Letha. According to Dr. Lanigan, the scribe mistook Letha for Latium. Hence was introduced the Tuscan Sea, and, wonderful to tell, Capua. This greatly puzzled Colgan. Knowing that Capua lies several miles distant from the sea, he conjectured, that for Capua we might read Caieta. See "Trias Thaumaturga." Vita Tertia S. Patricii, cap. xxv., p. 23, and nn. 25, 26, p. 31. Jocelyn has copied this account, about the Tuscan Sea and Capua, but he calls the mountain Morion. See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxvi., p. 70.

<sup>150</sup> Probus mentions the interference of an angel, in sending St. Patrick to Hermon, a walled city near the sea. See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xvii., p. 48.

<sup>151</sup> See the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. xxxvii., p. 122.

<sup>152</sup> The Bollandists seem to have shelved this difficulty, by changing the mountain into a river; most probably, by understanding Arnon, as in the Third Life, to mean the River Arno. On it, the city of Pisa is

According to some of St. Patrick's Acts, the holy man had determined to visit Rome, in order to be better instructed, in the ecclesiastical Constitutions, and Canons. He felt desirous withal, that his journey for Ireland might be approved, and ratified by Apostolic authority. This determination he manifested to St. German, who well approved of it. Germanus joined with St. Patrick a servant of God, named Segitius,<sup>153</sup> or Segetius,<sup>154</sup> also called Sergenius,<sup>155</sup> the Priest, as a comfort in his trials, and as a faithful witness to his holy conversation.<sup>156</sup> Then, as we are told, he had an angelic revelation, that he should seek out a holy solitary, called Justus,<sup>157</sup> living in an island of the Etruscan Sea. It is stated, in old accounts, that St. Patrick received there a certain baculus—or as called in Irish bachul<sup>158</sup>—afterwards regarded with great religious veneration. It was called "the Staff of Jesus," because our Saviour is thought to have given it himself<sup>159</sup> to a hermit of the place. In turn, he was directed to present it to St. Patrick, when he should arrive there.<sup>160</sup> After charitable salutations and some spiritual conference passing between them, the holy man, Justus, delivered to Saint Patrick that staff, which he said he received out of our Saviour's own hands, and destined for him alone. Other old and young men resided on that island, apart from Justus.<sup>161</sup> Saint Patrick, after living some days with that servant of God, went on his journey to Rome, being enriched with that holy staff, which the Almighty had so miraculously sent him. However, no mention of this circumstance occurs, in St. Fiach's Hymn, nor in his Commentator, nor in Probus.<sup>162</sup> Yet, the Tripartite Life of our saint<sup>163</sup> and Jocelyn<sup>164</sup> relate some wonderful miracles, situated, and here its Bishop Senior lived, according to their supposition. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Apostolo Hiberniæ. Commentarius prævius, sect. viii., num. 34, p. 527.

<sup>153</sup> In the Second Life; in the Third Life; in the Fourth Life. In Probus, by an apparent error, the name is written Regirus.

<sup>154</sup> In the Tripartite Life.

<sup>155</sup> By Jocelyn.

<sup>156</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. xxiv., p. 70.

<sup>157</sup> In a Synod held at Arles, about A.D. 450, a bishop called Justus assisted, and it is remarkable, that the Synod was mainly composed of prelates, educated at the School of Lerins. See Tillemont, "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xv., p. 407.

<sup>158</sup> "Bacul—a staff. Either, hence the Latin, Baculum; or from it Bachal Easpuic—for philologists differ as to which is the original root—a bishop's staff, a crozier. Of these Bachul Phadraig, St. Patrick's crozier, was the most celebrated." See n. II., pp. 117, 174, of that admirable and elegant Poem, "The Monks of Kilmere."

<sup>159</sup> See Henry, a monk of Saltrey, Huntingdonshire, in his book, "De Purgatorio S. Patricii," cap. i.

<sup>160</sup> See the Seventh Life, pars. i., cap. xxxvii., pp. 122, 123.

<sup>161</sup> The following curious and legendary particulars are related, in addition, by Jocelyn: When St. Patrick had conferred with the youthful-looking persons, he learned from them, that the apparent seniors were the sons of those apparent juniors, and when he enquired how this wonder happened, they replied: "From our youth forward, through the Divine mercy, we were all intent on performing charitable works, while our doors were always open to every traveller, asking for food and hospitality, in Christ's name; but, one night, a pilgrim bearing a staff sought refuge at their house, and he was most considerately treated; in the morning, he blessed them and said, 'You have received Jesus Christ, this time in person, whereas formerly you only served his members.' Then, leaving his staff with the chief of those holy men, he was ordered to keep it, until a pious pilgrim, named Patrick, should in lapse of time come to their island. Giving these orders, Jesus Christ ascended into heaven, and we continued in the same state of youthfulness, beauty and vigour, to the present time; while our children, who were then small, have now become decrepit, as you observe." There is a different rendering of this story, in Colgan's Latin Tripartite Life, and in Miss Cusack's Irish version of it.

<sup>162</sup> Probus speaks of a staff, with which St. Patrick struck a certain grave. See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. xxi., p. 58. Still, he does not call it "the Staff of Jesus." Neither does he tell how the saint came to possess it.

<sup>163</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxxvi., xxxvii., pp. 122, 123. The Irish version has an account, differing from that in the text, regarding the reception of this celebrated staff. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 377.

<sup>164</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxiv., p. 70.

wrought through it, and they compare it for efficacy to the rod of Moyses.<sup>165</sup> As by it, says Jocelyn, God wrought many prodigious wonders, in bringing the Israelites out of the house of bondage, so by that holy staff, which the Lord had sent to his true servant Patrick, did he work wonderful miracles, in the conversion of many nations. St. Bernard<sup>166</sup> and Jocelyn allude to it, as having been held by the Irish, in great veneration, at that time, when they respectively wrote. If St. Patrick brought the Staff of Jesus from that island, where he had been educated, it may have been a keepsake given to him, by some dear friend. Perhaps, at first, it was merely a plain walking staff, although subsequently it served the purposes of an episcopal crozier.<sup>167</sup> However this may be, it was transferred from Armagh to Dublin, by William Fitz-Adelm De Burgo, and deposited in Christ's Church, about the year 1180.<sup>168</sup> With many other relics, it was publicly burned, in High-street, by the Protestant Archbishop Browne, soon after the Reformed doctrines had been brought into Ireland.<sup>169</sup>

Thus, after receiving the Staff of Jesus, from the hand of our Lord Himself, according to the Irish Tripartite Life, and at a place, called Sliabh-Hermoin, near the island, St. Patrick was commanded to go and preach to the Gaoidhel. He was told, likewise, that the Bachall-Isa should prove of great assistance to him, in all his difficulties and dangers. Then are related, three special requests, made by the favoured of heaven;<sup>170</sup> but, as these appear to partake of a legendary cast, the reader may well be spared an enumeration of those specific petitions preferred. Nine companions, according to some accounts, journeyed with the saint, at this period of his life; but, the order and variety of incidents recorded are greatly confused, by his different biographers.

CHAPTER VI.

ST. PATRICK'S RECEPTION OF HOLY ORDERS—HIS SUPPOSED MISSIONARY LABOURS AT BOULOGNE—HIS MISSION WITH SAINTS GERMANUS AND LUPUS TO GREAT BRITAIN—THEIR RETURN TO GAUL—ST. PALLADIUS IN IRELAND—ST. PATRICK PROCEEDS TO ITALY—HIS CONSECRATION AS BISHOP—ST. PATRICK SAID TO HAVE BEEN AN AUGUSTINIAN—DESTINED FOR HIS MISSION TO IRELAND, BY THE POPE.

HAVING received the various grades of clerical Orders, and even priesthood itself, under St. Germanus;<sup>1</sup> it has been supposed,<sup>2</sup> that before St. Patrick set out for Rome, he spent some time, in his own country. It has been calculated, that our saint passed about nine years, in the Tyrrhene Island, <sup>165</sup> See Exodus vii., xiv.

<sup>166</sup> See "Vita S. Malachiae," cap. xii. See, also, the author's "Life of St. Malachy O'Morgair," &c., chap. vii. Dublin, 1859, 8vo.

<sup>167</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xii., and nn. 89 to 115, pp. 173 to 178.

<sup>168</sup> In the years 1877 and 1878 appeared a series of communications, in the Kilkenny Journal, referring to a Charter of Henry the Third, preserved in the British Museum (Charter Role 14, Henry III., p. 1, MS.) This Charter conferred a Knight's Fee, at Inistioge, on John Comyn, Archbishop of Dublin, for guardianship of the Staff of Jesus. Mr. James Morrin suggested, that the latter object had been preserved, at Inistioge, County Kilkenny, about the period alluded to; but, the Rev. Patrick Neary, C.C., proved, that it had never been kept, except in the churches of Armagh and of Dublin, while in Ireland. This controversy originated from a learned paper, read by Mr. Morrin, at a meeting of the Diocesan Archæological Society of Ossory.

<sup>169</sup> Whoever wishes to learn more, regarding this staff, may consult Colgan. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxii., pp. 263, 264.

<sup>170</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 377.

CHAPTER VI.—<sup>1</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. xxii., p. 66.

<sup>2</sup> By Rev. Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>3</sup> See Tillemont's "Mémoires pour servir

and at the end of this time, that he approached the fortieth year of his age. It is thought, he returned to Auxerre, about A.D. 429, and had been employed, during the interval to A.D. 431, in missionary duties, near his parents' place of residence. More probably, we should suppose, he was only a priest, at that time. However, popular traditions, and even old chronicles, represent him to have governed Boulogne, as a bishop, before he set out on the Irish mission. Victricius, who presided over the See of Rouen, preached to the Morini;<sup>3</sup> and, after his departure, to replace their loss, St. German, it is stated, sent our saint to Boulogne.<sup>4</sup> Indeed, Probus tells us, that St. Patrick preached the Gospel, and that he baptized persons in Scotia, Britain, Anglia and Normandy, as also in the islands.<sup>5</sup> The name of Normandy had been sometimes extended, beyond its provincial limits, and hence may have originated an idea, that St. Patrick laboured at Boulogne, and in the adjacent territory. However this may be, in the year 429,<sup>6</sup> Saints Germanus and Lupus<sup>7</sup> proceeded to Britain, for the purpose of combating the growing errors of Pelagius.<sup>8</sup> He was a monk of Bangor, in Wales; and, about the beginning of the fifth century, he denied the propagation of original sin, among the children of Adam.<sup>9</sup> Aided by Celestius, a Scottish monk, this heresy became greatly diffused, through Europe, Asia, and Africa. The Apostolic missionaries are said to have been accompanied, by many other attendants, and among these, St. Patrick is stated to have been.<sup>10</sup> Although loaded with exaggerations, this account may not be considered improbable, since he is said to have been on the mission, in northern France, about this period. Those prelates stopped, for some time, at Nanterre, in the diocese of Paris.<sup>11</sup> Their journey seems to have been directed, towards the Armorican Sea. They embarked, it is quite possible, at some port, where St. Patrick could bear them company,<sup>12</sup> and with little inconvenience to himself.<sup>13</sup> The result of their united labours tended to extirpate this heresy there, in a short time.<sup>14</sup> It is not correct to state—as Jocelyn does—that the Arian perfidy had then defiled many parts of Britain.<sup>15</sup> Only imperfect accounts of this British missionary enterprise have come down to us. Probus indeed informs us,<sup>16</sup> that at a certain time, when all Britain—meaning Anglian Britain—was nearly overspread with infidelity, St. Patrick almost despaired of doing any good among its inhabitants. These would not pay attention to his preaching. However, the Lord comforted him, and told him, that his toils should not be a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome x., Article. S. Victrice.

<sup>4</sup> See Malbrancq, "De Morinis," lib. ii., cap. 26.

<sup>5</sup> See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. x., p. 51.

<sup>6</sup> See Cressy's "Church History of Britany," book ix., chap. iv., v., pp. 174 to 178.

<sup>7</sup> He was Bishop of Troyes. His feast occurs on the 24th of July. He died A.D. 479.

<sup>8</sup> See Fiach's Scholiast, in Prima Vita S. Patricii, n. 10, p. 5. Also Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xi., p. 325.

<sup>9</sup> For an account of this heresiarch, and of Pelagianism, named from him, see the Abbé Bergier's "Dictionnaire de Théologie," Art. Pélagianisme, Pélagiens.

<sup>10</sup> See Cressy's "Church History of Britany," book ix., chap. vi., pp. 178 to 180.

<sup>11</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xi., p. 327. Also, Tillemont's "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xv., p. 16.

<sup>12</sup> Stillingleet, in his "Antiquities of the British Churches," chap. iv., favours this view.

<sup>13</sup> A passage, quoted by Ussher, from William of Malmesbury's work, "De Antiquitatibus Glastoniæ Ecclesiæ," contains something to the same purpose. See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 840.

<sup>14</sup> Then the Scholiast adds, regarding Germanus, that he and St. Patrick returned into Gaul. Jocelyn adds, that Patrick by his preaching and miracles, "patriotas ad viam veritatis reducebat." See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xcii., p. 86. However, he refers this visit, to a later period of St. Patrick's career.

<sup>15</sup> See Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. xvii.

<sup>16</sup> See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. xxiv., xxv., p. 59.

quite useless. This state of things, hardly referable to Great Britain, before the Saxon persecution, after A.D. 450,<sup>17</sup> may relate rather to Gallic and Belgic Britain. The Morini, Nerviens, and other adjacent people,<sup>18</sup> were in a wretched condition, owing to the ravages of barbarians, and the negligence of their pastors,<sup>19</sup> about A.D. 427, or 428. This is supposed to be nearly the time, when St. Patrick went to Boulogne, and after his return from Lerins.<sup>20</sup> If it be true, that he preached and baptized in Great Britain, most probably it was on this occasion. We may fairly take it for granted, that such a zealous pastor would not have misspent his time while there, even in a subordinate capacity. However, it seems probable, also, that he may have continued his missionary career, while passing through England, when leaving Gaul for the Irish shores, in 432. In his own words, we may learn, that from the time, he commenced the work of God there, Patrick continued to labour among the people, to the close of his active career.<sup>21</sup> Saints Germanus and Lupus are said to have remained in Great Britain, until Easter, in the year 430.<sup>22</sup> It is supposed, about that time, they must have returned to Gaul.<sup>23</sup> German had learned before this, that his own city was infected with Pelagianism.<sup>24</sup> Then he went to Gaul, as has been thought, in company with St. Patrick. It is possible, they had communications, respecting the state of Ireland, and that these were duly forwarded to Pope Celestine. From his experience of that country, our saint might have been considered most suitable, to serve in the capacity of a missionary bishop.<sup>25</sup>

About the year 431, Pope St. Celestine the First had sent his Archdeacon Palladius<sup>26</sup> to attempt the Christian conversion of the Irish people. Even then, the Gospel had been preached among them, by some holy missionaries. At that period, however, our island is said to have been exposed to wintry cold<sup>27</sup>—probably a metaphoric expression used for the prevailing errors of Paganism. It is said, Palladius brought with him the Apostolic number of twelve companions. The Pope bestowed some books, with the relics of the Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, as also of other martyrs.<sup>28</sup> The missionaries set out, and landed on the eastern shore of Ireland. It was not decreed by Providence, however, that Palladius should convert its people; since, no one can receive anything on earth, unless it be given to him from above. Having reached the territory of Hy-Garchon, he there built three churches, called respectively, Teach na Roman, Kill-fine, and Domnach ardec.<sup>29</sup> A local ruler, named Nathy, resisted his efforts to spread the Gospel, and drove the missionaries away from that part of the country. Neither did Palladius desire to remain any long time, in a country not his own; but, he resolved on

<sup>17</sup> See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," ad annum ccccl., and "Primordia," cap. xii., pp. 415, et seq.

<sup>18</sup> At present known as Flanders, Brabant, Hainaut and Cambray.

<sup>19</sup> See Tillemont's "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome x., p. 671.

<sup>20</sup> See Malbrancq's work, "De Morinis," lib. ii., cap. 26.

<sup>21</sup> See his Confession, p. 17, and Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xiv., and nn., pp. 180 to 183.

<sup>22</sup> See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. ccccxxx.

<sup>23</sup> Computing the "aliquot annos," mentioned by William of Malmesbury, from A.D. 430 to 432, the statement cannot be admitted. See "De Antiquitate Glastoniensis Ecclesiæ."

<sup>24</sup> See St. Fiach's Scholiast, n. 10, p. 5.

<sup>25</sup> According to William of Malmesbury, St. German going to his own country, and receiving St. Patrick to become his familiar friend, after some years sent him to preach among the Irish, Pope Celestine ordering it.

<sup>26</sup> He is styled, alio nomine, Patricius. His festival is generally assigned to the 6th of July.

<sup>27</sup> According to Muircu Maccutenus who is said to have written his narrative, before A.D. 700. Probus uses a similar expression. See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxiv., p. 48.

<sup>28</sup> See Sixth Life, cap. xxv., p. 70.

<sup>29</sup> See St. Fiach's Scholiast, n. 13 n., p. 5. Second Life, chap. xxiv., p. 13; the returning to him, by whom he had been sent.<sup>30</sup> It is thought he remained there, until about the end of 431, when he intended returning to Rome ;<sup>31</sup> but, his vessel was impelled by contrary winds, towards the northern coasts of Ireland. Afterwards, he was driven towards the southern extremity of a land, called Modhaidh.<sup>32</sup> When Palladius left Ireland for Britain, it is said, he went to the land of the Picts. Fordun was the place selected for his residence. Between the departure of Palladius from Ireland and his arrival there, some time must have intervened, and probably at least three weeks or a month. How long he stayed at Fordun we do not know. There is no reason for supposing, that Palladius died, so soon as he reached that place.<sup>33</sup> It is likely he lived, until the beginning of A.D. 432.<sup>34</sup> Some accounts have it, that he died a martyr, in Ireland. We must allow some weeks to have passed, in any case, between the day of his death, and that time, when an account of it reached St. Germanus, and St. Patrick.<sup>35</sup> It may be, that somewhat later, Pope Celestine learned this failure of his project, for the conversion of Ireland.

In conformity with St. Patrick's most ancient Acts, we must probably reject the hypothesis, that our holy Apostle had time to arrive in Rome—where according to some accounts he had already been<sup>36</sup>—to be consecrated, or even to receive powers, relative to the Irish mission, from Pope Celestine. Now, this Pontiff died, on the 6th of April, A.D. 432. It seems probable, that the whole of Ireland's missionary affairs had been arranged, at Rome, before the departure of Palladius, for his mission ; and, that due provision had been made, for supplying his place, in case of any untoward accident. Yet, owing to a complexity and an apparent contradiction of statements, it is particularly difficult, at this period, to arrange the order of our narrative. St. Eric of Auxerre declares, that he considers it as the highest honour of the holy prelate, St. Germanus, of that city, to have been the instructor of St. Patrick ; for, the glory of a father shines, in the government of his children. Of the many disciples, who are reported to have been his sons in Christ, one, by far the most famous, as the series of his actions must show, was Patrick, the particular Apostle of Ireland.<sup>37</sup> By some, it has been inferred, St. Patrick's discipleship, under St. Germanus in person, was after his return from the Tuscan Islands, and immediately before his Irish mission began. We are told, that St. Patrick, in A.D. 430, went to Rome ; and, what we would not expect to meet with, is stated by the Bollandists, that he was at first repulsed, by the Pope.<sup>38</sup> They add, that he then returned to St. German, by whom he was sent, after the earlier Irish missionary's death, to the same Celestine. We learn, that the disciples of Palladius, Augustine, Benedict, and the rest,

Fourth Life, chap. xxviii., p. 38 ; the Seventh Life, part i., cap. xxxviii., p. 123.

<sup>30</sup> See the Fifth Life, cap. xxiv., p. 48.

<sup>31</sup> See the Third Life, chap. xxvi., p. 23.

<sup>32</sup> See St. Fiach's Scholiast, n. 13 n.,

p. 5.

<sup>33</sup> John Bale assigns the death of Palladius, to the 15th day of December. See "Scriptorum Illustrium Majoris Britanniae, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam vocant, Catalogus," Centur. xiv.

<sup>34</sup> Palladius did not die, so soon as Bale has stated ; for, the Anglican Martyrology and Ferrarius, much better authorities than he, place the natalis or exit from the world of Palladius, on the 27th of January. See Ferrarius' "Catalogus Sanctorum," at this day, and also Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Secunda Vita S. Patricii, nn. 33, 34, p. 18.

<sup>35</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xviii., n. 153, p. 201.

<sup>36</sup> In the year 413, according to the Bollandists. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Apostolo Hiberniae. Commentarius praevious, sect. v., p. 522, and sect. viii., num. 56, p. 527.

<sup>37</sup> See "Vita S. Germani."

<sup>38</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Apostolo Hiberniae. Commentarius praevious, sect. v., p. 522.

on their return, brought that news to a place, called Ebmoria, or Euboria.<sup>39</sup> Soon afterwards, the mission pre-ordained by God, and the conversion of the Irish nation, often promised by the angelic oracle, were given by apostolic authority of Pope Celestine to Patrick.<sup>40</sup> Probus declares, that our saint had not yet obtained the episcopal degree, because he had deferred receiving it, as he knew that Palladius, Celestine's chief deacon, had a particular mission to Ireland. One statement puts it, that our saint had been consecrated, so early as A.D. 424.<sup>41</sup> This is too early a period, however, for his episcopacy; and, it does not seem to agree, with the context of the different published Lives. The Scholiast on St. Fiach tells us, that when St. Patrick went to Rome, on what he pretends was the first of two visits to that city, the Pope refused to honour him with the insignia of a bishop, because he had already consecrated and sent Palladius to Ireland.<sup>42</sup> Other Acts of our saint have a like statement.<sup>43</sup> It has been asserted, as Palladius had assigned to him charge of the Irish mission, at that time; it is likely, in consequence, that St. Patrick could not have been appointed more than his assistant, with a proviso for succession, in case of his principal's death.<sup>44</sup> This, however, is purely conjectural, as an attempt to clear up some obscurities, in the acts of our Apostle. Again, some writers have inferred, that St. Patrick had been previously nominated, to assume his position in Ireland; and, as it was not probable he could there receive consecration, a presumption is, that at Eboria he found the venerable prelate, called Amator, deputed to perform such a function.<sup>45</sup> From their experience of his zeal and efficiency, as a missionary, St. Germanus and St. Lupus are said to have highly approved of St. Patrick, as a bishop for the Scots and Britons.<sup>46</sup> Generally, however, it is related, that St. German had been most active, in procuring the appointment of St. Patrick, for that great career before him.<sup>47</sup> Testimonials were borne accordingly to the Apostolic See; for, it had been deemed advisable, to send a great labourer in the Lord's vineyard, to gather a harvest of souls in a field, where hitherto but few missionaries had been engaged. It is related, that Segetius accompanied him, on his second visit to Rome.<sup>48</sup> He was to bear testimony, for the zeal, virtue, prudence and learning of the favourite of heaven, so that, through permission of the Apostolic See,<sup>49</sup> according to the proper order, he might go forth to preach. It is thought, that Segetius, or as he is otherwise called, Segestius, had been a member of the Auxerre clergy, for he is styled the Vicar of St. German, in spiritual affairs.<sup>50</sup> Some writers

<sup>39</sup> See the Fifth Life, cap. xxv., pp. 48, 49.

<sup>40</sup> Such is a statement of the holy Bishop Marcus.

<sup>41</sup> See Malbrancq, "De Morinis."

<sup>42</sup> See n. 13 n., p. 5.

<sup>43</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Secunda Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 13. Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. xxiv., p. 48.

<sup>44</sup> Dr. Lanigan says, that it is worth remarking, this is the very reason assigned in some of St. Patrick's Lives, for his not having been sooner consecrated bishop.

<sup>45</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xxvi., p. 14; the Third Life, cap. xxiv., p. 23; the Fourth Life, cap. xxxi., p. 39; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxv., pp. 48, 49.

<sup>46</sup> So it is stated, in an old Tract, on the Liturgy.

<sup>47</sup> We are told, by St. Fiach's Scholiast, that Germanus said to Patrick, "Do you proceed to the successor of holy Peter, namely to Celestine, that he may ordain you. For this office belongs to him." St. Patrick therefore came to him, "et nec ei honorem dedit;" because Celestine had before sent Palladius to Ireland, that he might teach the people there, and bring them to the true Faith. Then, after sending St. Patrick to the islands of the Etruscan Sea, some authorities make him return again to St. German.

<sup>48</sup> This account of St. Patrick's second visit there rests only on the authority of St. Fiach's Scholiast, nn. 13 n., 14 o., p. 5. The Bollandists seem to have been led astray, by such an account. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xv., n. 131, pp. 185, 186.

<sup>49</sup> See "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxix., xxx., p. 39. It adds: "ita enim ordo exigebat."

have stated, that St. Patrick had been accompanied to Rome, by Germanus,<sup>51</sup> Axilius and Servinius, who are designated Canons of St. John Lateran. Ussher inclines to an opinion, that a Germanus,<sup>52</sup> said to have been consecrated bishop for the Isle of Man, might have accompanied our saint.

On his way to Rome, it is related, that St. Patrick met Kiaran<sup>53</sup> of Saigir and Declan,<sup>54</sup> in Italy.<sup>55</sup> This, however, is rather a doubtful matter. We are told, likewise, that Patrick and his companions turned aside from their journey, to seek a remarkable and holy bishop,<sup>56</sup> living in a neighbouring place. He foresaw future events, while the holy pilgrim received episcopal consecration from that wonderful man, and chief bishop, called Amathorix or Mathorix,<sup>57</sup> by Muircu Maccutenus.<sup>58</sup> This prelate is called, likewise, Amator,<sup>59</sup> Amatorex,<sup>60</sup> Mathorex, Amathus<sup>61</sup> or Mathens.<sup>62</sup> It is argued, by Colgan, that St. Patrick had been at first nominated a bishop, by the Apostolic See, and destined for the conversion of the Irish, sometime before he had been consecrated as bishop.<sup>63</sup> Those writers, who have most carefully examined the subject,<sup>64</sup> do not consider St. Patrick to have been consecrated in Rome.<sup>65</sup> Others again, are found to assert it.<sup>66</sup> Some pretend, that he went thither, after he had heard about the death of Palladius.<sup>67</sup> Several writers have held the opinion, that the Irish Apostle received consecration, as bishop, from the hands of Pope St. Celestine the First. Thus, also, Sigebert,<sup>68</sup> Marianus Scotus,<sup>69</sup> William of Malmesbury, suppose.<sup>70</sup> Jocelyn states, that the Pope, finding St. Patrick sound in faith, learning, and sanctity, consecrated him bishop, and determined to employ him in the conversion of Ireland. Later writers have adopted the same statement.<sup>71</sup> Ussher would not decide, as to whether he was consecrated, by a certain Bishop, Amator, or Amathaeus, or as some declared, by Pope Celestine himself. However, St. Patrick there heard the voice of an angel saying: 'Go to the island of Ireland, and assist those who invoke thy aid.' And Patrick answered: 'I will not go, until I salute the Lord.' Then, the angel conducted him to Mount Arnon, on the Italian sea, in the city which is called Capua: and, there he saluted the Lord as Moyses. Authorities seem to differ, regarding the actual consecrator of St. Patrick. While some have it, that he had been made bishop, by Pope St. Celestine the First; others state, St. Germanus officiated, at that time, while most of the ancient Acts relate, that Amator consecrated him.<sup>72</sup> The com-

<sup>50</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxxv., p. 122.

<sup>51</sup> Thus, Vincent of Beauvais writes: "Mittitur cum Germano Patricius, et Hiberniis episcopus ordinatur."—"Speculum Historiale." However, we know, that the great St. Germanus was not sent with St. Patrick.

<sup>52</sup> There is no such person, however, known at this period.

<sup>53</sup> His feast occurs, at the 5th of March.

<sup>54</sup> His feast occurs, at the 24th of July.

<sup>55</sup> Such is the account, as found in the respective Acts of these saints.

<sup>56</sup> By John of Teignmouth, he is called Amotus.

<sup>57</sup> Also called Amator. See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxiv.

<sup>58</sup> In the Book of Armagh.

<sup>59</sup> See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxiv., p. 23.

<sup>60</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxvi., p. 14, and "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxi., p. 39.

<sup>61</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 839.

<sup>62</sup> These are probably Irish or Latinized corruptions of a particular name.

<sup>63</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xvi., num. 4, p. 253.

<sup>64</sup> Such as the Bollandists.

<sup>65</sup> The more ancient Acts of St. Patrick, and their writers, are opposed to this conclusion, according to Colgan. These he considers to be the authors of the Second, Third, and Fourth Lives of St. Patrick.

<sup>66</sup> Among these are Archdeacon Cotton, in "Fasti Ecclesiae Hibernicae," p. 3.

<sup>67</sup> See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. ccccxxxii. Also Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 11.

<sup>68</sup> In his "Chronicon."

<sup>69</sup> In his "Chronicon."

<sup>70</sup> In his "Chronicle."

<sup>71</sup> Such as Sir James Ware, in his Irish Bishops, p. 11. See, also, Dr. O'Donovan's

mentator on St. Fiach has Amato,<sup>73</sup> King, and Bishop of Auxerre, as the officiating prelate, in the presence of Celestine, and of Theodosius the Younger,<sup>74</sup> King of the World.<sup>75</sup> We are informed, too, that St. Patrick had a special call to the mission of our island, and that it was granted to him, by apostolic authority. He proceeded to Rome, as some state, for his grade or orders, and Pope Celestine consecrated him,<sup>76</sup> in the presence of Saint Germanus. Amatho, King of the Romans was there likewise.<sup>77</sup> At this period of his life, Mann was the name he bore.<sup>78</sup> It is related, by the author of the Tripartite Life,<sup>79</sup> that our saint received episcopal consecration from Pope Celestine himself. We have added, that Celestine gave him the name of Patrick.<sup>80</sup> This statement found admittance into some modern lessons and accounts, relating to our saint,<sup>81</sup> as a consequence. His consecration, it is said, took place in the presence of the Roman King Amatus<sup>82</sup> and of St. German.<sup>83</sup> The date, most generally assigned for this event, is about the earlier part of the year 432.<sup>84</sup> Then, Auxilius and Iserninus<sup>85</sup> with others, obtaining minor degrees, as we are told, were associated, apparently on the same day, and with St. Patrick, those companions received ordination.<sup>86</sup> In addition to this account, we may add, that the author of the Second Life, as found in Colgan, gives almost word for word a similar narrative. But, according to Nennius, Auxilius was only ordained priest, and Iserninus deacon. The very ancient Third Life of our saint, without observing chronological order, yet presents a series of detached facts, concerning him. When consecrated, we are told, the three harmonious choirs mingled their chants and rejoicings: the first composed of heavenly spirits; the second consisting of the Romans; and the third of those Irish infants, living in the region of Caille Fochladh, who had cried out to St. Patrick, saying: "All the Irish pray you, O holy Patrick, to come and live amongst us, and that you liberate us."<sup>87</sup> Also, we are informed, that on the same day, when St. Patrick had been consecrated by sacred rites, the canticle of the Psalmist was appropriately sung, by the "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 128 to 131.

<sup>72</sup> Colgan thinks the best way to reconcile these accounts is, to consider St. Patrick's consecration, as being solicited from Pope Celestine, by Germanus, and that it took place, by authority of that Pope, and through the ministry of Amator.

<sup>73</sup> See, also, the Second Life, cap. xxvi., p. 14; the Third Life, cap. xxiv., p. 23; the Fourth Life, cap. xxxi., p. 39; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxv., p. 49.

<sup>74</sup> This Emperor never resided at Rome. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xv., n. 131, p. 186.

<sup>75</sup> Some accounts have Theodosius and Valentinian, as the Roman rulers, at this time. Theodosius is said to have ruled in the east, from A.D. 408 to 450; while Valentinian III. was ruler in the west, from A.D. 425 to 455. See the Scholiast on St. Fiach's Hymn, n. 140., and Colgan's nn. 32, 33, 34, pp. 5, 9.

<sup>76</sup> See the Tripartite Life, lib. i., cap. xxxviii., xxxix., p. 123.

<sup>77</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 378. Here too, he is called "a hostage-liberating man."

<sup>78</sup> According to Bishop Marcus.

<sup>79</sup> See lib. i., cap. xxxix., p. 123. See also Jocelyn's "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxv., p. 70.

<sup>80</sup> Meaning, "a Patrician." This was a title, commonly assumed, in Italy, during the fifth century. See the Scholiast on St. Fiach, n. 6, p. 4. Florence of Wigorn, Ralph of Chester, and Henry of Marleburgh, repeat this origin of the name. See also Dr. Todd's "Life of St. Patrick," chap. ii., p. 363.

<sup>81</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 841.

<sup>82</sup> No such King of Rome is known in history.

<sup>83</sup> Most certainly, St. German was not in Rome, in the year 432.

<sup>84</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xvi., num. 4, p. 253.

<sup>85</sup> By some writers, he has been called Esserninus or Serenus.

<sup>86</sup> The Second Life says, "Sed etiam Auxilius et Serenus, et ceteri inferioris gradus, ordinati sunt eodem die, quo sanctus Patricius." See "Vita Secunda S. Patricii," cap. xxvi., p. 14. By Serenus was probably meant Iserninus. The Fourth Life has nearly—but more correctly—the same words. See "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," choir of clerical chaunters: "Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech."<sup>88</sup>

Among writers, O'Sullivan Beare<sup>89</sup> and Baronius<sup>90</sup> were of opinion, that this bishop, who consecrated St. Patrick, was St. Amator,<sup>91</sup> Bishop of Auxerre.<sup>92</sup> Again, Pagi<sup>93</sup> supposes, an Amator,<sup>94</sup> who was Bishop of Autun, had performed that function; but, this should clearly be found a chronological impossibility.<sup>95</sup> Again, Dr. Lanigan does not hesitate to assert, that St. Amandus,<sup>96</sup> Bishop of Bordeaux, who survived to the year 432, may have been that prelate, whose name so nearly approaches the forms, and the circumstances of whose life may be reconciled, with what we can learn, regarding St. Patrick's consecrator. Little has been preserved, regarding his Acts. It is thought, he may have been expelled from Bordeaux, during the Gothic eruptions, in the commencement of the fifth century.<sup>97</sup> No account is said to be extant, regarding an Archbishop of this city, intervening between him and Gallicinus, who ruled over that See, about A.D. 474.<sup>98</sup> Then, St. Amandus may have been an exile, in that part of France, where and when St. Patrick was obliged to embark for the Irish mission. The history of the Gaulish bishops is a very imperfect one, about this period; and, consequently, great scope is left for conjecture, on the question here discussed.<sup>99</sup> However, that Bishop Amatorex,<sup>100</sup> who consecrated St. Patrick, is not represented as residing in his own See, but dwelling, probably as an accidental sojourner, in a place near Ebmoriam, remarks Dr. Todd. But, he does not profess to point out where that place was situated. It was not then unusual, he observes, that a bishop should be without a See; while, the incursions of Goths, with other contemporaneous political troubles,<sup>101</sup> may sufficiently account for a bishop being found in retirement or concealment, in some obscure village. Such a story is not discredited, although we are unable satisfactorily to identify the Bishop, Mathorex, or Amathorex, with any Gaulish prelate, whose name is known in history.<sup>102</sup> cap. xxxi., p. 39. Without giving their names, Probus thus writes: "Sed et alii nonnulli clerici ad officium inferioris gradus ordinati sunt."—"Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxv., p. 49.

<sup>87</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 378.

<sup>88</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xxvi., p. 14; the Fourth Life, cap. xxxi., p. 39; the Fifth Life, part i., cap. xxv., p. 49.

<sup>89</sup> "Ad Amatorem antistitem, qui Antisiodorensis et Germani antecessor fuit, divertit, a quo Pontificalibus sacris inauguratus."—"Patritiana Decas," p. 14.

<sup>90</sup> See "Martyrologium Romanum," at Maii i.

<sup>91</sup> He died, on the Kalends of May, A.D. 418, according to Ussher, or, as other accounts have it, A.D. 421. Now, St. Celestine did not become Pope, until A.D. 423. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 34, p. 9.

<sup>92</sup> He must have been dead, however, from ten to fourteen years before this event.

<sup>93</sup> See Critics to the "Annales Ecclesiastici," of Baronius, at A.D. 431.

<sup>94</sup> He flourished, about the year 314, according to "Gallia Christiana."

<sup>95</sup> He is mentioned, about the year 314, in the "Gallia Christiana."

<sup>96</sup> See Sammarthan, in "Gallia Christiana," tome ii., col. 789, 790. It is there added, that he was perhaps the Amandus, who subscribed the synodical letter of the Gallican bishops to Pope Leo, A.D. 451.

<sup>97</sup> See Tillemont's "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome x. Article, S. Amand.

<sup>98</sup> It is related, by Gregory of Tours, that St. Amandus gave up his See for some years to a St. Severinus. "If so," asks Dr. Lanigan, "might not the year 432 have been one of them, and spent by him in retirement?"

<sup>99</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xviii., and notes, pp. 198 to 203.

<sup>100</sup> Dr. Todd, in his "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. i., p. 37, lays it down, that he was consecrated bishop by Amathorex, or Mathorex, as he is called in the Book of Armagh. Still, it must be remarked, Dr. Todd acknowledges himself unable to discover the truth, on this subject, which to him seems to be overlaid by a cloud of fiction. See n. 1, p. 335. Ibid.

<sup>101</sup> See L. P. Anquetil's "Histoire de France." Première Race dite des Mérovingiens, sect. i., pp. 41 to 44.

<sup>102</sup> See Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle

A great variety of opinions has been expressed, regarding that country and place, where St. Patrick received episcopal consecration. While some pronounce in favour of Gaul,<sup>103</sup> others declare it was in Italy;<sup>104</sup> while Colgan surmises, he was made bishop, in Belgium,<sup>105</sup> or somewhere adjoining.<sup>106</sup> It has been conjectured, likewise, by Tillemont, and by others, that St. Patrick had become a bishop in his own country, which is assumed to have been Great Britain. Although an opinion, regarding his consecration in Gaul, prevailed; yet, the only ground, on which that opinion rests, is a gratuitous supposition, that St. Patrick,<sup>107</sup> having left St. German at Auxerre, some short time before, must have been in that country, about the time he received the fullness of the priesthood. However, no ancient record confirms it; while, it is even plainly contradicted, by historic authorities. Certain zealot writers, in the present century, have endeavoured to maintain, that our early Irish missionaries were independent of the Roman See, and rejected the present doctrines of those in communion with it.<sup>108</sup> However, from various authorities, and especially from the old Lives of St. Patrick himself, there can be no question, as to the source, whence our Apostle's great mission had been drawn.<sup>109</sup> The Bollandists bring him to Rome, A.D. 431, after the death of Palladius.<sup>110</sup> For this statement, however, no authority is quoted. Two very ancient anonymous Lives of our saint are quoted, by the learned Ussher. In one of these, it is recorded, that St. Patrick, on coming to Rome, was benignly received by the blessed Pope Celestine, who reigned the forty-fifth in order, after St. Peter the Apostle.<sup>111</sup> It is said, that Celestine greatly honoured and favoured our holy missionary, while he was in Rome.<sup>112</sup> Here, he remained a long time studying, according to Bishop Marcus,<sup>113</sup> and being filled with the Holy Ghost, he learned the Scriptures and sacred mysteries. Again, it is said, after the saint's safe arrival at Rome,<sup>114</sup> he visited with great devotion, and reverence, the memorials of the Apostles and Martyrs.<sup>115</sup> If of Ireland," chap. i., pp. 317, 318, and nn. Ibid.

<sup>103</sup> Such is Colgan's opinion. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Secunda Vita S. Patricii, n. 38, p. 18. Also in "Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii," cap. xvi., pp. 252 to 254. The fact of St. Patrick's friends having interfered to prevent his consecration is greatly relied on, by Dr. Lanigan, to prove it took place in some north-western part of France. See his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xix., p. 204. But, it was almost equally convenient, to transmit an accusation, or to place obstacles, at a great distance from his place of residence, or of birth.

<sup>104</sup> Among these are Archbishop Ussher. See "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. ccccxxii. See, also, Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," sect. 14, p. 11.

<sup>105</sup> The city or town of his ordination, Eboria, is thought to correspond with the Belgic Eboronum.

<sup>106</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xvi., p. 254.

<sup>107</sup> See a very able article, manifesting a very great power of historical analysis, and intitled, "Notes on the Life of St. Patrick," in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii., No. xxv. October, 1866, pp. 7 to 18.

<sup>108</sup> Among these may be noticed, Henry J. Monck Mason, LL.D., in a Letter to Thomas Moore, Esq., and intitled, "Primitive Christianity in Ireland." Dublin, 1836, 12mo. Also the Very Rev. Richard Murray, D.D., Dean of Ardagh, in a work, intitled, "Outlines of the History of the Catholic Church in Ireland." London, 1840, 12mo.

<sup>109</sup> The Third Life of our saint places Patrick's episcopal consecration, before his arrival at Rome, and before his presenting himself to the Pope; but, this is contrary to all other accounts, and, it is undoubtedly owing to a misplacement of the chapters, by making the 24th stand instead of the 26th.

<sup>110</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Apostolo Hiberniæ. Commentarius prævius, sect. v., p. 522.

<sup>111</sup> Jocelyn styles him the forty-third in succession, in opposition to other authorities, cited by Colgan, in n. 21, p. 109, of "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>112</sup> See the Fourth Life, cap. xxix., p. 39.

<sup>113</sup> He wrote a Life of St. Patrick, about the year 820.

<sup>114</sup> The "Annals of Innisfallen," also, state, that Patrick came from Rome, as a bishop, into Ireland, and that he devoutly preached here the faith of Christ.

<sup>115</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. xxv., p. 70.

he at all visited the Eternal City, his stay must have been short, at this period, as can easily be collected, from a comparison of dates. His arrival, in that city, according to Rev. Dr. Lanigan,<sup>116</sup> could scarcely have been previous to the year 431. It is generally allowed, his abode there, on the occasion treated of, could not have been that, during which it has been said by some writers, he studied at Rome. So early as A.D. 402 has been set down,<sup>117</sup> for his first visit to that city, where it is said he spent a considerable time.<sup>118</sup> This period Ussher considers, as a part of those seven years, mentioned by Tirechan, and which are said to have been passed, by the saint, in the Gauls, in Italy, and in the islands,<sup>119</sup> although Rome is not referred to, by the latter writer.<sup>120</sup> However, about A.D. 402, St. Patrick was probably a captive in Ireland. Besides, there is not, in any of St. Patrick's early Acts, an account, relative to those supposed studies, in the eternal city. Nor does it clearly seem, he had ever been there, unless he went thither, on business connected with the Irish mission. However, it has been stated, in some of those Lives, that he had been actually at Rome, where he received the Pope's benediction. This was amplified into an account of his having remained there a considerable time, and for the sake of study.<sup>121</sup> Were we to follow the text of Probus, in Colgan, the foregoing conclusion might be admitted.<sup>122</sup> In that passage, however, the text of Probus seems to have been reversed, so that, what is found in the twentieth chapter ought to follow the twenty-second chapter. The reported circumstance, of St. Patrick having been accompanied by a priest, was for the purpose of introducing our great Apostle to the Pope. Other ancient Acts of our Apostle interpret it, in like manner.<sup>123</sup> For, Probus could not have meant what the text, in its present involved state, seems to convey; since, neither Rome, nor Celestine, is mentioned, after what we find, in the twenty-first and twenty-second chapters.<sup>124</sup>

According to some accounts,<sup>125</sup> St. Patrick, while at Rome, is said to have become a Regular Canon of St. John Lateran,<sup>126</sup> and to have followed

<sup>116</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xv., p. 184.

<sup>117</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvi., xvii., pp. 790, 835.

<sup>118</sup> Colgan followed Ussher's account, and he has observed, that St. Patrick could not have remained there, more than six years. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xiii., p. 243.

<sup>119</sup> If this were the case, we might suppose it probable, that on some occasion or other, St. Patrick visited Rome, like other holy men. A visit to a city, however, is very different, from a permanent residence, which he is thought to have had there, according to some of his more recent biographers, or their interpolators.

<sup>120</sup> See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. CCCCII.

<sup>121</sup> Nennius is the only old writer, in whom this story is to be found.

<sup>122</sup> See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xx., p. 48. Afterwards, it is stated, that he remained a considerable time with St. German. When the proper time arrived, for St. Patrick setting out for Ireland, Germanus sent with him a priest, who is called Regirus. See cap. xxi., xxii. Ibid.

<sup>123</sup> This appears to be the more confirmed, by what Probus states, regarding a priest having been sent with our saint, as the witness, or voucher for his character. This priest could not have borne testimony for him, to the people of Ireland. For these knew less of that priest, than of St. Patrick himself. Yet, such appears to have been Probus' meaning, were we to adhere to the order of his printed text. We must also naturally conclude, according to such version, that our saint had been sent to Ireland, not by the Pope, but by St. German.

<sup>124</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xv., n. 135, pp. 190, 191.

<sup>125</sup> See, Onuphrius Panvinus, in his work, "De Ecclesia Lateranense," lib. ii., cap. 3. Joannes Trullus, in "Historia Canoniorum Regularium," lib. i., cap. 5. Also, Gabriel Pennotus, in his "Historia Canoniorum Regularium," lib. ii., cap. 34, 35.

<sup>126</sup> The claim of the Canons Regular of St. Augustine, to St. Patrick, has been strenuously opposed, on their own behalf, by several writers, belonging to the Order of Augustinian Hermits.

<sup>127</sup> This might be understood, however, as merely meaning, that they lived in a manner,

the rule of St. Augustine.<sup>127</sup> But, the name of that church, or the account of his regular attachment to it, is not mentioned, in any of St. Patrick's old Acts.<sup>128</sup> Probably, that discipline, according to which he had lived, both in St. Martin's College, and at Lerins, was similar to what had been observed in Canonical communities. But, he could not properly be called a Canon Regular of St. Augustine, because no such Canons were known, until the eleventh century. About that time, some communities of clergymen adopted a sort of monastic rule, commonly attributed to St. Augustine.<sup>129</sup> Nor until the thirteenth century were the Augustinian Hermits<sup>130</sup>—more generally known as Augustinians—in existence.<sup>131</sup> Until the time of Pope Gelasius, it is said,<sup>132</sup> there had not been Canons, in the church of St. John Lateran.<sup>133</sup> However, the practice of some clergy, belonging to a diocese, and living in common with the bishop, had been introduced in several churches, at an early period. Although given originally to all clergymen, who were in the Canon, or roll of a church,<sup>134</sup> afterwards, the title Canonici or Canons became particularly appropriated to those only, who thus lived in a community.<sup>135</sup> Especially, they were bound to observe regular rules, relating to their institute.<sup>136</sup> According to this acceptance, it might be said, during part of his life St. Patrick had lived as a Canon, or even, as a Regular Canon. However, it does not appear, that he could have been a Canon Regular of St. Augustine, nor an Augustinian Hermit.<sup>137</sup> For, owing to the nature of that business, upon which St. Patrick is thought to have visited Rome, he could not have been regularly attached there, to the service of any church.<sup>138</sup>

With regard to Eboria—the place assigned for St. Patrick's consecration by the old writers of his Acts—it has been conjectured, that it was probably similar to that practised in St. Augustine's domestic establishment.

<sup>128</sup> As a conclusion from this, however, Dr. Ledwich had no reason triumphantly to urge an objection, from rather modern and ill-founded statements, against the truth of our saint's Acts, and even of his existence. See "The Antiquities of Ireland," p. 372.

<sup>129</sup> He left no rule, according to Dr. Lanigan, except certain regulations, which he had drawn up for the direction of a nunnery. This was under the superintendence of his sister. With some necessary alterations, these have been applied to communities of men, who took vows, under the title of the Rule of St. Augustine.

<sup>130</sup> Then, they appeared in Lombardy, under the name of Eremitæ fratris Joannis Boni, ordinis S. Augustini.

<sup>131</sup> Colgan has a long disquisition, regarding this whole question. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pp. 237 to 241. There, he states with critical and historical care, the arguments, for and against, these rival claimants of our saint, as their patron. He has very unnecessarily and amusingly endeavoured to accommodate matters, between the disputants.

<sup>132</sup> His pontificate began, A.D. 492.

<sup>133</sup> From the archives of this church, we learn, that they continued there, until the time of Pope Boniface VIII. See a note to Platina's Life of Felix II., alias III. That learned man was certainly mistaken, in this point. The Canons Regular of St. Augustine, however, for the first time, had been placed in the Lateran church, by Alexander II. Onuphrius himself marks it, in his Ecclesiastical Chronology, at the year 1062, or, as it would appear from Fleury, in 1063. See "Histoire Ecclesiastique," lib. lxi., sect. vi.

<sup>134</sup> Regulations were made, at various periods, for the purpose of upholding that salutary discipline.

<sup>135</sup> See Bingham's "Origines Ecclesiasticæ," book i., chap. v., sect. 10.

<sup>136</sup> See Fleury's Institutes, part i., chap. xvii.

<sup>137</sup> In Ireland we had very few of them, until after the arrival of the English. Alemand in his "Histoire Monastique d'Irlande," and, after him, Harris in "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., have been guilty of a great mistake, in classing such a multitude of our ancient monasteries, under the head of Canons Regular of St. Augustine. The name of Canons Regular has been continued in these institutions alone, since the eleventh century; and, as such, they are usually spoken of in the Canon law, and alluded to by Canonists. Thus Gibert says: "Tantum seculo XI. visi sunt primum Canonici regulares, sic vocati, quia religiosorum vota faciebant, et ea vitæ clericali adjiciebant."—"Corpus Juris Canonici," Tit. xiii., Reg. 3.

<sup>138</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xv., nn. 133, 134, pp. 186 to 189.

some corrupt form of the ancient Bononia, now Boulogne; or, that Eboria might stand for Eboracum,<sup>139</sup> or for Ebonia Insula;<sup>140</sup> or, that it might refer, perhaps, to some town, within or near the territory of Liege, in Belgium.<sup>141</sup> Again, the Eburones, or Eburoni, are mentioned by Cæsar,<sup>142</sup> and, in his time, they had a town named Amatuca. Afterwards, their chief town was Tongern.<sup>143</sup> Supposing it to have been near the coast of France,<sup>144</sup> and not far from Auxerre, Dr. Lanigan thinks it was in north-western Gaul,<sup>145</sup> and to have been identical with Evreux,<sup>146</sup> in Normandy. This was formerly called Ebroica, and the people of that district were designated Aulerci Ebuovices.<sup>147</sup> This name was thought to resemble Eboria. But, in Gaul, neither a town can be found corresponding in name with Eboria,<sup>148</sup> as all skilled topographers must acknowledge, nor a bishop, who might answer for St. Amator; it may be considered, then, if such a town and such a bishop, may be found in ancient Italy. Now, it so happens, that very town, in which St. Patrick received intelligence, regarding the death of Palladius, we find at the foot of the Alps, and called Eboria, or Eporia.<sup>149</sup> Eboria—resolvable into Eporia or Eporedia—is now Ivrea, in Piedmont, according to the Bollandists.<sup>150</sup> It lay at the foot of the Alps.<sup>151</sup> Also, it has been styled, Iporia and Eporedia; and, it is met with, on the direct route from Ravenna—where probably St. Germanus then lived—to Gaul and Ireland. Travellers, and especially celebrated Irish Saints, generally passed through it, in former times, when journeying between Italy and Gaul. It happened to be on that very road, hallowed by St. German's relics, when translated with solemn pomp from Ravenna to Auxerre; and, in after times, this funeral route was dotted over, where his remains rested, with several churches, dedicated to him.<sup>152</sup>

St. Maximus ruled, at this very period, over the See of Turin. He flourished, A.D. 423,<sup>153</sup> and he was bishop there in 451.<sup>154</sup> In a straight course, that city is not more than a few miles distant from Ivrea. The name, Maximus, in the old Celtic form, should be equivalent to Amahor, it is main-

<sup>139</sup> York, an ancient city in England.

<sup>140</sup> Eubonia and Ebonia were formerly names, used by ancient Irish writers, for the present Isle of Man. However, the context of his various Lives sufficiently demonstrates, that St. Patrick had been consecrated a bishop, either in Gaul or Italy, and this too before he set out for Britain or Ireland, to assume the missionary duties devolving on him, in reference to our island.

<sup>141</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Secunda Vita S. Patricii, n. 38, p. 18. Also, Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xvi., pp. 252 to 254.

<sup>142</sup> See "De Bello Gallico," lib. ii., sect. 4, lib. vi., sect. 31, and elsewhere.

<sup>143</sup> It was called so from Tongri. This was another name for the tribe. See Cellarius, "Geographia Antiqua," lib. ii., cap. 3.

<sup>144</sup> See, also, Rev. Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. i., p. 280.

<sup>145</sup> This he thinks may be gleaned, from the Second, Fourth and Fifth Lives. In these, Euboria is spoken of, as being not far from that port, whence St. Patrick embarked for Great Britain.

<sup>146</sup> In Peutinger's Table, and in Antoninus' Itinerary, from Rouen to Paris, this town is called Mediolanum Aulercorum.

Afterwards, it went by the name of Civitas Ebroicorum, then Ebroica. Finally, the name was Frenchified into Evreux. See Cellarius, "Geographia Antiqua," lib. ii., cap. 2, and Hadrian Valesius, "Notitia Gallica," at Aulerci Ebuovices.

<sup>147</sup> See Cæsar, "De Bello Gallico," lib. iii., sect. 15.

<sup>148</sup> This Colgan himself avows.

<sup>149</sup> The change of p into b is quite characteristic of our early Irish writers. This Zeuss very clearly proves. It is thus they write, baptizo, obto, etc. See also Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba." Præfatio, p. xviii.

<sup>150</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. Commentarius prævius, ad Vitam S. Patricii, sect. v.

<sup>151</sup> For the various names of Ivrea, see Cappaletti's "Le Chiese d'Italia," vol. xiv., p. 177.

<sup>152</sup> In the town and small diocese of Ivrea, at present, there are no less than seven chapels, bearing the name of St. Germanus.

<sup>153</sup> According to Genadius.

<sup>154</sup> During this year, he assisted at the Milan Synod, and subscribed to its decrees. He died soon after A.D. 465, and his feast occurs on the 25th of June.

tained;<sup>155</sup> and, a transition from that, to the various Latinized names, already given, is readily explained. This reputation, for learning and eloquence, and still more for sanctity, justifies those epithets, which are added to his name, in the ancient Lives of St. Patrick. Even the title, Romanus, which these sometimes add, has reference, perhaps, to a tradition, mentioned in the Life of St. Maximus, that he was a native of Rome. At this time, the Emperor Theodosius lived, probably at Ravenna. This city was regarded, at that period, as head-quarters for the Western Empire, and for other cities, in Northern Italy. St. German's history justifies a conjecture, that he was then actually at the Emperor's court. This, too, on occasions, had been migratory, between Ravenna and the Imperial city of Turin.<sup>156</sup> Accounts state, that the Popes had often visited those parts, during the fifth century. Thus, Pope Celestine, the Emperor Theodosius, St. Germanus, St. Maximus, and Segetius,<sup>157</sup> could have been present, at Turin, on the occasion of St. Patrick's consecration as bishop, and when intelligence had been received at Eboria, regarding the death of Palladius.<sup>158</sup>

Some writers have stated, that St. Patrick was sixty years old, at this time of his life;<sup>159</sup> but, more probably, it has been concluded, that he must have been consecrated a bishop, when about forty-five years of age.<sup>160</sup> From some passages, found in his Confessions, this latter opinion has been inferred.<sup>161</sup> During an unguarded moment, in one hour and during some day of his boyhood—being only fifteen years at the time—St. Patrick seems to have offended God, by some objectionable expression. He meekly confesses, that in consequence of it, he was severely punished; that verily, he was humbled by hunger and nakedness, and that he proceeded, though not willingly, towards Ireland, until he nearly fainted away. These acknowledgments manifest the poignancy of his regret; and, we cannot approve, therefore, that breach of confidence, to which he afterwards had been subjected. The saint thus writes, that he was tempted by some of his elders, who came on account of his sins, to urge him against undertaking his laborious episcopacy; and, he was violently tempted, on that day, so that he might have fallen then, and for ever, which appears to mean, he had almost formed an intention, to renounce his original purpose. He then says: "But the Lord had mercy on his stranger convert, for his name's sake, and favourably came to my aid in this tribulation, so that I escaped from the same, without blame, and without reproach. I beseech the Lord," is added, "that he lay not the occasion of this sin to their charge; for, after the space of thirty years, they discovered against me that word, which I confessed, before chap. iv., sect. xv., n. 132, p. 186. There was a St. Maximus, Abbot of Lerins, in 426. He became Bishop of Riez, in Provence, about the year 433, and he died before the year 462, on the 27th of November—the day for his festival.

<sup>155</sup> By a writer in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii. See Notes on the Life of St. Patrick, No. i., p. 18.

<sup>156</sup> It was called, Augusta Taurinorum, in those times.

<sup>157</sup> A bishop, named Segetius, was in Italy, during the pontificate of Leo the Great, and about A.D. 443. See Tillemont, "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xv., p. 421. Dr. Lanigan asks: "Might he have been the same person? Or would it be reasonable to conjecture, that Segetius, when a priest, had been sent by Pope Celestine with letters to S. German relative to his proceeding to Great Britain, and that, after having been with him in that country, he, on his returning to Rome, was requested to take St. Patrick along with him and to introduce him to the Pope?"—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i.,

<sup>158</sup> See a very learned dissertation, on the subject of this enquiry, by an acute investigator and a learned writer, in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii., No. 25. October, 1866, pp. 7 to 18.

<sup>159</sup> Were such the case, when undertaking the Irish mission, in Dr. Lanigan's opinion, he would not have spoken of himself, as having been then a young man. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. iii., p. 136. But, may it not be observed, this allusion to being a young man might have reference to the period of his captivity?

I was ordained deacon.<sup>162</sup> On account of the anxiety of my sorrowing mind, I confessed to my dearest friend, what I had done one day in my boyhood." The false zeal and want of judgment, on the part of this supposed familiar, seem, for a time, to have interposed some objection to St. Patrick's episcopal elevation. Yet, God had great designs in waiting, for his humble servant; and, he acknowledges, that all things turned out well for him,<sup>163</sup> because he was thereby amended, through our Lord. Even on that very day, when Patrick had been reproved by those censors, he saw a nightly vision, before his face. It presented the appearance of a writing, and, in the meantime, Patrick heard an answer from the Lord, saying to him: "We have imperfectly seen the face of him, who was marked out to us, and whose name was discovered." In giving this account, the saint adds: "Nor did he say, 'You have imperfectly seen;' but, 'We have imperfectly seen,' as if he there joined himself to another; like when he said, 'He who touches you, touches the apple of my eye.'<sup>164</sup> Wherefore, I give thanks to him, who comforted me in all things, so as not to interfere with the journey I had resolved upon, nor with my purpose, which I had learned from my Lord; but, rather I felt within me an uncommon strength, and my faith was approved before God and men. Wherefore, I boldly assert, that my conscience offers me no reproach. I have God for my witness, that I have spoken the truth in those things I related; but, I grieved the more for my dearest friend, to whom I trusted my soul, that we should have deserved to hear such an answer. I found out, likewise, from some of my brethren, before such prohibition, that I was not there, nor was I in Britain, nor was I the occasion, that he, in my absence, should have defended me." We are not more clearly enlightened, regarding the nature of this accusation and defence of our holy patron. However, he returned thanks to God, for having comforted and encouraged him, not to desist from the great purpose, on which he had resolved.<sup>165</sup> He also declares, how God and the Irish people knew the manner of his life, and of his dispositions, among them, from the time of his youth. It has been conjectured, that the denunciation of St. Patrick had been contrived, by certain seniors,<sup>166</sup> with a view of keeping him at home, with his friends and relatives, who were so much opposed to the idea of his undertaking the Irish mission. It has been regarded, also, as a convincing proof, for his having been consecrated, in his own country, and, not far from where his relations and acquaintances resided.<sup>167</sup>

Singular to relate, St. Celestine the First only lived one week, after this most remarkable event in his pontificate.<sup>168</sup> He thoroughly approved, how-

<sup>160</sup> Thus, according to Dr. Lanigan, it would seem to have occurred, in A.D. 432, or towards the latter end of 431. See ibid., sect. iv., pp. 136, 137.

<sup>161</sup> See, Tillemont's "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," &c., tome xvi., Art. ii., S. Patrice, and notes.

<sup>162</sup> These thirty years must be counted, after the fifteen years of age, when this fault had been committed.

<sup>163</sup> Rom. viii. 28.

<sup>164</sup> Zach. ii. 8.

<sup>165</sup> See "Confessio S. Patricii," cap. iii., num. 11, 12, 13, pp. 194 to 197. See Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c.

<sup>166</sup> Tillemont conjectures, that by "seniores" he meant priests. See, "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xvi., p. 459. But this agrees, neither with the context, which plainly shows, that at least under a part of these seniores, he comprised some of his relatives, nor with his using the word presbyter, wherever he talks of a priest. It would be very unusual, moreover, for a person, while as yet only a priest himself, to use the phrase, "my priests."

<sup>167</sup> Tillemont adds, that country was Great Britain. See p. 783. At this time, however, St. Patrick's near relatives seem to have been in France.

<sup>168</sup> See "Prima Vita S. Patricii," nn. 13, 14, p. 5. The Scholiast remarks, that at the time of Patrick's ordination, Celestine heard the voices of certain infants, called Erebreia and Lessa, or Lasseria, two daughters of Glerann, the son of Cumin.

ever, the judgment of St. German, in this choice, and gave his benediction to St. Patrick, before setting out on his Irish mission.<sup>169</sup> Our saint also obtained sacred relics, from the glorious Pontiff.<sup>170</sup> Having bade farewell to him, our newly-appointed bishop journeyed on towards Ireland, through Italy and Gaul, until he came to the British Sea.<sup>171</sup> If we are to rely on the Scholiast's statement, this consecration should be assigned, to the 30th or 31st of March, A.D. 432.<sup>172</sup> Assuming St. Patrick to have visited Rome, Dr. Lanigan calculates, that he left it, either late in the year 431,<sup>173</sup> or early in the year 432.<sup>174</sup> The latter date is that most generally accepted.<sup>175</sup> William of Malmesbury, who knew little about the chronology of those times, brings St. Patrick to Ireland, in A.D. 425. It would appear, he brought companions associated with him, for this important work he had undertaken.<sup>176</sup> Whether or not these belonged to Gaul or to Italy has been questioned. It is most likely, however, his missionaries were drawn, from both countries. There are even reasons for doubting, if all those enumerated as foreign assistants went to Ireland with St. Patrick, or deferred their visit to that country, for some years, after his mission there commenced. The Third Life<sup>177</sup> gives St. Patrick twenty-four companions; while others raise the number to thirty-four, partly obtained, it would seem, from Rome, and partly from other places.<sup>178</sup> This cortège has been thought, however, to have been over numerous, for the necessities and policy of the Irish Apostle's mission.<sup>179</sup> Jocelyn says,<sup>180</sup> that he was accompanied, all the way from Rome, by twenty men, who were distinguished for their morals and wisdom. These were given him, by the Pope, as his coadjutors, in that great work he was to undertake, when he set out on his journey towards Ireland. On the way, he repaired to his old master and instructor, St. German, from whom he received chalices, vestments, books, and other church requisites.<sup>181</sup> Whether or not, St. German then lived, at Auxerre, may be questioned. It is supposed, that St. Patrick did not take the route by Boulogne, when about passing over to Great Britain. This may have proceeded from a desire, to avoid family importunities, as he had been previously thwarted in his episcopal consecration, and in his self-devotedness to the labours of a foreign

These, although not yet born, invoked Patrick; and, afterwards he baptized them, at Caille Foehla, westwards from the River Moy, where they rest. "Quæ autem tunc in ventre Matris existentes dicebant, erant hæc; Hibernienses omnes clamant ad te. Et hæc sæpius ab eis decantata audiebantur per Hiberniam totam, vel usque ad ipsos Romanos."—Ibid., n. 15*p.*, and n. 38, p. 10.

<sup>169</sup> Erric thus writes, in his work, "De Vita S. Germani," lib. i., cap. 12.

<sup>170</sup> The Fourth Life so states, in the twenty-ninth chapter, p. 39.

<sup>171</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxxix., xl., p. 123.

<sup>172</sup> Pope St. Celestine the First died, on the 6th of April, A.D. 432.

<sup>173</sup> His mission is placed under this year, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters." See vol. i., pp. 128 to 131.

<sup>174</sup> See his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xviii., p. 195.

<sup>175</sup> The Bollandists have supposed, that St. Patrick preached in Ireland, A.D. 413, for the first time. This was long before his regular appointment, for that purpose. It is remarkably absurd, as also their conjecture, that by the island Tamarensis, we may understand Ireland. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Apostolo Hiberniæ. Commentarius prævius, sect. v., p. 522, and sect. viii., p. 527.

<sup>176</sup> See, Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 842, and Colgan's Secunda Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxvi., pp. 13, 14, and "Trias Thaumaturga," nn. 39, 40, pp. 18, 19.

<sup>177</sup> See cap. xxvii., p. 23.

<sup>178</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 845.

<sup>179</sup> Such a number of missionaries, as Dr. Lanigan remarks, was hardly ever heard of before, nor even since, when an enterprise of this kind had been at first undertaken. Not to mention the expense for conveying and maintaining such a number of persons, those story tellers might have reflected, if St. Patrick were to appear in Ireland with such a host of foreigners, and particularly of Romans, that he and his companions must have been driven immediately out of the country.

<sup>180</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxvi., p. 70.

mission.<sup>182</sup> However, St. Patrick permitted no very lengthened period to elapse, after his consecration, until he made the necessary preparation, and he soon was ready to enter on the scene of his missionary enterprises.

Some miracles are commemorated, by his biographers, and which our saint is said to have performed, while in Gaul, as also on his passage over to Ireland. These, indeed, are of too legendary a character to deserve serious notice.<sup>183</sup> It is thought, by Dr. Lanigan, our great Apostle may have embarked for Ireland, from the mouth of the River Seine.<sup>184</sup> Every preliminary for his passage having been arranged, St. Patrick, with his companions, probably coasted by the shores of Cornwall. It is even possible, he sailed direct from France to Ireland. His passage is described, as having been a favourable one.<sup>185</sup> According to nearly all of his biographers, however, he passed over, in the first instance, towards Great Britain.<sup>186</sup> Some writers state, moreover, that he made little delay in this latter country.<sup>187</sup> Yet, other authorities declare, that he preached for some days there;<sup>188</sup> and, it is related, likewise, that he spent some time at Menevia, afterwards known as St. David's, in South Wales.<sup>189</sup> This, indeed, seems not improbable; and, it is even likely, he passed by a short sail, from that port, over towards the Wicklow coast, where he is thought to have landed, on this auspicious occasion. According to another account, however, the saint debarked A.D. 432, from that celebrated pool, on the north-western coast of England, and which is now so famous, as a great commercial entrepôt.<sup>190</sup> If there be truth, in his sailing to the Isle of Man and to Britain, at a later period, this tradition may have antedated the time of his departure, from that more northerly shore. During his passage over to Ireland, the holy man turned from whatever might impede him,<sup>191</sup> and, he was wafted speedily to our shore, in the name of the most adorable Trinity.

<sup>182</sup> According to Jocelyn.

<sup>183</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sects. vii., viii., xix., and nn. pp. 195 to 205. Colgan thinks, however, if we grant, that St. Patrick spent some time on the mission, and exercised the episcopal office among the Morini, and at Boulogne, before he began his Irish Apostleship; it cannot be allowed, as Malbranque would have it, that many years were passed by the saint there, but, at most, only some months of the year 432, when he was consecrated, and sent into Ireland. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xvi., num. 4, p. 253.

<sup>184</sup> The Third Life contains the account of a leper, who in an extraordinary manner followed the saint to Ireland; and also, how demons fluttered about his vessel, during the six days he spent on the voyage over (cap. xxvii., p. 23); other particulars are added in the Fourth Life (cap. xxx., p. 39.) Probus omits these accounts; Jocelyn, however, enlarges on those particulars, apparently subjects he desired to treat, according with his peculiar taste (cap. xxvii., xxviii., pp. 70, 71); the Latin Tripartite Life relates about the leper solely (lib. i., cap. xl., p. 123); while, in the Irish Tripartite Life, edited by Miss Cusack, we find nothing, regarding either legend.

<sup>184</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xvii., and n. 150, pp. 196, 198.

<sup>185</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xxvi., p. 14; also the Third Life, cap. xxviii., p. 23.

<sup>186</sup> The Life of our saint, written by Probus, thus relates, that the venerable priest Patrick speedily going on board, his vessel then sailed to Britain.

<sup>187</sup> Probus thus continues the narrative: "omissisque omnibus ambulandi anfractibus cum omni velocitate prospero fluctu mare nostrum in nomine S. Trinitatis adiit." See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxv., p. 49.

<sup>188</sup> In a passage, almost word for word agreeing, with that just quoted from Probus, Nennius throws in this addition, referring to Britain: "Et prædicavit ibi non multis diebus." See, also, Matthew of Westminster, "Flores Historiarum," A.D. ccccxcī., p. 177.

<sup>189</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 843, and those following.

<sup>190</sup> Under the year 432, and as the first entry, in local historic annals, one authority connected with this great town observes, that tradition informs us, St. Patrick, during this year, sailed from the banks of the Mersey, on his celebrated mission to Ireland, and that he suffered shipwreck, at the Isle of Man.—See Gore'

CHAPTER VII.

STATE OF SOCIETY WHEN ST. PATRICK ARRIVED IN OUR ISLAND—DRUIDIC PREDICTIONS—THE DATE FOR PATRICK'S ARRIVAL—HE LANDS ON THE EASTERN COAST OF LEINSTER—REPELLED BY THE NATIVES—HE THEN SAILS TOWARDS THE NORTH—THE SAINT TOUCHES AT INIS PHADRAIG—HE ARRIVES AT LECALÉ—ENQUIRY REGARDING THE PLACE OF HIS DEBARKATION.

AT the time of St. Patrick's arrival in this country, the island was governed by a chief monarch, whose usual and principal residence was in the great central fortress, on the Hill of Tara.<sup>1</sup> According to a constitutional settlement of rights and privileges,<sup>2</sup> harmonized with those of his chiefs and subjects, the Ard-Righ's supreme jurisdiction was acknowledged, and it extended over the entire nation.<sup>3</sup> The territory of Midhe, or Meath, was more immediately subject to him, as containing the mensal lands; yet, Ulster, Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, were under independent kings, and co-ordinate with the Ard-Righ, to whom all others owed fealty. The subordinate chiefs, notables, and learned men of the kingdom, were obliged to assemble, in a triennial Feis, or Convention,<sup>4</sup> held at Tara;<sup>5</sup> where, with great ceremony and solemnity, this truly representative assembly enacted general laws, and discussed measures, requisite for the social well-being of various classes among the humbler people. These latter, at this period, had no special public interests or policy, distinct from the oligarchy, who were regarded as their protectors and privileged superiors.<sup>6</sup> Among the five provinces, that of Ulster was, at all times, the most important, since it furnished more titular monarchs for all Ireland, than any of the remaining divisions. The executive power sometimes wanted strength and authority to enforce obedience, especially under unwise and irresolute monarchs; so that, not less among our ancestors, than among other contemporaneous people, civil commotions and petty wars were often waged. This had been a state of living, common to the Teutonic and Celtic races. In contests with better organized empires and states, the fiery Kelts were often able to maintain a fitful, yet protracted, resistance. However, as the septs or clans varied in numbers, and in power, as also in diversity of local interests; it was found very difficult, to procure cohesion or coalition, in sufficient force, to secure a final victorious result.<sup>7</sup> From genuine records and monumental evidences, we can glean, and with a great degree of certainty, that the chiefs lived in old-world grandeur and state, while the law-protected people of ancient Erin were in possession of much worldly happiness and temporal comfort; although perfect civilization and rule cannot prevail, where Pagan superstitions abound.<sup>8</sup>

"Directory for Liverpool and its environs, 1871." Annals of Liverpool, etc., p. 45.

<sup>19</sup> See Probus, in "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxv., p. 49.

CHAPTER VII.—<sup>1</sup> The parish of Tara, in the barony of Skreen, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 31, 32, 37, 38. The townland and Hill of Tara are noted on Sheet 31.

<sup>2</sup> See on this subject, John O'Donovan's edition of Leabhar na 5-Ceapt, or "The Book of Rights," &c. Dublin, 1847, 8vo.

<sup>3</sup> The former social state of the Irish and the Celtic land system have been treated, with great ability, in the "History of the Land Tenures and Land Classes of Ireland," by George Sigerson, M.D., M.R.I.A. See especially chap. i. on this subject. Dublin: 1871, 8vo post.

<sup>4</sup> This is said to have been first instituted, by Ollamh Fodhla, Monarch of Ireland, from A.M. 3082 to 3113.

<sup>5</sup> For a description and illustration of the ancient remains there, the reader may consult "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xviii. Antiquities, No. iii. On the "History and Antiquities of Tara Hill," by George Petrie, Esq., R.H.A., M.R.I.A. Read 24th April, 8th May, and 22nd May, 1837, pp. 25 to 232.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. Jeffery Keating's "General History of Ireland," part i., pp. 160 to 170, Duffy's edition.

<sup>7</sup> See Goldwin Smith's "Irish History and Irish Character," p. 15.

History and poetry were preserved and cultivated by the learned, while patronized by the kings and chiefs. Ireland was a land of legends and of traditions many ages, before Saint Patrick visited it. There existed, in all parts, colleges of bards, whose duty it was to preserve in song the history of every clan and ruling-house, while shannachies no less sedulously promoted the cultivation of historic studies. From Pagan times, strange accounts were handed down to our Christian ancestors, who have not failed to transmit an abundant store of curious romance to the present generation. Thus, for fourteen centuries back, the subject of this biography has been regarded, at countless hearths, as the greatest man and the greatest benefactor, that ever trod the Irish soil, and there remains respecting him a vast cycle of legends, serious, pathetic, and profound.<sup>9</sup> Even the Druids and Soothsayers are related to have predicted St. Patrick's arrival, and those consequences likely to result from it. Art,<sup>10</sup> the son of Conn, Monarch of Ireland, is said to have had a vision of his coming.<sup>11</sup> We are informed,<sup>12</sup> that previous to, or about, the time of St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland, the "Tuatha" of Erin prophesied regarding a new kingdom of Faith, which should come, and that it should last for evermore. They had also announced, how the land of Tara must become waste and silent.<sup>13</sup> At this time, Loegaire was the supreme Monarch of Ireland, and from him, it is stated, his Druids<sup>14</sup> did not conceal the coming of St. Patrick: while their prophecy was verified, as to the kingdom, regarding which they spoke.<sup>15</sup> Various Irish Annals<sup>16</sup> announce the saint's arrival to have occurred, after the death of Pope Celestine I., and <sup>9</sup> Whoever desires the most ample information, regarding this subject, may consult that admirable work, "On the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish." A series of Lectures, delivered by the late Eugene O'Curry, M.R.I.A., Professor of Irish History and Archaeology in the Catholic University of Ireland, corresponding Member of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, etc. Edited with an Introduction, Appendices, etc., by W. K. Sullivan, Ph. D., Secretary to the Royal Irish Academy, and Professor of Chemistry to the Catholic University of Ireland, and to the Royal College of Science. Three volumes 8vo. Dublin, 1873.

<sup>9</sup> See Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of Saint Patrick." Preface, p. vii.

<sup>10</sup> Art, the father of Cormac Mac Airt, was killed at the battle of Magh Mucruma, in the county of Galway, A.D. 195, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 108, 109.

<sup>11</sup> According to the "Leabhar Na H-Uidhri," p. 119. This is related in a Tract, having a short prose introduction to an Irish Poem of 156 verses. The Poem begins with Cáin 'o Denna 'oen; thus Englished, "Pleasant for Denna is the mist." See also "Description," p. xxii.

<sup>12</sup> The text of St. Fiach's Hymn, as found in the Franciscan "Liber Hymnorum," thus reads:—

*Tuatha hehenn tairchantair uor mcepo
ritlhaith nua, mearo coe diaitaise, beo pái tih Tempach tua.*

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv. March, 1868, p. 286.

<sup>13</sup> See St. Fiach's Hymn on St. Patrick, stanza 10. "Prima Vita S. Patricii," p. 2. "Trias Thaumaturga." Also Scholia, n. 18, p. 5. See the Second Life, cap. xxvii., p. 14; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxvi., p. 49; the Sixth Life, cap. xxxi., p. 71; the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xliii., p. 123.

<sup>14</sup> In the scholia to St. Fiach's ancient Hymn, we are informed, that the Druids of King Laogarius were Luchra and Lucat Moel. Other Acts of St. Patrick agree with this account, although the names of those Druids are somewhat differently spelled.

<sup>15</sup> The following gloss is added, in fol. 15, b., in the margin of the MS.:—

*ite a opuro .i. lucra ocu lucut mel ocu iro apbertir:—
ticpa talceno uar muih mep ceno a bpat toll ceno, a cpam cpom-ceno a mair in iapthair a tige pfergeat a muntir huile, amen. amen.*

This is an English version of what they used to prophecy:—

"A Talcenn will come over the raging sea,
With his perforated garment, his crook-headed staff, during the first year of his successor, Sixtus III., who was elevated to the Papal dignity, on the 28th of April, A.D. 432.<sup>17</sup> It seems probable, that our holy Apostle came early in the summer of that year. It has been shown, that the date, A.D. 425 assigned by William of Malmesbury<sup>18</sup> for the arrival of St. Patrick in Ireland must have anticipated the true event, by several years. It was copied from him, by Stanihurst,<sup>19</sup> and by other writers; but, it is strangely erroneous.<sup>20</sup> In that case, St. Patrick must have been in Ireland, five or six years before that generally assumed time, for the arrival of Palladius. Nor is it likely, that his mission should have been deferred, until about 435,<sup>21</sup> or to A.D. 440, as Tillemont,<sup>22</sup> and other writers conjecture.<sup>23</sup>

Happily, to accomplish that glorious mission, which Palladius failed in fully prosecuting, and which the Almighty so mercifully aided St. Patrick in effecting, as many writers suppose, the future Apostle of Ireland landed, on some part of the Wicklow coast. A writer of his Acts tells us, that the holy man touched at a certain port, in the country of the Evoleni.<sup>24</sup> This place had been celebrated, even on the Continent of Europe. Yet, Colgan urges, in a note, that, for Evolenorum, we should rather read Cuolenorum. This seems to have been the Latinized form of name, for that tract, called, in Irish, Crioch-cuollan. Hence, the harbour in question must have been that of Kilmantan, now called Wicklow,<sup>25</sup> in the opinion of our Irish hagiologist.

With his table at the west end of his house,
And all his people will answer. Amen, amen."

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv. March, 1868, n. f., p. 287. In this gloss, the altar is said to be at "the west," i.e. ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου. This word is written ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου, i.e. "the east," in the Irish version of the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, and in other copies of this stanza, as may be seen in Professor Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xix., p. 397, and Appendix, No. cxxxi., p. 624.

<sup>16</sup> According to those of Ulster, of Innisfallen, of Clonmacnoise, and of the Four Masters. See, also, Marianus Scotus, Florence of Worcester, Sigebert and Baronius. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 1046, and Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xvii., p. 254.

<sup>17</sup> This seems to accord best, with the narrated series of St. Patrick's Acts.

<sup>18</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. xv., n. 129, p. 185.

<sup>19</sup> See "De Vita S. Patricii Hiberniæ Apostoli," lib. i., p. 42. He remarks, that others have A.D. 430.

<sup>20</sup> Among the Burgundian Library Manuscripts, Bruxelles, vol. xviii., No. 5303 consists of sixty-five pages; the first twenty-six are entitled "Adversaria Rerum Hiberniæ excerpta ex mutila Historia D. Cantwely," and it commences thus: "Hoc anno ante diluvium." At page 25 commences "Annales Roscreenses." The initial line is "Patricius Archiepus in Hiberniam venit atque Scotos baptizare inchoat, nono anno Theodos. minoris," &c. This should place St. Patrick's arrival, about A.D. 417. These Annals, as well as the "Adversaria," are in Latin and Irish, and very badly written.

<sup>21</sup> This would seem to follow, from the statement of John Major, that St. Patrick was sent to Ireland five years after Palladius. See "De Gestis Scotorum," cap. ii.

<sup>22</sup> See "Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xvi., p. 784.

<sup>23</sup> The Rev. Dr. Todd states, from some calculations he has made, that "we may assume A.D. 440 to 450, or at latest 460, as the limits within which must be found the year of the consecration of St. Patrick and of his arrival as a missionary in Ireland."—"St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. ii., p. 392.

<sup>24</sup> Probus says, that when the holy Bishop Patrick had ended his voyage and fatigue, "in optatem portum regionis Evolenorum, utique apud nos clarissimum delatus est."—See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxvii., p. 49.

<sup>25</sup> See also Ussher, "De Primordiis," cap. xvii., p. 845. "If Cuolenorum be the true reading," says Dr. Lanigan, "Ussher's and Colgan's corollary will naturally follow; but I confess I have some doubts on this subject, for it is not easy to admit that the harbour of Wicklow could, at any time, be very famous (clarissimus), considering not only how badly situated that place is for trade with the interior of Ireland, but likewise the badness of the harbour, which is fit only for small vessels."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. i., n. 3, p. 210. The accompanying view of the River Vartry, near its embouchure to

However, the Rev. Dr. Lanigan<sup>26</sup> and Thomas Moore<sup>27</sup> think St. Patrick's first landing may have been, on the shore of Dublin.<sup>28</sup> But, Ostium Dee,<sup>29</sup> Inbher-De, Dee, or Dea,<sup>30</sup>—which means the opening of a River De or Dea—is mentioned by many writers,<sup>31</sup> as having been the actual place, where St. Patrick disembarked. That stream has been also called the Deae River.

The Vartry River, the wooden bridge across it, the Town of Wicklow, and St. Patrick's Catholic Church on a hill-side.

From the situation of Cualann and Ui-Garchon, where it was, Dr. O'Donovan supposes it to be more than probable, that he landed at Bray.<sup>32</sup> It is very remarkable, however, that the river, now denominated the Two Mile Water, formerly was known as the De,<sup>33</sup> and this local tradition is yet preserved in the sea, at Wicklow Town, and the Catholic Parochial Church, dedicated to St. Patrick, is from a photograph, kindly furnished by Mrs. Ryan, 89 South Great George's-street, Dublin. This view has been drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved, by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>26</sup> See ibid., sect. i., p. 209. Dr. Lanigan says, according to one account, it should be looked for somewhere in the bay of Dublin, or between it and Skerries.

<sup>27</sup> Owing to the mention of the Evoleni, Ptolemy's "portus Eblanorum," or the harbour of Dublin, may have been meant. See "History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. x., p. 214. As in Irish, b is commutable with v, between the two names, there seems little difference.

<sup>28</sup> The harbour of Dublin, in the time of Probus, was very celebrated; for, the Danes were then its controllers.

<sup>29</sup> So it is called, in the Second Life, cap.

xxviii., p. 14; in the Fourth Life, cap. xxxi., p. 39. This landing, at the place named, is thus alluded to, in Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick:—"

"When now at Imber Dea, that precious bark, Freighted with Erin's future, touched the sands
Just where a river, through a woody vale
Curving, with duskier current clave the sea,
Patrick, the island's great inheritor,
His perilous voyage past, stept forth and knelt
And blessed his God."

—The Disbelief of Milcho, or St. Patrick's one failure, p. 3.

<sup>30</sup> A prince named Dagadh is said to have been drowned, near that place, and hence the name is thought to have been derived.

that neighbourhood.<sup>34</sup> By others, it has been said, the mouth of the Ovoca River is more likely to have been that exact spot, and some reasons have been advanced for such an opinion.<sup>35</sup> This is near the present town of Arklow,<sup>36</sup> and the people there have a tradition, that no fish can live in that river, owing to the malediction of St. Patrick; while others attribute such a circumstance, to those copper mines, which are near its banks. Popular tradition asserts, likewise, that the holy missionary first landed at the mouth of a little creek, a few miles to the south of Wicklow town, and near the old church ruins of Ennisboheen, formerly written Inis-Baithin.<sup>37</sup> However, his bark may have touched, at several places, along that shore, and which undoubtedly were within the ancient Ui-Garchon district.<sup>38</sup> The present conformation of coast, however, to the north of Wicklow town, appears more to favour that old record, about the sea having broken over a part of the eastern shore, where the illustrious Apostle had been so inhospitably and rudely treated. When St. Patrick arrived on the east coast, he is said to have visited a place, called Anat-Cailtrin,<sup>39</sup> whence he was driven away by the people. This Jocelyn calls Aonach-Tailtin.<sup>40</sup> Colgan states, that it was not near the sea, but some miles distant from it. However, as it is said to have been overflowed by the tidal-waters,<sup>41</sup> we cannot conceive it to have been very far removed from the Irish Sea. The Third Life distinguishes that place from Tailtin,<sup>42</sup> so remarkable for ancient sports and festivities. St. Patrick could not have remained long, on the shores of Wicklow; for, it appears, he met with a very inhospitable reception, from its inhabitants. After landing, the Apostle made ready to refresh himself and his people, and to announce the office of his ministry. The idolatrous inhabitants, however, not enduring the presence of the man of God, violently drove him thence, as the light of the sun is intolerable to the weak eye. Yet, that God, whom Patrick bore about him and glorified in his body, would not permit an affront, offered unto his servant, and for the sake of his name, to go unpunished. The river, which flowed into the sea, at that point, is said to have abounded with fish. Some fishermen, at the time, were found leaving that water, and drawing their loaded nets to the bank. Wearied with toil and hunger, the servants of the holy missionary earnestly besought those fishermen, to bestow what was requisite for refreshment. Such entreaty was not only refused with churlishness, but insult was added by the uncourteous and inhuman fishermen. On account of this refusal, on the part of these idolaters, to comfort and feed God's true worshippers, that river was thenceforth condemned to unproductiveness. This was announced, in a prediction of St.

See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 11.

<sup>31</sup> See the Third Life of St. Patrick, cap. xxviii., p. 23; Jocelyn's, or "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxix., p. 71. See, also, the Irish Tripartite, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 378.

<sup>32</sup> See "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., p. 130, n. (d.)

<sup>33</sup> This identification accords very well with the order of narrative, as found in the Third Life, cap. xxviii., xxix., p. 23.

<sup>34</sup> Accompanied by the Rev. Michael Moloney, P.P. of Kilbride, to Ennereilly, at its mouth, near the sea, a resident there told us the Two Mile Water was formerly called the De, and this peasant had no knowledge whatever, regarding any historic matter, in connexion with it.

<sup>35</sup> In Lynch's "Life of St. Patrick,"

chap. x., the writer adds, in a note, he was strongly of this opinion, owing to the local tradition.

<sup>36</sup> The town and parish of Arklow, in a barony so called, are shown, on the "Ordinance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheets 40, 45.

<sup>37</sup> Kil-Mantin and Inis-Baithin took their names from saints, and subsequent to the time of St. Patrick's first landing in Ireland.

<sup>38</sup> Hence, the exact place where St. Patrick first landed, after his return to Ireland, appears still a matter for further investigation.

<sup>39</sup> See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxix., p. 23, and n. 29, p. 31.

<sup>40</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxx., p. 71.

<sup>41</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xxix., p. 23.

<sup>42</sup> See ibid., cap. xliii., p. 25, and n. 43.

Patrick, according to the local legend ; and, it seems to have come down to us, from the records of very ancient times.<sup>43</sup>

A certain chief, said to have opposed Palladius some time previous, has been charged with offering most violent opposition to our saint.<sup>44</sup> That opponent is set down as Nathy,<sup>45</sup> son of Garchu,<sup>46</sup> and he figures as the Chief of Ui Garchon.<sup>47</sup> His opposition to St. Patrick is related in the Tripartite Life, and immediately after his rejection by the people, who lived near Inbherde. These narratives seem to indicate distinct events.<sup>48</sup> Owing to the wickedness of those who dwelt there, the Lord converted their fruitful land into a salt-marsh. With the overflowing of an unwonted tide, the sea covered their adjoining grounds, and that these might for ever be uninhabitable, our saint changed the dry land into a plashy lake.<sup>49</sup>

If we are to credit some accounts, St. Patrick is stated to have made the first Scottish or Irish convert,<sup>50</sup> where he landed, about this time, on the coast of Wicklow. This presumed neophyte is called Sinell,<sup>51</sup> son of Finnchadh, a Leinster man. He is related, to have received baptism, from the newly-arrived Apostle.<sup>52</sup> According to other accounts, however, Dichu, in the north of Ireland, is said to have been St. Patrick's first convert. His neophyte, Sinell, is thought to have lived, until A.D. 548.<sup>53</sup> Therefore, in the opinion of Dr. Lanigan, he could not have been of age to become a convert, when St. Patrick landed on the east coast of Ireland.

After the inhospitable repulse of Nathi, the inspired man pushed his bark out from Inbher-Dea,<sup>54</sup> and, he had a prosperous voyage. When obliged to sail from the Wicklow coast, the Tripartite Life states, that, spreading sail, he next steered towards the north, keeping the region of Breagh on the left side.<sup>55</sup> He landed, at a place, called Rathinbher.<sup>56</sup> It is thought to have been denominated a Rath, owing to the circumstance of a fort, or castle, p. 31. Dr. Lanigan cannot but think, that Tailten, or Tailtin, was situated, at or near the place, now corruptly called Teltown, in the barony of Kells. See Seward's "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," at Tailten.

<sup>43</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxix., p. 71 ; Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>44</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. xlii., p. 123. As this narrative appears in the Second Life, it is evidently an interpolation. It not only breaks the continuity ; but, it is directly contrary to circumstances, related in the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth chapters of the said Life. Found in the Tripartite, it may be suspected as an interpolation. It has even all the appearance of a note, that had crept into the text.

<sup>45</sup> See Secunda Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxv., p. 13.

<sup>46</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 378.

<sup>47</sup> This ancient territory contained Gleann Fhaidhle, now Glenealy, and Rath-Naoi, now Rathnew, near Wicklow. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (r), p. 453.

<sup>48</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xlii., p. 123.

<sup>49</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. xxx., p. 71. This description of the place seems to accord very well, with those lagoons, near the mouth of the Vartry River ; and, in point of fact, the landing-place has been so identified. See Rev. Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. i., p. 338, n. 2.

<sup>50</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxv., p. 13. In a note annexed, Colgan seems to think, he was a saint of the name, venerated either on the 12th of January, or on the 12th of November. See ibid., n. 35, p. 18.

<sup>51</sup> His Life is given by Colgan, in the "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," at the 26th of March. In this, however, there is nothing about Sinell having been converted, by the Irish Apostle.

<sup>52</sup> A genealogy of Sinell is furnished by Colgan. Thence, it would appear, that Sinell was grandson of Imchadius, and the eighth in descent from Corbmac Cucor, King of Leinster. Colgan likewise says, that he was surnamed the Elder. See n. 35, p. 18, in "Trias Thaumaturga." The Bollandists, with regard to Sinell, followed the Tripartite Life of our saint.

<sup>53</sup> At this year, we find the death of Sinell, alias Senchell, the Elder. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 186, 187. See, also, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. 120, p. 188.

<sup>54</sup> The Irish Tripartite has it, "his ships," thus seeming to indicate, that the having been there, and at the mouth of a river. A conjecture has been offered,<sup>57</sup> that it may have been identical with Old Court,<sup>58</sup> in the parish of Bray, and at the mouth of a clear and shallow stream, rushing into the sea, Skerries Harbour, County Dublin.

near that point. Afterwards, it is related, that he reached the mouth of a river, called Inbher Domnonn<sup>59</sup>—perhaps, however, it was not a locality distinct from Rath Inbher. He found no fish there.<sup>60</sup> That name is now supposed to be disguised, under the modern denomination, Muldowney,<sup>61</sup> at the Malahide river.<sup>62</sup> Thus, had the holy man touched on the territory of the Bregenses,<sup>63</sup> or Bregii.<sup>64</sup> This district, called Magh-Brega,<sup>65</sup> was situated saint and his companions used more than one vessel. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 381.

<sup>55</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," cap. xlv., p. 124.

<sup>56</sup> This seems to have been the place, called Anat-Cailtrín, in the Third Life, cap. xxix., p. 23. See, also, n. 29, p. 31. By Jocelyn, it is named Aonach-Tailltinn. See cap. xxx., p. 71.

<sup>57</sup> In Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii. p. 846. Harris and other writers adopt this supposition. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 12.

<sup>58</sup> This townland, in the barony of Rathdown, is noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheets 4, 8. The parish of Bray is noted, on Sheets 4, 7, 8, ibid. An illustration of the scene will be found, in the "Dublin Penny Journal," vol. ii., No. 68, p. 125.

<sup>59</sup> "In via autem primo declinavit ad ostium fluminis Inbher Domnonn, et inde ad quamdam parvulam insulam, quæ ex ejus nomine postea Inis Padruic." See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xlv., p. 124. Alluding to this voyage, Aubrey De

Vere, in his "Legends of St. Patrick," states :—

"They passed, and heard the lowing of the herds
In hollow glens, and smelt the balmy breath
Of gorse on golden hillsides ; till at eve,
The Imber Domnand reached, on silver sands Grated their keel."

—The Disbelief of Milcho, p. 5.

<sup>60</sup> This is asserted, in the Irish version of the Tripartite Life, published by Miss Cusack ; but, it is wanting, in Father Colgan's Latin version.

<sup>61</sup> This is not noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin." The parish of Malahide, in the barony of Coolock, is marked on Sheet 12.

<sup>62</sup> See Rev. Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," n. 5, p. 405.

<sup>63</sup> In the Second Life, cap. xxix., p. 14, and in the Fourth Life, cap. xxxii., p. 39, the district of the Bregenses is the first referred to, when relating St. Patrick's course towards the north.

between Dublin and Drogheda,<sup>66</sup> or according to Connell Mageoghegan, from Howth northwards, along the coast of Dublin to Louth. Our saint stopped for a while, at Holmpatrick,<sup>67</sup> now near Skerries harbour.<sup>68</sup> Here, he touched at a small island, some miles north of Dublin City. This was called after him, Inis Phadruig, or "the island of Patrick."<sup>69</sup> There he landed,<sup>70</sup> and tradition fondly points out the trace of St. Patrick's foot, on a hard rock, off the main shore, and at the entrance to Skerries harbour.<sup>71</sup>

Still Patrick sailed northwards,<sup>72</sup> towards Inbher Nainge, where nothing was found to eat. This is now known as the Nanny Water.<sup>73</sup> On this river, he is said, also, to have pronounced a malediction; and, afterwards, it was found to be unproductive.<sup>74</sup> Here, he first met with St. Benignus,<sup>75</sup> or Benen, regarding whom a beautiful legend is told. Patrick went to the house of a certain noble, called Seschenus, who, with his wife and family, embraced the Christian Faith, as preached by the Apostle. Among the neophytes was a boy of tender years, but remarkable for his good morals and benign disposition.<sup>76</sup> After the child's baptism, St. Patrick lay down to rest, and soon was he sleeping. Benignus, who had received a name, expressive of his character, drew near, and the child spread sweet-smelling flowers and herbs, near the Apostle, whose feet he impressed with kisses. The attendants forbade the boy to do so, lest he should awaken Patrick; but, the latter, knowing what had occurred, cried out: "He shall be the heir of my kingdom," thus meaning, that Benignus should succeed him, in the primatial See of Armagh.<sup>77</sup> The event was fully verified; for, Benignus left his parents, and attached himself to a spiritual father, from whom he could not be separated afterwards, and from whom he learned all heavenly wisdom. He afterwards became distinguished for sanctity, learning and miracles, so that all persons agreed, he was worthy to succeed his master, as bishop of Armagh. This office, for many years, he happily exercised.<sup>78</sup> Leaving Inbher Nainge, St. Patrick went to Inbher-Boindi, or to the mouth of the Boyne River, where he procured fish, and he blessed that place. There, he had been kindly received, by the inhabitants, and, after his blessing, their river constantly abounded with fish. However, a wicked Magus, or wizard, in that place, had dared to offer insult to the Immaculate Virgin Mother of God. This blasphemy was punished, in an exemplary manner; for, the earth opened, and it swallowed him alive.<sup>79</sup>

<sup>64</sup> The Tripartite says, "juxta fines Brengensium ad sinistram flectens, dirigit in Ulltoniam."

<sup>65</sup> Since the occupation of all the upper coast of Dublin County, by the Danes, or Fingals, it is no wonder, that almost all its old names have been changed, and that the original denominations, in ancient Irish, have been forgotten.

<sup>66</sup> See the Trias Thaumaturga, Index Topographicus, at Brega and Bregii, p. 706.

<sup>67</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 440, and Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 12.

<sup>68</sup> The accompanying view of it was drawn from the main shore, by William F. Wakeman, who transferred it to the wood, and it has been engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>69</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxviii., p. 14; "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxii., p. 39; "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxx., p. 71; "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xlv., p. 124. See, also,

the Irish version in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 381.

<sup>70</sup> Jocelyn states, that he remained there, for some days.

<sup>71</sup> This curious hollowed rock-formation, the writer has been shown, and it presents a fanciful impress, like that of a human footprint.

<sup>72</sup> See the Second Life of St. Patrick, cap. xxxiii., p. 14. Also, the Third Life, cap. xxx., p. 23, the Fourth Life, cap. xxxii., p. 39, and the Sixth Life, cap. xxxi., p. 71.

<sup>73</sup> It runs past Duleek, county of Meath, and empties into the Irish Sea, at the parish of Julianstown, otherwise called the parish of Nanny, in Ussher's "Return of Meath," A.D. 1622. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 381, n. 6.

<sup>74</sup> See ibid.

<sup>75</sup> His feast is observed, on the 9th of November.

<sup>76</sup> By Jocelyn, this account is deferred to a later stage of St. Patrick's career. See Sixth Life, cap. xxxix., pp. 73, 74.

Next, St. Patrick sailed past the eastern coast of Conaille Muirthemhne—extending from the River Boyne, to the Cuailgne, or Cooly, Mountains.<sup>80</sup>

Northward still he went, to the extreme shores of Ultonia,<sup>81</sup> and the Mourne mountains soon reared their lofty peaks, on the larboard side.<sup>82</sup> Passing along that part, formerly known as Ulidia, and inhabited by the Ultones, he arrived at a port, in the barony of Lecale, as seems most probable. This Frith was called, Brennese, or Brenasse,<sup>83</sup> while, it is also designated, Inbher-Brena.<sup>84</sup> That part of the sea, near where he landed, is called a fretum, or streight. This place of arrival is represented, as having been very near to Sabhall Padruic. The latter locality is now called, Saul.<sup>85</sup> There he, and his companions, left the ship, hoping to rest their wearied limbs, by a little quiet and sleep.<sup>86</sup> There, too, he drew on shore, at a place, variously called Slan,<sup>87</sup> Inbher Slainge,<sup>88</sup> or Inberslan,<sup>89</sup> Latinized Ostium Slain, or the

<sup>77</sup> Benignus is placed third on the list of its bishops. See Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. i., pp. 3, 4.

<sup>78</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xlv., p. 124.

<sup>79</sup> See ibid., cap. xlv., p. 124.

<sup>80</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 381.

<sup>81</sup> Jocelyn poetically says: "Sic profecto recedente Aquilone Auster perfians adveniret, et in lateribus Aquilonis hortum, Domini aromata perfluentem plantaret."—"Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxi., p. 71. See, also, the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xlvii., p. 124.

<sup>82</sup> Their Irish denomination, Bann a Bairche, means "the peaks of Bairche." It was a former name for the entire range of Mourne Mountains. The barony of that name was so called, from Boirche, the shepherd of Ros, King of Ulster, in the third century. He is said to have herded the king's cattle, on these mountains. See the "Book of Rights," edited by John O'Donovan, pp. 38, 165.

<sup>83</sup> Colgan says in a note 45, to the Fourth Life, it is called the Frith of Brenasse, and, in our days, it is universally called, Loch-Cuan, unless it may appear to be the frith, or bay, of that sea, which lies between Dundrom and Lecale. See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxix., p. 14, and n. 45, p. 19.

<sup>84</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life of St. Patrick. See Miss Cusack's edition, p. 382.

<sup>85</sup> This parish, in the barony of Lower Lecale, is marked on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheets 31, 38. Saul, and Saul Quarter, in Upper Lecale, are shown on those same Sheets.

<sup>86</sup> The Tripartite Life adds, "in loca postea Sabhall Padruic." See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xlvii., p. 124.

<sup>87</sup> Thus, it appears to have been called, from St. Fiach's Irish Hymn:—

1 slán tuaidh benna bairche nír gairbeo carr na lía, canaro cet palm ceth narochi, so níg áingel fognao.

It is thus rendered into English:—

"In Slan, in the territory of Benna-Bairche, hunger or thirst possessed him not.

Each night he sang a hundred psalms, to adore the King of Angels."

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 288, 289. See, also, "Prima Vita S. Patricii," strophe 15, p. 2. In the Commentator's note, its proper name is stated to have been Tiprad Innse, but it is said to have got the name of Slan, meaning "health," because all sick persons, who made pilgrimages to it, were restored to health, through St. Patrick's merits. "Alii dicunt quod juxta Sabhallum sit, vel in Dal-aradia: sed Ulidii repleverunt," &c. At the word, Slan, we find a comment, differing from that in Colgan. This gloss is added in one MS.:—"Slan .i. iap rín sí ba slán [oap a heip] in lobor oap a tege [in tuirce] oap ic pabull ata . . . repleverunt ullaro [illum] propter molestiam tur [barum] exeuntium do illum." "Slan, i.e. because the leper upon whom its [water] was put was cured by it, and at Sabull (Saul) it is . . . repleverunt Ulaidi [the people of Ulidia] illum propter molestiam tur [barum] exeuntium ad illum." The words in brackets are very obscure in the MS. See also "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 19 t., p. 5.

<sup>88</sup> The Tripartite Life thus states this whole matter, by saying that St. Patrick, leaving the extreme coasts of Ultonia on the left side, was wafted "in portu de Inbher Slainge."—Part i., cap. xlvii. It seems to have taken that name, it is thought, from the first King of Ireland, Slainge, by name concerning whom the Four Masters, in the year of the world 3,267, write—"For that loftiest mountain of Ulster, which now is commonly called Slieve-Domhan-Gairt, that is, the mountain of St. Donard, we read of being called by the ancient writers Slieb-Slainge. Wherefore, the aforesaid port "mouth of the Slain River." Various opinions have been given, regarding its exact situation. Thus, there are several writers who identify it with some port in the present Bay of Dundrum;<sup>90</sup> and, among these may be enumerated, Sir James Ware,<sup>91</sup> Harris, his continuator,<sup>92</sup> and Patrick Lynch.<sup>93</sup> The people, living along the coast, fondly cherish such a tradition.<sup>94</sup> Others,<sup>95</sup> again, claim this distinction, for Strangford Lough,<sup>96</sup> and their conclusions seem to be fully established, owing to recent investigations. On this subject, a learned and concise Tract has been already published. It conveys some very researchful observations,<sup>97</sup> and, we believe, it serves most satisfactorily to solve the point in dispute. Its author arrives at the conclusion, there are no traditions, nor any evidence, that the strand or river, at Dundrum Bay, had ever been called Brenasse. Neither was the Blackstaff or Drumca River designated the Slaine, nor does any part of the adjoining coast bear any name, sounding like Brene, or Brenasse. The Fretum Brennesse was evidently an ancient name for the mouth of Strangford Lough, in the county of Down; because, at A.M. 2,546, the Four Masters write, that an inundation of the sea over the land took place at Brena, while it was the seventh lake eruption, that occurred in the time of Partholan. This is also named Loch Cuan, which is still the Irish name for Strangford Lough.<sup>98</sup> The evidence adduced seems to establish beyond question, the identity of Strangford River, and bay of the sea, lie beneath this mountain, towards the north, between it and the Maginnis's country, now called Lecale, in which Patrick then landed. Hence, Colgan is of opinion, that the port, or ostium, derived its name, from the same king, and that his name had been extended, also, to include the Bay of Dundrum. See ibid., n. 46, p. 19.

<sup>89</sup> See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxi., p. 23.

<sup>90</sup> It is also a singular circumstance, that Dundrum Bay itself is designated "Holy Bay," in a very ancient unpublished map, belonging to the manuscript library of Trinity College, thus, apparently showing, that some peculiar sanctity was attached to the place.

<sup>91</sup> See "De Præsulibus Hiberniæ Commentarius."

<sup>92</sup> In his annotations, Harris writes, that the "Inkber Slaing, or the Mouth of the River Slaing, is now called the Bay of Dundrum, in the county of Down. The River Slaing, or Slain, riseth in the barony of Castle-reagh, and county of Down, and, taking a southerly course, falls into the north end of the Bay of Dundrum."—Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 12, note. But, no such river can here be found.

<sup>93</sup> See "The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. xi., p. 127, note.

<sup>94</sup> North of the outer bay, a narrow straight or river runs from the bulls of the bar, to the town of Dundrum, connecting it with the strand, or inner bay—a large sheet of water at high tide. The inhabitants of Ballykinlar parish, which is situate to the east side of this strand, point out a nook, in Middle Ballykinlar, as the place of St.

Patrick's arrival. Near it, the ruins of the little church of Killyglinnie still remain, and alongside these is a holy well, called after the saint. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 40. In favour of this tradition, it has been urged, that the streight, or river, connecting the bay, with the strand, is the "fretum brenasse," and that either the Blackstaff or Drumca River, entering the north end of the strand, is the River Slainge. The inhabitants, also, give it as a tradition, that the parish derived its name, owing to the fact of the saint having first kindled, on the Kinle, hills, which traverse it, the light of the Gospel. The place has its name, Baile-Caindlera, signifying the "town of the candlestick," because it furnished lights for Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin.

<sup>95</sup> Among these may be named Rev. Dr. Lanigan. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. ii., n. 16, pp. 213, 214.

<sup>96</sup> The Down survey of 1650, in describing the barony of Ards, states:—"Afterwards the said barony of Ards is bounded on the south side by an arme of the sea, called Loughcoyn, which (from Newtowne) extends to Portaferry Towne in the Ards, and Strangford Towne in the barony of Lecale, betwixt which two townes the sea, coming in by a strong current and a narrow passage, makes Loughcoyn aforesaid, and that narrow entry of the sea is called Strangford, because of the swift and rapid entry which the sea there makes." The word, "ford," or "fiordr," itself is Danish, signifying a frith, or streight. This is precisely the character of Strangford River, and the Danish of "strong" is "streng," thus showing the name to be of Danish origin.

with "Brennasse." Yet, there is additional proof, which confirms this view. For, a townland, near Strangford Lough, and now named Ballintougher,<sup>99</sup> was formerly called Ballybrene, in the Taxation of Pope Nicholas.<sup>100</sup> No reasonable doubt can exist, that the name, Brenasse, is the Latinized form of "brena," entering into the composition of the name Balibren. Nor, can there be a question, that the land of Brena, stated to have been overflowed, and that Balibren, mentioned in the Taxation, were identical. Such forms naturally imparted a name to the "Fretum Brenasse." On the southern shore of Lough Strangford, a small river—formerly called the Slaney<sup>101</sup>—empties itself between Saul's and Gore's Islands; nor can there be any doubt, owing to its name, and to the fact, that immediately near its exit are the Slaney Rocks,<sup>102</sup> it was the Slainge, where St. Patrick and his companions disembarked.<sup>103</sup> It was formerly a tidal river, for upwards of a mile, and nigh to the little village of Raholp.<sup>104</sup> In past times, it had been of importance, as a government port. Latterly, a battery and floodgate have been erected, near its mouth, for the purpose of keeping out the tide, and of reclaiming the broad expanse of land, at the embouchure.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE IRISH APOSTLE'S ARRIVAL AT SAUL—SOOTHSAYERS' PREDICTIONS REGARDING HIS COMING—KING LAOGHAIRE'S INSTRUCTIONS—OPPOSITION AND CONVERSION OF DICHUO OR DICHU—ST. PATRICK ERECTS A CHURCH AT SAUL—PUNISHMENT OF A MAGICIAN—ST. PATRICK VISITS HIS FORMER MASTER, MILCHO, BUT FAILS IN EFFECTING HIS CONVERSION—TERRITORIAL POSITION OF THE CRUITHNI AND DALARADIANS—ST. PATRICK RETURNS TO DICHU—HE RECEIVES ROSS, OR RUS, INTO THE CHURCH—HE INSTRUCTS AND BAPTIZES MOCHOE, AFTERWARDS BISHOP OF ISLAND MAHEE—ST. PATRICK RELEASES THE SONS OF DICHU FROM CAPTIVITY.

As Saint Patrick and his companions approached the shore, they desired some respite from their labours.<sup>1</sup> At the end of the Brene Strait, and at the mouth of the Slaney River, their bark<sup>2</sup> was concealed, in some creek, when

<sup>97</sup> See "An Inquiry into the true Landing-place of St. Patrick in Ulster," published at Downpatrick, June, 1858, by J. W. Hanna, pp. 12.

<sup>98</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 6, 7, and n. (w.)

<sup>99</sup> This is to be seen, in the parish of Saul, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 31.

<sup>100</sup> In A.D. 1306. The old church of Balibren, here mentioned, has been identified with Ballintougher, on the authority of an Inquisition, 3 Edward VI. See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," p. 40, n. (k.)

<sup>101</sup> This was related to Mr. Hanna, by all the old residents, near the place; but, the name had fallen into disuse, in 1858, since the stream had been previously embanked. The opening or estuary lies, between the townlands of Ballintougher, and Ringbane or Rinban, "the white Promontory." The little River Slaney rises in Loughmoney, about two miles to the south. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 38. It is more plainly marked, on Kennedy's Map of the County Down, published in 1767, and on Williamson's, published in 1814, than on the Ordnance Maps. The two former show it, as being then considerably broad at the mouth.

<sup>102</sup> On these, duileasg, a seaweed, is gathered by the neighbouring inhabitants.

<sup>103</sup> See J. W. Hanna's "Inquiry into the true Landing-place of St. Patrick in Ulster," pp. 7 to 10.

<sup>104</sup> This is in the parish of Ballyculter, barony of Lower Lecale, and it is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 31.

CHAPTER VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxiii., p. 39.

<sup>2</sup> That vessel, in which the saint had sailed, was a hooker or wherry, and not a ship. It is recorded, that on reaching land, the voyagers hid it, near some sequestered part of the coast. This could not have been the missionaries travelled a little distance into the country,<sup>3</sup> perhaps, to reconnoitre its position, and to obtain some necessary intelligence, for their holy objects. They seem to have travelled westwards, towards Saul, which was about two miles distant; and, from it, the high hills of Ballintougher must have intercepted a view of their vessel, lying in the Slaney River.<sup>4</sup> Meantime, the Magicians, and Soothsayers of that region,<sup>5</sup> had long before prophesied, regarding St. Patrick's approach, and in the manner following: "There shall come a man, with his crown shaved, and in his hand a crooked staff; his table shall be set in the east of his house, and his people shall stand behind him; from his table he shall sing blasphemies, and all his family will answer, Amen. When this man shall come, he will destroy our Gods, throw down our altars, and temples; he shall seduce the people and bring them after him; he shall subdue, or take away our kings, who will resist him. His doctrines, too, shall reign for ever." Somewhat different in terms, although agreeing in substance, are the magical prophecies, attributed to the Druids, in the Tripartite Life.<sup>6</sup> At this time, the reigning Monarch of Ireland, Laeghaire Mac Neill,<sup>7</sup> a fierce and cruel pagan, had many Magi or Haruspices,<sup>8</sup> who are said to have predicted what should happen, in the future; and, among these, the chief ones were Lochra or Lochru, and Lochadh Mael or Luchat Calvus.<sup>9</sup> A certain Conn, or Constantine,<sup>10</sup> is said, also, to have had this foreknowledge of the Irish Apostle, probably three done, had it been a ship. It was, therefore, a sort of large boat, which St. Patrick had either purchased or hired. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. iii., n. 22, p. 217.

<sup>3</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xxix., p. 14.

<sup>4</sup> This situation answers well to the description given, in the Book of Armagh, regarding the Slain, which runs at the end of the Brene.

<sup>5</sup> Jocelyn gives it the Irish title Vlagh, and the Latin rendering Uldia. At first, that province was called by ancient Irish writers, Ulta and Ulaiddh, and by Latin writers Uldonia, Uldia, or more correctly, Uldia. Thus rendered, it applied to all Ulster, excepting the county of Cavan. Besides, it included Louth. But, when the Dalriatach, in the second century of the Christian era, and afterwards the race of Colla, and the sons of Niall, invaded it, the original rulers and people were driven into a more confined space, now represented by the County of Down, where the people were specially called Uldians, in the time of Jocelyn. The annals and customs of Uladh are set forth, in Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix I. I., pp. 352 to 369.

<sup>6</sup> See the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xliii., p. 123, and, also Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 379 to 381, with notes.

<sup>7</sup> It was said, by Galasius, that St. Patrick came into Ireland, in the fifth year of his reign, Pope Celestine being in the eighth year of his Popedom, in the eighth year of the Emperor Theodosius' reign. Colgan thinks, that the foregoing statement tallies very well with received chronology. However, while he makes Theodosius the sixtieth Emperor after Augustus, the Latin Tripartite Life deems Theodosius to have been the sixty-fifth, while the Irish Tripartite sets him down as the forty-fifth—probably an error of transcription. The Galasius—quoted in the Tripartite—was unknown to Colgan. He does not seem to have been Pope St. Galacius L., who died A.D. 496, nor Galasius, Archbishop of Armagh, who succeeded St. Malachy O'Morgair, and who flourished A.D. 1150, unless some interpolator inserted such a chronological addition to the Tripartite text.

<sup>8</sup> Jocelyn calls them Arioli. The Second Life calls them, "venefici," "incantatores," and "nequissimæ artis inventores."

<sup>9</sup> While most of St. Patrick's Acts distinguish them, as only two distinct persons, Probus, on the contrary, notes them as three, whom he calls Locri, Eglid and Mel. See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxvi., p. 49.

<sup>10</sup> Some have thought him identical, with Conn of the Hundred Battles, who reigned over Ireland, from A.D. 123 to 157. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 102 to 105. Colgan thinks, however, that a different person, among the Druids or Magi of Ireland, is here meant, so far as memory served him, regarding some document he had read.

<sup>11</sup> There is a Poem, known as the "Baile Chuinn Ched-Chathaigh," or Ecstasy of Conn of the Hundred Battles, a copy of which was found by Eugene O'Curry, in 1849, among the Egerton MSS., No. 88, of the British Museum. This was transcribed on vellum, about A.D. 1590, by Donnel O'Davoren, in Burren, County Clare. The hundred years before that period.<sup>11</sup> Nor, need it seem strange, or incredible, if the Lord inspired, or even permitted, that magicians should thus foretell the arrival and the several acts of St. Patrick, since, the soothsayer, Balaam,<sup>12</sup> and King Nabuchodonazor, as Jocelyn remarks, plainly prophesied the coming of Christ,<sup>13</sup> and even the devils most reluctantly bore testimony to the Son of God.<sup>14</sup> Those Magicians and their prophecies had moved Laogaire, to command his subjects throughout all his dominions, that they should watch all the havens, and ports, in order to drive St. Patrick away, when or wheresoever he should land.<sup>15</sup>

A reigning chieftain of that district, afterwards called Lecale,<sup>16</sup> was Dichu, or Dichuo,<sup>17</sup> the son of Trichim,<sup>18</sup> belonging to the race of Fiatach Finn, Monarch of Ireland. Regarding his parentage, however, most of St. Patrick's Lives are silent.<sup>19</sup> He is said to have had six other brothers, who are thus named: Laeghaire, of Dun;<sup>20</sup> Ailill, of Maghbile;<sup>21</sup> Duirthecht, of Aendruim;<sup>22</sup> Eoghan and Niell, both of Cilleleithe;<sup>23</sup> and Ros,<sup>24</sup> or Rus,<sup>25</sup> of Dundaleithglass;<sup>26</sup>—all these places being within the present county of Down. Dichu was a pagan, and he had a swineherd there employed. He was the first who met the strangers. The great Apostle of Ireland desired to make men free in that land, where he had formerly been a slave, when a youth, and where he had served in a like lowly capacity. It is a singular circumstance, that after hiding their ship or ships, at Inber-Slani, the first person met was a swineherd; thus, practising that same occupation, St. Patrick had himself composition, professing to have been written in the second century, predicts the fortunes and misfortunes of the Irish people, down to the time of a false fratricidal King of Tara.—supposed to have been Domnall Breaghach O'Mailechlainn, who murdered his cousin Diarmaid, the rightful heir, in A.D. 1179. In his reign, the Saxons were to come into Ireland. Unless these quotations be regarded as interpolations, they show the Tripartite Life of our saint to have been a comparatively modern composition. See more on this subject, in "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xviii., pp. 385 to 387, and Appendix, No. cxxvii., pp. 617, 618.

<sup>12</sup> See Numbers xxii., xxiii., xxiv.

<sup>13</sup> See Daniel ii., iii., iv.

<sup>14</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxi., p. 71, and n. 31, pp. 109, 110.

<sup>15</sup> See ibid., cap. xxxii., p. 71. And, also, "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xliiii., and nn. 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 32, pp. 123, 171, 172. There is an account regarding the time of St. Patrick's mission, differing from the received version of it, in the Book of Lecan, at fol. 306. a. b. See the "Catalogue of Manuscripts, belonging to the Royal Irish Academy," compiled by Eugene O'Curry. There is likewise a Poem, by Finn Mac Cumhaill, on St. Patrick's coming into Ireland. It is classed 23, H. 1, p. 82, in the Hodges and Smith Collection of Manuscripts, described at p. 688.

<sup>16</sup> Called in Irish, Leth-Cathail, "Cathal's portion,"—now co-extensive with the modern barony of Lecale—because it belonged to a chief so named, who flourished about A.D. 700. In it were situated the city of Downpatrick, Saul, as also other religious establishments. In the Second Life (cap. xxx., p. 14), Dichu is said to have lived in the plain Inish, or as the Irish called it, Mag-Inish, or the "Island plain;" since, as Colgan thinks, this district, if not in reality an island, was at least a peninsula. See n. 51, p. 19. See its description and historical notices, in Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix I., pp. 201 to 205.

<sup>17</sup> He was afterwards venerated, as a saint; and, it is thought, his festival was kept at Saul, on the 29th of April.

<sup>18</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xxxi., p. 23, and the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xlvii., p. 124.

<sup>19</sup> Thus, we may mention the First, Second, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Lives.

<sup>20</sup> Possibly Downpatrick.

<sup>21</sup> Now Moville.

<sup>22</sup> Now Island Mahee.

<sup>23</sup> Now Kilclief.

<sup>24</sup> His feast is supposed to fall on the 7th of April. By Jocelyn, he is said to have been "prædicto Dichu Germanus carne Rus."—"Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxiv., p. 72.

<sup>25</sup> He is called the son of Trichim, in the Second (cap. xxxi., p. 14), Third (cap. xxxii., p. 23), and Fourth Lives (cap. xxxvii., p. 39). He is said to have lived, towards the south of Dichuo's residence. Had the writers of these Acts known, that Dichuo was his son, it appears strange, that they have not so designated him, and, in the same manner, as they did, with regard to Rus. However, the notion, that Dichu and Rus were brothers, has probably had its origin, been subjected to, in the country, whither he had now come, in order to proclaim Christ's Gospel. That swineherd of Dichu, however, thought those strangers, whom he met, were pirates or thieves.<sup>27</sup> At once, he communicated such intelligence to his master, and brought him to the place, whither they had come. The chieftain, Dichuo, was a man of great strength, of gigantic stature, and of a fierce spirit. In a transport of rage, this chief set his dogs to worry or devour them.<sup>28</sup> Whereupon, St. Patrick cried out : "Ne tradas Domine bestiis animas confitentes tibi."<sup>29</sup> Yet, an attacking animal no sooner saw God's servant, than he became mute, and apparently stiff as a stone. On seeing this, it is said,<sup>30</sup> that Dichuo drew out a sword, thinking to kill the saint. But God, opposing the shield of his divine protection, all Dichu's strength failed him. That celebrated miracle, which the Book of Kings relates to have been formerly wrought on Jeroboam, St. Patrick more profitably renewed on this occasion. When that king was sacrificing to idols, and had stretched out his hand to seize the prophet, who was reproving him, forthwith his arm stiffened. On his repentance, however, the prophet healed him, yet the king did not when healed forsake his error.<sup>31</sup> Such a paralysis, as we are told, grew over all his body, that Dichuo could neither stir hand nor foot. This punishment, however, led to his conversion. The noble, seeing this great miracle wrought upon himself, became another man ; for he, and all his household, inspired by God and believing in Christ, were baptized. Dichu having obtained health both of soul and body, bestowed upon Saint Patrick the place, where that miracle happened, with all necessary appurtenances, for the building of a church. Then the saint imparted to him a special blessing.<sup>32</sup> Hence, from accounts, Dichu or Dichuo is generally held to have been the first convert, made in Ulster ;<sup>33</sup> but, he seems, even to have been the first in Ireland, received by St. Patrick into the Church.<sup>34</sup>

Contrary to the usual practice of church-building, Dichu's barn ran from north to south.<sup>35</sup> However, this granary was actually converted into a church ; and, probably, St. Patrick obtained a spot of ground adjoining it, for a place of interment, or for ecclesiastical purposes.<sup>36</sup> This place got the name of Sabul Patric, or Sabhall, now Saul.<sup>37</sup> It was called, Sabhall Padruic,<sup>38</sup> or Saint Patrick's Barn, even to the twelfth century, when Jocelyn wrote his from such a circumstance. Then, four more brothers, and all belonging to the most noble house of Dalriatach, are mentioned. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. ii., n. 17, p. 215.

<sup>26</sup> Now Downpatrick.

<sup>27</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxix., p. 14.

<sup>28</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 382.

<sup>29</sup> See the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. xlvii., p. 114.

<sup>30</sup> By Jocelyn.

<sup>31</sup> See iii. Kings, xiii. 4.

<sup>32</sup> It is thus expressed :—

"The blessing of God on Dichu,
Who gave me the Sabhall ;
May he be hereafter,
Heavenly, joyous, glorious.

"The blessing of God on Dichu—
Dichu with full folds (flocks) ;

No one of his sept or kindred Shall die, except after a long life."

—Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 382.

<sup>33</sup> So Colgan conjectures, as he thinks, owing to the Tripartite statement, that Sinell had been the first made in Ireland. See lib. i., cap. xlvii., p. 124. In this supposition, he is followed by Harris, in his edition of Sir James Ware's Works, vol. i. "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 12.

<sup>34</sup> The Second Life expresses this most clearly, "crediit et baptizatus est, et primus Scotorum per Patricium confessus est." See cap. xxix., p. 14. The Fourth Life adds to the account of his belief and baptism, "primus Scotorum, ut fertur, per Patricium confessus est."—Cap. xxxiii., p. 39. Probus, also, has a like statement. See the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxviii., p. 49.

<sup>35</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xxxi., p. 23, and the Sixth Life, cap. xxxii., p. 72.

<sup>36</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical

Life of our great Apostle.<sup>39</sup> In process of time, it is said, the saint built thereon a fair monastery, which he furnished with a company of perfect monks. Here, in after life, St. Patrick spent a considerable portion of his days,<sup>40</sup> and there, too, he departed from this world. A small modern Protestant church has been built in the old cemetery. Another account has it, that extensive ruins of the ancient monastery in Saul—said to have been originally founded A.D. 433—existed even in the present century.<sup>41</sup> A few fragments of a former church are there;<sup>42</sup> and, it may be satisfactory to know, that its great altar-stone is now used, for the same holy purpose, in the Catholic parish church of Saul.<sup>43</sup> Over his monks, here, St. Patrick placed St. Dunninus,<sup>44</sup> his own disciple, as their abbot.<sup>45</sup> For their use, too, he caused by prayer a fountain to spring from the earth.<sup>46</sup> This was probably at a place, not far distant from Saul, and where a number of springs—known as History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. ii., pp. 212, 213.

Saul Church and Churchyard, County of Down.

<sup>37</sup> An account of this place will be found, in Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix O, pp. 220 to 223.

<sup>38</sup> See Probus' or "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," where it is called, "Patricii horreum," lib. i., cap. xxviii., p. 49.

<sup>39</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxii., p. 72.

<sup>40</sup> St. Patrick writes, or has written for him, in his Testament, the following holy reminiscence of a sojourn here :—

"Thirty years was I myself
At Saul with purity."

<sup>41</sup> See Philip Dixon Hardy's "Northern Tourist," p. 84.

<sup>42</sup> These, with the modern church, in the cemetery, at Saul, are represented in the accompanying illustration, drawn on the wood, from a local sketch, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>43</sup> This has been built, in the adjoining townland of Ballysugagh. Of this precious relic, the parishioners are excessively proud.

<sup>44</sup> Colgan remarks, that in no other Acts of St. Patrick, except in those by Jocelyn, nor in other Saints' Lives, could he find anything about Dunninus. He thinks, however, that probably he may be the same as a Moduinus, who is mentioned, by Marianus O'Gorman, at the 29th of May. See n. 33, p. 110, to Jocelyn's Acts of St. Patrick.

<sup>45</sup> On the ruins of this place, we find a few very indifferent metrical lines, introduced into Philip Dixon Hardy's "Northern Tourist," &c., p. 84.

<sup>46</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxii., p. 72.

the Struell Wells<sup>47</sup>—are now the resort of pilgrims, especially during the summer months.<sup>48</sup> The people living there naturally feel very indignant, at any desecration of these healing springs, in which, as they relate, St. Patrick remained whole nights immersed.

One day, as the holy missionary offered Mass in the church at Saul, a sacrilegious Magician,<sup>49</sup> and a child of perdition, stood without, and with a rod, thrust in through the window,<sup>50</sup> he cast down the chalice, and spilled its contents; but, God immediately and severely punished so wicked a sacrilege, the earth opening, after a most strange manner, swallowed the Magician alive.<sup>51</sup> In the time of Jocelyn, the people of Down showed a great fissure in the earth, where this miracle is reported to have occurred.<sup>52</sup> The saint sorrowed much, for the effusion of the chalice, and, being afflicted, he shed tears. But, as related, by Divine virtue, the chalice was erected in its own place, and, with the elements so entire, that there appeared no sign nor mark of the former effusion.<sup>53</sup>

Many ancient writers declare, that St. Patrick had a great desire to convert Milcho, or Miliuc, in whose service he had been, as a swineherd, all the time of his bondage. A knowledge of the true God, and of his religion, this chieftain seems not to have as yet received. With him, on Slemish, in the county of Antrim, the saint suffered much, in the days of his captivity; and, near the mountain Mis, Milcho yet lived. St. Patrick must have given him offence, for becoming a fugitive slave; and, we are not enlightened, as to the hope of pardon from a former master, he seems to have entertained, and the still more sublime hope of converting that pagan chief to Christianity. But, the holy Apostle does not appear to have remained more than a few days<sup>54</sup> with Dichu. Leaving his bark on the sea-shore, and under care of that chief,<sup>55</sup> St. Patrick travelled inwards by land to seek his former master, Milcho,<sup>56</sup> who lived at a considerable distance. Our saint thus taking leave of Dichuo, who is said, by various old writers, to have been his first begotten in Christ, after having come to preach in Ireland; as he had purposed, Patrick journeyed through the lands of the Crutheni.<sup>57</sup> The saint hoped by his preaching, to subdue this man, likewise, to the sweet yoke of our Saviour.

<sup>47</sup> These are noted on the townland, so named, in the parish of Down, and barony of Upper Lecale. They are shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 38. The most minute and accurate description of the locality and of the penitential stations will be found, in the Rev. James O'Laverty's learned work, "An Historical Account of the Diocese of Down and Connor, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., pp. 248 to 253.

<sup>48</sup> During a visit, paid to Saul and to this place, in May, 1874, the writer had an opportunity for seeing those springs, some of which are roofed overhead, and they are used, also, for bathing purposes. Relations of many cures effected there are told by Catholics, living in the neighbourhood. Here, too, is shown the chair or bed of St. Patrick.

<sup>49</sup> In the Latin Tripartite, he is noticed as "Mantes nomine."

<sup>50</sup> From such narratives as these, we may accidentally alight on an interesting fact or inference. It seems probable, no glass was in the window mentioned: it must have been left open; for, it is not likely this wicked action could have been otherwise so readily perpetrated.

<sup>51</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xxxii., p. 23.

<sup>52</sup> It is compared to the punishment of Dathan and Abiron.

<sup>53</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxiii., p. 72, and "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xlviii., p. 124. Hence arose a common proverb, among the Irish: ní fíú a maoin mantei (Mantes not worthy of his wealth). It is remarkable, that this legend is not to be found in the Irish version of the Tripartite Life.

<sup>54</sup> Some of St. Patrick's Acts—such as the Second and the Fourth Lives—have "non multis diebus."

<sup>55</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xxxiv., and the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxix.

<sup>56</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxix., xxx., p. 14; "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxiv., p. 23; "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxiii., xxxiv., p. 39; "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxix., p. 49.

<sup>57</sup> Sometimes called Criú na Cruithne, or

The Crutheni,<sup>58</sup> or Cruithneach,—sometimes confounded by Colgan<sup>59</sup> with the Dal-Aradii<sup>60</sup> in general,—had settled in the northern parts of Ireland.<sup>61</sup> Those former people were Picts.<sup>62</sup> Although belonging to the same race, they must be distinguished, however, from the Picts of Northern Britain.<sup>63</sup> Ussher's opinion was, that those Crutheni possessed only the northern part of Dal-aradia,<sup>64</sup> or that tract, since called Clandeboy.<sup>65</sup> Dal-aradia<sup>66</sup> must not be confounded with the Dalriada region.<sup>67</sup> The former comprehended the South and South-East parts of Antrim County. Another writer thinks it included the greatest part—if not all—of Down County besides,<sup>68</sup> but, this is “Country of the Cruithne.” These are thought to have been so called, from the Irish word cruith, meaning “colour,” as the Latin writers called them Picti, or Pictores, from the artificial colouring of their bodies. To the Albanian Picts, the latter terms have been applied, by Irish and classic authors; the native term, Cruithne, is used, however, by purely Irish writers, to express both the Albanian and Irish Picts. We know not, if the latter were accustomed to paint their bodies, as were those in Scotland. The Irish Picts have been called, Y Gwydhyl Phichtiaid, by the Welsh writers.

<sup>58</sup> The Second Life has this account: “Cumque vellet ire et visitare praedictum hominem Miliuc,” * * * “relicta navi, coepit per terram iter dirigere ad regionem Cruthenorum, donec perveniret ad montem Miss.” See “Secunda Vita S. Patricii,” cap. xxx., p. 14. We find nearly the same words, in the Fourth Life. See “Quarta Vita S. Patricii,” cap. xxxiv., p. 39. The account, given by Probus, very nearly corresponds. See “Quinta Vita S. Patricii,” lib. i., cap. xxix., p. 49. Through an error of transcription, however, Egli appears, and not Mis, in this latter text. Egli is in the Connaught province. See “Quinta Vita S. Patricii,” n. 31, p. 63.

<sup>59</sup> See “Trias Thaumaturga.” The Second Life, n. 50, p. 19; the Third Life, n. 51, p. 32; the Fourth Life, n. 26, p. 49; the Fifth Life, n. 31, p. 63. In O’Flaherty’s marginal notes, to the copy of this work, in the Dublin Society’s Library, he follows Colgan.

<sup>60</sup> They were called after Fiacha Araidhe, a king of Ulster, who flourished A.D. 236. See “Annales Tigernaci,” p. 42. Dr. O’Conor’s “Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores,” toms ii.

<sup>61</sup> Among other northern tribes, converted by St. Patrick, those of the Cruithne and Dalnaraide are distinguishably mentioned, in the Third Life, cap. lvii., p. 25. Therefore, although the Crutheni lived in a part of Dal-Aradia, it is thought, by Dr. Lanigan, that they did not occupy the whole of it. There was a tribe, or a people, called Dal-aradians, supposed to have been quite distinct from them. Some of the Crutheni might, perhaps, have been found in other parts of Ulster. The Tripartite Life mentions a place, called Dun-cruthen, or the “Fort of the Cruithne,” and it apparently was in the district, now called Coleraine barony. See “Septima Vita S. Patricii,” lib. ii., cap. cxxv., p. 146, and n. 187, p. 181. The “Book of Lecan” states, that there was a place in Dal-Araidhe, called Δεσ να ν-ινγεσνν, or “Mount of the Maidens.” From this, the maidens, given by Heremon to the Cruithne, took their departure for Albain, fol. 141.

<sup>62</sup> The “Chronicon Pictorum,” published by Innes, makes allusion to the Picts of Ireland. See “Critical Essay,” vol. ii.

<sup>63</sup> As Bede tells us, some of the Picts touched at Ireland, before they occupied the northern parts of Great Britain. See “Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum,” lib. i., cap. i., p. 23.

<sup>64</sup> See “Primordia,” cap. xvii., pp. 1019, 1047.

<sup>65</sup> That district, alluded to by Ussher, is what has been denominated North Clandeboy. It was so called, as distinguished from South Clandeboy. This latter lay in the county of Down. It extended from Carrickfergus Bay, and from the River Lagan, westwards to Lough Neagh. It consequently contained the baronies of Belfast, of Massarene, and of Antrim. See Dubourdieu’s “Statistical Survey of Antrim,” chap. i., sect. i., p. 3.

<sup>66</sup> This extended, it is said, from Newry, to Sliabh Mis, now Slemish, in Antrim barony.

<sup>67</sup> This latter comprehended the North, North-West, and part of the South, in Antrim County. It has been called Reuta, likewise, and, by a corruption, “the Routs.” For a more particular description and historical notices of both territories, the reader is referred to Rev. William Reeves’ “Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore,” Appendix FF, Dalriada, and GG, Dalaradia, pp. 318 to 348.

<sup>68</sup> See Harris’ Ware, vol. i., “Archbishops of Armagh,” p. 8. Also, “Antiquities of Ireland,” p. 48, vol. ii.

<sup>69</sup> The Rev. Dr. Reeves supposes, that the more extensive application of name, as given in O’Flaherty’s “Ogygia,” pars. iii., cap. xviii., p. 190, must apply to Fiacha Araidhe’s descendants, rather than to Dalaradia, which as a territorial designation referred to a northern portion, now nearly very questionable.<sup>69</sup> According to a statement of Ussher,<sup>70</sup> Dalrieda stretched about thirty miles from Glenfinnaght—one of the Glynnnes in the eastern part of Antrim County—to the Bush River.<sup>71</sup>

In some accounts we read, that Milchuo was a man of very avaricious disposition, and desirous, on every occasion, to increase his wealth. Hence, we are told, that St. Patrick brought with him a quantity of gold, to please the dynast, who feared, that his efficacious preaching and gift of miracles should soften an obdurate heart, and withal Milchuo disdained to receive the doctrine of one, who in former times had been his slave. Thus, the force of human respect was added to a naturally cold, callous and pagan disposition; so that, the zealous labour and tender feelings of the holy missionary, for his old master, proved unavailing.<sup>72</sup> When Milchuo heard, that the Priest of the Most High was approaching, the wicked spirit urged him to a diabolical act. This child of perdition gathered together all his substance, his gold and silver, and cast them into the fire. Then throwing himself on the flames, he made himself an holocaust for the infernal demons.<sup>73</sup> In the townland of Killicarn,<sup>74</sup> and parish of Skerry, there is a large rath, under which are some beehived erections, constructed in a Cyclopean manner, and this is popularly believed to have been one of Milchuo's residences. The holy prelate, beholding from the neighbouring mountain of Mis<sup>75</sup> the deadly end of that wicked prince, saw his soul in the form of a fiery serpent plunged into hell. For two or three hours remaining silent, and contemplating the infinite depths of the judgments of God, with heavy tears and sighs, St. Patrick at length uttered these words:—"The posterity of this king, who, lest he should believe in the Creator of heaven, and earth, hath thus doubly damned himself, shall not inherit his kingdom, but shall be bound in servitude that never may be loosed." All this came to pass, according to the word of the man of God. For none of his race ascended after him, to the throne of his kingdom; but, in a short time, all his generation quickly perished, from the face of the earth, by the sword, or by famine, or in captivity, and in the lowest servitude. Thus, the Lord visits the sins of the fathers on their children; and, thus, the axe is applied to the tree of death, lest it should bring forth branches of iniquity.<sup>76</sup> However, there seems to be an inconsistency, in the Tripartite Life of our saint, in common with other Lives, relating this prediction. For, it makes Guasact,<sup>77</sup> afterwards a holy bishop at Granard,<sup>78</sup> the son of this conterminous with the modern diocese of Connor. The king of Dalaradia was excluded, from most of the present county of Down; while, the Irish Annals frequently represent Dalaradia, as a territory, independent of Ulidia.

<sup>70</sup> See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 1029.

<sup>71</sup> See the Rev. Mr. Dubourdieu's excellent work, "The Statistical Survey of the County of Antrim," chap. i., sect. i., p. 4. This writer extends the Routs—supposed to be the old Dalrieda—more to the west, or so far as the Bann River. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. iii., nn. 24, 25, pp. 217 to 219.

<sup>72</sup> "The Disbelief of Milcho" is elegantly versified, in Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 3 to 25.

<sup>73</sup> Yet it is more probable, that by some accident, this fire had broken out; if, indeed, we are to credit the account. Such a misfortune might have been attributed to Milchuo's discourtesy towards St. Patrick. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. iii., n. 26, p. 219.

<sup>74</sup> It is shown, in the barony of Lower Antrim, and on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 28, 29.

<sup>75</sup> The Tripartite states, that St. Patrick proceeded past the northward side of Sliabh-Mis, and that there was a cross, in the place where he stood, while beholding this conflagration.

<sup>76</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxvi., pp. 72, 73. "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. i., p. 125. See, also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," pp. 282, 283.

<sup>77</sup> His festival is observed, at the 24th of January.

<sup>78</sup> In Tirechan's list of St. Patrick's disciples, we find a Gosachus, who was, perhaps, the same person as Guasactus.

Milcho, and, it places two noble and virtuous sisters<sup>79</sup> of his, both virgins, and each one called Emeria,<sup>80</sup> in the nunnery of Clonbrone, near that town.<sup>81</sup> These are said to have received the grace of baptism; as the roses spring from thorns, so were they fairest of flowers, and from a parent stock the most repulsive.

Then, the saint returned southwards, unto the house of Dichu. There he abided for some days. By preaching the Christian faith, and by working signs and miracles, he profited many people in this part of Ulidia. Dichuo is said to have resided, in the plain of Inish,<sup>82</sup> whither St. Patrick returned. While he remained there preaching the Gospel, one of his chief converts is named Ross, or Rus,<sup>83</sup> son of Trichem. He lived in a town, called Derluss.<sup>84</sup> Afterwards, it was known as Inreathan,<sup>85</sup> and now distinguished by the modern denomination of Bright.<sup>86</sup> The Tripartite Life calls it Brettan.<sup>87</sup> This was a castle and a gentleman's seat, in Colgan's time.<sup>88</sup> It lay southwards, from Downpatrick, and there, Bishop Loarn<sup>89</sup> was buried.<sup>90</sup> It is stated, that Rus was very old, when St. Patrick came to visit him, and that he was warned, by the latter, in these words: "Why strive you for this life, which is passing away from you? for, all your senses are failing you: your eyes are becoming dimmed; your ears scarcely hear; your tongue hardly enables you to speak; the number of your teeth is diminished; while, all your limbs are weak. Should I now renew your youth, would you believe?" At once, Rus replied, "Whosoever should restore me to the flower of youth must compel me to believe in his miraculous power." Then, Patrick prayed, and Rus became a young man, handsome and robust. This chief not only believed himself, but three of his sons, and a great number of persons besides, received the grace of baptism. Whereupon, the Apostle said to him: "A choice is now given to thee; hadst thou rather live a long time, in this life, or go immediately to heaven?" Rus replied, "I desire to enter heaven, at once." Then, after receiving Holy Communion, he went to eternal rest.<sup>91</sup>

While St. Patrick remained in this part of the country, sowing the seed of evangelical doctrine, he became acquainted with a youth, named Mochua, or Mochoe;<sup>92</sup> and, by Divine inspiration, he knew this disciple should prove a chosen vessel of election. This holy youth was only a swineherd,<sup>93</sup> but, he

See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 951.

<sup>79</sup> Milchuo is said to have had a remarkable vision, indicating their future sanctity. See the Second Life, cap. xv., p. 12; the Sixth Life, cap. xiv., p. 67.

<sup>80</sup> These are venerated, on the 11th of December.

<sup>81</sup> Jocelyn has those two Emerias of Clonbrone, but he makes no mention of Guasact. See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxvi., p. 73. Also, "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. xxx., p. 133, and nn. 65, 66, p. 176. Ibid.

<sup>82</sup> The Second Life has "campum Inish ubi Dichu erat." See "Vita Secunda S. Patricii," cap. xxx., p. 14. The same name occurs in the Fourth Life. See, "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxvi., p. 39.

<sup>83</sup> The Third Life represents him as being "valde senex," at this time. Jocelyn says: "Erat prædicto Dichu germanus carne, Rus nomine."

<sup>84</sup> Durlas is translated "a strong fort," by Dr. O'Donovan. It is Anglicised, Thurles,

<sup>85</sup> This was an earthen rath, now probably occupied, by the old Anglo-Norman castle of Bright. See Rev. James O'Lavery's "Historical Account of the Diocese of Down and Connor, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., p. 148.

<sup>86</sup> This, the native parish of Rev. James O'Lavery, is very fully described, in the work previously quoted. See pp. 137 to 165.

<sup>87</sup> See the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. lii., p. 125.

<sup>88</sup> See ibid., nn. 1, 37, pp. 169, 172.

<sup>89</sup> His feast was kept, on the 11th of September. A curious legend is told regarding him.

<sup>90</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xxx., xxxi., p. 14.

<sup>91</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xxxiii., p. 23; the Fourth Life, cap. xxxvi., xxxvii., p. 39; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxix., xxx., p. 49; the Sixth Life, cap. xxxiv., xxxv., p. 72; the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. li., lii., p. 125.

<sup>92</sup> His feast occurs, at the 23rd of June.

<sup>93</sup> On this account, the church of Mahee, embraced willingly the Apostle's doctrine. The saint himself baptized Mochoe, and taught him his earliest lessons.<sup>94</sup> On this first occasion, and after his baptism, St. Patrick taught Mochoe,—or as Jocelyn calls him Mochua,—the alphabet.<sup>95</sup> This was perhaps the Roman alphabet, and for the purpose of his disciple learning Latin.<sup>96</sup> But, even in pagan times, besides the Ogham characters,<sup>97</sup> and various old inscriptions,<sup>98</sup> regarding which such a diversity of opinion prevails; the old Irish alphabet had been in existence, and it was called Bethluisnon.<sup>99</sup> This, probably not unlike in form, had quite a different construction from the Roman, and a smaller number of letters. The youth, as we are told, within the compass of one month, learned all the Psalter, and before the year came to an end, he attained a complete knowledge of the holy Scriptures. After some time, as St. Patrick passed by that place, Mochua repaired to him. While both talked of Divine matters, a pastoral staff, and sent from heaven, fell between them.<sup>100</sup> With great joy for that miraculous gift, Patrick turned towards Mochua, and said to him: "Know, my dearest child, that by this pastoral staff, you are designed to take upon yourself the charge of souls."<sup>101</sup> Therefore, although much against Mochoe's will, St. Patrick promoted him to Holy Orders. In fine, our saint installed Mochua as Bishop of Endruim.<sup>102</sup> This holy prelate did great good, in the Church of God, by means of his pure conversation, and singularly sublime doctrine. He ascended to the Omnipotent, being covered with the ornaments of rare virtues, and with the glory of many miracles.<sup>103</sup>

The Monarch Laogaire, to keep his subjects in awe, and in subjection, constrained all his subordinate princes, and great chiefs, to give him hostages, so as to ensure their loyalty. Among others, he had Dichu's sons held as pledges, for their father's fidelity. King Leogaire, who was wholly addicted of which Mochua was first pastor, afterwards sent the annual tribute of a swine, to the church of Downpatrick.

<sup>94</sup> The second Life of St. Patrick says "baptizavit eum ac totodidit, et dedit ei Evangelium, et Minister." See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxii., p. 14. Colgan interprets the Minister, to mean, either a Liturgical Book, or a Chrismal, in which holy oils are kept. See n. 56, p. 20. Ibid. The Tripartite, having mentioned the baptism, instruction in letters, and clerical tonsure, afterwards adds: "Reliquit discipulo vir Dei sacrum Evangeliorum codicem, cum aliis sacri ministerii utensilibus." See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. liii., p. 125. Hence, it would seem, the latter presents were some sort of sacred vessels.

<sup>95</sup> From the mention often made of St. Patrick having given alphabets to his Irish disciples, being unacquainted with the Irish language, and knowing little of Irish history, the Bollandists rashly concluded, that alphabetic writing was unknown in Ireland, until after the arrival of St. Patrick. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo, &c. Commentarius prævius, sect. i., num. 4, 5, 6, pp. 516, 517.

<sup>96</sup> The Bollandists' argument, denying to the Irish before St. Patrick's time the use of letters, is like that of an Arab, who, on being told, that the Europeans cannot read Arabic books, without being taught their letters, would thence conclude, that the Europeans had no letters of their own.

<sup>97</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. iii.

<sup>98</sup> Thus, Mr. Tighe has published an inscription in alphabetic characters, prior to the period of Christianity in Ireland, in his "Statistical Survey of the County of Kilkenny," part iii., sect. 19, p. 622.

<sup>99</sup> See Vallancey's "Collectanea de Rebus Hibernicis," vol. iv. A Vindication of the Ancient History of Ireland, chap. v.

<sup>100</sup> The Second Life inserts these Irish words: Isi sin inditchech Mochoe Noendroma, thus Latinized by Colgan: "Iste est volatilis S. Mochaii Dendromensis." See n. 57, p. 20.

<sup>101</sup> This was afterwards known, as the "flying staff," and it was preserved as a precious relic, in the church of Mahee.

<sup>102</sup> By some writers, this place has been confounded with Antrim; but, in reality, it was Island Mahee—called after this saint—and situated near the north-western shore of Strangford Lough. By an artificial causeway, that island, and only of late years, has been joined to the mainland.

<sup>103</sup> He died on the 23rd of June, A.D. 494 or 496. See O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 158 to 161. Also, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," n. 55, p. 20. Likewise, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxix. Ja-to superstition and idolatry, soon heard, that Dichu and all his family had been converted to the Christian Religion. The chief monarch thereupon fell into a great rage, and inveighed against Dichu, while commanding that his two sons, who were hostages, should be put to death. The monarch is said to have kept drink from them, that they might thus die of thirst. Knowing, by a Divine revelation, that most cruel command, Patrick informed Dichu about it, and advised him, to procure a delay of ten days, so that he might interview King Leogaire. This the monarch would not allow, but gave orders instead for the death of his hostages. St. Patrick had recourse to his wonted weapon of holy prayer. The night following, an Angel, coming into their presence, presented to the young nobles some strengthening liquor, that quenched their thirst. What is far more strange, it extinguished in them all appetite for drinking. Within a few days, that Angel came again, and released them, on account of St. Patrick's intercession.<sup>104</sup>

CHAPTER IX.

THE HOLY APOSTLE RESOLVES ON SETTING OUT FOR TARA—HIS JOURNEY THITHER—HE PROCEEDS TO SLANE—KING LAOGHAIRE AND HIS MAGICIANS—THE DRUIDS—THE FEIS OF TARA—ANTIQUARIAN REMAINS THERE—THE HYMN ATTRIBUTED TO ST. PATRICK, ON APPROACHING TARA—HE APPEARS BEFORE THE ASSEMBLY—HERCUS OR ERC DOES HONOUR TO THE SAINT—DUBTACH, THE CHIEF POET, BECOMES A CONVERT—ARTS OF THE MAGICIANS—HOW KING LAOGHAIRE RECEIVES THE TIDINGS OF SALVATION—THE SHAMROCK.

It is generally thought, that St. Patrick's Northern mission occupied the latter part of A.D. 432. When Easter approached the year following, he resolved on assisting at a great Festival or Convention, then held at Tara. Accordingly, he took leave of Dichu, and he left Ulidia. The holy man sailed southwards, with favouring winds, until he entered a harbour, called Colbdi,<sup>1</sup> now supposed to be identical with Colp, or Colpe,<sup>2</sup> near the embouchure of the River Boyne. Our antiquaries relate, that it obtained such a name from Colpta,<sup>3</sup> the son of Milesius. There, according to some accounts, leaving St. Luman, or Loman,<sup>4</sup> to keep watch over the vessel, St. Patrick hastened to the interior country, and on foot,<sup>5</sup> to preach the Gospel.<sup>6</sup> He appears to have nuarii, where occurs the Vita S. Gildæ Badonici, n. 13, p. 189.

<sup>104</sup> The Third Life states, they were only released, when St. Patrick came to Tara. See cap. xxxv., p. 24. See, likewise, "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxvii., xxxviii., p. 73. Also, "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. liii., p. 125, and Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 384.

CHAPTER IX.—<sup>1</sup> In the Second Life, cap. xxxiv., p. 15, the port's denomination is Colpdai. In the Fourth Life, cap. xxxix., p. 49, we read Inver-Colpoe. The Tripartite Life of St. Patrick has Inbher-Colptha, and again Inbhear-Boinne, or "mouth of the Boyne," as the landing-place. See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. liii., p. 125, and lib. ii., cap. i., p. 129.

<sup>2</sup> A parish, in the barony of Duleek, and county of Meath. See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. xxx., pp. 177, 178.

<sup>3</sup> He was the brother of Erimon and Eber, and he is said to have been drowned here, A.M. 3500.

<sup>4</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. lv., p. 125. His feast has been assigned, to the 11th of October.

<sup>5</sup> These words, "pedestri itinere," occur in the Second Life, cap. xxxiv., p. 15, and in the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxxiii., p. 50. These are better authorities, than the Third Life of St. Patrick, or the Sixth Life. Their writers make St. Patrick and his company travel in a chariot. See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxvi., p. 24, and "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxix., p. 73.

<sup>6</sup> According to some of St. Patrick's Acts, such as the Third Life (cap. xxxvi., p. 24), and the Sixth Life (cap. xxxix., pp. 73, 74), during this journey, the Apostle met St. Benignus and his family; but, other Acts place this event, previous to his arrival in the North, as we have already seen. This inversion may be owing, however, to some inadvertence, on the writer's part, or journeyed along the river, probably on the northern banks, and by those huge burial pyramids,<sup>7</sup> which were of historical notoriety in his time, although so much mystery, in reference to them, prevails in our days.<sup>8</sup> This excursion led him onwards, through the fertile and spacious plain of Breagh, to Ferta fer Feic,<sup>9</sup> the ancient name for Slane. There he pitched a tent.<sup>10</sup> At that time, the solemn feast of our Saviour's triumphant Resurrection approached. Saint Patrick had determined to celebrate it at Slane, and with great solemnity. He resolved, likewise, on preaching the Kingdom of Heaven, and on administering the sacrament of holy Baptism, to increase the number of the faithful. It is said, that the eve of Bealtine fell on Holy Saturday evening, that very year.<sup>11</sup> Now, it was the custom, established by the Magi and also by royal decree, in ancient Ireland, that each year,<sup>12</sup> or according to other accounts, every three years,<sup>13</sup> that a great fire-festival should be celebrated.<sup>14</sup> Among other ordinances, it was provided, that all fires must be extinguished, and none were to be lighted, until the Druids had first kindled their ritual fire, at Tara, with the usual formalities.<sup>15</sup> Unacquainted with, or rather we may suppose, despising this pagan usage,<sup>16</sup> St. Patrick resolved on celebrating the festival of Easter, before he proceeded further. All the Lives agree in stating, that the Paschal fire was lighted on the evening of that day,<sup>17</sup> when St. Patrick arrived at Slane. The holy man desired to celebrate this great Christian festival, and in a manner conformable to Church usages. The position was a commanding one, and hence the fire shone brightly, as viewed from the royal residence, on the Hill of Tara, and on that of a copyist. This order, too, seems contradicted, by the tenor of St. Patrick's journeyings.

<sup>7</sup> The most celebrated of these is Brugh na Boyne, or the Brugh on the River Boyne, near Stackallen bridge, county of Meath. The "Book of Lecan" states, that Daghdha Mor, i.e., "the great good Fire"—so called from his military ardour—and for eighty years King of Ireland, had three sons, Ænghus, Ædh and Cernad. These were all buried, at Brugh na Boyne, where the great mound, called Sidh-an-Bhrogha, was raised over them, as a monument. See fol. 279, p. b, col. 2. Some of those monuments, ascribed to the Tuatha-De-Danann colony, are yet to be seen at Drogheda, New Grange, Dowth and Knowth. For a curious account of the pagan cemeteries of Ireland, see Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland," part i., sect. iii., pp. 97 to 109.

<sup>8</sup> To Sir William R. Wilde's admirable work, "The Beauties of the Boyne, and its Tributary, the Blackwater," chap. viii., pp. 184 to 211, the reader is referred, for fuller particulars, in reference to those remains. Beautiful and accurate illustrations accompany the descriptions. In the "Leabhar na h-Huidhre," there is a history of the great pagan cemeteries of Erin, and an account of the various old books, from which this tract, and other pieces were compiled.

<sup>9</sup> This Irish denomination is rendered by Colgan, "fossæ, sive sepulchra virorum Feic;" and, these were so called, because the servant of a Dynast, named Feic, had dug deep trenches or moats there for the interment of slain bodies. See Second Life, cap. xxxiv., p. 15, and n. 60, p. 20.

<sup>10</sup> According to some writers. See the Fourth Life, cap. xxxix., p. 40, and the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxxiii., p. 50.

<sup>11</sup> The latest day, at present, on which Easter Sunday falls is the 26th of April. Bealtine was held on the 1st of May, according to different authorities, and this causes an apparent discrepancy in the narrative. See Patrick Kennedy's "Legendary Fictions of the Irish Celts," pp. 331, 332, and note.

<sup>12</sup> See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxxv., p. 50.

<sup>13</sup> According to Dr. Geoffrey Keating. See his "History of Ireland."

<sup>14</sup> The Second Life contains the following Irish words: Ísisin indaimsir sindam dorighnedhned feis Temradhi la Leogaire mac Neill et la firu Ereann, cap. xxxiv., p. 15. They are thus Latinized by Colgan: "Istud erat tempus et hora, qua celebrabantur encoenia Temoriana per Leogarium filium Neill, et per populos Hiberniæ."—Ibid., n. 61, p. 20.

<sup>15</sup> The Third Life calls this great solemnity the "Feis-Temrach." See cap. xxxvii. Jocelyn calls it, by the name "Rach." See Sixth Life, cap. xl., p. 74. Elsewhere, Colgan could not find such a festival, mentioned by Irish writers; however, he thinks Jocelyn confounds this Rach, with Cruach, in reference to the chief idol of the pagan Irish Crom Cruach. See n. 43, p. 100. By "encomia Temorenensia," Colgan means "nuptias Temorenenses."

<sup>16</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 14.

<sup>17</sup> Hence, Jocelyn was not wrong in saying, that his arrival took place on Holy

it was seen by many persons.<sup>18</sup> The remarkable burgh and buildings,<sup>19</sup> around Tara Hill, were full in view, likewise, to St. Patrick and his companions, who stood on the Hill of Slane, which rose immediately over the Boyne Water.

The celebrated Cormac Mac Airt, who reigned as Ard-Righ of Erin, in the third century,<sup>20</sup> was renowned for his munificence, learning, and valour.

Church at Tara Hill, County of Meath.

He is said to have erected many of the finest forts and houses, on the Hill of Tara ;<sup>21</sup> so that, in St. Patrick's time, from whatever side approached, it presented an imposing and a splendid appearance.<sup>22</sup> Now were the provincial kings, the higher chiefs, the bards, the ollamhs, and other representatives of classes, assembled in great force. Among the most influential persons present were the priests, state-councillors and judges of the pagan Irish, called Magi, or Diviners. It is probable, we should seek for their remote origin and superstitions, in the history and habits of the ancient Chaldeans, Medes, Persians, and other Eastern people.<sup>23</sup> Among these, their priests were called Mog, or Mag, while the Greeks and Latins have noticed them as Magi.<sup>24</sup> Sun-worship must have prevailed among them, as also among the Gentile Irish ;<sup>25</sup> and, fires were lighted, as a part of their religious

Saturday. See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xl., p. 74.

<sup>18</sup> See Second Life, cap. xxiv., p. 15.

<sup>19</sup> In November, 1837, appeared the "History and Antiquities of Tara Hill," by Doctor Petrie. To adopt the language of Doctor Stokes, in his genial and admirable Life of the author, this work "forms the key to all the reliable ancient history of the country."

<sup>20</sup> From A.D. 227 to 226, according to the Four Masters.

<sup>21</sup> Of the former structures, only traces of foundations and mounds now remain. These have been most ingeniously described, if not actually identified, with former historic erections, by Dr. Petrie.

<sup>22</sup> From a photograph, kindly lent by Miss Cullen, of Tara Hall, William F. Wakeman has drawn on the wood an eastern view of the church, at Tara. It was engraved by Mrs. Millard, and it serves for the accompanying illustration.

<sup>23</sup> An interesting account of their Magi, their Hierarchy, Rites and Religious Belief, as also of their old Books, Habits and Temples, will be found in Rev. Dr. Thomas Hyde's "Historia Religionis Veterum Persarum, eorumque Magorum," &c., cap. xxviii., xxix., xxx., xxxi., pp. 348 to 386.

<sup>24</sup> See ibid., cap. xxxi., pp. 372, 373.

<sup>25</sup> To this custom, St. Patrick himself ceremonial, at stated times. The moon, and most probably the stars, were also objects of veneration. Even the wind or air were held in awe, by the Pagan Irish.<sup>26</sup> Well-worship was likewise a prevalent superstition. Some, who adored water as a propitious element, considered fire as a bad one. We read, too, of Oriental contests, between worshippers of fire and of water.<sup>27</sup> Through the British Islands and through ancient Gaul, they were known from pre-historic times, the name Magi having been substituted for that of Druid.<sup>28</sup> Unquestionable evidence,<sup>29</sup> taken from Greek and Latin classical writers,<sup>30</sup> assures us, that the Celtic Druids were imbued with a knowledge of letters,<sup>31</sup> and that they entertained some enlightened ideas, regarding a Supreme Being and the soul's immortality.<sup>32</sup> In many particulars, relating to power and jurisdiction, as also in the use of writing, the Irish differed from the Gaulish and British Druids.<sup>33</sup> This name, Druidheadh, is used only by the modern Gael, to signify a wizard or magician.<sup>34</sup> Among the Irish, at least, the Druids are supposed to have had a regulated hierarchy, from the Arch-Druid to inferior classes of Priests.<sup>35</sup> The belief, peculiar rites, ceremonies and social state of the Druids—especially in Ireland—has furnished a curious subject for speculation, to many of our native writers. Thus, Toland, Wood,<sup>36</sup> D'Alton,<sup>37</sup> and others, have sought to unveil their mysteries; yet, it must be confessed, much remains still to be known, regarding them. It has been supposed,<sup>38</sup> they preserved the ancient patriarchal religion, derived from Abraham, with little or no idolatry. According to others, however, they were very gross idolaters;<sup>39</sup> and, proof of this seems to be furnished, in the rude monuments and records, that are connected with Irish seems to allude, in his Confessions, when he says, "Sol iste, quem videmus, illo jubente, propter nos quotidie oritur: sed nunquam regnabit, neque permanebit splendor ejus; sed et omnes, qui adorant eum, in pœnam miseri malè devenient."—Cap. v., num. 24, p. 209. Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c.

<sup>26</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xvi.

<sup>27</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. v., n. 43, pp. 226, 227.

<sup>28</sup> In connexion with this subject, an interesting tract has been lately published by Henri Gaidoz: "Esquisse de la Religion des Gaulois avec un Appendice sur le Dieu Encina." It first appeared in "Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses," tome v. It has been separately re-issued at Paris, 1879, in 8vo. The "Revue Celtique," and that highly interesting folk-lore periodical, "Mélusine," edited by the same writer, have very curious notices of old Celtic mythology.

<sup>29</sup> See the learned Anthony Wood's First Dissertation, in "Historia et Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis," vol. i., pp. 1 to 3. Oxonii, 1674, fol.

<sup>30</sup> Especially from Cæsar, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela and Ammianus Marcellinus.

<sup>31</sup> See Cæsar, "De Bello Gallico," lib. vi.

<sup>32</sup> The poet Lucan has such an allusion, when referring to the Druidic rites and belief:—

"Nemora alta remotis
Incolitis lucis; vobis auctoribus umbræ
Non tacitas Erebi sedes, Ditisque profundi Pallida regna petunt; regit idem spiritus artus
Orbe alio. Longæ, canitis si cognita, vitæ, Mors media est."

—In "Bello Pharsaliæ," lib. i., ll. 453 to 458.

<sup>33</sup> See Rev. Henry Rowland's "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," sect. ix., pp. 107, 108. Dublin Ed., 1723. 4to.

<sup>34</sup> See Daniel Wilson's "Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," part ii., chap. viii., p. 345.

<sup>35</sup> See John Toland's "Critical History of the Celtic Religion and Learning: containing an account of the Druids; or the Priests and Judges, of the Voids, or the Diviners or Physicians; and of the Bards, or the Poets and Heralds; of the Ancient Gauls, Britons, Irish and Scots." Letter I., sect. iii., p. 49. Edinburgh, 1815. 8vo.

<sup>36</sup> See Wood's "Inquiry concerning the Primitive Inhabitants of Ireland," pp. 159 to 180. Cork. 8vo, 1821.

<sup>37</sup> See John D'Alton's "Essay on the Ancient History, Religion, Learning, Arts and Government of Ireland," in "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xvi., part i. Period the First, sect. iii., pp. 79 to 95.

<sup>38</sup> By Dr. Stukeley.

history and archæology. The name of Beallinne, applied to the first of May,<sup>40</sup> with many similar etymologies, and traditional accounts,<sup>41</sup> sufficiently demonstrate, that in the time of heathenism, fire was a chief object of some mysterious worship in Ireland. Again, it must be observed, we have little evidence, from Celtic tradition, to preserve a distinction between the pantheistic creed of the Arian races, and the spells or superstitions of Allophylian aborigines.<sup>42</sup> However, the Magi were the Celtic priests, in Wales and Ireland, before the introduction of Christianity.<sup>43</sup> Their institutions and rites are thought to have prevailed, earlier in Ireland, than in Britain and on the Continent, where their system was distinguished as Druidism; and, it seems probable, that after its extinction here, the terms, Druids and Druidism, recoiled upon our island.<sup>44</sup> The system was not known in Germany.<sup>45</sup> In these islands, we are informed, that the Island of Anglesey was a chief seat of their mysteries; and, many curious monuments, illustrative of their usages, have been there discovered.<sup>46</sup> Our Irish Pagan ancestors believed in the existence of a sort of genii, or fairies, called Sidhe; <sup>47</sup> nor has this popular superstition altogether died out, even in the present century. These spirits were supposed to inhabit pleasant raths, hills, and romantic places.<sup>48</sup>

The strange and forbidden fire, lighted on the Hill of Slane, was a subject for astonishment to all who beheld it. In full court, and surrounded by his notables, at Tara, the Monarch Laoghaire enquired, and with extreme vehemence, about this man, who had dared to violate their old and honoured custom, and who had presumed to introduce such an innovation.<sup>49</sup> The Druids or enchanters are said to have practised the art of pseudo-prophecy,<sup>50</sup> and they told him, if that fire, which the stranger had lighted, were not put out,

<sup>39</sup> See the "London Magazine," October, 1751, p. 464.

<sup>40</sup> See General Vallancey's "Vindication of the Ancient History of Ireland," p. 394.

<sup>41</sup> See "Irish Folk-Lore," By Lagenisus, chap. xxiii., pp. 182 to 197.

<sup>42</sup> See Daniel Wilson's "Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," part ii., chap. viii., p. 345.

<sup>43</sup> See Mr. James Ferguson's beautifully-illustrated work, "Rude Stone Monuments in all Countries, their Age, and Uses." Introductory chapter, pp. 5, 6.

<sup>44</sup> See Campbell's "Strictures on the Ecclesiastical and Literary History of Ireland," p. 67.

<sup>45</sup> See Cæsar, "De Bello Gallico," lib. vi.

<sup>46</sup> See Rev. Henry Rowland's "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," sect. viii., ix., pp. 53 to 112.

<sup>47</sup> See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xlviii., p. 25.

<sup>48</sup> Roderick O'Flaherty observes, that the old Irish knew of no such beings as Jupiter, or other gods, worshipped by the ancient Romans. He concludes thus: "Unde colligendum Hibernorum numina fuisse deos Topicos, sc. montanos, campestris, fluviales, aequoreos, et id genus alios locorum genios." See his "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xxii., pp. 199 to 201.

<sup>49</sup> These incidents are thus alluded to in Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of St.

Patrick," in the opening to his poem, "Saint Patrick at Tara," p. 26:—

"The King is wroth with a greater wrath
Than the wrath of Nial or the wrath of Conn!

From his heart to his brow the blood makes path,
And hangs there, a red cloud, beneath his crown.

"Is there any who knows not, from south to north,
That Laeghaire to-morrow his birthday keeps?

No fire may be lit upon hill or hearth
Till the king's strong fire in its kingly mirth
Up rushes from Tara's palace steep!

"Yet Patrick has lighted his Paschal fire
At Slane—it is Holy Saturday—
And bless'd his font 'mid the chanting choir!

From hill to hill the flame makes way.
While the king looks on it his eyes with ire
Flash red, like Mars, under tresses grey."

<sup>50</sup> Dr. Lanigan does not think, that they were endowed with any sort of prophetic gift, any more than the Jews, when they said of our Saviour: "If we let him alone in this on that night, Patrick and his successors should hold sovereign power, not only over the "City of Kings," but, even over all Hibernia.<sup>51</sup> It is probable, those magicians had only the natural foresight to anticipate St. Patrick's final success, unless they energetically opposed this his first intrepid proceeding.<sup>52</sup> Their prophecy—if as such we can regard it—has been fully verified, in the spiritual light, which from that hour to this day, has burned on through so many vicissitudes of Ireland's history. The appearance and mission of our saint, at Tara, being the supreme effort of his life, so the accounts left to us, regarding them, have been overcrowded with popular fables, and these have even been confused in the records which remain. It was resolved, that signal vengeance be executed, on the transgressors of the law. Wherefore, the king, being greatly incensed, hastened with all expedition to quench St. Patrick's Paschal Fire, and he is said to have taken with him a number of chiefs, guards and Magi, when setting out for Slane. Horses and chariots were prepared for this expedition.<sup>53</sup> One account has it, that his retinue consisted of thrice nine, that is twenty-seven chariots.<sup>54</sup> His Magicians<sup>55</sup> had asserted, that number was fortunate, and prosperous. These Magi had proposed to dispute with the saint. At sight of all the chariots coming, the holy man sung that verse of the Psalm: "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will call upon the name of the Lord our God."<sup>56</sup> When the king came near to the place, Fearta da Feic,<sup>57</sup> where Patrick had kindled his fire, the Magi, through advice given, prevented their monarch from honouring the saint, by approaching him, as if it would be a humiliating acknowledgment of supremacy or reverence. Therefore, he sent messengers to the saint, and commanded him to make his appearance, before the royal presence. His Divine office being ended, the saint came. But, none of the courtiers, as the king had commanded, exhibited any reverence or honour, by rising up to salute St. Patrick, on his approach, except one Hercus, or Herc,<sup>58</sup> son of Dego. He rose, and saluted the saint, in a very marked manner.<sup>59</sup> The saint gave him his benediction, and promised him life everlasting. He also lived, it is said, to the ninetyeth year of his age, and died, A.D. 512,<sup>60</sup> or, as some state, A.D. 514.<sup>61</sup> manner, all will believe in him; and the Romans will come and take away our place and nation." (John xi., 48.)

<sup>51</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xxxiv., p. 15, the Third Life, cap. xxxvii., p. 24, the Fourth Life, cap. xl., p. 40, the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xxxv., p. 50, the Sixth Life, cap. xl., p. 74, and the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. lv., p. 125. See, also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," pp. 379, 380, 385.

<sup>52</sup> According to Probus, the Magi predicted regarding this fire: "nisi extinctus fuerit hac nocte, non extinguetur in æternum: insuper et omnes ignes nostrae consuetudinis superexcelleret: et ille, qui incendit eum, regnum tuum dissipabit."—"Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxxv., p. 50. The other Lives substantially agree.

<sup>53</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life states, that the king came "in fine noctis," to Slane, or Ferta-fer-Feic. See Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. lvi., p. 126. The Irish Life, as published by Miss Cusack, has a like statement. See p. 385.

<sup>54</sup> According to Jocelyn.

<sup>55</sup> Among these, Lochu or Lochru and Lucamael are named, as chiefly advising the monarch. They are represented, as uttering blasphemies against God.

<sup>56</sup> Psalm xix., 9.

<sup>57</sup> The Abbate D. Giacomo Certani adds, "ed è non molto distante a Temoria all' ora Città Reale," and then very incorretly follows, "e Metropoli della Conacia."—"Il Mosè dell' Ibernica, Vita del glorioso S. Patrizio, Canonico Regolare Lateranense, Apostolo, e Primate dell' Ibernica," Libro Quinto, p. 159.

<sup>58</sup> He died, on the 2nd of November, which is the date for his festival.

<sup>59</sup> A certain writer, called Anselm, who has recorded the Acts of a St. Fingar or Guignar, relates, that this holy man was converted by St. Patrick, on Holy Saturday. He is said to have been son to a certain King, Clito. It is related of him, that he, too, stood up to honour St. Patrick. Yet, the Acts of our national Apostle do not mention such a circumstance. St. Fingar and his martyr companions are venerated, at the 23rd of February.

<sup>60</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 166 to 169, and nn. (h, i, k, l.) Ibid.

This holy man received the grace of regeneration, and he led a life, conspicuous both for miracles and virtues. Afterwards, he became the first bishop, in the city of Slane. He departed to a better life, in the same city, of which he is the recognised patron. The legends of St. Patrick's Acts then give some wonderful accounts of Luchru's opposition,<sup>62</sup> and of a challenge to a contest, in which the Irish Apostle proved victorious.<sup>63</sup> The Lord magnified his servant, by sending earthquakes, lightning and thunder, to scatter the hosts of his enemies. The monarch, his queen, and others, who were in their train, felt terrified at those portents. Then, the queen,<sup>64</sup> falling prostrate before the saint, undertook on behalf of her husband, that he should yet adore the true Lord of all, and submit to the saint's directions. Patrick then praying to Almighty God, the vehement storm ceased, no further was life sacrificed, and the sky became serene. The king came, too, as the queen had promised, but covering, with the veil of a feigned humility, the obstinate malice of his heart. In show and outward adoration only, he acknowledged the sovereign majesty of God. He bent the knee, and there entreated Saint Patrick, that he would be pleased to come to his court, while Laoighaire promised, that for the future, he should be wholly directed and governed by the saint. Whereupon, the holy man condescended, to accept this invitation, although he was not ignorant of the king's deep and wicked dissimulation; for, the spirit of a Divine Revelation burned, within the soul of our Apostle. Notwithstanding, the deceitful king, being obdurate in his malice, took an apparently kind farewell of Patrick.<sup>65</sup> However, the monarch beset all the way, whereby the saint was to pass, so that he might be assassinated. With armed chariots, Laoighaire blocked up every passage <sup>61</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 1047, as also his "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. DXIV. If this account be true, according to Dr. Lanigan's computation, it will follow, that Herc could only have been about nine years old, at that time.

<sup>62</sup> The account of St. Patrick's contest with the Druids, at Tara, is related in Patrick Kennedy's "Legendary Fictions of the Irish Celts," pp. 322 to 325.

<sup>63</sup> Lochu is said to have attempted a flight into the air, after the example of Simeon Magus, to have fallen down to the ground, and to have broken his neck. Then, the king, attributing this calamity to St. Patrick's malediction, ordered his satellites to kill the holy man. The mangled remains of the magician who was named Lochu, in that part of the country, thus lay at the feet of St. Patrick. It is stated, that he was projected to earth, by a ball of snow, after the saint had prayed aloud, in presence of all the people. Anticipating their desperate intention, St. Patrick in a clear voice began to sing that verse of the psalm: "Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered, and let them that hate him fly from before his face." (Psalms lxvii. 1.) Then, the Lord, the protector of his chosen ones in the time of need, saved from this angry multitude his faithful servant. Thus, as was said by the Prophet: "The Lord shot forth his arrows, and he scattered them; he multiplied lightnings, and troubled them." Psalms xvii. 15. For, he sent among them, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, the spirit of giddi-ness; and he set the idolater to war against the idolater, like the Egyptians against the Egyptians. Each man rushed on his fellow, and brother fought against brother, while the chariots and their riders were cast to the ground and overturned. Several men were slain, and hardly did the rest escape with life, to a neighbouring hill, called Moduirm. On William Larkin's fine map of the County of Meath, published in 1812, the hills about Slane are very finely delineated; but, no such name for any hill there occurs. The old Celtic names, for the most part, have merged into modern English denominations. The Latin Tripartite Life states, that fifty of King Leoghaire's retinue came only half-alive to the mountain of Modhairn, and Briggraidbe, in the territory of Carbrie, while the rest were scattered in various directions, three only excepted, King Leogaire, his queen, and one of his courtiers. See Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. lviii., p. 126.

<sup>64</sup> In St. Patrick's published Acts, her name is not given, except in the Latin Tripartite Life, which alone calls this queen Angusa, the daughter of Tessach, son to Liethen. See lib. i., cap. lviii., p. 126. The Irish version does not at all name her.

<sup>65</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life states, that the king went to Tara, in sorrow and shame, by twilight, a few persons only escaping in his company. In the Latin and Irish Tripartite Lives, St. Benen, or Benignus, is said to have carried the polaire (satchel or epistolary) of sacred books, on his back. According to the Irish Life, Benan is called a and river ford. With nine chariots, and wicked men in them, each spot was guarded, to the end, that if the saint escaped one passage, he should be entrapped in another. But, the malice of man cannot prevail against the goodness of God, who conducted his true servant, with eight more attendants,<sup>66</sup> and the holy youth Benignus, in an invisible manner, and through the midst of their blood-thirsty enemies, to Tara, where the king kept his chief court. At the various places of ambush, the eyes of those plotters were bound, so that they could not behold the holy travellers. But, to their sight appeared eight stags, with one hind, passing over the mountains; and, thus, the Lord being his protector, did the saint and his companions escape the contrivers of, and the means for, their destruction.<sup>67</sup>

On the following day, which was Easter Sunday, the great Fes was solemnized by a public banquet, held in the Royal Hall, on the Hill of Tara.<sup>68</sup> The advent of St. Patrick in Ireland, and the late events at Slane, were then a subject for general wonder and comment. An invitation had been extended, that he should present himself, before the magnates of the land, at their great assembly.<sup>69</sup> Nothing could be more sublime, than the dignified and solemn entrance of St. Patrick, into the king's presence, at the Palace of Tara. Preceded by the crucifix, and accompanied by his clergy, the holy man advanced like a prophet,<sup>70</sup> and when he arrived, all assembled there gazed upon himself and upon his companions, with feelings of admiration and reverence. The palace gates flew open as he approached.<sup>71</sup> It is said, that as St. Patrick journeyed forward to Tara, on this occasion, he composed that celebrated Hymn,<sup>72</sup> in the Irish language, known as the Feth-Fiadha,<sup>73</sup> and which was gilla, and he was clothed with a dicheltair, or garment of invisibility. Nothing of this occurs, in the Latin Life.

<sup>66</sup> The Second Life has seven.

<sup>67</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxv., xxxvi., xxxvii., p. 15; "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxviii., xxxix., xl., p. 24; "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xli., xlii., xliii., p. 40; "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xxxvii., xxxviii., xxxix., xl., pp. 50, 51; "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xl., xli., xlii., xliii., xlv., pp. 74, 75; "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. lvi., lvii., lviii., lix., lx., p. 126. Also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," pp. 385 to 387.

<sup>68</sup> According to the Scholiast on St. Fiech's Hymn, this place, Latinized, Temoria, had its name, Tea-mhur, or Teæ-Murus, because Tea, the wife of King Eremon, son to the Spaniard Milesius, had been there interred. See First Life, stanza 10, p. 2, and n. 17<sup>r</sup>, p. 5.

<sup>69</sup> See Rev. E. J. J. Stenson's "Panegyric of St. Patrick," p. 15. Almonte, 1875. 12mo.

<sup>70</sup> See Archdeacon Hamilton's "Summary of the Life of St. Patrick," p. 6, to his edition of the Confession.

<sup>71</sup> The most minute notices we find, regarding the turs—mentioned by Ptolemy in his account of Ireland—and the other houses and forts at Tara, are to be found in Dr. Petrie's "History of Tara Hill." Dr. Jeffrey Keating, in his "History of Ireland," and under the reign of Tuathal Teachtmhar, from A.D. 79 to 109, describes the order and celebration of the Tara Fes. See, also, Eugene O'Curry's Lectures "On the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish," edited by Dr. W. K. Sullivan, vol. ii., lect. ii., pp. 12 to 20. Also "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xiv. O'Flaherty's "Isles of Arran," pp. 105, 106.

<sup>72</sup> In the "History of Tara Hill," Dr. Petrie printed the celebrated Hymn of St. Patrick, with a translation and notes by John O'Donovan. Since then, it has been re-translated from different versions, by Whitley Stokes, the late Dr. Todd, and J. O'Beirne Crow. Miss Cusack has printed this Hymn, in the body of her "Life of St. Patrick," with valuable annotations.

<sup>73</sup> Here do we insert an English translation of this sublime Hymn, which, by some has been Latinized, "Lorica Patricii :"—

"There has come to me to-day, powerful strength, the invocation of the Trinity.

"I invoke the mighty power of the Trinity, I believe in the Trinity, under the unity of the God of the Elements.

"At Tara, to-day, I place between me and harm, the virtue of the birth of Christ with his Baptism; the virtue of His Crucifixion, with His Burial; the virtue of His Resurrection, with His Ascension; the virtue of the coming to the Eternal Judgment.

"At Tara, to-day, the virtue of the love of the Seraphim, the obedience of the angels, the hope of the resurrection to eternal reward, the prayers of the noble fathers, the afterwards held in such great veneration among our people.<sup>74</sup> The Monarch Laoighaire had desired, that his chiefs and familiars should manifest nothing of courteous respect to the distinguished stranger. Wherefore, as our saint entered the king's palace, none showed him any honour, or reverence, excepting the king's chief Poet.<sup>75</sup> In some accounts, he is merely called a Poet ;<sup>76</sup> in others, he is distinguished as Arch-Poet.<sup>77</sup> With great submission, this distinguished "son of song," Dubtach,<sup>78</sup> saluted him. This action was reputed in him to justice. He asked to become a Christian, and he received the grace of baptism. After his call to the true faith, Dubtach's talents were entirely given, to diffuse Christian truths and virtues. Some of his writings were said to be extant in the seventeenth century ; and, Colgan says, that divers Tracts of Dubthach were even in his own keeping.<sup>79</sup> Instead of displaying his varied powers in praising false gods, the Arch-Poet, thenceforward, only celebrated the greatness and mercies of the one true God.<sup>80</sup>

At this time, the king was seated at a royal banquet, and he invited St. Patrick, with great dissimulation, to partake of meat and drink. Luch Mael, or Lugach Mael, the Magician, grieving for the death of his friend Luchra, is said to have presented a poisoned cup to the newly-arrived guest. However, owing to the Divine protection, the contents in no measure injured St. Patrick. To the great astonishment of all the assembled guests, after blessing it, he drank out of that vessel, and the poison was miraculously removed from the liquid therein contained. After the banquet was over, our saint and all who were present adjourned to the open plain. There, the Magician, Luca-mael, challenged the Apostle, to a trial of their respective powers. These predictions of the Prophets, the preaching of the Apostles, the faith of the Confessors, the purity of the holy Virgin, the deeds of just men.

"At Tara, to-day, the strength of heaven, the light of the sun, the whiteness of the snow, the face of fire, the rapidity of lightning, the swiftness of the wind, the depth of the sea, the stability of the earth, the hardness of rocks.

"At Tara, to-day, may the strength of God pilot me ! may the power of God preserve me ! may the wisdom of God instruct me ! may the eye of God behold me ! may the ear of God hear me ! may the word of God make me eloquent ! may the Hand of God protect me ! may the Way of God direct me ! may the Shield of God defend me ! may the Heart of God guard me against the snares of demons, the temptations of vices, the inclinations of the mind, against every man who meditates evil towards me, far or nigh, alone or with others.

"I place all these powers between me and every evil, unmerciful powers directed against my soul and body, as a protection against the incantations of false prophets, against the black laws of Gentilism, against the false laws of heresy, against the treachery of idolatry, against the spells of witches and Druids, against every knowledge which blinds the soul of man. May Christ protect me this day against poison, against burning, against drowning, against wounding, until I merit a great reward.

"Christ be with me, Christ before me, Christ after me, Christ in me, Christ under me, Christ over me, Christ at my right hand, Christ on my left, Christ at this side, Christ at that side, Christ at my back. May Christ be in the heart of each person to whom I may speak, Christ in the mouth of each person who speaks to me, Christ in each eye which sees me, Christ in each ear which hears me."

<sup>74</sup> See the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. lx., p. 126. The recital of this Hymn was supposed to prove a spiritual antidote, against all evils, both of mind and body.

<sup>75</sup> On such a foundation, Harris formed his epithet of "poet laureat." See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 14.

<sup>76</sup> Jocelyn calls him "Poeta Regis." See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xlv., p. 74.

<sup>77</sup> See "Prima Vita S. Patricii," n. 1, p. 4, where Fiech's Scholiast calls Dubtach the Arch-poet, or a chief among the Irish poets, or bards. The Tripartite Life makes him the arch-poet of the king and of the kingdom. See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xli., p. 126.

<sup>78</sup> Fiach, the son of Erc, was a pupil to this Dubtach ; and, that celebrated disciple afterwards became Bishop of Sletty, near the banks of the Barrow, in the Queen's County.

<sup>79</sup> See the Commentator on St. Patrick's First Life, n. 5, p. 8.

<sup>80</sup> See Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. ii., cap. i., p. 2.

efforts on the part of the Magician and of the saint are related, with varied colourings of fancy; but, they are of too legendary a complexion, to deserve serious attention.<sup>81</sup> It is stated, that the monarch wished the saint and the Magician, to put their respective books into water. Should the book of one or of the other be saved from injury or obliteration, his doctrine was adjudged to be the right code of belief. This proposal pleased St. Patrick, but not the Magician, who said the Christian missionary worshipped the watery element as God, because he baptized with it. Then, the king proposed a trial of the books by fire. The book saved from it, was to determine the excellence of its teaching. To this the Magus objected once more, for he said Patrick by turns worshipped fire and water, and that either element should prove propitious for him. St. Patrick then declared, that he adored no element, but only the Creator of all the elements. A different kind of trial was then proposed, to which the Magus assented; but, this resulted in his own most miserable death.<sup>82</sup> Notwithstanding, King Leogaire relented not in his wicked malice, but rather was his heart hardened like unto that of Pharaoh. To revenge the Magician's death, he contrived, it is said, by all means possible, to effect the saint's utter destruction. He found many of his subjects willing and prompt, to execute this bloody purpose. But, Almighty God, the powerful protector of his servant, manifested his miraculous power; for, the earth, gaping horribly, swallowed those officers and the mob. Many citizens of Tara had a hand, in prosecuting that wicked and treacherous design.<sup>83</sup> This severe chastisement struck such a terror into their minds, that fearing to incur

<sup>81</sup> We are told, in St. Patrick's Acts, that the Magician, fearing to be overcome by our patron's supposed spells, caused a fantastic snow to fall over all the adjoining country. In like manner, it is related, that by force of his magic charms, he overcast all the land with a palpable darkness. But, neither the one nor other portent was he able to remove, as he publicly confessed. Then, Saint Patrick, the child of light, offering his devout prayers to the Son of Justice, chased away both the snow and the impenetrable darkness. The people of that region, who had sat so long in darkness, now seeing this great light, prayed to the true God. They likewise magnified his holy servant, St. Patrick, while they felt a detestation for the delusive efforts of the Magus.

<sup>82</sup> According to an appointment of all the company for St. Patrick and the Magician, a new and temporary house was built, after a strange manner. One half was constructed of green oak, and the other of dry and withered timber. Then binding St. Benignus and the Magician, they placed both in the house, one of them opposite the other. St. Benignus, attired in the Magician's apparel, was placed in that part, made of dry wood, and the Magician, with St. Patrick's vestment, was placed in a part, that was built of the green wood. This being done, fire was set to the house. A strange and an unheard-of event took place; for, the fire burnt the Magician and the green part of the house, even to ashes; while, it left, not so much as the least sign of scorching on St.

Patrick's garment. But, the holy youth Benignus was not touched by the flames, nor did he receive any harm from them, while the Magician's garment was consumed into ashes. This was regarded, as a repetition of the miracle, relating to the three children in the Babylonian furnace, and which is registered by Daniel, in his book of Prophecies. So winds up the account; and, it is greatly to be suspected, the whole of this romantic story only depends on some wild popular tradition, framed on the incidents just alluded to, as found in the Old Testament.

<sup>83</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life has an account of three noble young hostages, then detained at Tara. These were favourably impressed with the saint and his mission. He consoled those noble youths, by predicting, that they should respectively become the ancestors of St. Columkille, venerated on the 9th of June; St. Comgell, venerated on the 10th of May; and St. Finian, on the 23rd of February, or on the 12th of November. Hence, Colgan infers, the hostages must have been—firstly, Fergus; secondly, Enoch, or perhaps Sedna; and, thirdly, perhaps, Finlug, the grandfather of St. Finian of Clonard. Colgan thinks this story may have been an interpolation, in the published Tripartite, the original copy of which he deems referable to the sixth century. See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 43, p. 172. It is remarkable, that the foregoing account is omitted, from the Irish copy, as published by Miss Cusack.

<sup>84</sup> Thus is it expressed, in Aubrey de

a like danger, all the people of the country thereabout became Christians. They then received the grace of baptism. It is said, the unbelieving king simply tolerated St. Patrick, in announcing Christianity to his subjects.<sup>84</sup> Some accounts have it, that the Monarch Leogaire continued an obstinate Pagan,<sup>85</sup> to the end of his days. Other writers state, that he was converted to Christianity,<sup>86</sup> by St. Patrick.<sup>87</sup> Miracles are said to have been wrought by the latter, on this occasion,<sup>88</sup> and these had a salutary effect, if not on the dispositions of King Leoghaire, at least on the minds of the queen,<sup>89</sup> and of many, who were then in Tara and its neighbourhood.<sup>90</sup> The Apostle then predicted, according to some writers, that since Leoghaire had professed his belief in God, and had submitted to Patrick, that he should have a lengthened reign; yet, because of his previous dissimulation and disobedience, no king or roydamhna of his race, save Lughaidh, then in the womb of Queen

Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick," in the Poem "St. Patrick at Tara," pp. 29, 30 :—

"Yet the King believed not ; but ordinance gave That whoso would might believe that word ;
So the meek believed, and the wise, and brave,
And Mary's Son as their God adored.
And the Druids, because they could answer nought, Bow'd down to the Faith the stranger brought.
That day upon Erin God pour'd his spirit—
Yet none like the chief of the Bards had merit, Dubtach ! — He rose and believed the first,
Ere the great light yet on the rest had burst."

<sup>85</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xlii., pp. 14, 15 ; the Sixth Life, cap. xlix., pp. 75, 76.

<sup>86</sup> See, on the present subject, that very curious, but romantic and fabulous tract, known as Siabur-Charpat Con Cuilaind, or "The Demoniac Chariot of Cu Chulaind," from the Lebor na h-Uidre, translated and edited by J. O'Beirne Crowe, A.B., for "The Journal of the Royal Historical and Archæological Association of Ireland," vol. i., part ii. Fourth Series. January, 1871, pp. 371 to 448.

<sup>87</sup> See the Second Life, cap. xli., p. 16 ; the Fourth Life, cap. xlix., p. 41 ; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xlvii., p. 51 ; the Seventh Life, lib. i., cap. lxviii., p. 128. However, the sincerity of this conversion has been questioned, since Loeghaire is reported as having exclaimed : "It is better for me to believe than to die." The Tripartite Life tells us, his father Niall had enjoined on him, never to embrace the Faith of Christ, and that he should always adhere to the gods of his ancestors. See lib. ii., cap. viii., p. 130.

<sup>88</sup> By a test, the king tried our saint's novel doctrine of forgiving injuries, according to a Tract found in the "Leabhar na H-Uidhri," p. 117. It begins : Comtoit Léogairi co chréim acap a d'veto do péit in tsel ro. It is thus translated, "The conversion of Loegaire to Christianity and his death are told in this story." See, also, "Description," p. xxii., in the published copy.

<sup>89</sup> The Third Life states, that she was converted to the Christian Faith. She embraced the Christian Religion, and received baptism at the saint's hands, according to Jocelyn. She ended her days happily, as some state ; but, we have hardly anything authentic, on this subject.

<sup>90</sup> See "Secunda Vita S. Patricii," cap. xxxviii., xxxix., xl., xli., pp. 15, 16 ; "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xl., xli., xlii., pp. 24, 25 ; "Quarta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xlv., xlv., xlv., xlvii., xlviii., xlix., pp. 40, 41 ; "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xli., xlii., xliii., xlv., xlv., xlv., p. 51 ; "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xlv., xlvii., xlviii., xlix., pp. 75, 76. Also, "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. lxi., lxii., lxiii., lxiv., lxv., lxvi., lxvii., lxviii., pp. 126 to 128. Also the Irish Tripartite, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," pp. 387 to 391. A story is told, in the Latin Tripartite—it is not in the Irish version—that Leogaire ordered one of his servants, called Erramaelus, to smear his face with blood, to cast himself on the public street of the city, and to feign death, before St. Patrick should arrive at the place. He was commanded not to arise, even if the holy man called on him so to act. To this course Erramaelus assented, but, as it fell out, to his own destruction. To test St. Patrick's supernatural knowledge, the king brought him that way. However, our saint, having had a Divine admonition of the scheme, cried out : "O Erramaelus, whether truly or falsely you have been wounded, no healing shall you receive ; whether truly or falsely you have been wounded, from this place you shall not rise." And this prophecy was fulfilled, for Erramaelus, who feigned death, was found in reality to have passed away from life. See lib. i., cap. lxviii., p. 128.

Angusa, should reign after him. This latter reservation was in consequence of the mother's piety; because, on bended knees, she had asked the holy man a favour, on behalf of her yet unborn offspring. Patrick then said, that no malediction should be pronounced against Lughaidh, until his own evil deeds should cause him to incur a signal punishment.<sup>91</sup>

Tradition alone seems to affirm the popular opinion, long entertained in Ireland, that St. Patrick preached a remarkable and an eloquent open-air sermon, regarding the Most Holy Trinity, when he stood on the Hill of Tara. There, he had before him the provincial kings, the dynasts, the chiefs and representatives from various parts of the kingdom. This circumstance was providentially arranged, as all appear to have separated for their respective districts, filled with wonder and admiration, at what they had seen and heard. It is said, that finding it difficult to make some of the people present understand the mystery of the Most Holy Trinity, one God in three Divine Persons, St. Patrick plucked from the green sod, beneath his feet, a branch of the shamrock,<sup>92</sup> and that he endeavoured to illustrate his doctrine, by showing them, how three leaves were so intimately interwoven on the single stem.<sup>93</sup> Hence, this small but universally-spread plant, in our island, has been assumed as Erin's national emblem; and, it is thus connected with our saint's great preaching of Gospel truths, at an early stage of his mission.

CHAPTER X.

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION ACCORDED TO ST. PATRICK—ST. LOMAN OR LUMMAN—ST. PATRICK VISITS TAILTEAN—HIS RECEPTION BY KING LAOIGHAIRE'S BROTHERS, CAIRBRE AND CONNELL—ST. PATRICK'S SOLEMN BAPTISM—HIS REPUTED FOUNDATIONS IN MEATH—HIS MISSION IN WESTMEATH—USNEACH HILL—HE VISITS LONGFORD—HE RESOLVES TO SET OUT FOR CONNAUGHT—HIS PASSAGE THROUGH LEITRIM—DESTRUCTION OF THE IDOL CROM-CRUACH, AT MAGH SLEACHT.

THIS singularly successful opening of his apostolate, at Tara, was the prelude to further triumphs.<sup>1</sup> After this great event, St. Patrick went over all the country, <sup>91</sup> It is said, that after he assumed the sovereignty, and towards its close, he went to a place, where there was a church. There he said: "Is not that the church of the cleric, who said that there should be neither king nor roydamhna from Laeghaire?" After this, darts of lightning from heaven killed him on the spot, and thenceforth the place was called Achadh-farcha, or "the field of lightning." Dr. O'Donovan was unable to identify the locality, although the Life of St. Patrick, in the "Leabhar Breac," states that it was in the territory of Uí-Cremhthainne. In Miss Cusack's Irish Tripartite Life, n. 1, p. 391, the place is identified, as Aghafacarnane, according to the Down Survey, in the old district or parish of Ballialticknaffe, now in the parish of Enniskeen, baronies of Lower Slane and Kells. This parish, too, is partly in Cavan; and, it is defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Cavan," Sheets 28, 29, 34, 35, as also on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 2, 3, 5, 6.

<sup>92</sup> Its botanic name is the "trifolium ripens," according to Keogh, Threlkeld and other botanists. See "Dublin Penny Journal," vol. i., No. 2, p. 10.

<sup>93</sup> In Mrs. Ellen Fitz-Simon's sonnet, "The Wood-Sorrel," No. xii., we have the following lines:—

"Its triple leaves, heart-shaped, and emerald green,
Recalling Erin's early days to view,
* * * * *
Preaching to Pagans Christianity,
Then, honoured wood-sorrel, the saint chose thee,
A lovely symbol of the Trinity."

—"Darrynane in Eighteen Hundred and Thirty-two, and other Poems," p. 139.

CHAPTER X.—<sup>1</sup> Probus and others relate, that after his interview with Leogaire, the energetic missionary preached freely through the country. See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. xlvii., p. 51. The Tripartite goes even further, and it mentions an agree-preaching the Gospel, in a public manner. Our Lord worked withal, and daily confirmed his doctrine, with sundry miracles.<sup>2</sup> He went boldly forward,<sup>3</sup> to seek the kings and chiefs, in their respective territories; for, he knew that their conversion must have an encouraging effect on their subject clansmen, and that it could hardly fail to secure a great accession to the fold. Everywhere, from that time forward, he seems to have obtained a remarkable degree of toleration, in the working out of his ministry.<sup>4</sup>

With great caution and doubt must we receive some of the popular traditions, relating to St. Patrick's acts, as given by the biographers. While the soldier of Christ was absent at Tara, it is said, Loman,<sup>5</sup> his disciple,<sup>6</sup> having waited more than forty days<sup>7</sup> in his vessel, at the mouth of the River Boyne—during which time, he suffered many hardships from barbarians and unbelievers,—then Luman set sail for, and landed at Athtrym, now Trim. In this town, he is said to have been the first bishop.<sup>8</sup> To make this voyage still more marvellous, Jocelyn<sup>9</sup> subjoins, that, sails being hoisted, Luman's vessel went upwards, without the assistance of oars,<sup>10</sup> notwithstanding furious blasts of wind, coming in that direction, opposite to its course.<sup>11</sup> But, Ussher has remarked,<sup>12</sup> about the channel of the Boyne being so unfit for navigation, that it must have been impossible for a boat, to proceed so far as Trim, even were both the current and the winds favourable. At this town, Loman converted to the faith of Christ, first, Forkernus, the son of a certain great man, who there ment, entered into between St. Patrick and the monarch. See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. viii., p. 130. According to this, the saint pledged himself, not to eject Leogaire from his kingdom, while the king promised, not to make any other attempt upon Patrick's life.

<sup>2</sup> So state the Fourth Life, cap. i., pp. 41, 42; the Fifth Life, lib. i., cap. xlvii., p. 51; the Sixth Life, cap. xlix., p. 76. See, also, Præfatio to the Tripartite Life, lib. ii., pp. 128, 129.

<sup>3</sup> Tara and the adjacent districts must naturally have been then considered, as chiefly important to opening this mission. For, whatever becomes prevalent in a metropolis is thereby more speedily and easily diffused, through the more distant districts of any country.

<sup>4</sup> Probus and Jocelyn seem to observe little chronological order, in relating St. Patrick's miracles and actions. The order and arrangement of St. Patrick's journeys and excursions, as laid down in the Tripartite Life, are much more natural and consistent. It is difficult, however, to connect incidents related, with the time and course of St. Patrick's various travels in the west. Treating of adventures, that might have occurred in such places, as the writer states our saint to have visited, the Tripartite Life frequently inserts transactions, and the names of persons, belonging to a much later period. However, it observes a rational and regular system, with regard to St. Patrick's movements, from one place to another. The First Book, after relating his mission at Tara, breaks off abruptly, by announcing his happy death. I am inclined to believe, this First Book was originally a distinct yet an imperfect biography, and that it received additions from scribes. The Second and Third Books, I believe to have been only continuations of the First, and compiled, probably, by several different persons, at a much more recent period. These have added little, that is historically authentic; and, for the most part, their narratives savour merely of popular and romantic legends.

<sup>5</sup> His feast occurs on the 17th of February, as also on the 11th of October. See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 48.

<sup>6</sup> Some accounts have it, that he was nephew to our great Apostle. His reputed relatives, in Ireland, have been already alluded to.

<sup>7</sup> St. Lumanus added forty days more to those forty days, which St. Patrick had commanded him to wait expecting his own return, according to Jocelyn.

<sup>8</sup> In the other Lives of our Apostle, there is no mention of Loman, or concerning his having been placed at Trim. Yet, Jocelyn makes him a bishop. The antiquity of that church, however, is known to have been very great.

<sup>9</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. li., p. 76.

<sup>10</sup> The Latin Tripartite only says, that St. Loman directed his course against the current; while, the Irish Tripartite states, that he rowed his vessel to Trim.

<sup>11</sup> As quoted by Ussher, Tirechan has a part of this story, set down in the Tripartite. However, instead of calling Loman a nephew of St. Patrick, Tirechan makes him only a disciple.

<sup>12</sup> See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 853.

<sup>13</sup> He is said to have been Fedhlimid, the ruled.<sup>13</sup> Afterwards, the saint baptized his mother,<sup>14</sup> a Briton by nation; and, lastly, his father, Fethleminius,<sup>15</sup> or Fedhlimid. In a fountain, which by prayer Loman produced out of the earth, even before their eyes, did he baptize them, and many others. These things being done, the holy prelate, in the twenty-fifth year before the foundation of Armagh, there built a church.<sup>16</sup> He resigned its government, to his disciple, named Forkern, or Fortchern,<sup>17</sup> when about to leave this world. After presiding over it for three days, Fortchern is said to have committed it to the charge of a Briton, who is named Cathalad or Cathlad.<sup>18</sup> Fortchern would not sell the rights of the church, nor his parental heritage. It is said, the revenues of Trim,<sup>19</sup> by the consent of princes, were transferred to St. Patrick, and to his successors, and that they were given perpetually to the church of Armagh.<sup>20</sup> However, there can hardly be a doubt, that Loman lived at a much later period, than the time of St. Patrick,<sup>21</sup> and that some writers have incorrectly made him the disciple of our great Irish Apostle.

Immediately after the occurrences at Tara, St. Patrick visited Tailten,<sup>22</sup> or Teltown,<sup>23</sup> where grand public games were an institution, and which, from time immemorial, had been annually celebrated, in or near that old settlement. His arrival there was on Easter Monday, if we credit the account left us, in the Tripartite Life.<sup>24</sup> We are informed, that Tailtean, or Teltown,<sup>25</sup> had its origin from Tailte, the foster-mother of Lugh Lamhfhada, King of Ireland, who established a fair, at the place so named, in commemoration of her. This fair was held annually, upon the first of August, so that when St. Patrick arrived there, no extraordinary assemblage seems to have greeted him. Shows and rude theatrical exhibitions, marriage ceremonies and engagements, sports and pastimes, were the order of proceedings, at the ancient fair of Teltown. Thither repaired the princes and chieftains of the land, to witness and to join in various manly exercises, such as boxing, wrestling, run-son of Laeghaire Mac Neill, who had a dun, at this place.

<sup>14</sup> She is called Scotha, a daughter to the King of Britain.

<sup>15</sup> He is said to have been the local proprietor of Trim.

<sup>16</sup> Tirechan says, it was founded twenty-two years before that of Armagh. Its foundation, notwithstanding, could not have been prior to A.D. 433. This is thought most generally to have been the year, when St. Patrick first preached in Meath.

<sup>17</sup> His feast occurs on the 17th of February, and on the 11th of October. Colgan considers him, to have been the grandson of King Laoghaire. See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," n. 55, p. 110.

<sup>18</sup> Colgan cannot find his name, in any of the Irish Calendars. See ibid., n. 59, pp. 110, 111. Yet, it is not necessary, in all cases where names occur in our saint's Acts, to find them recorded in the Martyrologies.

<sup>19</sup> See Rev. Richard Butler's "Some Notices of the Church of St. Patrick, Trim, collected from various Authorities," pp. 4, 5, and notes. Trim, 1837, 12mo.

<sup>20</sup> Compare the foregoing with the account as given in "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. i., cap. lv., p. 125, and lib. ii., cap. i., ii., iii., p. 129.

<sup>21</sup> Rev. Dr. Lanigan thinks, Loman is not different from that bishop so named, and classed, by Ussher, in the third order of Irish Saints. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. iv., n. 35, p. 222.

<sup>22</sup> It is also called Taltenam or Tailte. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 396, and n. 9.

<sup>23</sup> Its situation, on the northern bank of the River Blackwater, is about midway between Kells and Navan. Here, too, are large and curious forts. A very interesting description of the place, its history, its ancient games, legends and customs, will be found in Sir William R. Wilde's "Beauties of the Boyne, and its Tributary, the Blackwater," chap. vi., pp. 149 to 154.

<sup>24</sup> It has, "Prima autem feria venit Patricius ad Talteniam." See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. iv., p. 129. That this was Easter Monday seems clear from a passage, in which, after an account is given, regarding the saint's transactions with Carbre and Conall, it runs thus: "Paschae quoque clausula finita, prima feria exiit ad vadem duarum furcarum." See cap. vi., p. 130. These two passages seem to be quotations, from some old Latin work. Therefore, they appear entitled to some degree of credit.

<sup>25</sup> This is now the head of a parish, in the barony of Upper Kells, and it is figured on

ning, jumping, fencing, with other military movements. Like the Olympic games of ancient Greece, those were held for the purpose of promoting bodily health, mental accomplishments, and public or national amusements. Horse and chariot races were prominent, among those popular enjoyments. King Leogarius had two brothers; and, the eldest of these, named Cairbre,<sup>26</sup> was like himself in wickedness and infidelity. The other and younger brother, who was called Conall,<sup>27</sup> took no more of his brother's nature, than the fish partake of the salt sea, nor than the rosebud of its companion thorn. The child of perdition, Cairbre, lived at Taitin, and St. Patrick went there, hoping to convert him. But, Cairbre would not listen to the saint's doctrine. He even threatened death, and he whipped the servants of the holy Apostle, in the middle of an adjoining stream, which is called the Sele.<sup>28</sup> The holy man, perceiving him to be obstinate in this infidelity, said to him, by way of prophecy: "In regard, that thou hast cast off the sweet yoke of Christ, none of thy posterity shall enjoy thy kingdom, but it shall be transferred to thy younger brother, Conall." This prediction afterwards fell out to be most true. To confirm more his prophecy, St. Patrick added these words: "And this shall be to thee a sign, that the Lord will fulfil the word, which he has spoken through my mouth; the river near thy mansion, where thou hast so cruelly oppressed my servants, and which with the abundance of its fish is wont to feed thee and thine household, from henceforward, even for ever, shall produce no fishes." The word of this man of God prevailed; for, all Cairbre's posterity became subject to the posterity of his brother Conall, and they came to the throne of his kingdom; while, that river, which was called Sele, even to the time of Jocelyn, in the twelfth century, bore no fishes.<sup>29</sup> Saint Patrick left the children of darkness, and he repaired to where Conall lived, at the place, now known as Donough-Patrick.<sup>30</sup> This prince received the saint, with great joy and exultation. Opening his ears and heart to the doctrine of life, he was incorporated with Christ, by the laver of regeneration.<sup>31</sup> Conall, this child of grace, is said to have bestowed his court, with all the adjoining territory,<sup>32</sup> upon the saint, whom he besought most earnestly, that for better enlarging the Christian Religion, he should build a city for himself, and for his holy company, in that place.<sup>33</sup> Then it was, that Conall measured a church for God and Patrick, sixty feet in extent, and Patrick said: "Whosoever of your race diminishes this church shall not have a long reign, and he shall not be prosperous." Conall stated, also, that he should seek out an adjoining spot, to build a suitable house for himself. The saint accepted this proposal, and congratulating much the charity of Conall, he yielded to that loving request, and built the city, which was afterwards called Domnach Phadruig,<sup>34</sup> that is, "Saint Patrick's City,"<sup>35</sup> adds Jocelyn, the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 11, 17. The townland proper is on Sheet 17.

<sup>26</sup> He is called the son of Neill, viz., Niall of the Nine Hostages.

<sup>27</sup> This was Conall Crimthan.

<sup>28</sup> Now the River Blackwater, which joins the River Boyne, in Meath.

<sup>29</sup> See the foregoing account, in "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. liii., pp. 76, 77.

<sup>30</sup> Donagh-Patrick still retains the name. It is a parish, about four miles east of Kells, and lying on the banks of the River Blackwater, partly in the barony of Upper Kells, and partly in that of Lower Navan. It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Town-land Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 17, 18, 24, 25. The townland itself is on Sheets 17, 18.

<sup>31</sup> The Irish Tripartite adds, that Patrick confirmed his royal seat for ever.

<sup>32</sup> The Fourth Life, however, only represents it, as a spot of ground. See cap. lii., p. 42.

<sup>33</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life tells us, that Patrick said to him: "Thy brother's seed shall serve thy seed for ever; and strive to exercise charity towards my successors after me, and the sons of thy sons, that they may be perpetual subjects to my sons of faith."

<sup>34</sup> Colgan refers to a Domnach mor muighe siuil, or Donagh-Patrick, in the

Not far off, the saint appointed a place, marking it with his staff, to build there a new palace for Conall, as this prince himself desired. In the twelfth century, this spot was denominated, Rathyrtair, or Rathairthir.<sup>36</sup> Then giving his benediction by way of prophecy, the saint said: "Happy and fortunate shall his palace be, and many shall live happily in it; God's blessing shall bless thee, and it will establish thy throne; he shall enlarge thy dominion; while, thy brethren's offspring shall serve thy posterity for ever. Only the blood of one man shall be shed in it."<sup>37</sup> The saint's prediction was fulfilled, in due course of time;<sup>38</sup> and, the saint, being prepared for his journey to a more distant part of the country, blessed Conallus. As a memorial of himself, he left in the afore-mentioned city,<sup>39</sup> his altar-stone.<sup>40</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life states, that when St. Patrick was going away from Domhnach Patrick, eastwards to Tara, and on his way to Laeghaire—for they had formed a friendship—he blessed Conall, the son of Niall, and then threw his lec or flagstone—more correctly, altar-stone—behind him, eastwards into the hill.<sup>41</sup> diocese of Tuam. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxix. Martii. Vita S. Fularti, n. 2, p. 788. Archdall quotes this reference, and absurdly refers the place to Donagh-Patrick, in Meath. See "Monasticum Hibernicum," p. 529, and n. (u). Ibid.

<sup>35</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., for an interesting history of this place, chap. xxii., pp. 131 to 133. It has been stated, that all of St. Patrick's foundations, having the word Domnach attached, were laid on a Sunday.

<sup>36</sup> Sir William R. Wilde thought this place to have been identical with Oristown, not far from the little ruined church of Cill-Taillean, near a broad curve of the Blackwater. Rath-Airthir, or "the eastern fort," formed a great central circular mound, with circumvallations, of immense size, but now obscured by trees and much underwood. It is near the road, and on the left side, as the church is approached. See "Beauties of the Boyne, and its Tributary, the Blackwater," chap. vi., p. 155.

<sup>37</sup> The exception to this immunity is thus explained: Early on a Sunday morning, Cinaid and Dubhdaleithe, the two sons of Carbhall—or Fergall according to the Latin Tripartite—son of Maelodhra, descended from Aedh-Slaine, went to Rath-Airthir, where they saw a young man lying down, i.e., the son of Bressal. One of them plunged a sword into him, and then throttled him. The murderer then went past Tailten, upon his straight road, and the other went to Domnach-Patrick, as being a place of refuge. Aedh Slaine, King of Ireland, thus mentioned, died A.D. 600. Kinaeth and Dubhdaleith are said to have flourished, after the middle of the ninth century. Colgan, who has an idea of the great antiquity of the original Tripartite Life, thinks the substance of this note to its text, to have been a later interpolation. See "Trias Thaumaturga," nn. 16, 17, 18, p. 173. Again, by way of showing the efficacy of St. Patrick's prophecy, it is told, that one Cobdenach, the son of Fidgal, in the time of Dunchadh, or Donat, King of Ireland, with his host, contended against his opposing foes, in this very plain. Yet, none fell in the battle, nor were any grievously wounded. Colgan thinks, this affair happened, in the earlier part of the tenth century. See ibid., n. 19.

<sup>38</sup> See ibid., cap. liv., p. 77.

<sup>39</sup> In Colgan's time, this place, not far from the aforesaid church of Donoughpatrick, near Tailten, in the diocese of Meath, was ruined, and scarcely any vestiges remained. See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," nn. 61, 62, p. 111.

<sup>40</sup> See "Obits and Martyrology of Christ's Church," edited by Rev. Dr. Todd, Introduction, p. xxii. See the Third Life, cap. xliii., xlv., p. 25; the Fourth Life, cap. li., lii., p. 42; the Sixth Life, cap. i., li., lii., liii., liv., lv., pp. 76, 77; the Seventh Life, lib. ii., cap. i., ii., iii., iv., v., pp. 129, 130.

<sup>41</sup> Here, a folio of the original MS. is missing from the Irish Tripartite. However, the legend—not given in the Latin version—is probably the following, found in the text of Jocelyn: "et in sui memoriam in civitate præscripta, quasi quoddam pignus sanctitatis suæ, altare suum lapideum, ad salutem languentibus conferendam, signorum effectuum reliquit. Cumque iter arripere, altare illud sequens illum egrediebatur, nec alicujus hominis oculis perceptibile fuit a quo portabatur; sed (ut reor) ejus potentia et virtute, lapis ille post S. Patriciam portabatur in via, cujus nutu de Judæa in Chaldæam transvectus est Habacuc Propheta. Ut enim lapis ille angularis, Jesus Christus, cunctis ostenderet Patricii sanctitatem absque humana manu ferri fecit illum sanctum lapidem. Respicens Antistes Sanctus, altare modo tam miraculoso post se gestari, exultabat in Domino, reversusque collocavit illud in loco idoneo. Ab illo ergo die usque in præsens fixum perstitit, sed miraculis corrumpere non destitit, ac si virtus Patricii mansisset in eo." The Latin Tripartite has the curious statement, that the

To this memorable Easter week, Dr. Lanigan assigns the origin of St. Patrick's first solemn baptism<sup>42</sup> in Ireland, and a feast instituted to honour it. This remarkable ceremonial was held, as is generally believed, on Wednesday, the 5th of April.<sup>43</sup> The learned Ussher seems to have been unacquainted, notwithstanding, in regard to our Calendars' and Martyrologies' entries of an event, that explains, what was meant, by the festival of "St. Patrick's baptism." This writer thought it might have meant, the baptizing of St. Patrick himself. It is well known, however, that "St. Patrick's baptism," so celebrated in Ireland, was intended to commemorate that sacramental rite, as first solemnly administered by him, in this country.<sup>44</sup> For, not only Easter Eve, or Holy Saturday, had been considered a suitable day, for the public and solemn administration of baptism; but, in many ancient churches, during the whole of Easter week, and even many days following, that practice was allowed.<sup>45</sup>

The Pasch being finished, on the next day, St. Patrick took leave of his dear friend Conall, and then he came to Vadum duarum furcarum.<sup>46</sup> Some writers—such as Ussher<sup>47</sup>—bring our saint immediately to Connaught, after he left the house of Conall. The Tripartite Life,<sup>48</sup> however, makes St. Patrick found a church at the place mentioned, and in which he left the three brothers, with their sister, viz., Cathaceus, and Cathurus and Cathneus.<sup>49</sup> Of a pure and meek disposition was Catnea, their sister, who used to milk the deer. These abandoned their natural timidity, under her hands. Patrick went, afterwards, to Druim Corcortri,<sup>50</sup> and he founded a church there, over which he left Diarmaid,<sup>51</sup> the son of Restitutus.<sup>52</sup> portable altar followed St. Patrick to a place, where afterwards a cross stood, near the mill, and beside the river. The church of Domnach Padruic, where that altar-stone was kept, became an asylum, which none dared to violate with impunity. When Kinactus, the son of Irgalach, King of Tara, attempted to drag a refugee, from this place, and to put him to death, it is related, that three streams of blood did not cease to flow from that stone, until Kinactus, the son of Congalach, in order to expiate this sacrilege, presented three villages, with their adjoining farms and possessions, to God and to St. Patrick. These farms were called Huacthar-nessa Hy Midgna, and Tir-mic Conning. Then, two of the streams ceased flowing. But, the third stream continued, until Kinactus himself fell in battle, at Druim-corcain (Corcain's ridge), having been killed by Flathbertach, the son of Longech, A.D. 722. See n. 25, p. 173, and Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 320 to 323, as also n. (s.)

<sup>42</sup> Already he had baptized some of his converts, such as Dichuo and others, in a private manner.

<sup>43</sup> According to Dr. Lanigan's computation, such a coincidence of day and date fell in A.D. 433, and apparently during the Easter week. This writer adds, that according to the Paschal cycle of 84 years, and the method of applying it practised in Gaul, which St. Patrick introduced into Ireland, Easter Sunday seems to have fallen during that year, on the 2nd of April. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. vi., p. 233.

<sup>44</sup> From the Book of Sligo, Ussher has a passage in Irish, which literally translated is as follows: "Three Wednesdays of Patrick, birth, baptism, death." See "Primordia," chap. xvii., p. 882.

<sup>45</sup> See Bingham's "Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church," vol. iii., book xi., chap. vi., sect. 7.

<sup>46</sup> Now Ath-da-laarg. Dr. O'Donovan, was unable to identify it. See "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., n. (c), p. 637. However, the "Martyrology of Donegal," has it. 1 τσσθ Cεαννντς, or near Kells, in the county of Meath. See Rev. Drs. Todd's and Reeves' edition, p. 324.

<sup>47</sup> Having taken Jocelyn for his guide, that learned calculator passed over the saint's proceedings in Meath, Westmeath, and other places, after what had passed between him and Conall.

<sup>48</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life becomes our chief authority for the narrative, which immediately follows.

<sup>49</sup> These holy brothers and their sister, Colgan could not find, in our Irish Martyrologies, under the inserted forms of name. He says, that Cathneus may possibly be Cathaneus (? Cathcan), whose feast occurs, at the 20th of March. He says, likewise, that Cathnea may not be distinct from Cota or Cotana, venerated at the 4th of February. See nn. 22, 23, p. 173, "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>50</sup> This place is written down Druim-Chor-

Our holy Apostle is thought to have founded many churches and religious institutions, in Meath;<sup>53</sup> and, according to the Latin Tripartite, from Conall's place,<sup>54</sup> he went back to Tara, where a sort of arrangement was made with the monarch Laogaire. Although the latter professed himself a Christian, we are informed, that he was not at heart a believer, since he had promised his father, Niall of the Nine Hostages,<sup>55</sup> that he should continue, attached to the Magian rites and practices.<sup>56</sup> With a guarantee for safe conduct, the holy Apostle left Laogaire, and next he went into Delbna-Assuil.<sup>57</sup> This district was among the ancient territories of Meath.<sup>58</sup> Here, the Apostle is said to have founded some churches; but, it seems probable enough, these erections do not belong to so remote a date.<sup>59</sup> It was a rule with St. Patrick, to supply his converts with clerics, as ministrants for their spiritual wants, when congregations had been formed.<sup>60</sup> Allusion is made to St. Patrick, on corthri, in the Latin Tripartite. Colgan tells us, that Corcothri was a little district of Meath, not far from Tailteen. Dr. Lanigan says, that perhaps it was Drumconrath, in the barony of Slane.

<sup>54</sup> He is considered to have been the nephew of St. Patrick, and his mother was named Darerca. In the previous n. 63, to chap. iiii., Diarmaid is not mentioned among the sons of Restitutus and Darerca. In the following n. 64, it occurs in another connexion. Colgan thinks his festival assignable to the 12th of December.

<sup>55</sup> Otherwise, we find him called, Restitutus Hua-Buaird, or Longobardus, who was married to Darerca. See the Seventh Life, lib. ii., cap. vi., p. 130. Also Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 397.

<sup>53</sup> Yet various persons, named as placed over churches, or religious houses there, are known to have lived, long after St. Patrick's time. Nor are we to infer, that all the churches, there dedicated to his memory and called after him, were foundations of our Apostle.

<sup>54</sup> From this, he is said, to have set out on the Monday after Easter week was over.

<sup>55</sup> According to our Irish historians and genealogists, this renowned monarch had fourteen sons, of whom eight left issue. His descendants are set down as the Hy-Niall, or the posterity of Neill. I. From King Laeghaire, the O'Coindhealbhaíns, or Kenedallans, of Ui-Laeghaire, are said to have been descended. II. From Connall Crimthann, the O'Melaghíns, or Mac Lochlans, are descended. III. From Fiacha, the Mageoghegans and O'Molloys claim descent. IV. From Maine, the O'Breens, O'Dalys, the Magawleys, the O'Quinns, the O'Caharnys, now the Fox family, descend, with their co-relatives, in Teffia. All of these remained in Meath. The other four families settled in Ulster, where they acquired extensive territories. I. Eoghan was ancestor to the O'Neills and various co-relative families. II. Connall Gulban was ancestor to the O'Donnells. III. Cairbre's posterity settled in the barony of Carbury, in the county of Sligo, and in the barony of Granard, county of Longford. IV. Enda Finn's race settled in Tir-Enda, Tyrconnell, and in the tract, known as Kinel-Enda, near the Hill of Uisneach, in Westmeath. The foregoing went northwards, a little before the time of St. Patrick's arrival in Ireland. See Roderick O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iiii., cap. lxxxv., pp. 400, 401. Also, Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (2), p. 128.

<sup>56</sup> He wished to be buried at Tara, according to the pagan heroic custom, clad in his armour, "facie ad faciem usque in diem judicii."

<sup>57</sup> This place is supposed, by Colgan, n. 46, p. 174, and by Dr. Lanigan, to be Devlin and Magassil or Moyashil, in Westmeath. Colgan only tells us, in his "Index Topographicus," that it was a country in Meath. See "Trias Thaumaturga," p. 708. Dr. O'Donovan notices different districts, designated Dealbhna, with various other denominations affixed, in the counties of Meath, Westmeath, and King's County—the affix Assuil in the text is not found among them. See his edition of the "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," nn. 26, 28, 34, pp. vii., ix.

<sup>58</sup> From a particular allusion, in the Latin Tripartite Life, lib. ii., cap. ix., of Donoghmore being within Dealbhna-Assuil, it would seem, that it lay within the present county of Meath.

<sup>59</sup> Nor are we to understand such edifices, as are now called churches, but, humble buildings, made of hurdles, or wattles, of clay and thatch. There can be no doubt, however, but very many of them were built of stone, according to an ancient fashion of building in Ireland. These primitive structures could have been put together, in a very short time; and, hence we may very reasonably account for the great number, that had been erected, even at a very early period in our ecclesiastical history.

<sup>60</sup> "Ut clerici ubique illis ordinarentur

one of those occasions, when going to, or returning from, Rome,<sup>61</sup> having met six Irish clerics, each having a boy to carry the books, belonging to his master.<sup>62</sup> The six Irish clerics are said to have been, Lugacius,<sup>63</sup> Columbanus,<sup>64</sup> or Columba,<sup>65</sup> Meldanus,<sup>66</sup> or Mellanus,<sup>67</sup> Lugad, or Lugadius,<sup>68</sup> Cassanus,<sup>69</sup> and Ceranus,<sup>70</sup> or Kieranus.<sup>71</sup> To these—who are called his disciples—St. Patrick, after a blessing, presented a seal-skin,<sup>72</sup> to be used by them as a satchel for their books.<sup>73</sup> In course of time, they all became exemplary and zealous bishops. The holy Apostle had baptized many of the Luagni,<sup>74</sup> and he built a church of small dimensions for them in Mag-Echnach, and at the place now called Donaghmore.<sup>75</sup> Here there are some interesting antiquities;<sup>76</sup> especially, a remarkable Round Tower,<sup>77</sup> beside a ruined priory,<sup>78</sup> and in a very old graveyard, not far from Navan, and on the River Boyne.<sup>79</sup> Over the church, which our saint erected, at this place, he appointed St. Cassan to preside, and he predicted, that although small in size, it should be the place of his resurrection, and that it should be held in great veneration.<sup>80</sup> When Patrick took leave of his disciple there, and ad plebem nuper venientem ad credulitatem.”—“Confessio S. Patricii,” p. 14. Sir James Ware’s edition.

<sup>62</sup> Jocelyn has it, that he was then returning from Britain.

<sup>63</sup> See Jocelyn’s Life, cap. xciii., p. 86, and the Latin Tripartite Life, lib. ii., cap. viii., ix., p. 130.

<sup>64</sup> His feast, it is supposed, was kept, on the 2nd of March, or on the 16th of June. He belonged to Killairthir.

<sup>65</sup> So is he called, by Jocelyn.

<sup>66</sup> He is called “Columba præsbyter de Kill-Ernain,” in the Latin Tripartite. His feast is said to have been, on the 4th of June, at Cluain-Ernain.

<sup>67</sup> Thus he is mentioned by Jocelyn.

<sup>68</sup> He is called, in the Latin Tripartite, “Mellanus de Cluain-Chremha.” His feast is said to have been, either on the 28th of January, or on the 26th of October.

<sup>69</sup> The Latin Tripartite calls him “Lugadius filius Erci, de Fordhrum.” His festival has been assigned to the 17th of April.

<sup>70</sup> In the Latin Tripartite Life, he is called “Cassanus Presbyter de Domnachmor in Mag-Echnach.” His feast is said to have been kept, on the 4th of June. The five already mentioned, in the text, are said to have found their place of rest, in the territory of Delbna-assuil, and to each St. Patrick left a precious patena.

<sup>71</sup> So he is called, by Jocelyn.

<sup>72</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life, thus distinguishes him as “senex Kieranus de Sagir.” His feast is held, on the 5th of March.

<sup>73</sup> Regarding the material, there is some doubt expressed. This relic was very well preserved to the twelfth century, as Jocelyn takes care to observe, and several miracles were wrought, through means of this sacred memorial of our saint.

<sup>74</sup> This relic afterwards remained in the church of St. Columba, of Cluain-Ernain. The Latin Tripartite Life adds, “vbi pre-tioso tegumento ex ebore, gemmis et auro, in texto, celata, in summa habetur veneratione. Ignoratur tamen an pellis ipsa vituli marini, sive phocæ, an alterius bestie.”

<sup>75</sup> Or Luighe, or Luibhne, now Anglicised Lunc, a barony in the west of Meath County. The O’Broins, or O’Breens, of this territory, disappear from the “Annals of the Four Masters,” in A.D. 1201. See Dr. O’Donovan’s “Topographical Poems of John O’Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O’Huidhrin,” n. 15, p. iv. Their tribal-land probably extended further towards the north-east.

<sup>76</sup> Now the head of a small parish, in the barony of Lower Navan. It is shown, on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath,” Sheets 18, 25. The town and antiquities there are noted, on Sheet 25. There is also a parish of Donoghmore, in the barony of Ratoath, and it is shown, on Sheets 39, 45. The townland proper is on the latter Sheet. See an account of both parishes in Lewis’ “Topographical Dictionary of Ireland,” vol. i., pp. 468, 469.

<sup>77</sup> An account of these, with illustrations, will be found in Sir William R. Wilde’s “Beauties of the Boyne, and its Tributary, the Blackwater,” chap. vii., pp. 159 to 163.

<sup>78</sup> A curious stone carving, intended to represent the crucifixion, is over the door, and on the key-stone of its arch.

<sup>79</sup> This is in the pointed style of the thirteenth or fourteenth century. See Dr. Petrie’s “Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland,” &c., part ii., sect. iii., subsect. 3, pp. 409 to 411.

<sup>80</sup> The accompanying illustration was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it has been engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>81</sup> The Latin Tripartite remarks, that the prophecy was fulfilled; for there, the relics of Cassanus were to be seen, and many miracles had been wrought, in favour of travelled in a chariot, as afterwards he had occasion frequently to do,<sup>81</sup> he was met by a pious woman, called Richella,<sup>82</sup> who desired her little son Lonanus<sup>83</sup> to receive a benediction, and to be instructed in letters. The Apostle complied with her request, and signed the child's mouth with a cross; then, was he committed to the care of St. Cassan, to be instructed in learning and piety, by the latter holy man. Such was the progress, made by his pupil, that Round Tower and Priory of Donoughmore, County of Meath.

Lonan learned the entire Psalter in fifteen days, according to Jocelyn, or in twelve, according to the Tripartite.<sup>84</sup> Then, the holy Apostle set out, to prosecute the labours of his mission. In those days, long journeys, by the respectable Irish, were performed through the use of chariots, regarding which some interesting descriptions<sup>85</sup> and illustrations<sup>86</sup> have come down to us. Next, we find St. Patrick erected a church at Druim-Inisclain,<sup>87</sup> and which subsequently became very celebrated. It was also within Delbna people, who were in ill-health, or who desired spiritual graces, when visiting this shrine with true devotion.

<sup>81</sup> Thus, the Memoirs of St. Patrick, in the Book of Armagh, make frequent mention of his chariot. See fol. 7, a. b., 13, b. b.

<sup>82</sup> Her husband is called Senan.

<sup>83</sup> His feast has been assigned, by Colgan, to the 12th of November.

<sup>84</sup> He was venerated, in the church of Kill-Huailleach. It is now known, as Killoolagh, in the county of Westmeath. See Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xviii., p. 412, and vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 574.

<sup>85</sup> See Dr. Charles O'Connor's "Rerum

Hibernicarum Scriptores," Annotationes ad Sæc viii., tomus iv., pp. 148 to 150.

<sup>86</sup> An ancient car, and probably very similar to such as were used in Ireland, has been pictured from a monument, at Meigle, in Patrick Chalmers's "Sculptured Monuments of Angus." See plate xviii. Edinburgh, A.D. 1848.

<sup>87</sup> Now Dromiskin, or Druminisklin, in the barony and county of Louth, not far from Castlebellingham. Considerable remains of a Round Tower are at that place. Colgan, Archdall and Lanigan are wrong, in seeking to identify Druim-Ineasgleann with Drumshallon, in the same county. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (y), p. 394.

<sup>88</sup> This must have extended over a con-

territory.<sup>88</sup> Here were placed two of his disciples, named Daluan<sup>89</sup> of Croebheach, and Lugadus,<sup>90</sup> son to Ængus Nathfraich, King of Munster. The people of Eastern Meath, St. Patrick baptized, at the church of Teglaireann;<sup>91</sup> and, there, he left two of his disciples, the Virgin Bega<sup>92</sup> and the Priest Lugadius.<sup>93</sup> Near the doors of this church was a fountain, and at the northern side was Feart-Bige,<sup>94</sup> or the sepulchre of Bega. Not far from the same church, on the southern side, another was built, on the margin of Loch Annenn.<sup>95</sup> This church was called Imleach-Sescain,<sup>96</sup> where he left one of his disciples, Moluanus,<sup>97</sup> the pilgrim, from Britain.<sup>98</sup> The ancient name for the present beautiful Lough Ennell,<sup>99</sup> near Mullingar, in the county of Westmeath, was Loch-Ainninn;<sup>100</sup> and, it seems most probable, that near it his church stood. Afterwards, our holy Apostle is said to have visited a place, called Temoria Singite,<sup>101</sup> where a great number of the Assuil people were baptized. On the way, between Rath-Suine<sup>102</sup> and Cluainfoda Anmireach,<sup>103</sup> near the church of Domnach-Padruic,<sup>104</sup> a particular blackberry bush, surrounded by other brambles and thorns, was ever after regarded as sacred,<sup>105</sup> probably because our saint rested, at the spot, and it even became a place of sanctuary.<sup>106</sup> While he was yet in the Assuil territory, and near the River Ethne,<sup>107</sup> and the ford, called Ath-Maigne,<sup>108</sup> Patrick commenced

siderable part of the present county of Louth.

<sup>89</sup> His feast is said to have been, on the 7th of January, or perhaps, on the 4th of June, or on the 15th of October.

<sup>90</sup> His feast has been assigned to the 2nd of November, by our Irish Martyrologists.

<sup>91</sup> This church is said, by Colgan, to have been on the confines of Bregia.

<sup>92</sup> She is said to have been the daughter of Gauren, and to have been venerated, on the 10th of February. There was a St. 'Bega' venerated, also, on the 6th of September.

<sup>93</sup> He is thought to have been St. Lugadius, the son of Gauran, and a brother to the aforesaid St. Bega. His feast is set down, at the 17th of April, in the Martyrology of Tallagh.

<sup>94</sup> This place does not seem to be known, at present.

<sup>95</sup> This is said to have been in or near the northern part of Dublin County; perhaps, however, in or near the southern or western part of Louth County.

<sup>96</sup> This may have been the modern Em-lagh, in the parish and barony of Louth, and noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Louth," Sheet 11. The parish itself is situated, partly in the barony of Louth, partly in that of Ardee, and partly in that of Upper Dundalk; and, it is shown, on Sheets 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 14. Yet, I suspect the place was near Lough Ennell, in the county of Westmeath.

<sup>97</sup> He is thought to have been not a distinct person from St. Dalua, of Dun-Tighe-Bretan, venerated at the 7th of January.

<sup>98</sup> In course of time, the right to his church benefice was in the gift of Clonmacnoise monastery.

<sup>99</sup> See a very satisfactory description of it, in the "Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 178.

<sup>100</sup> Under this title, it is often alluded to in our Irish Annals.

<sup>101</sup> In the text, so it is written, but in the "Index Chronologicus," p. 717, it is set down, as "Temoria Singinte locus in Media," by Colgan, who does not offer any more particular identification.

<sup>102</sup> So is it written in the text, and in the "Index Chronologicus," p. 716, it is noted, as "Rath-saine arx in Media." There is a Rathshane,—near the River Inny,—in the parish of Foyran, and barony of Fore. It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheet 1.

<sup>103</sup> Colgan seems to connect this place, with St. Ainmire, of Cluain-foda, whose feast is set down, in the Martyrology of Donegal, at the 15th of September.

<sup>104</sup> Perhaps Temple Patrick.

<sup>105</sup> It would be interesting to know, if any existing popular tradition remains concerning it.

<sup>106</sup> When the Latin Tripartite Life was written, no one dared to remove a shrub or branch from this thicket, lest some signal misfortune or sudden death might follow the violation of that venerated bush.

<sup>107</sup> Now, probably, the Inny.

<sup>108</sup> This place has been identified—but perhaps incorrectly—with Lismoyne, a townland in the parish of Ardnurchur, or Horseleap, and barony of Moycashel. This townland is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheet 37. It is removed some distance from the Inny River, and hence, Connell Mageoghegan's identification does not seem to be well established. I think, it was rather within the present parish of Mayne, in the barony of Fore, and it

the erection of another church.<sup>109</sup> But a wicked and obstinate man, named Fergusius,<sup>110</sup> the brother of Brendan,<sup>111</sup> son of Eochod, offered strenuous opposition to the project.<sup>112</sup> Seeing his wilfulness, and hearing his rudeness of speech, the Apostle meekly signed the figure of a cross, on a stone near him, and with the end of his staff. The impression there remained deeply carved, as if the lines were drawn through soft mud. Presently he said to Fergus: "As this staff has divided the hard rock, so would the All-powerful Lord rend thy stubborn and impenitent heart asunder, had not my tolerance patiently borne thy perversity; and, since thou hast so fiercely contested my right to this field, lest thy posterity might lose it, so shall none of thy family rule in this place, nor prosper in any other, but it shall wither and decay." The wife of Fergus entreated, that the weight of such a malediction should not fall on her, and Patrick with compassion declared, that the infant she then bore should survive, but that the race of Fergus thenceforward should not exist. Near the same place, but more towards the south, one of our saint's disciples, called Mac Dichoill,<sup>113</sup> built a church.<sup>114</sup> From Temoria, the holy Apostle set out, resolving to build a church, near the Hill of is described on Sheets 2, 3, 6, 7, ibid. The townland itself is on Sheets 2, 3, and near the Inny River, a very likely locale for the place. The Inny is well described in the "Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 325.

<sup>109</sup> Very near the Inny, and to the south, in the county of Westmeath, there is a Temple Patrick parish. The disciple might have given it this name, in honour of his master, and the parochial name may afford some guide to the exact locality of this church. The parish of Temple Patrick is in the barony of Rathconrath, and it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheet 17. This parish borders on the River Inny, as may be seen, by consulting the Diocesan Map of Meath, comprising Meath, Westmeath and a great part of the King's County, by Daniel Augustus Beaufort, LL.D., M.R.I.A., Rector of Navan, published in 1816. No ruin there is noticed, however, yet several rafts and an old fortress are within its bounds.

<sup>110</sup> Some are of opinion, that he was identical with Fergusius, surnamed Cuochain, brother to King Niall and to Brian, here thought to have been mistakenly called Brendan. But Colgan thinks otherwise, since this Fergusius is said to have died, before his father's decease; while, it is related, that Fergusius Cochain, the brother of Niall and Brian, did not depart from life, before his father Eochodh Muighmeadhoin, King of Ireland, and if he had died so early, he could not have been alive, at the time of St. Patrick's preaching in Ireland. Thus, Eochod departed A.D. 365, and after him on the throne sat Crimthann thirteen years, Niall of the Nine Hostages, who ruled twenty-seven years, Dathy, who governed twenty-three years, not to speak of Laeghaire, who had already sat for some years, after St. Patrick's arrival. Besides, according to the "Genealogies of the Irish Saints," Fergusius Cochain had holy posterity, and the name of his brother was Brian, but not Brendan, chap. xi. See the author's "Catechism of Irish History," Lesson v., vi., pp. 34 to 40. Colgan supposes, this Fergusius was the grandson of King Dathy, especially as he had a brother Brendan, and the chronology most aptly agrees. King Dathy died A.D. 427 or 428. Now, his grandson could have died, before or about the year 440 or 450, in the time of St. Patrick, his father Eochod yet living.

<sup>111</sup> We have the following as the pedigree of St. Fidmunn. According to the "Genealogies of the Irish Saints," he was the son of Fídbadac, son to Cudolig, son of Coman, son to Suanach, son of Brendan, son to Eochod Brec, son to King David, otherwise known as Dathy, chap. ix.

<sup>112</sup> The Latin Tripartite says: "Hic Fergusius obscurioris notæ est, quia patre adhuc superstite decessit."

<sup>113</sup> Colgan offers a conjecture, that he was identical with a certain Mac-Dechil, who was probably St. Aidanus, or Aedhan, the son of Dechill—the same as Deicola, Dichoill, Dichuill—son to Brian, and afterward Abbot of Cluain-Chaoin, otherwise Letracha Abbrat, in that part of Orgiell territory, known as Ferross, or Fera Rois. His place is also called Cluain-Chaoin-Finnabhrach—now Clonkeen, in the barony of Ardee, and county of Louth. He is said to have been of Kill-alinn—likewise written Kill-Ilialeith, or Cill-Ilanleith—at the north of Fochard, county of Louth. His feast is given in our Calendars, at the 1st of January.

<sup>114</sup> On account of the negligence of those who followed him, as the disciples of St. Patrick, when the Latin Tripartite Life was written, this church then had passed to St. Columkille. From this we are not to suppose, that the latter saint was then living;

Usna, or Usnagh.<sup>115</sup> This elevation combines the dimensions of a mountain, with the beauties of a hill, and it rises above the bosom of the highest tableland in Ireland. From the summit, a charming and an extensive view stretches all around it. Rich fields, shining lakes, or rivers, and verdant valleys, with glowing historic memories, fill the eye and mind of an Irish historical student, as he stands on St. Patrick's Bed,<sup>116</sup> which is there shown. On this green sod, it is said, the Apostle slept.<sup>117</sup> An ancient cemetery was near.<sup>118</sup> A little lake, set in the summit of the hill, is an object of great admiration. Beside it are the ruins of what was, perhaps, a monarch's home; and, on the opposite side, there is a rath, comprising about two acres. Perhaps, no other fort in Ireland is of so strange a structure—half of its circumference is hemmed in by stone, and the other by an ordinary fence. Two or three old monuments are within it. A very curious cave, with a beautifully-arched entrance, has more than ordinary interest for the antiquary.<sup>119</sup> Altogether, the remains of seven or eight Druidic altars, as they are popularly distinguished, may be seen on the hill. Near the ancient rath, four little rivulets gush from the hill-side. Meeting lower down, these rush in one clear stream into the valley. The land about this celebrated hill of Usneagh,<sup>120</sup> belonged to two brothers, named Fiach and Enda. The Tripartite Life makes them brothers of King Leogaire;<sup>121</sup> but, from other documents, however, and, particularly from the Third Life,<sup>122</sup> it appears, that St. Patrick was not acquainted with any brothers of Leogaire more than Carbre and Conall. Jocelyn speaks of them, and he mentions another brother, called Leogerus.<sup>123</sup> He was different, however, from the king.<sup>124</sup> Some of our antiquaries have given more brothers to King Leogaire,<sup>125</sup> and sons to Niall of the Nine Hostages, than they ought probably to have done. It is stated, that blessed Patrick courteously addressed Fiach and Enda to obtain from them a site for the erection of a church, the rulers of which he intended to select from their family. His mission and his request were alike rejected by those pagan brothers, who treated him with rudeness, and even with personal but, the meaning seems to be, that his monastic rule had been there observed. Whether this differed, in any respect, from the rule of St. Patrick, if there established, might prove a subject for curious investigation. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxliv., xcix., pp. 88, 96, and nn. 111, 112, 152, 153, pp. 113, 115, and Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. x., xi., xii., xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., pp. 130, 131, and nn. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, p. 174.

<sup>115</sup> Its summit has an altitude of 602 feet, above the sea-level. It lies not far from the village of Ballymore, and about five miles west of Lough Ennell. It is situated in the parish of Conry, and barony of Rathconrath, and is marked, with its antiquities, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheet 24.

<sup>116</sup> It is a raised oblong mound, of about six yards by three.

<sup>117</sup> Some years ago, however, this object of veneration had been much damaged by the sappers. See Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xviii., pp. 425, 427, and note.

<sup>118</sup> This is pictured, in Sir Samuel Fergu-son's paper, read on February 26th, 1872, and published in "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," No. xvii. On Ancient Cemeteries at Rathcroghan and elsewhere in Ireland, &c., p. 119. The cemetery occupies the eastern summit of Usneach.

<sup>119</sup> The remains of several tumuli are on this remarkable hill.

<sup>120</sup> It is stated, that in the second century, Tuathal Techtmar, Monarch of Ireland, established an anach, or "fair," at this place, and similar to those fairs established at Tara, Tailtin and Tlacta. The games and festivities of an anach were usually celebrated, in connexion with sepulchral places.

<sup>121</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xviii., p. 131.

<sup>122</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. xliii., p. 25.

<sup>123</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. c., p. 88.

<sup>124</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. viii., n. 69, pp. 239, 240.

<sup>125</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. 48, p. 174.

<sup>126</sup> Called, in Irish, St. Seachnall, who was violence. Then Patrick, raising his voice, pronounced the words, "a malediction," when his disciple St. Secundinus<sup>126</sup> interrupted, and completed the sentence, by saying, "fall on the stones of Usneach Hill."<sup>127</sup> These were regarded, as being useless for building, or for any other purpose.<sup>128</sup> The result, as we are told, was, that while Fiach obstinately refused to believe in Christ, his brother was moved to become a faithful adherent to the truths there announced. Enda did penance for the injury offered to St. Patrick, and presented his newly-born son,<sup>129</sup> named Corbmac,<sup>130</sup> with the ninth part of all his possessions, to the Irish Apostle. That child grew up in years and grace; and, when he was of sufficient age, his holy patron gave him in charge, to his disciples, Bishop Domnal,<sup>131</sup> Comitius, or Connetus,<sup>132</sup> and Dabonna<sup>133</sup>—the two latter sons to Huabaird<sup>134</sup>—and to a fourth person, not named.<sup>135</sup> These were directed to watch over his proficiency in virtue and learning;<sup>136</sup> while they discharged such duty, in the district of Crich Enna Artech,<sup>137</sup> in Connaught. The saintly Corbmac<sup>138</sup> ended his days most happily, in that place where he presided.<sup>139</sup>

From Usneach, the saint proceeded towards Longford; yet, it is thought, some of the most remarkable transactions, recorded in the Tripartite Life, as here occurring, must be referred to a subsequent visit, and to a later period. We may instance, that pastoral appointment to the See of Ardagh, by St. Mel; for, it has been asserted, the latter had not arrived in Ireland, when St. Patrick had been preaching, for the first time, in Meath.<sup>140</sup> It is also recorded, that among certain persons, then appointed by St. Patrick, one Cromman, or Cruimminus, Abbot of Lackin, or Leckan,<sup>141</sup> in Westmeath, must be included.

venerated at Dunshaughlin, county of Meath, on the 27th of November.

<sup>127</sup> It is quite apparent, that the present, with many another Patrician, legend, had been ingeniously concocted, and to amuse the vulgar, with explanations, as unreasonably applied, as they are fictitious.

<sup>128</sup> When the Latin Tripartite Life had been composed, a saying was in vogue among the people, when they handled rotten stones, or worthless materials, "they are like the stones of Usnach Hill."

<sup>129</sup> Jocelyn calls him the youngest son of his father.

<sup>130</sup> Colgan seems to place his festival, at the 17th of February.

<sup>131</sup> He is called, Bishop of Aleach mor, a place which afterwards belonged to the monks of Clonmacnois. Colgan thinks him to be the same as Daniel, or Domhnall, venerated in our Irish Calendars, at the 1st of December.

<sup>132</sup> He is called, Bishop of Cluain-sean-moil.

<sup>133</sup> He is said to have been bishop, over Cluain-na-manach.

<sup>134</sup> Ussher treats regarding him, and his children, in "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., pp. 430, 431.

<sup>135</sup> About the feast of All Saints, when Corbmac used to visit their respective churches, each of these masters had been accustomed to present his disciple with a cow, especially to reverence the great Irish Apostle, who had committed to them that boy's instruction. This usage was continued, by their respective successors, towards the successors of St. Corbmac, until Nuadat, Archbishop of Armagh, released them from such an obligation. The latter died, A.D. 811, and his feast was kept, on the 19th of February.

<sup>136</sup> The place, where he received this education, is called Tir-omna-Snithine, and it lay before Dermagh of Cuilchaonna. The successors of St. Patrick lost the right of presentation and benefice, in this parish, the identification of which is now difficult to ascertain. Dermagh was the name for Durrow, formerly in the territory of Teffia, and now in the King's County. Here was St. Columkille's great establishment.

<sup>137</sup> This territory is said to have been near Cruachan, and towards the North. Enda had received fifteen villages—usually called, Sen-chletha-Enna-Airtich—from his brother, King Laeghaire. Enda bestowed them on St. Patrick, with consent of the monarch; and, in after time, they were regarded as possessions, belonging to the church of Armagh.

<sup>138</sup> He was surnamed Snithine, from the place of his education.

<sup>139</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. c., p. 88. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xvii., xviii., p. 131, and nn. 50 to 55, pp. 174, 175.

<sup>140</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. viii., and n. 71, pp. 238, 240.

<sup>141</sup> This parish, in the barony of Corkaree, is delineated on the "Ordnance Sur-

However, Colgan suspects, that Cromman<sup>142</sup> was contemporary with the renowned St. Fechin,<sup>143</sup> who died, A.D. 664. To account for Cromman's having been a disciple of St. Patrick, he has been made to live 190 years.<sup>144</sup> Cromman is said to have resided near the church of Forgney,<sup>145</sup> where Munis,<sup>146</sup> another of Patrick's disciples, and a nephew, on the sister's side, dwelt.<sup>147</sup> Munis is said to have had other holy brothers,<sup>148</sup> of whom various wonderful stories are told; and, those followed their renowned uncle, from Britain,<sup>149</sup> to share in the labours of his Irish Apostolate. Even two sisters, St. Echea,<sup>150</sup> and St. Laloca,<sup>151</sup> are named, who presided over religious houses. Thence, St. Patrick passed into southern Tefia, where he converted and baptized Manius, or Maine, the son of Niall, and brother to King Laegaire. In the place, now known as Ardagh, he built a church, and it was made the head of a See, over which St. Mel first presided. With him was left, also, a brother Milchuo,<sup>152</sup> a bishop, while great numbers of the people in that region were brought over to the Faith, and the illustrious Apostle predicted many things, in reference to them and to their posterity. When Maine had received baptism, he brought to St. Patrick a woman, who then bore a child, and for both of them, the chief humbly asked a blessing. Extending his hand, in the act of benediction, the Apostle suddenly withdrew it, and, as if in doubt, he used a form of expression, customary with him, "I know not, but God knows." After some hesitation, however, he completed the benediction. By a Divine revelation, he learned, that the unborn child should afterwards be known as Tuathal, surnamed Maolgarb, the grandson of that Cairbre, whose posterity he declared accursed, and debarred from the royal sceptre. With indignation, turning to Maine, he said, "Lo! man, how hast thou done this unhappy thing? He who has surreptitiously obtained my blessing shall be a king." Then Maine knelt to Patrick, and he performed penance. Patrick then vey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheets 6, 11. The townland proper is on Sheet 6.

<sup>142</sup> His feast occurs, at the 28th of June, according to Father Ward, in "Vita S. Rumoldi," Dissertatio Historica de Patria S. Rumoldi, sect. 9, num. 9, p. 159.

<sup>143</sup> His feast occurs, on the 20th of January.

<sup>144</sup> See the "Trias Thaumaturga," Sep-tima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xx., p. 132, and n. 56, p. 175.

<sup>145</sup> This parish, in the barony of Shrulce, is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Longford," Sheets 23, 27. The townland itself is on the latter Sheet.

<sup>146</sup> He is said to have been a bishop, and his festival is placed, at the 6th of February. He is said, also, to have had a feast, at the 18th of December.

<sup>147</sup> St. Patrick's sister, Darerca, is called "mater filiorum Hua-Baird." She is said to have been the mother of seventeen sons. Yet, this account is supposed to have been a great exaggeration. Jocelyn makes Tygrida the mother of seventeen sons and of five daughters.

<sup>148</sup> Such as St. Mel and St. Riogh, whose feast days are found, at the 6th of February. The latter has a festival, likewise, at the 1st of August. These are regarded, as the sons of Conis and Darerca.

<sup>149</sup> At one time, while St. Patrick was about to leave Britain for Ireland, he left a "casula," or a chasuble, behind, him on a rock. He thought no more about it, until he had arrived, and then calling for this garment, it miraculously lay at his feet.

<sup>150</sup> She is called, likewise, Achea, and in the "Vita S. Moduenna," by John Capgrave, there is a notice of her. Harpsfeld, in "Historia Ecclesiastica Angliæ," lib. ix., cap. xiii., tells us, that Echea or Achea was numbered among the saints. Unless she was the Aicheach, or Deche, mentioned in the Irish Calendars, at the 23rd of April, Colgan is not able elsewhere to find her, under the title of a saint. Her church of Kill-glais was near the church of Ardagh, and towards the south of it, in the region of Tefia.

<sup>151</sup> Her name does not appear, in our Calendars; but, her church is said to have been Sen-lios, in Connaught. These were the two daughters of Darerca, St. Patrick's sister, according to the "Opuscula," attributed to St. Ængus, lib. iv., cap. vi. Also, the Scholiast, to St. Ængus' "Festilogy," at the 6th of February, and at the 22nd of March, has a like statement.

<sup>152</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 6th of February; and, yet, there is reason to suspect, he was not a different person from St. Mel.

<sup>153</sup> Afterwards known as Tuathail, sur-said, that there should be no king, who would refuse to recognise him as sovereign ; and, the saint then added, that his injunctions must be the longest that should live in Erin. "The person whom I have blessed shall also be a king, i.e., Tuathal."<sup>153</sup> In accordance with this prophecy, the latter assumed the sovereignty, after he had banished Diarmaid Mac Carbhail ; so that, he was a victor on Loch Ri,<sup>154</sup> on Derg Derc,<sup>155</sup> and at Luimnech.<sup>156</sup> A very idle legend, about St. Mel, has been circulated ; but, as it does not appear, in the more ancient accounts of our holy Apostle, it may be dismissed as unworthy of serious attention. The following is its purport. While he was in southern Teffia, St. Patrick heard a rumour spread, and it was industriously circulated, through the malice of the vulgar, that Bishop Mel had sinned with his aunt, Lupita,<sup>157</sup> who had taken the religious veil. As a near relation, and one of exemplary life, she lived with him, in the same house,<sup>158</sup> praying to the Lord. The interests of religion and of family honour required an investigation ; yet, not believing that there were just grounds for such a scandal, Patrick resolved on visiting Ardagh. Above all other men, the pious and amiable bishop of that place, was remarkable for a holy purity and simplicity of life and manners. Trusting in his innocence, and knowing that his holy master was expected, when he saw St. Patrick coming towards Ardagh, to reprove him, the bishop went out to a certain hill, to fish in the pools, and furrows of the field. Here, it is said, he caught salmon.<sup>159</sup> And, moreover, Bishop Mel's kinswoman went with fire in her mantle, which was wrapped over her bosom, and yet she was in no manner scorched.<sup>160</sup> Patrick then knew there had been no sin between them ; yet, he willed, that their places of dwelling should be apart.<sup>161</sup> Then, too, he pronounced the law, which regulated such a mode of life, in after times.<sup>162</sup> He likewise declared, that God did not aid any unjust or false man ; still, he deemed it necessary, that the occasion for scandal and temptation should be avoided, as far as possible.<sup>163</sup> He decreed, that while St. Mel should remain eastwards, at Ardagh, Bri-Leith<sup>164</sup> must rise between them ; she living in Druiim-Cheu, or Drumcheo,<sup>165</sup> on the west side of that eminence. Here was named Maelgarb. He ruled, as King of Ireland, from A.D. 528 to about A.D. 538.

<sup>154</sup> Now Lough Ree, a noble extent of water, above Athlone, and on the Upper Shannon.

<sup>155</sup> Now Lough Derg, an expansion of the Lower Shannon.

<sup>156</sup> The ancient name of the Lower Shannon. See Mr. Lenihan's "History of Limerick," pp. 2, 3, for the origin of those names.

<sup>157</sup> Lupita is stated to have been St. Patrick's sister. The Latin Tripartite says : "Rumoris coram malignis turpitudinem, et coram Deo, et bonis malignitatem auxit, quod fœminæ, de qua rumor ille spargebatur, connubium, si secluso susceptorum Ordinum et Episcopalis dignitatis sacro honore, viro Dei nuptias ambire liceret ; fuerit illud fascinus ipsi alio duplici humani et divini juris impedimento præclusum et execrandum."

<sup>158</sup> This circumstance was the principal or only foundation for a sinister suspicion.

<sup>159</sup> The place was subsequently called, An chora thirim, i.e., "piscina sicca," owing to this miraculous occurrence.

<sup>160</sup> The spot, where Lupita threw the fire down before St. Patrick, was afterwards called, An maol-tene, i.e., "fatuus ignis."

<sup>161</sup> The Latin Tripartite states : "Sanctus autem Patricius licet viderit, et approbarit innocentiam, signis tam evidentibus, probatam ; Mælum Episcopum tamen admonuit in agris araret, in fluviis vero piscaretur ; ne tentare Dominum Deum suum videretur."

<sup>162</sup> Patrick uttered the famous saying : "Seorsim viri et seorsim fœminæ, ne occasionem dare infirmis inveniantur, et ne nomen Domini per nos blasphemetur, quod absit a nobis."

<sup>163</sup> The Irish Tripartite adds these words : "non temptabis Dominum Deum tuum," and then follows the repetition of words, given in the previous note.

<sup>164</sup> Bri-leith was the ancient name of Sliabh Calraighe, or Slieve Golry, to the west of Ardagh, in Longford. Dr. O'Donovan founds this opinion, on Colgan's statement, in the Life of Bishop Mel, in the "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," at cap. ix., p. 261. See the "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or the Book of Rights," n. (p), p. 9.

probably that nunnery, which had been founded by St. Lupita ; although, at present, it baffles our attempts of identification.<sup>166</sup>

Patrick next went into northern Tathbhe,<sup>167</sup> or as otherwise called, into the territory of Cairbre,<sup>168</sup>—so called after him, who was the founder of this principality. There Granard was presented to him, by the sons of Cairbre. It is stated, that Guasacht,<sup>169</sup> or Guasactus, was then placed as a Bishop, at Granard. It is probable, moreover, this account does not rest on any sufficient foundation.<sup>170</sup> Again, it is stated, that he left there the two sisters, called Emir, or Emeria,<sup>171</sup> who first put up, at Cluain-Bronaigh, or Clonbroney.<sup>172</sup> These holy sisters and their brother are said to have been instructed in the Christian faith, by their once undistinguished boy-slave ; and, no doubt, it was a happy moment in his life, when Patrick blessed that veil, with which he clothed the aforesaid virgins. Then follows a most miraculous account, as to how their four feet sank into the rock, and the traces existed there to that time, when the Irish Tripartite Life had been written. We are told, that the reason, why the sides of the churches, at Granard and Clonbroney, had been joined to each other, was owing to the close relationship of the founders. It was the airchinnech, or superior, at Granard, that always ordained the head-nun in Cluain-Bronaigh, so long as our old Irish usages prevailed.

Afterwards, the Blessed Patrick went across the water,<sup>173</sup> to a locality, then known as Magh Sleachta. Not far removed from the present considerable town of Ballinamore,<sup>174</sup> and on the plains of Leitrim, near Fenagh,<sup>175</sup> was the place, called Magh-slecht,<sup>176</sup> or Moy-slecht.<sup>177</sup> Indeed, the spot is not only well defined, by a peculiar name, Edentinny,<sup>178</sup> or Aidentinny ;<sup>179</sup> but, even yet, <sup>165</sup> This denomination now seems to have become obsolete.

<sup>166</sup> There is a Drumnacoocha, somewhat northward, in the parish of Killoe, in the barony of Longford. It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Longford," Sheet 9.

<sup>167</sup> This was the Irish denomination, and it was Latinized, Teffia. It was divided into two parts, by the River Inny, and these were called North and South Teffia ; the former comprising, nearly all the present county of Longford, and the latter, the western half of Westmeath. See O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or the Book of Rights," n. (g), p. 180.

<sup>168</sup> Roderick O'Flaherty states : "Borealis Teffia eadem est, ac Carbria Gaura ad Carbreum filium Nielli regis et posteros spectans."—"Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxxv., p. 402.

<sup>169</sup> He is said to have been the son of Milchu, St. Patrick's pagan master, when a slave ; and, he is regarded, also, as our Apostle's foster-brother. His feast is held, on the 24th of January.

<sup>170</sup> In all other Lives of our Apostle, there is nothing about Guasactus, or any See of his. Had such an occurrence been veritable, it could hardly have been omitted.

<sup>171</sup> Colgan has assigned their festival, to the 11th of December, when he promised to treat fully regarding them.

<sup>172</sup> There was founded here a famous nunnery, by these sisters. Clonbroney parish is partly, in the barony of Granard, and partly in that of Ardagh. It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Longford," Sheets 5, 9, 10, 14, 15. Between the towns of Longford and of Granard, and in the barony of Granard, lies the townland of Clonbroney.

<sup>173</sup> Perhaps Lough Gownagh, or the upper course of the River Erne, is here meant.

<sup>174</sup> This is a considerable town, in the parish of Oughteragh, and barony of Carrigallen. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Leitrim," Sheet 25. The parish itself is defined, on Sheets 19, 21, 22, 24, 25.

<sup>175</sup> The parish of Fenagh lies, partly in the barony of Carrigallen, partly in that of Leitrim, and partly in that of Mohill. See ibid., Sheets 24, 25, 28, 29. On the two former Sheets, the townland, Fenagh Beg, is defined.

<sup>176</sup> This is Latinized, campus excidii, by Rev. Dr. Charles O'Connor ; but, more correctly, by Father John Colgan, campus adorationis.

<sup>177</sup> See Seward's Topography, and O'Connor's Map of Scotia Antiqua.

<sup>178</sup> The village of Edentinny, in the townland of Ardrum, is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Leitrim," Sheet 25 ; but, there is no indication of the historic cahir, near it. However, two sites of standing stones are noted, just adjoining ; and, at a greater distance, near Fenagh, are two other sites designated, "standing stones." The mounds an immense rude, upright stone,<sup>180</sup> of great weight and height, crowns the summit, within a most remarkable oblong and ancient fortress.<sup>181</sup> Much of the stone—supposed to have been a pagan monument—is buried in the ground; while, beside it, another stone<sup>182</sup> of great length lies prostrated,<sup>183</sup> and not far removed are similar prostrate stones,<sup>184</sup> which, once upright, must have rendered this eminence very conspicuous. Other writers state,<sup>185</sup> that this plain of Magh Sleachta lay, in the present barony of Tullyhaw, in the county of Cavan.<sup>186</sup> When Patrick arrived at Magh Sleaght,<sup>187</sup> there was erected the large statue, of an obliterated city beside them are passed over, with the imperfect description of "carns." This whole district has yet to engage the explorations of historians and archaeologists, for the elucidation of social conditions, in an age very remote; and, it must be added, in this connexion, that socially considered, as well as topographically and historically, the scenery and capabilities of Leitrim County need higher appreciation and improvement, than have been bestowed by most of its large landed proprietors.

Edentenny Fort, near Ballinamore, County of Leitrim.

<sup>179</sup> It is said to be Anglicised, "the brow of fire."

<sup>180</sup> This "galloon" is at least 12 feet in height, and artificially formed.

<sup>181</sup> Huge stones are found, forming the outer face of an embankment, on the two smaller ends: on the depressed sides, the rock has been quarried and removed, to form a steep, not easy of access. Several of the loose flanking stones have been removed, for building purposes, by former inhabitants of the adjacent village of Aiden-tinny, and by their neighbours.

<sup>182</sup> It is nearly as large as the upright one.

<sup>183</sup> The accompanying illustration, taken from a drawing on the spot, in June, 1876, by the author, was traced on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by George A. Hanlon. It represents the upright "galloon," and that prostrate one, within the old fortification.

<sup>184</sup> A woman, whose farm-house was near, informed the writer, that she had seen one of these upright, and she had even witnessed its accidental falling, some few years before.

<sup>185</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (a), p. 43. The island of Port, and the village of Baile Meg-Shamhradain, now Ballymagauran, are said by Dr. O'Donovan, to have been in that plain. See ibid., vol. iv., n. (c), p. 882, at A.D. 1431. Also, Rev. Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," Introduction, p. 127, and chap. iii., n. 3, p. 464.

<sup>186</sup> In our opinion, these statements are incorrect, as referring to the exact locality.

<sup>187</sup> The origin of the name of Magh Slecht is to be found, in the "Book of Ballymote," fol. 220, a. a.

<sup>188</sup> It is so called, in the Tripartite. The Rev. Dr. Todd says, this word "seems to or an idol, called by some, Crom Cruach.<sup>188</sup> To their chief idol, the pagans were accustomed to present the firstlings of animals and other offerings.<sup>189</sup> Twelve other idols<sup>190</sup> are said to have stood near or around Crom Cruach;<sup>191</sup> and with the intention of destroying the prestige or efficacy of these idols, Patrick soon came to a river, called Gath-ard,<sup>192</sup> within sight of them. There and then, he beheld a great multitude of persons assembled. In some accounts,<sup>193</sup> it is asserted, that King Laeghaire himself was present, and engaged in the same offices of idolatrous worship. The people at Edentinnu show a broad, rushing, clear stream, named St. Patrick's well,<sup>194</sup> which escapes from beneath the perpendicular face of steep rock, and from its subterranean course, into the lower grounds. These are now converted into moorland, but once—and not so long ago—they formed the bed of an extensive lake,<sup>195</sup> on the margin of which arose the artificially-scarped ledge of rock, on the top of which was a nearly oblong Caher or fortification. The idol of this locale, called Crom-Cruach, is said to have been the principal one of all the colonists that settled in Ireland, from the earliest times to the period of St. Patrick.<sup>196</sup> Certain writers have it, that Crom,<sup>197</sup> or Crom-eacha,<sup>198</sup> was the title bestowed on their Fire God, by the Pagan Irish.<sup>199</sup> He was regarded as the dispenser of vital heat, of fecundity, and of prosperity.<sup>200</sup> Tighernmas Mc Follaigh, King of Ireland, who reigned from A.M. 3580 to A.M. 3656,<sup>201</sup> signify the bent, or stooping mound." Jocelyn calls the same idol, Ceancroithi, which he interprets "Caput omnium deorum." The Third Life calls this idol Cennbhe. See cap. xlv., p. 25. Dr. Keating terms it, Crom-cruadh, in his "History of Ireland," at the reign of Tighernmas. See Rev. Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," Introduction, n. 1, p. 128.

<sup>189</sup> See Rev. Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus i., pars. i. Prolegomina, p. 22.

<sup>190</sup> Rev. Dr. Lanigan shrewdly considers these idols referred to, as having been circles of stone. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. viii., p. 239.

<sup>191</sup> Dr. Lanigan conjectures, that the large idol was only a rude stone, occupying a central position, and representing the sun, while in a circular form around it, the twelve lesser stones represented the signs of the zodiac. See ibid., sect. v., n. 45, p. 229. Similar stone circles are numerous, in various parts of Ireland.

<sup>192</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life interprets this as guth "voice," and ard "high," because St. Patrick raised his voice there to denounce the idolaters. At a Rath Guthard, the Senchas Mor is alleged to have been partially composed. See "Senchas Mor," vol. i. Preface, p. xxx.

<sup>193</sup> Those of the Third, and of the Tripartite Lives.

<sup>194</sup> Here popular tradition has it, that St. Patrick baptized many persons.

<sup>195</sup> A middle-aged peasant informed the writer, that he recollected the time, when a sheet of water covered the present moorlands.

<sup>196</sup> According to the Dinnsenchus.

<sup>197</sup> This is said to have been derived from an Egyptian word, Chrom, meaning "fire."

<sup>198</sup> It is also thought, this idol had been termed Crom-dubh, "the black stooping stone;" and, under this latter appellation, to have given rise to the name, Domhnach Crom-duibh, or Cromduff Sunday, which O'Flaherty says fell, on the Sunday immediately before the Kalends of August. About this time, the people in different parts of Ireland have the traditional name, Garland Sunday, applied to that incidence; while others transfer such name, to the first Sunday of August, and, it is always regarded in the light of a sportive celebration. O'Flaherty thinks, the Sunday in question had been so called, in memory of Crom-Cruach's destruction. See "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xxii., pp. 198, 199.

<sup>199</sup> The Irish Crom Cruith is thought to express an idea of "God the Creator." The sun or fire was thought most strongly to express the symbolic form of the Supreme Being, by our Pagan ancestors. Cruith is possibly derived from the word Cruithain, which signifies, "to form" or "to create." Hence, the Irish word, Cruitheoir, which means "the Creator."

<sup>200</sup> See "Irish Folk Lore," by Lagenien-sis, chap. xxiii., pp. 195, 196. In the Preface to "Y Gwir yn erbyn y Byd," otherwise denominated, "Barddas;" or a collection of Original Documents, illustrative of the Theology, Wisdom and Usages of the Bardo-Druidic System of the Isle of Britain," there is a considerable amount of vague speculation, and some useful information, on this specific subject. See vol. i., pp. xiii. to lxxxii. The original Welsh, referring to symbol, theology and wisdom, and an English translation and notes, commanded sacrifices to this idol, on the day of Saman ;<sup>202</sup> and, he ordained, that both men and women should adore it, prostrate on the ground, until blood flowed from their noses, foreheads, knees and elbows. As many died from the severity of those genuflexions,<sup>203</sup> in this demoralizing and barbarous worship, the place was afterwards called Magh Sleacht.<sup>204</sup> The persons, present when St. Patrick arrived here, were engaged, in the adoration of their idolatrous object. There, according to some accounts, was seen the king himself, acting as high priest. But, the spell of superstition, then holding sway, was soon dissolved by St. Patrick. On finding he could, neither by fervent sermons, nor by great miracles, reclaim those people from the madness of their idolatry, the saint had recourse to his wonted arms of holy prayer. No sooner did he elevate his pure hands, for the subversion of that idol, than, in a threatening manner, on approaching, he lifted up the Staff of Jesus against it.<sup>205</sup> The idol fell down instantly, and upon the left side,<sup>206</sup> although the Bachall Isa did not touch it, nor leave St. Patrick's hand.<sup>207</sup> All the gold and silver dissolved into dust, while the little gods were swallowed up by the earth, even to their necks. Their heads, however, continued over the ground, even to the twelfth century.<sup>208</sup> Hereupon, many, who saw that prodigy, believed in the true and living God, and these were baptized in a fountain, which the saint, by his prayers, produced out of the earth.<sup>209</sup> There, too, in the exertion of his arms against the idol, a fibula,<sup>210</sup> or graif,<sup>211</sup> which confined the extremities of his garment, fell among the heather. Afterwards, the saint cut away all the heath, in that place, until he found the graif. A popular tradition prevailed, that no heather grew there, nor in the plain near it, owing to the incident recorded. The Tripartite Life states, that a demon was concealed within the idol, and thence banished by the saint. He then called all the people, with King Laeghaire, who there worshipped those idols. All, who saw the demon, feared death, unless Patrick would banish him to hell, and with this expressed wish, the saint complied. In this district, St. Patrick is said to have built a church, called Domnachmor,<sup>212</sup> and to have placed Mauran,<sup>213</sup> surnamed Barban, or Banban, over it. But, how long he con-follow. This work has been edited for the Welsh MSS. Society, by the Rev. J. Williams ab Ithel, M.A. This vol. was published at Llandovery, 1862, 8vo. Vol. ii., published in 1874, is similarly edited and arranged. Its contents refer to the Privilege and Usage of Bardism.

<sup>201</sup> On the very night of Samhain, A.M. 3656, Tighernmas died, with three-fourths of the men of Ireland about him, while worshipping Crom Cruach, at Magh-slecht.

<sup>202</sup> This corresponded with All-Hallows' eve, and this day is yet called in Ireland Samhain, from samh, "summer," and puin, "end."

<sup>203</sup> Dr. O'Connor translates this "propter excidium quod passi sunt viri Hiberniæ;" but, Dr. O'Donovan states, this is evidently erroneous.

<sup>204</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., nn. (b, c), p. 43, at A.M. 3656.

<sup>205</sup> There is a reference to St. Patrick's overthrow of the idol, Crom Cruach, in the "Book of Lecan," fol. 250, b. a., line 20. The fourth Life calls the idol Slecht, probably from the name of the plain, on which it stood. According to this account, also, the chief idol is said to have been adorned with gold and silver; while, it is added, "et duodecim Dii aerei fabricati hinc et inde erga Idolum positi."

<sup>206</sup> Such is the statement of Jocelyn; but, the Irish Tripartite Life, states, that the idol inclined over to its right side (for towards the south its face was turned), and the mark of the bachall lived in its left side.

<sup>207</sup> The Latin Tripartite there relates, "ad latus dextrum versus occidentem, cœpit sat sinistrè corruere. Faciem enim versam versus Temoriam habebat."

<sup>208</sup> According to Jocelyn's account.

<sup>209</sup> At Edentiny, such account is yet corroborated, by popular tradition.

<sup>210</sup> Such is the Latin term for this dress ornament.

<sup>211</sup> The Irish name for it. The object itself must have been a sort of button, or a buckle.

<sup>212</sup> The Latin Tripartite, renders this, by the words, "Basilicam magnam." The Irish Tripartite Life calls it, Domhnach-Maighe-Slecht.

<sup>213</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life states, that tinued here, at this time, cannot be accurately ascertained.<sup>214</sup> Although the foregoing varying accounts are mingled greatly with popular fables,<sup>215</sup> there can hardly be a doubt, regarding the historical celebrity attaching to those localities, and yet commemorated, in existing curious monuments, and in current traditions.

CHAPTER XI.

THE IRISH APOSTLE RESOLVES TO VISIT CONNAUGHT—HE CROSSES THE SHANNON—THE DRUIDS MOEL AND CAPLAT—PATRICK PREACHES THE GOSPEL TO THOSE PEOPLE, LIVING IN ROSCOMMON—ST. ASCICUS—CONVERSION OF ETINEA AND FETHLIMIA, THE DAUGHTERS OF KING LAOIGHAIRE—LABOURS OF ST. PATRICK IN TIR-CHAIREDHA AND HY-MANY.

THE great Apostle purposed to travel round the whole island, that he might convert it to Christ; but, he bore in mind, more particularly, that vision, which formerly he beheld in sleep, and wherein, he seemed called, by the infants of a western part of the country, even in their mothers' womb. He desired there the increase of God's kingdom, with greater effect; for, he had a special call of Providence, to visit that remote region. Patrick thus determined to go into Connaught, there to preach the Gospel, to the inhabitants of that province. He probably had spent the year 433, and a good part of 434,<sup>1</sup> on the Meath, Longford and Leitrim missions. Afterwards, according to the Tripartite Life, he crossed the Shannon, at a place, called Snav-daen,<sup>2</sup> or Snamh-daen,<sup>3</sup> where a ford was then first found,<sup>4</sup> which enabled the Apostle and his companions to cross that wide river, with great ease.<sup>5</sup> There, one of St. Patrick's servants, who was named Buadmael,<sup>6</sup> died and was buried. A church, afterwards, had been erected, at the spot; and, from him, it got the designation, Cill-Buadhmaoil.<sup>7</sup> This erection was regarded, as being specially under Patrician jurisdiction.<sup>8</sup> he left there, Mabran Barbarus, Patrick's relative and prophet. Colgan cannot find such a name, in our Irish Calendars; however, there are more Banbans than one, and, he conjectures, the present may have been St. Banban, the Wise, venerated at the 9th of May.

<sup>214</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. viii., and corresponding notes, 67, 69, 71, 74, pp. 237 to 240.

<sup>215</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. xlvii., p. 25; Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. liii., p. 42; Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. l., lvi., cii., cxi., cxiv., pp. 76, 77, 88, 89, 90, 91; Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xx., xxi., xxii., xxiii., xxiv., xxv., xxvi., xxvii., xxviii., xxix., xxx., xxxi., pp. 132, 133, 134. Also, see Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 397 to 400.

CHAPTER XI.—<sup>1</sup> Ussher places St. Patrick's journey to Connaught, in the year 434. See his "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. ccccxxxiv.

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Lanigan asks, if this might not have been near Drum-snav, in Leitrim. But, according to Dr. O'Donovan, the place, called in the Book of Armagh "vadam duorum avium," identical with Snamh daen, "the ford of the two birds," was the name of that part of the River Shannon, lying between Clonmacnoise, in the King's County, and Clonburren, in the county of Roscommon. See "Tribes and Customs of Hy-Many," Introductory Remarks, n. (f), p. 5.

<sup>3</sup> This is alluded to, in the Trinity College, Dublin, Manuscript, classed, H, 2. 16, p. 871.

<sup>4</sup> This is said to have been miraculously produced, owing to St. Patrick's merits. The Irish Tripartite Life remarks, that the learned will yet find that esker, in the bed of the river, and which thus rose up, under St. Patrick, in the ford.

<sup>5</sup> On this occasion, Ferrar very incorrectly states, that our saint crossed the Shannon at Lumneach, now Limerick. See his "History of Limerick," p. 4.

<sup>6</sup> Colgan could find nothing regarding him, in the Irish Calendars, unless he could have been identical, with a Buadan, whose feast has been referred, to the 14th or 24th of January, or to the 23rd of March.

In the western province were two celebrated Magi, named respectively, Maol and Caplat, who were charged by King Laoighaire, with the education of his daughters, Ethne and Fethelm.<sup>9</sup> By magic spells, those diviners procured a notable darkness, to settle over the lands of Magh Aoi,<sup>10</sup> for three whole days.<sup>11</sup> But, on the approach of St. Patrick, he blessed that region, and the obscurity was dissolved, by a remarkable brightness, in the atmosphere, except in that place, where Maol and Caplat dwelt.<sup>12</sup> The inhabitants, admiring those portents, turned with all their hearts to the teaching of God's servant, whom they greatly lauded, and a moral light, also, began to dawn within their minds. Beyond the Shannon, at a certain place, called Dumhagraidh,<sup>13</sup> St. Patrick ordained a St. Ailbe,<sup>14</sup> and he was afterwards connected with the church of Senchua,<sup>15</sup> in Tirellil,<sup>16</sup> or in Oild territory.<sup>17</sup> When Patrick was at Dumha Graidh,<sup>18</sup> ordaining the great multitude, he had the spirit of prophecy, and he smiled. "What has now happened?" asked his disciple Benen.<sup>19</sup> "Bron<sup>20</sup> and the monk Olcan,"<sup>21</sup> said Patrick, "who come towards me, along Traig-Eothaili,<sup>22</sup> and my foster-son, Mac-Erca,<sup>23</sup> with them; a wave of the sea made a great dash, and tried to carry off the youth."<sup>24</sup> He went, afterwards, through the territory of Ui-Oilella,<sup>25</sup> and he founded the church eastwards, in Tamhuagh.<sup>26</sup> This church was built, through God's providence, and by man's efforts. These people afterwards held it in singular veneration, and it was liberally endowed. Over this church, Carell<sup>27</sup> was set, he having been ordained by Patrick, Bron, and Bite,<sup>28</sup> according to the established ecclesiastical usage. Among the poste-

<sup>7</sup> This local denomination, at the present time, seems to have become obsolete.

<sup>8</sup> It was probably situated, within the parish of Moore, in the barony of Moycar-non, and county of Roscommon.

<sup>9</sup> Colgan has notices of these holy virgins, at the 11th of January, although nothing has been exactly discovered, regarding their festival day.

<sup>10</sup> Probus has "campum Hai," as lying on his way, near the course of the River Synon. See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xiii., p. 53. This Colgan explains, by Machaire Connacht, or the plain of Con-naught. See ibid., nn. 11, 12, p. 63.

<sup>11</sup> Jocelyn states, this darkness was intended to prevent St. Patrick approaching that country.

<sup>12</sup> This was in the level country of Roscommon. See Seward's "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," at Magh-ai.

<sup>13</sup> That it was in Connaught, Colgan tells us, in his Topographical Index to "Trias Thaumaturga," p. 709; but, he does not inform us, in what part.

<sup>14</sup> He is thought to have been identical with Cruimther-Ailbe, or St. Elbhe, venerated on the 30th of January.

<sup>15</sup> Now Shancoe, or Shancough, a parish in the barony of Tirerrill, and county of Sligo.

<sup>16</sup> Now the barony of Tirerril. See "The Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," edited by Dr. O'Donovan, p. xxxvi., n. 254.

<sup>17</sup> See Roderick O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxix., p. 374.

<sup>18</sup> There are six places named Doogary, in the county of Mayo, and two so called, in Roscommon. It is difficult, at present, to ascertain this locality.

<sup>19</sup> His feast occurs, on the 9th of November.

<sup>20</sup> His festival was held, on the 8th of June.

<sup>21</sup> A feast of St. Olcan, or Bolcan, is held, on the 20th of February.

<sup>22</sup> Now Trawhohelly, a famous strand near Tonrego, on the east boundary of the barony of Tireragh, and county of Sligo. See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," Explanatory Index to the map, at p. 499.

<sup>23</sup> It is doubted, by Colgan, if he can be identified with certain saints, mentioned in our Irish Calendars.

<sup>24</sup> The Latin Tripartite attributes to St. Patrick's vision, and to his merits, the protection then afforded.

<sup>25</sup> Also written, Hua Noilella.

<sup>26</sup> Now the church of Taunagh, or Tawnagh, in the barony of Tirerrill, and county of Sligo.

<sup>27</sup> Colgan thinks, he was venerated at Tirros, on the 13th of July.

<sup>28</sup> A saint of this name is venerated, on the 22nd, and on the 29th of July. The Irish Tripartite Life, moreover, states, in Latin, as if quoting from an older authority, "et ipse fecit amicitiam ad reliquias Assici, Rodani; et successores eorum epulantur invicem." The Latin Tripartite has a nearly similar statement; but, it omits the name of Assicus. It adds, that between this church city of Oilill, he baptized St. Maneus,<sup>29</sup> who was ordained subsequently, by Bishop Bron, of Cassel-irra.<sup>30</sup> Thence, St. Patrick went to a place, called Mag-Glais,<sup>31</sup> where the people joyously received him, and presented him with a grant of land, on which he laid the foundations of a basilica, afterwards called Killmore, or "the great church."<sup>32</sup> He left this mission, in charge of two disciples.<sup>33</sup> Next, he went into the district of Corca-ochland,<sup>34</sup> or Corcu Achland,<sup>35</sup> or Seachlann,<sup>36</sup> to the south of Ui-Ailella—another designation for Tir-Oillil—and to the north was a mountain, called Bagna,<sup>37</sup> or Badhghna.<sup>38</sup> There our saint found two brothers, called Ida, or Id, and Hono,<sup>39</sup> or Ono, who were Druids. There, too, he desired to erect a church. Hono asked Patrick, what he would give for some land, which was shown to him. Thereupon, Patrick answered, "Eternity." Hono, disregarding such an offer, said, "You possess gold: give it to me instead." Patrick replied, "I have given much, but God will offer more."<sup>40</sup> He afterwards found a mass of gold, in a place, where swine had been rooting. Then, Patrick gave that gold to Hono for his land. It was called Tir-na-brotha.<sup>41</sup> To reprove his avarice, St. Patrick said, "No king of thy race shall rule for ever."<sup>42</sup> This prediction caused Ono to shed tears, when the holy man felt compassion for his sorrow, and he added subsequently, "There shall not be a king unassisted by thy race, and who shall not be proclaimed by them." So it came to pass, for the Cenel Maic Erce was the strongest and most powerful sept, in Connaught; notwithstanding, they did not govern like high-kings. Ono then presented his farm and house, to St. Patrick; and Imleach-Ono was its designation, at that time. There, the Apostle built a church, and Ailfinn, or Elphin, was its subsequent denomination.<sup>43</sup> It became, afterwards, the seat of a well-known episcopal See.<sup>44</sup> On account of his penitence and liberality, Ono and his posterity were blessed by Patrick, who declared, that the palm and that of Rodan, a kindly feeling and fellowship prevailed, on the part of those, who ministered in them.

<sup>29</sup> His feast is supposed to have fallen, on the 2nd of September.

<sup>30</sup> This territory comprised the present parishes of Killaspugbrone and of Kilmacnowen, in the barony of Carbury, and county of Sligo.

<sup>31</sup> There is a Moyglass, in the barony of Ballintobber North, county of Roscommon, in which there is also a church, called Killmore, giving name to a parish.

<sup>32</sup> The church was otherwise called, Cill-mor Dithruibh.

<sup>33</sup> These are called, Conleng and Ercleeng, in the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>34</sup> So called, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>35</sup> In the Irish Annals, it is called Corca-Achlann.

<sup>36</sup> This was a territory, in the east of Roscommon County, and it comprised the parishes of Bumlinn, Kiltrustan, Cloonfenlough, with the western portion of the parish of Lissonuffly.

<sup>37</sup> Now Slieve Baune, which runs nearly parallel, with the River Shannon.

<sup>38</sup> This is a mountainous range, in the barony of Ballintobber North, and in the county of Roscommon. See John O'Donovan's "Tribes and Customs of Hy-Many," n. (h), p. 90.

<sup>39</sup> The Irish Tripartite alleges, that he was the son of Aengus, son of Érc Derg, or Érc the Red, who was the son of Brian, from whom the Ui-Honach descend.

<sup>40</sup> According to Jocelyn, St. Patrick told the Magus, that whatever money he possessed had been expended, in building churches, or in relieving the necessities of the poor.

<sup>41</sup> It may be Anglicised, "the district of the mass," from tir, "a region," and from broth, the genitive of which is brotha, "a mass," or "an ingot."

<sup>42</sup> The Clann-Branain, or Mac Branans, of this territory, are descended from the noble Druid Ona, who granted Imleach-Ona, now Elphin, to St. Patrick. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., n. (l), p. 358.

<sup>43</sup> The Irish Tripartite states, it was so called, from the ail, "a rock" which had been taken out of the well, which was made by Patrick, in the fair-green. That rock stood on the brink of the well. The Latin Tripartite adds, that the adjunct, fionn, "bright," or "clear," was derived from the appearance of the water, thus miraculously procured. Therefore, Ail-finn means "the rock of the bright fountain."

<sup>44</sup> It was situated, in Magh-Aoi, also called, Machaire Connacht, or "the plain of Connaught."

of laics and of clerics—eminent in the arts of peace and of war—should be from Ono for ever, and that the inheritance of that place should belong to them. Having there founded a church, he placed Assicus,<sup>45</sup> and Bite, the son of Assicus, as also Cipia,<sup>46</sup> the mother of Bishop Bite, to reside in this missionary station. The holy Bishop Assicus was regarded, as a worker in brass, or a brazier, for St. Patrick. Likewise, he made altars, and four-cornered book-cases, and four-cornered dishes. One of these four-cornered dishes was preserved in Ard-Macha, and another at Ailfinn, while a third was kept in Domnach-mor,<sup>47</sup> of Magh Seola,<sup>48</sup> on the altar of the holy Bishop Felartus,<sup>49</sup> in Ui-Briuin Seola,<sup>50</sup> far westwards from Ailfinn. Patrick went from Elphin to Dumacha,<sup>51</sup> or Domhacha, in the territory of Hua Noella,<sup>52</sup> or of Ui-Aillella. He built a church there, which was called Senchell-Dumaighe,<sup>53</sup> or Sencheall Dumaighe, which was known, afterwards, as Shankill,<sup>54</sup> in the barony and county of Roscommon. It lay immediately to the south of Elphin. There, he left many of his disciples, and among these are named, Machet or Macetus, Cetchen or Cetchenus,<sup>55</sup> and Rodanus or Rodan,<sup>56</sup> a noble priest. Along with these was left Mathona, or Matona,<sup>57</sup> Benen's sister. She received the veil from Patrick and from Rodan. Under the care of this latter holy man, the pious virgin was placed, and he was her spiritual director.

St. Patrick next approached Croghan, or Rathcroghan, situated in the wide tract of grazing lands, around Tulsk,<sup>58</sup> in the county of Roscommon.<sup>59</sup> Here <sup>45</sup> Colgan deems Assicus to have been identical with Assan, venerated on the 23rd of April, or perhaps, with Ossin, whose feast occurs, on the 1st of May, or on the 19th of July. Philip O'Sullivan Beare, in his work, "Decadis Patricianæ," lib. iv., cap. v., notices St. Assicus; yet, under this name, no mention of him occurs, in our Irish Calendars.

<sup>46</sup> Three different saints, called respectively, Copia, Cobha, Coppa, or Coipp, are venerated; one, on the 18th of January, the second, on the 24th, and the third, on the 28th of April. Colgan conjectures, the present saint may have been one of these.

<sup>47</sup> This church—the ruins of which are yet to be seen—is now called Domnach-Patruig, on the banks of Loch-Sealga, recte, Loch-Cimé, and now Lough-Hackett. It is in the barony of Clare, county of Galway. See James Hardiman's edition of O'Flaherty's "Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught," Additional Notes, B, p. 148.

<sup>48</sup> The plains, so called, were the inheritance of the O'Flaherties, for upwards of 800 years before the thirteenth century. See ibid., p. 147.

<sup>49</sup> Acknowledging his inability to determine who this bishop was, Colgan conjectures, nevertheless, that he may have been identical with a Feloranus, said to have been venerated, on the 13th of February. Yet, such a name, I cannot find, elsewhere, as being set down in our Calendars, for that date.

<sup>50</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Geart, or Book of Rights," the people of this tribe are placed in the barony of Clare, and county of Galway. See Index, p. 324.

<sup>51</sup> Anglicised "the mounds," in the Irish Tripartite. It does not seem to have been identified.

<sup>52</sup> Otherwise called Tir-olella. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiv., p. 271.

<sup>53</sup> Colgan was wrong, in his Index, by placing this church, in Kierrag-Arnensi, which was in the barony of Costello, and in the County Mayo, instead of in Ciarraidhe-Aei, where is Kilkeevan parish, near Castle-reagh, and which was in the west of Roscommon. See the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheets 20, 26. What probably led him astray was, that Machet, whom St. Patrick placed here, having been grandson of Ailell, (Ui Aillela), he took it for Tir-Ailell, thus confounding the descendants with their proper country. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," n. 8, p. 403.

<sup>54</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheets 15, 16, 21, 22. The Townland proper is on Sheets 16, 22.

<sup>55</sup> Colgan is not able to throw much light, on the history of these two disciples.

<sup>56</sup> It is conjectured, his festival may be found, at the 18th of January, or at the 24th of August.

<sup>57</sup> Nothing is known, with any degree of certainty, regarding her; yet, Colgan has some vague speculations, on a possible corruption of her name.

<sup>58</sup> The town and townland of Tulsk, in the parish of Ogulla, and barony of Roscommon, are defined on the "Ordnance are still to be seen many very ancient and remarkably curious monuments.<sup>60</sup> The fountain, known as Clibach,<sup>61</sup> flowed near or from the slopes of Cruachan,<sup>62</sup> on its eastern side.<sup>63</sup> Here, St. Patrick and his companions arrived, at early sunrise. In alluding to the sons and daughters of the Scotie rulers, who became consecrated men and women,<sup>64</sup> Patrick most probably had in mind this occasion, when having accidentally met the two daughters of King Leogaire, and having been questioned by them, as to the nature of the true God, he revealed to them the principles and duties of the Christian Faith. Here the clerics sat down at the fountain. Laeghaire Mac Neill's two daughters,<sup>65</sup> viz., Eithne<sup>66</sup> the Fair, and Feidelm<sup>67</sup> the Ruddy,<sup>68</sup> went early to the fountain to bathe,<sup>69</sup> as they were wont to do, when they found a synod<sup>70</sup> of clerics, at the well, with white garments, and with their books before them. The young princesses wondered, at the appearance of those clerics, and they imagined them to be fir-sidhe,<sup>71</sup> or phantoms. The young virgins questioned Patrick, "Whence are you, and whither have you come? Is it from the sidhe?<sup>72</sup> Are you Gods?" Patrick said to them, "It would be better for you to believe in God, than to ask regarding our race." The elder daughter said, "Who is your God, and in what place is he, in heaven or in earth? is he under the earth, or on the earth, or in the seas, or in the streams, or in hills, or in valleys? Has he sons and daughters? has he gold and silver? Is there a profusion of every good in his kingdom? Tell us plainly, how we shall see him, and how is he to be loved, and how is he to be found. Is he young or old? or is he ever-living? Is he beautiful, or have many fostered his son, or is his daughter handsome, and dear to men of the world?" Then, being full of the Holy Spirit, the saint responded, "Our God is the God of all, the God of heaven and of earth; the God of the seas and of rivers; the God of the sun, and of the moon, and of all the other planets; the God of the high hills, and of the lowly valleys; God over heaven, in heaven, and under heaven. He has a mansion, known as heaven, and the earth, and the sea, and he has all things that are in them. He quickeneth all things. He enkindleth all things. He giveth light to the sun, and to the moon. He Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheets 22, 28.

<sup>59</sup> See a paper of Sir Samuel Ferguson, LL.D., read February 26th, 1872, in the "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," No. xvii.—On Ancient Cemeteries at Rathcroghan and elsewhere in Ireland, &c., p. 115.

<sup>60</sup> Chief among these are the Reliquary, or "King's Burial-ground," and the Pillar-tomb of King Dathi, said to have been buried here, A.D. 428. Illustrations of these objects are to be seen, at pp. 114, 117.

<sup>61</sup> There is still a well at the rath, which is surrounded, by a double fosse. The word clibach is said to mean "a fox," or "a wolf." See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," n. 3, p. 291.

<sup>62</sup> This is the diminutive of Croagh, or Crogh, and it is applied to a round-shaped hill. See Dr. P. W. Joyce's "Origin and History of Irish Names of Places," part iv., chap. i., pp. 374, 375.

<sup>63</sup> In one place, Probus calls this fountain, Dabhach, and again, Clebach.

<sup>64</sup> See Father Joachim Lorenzo Villa-

nueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Confessio S. Patricii, cap. iv., num, 18, p. 202.

<sup>65</sup> Both of them were fostered, by those Magi, already named, Maol and Caplat.

<sup>66</sup> Identical with Inny, an Irish female name.

<sup>67</sup> Probably identical with the Irish female name Fedilmi, "the ever good."

<sup>68</sup> According to Jocelyn, one was named Eithne, and the other Fedella.

<sup>69</sup> The Irish Tripartite has it, to wash their hands.

<sup>70</sup> This word is here used, only in the sense of an assemblage. However, the Third Life mentions holy bishops, as being present in a Synod. See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. xlviii., p. 25. See, also, "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. xiv., p. 53. But, it may be asked, who were those bishops, at that place and time? for, with the exception of St. Patrick, we cannot be sure, that there were any other bishops then, in that part of Ireland.

<sup>71</sup> Literally, "fairy-men."

<sup>72</sup> "The fairies."

created fountains in the dry land, and he placed dry islands in the sea, and stars to minister to the greater lights. He hath a Son, co-eternal and co-equal with himself; and the Son is not younger than the Father, nor is the Father older than the son. And the Holy Ghost breatheth in them. And the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost are not divided. I desire, moreover, to unite you to the Son of the heavenly king, for ye are daughters of an earthly king." And, the daughters said, as if with one mouth, and with one heart, "How shall we come to believe in that king? Teach us duly, that we may see the Lord face to face—teach us, and we shall do as you will say to us." Then, replied Patrick: "Do you believe, that through baptism the sin of your mother and of your father shall be put away from you?" They answered, "We believe." "Do you believe in repentance after sin?" "Yes." After such a confession of faith, they were both baptized. Afterwards, Patrick blessed a white veil, which he placed upon their heads; and, they desired to see Christ, face to face. Then, Patrick said to them: "You cannot see Christ, except you first taste death, and unless you receive the body of Christ and his blood." The daughters replied, saying: "Give us the Communion, that we may be able to see the prophesied One." After this, they received Communion,<sup>73</sup> and fell asleep in death.<sup>74</sup> Patrick placed them under covering,<sup>75</sup> and in one bed,<sup>76</sup> or grave, they slept. Their friends greatly lamented them.<sup>77</sup> The Druids, Mael and Caplait, then entered into conflict with Patrick, on account of those daughters having believed, and having, through death, gone to heaven. Especially, Caplait came crying out against our holy Apostle; for, it was that Druid, who fostered the second daughter. However, the Apostle preached to him, and he believed. Afterwards, the saint cut off his hair.<sup>78</sup> After this, the other Druid, Mael, came, and he said to Patrick, "My brother has believed on account of thee; it shall not serve, nor strengthen him," said he, "for I shall again lead him into Paganism." And thus, while he was insulting Patrick, this holy man preached to him, and even that Druid believed in God, and in Patrick. Afterwards, the Apostle shaved him; and, hence, "Mael is like to Caplait," became a proverb, in Ireland, since together they believed. And, the days of weeping were finished, when those maidens were interred there. To commemorate this remarkable event, Sen-Domhnagh<sup>79</sup> was presented to Patrick for ever. Other writers state, the relics of those maidens were brought to Ard-Macha, or Armagh, where they await a final resurrection.

Afterwards, Patrick went to Tir-Caireda,<sup>80</sup> and he founded a church at

<sup>73</sup> From such passages, it appears, how essential it was, according to the opinion of Irish theologians, for all persons come to the use of reason not to neglect receiving the Eucharist, notwithstanding their having been recently baptized.

<sup>74</sup> This is said to have occurred, near the royal residence of Cruach, which is now known as Croghan, not far from Elphin.

<sup>75</sup> This seems to mean the earth, which covered their graves.

<sup>76</sup> The Tripartite expresses it, "in uno lecto quasi pausantes."

<sup>77</sup> Probus says: "Posita sunt autem corpora earum in lectulo uno, uno vestimento co-operta: feceruntque planctum magnum amici earum."

<sup>78</sup> This action seems to intimate, that he became a tonsured monk; but, further, we are not able to trace his history.

<sup>79</sup> There is no church of this name, in the neighbourhood of Rathcroghan, at present, and the name and site of Sen-Domhnagh seem to have become obsolete.

<sup>80</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life adds, as it had been called by our ancestors. Colgan, in his Topographical Index, only tells us, that it was a region in Connaught; but, the territory of Ciarraidhe-Aoi lay, in the western part of Roscommon County. This tribe derived its name from Ciar, one of the illegitimate sons of Fearghus, ex-King of Ulster, by Meadhbh, Queen of Connaught. At first, they had been settled in southern Munster; but, they removed to Connaught, under the conduct of Cairbre, son of Conaire, in the reign of Aedh, son to Eochaidh Tirmcharna, the eighth Christian King of Connaught. A curious account of this immigration is contained, in the Manuscript of Trinity College,

Ard-lice,<sup>81</sup> which was otherwise called Sen-Domhnach<sup>82</sup>—apparently not differing from the place so lately mentioned—and he left Deacon Caeman<sup>83</sup> in it. And, Patrick erected Ard-Senlis,<sup>84</sup> in Magh Nenda,<sup>85</sup> or the plain of Nenta. Here, he placed a holy woman, called Lalloc.<sup>86</sup> We are informed, moreover, that these went with Bishop Cethech,<sup>87</sup> to his country. His mother belonged to the race of Ailill,<sup>88</sup> and their family was of Cenel-Sai<sup>89</sup> [nigh] of Cianacht,<sup>90</sup> from Domhnach-Sairigi,<sup>91</sup> at Damhliac-Cianain,<sup>92</sup> now Duleek, in the county of Meath. Here, are yet to be found some interesting ecclesiastical antiquities.<sup>93</sup> It was Bishop Cethach's custom, to celebrate the great Pasch, in Domhnach-Sairigi. Again, at Ath-Da-lorg,<sup>94</sup> in Kells,<sup>95</sup> he

Dublin, classed H. 3. 17. p. 875. According to Dr. O'Donovan, the territory of Ciarraidhe of Connaught comprised the whole present barony of Clanmorris, in the county of Mayo, except the tearmonn of Balla, and also that portion of Costello barony, belonging to the archdiocese of Tuam, namely, the parishes of Aghamore, Knock, Bekan and Annagh, which was called Ciarraidhe Locha na n-Airneadh; the district of Ciarraidhe Aei, known as Clann Ceithearnaigh in Roscommon, extending, according to the most intelligent accounts of the natives, from the bridge of Cloonalis, near Castlereagh, westwards to Clooneane, where it adjoins the county of Mayo, and from Clooncan to Clooncraftfield, or Cluain Creamhchoille, where it adjoins the territory of Airteach, and thence in the other direction to Cloonaff, adjoining Lord Mountsandsford's demesne. Ciarraidhe Airteach comprised the parishes of Tibohine and of Kilnamanagh, in the modern grand-jury barony of Frenchpark, in the north-east of Roscommon County. See Roderick O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xlv., pp. 274 to 278. Also, the "Leabhar na g-Geart, or Book of Rights," edited by John O'Donovan, n. (f), pp. 100 to 103.

<sup>81</sup> By this name, it cannot readily be identified, on the Ordnance Survey Maps.

<sup>82</sup> There is an Ardleckna, in the parish of Aughrim, barony and county of Roscommon. We have the parish of Kilkeevan, containing the town of Castlereagh, in the county of Roscommon. See O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Geart, or Book of Rights," n. (f), p. 101. This, perhaps, is the church in question, the name having been changed to that of "the church of Caeman, the deacon," whom St. Patrick placed here. In Irish, Kilkeevan, should correspond.

<sup>83</sup> There are various saints, called Caeman, or Coeman—or as otherwise called Coemhoc, or Mochoemoc—in our Irish Calendars. After examining their respective claims for identification here, Colgan arrives at the probable conclusion, that the present one was Coeman, surnamed the Pilgrim, and whom St. Ængus calls the son of Bracan, in "Opuscula," lib. iv., cap. 76. Under the name of Mochoemoc the Pilgrim, he is venerated, on the 3rd of November.

<sup>84</sup> This place does not seem to have been identified.

<sup>85</sup> It is so called in the Latin Tripartite. It contained that hill, anciently called Sidh-Nenta, now Fairymount, in the barony of Ballintobber South, county of Roscommon. This place is celebrated, in Irish fairy legends.

<sup>86</sup> St. Ængus the Culdee makes her the niece of St. Patrick, and the daughter of Darerca, in "Opuscula," lib. iv., cap. 6. Yet, we do not find her name in our Calendars.

<sup>87</sup> He has been already alluded to.

<sup>88</sup> Olild or Ailill was the father of Kien, from whom are derived the Kiennachta.

<sup>89</sup> The Latin Tripartite has it, "pater de posteris say."

<sup>90</sup> There were two divisions of the Cienacht in Ireland; one portion in Northern Ulster, known as Kiennachta Glinne Gemhin, and the other, here noticed, was in Southern Meath, and called Kiennachta Breagh, or sometimes, Kiennachta Arda.

<sup>91</sup> According to Archall, the site of a monastery, at Domnachsarige, is now unknown. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 529. It should be sought for, however, in or near Duleek.

<sup>92</sup> This means, "the stone church of St. Kienan," the patron. See, on this subject, Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. iii., pp. 21 to 37.

<sup>93</sup> The accompanying illustration of the Abbey ruins, at Duleek, was drawn on the spot, and transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman. It was engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>94</sup> Considering that there was only one Ath-da-lorg, "the ford of the two forks," in Ireland—namely, the present Boyle—in his Index of Places, Colgan lays down this locality, as having been formerly a bishopric, in Connaught.

<sup>95</sup> This celebrated place is the head of a parish, in the barony of Upper Kells. It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 10, 11, 16, 17. The town and its Antiquities are noted, on Sheet 17.

<sup>96</sup> Among the many saints of this name, in celebrated the little Pasch, with Comgell,<sup>96</sup> or Comgilla; for, Cethech's people used to state, that Comgilla was Cethech's servitor. Patrick went, afterwards, to the territory of Ui-Maine;<sup>97</sup> and, he left there an arch-priest or a deacon of his people. This missionary was called Deacon Juis,<sup>98</sup> and he erected Fidharta;<sup>99</sup> and he baptized the Ui-Maine race. Moreover, Patrick left his books of orders and of baptism,<sup>100</sup> with Deacon Juis. In his extreme old age of one hundred and forty years,<sup>101</sup> it is related, that the latter baptized Ciaran mac-int-sair,<sup>102</sup> and that he used St. Patrick's Ritual, on this interesting occasion.

The Abbey Church of Duleek, County of Meath.

Among his disciples were some, who belonged to the Franks or Gauls.<sup>103</sup> It is said of these, that fifteen were brothers, and that they had one sister. Three of the brothers were named Bernicius, Hibernicius, and Hernicus,<sup>104</sup> otherwise called Ernicius.<sup>105</sup> Nitria was the name of their sister.<sup>106</sup> Various the Irish Calendars, Colgan is not able to distinguish the present holy man.

<sup>97</sup> The fullest account of this territory, its boundaries, sub-divisions, history and topography, will be found in the "Tribes and Customs of Hy-Many, commonly called the O'Kelly's Country," and in the prefixed Map. This tractate was edited, by John O'Donovan, in 1843, for the Irish Archæological Society.

<sup>98</sup> Colgan thinks the present saint was Justus, the son of Fergus, and who flourished in the time of St. Patrick. Colgan refers to the Life of St. Kieran of Clonmacnoise, chap. iv., for a further account of him; and, then, he seems to have been again confounded with St. Diarmaid Justus, venerated at the 10th of January, and with St.

Justan Lene, whose feast is at the 29th of July.

<sup>99</sup> Now Fuerty, in a parish of the same name. It is in the barony of Athlone, and county of Roscommon. For some notices of this place, see a paper, by Denis H. Kelly, Esq., in the "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. viii., p. 455.

<sup>100</sup> Otherwise, his Ritual Book.

<sup>101</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life adds, "ut aiunt peritissimi."

<sup>102</sup> Kieran, son of the artificer, whose feast is kept, on the 9th of September.

<sup>103</sup> Some of these most probably accompanied our Apostle, when he first came, as a missionary, to Ireland.

<sup>104</sup> He is so called, in the Irish Tripartite.

places were assigned to them. One of these was known as Imgoe,<sup>107</sup> of Baislic,<sup>108</sup> now the church of Baslick, which is a parish,<sup>109</sup> in the barony of Castlereagh, and county of Roscommon. It was situated, between Hy-Maine and Magh Nai. Our Apostle described to them the appearance of that place, with his finger, from Cill-Garad.<sup>110</sup> Here St. Patrick built a noble church, and it was called, also, by the title, Huaran-garadh.<sup>111</sup> Here, too, Cethech, his disciple, was left, and Ferta-gethich together. Then, Patrick produced that clear well,<sup>112</sup> which was called Uaran garad. He next went to Magh-Selcae, also called Dumha-Selca,<sup>113</sup> where young men lived, viz.: the six sons of Brian. These are named, Bolcderc, Derthacht, Echen, Cremthann, Caelcharna, and Echuid.<sup>114</sup> Patrick found three colossal and upright stones, which were erected there, by the Gentiles. On these stones, he inscribed, "Jesus,<sup>115</sup> Soter,<sup>116</sup> Salvator,"<sup>117</sup> one inscription only being left on each "gollon." Some bishops were with him, at that time, and they rested, where a grand view of the whole country might be obtained; while Patrick's seat was there pointed out, between the stones,<sup>118</sup> according to a prevalent popular tradition. The Irish Tripartite states, that nine bishops<sup>119</sup> were present, and these are thus named, viz.: Bron, or Bronus,<sup>120</sup> of Caisel-Irra, Sachelus<sup>121</sup> of Baislic-mor, in Ciarraighe, Brocaid<sup>122</sup> of Imlech-ech,<sup>123</sup> Bronachus the Presbyter,<sup>124</sup> Rodan,<sup>125</sup> Cassan,<sup>126</sup> Benen,<sup>127</sup> Comarb of Patrick, and Benen,<sup>128</sup>

<sup>105</sup> Thus is he named, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>106</sup> Colgan was not able to find any of these here enumerated, in our Irish Calendars, unless, indeed, they might have been classed, among the holy Franks or Gauls, thus mentioned in the Book of Litanies, attributed to St. Ænguss: "Gallos in solida per Jesum Christum inuoco in auxilium, &c. Gallos in Mag-salach, per Jesum Christum, &c. Gallos in Achadh-Ginain per Jesum Christum, &c."—"Opuscula," lib. v., num. 48, 49, 50.

<sup>107</sup> The word Imgoe is very obscure.

<sup>108</sup> It continued a monastic house, for many centuries. St. Cormac, son of Muirghius, its abbot, died, A.D. 800, according to the "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 410, 411. Dr. O'Donovan's edition.

<sup>109</sup> Its bounds are defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheets 20, 21, 22, 27, 28. The townland proper is on Sheet 21.

<sup>110</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life adds: "Quia venerunt ad Patricium ut obteret illis de locis quos invenerent."

<sup>111</sup> Now Oran, a parish between Castlereagh and Roscommon, in the county of Roscommon. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. x., and n. 88, pp. 244 to 246.

<sup>112</sup> He loved this water very much, according to that saying, attributed to him:—"Uaran gar [Uaran-gar]. O well! which I have loved, which loved me; Alas! my cry, O dear God! That my drink is not from the pure well."

<sup>113</sup> It is interpreted, in English, the "mound of the chase." This was the old name of a mound, which still exists, in the townland of Carns, a little to the south of Tulsck village, in the County Roscommon. The mound, or moat, lies due east, from the celebrated mound of Cairnfree.

<sup>114</sup> We are not furnished, by Colgan, with any notes further to identify them.

<sup>115</sup> This sacred name is of Hebrew form.

<sup>116</sup> This is the Greek form of the following word.

<sup>117</sup> This is Latin, meaning in English "Saviour."

<sup>118</sup> It should be an interesting subject for inquiry, to ascertain, if any such local denomination be now known, or if the inscribed stones alluded to could yet be found.

<sup>119</sup> Another, St. Biteus, is added in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>120</sup> Venerated, at the 8th of June.

<sup>121</sup> His feast is said to have been kept, on the 1st of August. He is otherwise known as Soichell.

<sup>122</sup> His feast occurs, on the 9th of July.

<sup>123</sup> He is said to have been a brother to Lomman, of Ath-Truim, or Trim, in the county of Meath.

<sup>124</sup> We cannot discover his festival.

<sup>125</sup> He may have been the Bishop Rodan, whose festival occurs, on the 24th of August.

<sup>126</sup> He was probably the saint of that name, venerated on the 4th of June.

<sup>127</sup> His festival was kept, on the 9th of November.

<sup>128</sup> Having vainly endeavoured to identify him under this name, Colgan thinks, he may have been a St. Benatius, who is said to have been venerated, on the 3rd of April, at Killchuile, in the deaconate of Sil-Maire-daich, in the diocese of Elphin.

<sup>129</sup> Colgan supposes him to have been a brother of Cethech, Felartus the bishop,<sup>129</sup> and his sister, a nun there, besides, another sister,<sup>130</sup> belonging to Croch-Cuile-Conmaicne.<sup>131</sup> Our holy Apostle founded a church, at Loch-Selca,<sup>132</sup> and, it was called Domhnach-mor<sup>133</sup> of Magh-Selca.<sup>134</sup> There the indefatigable missionary, having preached to the people, baptized many in the Faith of Christ. He blessed, from Dumha-Selca, the sons of Brian, and the inhabitants of Hua Briúin.<sup>135</sup> Having wisely arranged church affairs, he proceeded on his way, to accomplish other great works.

CHAPTER XII.

ST. PATRICK ADVANCES TO THE TERRITORY OF GREGRADHE, WHERE HE FINDS TWO CHURCHES—HE NEXT VISITS AIRTEACH AND ARNEN, CONMAICNE AND CERA—THENCE HE PROCEEDS TOWARDS UMAIL, WHERE HE BUILT A CHURCH AT AGHAGOWER—ST. PATRICK THEN ENGAGES IN A SPIRITUAL RETREAT ON THE SUMMIT OF CROUGHANAILCHE—AFTERWARDS IT WAS CALLED CROUGH-PATRICK—ITS SITUATION AND APPEARANCE—LEGENDS REGARDING WHAT OCCURRED, AT THIS PLACE—HE CELEBRATES THE PASCH AT AGHAGOWER, AND THEN GOES SUCCESSIVELY TO CORCATHMNE, TO MAG-MAC-ERCA, AND TO TIR-AMALGAIDH—GREAT SUCCESS OF HIS MISSION—HE FOUNDS KILLALA AND OTHER CHURCHES—HE JOURNEYS THROUGH HY-FIACHRACH.

AFTER these proceedings, Patrick went to Gregraidhe, a district in the south of Sligo County, and supposed to have been conterminous with the present barony of Coolavin. Originally, however, it was more extensive.<sup>1</sup> There, at Loch-Techet, now Lough-Gara,<sup>2</sup> lying on the frontiers of the counties of Mayo, Sligo, and Roscommon,<sup>3</sup> and near its banks, he founded a church in St. Feloran, whose feast is said to have been kept, on the 13th of February. However, I cannot find him in our Calendars, so named, and at that date.

<sup>130</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls one of these Callecha, and the other Crocha; but, neither of them can be identified, under such form of name.

<sup>131</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls it "Cuil-Chonnaicne in insula quadam freti, quod Muir-chonnaicne appellatur." In the Irish Tripartite, we have the following explanation: "quae sit insola in mari Conmaicne." This island of Connemara is now called Crughnakilly, or Cruanakeely, and sometimes Deer Island. At present, it has no remains of a church, although it had, in O'Flaherty's time. See James Hardiman's edition of his "Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught," n. (e), p. 102.

<sup>132</sup> It is now called Lough-Hackett. See James Hardiman's edition of O'Flaherty's "Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught," Additional Notes. B, pp. 147, 148.

<sup>133</sup> Now called Donagh-Patrick, on the banks of Loch-Sealga. See an account of this parish, in the "Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 31.

<sup>134</sup> The plains of Magh Seola were the inheritance of the O'Flaherties, for upwards of 800 years, antecedent to the thirteenth century. Those plains form the present barony of Clare, in the county of Galway.

<sup>135</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xlvii., xlviii., xlix., p. 25, and nn. 48, 49, p. 32; the Fourth Life, cap. liv., lv., lvi., lvii., p. 42, and n. 39, p. 49; the Fifth Life, lib. ii., cap. xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., xvii., p. 57, 58, and nn. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, p. 63; the Sixth Life, cap. lviii., lviii., pp. 77, 78, n. 64, p. 111, and again at cap. civ., cv., cvl., cvii., cviii., cix., cx., pp. 89, 90, and nn. 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, pp. 113, 114; the Seventh Life, pars. ii., cap. xxxiii., xxxiv., xxxv., xxxvi., xxxvii., xxxviii., xxxix., xl., xli., xlii., xliii., xlv., xlv., xlvii., xlviii., xlix., l., li., lii., pp. 134 to 137, and nn. 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, pp. 176 to 178. Also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 400 to 408, with accompanying notes.

CHAPTER XII.—<sup>1</sup> See the "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," edited by John O'Donovan, n. (d), p. 99.

<sup>2</sup> "It is about five and a-half miles long, and its breadth, which is very variable, is in some places three."—James Fraser's "Hand Book for Travellers in Ireland," No. 29, p. 461.

a place, called Druimnea,<sup>4</sup> or Drumma.<sup>5</sup> He also dug a well thereat, and no stream went into or came out of it; yet, it was always found to be full of water.<sup>6</sup> He afterwards founded a church in Gregraidhe, and he left there Attrach, or Attracta,<sup>7</sup> Talan's<sup>8</sup> daughter. She received a veil from St. Patrick's own hand.<sup>9</sup> And he left a teisc,<sup>10</sup> and a chalice, with her. In course of time, that church took its name from her, and it was known as Cill-Attrachta, or Killaraght,<sup>11</sup> in the barony of Coolavin, and county of Sligo. The holy patroness was sister to St. Caemhan<sup>12</sup> of Airdne-Caemhain, which place is said to have lain by the side of Lough Garman, now Wexford harbour,<sup>13</sup> in the province of Leinster.<sup>14</sup> Others, however, have placed it in Connaught,<sup>15</sup> and on the Islands of Aran.<sup>16</sup> Patrick blessed and placed a veil on her head. Drummana<sup>17</sup> was the name of that locality, where they were, at that time; but, Machaire<sup>18</sup> was its subsequent denomination, and both of these names appear to have now become obsolete. There, too, a casula<sup>19</sup> was sent down from Heaven, and, it alighted on St. Patrick's breast. "You shall have this casula, O nun," said Patrick. "No," said she, "not to me was it given, but to thyself." Thence, our holy Apostle went to the territory<sup>20</sup> of the sons of Erc; but, they refused to hear the word of life, and even they feloniously carried off Patrick's horses. Then the holy missionary, feeling very indignant, pronounced their degradation, and having a prophetic foreknowledge, he said: "Your seed shall serve the seed of your brother for ever." Patrick went into Magh-Airtich, of Ciarraidhe-Airtech,<sup>21</sup> and, there he blessed a

<sup>3</sup> See "The Genealogies, Tribes, and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," Explanatory Index to the Map prefixed, p. 493.

<sup>4</sup> Without any authority, Colgan places a monastery here. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiv., p. 271. Archdall, who places this supposed and unknown Druimnea abbey in the half-barony of Coolavin, and county of Sligo, quotes the foregoing passage. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 631.

<sup>5</sup> It lay in that part of Sligo County, to the east of Lough-Gara, according to a note (6), in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," at p. 408. However, we do not find it marked, on Dr. O'Donovan's Map of Hy-Fiachrach, in that district.

<sup>6</sup> Hence, it got the name, Bithlan, which means "ever full."

<sup>7</sup> A feast has been assigned to her, at the 9th of February, and one, at the 11th of August.

<sup>8</sup> This Talan was the son of Cathbadh, and he belonged to the Gregraidhe of Loch-Teched.

<sup>9</sup> However, Dr. Lanigan maintains, that she did not live until the sixth century had commenced, and perhaps late in it. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. x., p. 245.

<sup>10</sup> This object is only mentioned in the Irish Tripartite Life. It means "a wallet."

<sup>11</sup> It is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheets 45, 46, 47. The townland proper is on the latter Sheet.

<sup>12</sup> His feast is said to have been held, on the 12th of June.

<sup>13</sup> Alongside of it is this church, and it is still called Ardcavan. The true position was long since pointed out, by Roderick O'Flaherty, in his "Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught," at p. 90.

<sup>14</sup> The "Martyrology of Donegal" gives it this position.

<sup>15</sup> Such as Colgan.

<sup>16</sup> There, too, is a Kill-Coemhan, but it took denomination from a different saint, bearing, however, the same name, as the present holy man.

<sup>17</sup> There is a townland, called Maghera, in the parish of Emlaghfad, barony of Corran, and county of Sligo. It is situated, a little to the north of Coolavin, but, whether this can be the place in question is undecided.

<sup>18</sup> There is the parish of Drom, or Drum-monaghan, in the barony of Carra, and county of Mayo; but, this does not seem to correspond with the place here mentioned.

<sup>19</sup> Probably "a chasuble."

<sup>20</sup> This region does not seem to have been properly defined.

<sup>21</sup> Ciarraidhe-Airtech has been confined to the parishes of Tibohine and Kilnamanagh, in the north-west of the county of Roscommon, by John O'Donovan, in the "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," p. 103. However, it is evident, from this entry, and from the following one, that Airtech extended into the adjoining barony of Costello, in the county of Mayo. Indeed, in a marginal note, at the Index Geographicus, in that copy of Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," kept in the Dublin Society's Library, O'Flaherty has it as the barony of Costello, in Mayo County. It adjoined Kierragia-Airne.

<sup>22</sup> It is probable, a stone fort was at this place, called Ailech-Airtigh,<sup>22</sup> in Telach-na-cloch, now probably Tullaghna-rock.<sup>23</sup>

Afterwards, Blessed Patrick, prosecuting the great work to which his life had been devoted, went into Drummut,<sup>24</sup> or Dromat, of Ciarraighe-Airtigh;<sup>25</sup> and, with drawn swords, there he found two brothers, who were in contention, regarding their father's land, after his death. These are named Bibar, or Bibor, and Lochru, or Lochra, the two sons of Tomanchenn.<sup>26</sup> Patrick stretched out his arms, with a sign of the cross; and, their hands became fixed to the swords, so that they were not able to lift or lower them. "Sit ye," said Patrick. Then he blessed them; and made peace between them. And they gave the land to Patrick, for their father's soul. There, too, Patrick founded a church, where Cona,<sup>27</sup> or Conu,<sup>28</sup> the artifex, and a brother of Bishop Sechnall, was placed. Patrick went subsequently to Ciarraighe-Airne<sup>29</sup>—otherwise known as the Carragh or Cera district—where he met Ernaise, and his son Loarn,<sup>30</sup> under a tree. We are told, that the Apostle wrote an alphabet for the latter; and, he stayed a week with both, having twelve men accompanying him. Patrick founded a church there;<sup>31</sup> and, over it, Loarn was placed as a ruler,<sup>32</sup> he being full of those graces, given by the Holy Ghost.

Then Patrick went to Tobar-Mucno,<sup>33</sup> probably near to Bishop Mucna's<sup>34</sup> church, which was in Donaghmore,<sup>35</sup> in the parish of Killala, barony of Tirawley, and county of Mayo. Afterwards, he went to a place, where he marked out the site for a church, and defined its dimensions. In course of time, it was called Seincheall,<sup>36</sup> or "the old church."<sup>37</sup> While St. Patrick place; for Elagh or Ellagh bears such a meaning, while several places are so called, in Galway and Mayo. See Dr. P. W. Joyce's "Origin and History of Irish Names of Places," part iii., chap. i., p. 283.

<sup>23</sup> This townland—apparently an Anglicised form of the previous denomination—lies in the parish of Kilcolman, and in the barony of Costello. In it are the town of Ballaghedareen, and Coolevin, the residence of the MacDermott family.

<sup>24</sup> This is very possibly Drummad, in the parish of Tibohine, barony of Frenchpark and county of Roscommon.

<sup>25</sup> Jocelyn takes an inverted order of narrative for this incident and place, which he seems to confound with Ciarraghe—known as Kiarraighe Luachra, or Kerry, in Munster. See cap. lxxvi., p. 82.

<sup>26</sup> We find no identification of these persons.

<sup>27</sup> So is he called, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>28</sup> He is thus named, in the Irish Tripartite Life. Under either form, or indeed under any other, Colgan vainly attempts to identify him, with any of the saints, found in our Calendars.

<sup>29</sup> This district comprised the whole of the barony of Clanmorris, county of Mayo, except the Tearmon of Balla—consequently the parishes of Crossboyne, Kilcoleman, Kilvine and Tangheen, with parts of Knock and Mayo, were in it—as also the parishes of Aghamore, Bekan, and Annagh, in the barony of Costello, and in the diocese of

Tuam. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (f), p. 102.

<sup>30</sup> Colgan thinks he was venerated, at the 30th of August.

<sup>31</sup> Its particular name is not given, but there can hardly be a doubt, that it was Aghamore, as the Martyrology of Donegal has it, at the 30th of August, "Loarn, priest of Achadh-mor." The church, at present, is in ruins, but the cemetery is still used. While Colgan only mentions Loarn, as a priest, at Achadh-mor, Archdall unauthorisedly states, that St. Patrick erected a monastery for him, at Aghamore, in the deanery of Mayo. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 493.

<sup>32</sup> The Irish Tripartite has "et tenuit illum abbatem."

<sup>33</sup> There is Tober-Makee, in the parish of Drumatemple, in the barony of Ballymoe, and in the counties of Galway and Roscommon. Whether or not it may be the right place is uncertain.

<sup>34</sup> Bishop Muckna was the patron saint of Maighin or Moyne, near Killala. He is thought to have been identical with the Saint Mukna, Muicin, or Muckinus, venerated at the 4th of March.

<sup>35</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," Addenda P., and n. (d), p. 466.

<sup>36</sup> It is thus written, in the Latin Tripartite Life; in the Irish version, it is noticed as Senchill.

<sup>37</sup> Some think, this was Shankill, near and his other companions were engaged, in making arrangements for the building of this church, and in transacting other business; it is stated, that St. Seachnall, or Secundinus,<sup>38</sup> his disciple and successor, was engaged praying under a leafy elm-tree, and wrapt in heavenly contemplation. Thenceforward, the mark of the Cross of Christ was found impressed on the earth, as a memorial of his great devotion.<sup>39</sup> Afterwards, he went into the country of Conmaicne,<sup>40</sup> into Cuil-Tolaigh,<sup>41</sup> and he founded four-cornered churches, in that place. One of these was called Ard-Uscon.<sup>42</sup> He went to Magh-Cera,<sup>43</sup> and stopped at Cuil-Corra,<sup>44</sup> where he preached, baptized many, and founded a church, for its people. Afterwards, Patrick proceeded to Magh-Foimsen,<sup>45</sup> where he met two brothers, namely, Luchtae and Derclam. The latter, a man of depraved morals and cruel, sent his servant to kill St. Patrick, but Luchtae, who had embraced the Christian religion, prevented him. Then the holy missionary said to Luchtae: "There shall be priests and bishops of thy seed, while the race of thy brother shall be cursed, and his descendants shall be few." On departing, St. Patrick left in that place Cruimther Conan,<sup>46</sup> and, he went, afterwards, to Tobar-Stringle,<sup>47</sup> or Stingle,<sup>48</sup> in the desert. He was two Sundays living beside that well, and these he celebrated, with great devotion, while he spent that whole time, in the exercise of sublime contemplation.

The Irish Apostle, directing his course towards the broad Atlantic, afterwards went to the men of Umhall<sup>49</sup>—called "The Owles"<sup>50</sup> by English writers<sup>51</sup>—and there he stopped at a place, which we find called Achadh-Elphin, in the barony and county of Roscommon.

<sup>38</sup> His festival was kept, on the 27th of November.

<sup>39</sup> A very old writer is quoted, in the Latin and Irish Tripartite Lives, in these words: "fuit Secundinus solus sub ulmo frondosa separatim, et est signum crucis in eo loco usque in hunc diem."

<sup>40</sup> There were three territories of the Conmaicne, in Connaught.

<sup>41</sup> This is now the barony of Kilmaine, in the south of the county of Mayo. It contains the parishes of Kilcommon, Kilmainbeg, Kilmainmore, Kilmolara, Moorgaga, Robeen, and Shrule, as also parts of Ballinrobe, Cong, Mayo, and Ballincollea.

<sup>42</sup> In the Index Topographicus, Colgan writes, that this church was in Kierragae-Arnensis in Connaught. This, however, is contrary to the reading of the text, which places it in Cuil-Tolaigh.

<sup>43</sup> This was in the barony of Cara, and county of Mayo. The barony contained the parishes of Aghlish, Ballyheane, Ballyovey, Breafty, Burriscarra, Drum, Minola, Rosslee, Tenlough, and Towaghty, as also parts of Ballintober, Islandeady and Kiltacomoge.

<sup>44</sup> This was, probably, in the parish of Burriscarra.

<sup>45</sup> In the Index Topographicus, Colgan writes, that Magh-Foimsen was in the region of Kera. There is a place, called Funshinaugh, in the present parish of Cong, barony of Kilmaine, and county of Mayo. It lay within the ancient district of Partry.

<sup>46</sup> Colgan has a conjecture—which is a very unreliable one—that he seems to have been identical with St. Canoc, whose feast occurs, at the 11th of February. There is a Conan in Tirechan's list; but, it would not be safe to pronounce, that he was the priest left in the district of Cara. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. x., and nn. 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 99, 100, pp. 246 to 248.

<sup>47</sup> So it is called, in the Irish Tripartite Life. It is now Ballintober, in the barony of Carra, and county of Mayo. It is also called, Baile-Tobair-Phadruig. Baile na craibhe, "the town of the bush," was another name for it. On the site of that church, erected by St. Patrick, Cathal Croidhearg, King of Connaught, founded a magnificent abbey, A.D. 1216. See "The Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," edited by John O'Donovan, n. (l), p. 191.

<sup>48</sup> The name is thus written, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>49</sup> The territory of Umhall comprised the baronies of Burrishoole and Murrisk, county of Mayo.

<sup>50</sup> From the pronunciation of Umhall, viz., Oo-al.

<sup>51</sup> From Maille, the Clann mhaílle, or the O'Malleys, derived their descent, and since the tenth century, they have been the hereditary lords or toparchs of this mountainous region, where their families are yet numerous. See "The Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," edited by John O'Donovan, n. (t), p. 43.

Fobhair,<sup>52</sup> or Acadh-fobhuir,<sup>53</sup> "field of the spring," so named from a celebrated fountain, afterwards called St. Patrick's well.<sup>54</sup> It is now known as Aghagower,<sup>55</sup> a village and parish, containing the ruins of an ancient church and of a dilapidated Round Tower.<sup>56</sup> Here, St. Patrick established an episcopal See; and there, too, Bishop Senach<sup>57</sup> was ordained. He was a

Round Tower and Church, at Aghagower, County of Mayo.

They were celebrated as mariners. See nn. (i, j), p. 181. Ibid.

<sup>52</sup> So called, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>53</sup> Thus is it written, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>54</sup> See Rev. Michael J. O'Farrell's "Popular Life of St. Patrick, Apostle and Patron of Ireland," chap. xi., p. 150, note.

<sup>55</sup> This extensive parish is situated, in the baronies of Burrishoole and of Murrisk, and it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo," Sheets 77, 87, 88, 89, 97, 98, 99, 106, 107, 108, 115, 116. The town and townland proper are noted on Sheets 88, 98, and are situated within the barony of Burrishoole.

<sup>56</sup> The accompanying illustration, from a sketch, taken on the spot, by James C. Fitzgerald-Kenny, Esq., M.R.I.A., has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it has been engraved by Mrs. Millard. The following notes—in a letter headed Clogher House, Ballyglass, County Mayo, September 11th, 1874—were taken on the spot, and were communicated to the author, by J. C. Fitzgerald-Kenny, Esq., M.R.I.A. They contain an account of the shattered ruins here left. The little door—to the right of the church ruins, as presented in the view—opens into a small sacristy, and a huge buttress has been added to the eastern gable, to correspond with the former externally. Neither annexe ascended more than half way to the eaves. Without buttresses and general repairs, the church will probably become a mere heap of ruins, before many winters are over. Mr. Fitzgerald-Kenny observed the loci in quo of a departed mullion; and, from this he inferred, that the interlaced east window may have been a later insertion, when, perhaps, the east gable was rebuilt. Numbers of tombs and headstones crowd the church, and the cemetery adjoining. Of the round tower, the door is modern: a long thick stone forms a lintel, very well inserted. The upper portion of the tower has in part fallen, displaying to the spectator both its outer and inward construction. The thick ivy has in its embrace probably been a means of preservation to the building, but its stem which—as thick as a young tree of eight or ten years—actually has grown through the lower story wall itself, will, in its constant enlargement, perhaps, à la longue, disintegrate the lower courses of the masonry, and finally demolish all that still remains of the tower, which seems to have been repaired man of admirable purity, and innocence of life.<sup>58</sup> St. Patrick blessed him, and all his family. He prophesied, likewise, that many saints and holy priests should succeed him. Senach had asked, for two<sup>59</sup> great and prized favours, through St. Patrick's prayers, viz. : in the first place, he wished to preserve the orders, he had received, from every stain of mortal sin ; and, in the second place, he desired that the church he served should not be called after his name, as was the custom, in many localities of Ireland.<sup>60</sup> This he asked, lest vain-glory, the moth which consumes so many virtues, should infringe on his sincere humility. Approving his simplicity of heart, St. Patrick assented to his request. At this place, Sennach ended his days, in great sanctity.<sup>61</sup> His memory was there perpetuated, by signs and wonders. Patrick desired greatly, to erect a See, at Achadh-Fobhair, and to remain there, during the rest of his days, so agreeable was its site, for heavenly contemplation. Then, he said, "I would remain here, on a small plot of land, after circumambulating churches and fastnesses ; for, I am infirm, I would not go."<sup>62</sup> But, the necessities of the Irish mission urged him to seek further adventures. Then, Patrick left two miraculous trout alive in the well, and they will be there living for ever,<sup>63</sup> according to a popular tradition.

That high mountain range of Mayo, lying still more to the west, stretched before St. Patrick, and Cruachan-Aighle,<sup>64</sup> was a prominent object of stern grandeur, rising high above the sea-waves, on the south of the present Clew Bay.<sup>65</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life states, that having provided for the good government of the churches and monasteries he had established, St. Patrick resolved on some years ago. The original entrance was apparently on the second story. As Mr. Fitzgerald-Kenny had no ladder, he could only conclude, that he saw the door, and a window, from the floor. As usual, there is no trace of a staircase. The various stories evidently depended for intercommunication on ladders. Not far off is shown a small ruin, a mere fragment of walls, as it appeared from the road. This is called "St. Patrick's Bed," being the last relic of a building, wherein the "Apostle of Ireland" is said to have passed a night. In the parish church are some old holy-water fonts ; one, somewhat resembling an ancient classic tragic mask, is very interesting.

<sup>57</sup> The feast of this holy man, as Colgan thought, occurs on the 10th of September.

<sup>58</sup> The name St. Patrick conferred on him was "Agnus Dei," according to the Tripartite Lives.

<sup>59</sup> According to Jocelyn ; the Tripartite Life gives three separate requests.

<sup>60</sup> The Tripartite Lives add a third request of Bishop Senach, viz. : that what was wanting to complete his own years should be added to the age of his son, Mac Aenghusa. It was for the latter, that Patrick wrote an alphabet, on the very day that Bishop Senach was ordained. The "Book of Armagh" calls it "abgitorium," fol. 13, b, a. It is curious to observe, also, that Nennius represents St. Patrick to have written 365 "abgitoria," or "abietoria," chap. 60. These are supposed to be corrupt forms for "abecedarium." See, on this subject, Rev. James Henthorn Todd's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. iii., pp. 508, 509, and n. 3.

<sup>61</sup> He is commemorated, in lib. iv., "Decadis Patricianæ," cap. vi., by Philip O'Sullivan Beare.

<sup>62</sup> The angel said to Patrick, according to the Irish Tripartite Life :—

"Everything you select shall be yours—
Every land, whether plain or rough,
Both hills and churches,
Both glens and woods,
After circumambulating churches and fastnesses,
Though infirm, that you shall select."

<sup>63</sup> St. Patrick is there said, to have predicted, according to the Irish Tripartite Life :—

"The two inseparable trout,
Which would advance against perpetual streams,
Without obligation—without transgression—
Angels will be along with them in it."

<sup>64</sup> This was the name, originally given to the present Crough Patrick. The latter name it bears, in consequence of the recorded retreat and residence of our Irish Apostle, on its summit, during the forty days of Lent.

<sup>65</sup> A description of this celebrated Reek is to be found, in Rev. Cæsar Otway's "Tour in Connaught," pp. 306 to 331 ; but, it is very objectionally and disagreeably flavoured imitating our Divine Lord's fast;<sup>66</sup> and, accordingly, having ascended to the summit of this steep mountain, on the Saturday before the first Sunday of Lent,<sup>67</sup> he commenced a most rigorous course of life there,<sup>68</sup> and for the duration of forty days, he was constantly engaged in prayers, contemplation, watching, and in all manner of austerities.<sup>69</sup> During this whole time, he tasted neither food nor drink;<sup>70</sup> but, his whole mind was fixed devoutly on God's perfections, and he lived in a sort of heavenly rapture. In this manner, as in several other acts of his life, Patrick seemed like a second Moyses.<sup>71</sup> The Lent of the year 434 is mentioned by Harris,<sup>72</sup> for this retirement; but whatever we may think, regarding the various incidents recorded in reference to this whole transaction, the date must be assigned to some later year.<sup>73</sup> This the Third Life seems to indicate.<sup>74</sup> The Bollandists refer that visit of our saint to Cruachan-Aigle,<sup>75</sup> to about the year 453.<sup>76</sup> Our hagiographers and historians relate his miraculous works, while dwelling on the lonely top of this mountain. When the end of those forty nights and forty days had come, as we are told, the mountain around him was filled with black birds, under which form, phalanxes of Cacodemons<sup>77</sup> were deemed to have been disguised; and, so numerous were they, that he could see neither heaven nor earth. Terrific were their screams, and fetid was the odour those demons caused. He continued, reciting Psalms and Divine Hymns; but, they went with the anti-Catholic prejudices of the writer.

<sup>66</sup> See Matthew iv. Jocelyn tells us, in that holy fast, St. Patrick desired to imitate Moses, who observed it, under the law of nature, and Elias, who observed it, in the written law. Especially did he imitate our dear Saviour, who consecrated in his person that mystical fast.

<sup>67</sup> "Exit in desertum, id est, Croighan-aigle in tempore Quadragesimæ ante Pascha." See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. lxxxv., p. 28. We are told, moreover, that he sat there, on a stone, having four stones placed around him, in quadrangular form. See ibid. This will apply to the ruined oratory walls, on the top of this mountain, as the writer had an opportunity for seeing them. Jocelyn remarks, that he disposed these five stones, in the form of a cross. In the midst of these, he placed himself, showing as well by the form and manner of his occupancy, as by his mortifications and his abstinence, that he was the true servant of Christ, and a bearer of the cross.

<sup>68</sup> Yet, the Irish Tripartite Life has it, that he went to the Cruaghan, on the Saturday of Whitsuntide.

<sup>69</sup> "The Striving of St. Patrick on Mount Cruachan" is verified, at considerable length, in Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 31 to 50.

<sup>70</sup> In a somewhat self-contradictory manner, the author of the Irish Tripartite Life states, that this miraculous abstinence lasted from Shrove Saturday to Easter Saturday.

<sup>71</sup> Thus states the Irish Tripartite: God accosted them both out of the fire; six score years was the age of each; the place of sepulture of both is uncertain.

<sup>72</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 15.

<sup>73</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan considers, that the proceedings of St. Patrick, after his first celebration of Easter, A.D. 433, until his arrival at Cruachan-Aichle, could not be comprised, within less than two, three, or perhaps even more, years.

<sup>74</sup> See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. lxxxv., p. 28. Also "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. clxxi., p. 102.

<sup>75</sup> There is to be found an interesting paper, by Mr. J. O'Beirne Crowe, in "The Journal of the Historical and Archaeological Association of Ireland," vol. i., part ii. Fourth Series. January, 1871, pp. 328 to 330. This contains some ingenious conjectural remarks, regarding the derivation of the Irish word clochan, as applied to building of a certain type, Pagan and early Christian. He thinks, it must have been of Gaulish origin, and, he says, that by change of a letter, clochan has become crochan, and in the case of Crochan Aigle (now Croch Patric) the last syllable, he maintains, cannot be taken as a diminutive. He adds: "As to the clochan and the crochan they have exactly the same form—starting from a wide base and ending in a sharp peak."

<sup>76</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tōmus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo, Apostolo et Primate Hiberniæ. Commentarius Prævius, sect. v., p. 523.

<sup>77</sup> Probos does not call those birds, to which allusion has been made, devils. He writes: "Multitudo avium venit circa illum, ita ut non posset videre faciem caeli et terræ ac maris propter aves." See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xix., p. 58.

<sup>78</sup> It is easy and natural to believe, that not away from him, thus causing the saint no slight degree of molestation.<sup>78</sup> He then became troubled and indignant, renewed his fervent prayers to God, and made a sign of the cross against them; he rang his bell, also, and the men of Erinn heard its sound.<sup>79</sup> Afterwards, he flung it at the unholy and routed bands,<sup>80</sup> who were chased into the Atlantic Ocean.<sup>81</sup> With the violent shock, a gap was broken in that bell, which was known thenceforward as the Bernan-Brighte.<sup>82</sup> This victory having been achieved, the Lord was pleased to comfort his faithful servant, by sending whole choirs of Angels, now assuming the shape of white birds. Floating on their wings, around the mountain's top, the sweet notes and celestial melodies of those birds filled his soul with peace and joy. Then, too, according to the Irish Tripartite Life, an angel went to converse with him, and said to him, "God will not give thee what thou demandest; for He thinks the demands weighty, and immense, and great." "Is that His decision?" said Patrick. "It is," answered the angel. "This is my purpose, then," said Patrick, "I shall not leave this Cruachan, until I die, or all my petitions shall be granted." His perseverance was finally crowned with success, and his prayers were most favourably received by the Almighty.<sup>83</sup> These petitions, which he addressed sea-fowl and various birds of prey found their resting-places, on this elevated reek. They might have assembled, too, in great numbers, and feel scared, on seeing a person, living there so long, and in such a lonely spot. It appears very probable, that in course of time, these birds were transformed, by the fancy of superstitious people, into flocks of demons, which came to tempt and disturb the holy man from his devotions. See Thomas Moore's "History of Ireland," chap. x., p. 220.

<sup>79</sup> Jocelyn observes, that by sounding his bell, and by frequent strokes, he drove them from all the coasts of Ireland, to islands ignorant of God and of the true Faith. Thenceforward, even to the time of Jocelyn, no venomous animals were seen in Ireland. Nor were its inhabitants afterwards molested, with apparitions of devils, as people often were in other countries.

<sup>80</sup> The Cistercian monk Jocelyn relates, that Ireland since its first inhabitation had been pestered with a triple plague, viz., with a great abundance of venomous reptiles, with a number of demons visibly appearing, and with multitudes of Magicians, so that the like was not recorded of any other country or kingdom. The glorious and most holy bishop laboured by his intercession, by his most fervent prayers, and by other exercises of devotion, to deliver the island from that triple pestilence. The most excellent prelate, it is said, taking the Staff of Jesus into his sacred hand, and elevating it in a menacing manner, as also having the favourable assistance of angels, he gathered together into one place, all the venomous reptiles that were in Ireland, after he had driven them before him to a most high mountain, hanging over the sea. This steep had been called then Cruachan-Aigle, and afterwards it was known as Cruach Padruig, that is "St. Patrick's mountain." Thence he cast the reptiles down from that steep precipice, to be swallowed up by the sea. The local guides still point out Lugnademon—a yawning gap on one side of Crough Patrick, and down which, as the legend tells us, St. Patrick hurled the toads and snakes and evil spirits to the sea. After directing his face towards the Isle of Man, Jocelyn immediately adds, when he has told of St. Patrick banishing serpents from Ireland, blessing Man with all the other Isles by him converted to Christ, by help of his prayers, he procured them the singular benefit of exemption from reptiles.

<sup>81</sup> Passing northwards, towards the steep mountain of Slieve League, these Demons emerged from the deep, and took up their abode in the savage wilds of Seangleann, on the south-west coast of Donegal. Thence, they were afterwards driven, by St. Columkille. See O'Donnell's or "Quinta Vita S. Columbæ," lib. i., cap. lxxxviii., p. 403. Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>82</sup> This miraculous bell seems to have been preserved in the twelfth century; for, Jocelyn states, that the saint's bell, being broken on one side by his often using it, was mended by an angel. Jocelyn does not forget to add, that the mark of the breakage was visible, in his time, although that bell had been repaired.

<sup>83</sup> The result has been thus poetically recorded in "The Striving of St. Patrick on Mount Cruachan," by Aubrey De Vere:—

"Then heavenward sped
Victor, God's angel, and the man of God Turned to his offering; and all day he stood
Offering in heart that offering undefiled
Which Abel offered, and Melchisedek,
And Abraham, Patriarch of the faithful race,
In type, and which, in fullness of the times,
The Victim-Priest offered on Calvary, to God, were accompanied by tears, which fell on his casula, or vesture, during the time of his penitential retirement on Croaghpatrick. His chief petitions were :<sup>84</sup> first, that every native of Ireland, even at the point of

And, bloodless, offers still in heaven and earth,
Whose impetration makes the whole Church one.

So stood he offering till the eve, and still Offer'd ; and, as he offer'd, far in front Along the ærial summit once again Ran out that beam like fiery pillar prone Or sea-path sunset paved, and by his side That angel stood. Then Patrick, turning not His eyes in prayer upon the west close held, Demanded, 'From the Maker of all worlds What answer bringest thou?' Thus the angel spake :—

'Down knelt in Heaven the Angelic Orders Nine,

And all the prophets and the apostles knelt,
And all the creatures of the hand of God,
Visible, and invisible, down knelt,
While thou thy mighty mass, though altar-less,

Offer'dst in spirit, and thine offering joined ;
And all God's saints on earth, or roused from sleep

Or on the wayside pausing, knelt, the cause Not knowing ; likewise yearned the souls to God :

And lo ! the Lord thy God hath heard thy prayer,

Since fortitude in prayer—and this thou know'st—

(Smiling the Bright One spake) is that which lays Man's hand upon God's sceptre. That thou sought'st

Shall lack not consummation. Many a race Shrivelling in sunshine of its prosperous years,

Shall cease from faith, and shamed though shameless, sink

Back to its native clay ; but over thine God shall the shadow of His hand extend,
And through the night of centuries teach to her

In woe that song which, when the nations wake,

Shall sound their glad deliverance : nor alone

This nation, from the blind dividual dust Of instincts brute, thoughts driftless, warring wills

By thee evoked, and shapen by thy hands,
To God's fair image, which confers alone Manhood on nations, shall to God stand true ;

But nations far in undiscovered seas,
Her stately progeny, while ages waste,
The Kingly ermine of her Faith shall wear,
Fleece uncorrupted of the Immaculate Lamb,

For ever : lands remote shall lift to God
Her fanes ; and eagle-nurturing isles hold fast
Her hermit cells ; thy nation shall not walk

Accordant with the Gentiles of this world,
But as a chosen people wear the crown
Or bear the Cross : and when the end is come,
When in God's Mount the Twelve great Thrones are set,

And round it roll the Rivers Four of fire,
And in their circuit meet the Peoples Three
Of heaven, and earth, and hell, fulfill'd that day

Shall be the Saviour's word, what time He stretched

The crozier-staff forth from the glory-cloud,
And swear to thee, 'When they that with Me walked

Sit with Me on their everlasting thrones,
Judging the Twelve Tribes of Mine Israel
Thy people thou shall judge in righteousness.

Thou therefore kneel, and bless thy land of Eire.'

Then Patrick knelt, and blessed the land, and said,

'Praise be to God who hears the sinner's prayer.'

—See "Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 48 to 50.

<sup>84</sup> In a very dramatic but legendary manner have they been recorded, by the author of the Irish Tripartite Life, in the following narrative. "I will bring so many souls from pain," said the angel, "and as many as would cover so far as your eye could reach on the sea." "That is no great boon for me," said Patrick ; "not far can my eye reach over the sea." "You shall have between sea and land, then," added the angel. "Is there anything more granted to me besides that?" asked Patrick. "There is," said the angel ; "you can bring seven every Saturday from the pains of hell for ever." "If anything be granted to me," observed Patrick, "let me have my twelve men." "You shall have them," said the angel, "and depart from Cruachan." "I shall not depart," said Patrick, "because I have been tormented, until I am recompensed. Is there anything else, then, to be granted to me?" asked Patrick. "Yes," said the angel ; "you shall have seven every Thursday, and twelve every Saturday, from pains, and depart from Cruachan." "I will not depart," answered Patrick, "because I have been tormented, until I am recompensed. Is there anything else granted to me?" asked Patrick. "There is," answered the angel ; "the great sea to come over Erin seven years before the Judgment, and depart from the Cruachan." "I will not depart," said Patrick, "since I have been tormented, until I am gratified." "Is there anything more you demand?" asked the angel. "There is," answered Patrick, death, should obtain God's clemency, after Confession and repentance; secondly, that barbarian invaders should not prevail against the Irish people; and thirdly, that no Irish person should be found living at the day of Judgment, because the sea should cover all Ireland for four years, previous to the great accounting day.<sup>85</sup> Whether or not, that curious and rude cell on the summit of Crough Patrick dates back to our Apostle's time may be questioned; and yet, it has every appearance of the most remote antiquity. At the eastern end of a plateau, on your right hand, as you ascend the usually-travelled course from the sea, are the remains of what once was a small cell, about twelve feet by eight; the walls have been built without mortar. This building has been sunk, much below the level of the adjoining ground, possibly to get shelter from the blasts and rain of Atlantic storms, that rush with chilling and unchecked sweep upon the towering peak. At the base of the tottering eastern gable are the remains of a bench-like projection, said to have formed the altar; the floor of the church is level with the sunken path, which leads to it. As you enter, a stone, with an impression on its upper face, is to be seen; this, they tell you, has been made by the knees of St. Patrick, during long seasons of prayer. Round the flat surface of the top, and quite along its verge, a sunken way has been dug. This is about nine feet wide, and stony, the stuff removed to make it has been cast above its outer edge, so as to form a rude parapet behind it, and the steep sides of the mountain, which fall away abruptly on all sides.<sup>86</sup> Opposite your approach are the falling walls of what

"that Saxons may not occupy Erin, by consent or force, whilst I shall be in heaven." "It shall be granted thee," said the angel; "and depart from the Cruachan." "I will not depart," said Patrick, "since I have been tormented, until I am gratified. Is there anything more granted to me?" asked Patrick. "There is," said the angel; "every one who repeats thy hymn from one day to the other shall not suffer pains." "The hymn is long and difficult," said Patrick. "Every one who repeats from Crist illum"—recte Crist linn, "Christ with me"—"to the end, and every one who repeats the name, and every one who observes penitence in Erin, their souls shall not go to hell; and depart from Cruachan," said the angel. "I will not depart," said Patrick, "for I have been tormented, until I am gratified. Is there anything more?" asked Patrick. "Yes," said the angel; "you shall have one man for every hair in your casula, from pains, on the day of Judgment." "Which of the other saints, who labour for God," said Patrick, "that would not bring that number to heaven? I shall not accept that," said Patrick. "What will you accept, then?" asked the angel. "Here it is," said Patrick; "that I should bring from hell, on the Day of Judgment, seven persons for every hair in this casula." "It shall be granted to you," said the angel; "and depart from this Cruachan." "I will not depart," said Patrick, "for I have been tormented, until I am gratified." "Is there anything else you demand?" asked the angel. "There is," said Patrick; "the day the twelve royal seats shall be on the Mount, and when the four rivers of fire shall be about the Mount, and when the three peoples shall be there, viz., the people of heaven, the people of earth, and the people of hell, that I myself may be judge over the men of Erin, on that day." "This thing cannot be obtained from the Lord," said the angel. "Unless this is obtained from Him, I will not consent to leave this Cruachan, from this day for ever; and even after my death, there shall be a caretaker from me there," answered Patrick. The angel went to heaven. Patrick went to his offering. The angel came in the evening. "How now?" asked Patrick. "Thus," answered the angel: "all the creatures, visible and invisible, including the twelve apostles, entreated, and they have obtained. The Lord said, that there came not, and would not come, after the apostles, a man more illustrious, were it not for the hardness of the request, which is granted thee. Strike thy bell," said the angel; "thou art commanded from heaven to fall on thy knees, that it may be a blessing to the people of all Erin, both living and dead." "A blessing on the bountiful King that gave," said Patrick; "the Cruachan shall be left." See Sister Mary F. Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 415 to 417.

<sup>85</sup> See "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. xx., p. 58. Similar practices of lonely retreats seem to have been usual with saints, in the Western Church. Thus St. Francis of Assisium retired to the mountain Alvernia, where he fasted forty days, in honour of St. Michael the Archangel, when he was favoured with the seraphic vision. See "Breviarium Romanum," sept. xvii., lect. iv., v., vi.

they say was St. Patrick's Cell, and behind this, his bed or Labba is shown. Scattered about on the top are various roughly-built places, serving as a shelter to pilgrims, passing the night up there. Only the young and vigorous tourist will be able to accomplish the toilsome journey, on foot, to this spot; and, yet, have we seen very old persons there engaged, at their devotional exercises. The ascent to Crough Patrick is now best made from the neighbourhood of Murrisk Abbey and Crough Patrick in the Distance, County of Mayo.

Murrisk Abbey,<sup>87</sup> about five miles from Westport, and lying at the base, close by the surges of the Atlantic. For a time, the tourist follows no beaten way, heading straight up the mountain's side, with the peak on his right, rather than in front, and holding this course until he reaches about 1,000 feet, above the starting-point. He next enters upon the pilgrims' path, which ascends to the shoulder of the hill, a point, perhaps, 1,500 feet above the base. This path so winds, that faces, which at starting looked 'landward, are turned oppositely, when the top is gained.<sup>88</sup> The path after a while becomes broad, and has been regularly made, the hillside having been scarped, so as to produce an inclined way, well defined, and about nine feet wide. At the foot of this widened path, we came upon the first station;<sup>89</sup> it consists of a circular track, or walk-about hill. Trench-like behind, that portion of space, which is enclosed by the path, is heaped into a kind of mound, topped once by a stone cross, but now surmounted only by piled stones.<sup>90</sup> A long stretch, <sup>86</sup> Roughly speaking, this path is about 200 yards in circumference; around this the pilgrims go. Fifteen circuits is the appointed number; but, this is commuted to one, should the pilgrim choose to go upon his knees, instead of his feet.

<sup>87</sup> This was a friary of Augustinian Eremites, founded by the O'Malleys. See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 506, 507.

<sup>88</sup> The accompanying illustration has been drawn and engraved, by Gregor Grey, from a photograph, taken on the spot, by Frederick H. Mares.

<sup>89</sup> Some little distance, from the first station, is the spot, where a poor woman is buried. She had died, when in the act of "making the stations." The time she had selected to do so was out of the usual season, and she departed this life, in the midst of snow. She had been buried in a spot so lonely, as in that place she should have the rising as if from an alpine pedestal,<sup>91</sup> now of pathway,<sup>92</sup> now of gully, choked with stones, takes us after a toilsome climb of two hours to the top. We reach it on its south-eastern side. It consists of a small plateau, containing about half an acre, and having a lone, wild look; this is covered with rude-built walls, the ruins of a little church, and pathways deeply sunk below the surface. The extreme point, on which the Oratory is situated, becomes clearly visible now, and when the steep is gained, a sublime spectacle bursts on the view, if the day happen to be fine. The sight is too great, too broad, too varied, too glorious, to be taken in, at a single glance. We are over two thousand five hundred feet, above the level of the sea.<sup>93</sup> Beyond the awful depths below, and all away to the north and west, lies the still more awful Atlantic.<sup>94</sup> The summit of this lonely mountain was indeed admirably suited for communing with the great Being, who had lavished with unsparing hand, the most sublime and varied charms of natural prospects, on a vast range of the most romantic scenery in our island.<sup>95</sup> Gathering mists, save at intervals, shrouded our view, when, at one time, on the mountain top. The scenes beneath our feet, and far away as our eyes could reach, were gloriously sublime. Clew Bay is a water-extended and irregular parallelogram of vast range: its upper or eastern end is so thickly studded with islands, that it has been said, one is there for every day in the year. Many of these are cultivated, some are clad with trees, a few are rocky. The seaward faces of all are abruptly steep, and plainly show how hard has been the struggle, between them, and the long inland sweep of the Atlantic waves. At times, the light falls upon the water, so as to make it seem of silvery whiteness, and then the contrast between it and the green-clad islands it surrounds is beautiful beyond all description. Along their western faces, the crests of the white horses of ocean are ever toppling over, in a broken line of snow-white foam; and, the islands seem placed by nature, to break the rush of water, like skirmishers in battle flung out along the front, to check a coming onset. Looking, then, as far as we can see, in the direction of the western Atlantic Ocean, the first object to catch the eye is Clare Island.<sup>96</sup> It is a huge mountain, 1,520 feet in height, sympathies and prayers of the pilgrims, when passing by her grave.

<sup>90</sup> Round this mound, and on the path mentioned as encompassing it, go the pilgrims, if walking, seven times; if on their knees, but once, and in both cases reciting a given form of prayer. Those who choose to make the circuit on their knees, not unfrequently leave the track of blood behind, this way being rough and stony. Close at hand, there is a rude stone shelter, where the blind or otherwise infirm find a scant protection from the weather, during the night.

<sup>91</sup> See "Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. i., p. 543.

<sup>92</sup> This is called the Kessaun Cruagh, or "the footway of the Reek."—Rev. Cæsar Otway's "Tour in Connaught," chap. xiii., p. 312.

<sup>93</sup> See "The Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. i., p. 543.

<sup>94</sup> Here, indeed, it may be seen a "glorious mirror, where the Almighty's form

Glasses itself in tempests; in all time,

Calm or convulsed—in breeze, or gale, or storm

Icing the pole, or in the torrid clime
Dark-heaving, boundless, endless, and sublime—

The image of Eternity—the throne
Of the Invisible."

—Lord Byron's "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," Canto iv., stanza clxxxiii.

<sup>95</sup> The writer had an opportunity for witnessing the magnificent panorama from the top of Crough Patrick, during the month of August, 1860. The reader is referred, for an imperfect description of the impression produced, to a little work, "Legend Lays of Ireland," by Lageniensis, pp. 89, 90.

<sup>96</sup> The remains of one among the castles of Grana Uaile, the celebrated sea-adventurer Grace O'Malley,—a heroine in the time of Queen Elizabeth, at whose court she was presented,—are still to be seen, upon this island. The towers, now ruined, and the romantic interview, to which allusion is here made, are most graphically described, in that charming poetic miscellany, intitled, "The Monks of Kilcrea, and other Poems," and covering about 4,000 acres. It rises, so as to part the waters at the mouth of Clew Bay, into a north and south entrance, and to block, in the middle, a full third of the whole width. In the dim distance beyond, we now faintly see Achill Head; its beetling cliffs, from a height of 900 feet, look vertically down upon the waves of the Atlantic, breaking upon their base. Nearer, by some fourteen miles, is Achill Beg or Little Achill. Then a dark, wall-like flank of mountain, near 2,000 feet high, comes next, gloomily overhanging the northern water of the bay. Between this and the next mountain group, called Nephin Beg, which also frowns above the northern margin of the bay, there is a narrow gap, through which we gain a glimpse of Blacksod Bay. The sheen of its waters, we see in patches, dark masses of long and narrow promontory so break upon it. The effect of this vista is magnificent in the extreme. Between that group, called Nephin Beg, many of whose peaks rise over 2,000 feet, and the Croagh Moyle mountains, we see huge Nephin, towering 2,646 feet over Lough Conn, the lap of whose waters falls along its eastern base. The lake itself is hidden from us, by the hills and mountains, which lie between. South of the Croagh Moyle mountains lies Castlebar, and the lakes about it: these latter we plainly see. Some miles further south, and just peeping round the north base of Slieve Bohaan, the upper end of Lough Carra comes in view. It lies at the head of that long stretch of inland water, composed of Loughs Corrib and Mask. This chain of lakes is full fifty miles in length. Immediately south of us lie Ben Bury, Ben Creggan, and Ben Gorm, all rising between 2,000 and 3,000 feet above the sea. Beyond their crests, the peaks of the Twelve Pins appear. At the base, or nearly so, of one among these, and hollowed in its sides, there is a dark, deep lake, gloomily shadowed by the mountain, within whose worn and channelled sides, it lies embosomed. Westward, out in the Atlantic, extend Inisdalla, Inisturk, and Caher Islands. These reached, we are back to the point, whence we started, to make a circuit of that vast amphitheatre of mountain, lake, plain, and ocean.<sup>97</sup> The legends of St. Patrick's Acts relate, that after his exorcisms, pronounced on Crough Patrick, no demon came to Erin for seven years, and seven months, and seven days, and seven nights.<sup>98</sup> The angel subsequently went to protect Patrick, and to advise, that his bell should be sounded. Then, like to a second Moyses,<sup>99</sup> Patrick descended from the mountain, when he had sounded his cymbal. Its jubilant tones were heard over all the kingdom. Elevating his hands, he blessed all Ireland, with its inhabitants, and, he commended them to Christ.

Patrick proceeded, afterwards, until he came to Achadh-fobhair, where he celebrated the ordo or solemnity of Easter.<sup>100</sup> At this place, his charioteer died, and he was buried between Cruachan and the sea. Patrick went, after-by * * *, and under the heading, Gran na uile, at p. 246, which thus commences:—

“There stands a tower by the Atlantic side—

A grey old tower, by storms and sea-waves beat—

Perch'd on a cliff beneath it, yawneath wide

A lofty hall—of yore, a fit retreat

For pirates' galleys; altho' now you'll meet

Nought but the seal and wild-gull; from that cave,

A hundred steps sheer upwards lead your feet

Unto a lonely chamber! bold and brave
Is he who climbs that stair, all slippery from the wave!”

<sup>97</sup> See a beautiful description of these scenes, given by a NORTH AUSTRALIAN, in “Catholic Opinion,” vol. ix., No. 233, pp. 354, 355. September 2, 1871.

<sup>98</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>99</sup> See Exodus, xxxii. 15.

<sup>100</sup> After this passage, the Irish Tripartite Life relates, that there were, moreover, “keepers” of Patrick's people in Erin then living. There is a man from him in Cruachan-Aigle. The sound of his bell was heard, but itself was not to be found. Also, wards, into the country of the Corca-Themne,<sup>101</sup> and he founded three or four churches, in this region. Among these, are the churches of Taghkeen<sup>102</sup> and Kilcommon,<sup>103</sup> as well as Robeen.<sup>104</sup> All of these lie near the River Robe.<sup>105</sup> He baptized many thousand persons there, and he founded his churches, in the three Tuagha,<sup>106</sup> otherwise called Teora Tuagha.<sup>107</sup> This was another name, for the three districts, called Partraighe—now Partry<sup>108</sup>—in Mayo. Patrick went then to Tobar<sup>109</sup>-Finnmaighe,<sup>110</sup> which seems to have been the ancient Pagan name for Ballintober, in the barony of Ceara—or Carragh—county of Mayo. It was told to St. Patrick, that the Pagans honoured this well,—called slan, or “health-giving,”—as a God. Besides, the foolish people believed, that a certain dead Magus, or prophet, made it.<sup>111</sup> His bones were supposed to lie buried beneath it, and, our saint, miraculously removing the covering stone, baptized many there. Among the rest was St. Cannech,<sup>112</sup> who was blessed by our holy Apostle, and who from being a monk became a bishop. He founded Kealltag,<sup>113</sup> or Cill-Tog,<sup>114</sup> a church,<sup>115</sup> in the territory of Corco-Themne. When Patrick travelled in the plains of there is a man from him in Gulban-Guirt, also known as Beann-Gulban, or Binn-Gulban, and now called Benbulbin. This is a remarkable mountain range, in the parish of Drumcliff, barony of Carbury, and county of Sligo. The third man from him was to the east of Cluain-Iraird, now Clonard, in the county of Meath. He was believed to have been living, together with his wife. Both were said to have entertained St. Patrick, in the reign of Laeghaire Mac Neill, and it was thought they were, and should continue for ever, of the same age. There was a man from him in Dromanna-Bregh. There is a townland of Drumman, in the parish of Duleek, county of Meath, and within the ancient Bregia; but, the place, here referred to, was in the north of the county of Meath, and adjoining the county of Cavan. Again, there was another man from him, in Sliabh-Slainge, now Slieve Donard, the highest mountain, in the county of Down, and on the margin of the bay of Dundrum. This latter man was Domangart, the son of Eochaidh. It was popularly believed, that he should raise Patrick's relics a little before the judgment. His cell was called Rath-Murbhuilg, at present identified with Maghera, county of Down. It was so called, from the adjoining townlands of Murlough, on the margin of the bay of Dundrum.

<sup>101</sup> Colgan writes, that it was a region in Connaught; but, he gives no clue, regarding its position. It was probably the present parish of Robeen, with some adjoining districts, in the baronies of Clanmorris and of Kilmaine, county of Mayo, and which formed part of the ancient Ceara.

<sup>102</sup> This is now the head of Tagheen parish, in the barony of Clanmorris. Its extent is defined on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo,” Sheets 100, 101, 110, 111. The townlands of Tagheen East and West are shown, on the latter Sheet.

<sup>103</sup> This is now the head of a parish, in the barony of Kilmaine, shown on Sheets 110, 111, 118, 119, 122, ibid. The townland proper is shown, on Sheets 111, 119.

<sup>104</sup> This is the head of a parish, in the barony of Kilmaine. Its extent is given, on Sheets 100, 110, 111, 118, ibid., and the townland proper, on Sheet 110.

<sup>105</sup> See the Fourth Life, chap. lxi., p. 43.

<sup>106</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>107</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>108</sup> Also written Partree. It is a village, in the parish of Ballyovey, barony of Carra. From it, a Catholic parish, in the diocese of Tuam, takes its name, and there are chapels here, and at Ballybannin. See “The Parliamentary Gazetteer for Ireland,” vol. iii., p. 69.

<sup>109</sup> It means “the well of the white plain.” This well was four-cornered, and there was a four-cornered stone, over its mouth.

<sup>110</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan writes, that Finmagh was in Mayo. See “Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. i., chap. v., sect. v., n. 43, p. 227. But, for this statement, he assigns no authority.

<sup>111</sup> In the Irish Tripartite Life, the following Latin extract is added: “bibliothecam sibi in aqua sub petra ut dealbare ossa sua semper, quia timuit ignem et zelavit Pat. de Deo vivo, dicens non vere dictis quia rex aquarum fons erat hoc necnon cum eis habuit rex aquarum, et dixit Patricius petram elevavi, et non poterunt, elevavit autem eam petram; Cainnech, quem baptizavit Patricius, et dixit erit semen tuum benedictum in secula.”

<sup>112</sup> He is thought, by Colgan, to have been the saint, called Coinnech, or Caineach, venerated at the 23rd of January; or, perhaps, the St. Caineach, whose feast occurs, at the 31st of the same month. But, the latter is called only a priest, and the son of Ua Chil.

<sup>113</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

Mac-Erca,<sup>116</sup>—so called from the tribe of Kinel-Mac-Erca,<sup>117</sup> who descended from Erc the Red,<sup>118</sup> and while passing through the fields, called after Dichuil and Erchuil,<sup>119</sup> he saw a large sepulchre,<sup>120</sup> which is stated to have been 30 feet, in length,<sup>121</sup> or, according to some exaggerated accounts, it was even 120 feet long.<sup>122</sup> The brothers desired, that the dead man might be brought to life, and Patrick thereupon awoke him, who rested in the sepulchre.<sup>123</sup> The holy man then questioned the resuscitated, regarding his name, and

<sup>114</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life. The denomination, under either form, now seems obsolete; yet, there is a townland Kiltogorra, in the parish of Cong, and barony of Kilmaine, shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo," Sheet 121.

<sup>115</sup> It was in Ceara, now Carra, in Mayo, according to a note, (7), found in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 419.

<sup>116</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite. This district is called Mag-Mac-Erca, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>117</sup> These were represented, by Hua-Hanlighe, or O'Hanlighe, and by Hua-Branam, or Mac Brennan. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 74, p. 176. The latter were chiefs of Corca-Achlan. The O'Hanlys were chiefs of Kinel-Dofa,—Dofa or Dobhtha being their progenitor—and they were separated by Slieve-Baune, from the Mac Brannans' country, otherwise called Corca-Sheachlann. Kinel-Dofa was on the west of the Shannon, in the County Roscommon, and to the north of Lough Ree. For further particulars see Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., at A.D. 1210, n. (e), pp. 169 to 171. This description exactly answers the topography of St. Patrick's travels, as given in the Latin Tripartite. See lib. ii., chap. xxvii., p. 134.

<sup>118</sup> He was the grandson of Eochy Muidh-mhedhoin, who reigned as Monarch of Ireland, from A.D. 358 to 365, according to the "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 124, 125. Dr. O'Donovan's edition.

<sup>119</sup> The history of these persons is not further known.

<sup>120</sup> It seems very probable, indeed, that this funeral monument exceeded considerably the dimensions of the man, whom it covered.

<sup>121</sup> So it is stated, by the author of the Third Life, cap. lxvii., p. 26. Also, in the Fifth Life, lib. ii., cap. xxi., pp. 58, 59. Colgan seems to have his suspicions, that the whole of this narrative is fabulous, although affirmed, by so many writers.

<sup>122</sup> Thus state the authors of the Fourth Life, cap. lxii., p. 43, and of the Seventh Life, lib. ii., cap. lxxi., p. 139. Jocelyn says, that the tomb was "miræ longitudinis" simply. See Sixth Life, cap. lxxxi., p. 83.

<sup>123</sup> Colgan, who indulges in a very learned theological disquisition, on this narrative, states, that to have a pagan thus rescued from punishment, resuscitated, and baptized, at first view seems opposed to the declaration of Sacred Scripture, "ab inferno nulla est redemptio," and to that sentence of our Divine Saviour, "ite in ignem æternum." In St. Augustine's work, "De Civitate Dei," lib. xxi., cap. xxiv., it is said to savour of presumption, if it be denied, that those do not remain in perpetual fire, to whom Divine Truth applies the words, "ite in ignem æternum." Also, Pope St. Gregory the Great states, that we can no more pray for deceased infidels, than we can for the devil, since they are condemned to the same eternal and irrevocable damnation. Yet, on the other hand, there are not wanting, many and weighty testimonies, which record, not alone men dying in their sins to have been resuscitated and brought to life, but, even to have been saved, afterwards, through baptism and penance. Even have we an account of the soul of a certain Trajan, brought immediately from the pains of hell, and translated to glory, through the merits and intercession of St. Gregory the Great, as related by St. John Damascene, in his Prayer for the Faithful Departed, and Petrus Diaconus, the Monk, who was nearly coeval with the former; in his Life of St. Gregory. Joannes Diaconus and another ancient author of "Vita S. Gregorii," prefixed to the works of this great saint, and printed at Basle, in 1564, have a like narrative. Alphonsus Ciacconius contends, that the anonymous author had been a contemporary of St. Gregory. Again, the Blessed Brigit, in her Fourth Book of Revelations, cap. 13, and others, have a similar account. St. Thomas, referring to it, says, that Trajan had been recalled to this life, before he obtained salvation. Thus, he writes: "Ad quartum dicendum, quod de facto Traiani, hoc modo potest probabiliter æstimari, quod precibus B. Gregorii ad vitam fuerit revocatus, et ibi gratiam consecutus sit, per quam remissionem peccatorum habuit, et per consequens immunitatem a pœna sicut apparet in omnibus illis, qui fuerant miraculosè a mortuis suscitati: quorum plures constat idololatrias damnatos fuisse. De omnibus enim similiter dici oportet, quod non erant in inferno finaliter deputati, sed secundum præsentem justitiam propriorum meritorum: secundum autem superiores causas, quibus prævidebantur ad vitam revocandi, erat de eis aliter disponendum," &c. — "Sententiarum," lib. iv., Dist. xlv., Quæst. 2, Art. 2. However, how he happened to be there interred. The giant<sup>124</sup> replied, that he was Cass, the son of Glassi, and that he had been a swineherd to Lugair Iruatæ.<sup>125</sup> He declared, that Mac Conn's fiann had killed him, in the reign of Cairpre Baronius, in his "Annales Ecclesiastici," at A.D. 604, and Bellarmine, in "De Purgatorio," lib. i., cap. 8, refute the narrative about Trajan. Still, there are many other recorded examples of men dying in the state of mortal sin, and who were in consequence condemned to punishment, yet are they said to have been at length brought to life and saved. Thus, St. John Damascene relates, the case of a pagan woman, Falconilla, who had been brought to life, through the merits and prayers of St. Tecla. See "Oratio pro mortuis." St. Gregory speaks of a very wicked man, who had been drawn by the devils into hell, and yet was he saved by St. Severus. See "Dialogorum," lib. i., cap. 12. St. Peter is said to have resurrected a certain heathen, who was related to Cæsar. See Egesippus, lib. iii., cap. 2. St. Agnes is related, to have restored to life the prefect's son, whom the devil had put to death, when he desired to offer violence to that holy virgin. See St. Maximus Serm. 2, and St. Ambrosius, Serm. 90. Lethaldus, in his Life of St. Julianus, Bishop of Cenoma, relates, that on three different occasions did the holy prelate bring three pagans to life. Colgan concludes, by observing, that in such particular cases, their punishment had been suspended, in consequence of a foreknowledge, that the saints would intercede for them; but, such a pardon could not be obtained for souls, absolutely and irrevocably condemned to eternal punishment. Nor can any Catholic pray for deceased infidels, or for those dying in mortal sin, as St. Gregory teaches; unless, indeed, from Divine Revelation, or other special instinct from the Holy Ghost, a Christian be moved thereto—such only is piously deemed to be the privilege of great saints.

<sup>124</sup> Colgan cites many examples of giants, recorded to be of extraordinary stature, as mentioned in the Old Testament, in Deut. ii. 13, iii., Josue xiv., xv., I. Kings, xvii., II. Kings, xxi., I. Paralip. xx., and, likewise, by various ancient writers.

<sup>125</sup> So is it stated, in the Irish Tripartite Life. In the Third Life, this account runs: "Ego sum Glas, filius Cais, qui fui porcarius Lugair Regis Hyrote et jugulavit me Fian Mac Con in regno Mothfer anno centesimo usque hodie." See cap. lxvii., p. 26. The Fifth Life, by Probus, has a differently expressed statement: "Ego sum Macmaic Cais Maicglais, quod potest dici, ego sum maximus virorum insularum, fui porcarius Kicrote Regis: et jugulavit me dormientem Femmaic Magus in anno regni Nuotfer, qui est annus centesimus usque hodie." See lib. ii., cap. xxi., pp. 58, 59. Again, the Sixth Life, by Jocelyn, relates, "respondit se filium Chais Glarcum nomine, porcarium quondam Leogarii Regis Hyrotæ fuisse, et jam expletis centum annis, a quodam viro, cui nomen Fynnian mac-con sibi insidiante in regno Coirbre jugulatum extitisse." See cap. lxxxi., pp. 83, 84. Now, the Latin Tripartite Life states, "respondit se Glasium esse, Cassii filium, porcariumque quondam extitisse Lugarii Regis Norwegiæ; quem satellites Macconii centum ab hinc annis Carbreo Niaffear regnante trucidarunt." See lib. ii., cap. lxxi., p. 139. Hence, it appears, that several mistakes must have been committed by scribes, in setting down the foregoing particulars, and more especially, in the rendering of names. Colgan endeavours to solve the difficulties, in reconciling the diversities of statement, by observing, that in reference to the Irish word Fian, sometimes it is an appellative, meaning, "a military band" or "troup;" while it is sometimes a proper name for a man, but then it is found more generally written Finn. There are two celebrated Irish heroes, known in history: one, as Mac-con, who invaded Ireland, about A.D. 195 or 196, having killed Art, King of Ireland, and son to Conn of the Hundred Battles,—the conqueror was otherwise called Lughaidh; while, the other was known, as Cairbre, surnamed Niethfear—brother to Alid, King of Connaught, and to Finn, King of Leinster,—and the latter invaded the kingdom of Meath, or Termonia, some years before the birth of Christ, according to our annalists. But, their chronology tallies not with their being contemporaries, nor with the narrative, referring only to one hundred years, before St. Patrick's time. Besides, Cairbre, surnamed Niethfear, was neither King of Connaught, where the giant's grave had been discovered, nor was he the King of Ireland. There was a Cairbre, surnamed Liffechuir, King of Ireland, at a later period, and, who reigned, from A.D. 268 to A.D. 284; however, his time will not even aptly synchrise. In fine, Colgan suggests, that if for Mothfer, the error of a scribe, we substitute Morethach, a better solution may be obtained; since, a Morethach, or Moredhach, surnamed Tireach, King of Ireland, reigned from A.D. 327 to 356. Wherefore, if during any intermediate year of his reign, we suppose Fian or Finnan Mac Con to have lived, the period could well be regarded, as about one hundred years, previous to the time of St. Patrick. See nn. 67, 68, pp. 33, 34. Also, Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 108, 111, 118 to 121, 122 to 125, and accompanying notes, as likewise, Roderick O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xlviii., pp. 282, 283.

Niafer,<sup>126</sup> in the hundredth year, and that he lay there until that day. Patrick afterwards baptized him, and he went again into his sepulchre.<sup>127</sup>

Notwithstanding our Apostle's continuous labours and occupations, he never ceased from the exercise of prayer and contemplation. He was truly indefatigable, in journeyings, in preaching, in administering the Sacraments, and in building churches. Whether resting or on his course, at any place, he was accustomed to recite the whole Psalter, with Hymns and Scriptural Canticles, as also the sublime Apocalypse of St. John the Evangelist. Three hundred genuflexions did he make each day; one hundred times, by day, and one hundred times, by night, did he sign himself with the cross. For the sacred emblem of man's Redemption, he had a singular devotion. Whether he was in a chariot or on a horse; wherever he saw the cross erected, or knew it to be in his vicinity, the Blessed Patrick would go aside from his path, even although that sacred object were one thousand paces away, from the road.<sup>128</sup> But, his reverence for the Sunday was most remarkable, and he would not travel on that day.<sup>129</sup> Whether he reached mountains, woods, or plains, in damp or dry weather, there he would remain for two nights. From first Vespers of the Lord's Day, until Tierce on Monday, Patrick would not stir from that place, where he might happen to be. One time, Patrick's charioteer wanted his horses; but he could not find them, owing to the darkness of the night. Patrick, at once, lifted up his hand, and his five fingers, like five torches, illuminated all the place, when the horses were immediately found.

Patrick then went across the Muaidh,<sup>130</sup> or Moy River,<sup>131</sup> which discharges itself into the Atlantic Ocean, at the bay of Killala.<sup>132</sup> For some miles, it forms the boundary, between the counties of Mayo and Sligo.<sup>133</sup>

<sup>126</sup> He is stated, by some of the old Irish writers, to have been Monarch of Ireland, about the beginning of the Christian era; but, his name is not in any of the genuine lists of Irish Kings, nor in the "Annals of the Four Masters."

<sup>127</sup> Probus states: "His dictis baptisatus est à B. Patricio, facta confessione, dictoque symbolo fidei ac Dominica oratione, prædicante sancto Episcopo, et mergente eum in aqua profundissima ter in nomine Sanctæ Trinitatis. Cumque fuisset baptisatus, læto animo, intravit sepulchrum suum, et requievit in pace."—Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxi., p. 59.

<sup>128</sup> One day, as we are told, Patrick omitted to visit a cross, which was on his way; but, at the same time, he knew not that it was there. His charioteer said to him, in the evening: "To-day, you left a cross, which was on your way, without visiting it." Patrick then started from his guest's house, leaving his dinner, and he went back to the cross. While Patrick was praying at the cross, "This is a sepulchre," said Patrick; "who was buried here?" A voice answered from out of the sepulchre. "I am a poor pagan," it said, "and I was buried here; while living I was injuring my soul, until I died; and I was buried here afterwards." "What was the reason," asked Patrick, "that the sign of Christianity, i.e., the cross, was placed over thy grave?" Then answered the voice: "A certain woman, that was in foreign lands, had a son, who was buried in this country, during her absence; and, she came from foreign lands, and placed this cross over my grave. She thought it was over the grave of her son it was placed; for, she was not able, through grief, to recognise her son's grave." "This is the reason, why I missed the cross," said Patrick, "i.e. its being over the grave of a pagan." The cross was raised, afterwards, by Patrick, over the Christian's grave. By Jocelyn, he is said to have left his chariot, to effect this purpose.

<sup>129</sup> For this veneration, the Almighty miraculously rewarded him. Thus, one Sunday, while Patrick was in a cold, damp place, great rain fell upon the earth; but, it rained not on that spot where the holy Apostle was "sicut in concha et vellere Gideoni accederat."

<sup>130</sup> This is the Irish name for the river, which is Latinized Moda, Moadus, Muadius and Moyus.

<sup>131</sup> It rises in the barony of Leyny, in the county of Sligo, and it flows through the barony of Gallen, in Mayo County.

<sup>132</sup> This town, in a parish of the same name, is in the barony of Tyrawley. It is to be seen on the "Ordnance Survey Town-land Maps for the County of Mayo," Sheet 22.

<sup>133</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," n. (c), pp. 2, 3.

He entered Tir-Amalgaidh,<sup>134</sup> so called from Amalgaidh,<sup>135</sup> the brother of Dathi, Monarch of Ireland, and who succeeded, in a like capacity, his uncle, Niall of the Nine Hostages, from A.D. 405 to 428.<sup>136</sup> Amalgaidh is said to have had fifteen sons<sup>137</sup>—not all of whom were probably alive at this period. Over the province of Connaught, he was king for thirty-two years; and, from his sons, were descended many of the most noble families there.<sup>138</sup> When St. Patrick arrived among the Hy-Amhalgaidh, that provincial potentate appears to have been living,<sup>139</sup> and also twelve of his sons, whose names are thus recorded: Aengus, or Ængussius; Fergus, or Fergusius; Fedhlimidh, or Fethlemius; Enna, or Enda Crom; Enna, or Enda Cullom; Cormac, or Corbmacus; Cairbre, or Carbreus; Echui, or Eochodius Dianamh; Oena;<sup>140</sup> Eoghan, or Eugenius Coir; Dubchonall, or Dubchonallus; Ailill of the rough face, otherwise named Alillus Ainech.<sup>141</sup> The sons of Amhalgaidh were disputing about the sovereignty.<sup>142</sup> These would not admit any man, as king over them, with a surname. Aengus, who was the proudest among them, imposed additional names upon his brothers. These went to Tara, in twelve chariots,<sup>143</sup> to have a decision of the matters in dispute; and, there they were welcomed, by the King of Tara.<sup>144</sup> Aengus happened to be a foster-son to Laeghaire, and he received a special welcome, at the court. Aengus prayed the door-keepers, that they would not admit his nephew Conall, who was the son of Enna Drom, into the fort; for, Aengus feared his wisdom and skill, in arguing for his right, and Aengus obtained this request, from the door-keepers. As Conall was outside the lios, he heard the sound of Patrick's bell, which rang at Tober-Patrick.<sup>145</sup> This well, most likely was that one, also called Leagh and Loigleas,<sup>146</sup> which lay to the west of Rath-na-Riogh,<sup>147</sup> the great fort, or royal residence. Conall then approached St. Patrick and saluted him. "O cleric!" said he, "do you know this expression, which I have in commemoration, i.e. 'Hibernenses omnes clamant ad te pueri,' &c., which two girls uttered in their mother's womb, in our country." "I am he, to whom that refers," said Patrick; "and, I heard

<sup>134</sup> From this ancient territory, the present barony of Trawley, in the county of Mayo, derives its denomination.

<sup>135</sup> He was the son of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Amhalgaidh.

<sup>136</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 126 to 129.

<sup>137</sup> Their names are to be found in "The Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," edited by John O'Donovan. He had eight sons, by Tresí, the daughter of Natíraoch, King of Munster, and sister to Ængus. Those eight sons are thus named, viz.: Fedhlim, Eochaidh, Eunda, Conall, Aongus, Eoghan, Cormac and Corrdubh. Amalgaidh, by a second wife, Earca, the daughter of Eochaidh, King of Leinster, had seven sons, viz.: Fergus, Cormac Ceannfoda, Colom, Seudna, Eochaidh, Aoldobhar, and Emeach.

<sup>138</sup> See ibid., from pp. 5 to 17, and the accompanying notes.

<sup>139</sup> The "Annals of the Four Masters," pp. 140, 141, record his death, at A.D. 449. See Dr. O'Donovan's edition.

<sup>140</sup> In his place, as if an alias, the Latin Tripartite Life has "Eochadius alter."

<sup>141</sup> The first forms of name are taken, from the Irish Tripartite Life, and the second forms, from the Latin version.

<sup>142</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life adds, twenty-four tribes—i.e. old tribes—that were in the country, as if these were to be under their jurisdiction.

<sup>143</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life adds: "sicut in libris Patricii inventus, quod exirent in iudicium tamen vii. fratres de eis." Nearly similar words are in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>144</sup> This and the following legendary account will be found in the Irish and Latin Tripartite Lives, and partially in the Life by Jocelyn.

<sup>145</sup> This well was at Tara. There are several wells mentioned, in the prose and poetic descriptions of that place, as given in Dr. Petrie's Essay.

<sup>146</sup> Tirechan, in the Book of Armagh, records, that St. Patrick baptized St. Erc in it, after his conversion, and many thousand men on the same day. See Dr. Petrie's "History and Antiquities of Tara Hill," p. 167. "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xviii.

<sup>147</sup> This most remarkable of the Forts at Tara is indicated on Plates 6, 7.

<sup>148</sup> The greater part of this territory now

it, when I was in the Islands of the Tyrrhene Sea, and I knew not whether within or without me these words were spoken, so that I shall go with you, into your country to baptize, to teach, and to announce the Gospel." Then the holy man asked for what reason Conall had come there, when he related the whole case to Patrick. The latter said, "Go in now, as the doors are open; and, go to my faithful friend, Eoghan Mac Neill, who will assist you, if you lay hold, secretly, of the finger next his little finger, for such is always a sign between us." And so it was done. When the prince approached, "Welcome," said Eoghan; "what is Patrick's wish?" Conall said, "That you assist me." Conall afterwards observed, "If it be according to youth, precedence in a king's house or land is to be given, I am the youngest; if according to mother's age, Enna Cromm is the oldest." To his remarks, Laeghaire replied: "Honor to the senior, truly, and converse with the learned; but, if jewels and treasures are given to anyone, however, I will not deprive him of them." Thus, Laeghaire, King of Tara, and his brother Eoghan, son of Niell, decided the dispute. It is said, however, that the Monarch Laeghaire had treacherously instigated Aengus to kill St. Patrick and Conall, when all were setting out together from Tara. In this plot, too, Aengus endeavoured to engage Fergus and Fedhlimidh, afterwards, while on their journey. They went along, and Patrick with them; while the latter gave his chariot to Conall, so that it was the thirteenth chariot, in their train. On setting out, they went northwards, towards their country. That place, which Aengus had fixed for the fratricide, is said to have been in Corann.<sup>148</sup> Fergus simulated sleep. His brothers refused, however, what had been proposed to them. "We will not kill the innocent," said they, "and we will not slay our brother." Aengus went towards St. Patrick, however, intending to kill him; and, he was accompanied by two bands, and by two Druids, namely, Reon,<sup>149</sup> or Roen,<sup>150</sup> and Rechred,<sup>151</sup> or Rechet,<sup>152</sup> of the race of Faelan the Warrior. These lay in wait, not more than a mile from that place, whence St. Patrick first saw his enemies. A cross, from the west of Cross-Patrick to Cill-Forclann, designated the situation. These two places can be determined, with sufficient accuracy, at the present day; for, Cros Phadruic, or "the cross of Patrick," still retains its original name.<sup>153</sup> That of Kill-Forclann<sup>154</sup> is now obsolete, and all traces of the church are removed;<sup>155</sup> but, the site was pointed out, not so very long ago, on a rising ground, about half a mile from Killala.<sup>156</sup> The plot against our saint's life failed, however, while the Druids, Reon<sup>157</sup> and Rechred,<sup>158</sup> were defeated, at Telach-na-Druadh.<sup>159</sup> The latter miserably perished, forms the barony of Corran, which is nearly in the centre of the County Sligo.

<sup>149</sup> So is he called, in the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>150</sup> Thus is he named, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>151</sup> He is so called, in the Irish version of the Tripartite.

<sup>152</sup> Thus is his name written, in the Latin Tripartite Life. He is called Rochait, by Jocelyn.

<sup>153</sup> It is now that of a townland, containing an ancient churchyard, with some traces of church ruins. It is situated, to the right of the road leading from Ballina to Killala, and it lies about one mile southwards, from the latter place.

<sup>154</sup> It is said to have been east of Cross-patrick.

<sup>155</sup> The natives of this district stated, that parts of the church walls were originally so called. In 1831, the place was called Killy-brone. Then the church walls were totally levelled.

<sup>156</sup> About sixty perches, to the left of the road, leading from this town to Palmers-town.

<sup>157</sup> The legend adds, how Reon said, that the ground should swallow Patrick, on the place where he should be seen. This was related to Patrick. "It is I, who shall see him first," said Patrick. When Patrick therefore saw Reon, the ground swallowed him up. "I will believe," said he, "if I am rescued." Then, the ground flung him up, until he was above the winds, and he fell down half alive.

<sup>158</sup> The legend tells us, that Rechred was also lifted up, and cast down violently, until his head was broken against the rock, and that fire from Heaven burned him.

but the former believed, and he was baptized. It is stated, too, that Feadelm, the daughter of Amhalgaidh, had died a long time before these events. Then, Aengus said, "I will believe, if my sister be resuscitated." The Irish Apostle is recorded to have worked the wonderful miracle of raising her from the dead, and of presenting Feadelm to her brother. In fear and astonishment, after those miracles, Aengus then asked the saint's pardon, for his past offences; he, too, believed and he was afterwards baptized.

A blind man went in great haste, to meet St. Patrick, on hearing the wonderful miracles he wrought;<sup>160</sup> for, the desire of being healed, from his infirmity, urged him. Having no guide, however, the blind man fell more than once. Thoughtlessly enough, one of St. Patrick's people laughed at him. "My de-broth,"<sup>161</sup> said the holy man, "it would be fitter that you were the blind person, than he, who seeks a remedy from the Sun of Justice." The blind man was then healed, and the cleric became blind. Afterwards, the person restored praised the Almighty for that favour conferred upon him. Ruan, or Roan, the son of Cucnamha, or Conchmamha, Amhalgaidh's charioteer, or servant, was the person healed, at Roi-Ruain, or Rae-Roain, which was the name of that place. Migna, or Midgna, was the name of that disciple who was blinded; and, another disciple of St. Patrick, who was called Donnmalus, remained with him, leading the life of a hermit, in Disert-Patrick, near the well and church at Cross Patrick. Afterwards, in commemoration of the miracle wrought, Rae-Roain belonged to St. Patrick. The Blessed Apostle met two lame men,<sup>162</sup> in Ochtar-Caerthin,<sup>163</sup> or Huachtar Charthuinn.<sup>164</sup> They complained to him regarding their infirmity, for they found it difficult to proceed through the mountains or plains, where they were obliged to travel. These poor men moved Patrick to compassionate them, and they were healed. He then went to Domhnach-Mor, or Donaghmore,<sup>165</sup> where Bishop Mucna<sup>166</sup> was placed, and where, too, he had been buried.<sup>167</sup> He went, afterwards, to Cross-Patrick, where a noble, named Aedh Fota, or "the tall," who was son of Eochaidh, son of Oengus, came to him; and, Patrick healed him from lameness, at a fountain, to the west of Cross-Patrick. In gratitude for the favour he received, Aedh presented to Patrick a plot of land there, on which he founded a church or residence. He left two of his family there, likewise, viz.: Teloc<sup>168</sup> and Nemnall, or Domnald.<sup>169</sup> The great success of the Irish Apostle had excited the envy and hatred of the Magi, who found therein their popularity and influence on the wane. Finding they could not oppose him publicly, a number of them conspired to lie in wait for him, while he <sup>159</sup> The Druid's rock is there, and near it there was a church, at Cross-Patrick, which was eastwards from Telach-na-Druadh. Glas-Conaigh lay between them, according to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>160</sup> Jocelyn relates this story, but in a manner quite different from that of the Tripartite. See cap. cxxiv., p. 93.

<sup>161</sup> "As God is my judge," Colgan interprets this expression, which was a favourite one with St. Patrick, when he made any solemn asseveration.

<sup>162</sup> The Irish Tripartite calls them bacachs.

<sup>163</sup> Thus is the place named, in the Irish Tripartite Life. Its identification does not appear.

<sup>164</sup> Thus is the name found, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>165</sup> It is found, in the parish of Killala, and barony of Trawley, and county of Mayo. See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," n. (d), p. 466.

<sup>166</sup> He is also called Muicin, and he is thought to have been venerated, on the 4th of March.

<sup>167</sup> He is said to have been the patron saint of Maighin, or Moyne, near Killala. At Moyne, a great abbey was afterwards erected.

<sup>168</sup> His name is vaguely conjectured, by Colgan, to agree with that of Tolan, of Disert Tola, whose feast occurs, at the 30th of March, or with that of Tellean, of Tegh-Telle, venerated at the 25th of June.

<sup>169</sup> No attempt, at identification, has been made, under this form, in the Latin Tripartite, nor in that preceding, as found in the Irish version.

<sup>170</sup> Jocelyn tells us, that those Magi as-was in the region of Tyrawley. Here a snare was contrived for his destruction.<sup>170</sup> But, Enna<sup>171</sup> saw that the Druids or Magi wished to murder St. Patrick, and to prevent their designs, he said to his son Conall, "Go and protect Patrick, that the Magi may not kill him."<sup>172</sup> The holy man perceived them, but a Heavenly Power protected him, for ethereal fire burned those Magi, to the number of nine.<sup>173</sup> Thus, was Patrick triumphant, over the plots of his persecutors.

Traversing that region, the holy man journeyed towards the ocean, where the fish-abounding Moy opens into Killala Bay. Here, he wished to establish a See. He then founded Kilmore-Moy,<sup>174</sup> or Cill-Alaidh, now Killala,<sup>175</sup> over which he placed, as bishop, St. Muredach,<sup>176</sup> one of his illustrious disciples, who belonged to the race of Laeghaire, son of Niall, the King of all Ireland. Here, too, Patrick baptized two celebrated virgins, that called upon him, in the region of Caille-Fochladh,<sup>177</sup> from their mother's womb, and while he was in the Islands of the Tyrrhene Sea. Those virgins<sup>178</sup> were Crebrea and Lasra<sup>179</sup> or Lassara,<sup>180</sup> the two daughters of Glerann,<sup>181</sup> son of Cummen,<sup>182</sup> or Cumine. They are patronesses of Cill-Forglainn, or Kill-fhor-clann,<sup>183</sup> in Hy-Amhalghaidh or Tirawley, to the west of the Muaidh. There, the relics of those holy sisters were preserved, and with a special devotion.

St. Patrick went to Forrach-mac-Amalghaidh, or "the assembly-ground of the tribe Mac Amalghaidh," which was the ancient name of Mullaghfarry, or "Hilltop of the Assembly," near Killala.<sup>184</sup> Here, the sons of King Amalghaidh, with their subjects, had been assembled, at a great public convention. Then, our glorious Apostle seized on this great opportunity, for announcing the Gospel of Christ, and for unsheathing the sword of the spirit, against those errors of idolatry that abounded.<sup>185</sup> The Lord helped him with signs and miracles. One day, coming to a place called Fearta, he found two women dead. The bodies lay buried on a hillside.<sup>186</sup> Invoking the name sumed white hoods, the more readily to deceive St. Patrick.

<sup>171</sup> He was the son of Amalghaidh.

<sup>172</sup> Jocelyn says, that Connall entered among the Magi, but only to frustrate their designs.

<sup>173</sup> Jocelyn tells us, that by his making a sign of the cross there, a healing fountain sprang from the ground.

<sup>174</sup> Sometimes this See was known as that of Tir-Amalgaid, or of Hy-Fiachra-mui.

<sup>175</sup> In the barony of Tyrawley, and county of Mayo.

<sup>176</sup> His feast occurs, at the 12th of August.

<sup>177</sup> The Scholiast on St. Fiach states, that on Caille Fochlaidh, towards the north, and in a maritime situation, on the Connaught coast, near to and west of the River Moy, was their church of Forcland, where these holy daughters were buried. See nn. 15*p*, 16*q*, p. 5.

<sup>178</sup> Their feasts do not seem to have been distinguished, in our Calendars. "St. Patrick and the Children of Fochlut Wood," by Aubrey De Vere, is a poem, that appears among "The Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 60 to 82.

<sup>179</sup> So is she called, in the Irish Tripartite. By the Scholiast on St. Fiach, she is named Lassia.

<sup>180</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life thus writes her name.

<sup>181</sup> Jocelyn does not otherwise name them.

<sup>182</sup> Thus is the name spelled, in the Irish Tripartite Life. Cumine is the rendering, in the Latin Tripartite Life. Nennius is the name, however, as given by the Scholiast on St. Fiach's Hymn, n. 15*p*, p. 5.

<sup>183</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's correspondence from Mayo, June 2nd, 1838, he identifies the site of its church ruins, although the building had long disappeared. His interesting account is contained, in the Ordnance Survey Memoirs, regarding the county of Mayo, as now preserved in the Royal Irish Academy, at p. 235.

<sup>184</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," Addenda P., p. 466. The townland of Farragh, within the parish of Ballisakeery, between Ballina and Killala, indicates the site. Tirechan spells the word Forgea. Cnoc-a-tionol, or the "Hill of Meeting," is likewise there. See the correspondence of John O'Donovan, Mayo, 17th May, 1838, among the Ordnance Survey Memoirs for Mayo County, preserved in the Royal Irish Academy's Library, p. 59.

<sup>185</sup> Jocelyn—apparently confounding the narrative as found in his sources for information—states, that a certain Magus, Rochait, by name, there rising up to oppose St. Patrick's preaching, was destroyed by fire from Heaven.

of Christ, at their tomb, he ordered the heap of earth to be removed, and he restored them again to life.<sup>187</sup> One of these women had been pregnant, at the time of her death.<sup>188</sup> The story goes, that Patrick and Conall went to the grave, where the dead pregnant woman had been buried,<sup>189</sup> and they travelled, by the lower road leading to Cill-Alaidh. Aengus, however, went by the upper road. When they had reached the grave, Patrick resuscitated the woman, and her unborn son. We are told, moreover, that both were baptized, in the well, which was called, Aenadharca,<sup>190</sup> or "the one-horned hill."<sup>191</sup> These miracles were wrought, at Killala church. Being resuscitated, she preached to the multitudes there assembled, regarding the pains of hell and the rewards of heaven. With tears, she prayed her brother, that he would believe on account of God and Patrick. He complied with her wishes, and he was baptized. On that day, twelve thousand were baptized in Tobur-enadharch,<sup>192</sup> or "the well of Aen-adherca,"<sup>193</sup> with the seven sons of Amhalgaidh, including Enna,<sup>194</sup> and the king.<sup>195</sup> And, Patrick left Magister Manchen,<sup>196</sup> also called Mancenus,<sup>197</sup> or Manchan the Master,<sup>198</sup> with them.<sup>199</sup> He was well versed in the Scriptures, and his knowledge of dogma and morals caused him to receive the special title bestowed on him. These great events are thought to have realized St. Patrick's dream of the wood, and of the converts, near Foclut.<sup>200</sup> It has been frequently asserted, that not one drop of human blood was shed, during the peaceful progress of St. Patrick's career. Nevertheless, we cannot forbear to mention, the cheerful sacrifices which were made by him, in the cause of religion. To such perilous adventures as those already related, he doubtless alludes, in his Confessions, where he states: "I came to the Irish nation to preach the Gospel, and to endure reproach from unbelievers. I heard them upbraid me as a stranger, and I suffered many persecutions, even unto chains. Yet, I gave myself up, without reserve, for their advantage. And, if I was held worthy, I am ready, immediately and cheerfully, to lay down my life for His name's sake." He adds: "I spent myself, that they might comprehend me; and everywhere among you, I advanced for your sake in many dangers, into distant regions, where nobody before had ever come, to baptize them, or to ordain them, or to confirm their people in the faith. Now, all these things I did, by the grace of God, diligently and cheerfully for your salvation. In the meantime, I was giving rewards to their kings and to their children, who remained along with me; and, nevertheless they seized me, and in that day, they sought most

<sup>186</sup> Such is the account, as contained in St. Patrick's Acts, by Jocelyn. See cap. lxiii., p. 79.

<sup>187</sup> See ibid.

<sup>188</sup> By Jocelyn, she is called Fedelina; but, I know not on what authority. See cap. lxiv., p. 79.

<sup>189</sup> Such is the account, in the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>190</sup> It is called Tobur-ên-adarc, in the Book of Armagh. See Rev. Dr. Todd's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 449, and n. 3.

<sup>191</sup> This well was named, from the little hillock of land, that was near it. The cause assigned for the name is not given, in Colgan's copy of the Tripartite.

<sup>192</sup> So is it called in the Latin Tripartite, and in an apparently older authority, Oen-adharca.

<sup>193</sup> So is it called, in the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>194</sup> Some accounts have it, that Enda

Crom had been nominated as Dynast of Tyrallow, at this time.

<sup>195</sup> Four different Catalogues of the Connaught kings place Amalghaidh, their father, as the first Christian king of that province. He lived, too, about the time of St. Patrick, yet Colgan seems to doubt, if he be the convert here indicated, and not rather his son.

<sup>196</sup> If this were the St. Manchen, who lived to 652, he could not have been a contemporary of St. Patrick. See Rev. Dr. Todd's "Life of St. Patrick," n. 4, p. 449.

<sup>197</sup> Thus is he named, by Jocelyn.

<sup>198</sup> There are eleven saints, called Mainchen, mentioned in the O'Clery's Calendar.

<sup>199</sup> Nennius and other writers, very circumstantially relate this great triumph of Christianity, in the west of Ireland. See, Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 865.

<sup>200</sup> In his "Index Chronologicus," Ussher

anxiously to kill me, but my hour was not yet come." From this account, it appears, St. Patrick knew, that in some parts of Ireland, which he could not have called remote—such as the Eastern and Southern districts—the Christian religion had been announced and practised, before his time. It is probable, in the foregoing passage, he alluded to Tyrawley,<sup>201</sup> especially as he had just before recalled the pleasing reminiscence of having baptized there several thousand persons.

Then, he went southwards, and to the ford of Lock-Daela,<sup>202</sup> or Loch Deala,<sup>203</sup> now Bally-Loughdalla,<sup>204</sup> in the parish of Ballysakeery.<sup>205</sup> This place was the property of the deceitful Aengus. Patrick intended to found a residence there for himself; but, Aengus came quickly, when he saw the holy visitor, for not sincerely did he believe, when he was baptized and had confessed the faith. "My debroth," said Patrick, "'twere right that thy houses should not be exalted, nor thy descendants after thee. Thy successors shall be seldom just, and there shall be fratricide in thy family." Then, St. Patrick went to the east, to Lec-finn,<sup>206</sup> or Leac-fionnbaile,<sup>207</sup> where Patrick inscribed a cross on the stone over Cill-mor-uachtair-Muaidh,<sup>208</sup> or "the great church of the Upper Moy," and towards the west. Afterwards, Lia-na-monach<sup>209</sup> was the name it obtained.<sup>210</sup> It is now shortened to Liag,<sup>211</sup> and the place is situated on a hill,<sup>212</sup> a short distance to the south of the old church of Kilmoye-Moy. There he baptized Eochaidh,<sup>213</sup> or Euchodius,<sup>214</sup> son of Nathi, another form of the name Dathi, or David, son of Fiachra, and resuscitated his wife,<sup>215</sup> Echtra, at Ath-Echtra, the little stream at the very door of Cill-mor. This place was also called Feart Echtra.<sup>216</sup> The grave is still to be seen in a field, lying a short distance to the east of the old church of Kilmoye-Moy.<sup>217</sup> places these events, at A.D. 434; but, it is most probable, they fell into a later year.

<sup>201</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. xii., p. 253.

<sup>202</sup> It is thus called, in the Irish Tripartite Life. The lough itself still retains the name. Its Anglicised form is Lough Dala. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," p. 281, n. (i), and Addenda P., p. 467, n. (i).

<sup>203</sup> So is it named, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>204</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo," Sheets 21, 22.

<sup>205</sup> It lies, in the south-west part of Tyrawley barony. See ibid., Sheets 21, 22, 29, 30.

<sup>206</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>207</sup> Thus is it written, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>208</sup> Now known as Kilmoye-Moy, a parish, extending into the baronies of Tireragh, county Sligo, and in Tyrawley, county Mayo, containing the towns of Ballina and Ardnaree, i.e. "the hill of executions." See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo," Sheet 30; and "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheets 22, 29.

<sup>209</sup> The Latin Tripartite has it "à Monachis postea possidentibus," &c. See, too, Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. xii., pp. 252 to 256, and nn. 111, 112, 115, 118, 120, 121.

<sup>210</sup> It was called, likewise, Cruimther Monach's, or Olcan's church. The Tripartite Life calls him a disciple of St. Patrick. There is an Olcan in Tirechan's list, and also an Olcan. Ussher makes Olcan a bishop of Derkan, in Antrim, after his return from his studies in Gaul. See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 951. The founder of Kilmoye was certainly another person. See Olcan's Acts, at the 20th of February.

<sup>211</sup> The name is applied to a rock, on which a cross is sculptured within a circle, and to an ancient churchyard. All traces of the church, however, have disappeared. See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," Addenda P., p. 468, n. (k.)

<sup>212</sup> Here Colgan and Archdall have incorrectly placed a monastery, founded by St. Patrick.

<sup>213</sup> He was called Eochaidh Breac, and he was ancestor of the O'Shaughnessys, O'Scanlans, O'Clerys, and O'Heynes.

<sup>214</sup> Thus is he named, by Jocelyn. In the Latin Tripartite Life, he is called Eochadius.

<sup>215</sup> As Jocelyn relates it, St. Patrick met her corpse, borne on a vehicle, at "quoddam vadum in Connacia." He also relates, that the husband's conversion, and that of his household, was in consequence of this miracle.

<sup>216</sup> Or "Echtra's grave."

<sup>217</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies,

Nearly opposite to it, there is a holy well, called Toberpatrick. Thus do Irish topographic names preserve the wondrous traditions of St. Patrick's travels.<sup>218</sup>

The Blessed Patrick sent Bishop Olcan,<sup>219</sup> after he had accomplished many good works, and had successfully preached the Gospel, to build, where the church of Kill-mor uachtair Mhuaidhe afterwards stood. There was he to find rest, in a cell, for the remainder of his days. Olcan, taking an axe on his back, travelled along, in a spirit of obedience; for, Patrick told him, to put up at that place, where the axe should fall from his back. At the spot, already indicated, this happened, and deeming it to be a heavenly monition, he there began laboriously to erect his future monastery, in which a great community afterwards dwelt. Still determined on cultivating his master's vineyard, the illustrious Irish Apostle went towards the north, and he came to Lec-Balben, or Leac Bailbene, or "the rock of Balben," where he found and blessed the sons of Amhalgaidh. Then, he went out from that country, by the western Berthlacha,<sup>220</sup> now Bartragh,<sup>221</sup> which is a sandy island, in the north-west of Castleconor parish,<sup>222</sup> and on the east side of the River Moy.<sup>223</sup> The holy man travelled towards the eastern Bertlacha, and he passed it eastwards, to the estuary of the Muaidh, towards its mouth at the sea. A young woman had been drowned there, before he arrived; when he blessed the place, and he said, that no person should thenceforward be drowned in it. Patrick prophesied, that the eastern Bertlacha should belong to him, by ecclesiastical title. According to the local history and traditions, in the day of war their king, over that region, will be found safe and victorious against his enemies, if he invoke St. Patrick, and be a faithful protector of the Church rights. There, at that stream, known as the Gregraihe<sup>224</sup>—which probably flowed through a region, supposed to be co-extensive with the barony of Coolavin—some rude persons flung stones at St. Patrick and his people. "My debroth," said the holy man, "you shall be beaten in every conflict, in which you may happen to be; and, you shall be subject to insult and contumely, in every assembly." Immediately on coming from the west, and on going towards the north, across the Muaidhe, into Gregraihe, he met two or three virulent Druids, at Rathbhaird,<sup>225</sup> or Rath-Righbhaird,<sup>226</sup> which is in the barony of Tireragh, and county of Sligo,<sup>227</sup> to the west of Killaspugbrone.<sup>228</sup> But, these, having plotted his death, were able to do nothing against him; for, the Almighty helped his

Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," Addenda, P., p. 468, n. (l.)

<sup>218</sup> The Irish Tripartite adds, that it is a sign of knowledge with them, i.e. the antiquaries, in their histories, to remember this grave.

<sup>219</sup> His feast is supposed to fall, on the 20th of February; yet, some doubt may well be entertained, on the subject.

<sup>220</sup> All around the coasts of Connaught, the word beaptrac largely enters into topographical names, to designate an oyster-bed.

<sup>221</sup> This is the Bertrigia of the Book of Armagh.

<sup>222</sup> In the barony of Tireragh. It is defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheets 16, 17, 22, 23.

<sup>223</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," n. (x), p. 250.

<sup>224</sup> This district, ridiculously called "the Gregories," seems to have been, in the county of Sligo, and as supposed co-extensive with Coolavin Barony. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (d), p. 99.

<sup>225</sup> According to the "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.M. 3501, this rath was in Muirisc. See Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., n. (w), p. 28. There were two districts so called, one now represented by the barony of Murrisk, in the county of Mayo, and the other, as indicated in the text.

<sup>226</sup> In the Book of Armagh, Tirechan's Life of St. Patrick calls it "Fossa Riabairt."

<sup>227</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," n. (m), p. 470, and the map, which is prefixed to that work.

<sup>228</sup> This parish, in the barony of Carbury, servant to escape from them. The saint said, moreover, that there never should be wanting among this people magicians and evil-doers.

Then, St. Patrick came to his dear spiritual child, Prince Conall, and demanded from him, whether he would be content, or not, to be clothed with the habit of a religious. The prince answered, that his heart was ready to perform, whatever the saint would enjoin him to do. The holy bishop, rejoicing much at his devotion, is reported to have said, "Arise O Conall, that you may assume the bachall." Conall said, "If it please thee, I shall do so." "That shall not be," said Patrick; "but, I will support thy valour, and will give comarbs<sup>229</sup> to thy race, and thou shalt be known as Conall Sciath-bachall."<sup>230</sup> The palm of laics and clerics shall be from thee; and, every one of thy descendants, on whose shield the sign of my bachall shall be, will not be subdued."<sup>231</sup> Moreover, with the Staff of Jesus, the saint made a sign of the cross upon Prince Conall's shield. This device he and his posterity, ever after took for their escutcheon.<sup>232</sup> The carrying of this shield, by any of his posterity, was supposed to render the bearer invincible in war. He went eastwards, into the territory of the Hy-Fiachrach,<sup>233</sup> of which district, there were two distinctive tribes in Connaught. He travelled along the sea-shore, but a flood of water opposed his passage. There was an unusually large rock, at that place; and, afterwards, it was designated Buaille-Patrick. A little mound, with a cross, marked the site; and there, Patrick rested, for a short time. Then, the holy bishop, Bron<sup>234</sup> of Caisel-Irra,—the ancient name for a stone fort in the district of Cuil-Irra<sup>235</sup>—and the holy Mac Rime<sup>236</sup> of Cill-Corcaraidhe<sup>237</sup>—supposed<sup>238</sup> now to be the church of Conry<sup>239</sup> is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheets 7, 8, 13, 14, 20.

<sup>229</sup> Or "church patrons."

<sup>230</sup> Or, the "shield-crozier," according to the Irish Tripartite Life; but, it was called, Sciath-bachall, or "the shield of the staff," according to the Latin Tripartite version.

<sup>231</sup> Somewhat varied runs Jocelyn's narrative of this prediction: "Thou shalt carry a shield, and a staff as the marks of sovereign power, and as the signs of thy great merit. Thou shalt represent the person, and habit of a layman, but thou shalt enjoy the merit and dignity of a monk. Many saints shall spring from thee, and many nations of the earth shall be blessed in thy seed."

<sup>232</sup> Aubrey De Vere has celebrated this incident in a poem intitled, "Patrick and the Knight; or the Inauguration of Irish Chivalry:"—

"Thou shalt not be a Priest," he said;
 "Christ has for thee a lowlier task;
 Be thou His Soldier! Wear with dread
 His Cross upon thy shield and casque!
 Put on God's armour, faithful knight!
 Mercy with justice, love with law;
 Nor e'er except for truth and right
 Thy sword, cross-hilted, dare to draw."

He spake, and with his crozier pointed 'Graved on the broad shield's brazen boss
 (That hour baptized, confirmed, anointed Stood Erin's chivalry) the Cross.

And there was heard a whisper low—

Prince of God's armies, was it thine?

"Thou sword, keep pure thy virgin vow,

And trenchant shalt thou be as mine!"

—"The Legends of St. Patrick," p. 94.

<sup>233</sup> The Hy-Fiachrach Aidhne were located in Galway, their territory being exactly co-extensive with the diocese of Kilmacduagh. The northern and more powerful tribe possessed that district, now occupied by the baronies of Carra, of Erris, and of Tyrrawley, in Mayo, with the district of Tir-Fiachrach, now the barony of Tireragh, in the county of Sligo. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (t), p. 108.

<sup>234</sup> At the 8th of June, "Bron, Bishop of Caiseal-Irra, in Uí-Fiachrach Muaidhe, A.D. 511," is noted in the O'Clerys' Calendar.

<sup>235</sup> There, too, now nearly overwhelmed with sand, stood the church of Killaspugbrone, near the town of Sligo. See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," n. (o), p. 470.

<sup>236</sup> He has not been identified, in our Calendars.

<sup>237</sup> This place lies a little south of the present barony of Corkaree, and lying west of Lough Annen, now Lough Ennel. It is near the celebrated hill of Usneach. The old church measures fifty-nine feet, by eighteen feet two inches; two of its old bells were discovered some years ago, and sold in Dublin. See Rev. Anthony Cogan's or Conrigh, in the barony of Rathconrath, and county of Westmeath—came to him ; and, there, too, he wrote an alphabet for them.<sup>240</sup> In this region, the holy Patrick baptized the seven sons of Draighen,<sup>241</sup> who, it is stated, resided in a locality, now called Drynaghan's, namely Drinaghanbeg and Drinaghannmore.<sup>242</sup> Among these, he selected Mac Erca,<sup>243</sup> subsequently the patron of Cillroe-mor,<sup>244</sup> now Kilroe,<sup>245</sup> a very ancient church,<sup>246</sup> in ruins,<sup>247</sup> on a rocky eminence, and situated within Hy-Amalgaidh territory.<sup>248</sup> Patrick gave him, after his baptism,<sup>249</sup> to Bishop Bron, to be fostered ; for, it would not be easy to take him far away, in consequence of the love his father bore him. Then, St. Patrick marked out the site of Caisel-Irra ;<sup>250</sup> and, Bishop Bron founded that place. Our holy Apostle prophesied, afterwards, that it should be deserted, by the Gentiles ;<sup>251</sup> and, as he had predicted, so did events transpire.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE HOLY MAN VISITS SLIGEACH AND CALRAIGHE—HE MEETS WITH OPPOSITION, BUT OVERCOMES IT—HE PROCEEDS TOWARDS THE BOYLE RIVER—HIS SUCCESSIVE MISSIONS ABOUT DRUIMDAIRE, GLINNE, DRUIM-CLIABH AND MAGH-ENE—HE SPENDS SEVEN YEARS IN PREACHING, AND IN ADMINISTERING CHURCH AFFAIRS, WITHIN THE CONNAUGHT PROVINCE.

ALONG the northern shore of Sligo County, St. Patrick proceeded, until he had arrived at the Sligeach River—now the Gitley<sup>2</sup>—and which flows through

<sup>240</sup> "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xviii., p. 424.

<sup>238</sup> According to a note 4, affixed to Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 428. Yet, this does not seem to us a reliable identification.

<sup>239</sup> Now a parish, defined on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheets 24, 25, 31.

<sup>240</sup> The Irish Tripartite writer adds to the foregoing account, as if quoting a more ancient author ; and, I have heard from another, that in the said place, he gave a tooth from his jaw to Bishop Bron, for he was dear to Patrick.

<sup>241</sup> So is he called, in the Irish Tripartite Life ; in the Latin version, his name is rendered Drogenius.

<sup>242</sup> These are two townlands in the parish of Kilglass, and barony of Trieragh, to the north-east of Ballina. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheets 16, 17.

<sup>243</sup> It seems possible, he may have had a festival, at the 15th of April, where the sons of Draighen of Cill-Ro are noted, in the O'Clerys' Calendar.

<sup>244</sup> Archdall is right, when placing it in Mayo. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 504. He is wrong, however, by converting it into an abbey ; and, he is still more singularly wrong, by saying, that it was erected, either by St. Fechin, or by St. Patrick. Colgan, whom he quotes, for that purpose, has no such statement, nor does he mention any patron saint of Kilroe, except Macerca. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. xiii., n. 122, p. 257.

<sup>245</sup> It is situated, in a townland of the same name, in the parish of Killala.

<sup>246</sup> It is built of very large stones, in the primitive Irish style, being twenty-four feet in length, by eighteen feet in breadth. See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," n. (n), p. 470.

<sup>247</sup> See M'Parlan's "Statistical Survey of the County of Mayo," p. 147.

<sup>248</sup> John O'Donovan, in "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," p. 469, note, calls the place here mentioned, Forrach mac n-Amhalgaidh. See p. 469, n. (m). This, he says, was Mullaghfarry, at Killala, and there the church was built, Ros filiorum Caitni, and not Catriu, as in Betham.

<sup>249</sup> Immediately after the baptism of Mac Erca, the Book of Armagh records the following incidents : "And two girls came to Patrick, and took the veil at his hand, and he blessed for them the place of the wood of Fochloth. And behold, Patrick went up to the land, which is called Foirrgea, of the sons of Amolngid, to divide it among the sons of Amolngid, and he built there a church of moist earth squared, because wood was not at hand ; and they brought to him a sick woman, having an infant in her womb, with the water of baptism, ipsa est aqua communio mulieris ; and they buried her in at the head of the

the present town of Sligo, to which it has given name.<sup>2</sup> At that river, he desired the fishermen, to set their nets for him. They said to him, "A salmon is not taken at this period of the winter; but, as you desire it, however, we will do as you direct." They placed their nets, and caught large salmon, and they gave them to Patrick; and, he blessed the river, so that the Sligech was deemed, afterwards, the most productive river of Erin, and to such a degree, that fish is caught in it, during every quarter of the year. St. Patrick left Bishop Rodan,<sup>3</sup> the herd, in Murrisk,<sup>4</sup> and at a place, called after him, Cill-Easpuig Rodain.<sup>5</sup> That district, known as Muirsce, or the "sea-plain,"<sup>6</sup> extended from the River Easkey, eastwards, to a stream, which flows into the sea, between the present townlands of Ballyecskeen, in the parish of Templeboy,<sup>7</sup> and Dunnacoy.<sup>8</sup> His calves would only do what Rodan counselled, because he was remarkable for obedience, towards his own master, St. Patrick. Wherefore, the harpers and musicians had a proverb, the nature of which is not recorded.

Next, St. Patrick went to the Callraighe<sup>9</sup> of Cull Cernadhan,<sup>10</sup> or Calregia de Culechernadan,<sup>11</sup> otherwise, the territory of Calry.<sup>12</sup> The latter denomination is still retained as the name of a parish, in the barony of Carbury, and county of Sligo.<sup>13</sup> In this district, Coolcarney<sup>14</sup> was situated. Here, the people at first opposed him, and they assembled with arms, in a secret place. When St. Patrick and his disciples passed by, the intending waylayers brought their spears close to their shields, to assault the travellers. But, in his usual frank and agreeable manner, St. Patrick induced them to yield, owing to his powers of persuasion. "My debroth," said he, "what you did is not good. Every battle and every conflict which you wage, and your children after you, shall be gained over you." They forthwith knelt to Patrick, and asked his pardon, for their obstinacy and resistance, excepting church; and upon the grave is the seat of the saint, in the church, even to the present day; and he built a certain church at Ross, among the family of Cairtrue, on an island of a bay of the sea."

<sup>250</sup> That flag, on which Patrick's tooth fell, is in the middle of the Uis, adds the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>251</sup> See the Third Life, cap. xlix., l., li., lii., liii., liv., lvi., lxii., lxvii., lxix., lxxvii., lxxxv., pp. 25 to 28; the Fourth Life, cap. lix., lx., lxi., lxii., lxiii., lxiv., lxv., lxvi., lxvii., lxviii., lxix., lxx., pp. 43, 44; the Fifth Life, lib. ii., cap. xviii., xix., xx., xxi., xxiii., xxix., xxx., xxxi., xxxii., pp. 58 to 60; the Sixth Life, cap. lix., lx., lxi., lxiii., lxiv., lxvii., lxxvi., lxxxi., cxii., cxiv., cxv., cxvi., cxxxi., cxxxviii., cxlv., clvi., clvii., clxix., clxx., clxxi., clxxii., clxxiii., clxxiv., clxxv., pp. 78, 79, 82, 83, 84, 90, 92, 95, 96, 97, 99, 105; the Seventh Life, pars. ii., cap. liii. to xcvi., pp. 137 to 142, and nn. 113 to 145, pp. 178 to 180. Also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 408 to 429, with the corresponding notes.

CHAPTER XIII.—It is a corruption of Gilly, which empties, from the beautiful Lough Gill, and passes into Sligo Bay.

<sup>2</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," Addenda, P, n. (p), p. 470.

<sup>3</sup> The Calendar of the O'Clerys has a Bishop Rodan, at the 24th of August, but without naming any place.

<sup>4</sup> In Colgan's Latin copy, it is incorrectly called Muirschaigle; and, thus, John O'Donovan was misled, by such a statement. See "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," Addenda P, n. (q), p. 471.

<sup>5</sup> It would appear, from the above, that the name, Muirsce, most likely preceded that of Cill-Easpuig-Rodain.

<sup>6</sup> See ibid., n. (b), p. 257.

<sup>7</sup> And barony of Tíreragh.

<sup>8</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheets 12, 18.

<sup>9</sup> Thus is it written, in the Irish Tripartite Life. Jocelyn calls this place Callria.

<sup>10</sup> A note to Miss Cusack's version of the Irish Tripartite Life identifies it, as Coolcarney, a district in the barony of Gallen, and county of Mayo. This comprises the parishes of Altymas and Kilgarvan. However, this does not seem to have been the place, to which allusion is made.

<sup>11</sup> Thus is the place called, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>12</sup> See "The Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," edited by John O'Donovan, LL.D., n. 269, p. xxxvii.

<sup>13</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheets 8, 9, 14, 15.

five only. Patrick then said, "In any battle, that may be won against you, though all Connaught may be after you, no greater number than five of you shall fall." And, so it had been observed, that for the future, his prophecy was verified in every instance. One time, desiring to visit the territory of Magh Luirg,<sup>15</sup> after he had travelled through Bernas-Ui-Cilella, now known as a remarkable pass in the barony of Tirerrill, and county of Sligo, the illustrious man fell into the water, in a river, which flows from Loch-Techet.<sup>16</sup> Athcarpait, or Ath-carbuid,<sup>17</sup> which was a ford on Boyle river, to the east of Assylin, is said to have been the place,<sup>18</sup> and it was near to Ess-mic-Eirc,<sup>19</sup> or "the cataract of the son of Eirc."<sup>20</sup> It was on the Buill or Boyle River, in the county of Roscommon. The parish is called Assylin,<sup>21</sup> otherwise Boyle.<sup>22</sup> Here was founded a magnificent Cistercian Abbey<sup>23</sup>—a filial establishment to that of Mellifont—in 1161,<sup>24</sup> and it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary.<sup>25</sup> Even yet, its ruins are in a good state of preservation, and they present, in connexion with a fine site, features of great picturesque beauty.<sup>26</sup> Irish romanesque arches prevail in the older parts of the building. Patrick there said, that the eastern half of the water should not produce much fish;<sup>27</sup> and, from the ford downwards, not much was ever taken thenceforward. "And, that half from the ford westwards, why do you spare it?" asked his people. "A son of life shall come, who will set up there hereafter," said Patrick, "who will desire fruitful water at his place." He alluded to Colum Cille,<sup>28</sup> the son of Fedhlimidh, who should build a monastery at Ess-Mic-Eirc. From the ford upwards to the lake,<sup>29</sup> the best fishing in Erinn was found by all, who tried the experiment. The glorious missionary, to arrange ecclesiastical affairs in Connaught, went afterwards into the territory of Magh-Luirg, where his horses and those of his companions were carried off, by the Cenel-Mic-Erca.<sup>30</sup> The tribe and territory, so distinguished, were

<sup>14</sup> This denomination is not found, on the Ordnance Maps.

<sup>15</sup> This plain and territory, of which the M'Dermotts were chiefs, is comprised in the barony of Boyle, and county of Roscommon. See an admirable Memoir on this family, and on their possessions, in John D'Alton's "History of Ireland and Annals of Boyle," vol. i., pp. 138 to 151.

<sup>16</sup> Now Lough Gara, in the county of Sligo.

<sup>17</sup> It is translated, "vadum quadrigæ," or "currus," according to the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>18</sup> The "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 748, state, that when they wrote, it was called Eas-Ui-Fhloinn, now Assylin, about a mile west from the town of Boyle. See vol. i., n. (q), pp. 350, 351, Dr. O'Donovan's edition.

<sup>19</sup> Here there was an old church, about one mile westwards from the town of Boyle, according to John O'Donovan's Ordnance Memoir Letters on Roscommon, Letter written at Boyle, July 23rd, 1837.

<sup>20</sup> In other words, St. Dachonua, son of Eirc, whom St. Columba placed over a church, in this place. St. Dachonna or Mochonna was venerated, on the 8th of March.

<sup>21</sup> The change of name to Assylin appears to have been taken from Flaherty O'Flynn, who was comarb of Dachonna, first abbot of the religious house in this place. That comarb died A.D. 1209. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., pp. 160, 161.

<sup>22</sup> The early name of Boyle was Δε το Λαργς.

<sup>23</sup> According to Sir James Ware, a prior foundation, in 1148, was effected there, but, at a place called Grellechdim. See "Cænobia Cisterciensia Hiberniæ," p. 64.

<sup>24</sup> See John D'Alton's "History of Ireland, and Annals of Boyle," vol. ii., pp. 248, 249. A very beautiful illustration of the interior is there to be found, while an exterior view illustrates the title-page of this volume.

<sup>25</sup> For illustrations of its exterior and interior, with historical notices by Mr. D'Alton, the reader is referred to "The Irish Penny Magazine," vol. i., No. 26, pp. 201 to 204.

<sup>26</sup> The accompanying interior view was sketched on the spot, by William F. Wakeman, and by him transferred to the wood-block, engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>27</sup> Lough Key lies north-east of Boyle, and its waters are drained eastwards into the Shannon.

<sup>28</sup> His feast occurs, at the 9th of June.

<sup>29</sup> Lough Gara, and the upper sources, must here be meant, inasmuch as they lie westwards from Eas Mac Eirc.

in the north of the present county of Roscommon.<sup>32</sup> The horses were concealed and tied in a remote hiding-place. Then Patrick pronounced a malediction, on the people of that country. But, Bishop Maine<sup>32</sup> of the Hy-Ailella, or "race of Oilíoll,"<sup>33</sup> and who was one of St. Patrick's disciples,<sup>34</sup> prayed the great master to forgive his kinsmen. Then, St. Patrick modified the malediction, and Bishop Maine washed his master's feet, with tears, and wiped them with his hair. He also drove the horses into a meadow, and cleaned their hoofs, in honour of Patrick. The holy Apostle said, "There shall be weeping, and wailing, and mourning, among the inhabitants of that country; nor shall there be neighbourhood there, for ever and ever." This prediction of the saint was exactly fulfilled. And Patrick also said, that a great part of that country should afterwards belong to him,<sup>35</sup> which was fulfilled. This happened, in the case of Nodain,<sup>36</sup> or Aidan, of Loch-Uama,<sup>37</sup> which is said to have been a lake, near Cavestown, in the parish of Estersnow.<sup>38</sup>

Interior of Boyle Abbey, County of Roscommon.

<sup>30</sup> So is this tribe-name given, in the Irish Tripartite Life; in the Latin version, we find, "familia de Mick-erca."

<sup>31</sup> According to a note, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," n. 9, p. 431.

<sup>32</sup> He was venerated, on the 2nd of September, according to the Calendar of the O'Clerys.

<sup>33</sup> He was the son of Eochaidh Muigh-medhoin, and of the seed of Heremon.

<sup>34</sup> Bishop Maine is also of Patrick's people, and Geintine, in Echaineach, in Hy-Ailella, we find added, in the Irish Tripartite Life. In the Latin version, he is called, "Gemthenno de Each-aineach, in regione de Tirolella." His feast has been assigned to the 2nd of September, as having been identical with Geinten, Priest, of Tir-Gaire, by Colgan.

<sup>35</sup> This servant of God was consecrated bishop, by Bron, according to some accounts. See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxv., p. 134. If so, however, it is difficult to believe, that he was among St. Patrick's followers, at that time. This incident is referred to about A.D. 440.

<sup>36</sup> Allusion seems to be made here to St. Nuadat, Archbishop of Armagh, who died A.D. 811, and whose feast has been assigned to the 19th of February.

<sup>37</sup> Thus, is it laid down, in the Irish Tripartite Life. In the Latin version, we read instead, "in Aidano de Coch-uamach." Colgan assigns his feast to the 1st of Ja-

Then, Blessed Patrick went into the territory of Callraidhe,<sup>39</sup> or Cal-rigia,<sup>40</sup> now probably the parish of Calry, in the barony of Carbury, and county of Sligo. The territory itself even extended, into Leitrim County,<sup>41</sup> to Druim-dara.<sup>42</sup> There, Druimlias<sup>43</sup> is now, represented by the parish of Drumlease,<sup>44</sup> about a mile east of the town, and in the barony of Dromahaire, and county of Leitrim.<sup>45</sup> That place was presented to Patrick for ever.<sup>46</sup> It was then and there, he baptized Mac Caerthinn.<sup>47</sup> Regarding this person, we have no further account. Patrick afterwards established himself, on the offering, in Druim-dara.<sup>48</sup> There, too, the holy Apostle left his dalta,<sup>49</sup> or foster-son,<sup>50</sup> Benen—most likely the celebrated St. Benignus,<sup>51</sup> his successor in the See of Armagh. We are told, that at Drumlease, he presided over a monastery, for a continuation of twenty years. Yet, there are good reasons for doubting, that he was left behind at Druimlias, and that, too, for so long a period.<sup>52</sup> The Tripartite does indeed mention, elsewhere, another Benignus, as being a contemporary with St. Patrick. It makes him a brother of Cethecus.<sup>53</sup>

He then journeyed into those romantic glens, which extended eastwards,<sup>54</sup> and which surround the head of Lough Gill.<sup>55</sup> It was called "Regio de nuary, or to the 9th of October. The first-named day does not seem to have been that for his festival : at the last-mentioned, there is a St. Aedhan, Mac Ua Chuinn. Colgan states, that about this period flourished St. Aidanus of Cluan-cochuille, of the race of the Hi-Fiachrach. He belonged, it is thought, to the territory of Corann, through which St. Patrick then passed. Colgan identifies Loch-uamach, here mentioned, with one near the River Buannad, towards the south, and in the territory of Breffney.

<sup>38</sup> The name of this parish is a corruption of Ath-disert-Nuadhain. It is in the barony of Boyle, and it is defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheets 9, 10, 15.

<sup>39</sup> So is it written, in the Irish Tripartite. There were several territories, named Calry, in Westmeath, Breffney, and Sligo.

<sup>40</sup> It is thus named, in the Latin version.

<sup>41</sup> Besides a part of Sligo, this district must have comprehended some part of the present county of Leitrim ; for, Dromahaire is said to have been situated in Calrigia. See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. ciii., p. 143.

<sup>42</sup> It means, "the oak-ridge."

<sup>43</sup> See Dr. James M'Parlan's "Statistical Survey of the County of Sligo," chap. v., p. 100.

<sup>44</sup> A St. Colman was venerated here, on 19th June.

<sup>45</sup> Harris was mistaken, when placing Druimlias, in Sligo. See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 268. He has been followed, by Archdall. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 631. However, this latter writer has the same Druimlias, in Leitrim. See ibid., p. 408. Here, alone, it ought to be placed.

<sup>46</sup> The charter of its church lands to Armagh is written in the Book of Armagh. The See lands were formerly attached to the Archbishopric of Armagh ; but, they were passed to the See of Kilmore, and they were afterwards leased in perpetuity.

<sup>47</sup> He was certainly a different person, from the great St. Maccartin of Clogher. The Carten in Tirechan's list, in all probability, was the latter. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. xiii., n. 125, p. 257.

<sup>48</sup> It is now known as Drumlease Cemetery. The latter name it obtained, from the number of houses and sheds, which St. Patrick and his disciples there erected.

<sup>49</sup> It means a "pupil" or "foster-child."

<sup>50</sup> See the Rev. Dr. Todd's "Life of St. Patrick," Introductory Dissertation, note 4, p. 177.

<sup>51</sup> Although occasionally employed here and there, this Benignus was a rather constant companion of the saint. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. xiii., n. 126, pp. 257, 258.

<sup>52</sup> Dr. Lanigan has no doubt, that this Benignus was introduced, merely to answer some objection raised, against certain stories about the real Benignus, such as that of his having been abbot of Druimlias. If ever there was a person of that name, an abbot in said place, he must have lived at a later period. The multitude of chapels and religious houses, which St. Patrick and his disciples built at Druimlias, belonged probably to after times, and not to the commencing period of the great man's mission. See ibid.

<sup>53</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. lii., p. 136.

<sup>54</sup> It may be observed, that Glenkeel, Glenaniff, Glenade and Glennauns, lie east and north-east from Drumlease, in the county of Leitrim.

<sup>55</sup> For several miles around the top of the lake, through the parishes of Drumlias, Cloonclare, Killargy, and Killenumery, the leading feature of the landscape is the glens Glinne," owing to the numerous valleys there abounding. The place in question is said to have had the denomination of Cenel-Muinremur,<sup>56</sup> or "Stirps Muinremar," when the Irish and Latin Tripartite Lives of our saint were written.<sup>57</sup> His two nostrils bled on the way. Patrick's flag, known as Lec-Patrick,<sup>58</sup> was near that place; and, it was also called, it is said, Carrick Phadruic, a spot corresponding with the site of Creevelea Abbey. Patrick's hazel, or Coll-Patrick,<sup>59</sup> lay a little distance, to the west of the church. The name is not now preserved, yet he put up there, for a time. Srath-Patrick,<sup>60</sup> or "the meadow of Patrick,"<sup>61</sup> was its name, when the Tripartite Life of our saint had been written; but, Domhnach Patrick was its former name, and apparently owing to the circumstance, that he remained there one Sunday.<sup>62</sup> This was the only one of St. Patrick's churches, known to have been erected, in that part of the country, or within the diocese of Achonry; and, it has been conjectured, that it was built of wattles, or of some such frail and humble material, in the first instance. Probably, also, to eradicate Druidic rites and that intersect the country."—The Ven. and Rev. Archdeacon T. O'Rorke's "History, Antiquities, and present State of the Parishes of Ballysadare and Kilvarnet, in the County of Sligo," &c., chap. ii., sect. vii., p. 91.

<sup>56</sup> A note in the Irish Tripartite asserts, that this was probably in that part of the County Cavan, in which is situate Lough Ramor, anciently called Loch Muin-reamhair. See "The Annals of the Four Masters," at A.M. 2859. Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., n. (y), pp. 10, 11. But, the introduction of this name seems to have been an oversight.

<sup>57</sup> This, however, appears to have been a mistake of the writers, regarding the exact locality of the Glenns, as Archdeacon O'Rorke has so sagaciously and critically proved, in his highly-interesting and admirable work, the "History, Antiquities, and present State of the Parishes of Ballysadare and Kilvarnet, in the County of Sligo," &c., chap. ii., sect. vii., pp. 87 to 97.

<sup>58</sup> There is a townland called Leckaun, north of Drumlease, and in the same parish.

<sup>59</sup> "The name Col-Phadruic does not survive, but there are several Coills or Culleens near Dromahaire, one of which is, doubtless, that referred to in the text. Probably it is the spot in the parish of Killenuremy, mentioned by the Four Masters, under the year 1435, as Coille-an-anma—wood of the soul."—Ven. Archdeacon O'Rorke's "History, Antiquities, and present State of the Parishes of Ballysadare and Kilvarnet," chap. ii., sect. vii., p. 93.

<sup>60</sup> There is Sraud, in the parish of Rossinver, barony of Rosslogher, and county of Leitrim, still further to the north; yet, this does not seem to have been the spot.

<sup>61</sup> The Venerable Archdeacon O'Rorke identifies this Pratum Patricii, Srah Phadruic, or "Patrick's Pasture"—long since locally disused yet preserved still by tradition—with a spot, lying at the eastern extremity of a peninsula, called Cloonmacduff, and formed by an arc of the River Uncion—a stream running from north to south being the chord. It adjoins the present townland of Collooney. The character of the spot could not have been better hit off, than by the epithet Srah, which Irish word, like the Saxon, Holme, denotes a low tract of rich land, in the vicinity of a river. The fine alluvial soil there had been called "Patrick's Pasture," by a man, who was one hundred years of age, when he related this to Archdeacon O'Rorke. "Midway between the stream mentioned and the river stands a fort or rath of one hundred and forty feet in diameter, and five or six feet in height, though somewhat depressed and dilapidated in parts, and particularly at the edge, which was formerly faced with large stones, forming a cashel. On the centre of the fort rests a great stone, five feet five inches long, five feet two inches broad, and two feet deep, which is called, by persons acquainted with the locality, the Druid's Altar. In this stone there is a slit, about twenty inches long and three wide, which was probably made for the purpose of receiving the blood of the victim sacrificed. Fifty feet to the south of the central stone there is a cluster of five others, all about the same size; an average one measuring five feet six inches in height, two feet four inches in breadth, and ten inches in depth. These and a few other large stones lying about seem to be the remains of cromlechs, and to prove the place to have been a haunt of the Druids; and looking at the spot, situated in the midst of a great solitude, fenced round by the deep and silent Uncion, and almost beyond the reach of human sight or sound, one feels that it would be hard to find a scene more fitted for the sombre and sanguinary rites of Druidism."—"History, Antiquities, and present State of the Parishes of Ballysadare and Kilvarnet," chap. ii., sect. vii., pp. 93 to 95.

<sup>62</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life adds: "et haec est una ecclesia illius regionis."

superstitions, the Irish Apostle wished to establish a congregation here ; and, it is right to state, that a church, or the ruins of a church, rested on " Patrick's Pasture " three hundred years ago,<sup>63</sup> although, at present, no trace of such a structure is to be found.<sup>64</sup> Following the opinion of Colgan,<sup>65</sup> the Rev. Dr. Lanigan and Rev. Dr. Reeves<sup>66</sup> think, there is one passage of the Tripartite Life, which is evidently misplaced. After mentioning St. Patrick's being at Drumlins, in Leitrim, he is made to appear in the Glenns, which are supposed to have been in the north of Antrim ; then, immediately afterwards, we find him travelling along the coast of Sligo, from South to North.<sup>67</sup> But, from what has been stated already, it may easily be seen, that the Glenns here mentioned, were within the Connaught province. It seems very reasonable to suppose, that he did not go to Ulster, at all, on this occasion ; but, that he merely travelled through Calry, along the northern shore of Lough Gill, and that he afterwards moved about in a district, to the east and south-east of the lake. Thence, he returned, probably by the southern shore, passing through Cloonmacduff, Coolerra, Sligo and Drumcliff, on to Magh-eni.<sup>68</sup>

We are informed, that Patrick went on his journey past Drum-Cliabh, from Caisel-Irra, and along the sea-shore, by the Rosses.<sup>69</sup> Such was the ancient name of a land-point, lying between the Rivers of Sligo and of Drumcliff,<sup>70</sup> in the barony of Carbury, and county of Sligo. He went eastwards, along Magh-Eni, or Mag-ene, and he founded there Domhnach-mor,<sup>71</sup> or the great church, of Magh-Eni. This was sometimes called Magh-Cedne, and it is now known as Moy.<sup>72</sup> Then it was, that he approached the Dubh,<sup>73</sup> which abounded with fish, and it is now known as the Duff, or Bunduff,<sup>74</sup> as also the Drobbais, or Drobbaois River. This latter stream had been unproductive, to that time. However, when St. Patrick came to the Duff, where a great number of fish had just been taken, the holy bishop requested some fishermen, who drew in their full nets, to help him and his companions to some. But, the fishers, devoid of all charity, churlishly refused the faithful servant of our Lord any of their fish, in requital of his labours and zeal for their spiritual welfare. Afterwards, he went to the Drobbais River, where he found some boys fishing ; yet, only with a very moderate share of success. Still, they joyfully saluted God's holy servant, and they offered him some fishes, from their scanty store. He was pleased to accept <sup>63</sup> This is noted on a map, belonging to the last years of Queen Elizabeth's reign.

<sup>64</sup> See Archdeacon O'Rorke's "History, Antiquities, and present State of the Parishes of Ballysadare and Kilvarnet," chap. ii., sect. vii., pp. 95 to 97. Probably, this was the church formed of mud, because no stone was there, as mentioned in the Third Life of St. Patrick, chap. liv. It was "in quodam loco Regionis Connactorum."

<sup>65</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. civ., and nn. 152, 153, pp. 143, 180.

<sup>66</sup> See "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix FF., p. 323.

<sup>67</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. xiii., n. 127, p. 258.

<sup>68</sup> See Archdeacon O'Rorke's "History, Antiquities, and present State of the Parishes of Ballysadare and Kilvarnet," chap. ii., sect. vii., p. 91.

<sup>69</sup> They gave name to the parish of Rossmore, lying in both counties. This district was formerly called, Ros-Cette, and now it is known as the Rosses ; thus differing from that place, so called, in the north-west of Donegal.

<sup>70</sup> The latter creek or river separates it from Machaire-Eabha. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.M. 3790, vol. i., n. (u), p. 49.

<sup>71</sup> It is in the parish of Inishmacsaint. There, in the vicinity of Carricklake, are the ruins of an ancient church. It is often mentioned, in the "Annals of the Four Masters."

<sup>72</sup> It forms a plain, lying between the Rivers Erne and Drowes, in the southern part of the County Donegal.

<sup>73</sup> It gives name to a village, in the barony of Carbury, and county of Sligo, where the river empties itself into the bay of Donegal. It is about four miles, west south-west from Bundoran.

<sup>74</sup> It means, "the foot of the Dubh River."

them. Yet, he pronounced, that for the future, the Dubh, formerly so abounding in fish, should not be productive in salmon, on account of that refusal, which the fishermen gave him. On the contrary, he blessed the Droghais,<sup>75</sup> which is still called the Drowes or Bundroes<sup>76</sup> River. Again, on account of the kindness, which the little boys who were fishing there did to him; our holy Apostle declared, that, thenceforward, its sterility should cease, and its fecundity should be so great, that even little boys, with scarcely any labour, could catch its fish. The salmon there taken were reputed to be among the best, in Ireland; while, it passed into a proverb, even at the waterfall of Assaroe, when large and fine fishes of that species were seen, that these must have been bred, in the River Droghais. It also was a clearer stream, than any other to be found in Ireland. Hereby, the prudent reader may learn, adds Jocelyn, in his account of the transaction, how meet it is, to entertain with hospitality the true members of Christ, and the faithful servants of Almighty God, who so greatly commends charity.

It has been said, that thrice St. Patrick went across the Shannon, into the land of Connaught.<sup>77</sup> However this may be, the holy Apostle travelled much through that province, never ceasing from preaching and working miracles, until such time as he brought nearly all the people there, to embrace the faith of Christ. In many places, he built churches, while he appointed priests, and other ecclesiastical persons; to direct the frequenters of churches, in the way of salvation. For seven years, he is stated to have laboured there, and considering all his great missionary proceedings and exertions, in the west, it is scarcely possible, he could have wrought God's work, within a shorter time. It has been supposed, that during this interval, he had been twice back and forward, in some different province.<sup>78</sup> However, the Tripartite, after having once brought the saint into Connaught, represents him as constantly employed there; nor does it make mention, in the series of recorded transactions, regarding any other excursion by him to any other province, until his departure for Ulster.<sup>79</sup> Fifty bells, and fifty altar chalices, and fifty altar cloths, he left in the land of Connaught, each of them in a church he had founded. He then bade adieu to the people of that province, and gave them a blessing, when he designed leaving them for the north.<sup>80</sup>

The priests, also, were taught to sing the divine office. In a pleasant and spacious plain, far distant from woods, and quarries, by a miracle, the saint built a fair church, which stood even to the time of Jocelyn. This building was fashioned of mud, but handsome, it seemed, for this primitive age. Neither winds, hail, frost nor rain injured it, so that it wondrously resisted the

<sup>75</sup> It rises in Lough Melvin, and empties itself into the bay of Donegal, about a mile from Bundoran. A village, at its foot, takes name from it. This is in the parish of Rossinver, barony of Rosslogher, and county of Leitrim. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," nn. 2, 3, 4, p. 432.

<sup>76</sup> It means "the foot of the Droes."

<sup>77</sup> The Tripartite Life gives this account: "Tribus autem vicibus trajecto Sinnano flumine, venit in Connaciam; in eaque, in verbi Dei predicatione et in opere Evangelii operam continuè dando, mansit annis septem." See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. cviii., p. 143.

<sup>78</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. lxvii., p. 79.

<sup>79</sup> During those seven years of his Connaught mission, St. Patrick had been once or twice, in some parts of Leitrim, to the East of the Shannon. Accordingly, he had to cross the river in a few cases for the purpose of getting into the heart of Connaught. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. v., sect. xiii., n. 127, pp. 258, 259. However, Leitrim and Cavan originally formed a part of that province.

<sup>80</sup> See "Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. liv., lv., lvii., p. 25. Also, "Septima Vita S. Patricii," pars. ii., cap. xcvi., xcix., c., ci., cii., ciii., civ., cv., cvi., cvii., pp. 142, 143, and nn. 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, p. 180. Also, the Irish Tripartite version, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," pp. 429 to 433, with accompanying notes.

<sup>81</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap.

change of seasons, and for many centuries. Near this church, a pulpit was shown, and, from this, St. Patrick was wont to preach. Moreover, many miracles were said to have been wrought there, in honour of the great founder.<sup>61</sup>

CHAPTER XIV.

ST. PATRICK LEAVES CONNAUGHT AND PROCEEDS TOWARDS DONEGAL—HIS MISSION IN TIR-AODHA—FAVOURABLY RECEIVED THERE BY THE DYNAST CONALL GULBAN—LOUGH DEARG AND ITS PILGRIMAGE—ST. PATRICK LEAVES FOR TIR-EOGHAIN—HONOURABLY TREATED BY THE DYNAST EUGENIUS—HE NEXT VISITS AILECH—CHURCHES FOUNDED IN INISHOWEN, AND NEAR DERRY—THE TWO MAC-CARTHINNS—ST. PATRICK ADVANCES TOWARDS THE RIVER BANN, AFTERWARDS SO REMARKABLE FOR ITS ABUNDANCE OF FISH.

THE illustrious Apostle of Ireland entered the Ulster province, by Eas-Ruaidh<sup>1</sup>—a celebrated cataract on the River Erne, nigh to Ballyshannon,<sup>2</sup> in the present county of Donegal.<sup>3</sup> This waterfall is now called Assaroe.<sup>4</sup> Here, he desired to build a church;<sup>5</sup> and, according to one account, he commenced its erection, and also a congbail,<sup>6</sup> in the place, subsequently called Disert-Patrick, or “the desert of St. Patrick.” St. Brigid<sup>7</sup> is said to have accompanied him.<sup>8</sup> The local name, if it ever existed at Ballyshannon, seems now to have become obsolete. However, in Disert-Patrick, there was afterwards a stone, called after him, Lec-Patrick, or Leac Phadruic. This was shown by the people, at one time, although it is not known, at present. Yet, possibly, it corresponded, a few centuries ago, with the Ballyboe<sup>9</sup> of Cashill, alias Lack,<sup>10</sup> now the townland of Cashel,<sup>11</sup> adjoining Ballyshannon. It is remarkable, that within a short distance of a cave, near the sea shore, at Assaroe Abbey,<sup>12</sup> there is a holy well, which is chiefly visited on Lady Day, although called “St. Patrick’s Well.”<sup>13</sup> lxv., lxvi., p. 79, cap. xc., p. 86, cap. xcvi., p. 87, cap. cxviii., p. 92, cap. cxlii., p. 96.

CHAPTER XIV.—The Book of Leinster and other ancient authorities state, that Aedh-Ruadh—the father of Macha, who founded Emania—had been drowned in this cataract, and thenceforward it was called after him, Eas-Ruaidh, or Eas-Aedha-Ruaidh, “Aedh-Ruadh’s waterfall,” now shortened to Assaroe. See Dr. P. W. Joyce’s “Origin and History of Irish Names of Places,” part ii., chap. v., p. 176.

<sup>2</sup> This town, so finely situated, lies partly within the bounds of Kilbarron, and partly within those of Inishmacsaint—parishes in the barony of Tirhugh—and, it is shown, on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal,” Sheet 107.

<sup>3</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan is of opinion, that St. Patrick left Connaught, for his Ulster journey, about the beginning of the year 442. See “Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. i., chap. v., sect. xiii., p. 257.

<sup>4</sup> St. Conan of Eas-Ruaidh was venerated, on the 8th of March.

<sup>5</sup> A celebrated abbey was afterwards founded, near the town, and it crowns a curious limestone rock. The abbot had the liberty of fishing for salmon, in the Erne river.

<sup>6</sup> “Congbail, ‘a habitation,’ is compounded of con, ‘together,’ and baile, ‘a house,’ and is found as the name of a parish in Conwall, in the County of Donegal.”—“Acts of Archbishop Colton in his Metropolitan Visitation of the Diocese of Derry, A.D. MCCCXCVII.,” &c. Edited by the Rev. William Reeves, D.D., M.R.I.A., n. (t), p. 79.

<sup>7</sup> Her festival occurs, at the 1st of February.

<sup>8</sup> According to the “Leabhar Breac.”

<sup>9</sup> It contains over 687 acres.

<sup>10</sup> By an Inquisition, taken in the thirty-first year of Queen Elizabeth, to inquire into the lands of Assaroe abbey, this Ballyboe was found to have been seized, among its other possessions.

<sup>11</sup> This townland lies within the parish of Kilbarron, in the barony of Tirhugh, and it is noted on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal,” Sheets 103, 107. Also, there is a town, with townlands, called Laghy, in the parish of Drumhome, and barony of Tirhugh. See ibid., Sheet 100.

<sup>12</sup> The accompanying view, drawn on the

By its side are two indentations, popularly believed to be prints, left by the saint's knees. Round the well<sup>14</sup> are seven small leachits, or penitential stations, formed of pebbles or small stones,<sup>15</sup> where pilgrims are wont to pray.<sup>16</sup> Here, Cairbre,<sup>17</sup> a son to Niall of the Nine Hostages, opposed him, and he sent two of his people, whose names were Carbacc,<sup>18</sup> or Corbhach,<sup>19</sup> and Cuan-

Ruins of Abbey Assaroe, with Bay of Donegal, in the Distance.

gus,<sup>20</sup> or Congus,<sup>21</sup> to seize his hands. The Apostle desired to mollify the tyrant, by deprecatory and mild words. "What you do is not good," said Patrick; "for, if I were permitted to found a place here, it should become another Rome of Letha, with its Tiber running through it. This should be my establishment, with its Eas-Ruaidh running through it; and, your descendants should be comarbs in it."<sup>22</sup> Thereupon, Cairbre,<sup>23</sup> or his henchman, spot, and transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, has been engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>13</sup> The basin, which contains the water, is a small natural formation in the limestone rock, at the opening of a little glen.

<sup>14</sup> A venerable thorn tree, covered with votive offerings, still remains in the vicinity of this well.

<sup>15</sup> These frail monuments, though washed by spring tides, are constantly renewed.

<sup>16</sup> The Catholic clergy of Ballyshannon do all in their power, to discourage the holding of stations, at this ancient font. See William F. Wakeman's "Lough Erne, Enniskillen, Belleek, Ballyshannon and Bundoran," &c. Third excursion, p. 96.

<sup>17</sup> He was brother to Eoghan, ancestor of the Cinel Enna; to Conall Gulban, ancestor of the Cinel Conaill; to Laoghaire, King of Ireland, from 428 to 463; to Conall Crimthann; to Fiac; and to Maine.

<sup>18</sup> So is he called, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>19</sup> His name is thus written, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>20</sup> He is called so, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>21</sup> This form of his name is found, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>22</sup> The extract from the "Leabhar Breac," fol. 15 b. a., thus reports his words: "What you have done is not good," said Patrick; "if you would permit me to erect a congbhail here, it would become a second Rome of Italy."—Rev. William Reeves' "Acts of Archbishop Colton in his Metropolitan Visitation of Derry, A.D. MCCCXCVII.," n. (t), p. 79.

<sup>23</sup> From Cairbre descended the Cinel-Cairbre of Carbury, county of Sligo, and of Gaura, or North Taffia, county of Longford. Tuathal Maolgarbh, his grandson, was King of Ireland, from 533 to 544.

Corbhach, incited a dog to attack Patrick. But wishing to save him from this danger, Cuangus struck the dog, and drove it away with a rod. Then Patrick said to him, who had urged on the dog to seize him, that his race should not exceed a small band; and, that the palm of laics or clerics should not be from him. This prophecy was duly fulfilled. But, as to Cuangus, since he agreed only to seize Patrick's hands, on behalf of Cairbre, the holy man predicted, that his race should not be more numerous than a small company, yet, that illustrious men should proceed from them. This prophecy was also fulfilled. Cairbre promised to Cuangus, for seizing Patrick's hands, so far as he could see to the north of Sliabh-Cise,<sup>24</sup> or Kisse, now probably Breesy Hill,<sup>25</sup> in the parish of Kilbarron.<sup>26</sup> When Cuangus turned to take a view about this place, however, a dark cloud closed around him, so that he only saw to the sea westwards, and to the little River Unseann<sup>27</sup> eastwards.

Crich-Conaill belonged to Cairbre, at that time, so far as Rath-Cunga,<sup>28</sup> now called Racoon; and, the northern half of the river, next to Cinel-Conaill, commensurate with the present county of Donegal, was his part. "This river, which God gave you, Cairbre," said Patrick, "your share of it shall not be fruitful as regards fish." St. Patrick predicted, likewise, that Conaill's share, which was the southern half, should be fruitful. This in reality happened, until Murghins,<sup>29</sup> or Murgesium, son of Maelduin, son of Scannal, an illustrious king of Cairbre's race, presented the unfruitful part to Colum-Cille. Afterwards, it abounded with fish, and, it was found to be a source of profit, for those who sought them in its waters.

Then, St. Patrick went between Es Ruaidh and the 'sea, into Crich-Conaill, to Rath Chunga.<sup>30</sup> He fixed a stake there, and said it should be an abode and establishment, for seven bishops. There Bite,<sup>31</sup> a brother's son to Aisicus,<sup>32</sup> Bishop of Elphin, rested from his labours. On his way, having

<sup>24</sup> Kisse was the name of a mountain, as also of a river, in Tirhugh, county of Donegal. It was near the River Erne. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 155, p. 180.

<sup>25</sup> It is on the east-border, and the highest ground, of the parish. It has an altitude of 852 feet. See "The Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 361.

<sup>26</sup> The parish, in the barony of Tirhugh, is defined on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 89, 103, 104, 106, 107, 108, 110. A little beyond the sandy beach of Ballyshannon Harbour, and rising high over the beetling cliffs, on the sea-shore, stood the picturesquely-situated Castle of Kilbarron, the former residence of the celebrated O'Clerys, who were a family of Irish historians. A picture of the ruins, with an interesting account of these hereditary chroniclers, will be found, in the "Irish Penny Journal," for 1840. Dr. George Petrie was the writer of the article, in question.

<sup>27</sup> So do we read, in the Latin Tripartite Life; but, in the English translation of the Irish version, we find this rendered "the ash eastwards."

<sup>28</sup> It is said to have been formerly known as Ard-Fothadh, in the townland of Ballymagrorty, parish of Drumhome, barony of Tirhugh, and county of Donegal. In after days, this was the regal abode of King Domhnall, about the time of Columkille. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," lib. i., cap. 10, n. (e), pp. 37, 38. Archdall has stated, that St. Patrick founded an abbey here. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 104. The Tripartite only says, however, that he founded a church.

<sup>29</sup> He was lord of the Cinel-Cairbre, who were seated in the barony of Carbury, county of Sligo, and he died, according to the "Annals of the Four Masters," in 696. See Dr. John O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., pp. 298, 299. See, also, "The Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," n. (h), p. 278.

<sup>30</sup> In the Latin Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, we find: "Pergens postea Patricius per Tirconalliam, itinere inter Eas-Ruaid et Oceanum suscepto, venit ad locum cui vocabulum Rath-cunga: ibique a fundamentis Ecclesiam excitavit," &c.—Lib. ii., cap. cxi., p. 144.

<sup>31</sup> This holy man is said to have been identical with St. Beoadh, Bishop of Ardcarne, in the county of Roscommon. His feast occurs, at the 8th of March.

<sup>32</sup> It is said, he was also buried in Rath-cunga. His feast was held, on the 27th of April. He was also known, by the name of Assan.

fixed a pole in Ard-fothaidh,<sup>33</sup> Patrick began to build a church, on this height, which is now said to be known as Ardpattan,<sup>34</sup> a small town near Ballyshannon, and contiguous to Ballymagroarty, in which was Rathcunga.<sup>35</sup> This practice seems to have indicated the preparatory intention, and a rite then adopted, before a house had been dedicated to God. On the morrow, however, the pole was found to be bent. It seems probable, that St. Patrick was in the habit of consecrating churches and altars, according to the Roman rite, which Pope Sylvester I.<sup>36</sup> had first instituted, when, under the reign of the Emperor Constantine, the Christian Religion enjoyed a respite, from those severe persecutions of previous ages.<sup>37</sup> After what he had seen, as we are told in the Irish Tripartite, Patrick said, that the place should be the seat of a king, as he regarded the sign to be declaratory of his abandonment, in regard to making it serve for ecclesiastical purposes. He foresaw, that Domhnall,<sup>38</sup> the grandson of Ainmire,<sup>39</sup> and who was subsequently so celebrated in Irish history, should there establish his residence, at a future period.

Afterwards, Patrick left the place, and he returned to that beautiful hill, called Sith-Aedha, which arose over the margin of the Erne River, and near to Assaroe. Even yet, the place is named Mullaghshee,<sup>40</sup> and it lies a little to the north of Ballyshannon town. There Connall,<sup>41</sup> the son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, and brother to King Laoighaire, was engaged holding a public assembly. These local conventions seem to have been of frequent occurrence in Ireland, at this time, as during subsequent periodical occasions. They were held for legislative, judicial and consultative purposes, while they served to regulate public and private rights and interests, according to that freedom of restricted jurisdiction, among the chieftains and their clans, as recognised by the ancient national constitution and tribal laws, which governed our ancestors. The Apostle bestowed his blessing on Connall, and his son Fergus<sup>42</sup> most earnestly desired the like favour. Then Patrick slowly and solemnly placed his hands on the boy's head,<sup>43</sup> and said, "A

<sup>33</sup> This was the royal residence, in the time of St. Columba. Dr. James M'Parlan makes St. Patrick found an abbey here. See "Statistical Survey for the County of Donegal," p. 118.

<sup>34</sup> It is within the parish of Kilbarron, and barony of Tírugh. Its extent is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 103, 107.

<sup>35</sup> The Latin Tripartite, states, they were in the vicinity of each other. "In colle vicino Ard-fothadh appellato, cœpit etiam jacere fundamenta Ecclesiæ. Sed die sequenti, inchoata fabrica cœpit corruiere, et penè tota corruit."—Lib. ii., cap. cxii., p. 144.

<sup>36</sup> This saint governed the church over 21 years, and he died at the close of the year 334. See Berti's "Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ Breviarium," iv. sæc., cap. i., p. 112. According to another account, he died on the 31st of December, the day of his feast, A.D. 335. See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. xii. December xxxi.

<sup>37</sup> See "Breviarium Romanum Pars Autumnalis. Officium Dedicationis Basilicæ Salvatoris." Noct. ii., lect. iv., v., vi.

<sup>38</sup> He was King of Ireland, from A.D. 624

to 639. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 246 to 257.

<sup>39</sup> He was the first cousin of St. Columkille.

<sup>40</sup> It means, the hill of the sidh or fairy-palace. On it a modern church is now built. See Dr. P. W. Joyce's "Origin and History of Irish Names of Places," part ii., chap. v., p. 176.

<sup>41</sup> Known as Connall Gulban, and he was progenitor of all the Cineal Connail. Their territory—described in the Book of Fenagh, fol. 47, a. a.—extended from the River Eithneach or Eany, falling into the harbour of Inbhear Naile, or Inver, the bay of Donegal, to the stream of Dobhar, which flows from the rugged mountains. Sliabh Liag was in this territory. The country of the Cineal Connail was called Tir-Boghaine, and it was included in the present barony of Banagh, county of Donegal. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (w), pp. 130, 131.

<sup>42</sup> Afterwards, he married Erca, the daughter of Loarn Mor, King of Scotland, by whom he became father to Felim, who was the father of St. Columba. Erca had been previously married to Muredach, his cousin, and son of Eoghán, son to Niall of the Nine Hostages.

child of benediction shall spring from thee, and who shall be enriched with treasures of science and wisdom. He shall be a Prophet of the Most High, a burning and a shining light, and never shall a deliberate falsehood proceed from his mouth."<sup>44</sup> Then Patrick blessed the Cenel-Conaill, and he left a blessing likewise, on their forts, and rivers, and churches. It has been generally supposed, that St. Patrick,<sup>45</sup> a nephew to the Irish Apostle, gave name to St. Patrick's Purgatory,<sup>46</sup> on an island, at Lough Derg. However, the prevailing popular tradition, in that district, the accounts of some writers, and certain reasons advanced for our holy Patriarch's possible visit to the Lough, after he had crossed the Erne, at Assaroe, are worthy of consideration.<sup>47</sup> It certainly seems not inconsistent with probability, that the Irish Apostle visited this wild region; for, his recorded journey to the north brought it indirectly on his route, as recorded in the Tripartite Lives. This lake is in the parish of Templecarn, barony of Tirhugh, and county of Donegal. The islands and lake, with the surrounding territories, for many miles, constituted at one time the patrimony attached to this holy place of pilgrimage. It has been stated, that St. Patrick entered a cave in the island of the Lough, in order to pray more devoutly to God, being removed from the abstractions of this world, in the gloomy retreat of Derg. He is related, to have traced the path to the Infinite,<sup>48</sup> for explorers of the invisible world, and there Dante has followed, with inspiring song. While his mind was earnestly directed to the Divinity, Patrick prayed, that the pains of Purgatory might be shown to him. His request was granted, and lo! before his heaven-touched fancy, the region of purgatory sprang into existence, and he saw the souls of millions, undergoing the process of purification, each placed in such a crucible, as was fitted to soften and remove the terrestrial dross, that stained the ethereal essence of the spirit; some marked with a deep hue, which much destroyed their heavenly radiance, but which blackened them not wholly; others half dimmed, half bright, and in the rapid progress of becoming spirits of light, from the action of the purifying element of fire; some becoming effulgent, by slow and almost imperceptible degrees, as having no friends to pray for them; while others glowed in the furnace, and cast off the foul crust, with amazing rapidity, by the force of those prayers and alms, which their friends offered for them on earth. Some he saw escaping from the flames, and winging their

<sup>43</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life avers, that Conall wondered at this thing, when Patrick said:—

"A youth (i.e. Colum Cille) shall be born of his tribe,

Who will be a sage, a prophet and poet,

A glorious, bright, clear light,

Who will not utter falsehood."

<sup>44</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan, however, questions the accuracy of this Tripartite statement. He thinks, if Adamnan had known, that St. Patrick himself delivered such a prophecy, he would certainly have recorded it, in his Life of St. Columba, where there is no mention of such a prediction. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. ii., n. 8, p. 263.

<sup>45</sup> He died and was buried, at Glastonbury. See Bishop Tanner's "Bibliotheca Britannica-Hibernica," pp. 578, 581.

<sup>46</sup> Others say, that it was called St. Patrick's Purgatory, from a prior, named Patrick, who ruled the monastery about 850.

<sup>47</sup> See this subject clearly treated, in that admirable, interesting, and learned work of Rev. Daniel O'Connor, "Lough Derg and its Pilgrimages," with Map and Illustrations, chap. vi., pp. 32 to 35. Dublin, 1879, cr. 8vo.

<sup>48</sup> "Il visita, assurait-on, les lieux d'expiation, et, plus justement, qu'a Virgile, le chantre de l'Enfer, du Purgatoire et du Paradis aurait pu lui dire:—

"Tu duca, tu signore, e tu maestro."

—Le Vicomte, Hersart de la Villemarqué's "La Légende Celtique et la Poesie des Cloîtres en Irlande, en Cambrie et en Bretagne." Première Partie, sect. XVII., pp. 105, 106.

<sup>49</sup> Such is the account we find, in an in-course to heaven; others were almost bright enough, to attempt the same effort.<sup>49</sup> It has been thought, that St. Patrick, under the influence of such a vision, established this island as a terrestrial purgatory, for those, who were to succeed him in the place; and, St. Daveog,<sup>50</sup> his reputed disciple, is said to have built a church and monastery here, and besides, to have carried out the details of the penitential retreat, of which he had received the outlines from his great master. The religious establishment, originally known as Patrick's Purgatory, was first fixed on what is now called the "Saint's Island," and from this, there was a bridge to the mainland, which gave easy access to the public.<sup>51</sup> During the early times of the Irish Church, and even during the middle ages, as at the present day, this Purgatory continued in high repute, both at home and abroad. We find in our records, several safe conducts, granted by the kings of England, to foreigners, who were desirous of visiting it as pilgrims. After the Reformation in England, this very remote spot was deemed to be a safe retreat for priests and people, during the penal days, until in 1632, Sir James Balfour and Sir William Stewart were ordered by the State, to seize upon the religious house, at St. Patrick's Purgatory, and to disperse the community there established. Sir William afterwards informed the Privy Council, that he ordered halls, works, foundations, and vaults, &c., to be rooted up. He ordered the place, called St. Patrick's bed, and the stone on which he knelt, to be thrown into the Lough. Furthermore, those Commissioners reported, that they found on the island an abbot and forty friars, and that there was a daily resort of 450 pilgrims to it.<sup>52</sup> After this, the station was changed from the Saint's Island, to another island much smaller, and removed about half a mile from the shore. A boat is in waiting, during the station-time, to ferry passengers across to the churches and houses, where the pilgrims resort, on this island. It is separated, far from the thronged haunts of men, and from the bustle of the crowded city, and there are no external objects to distract the minds of devout pilgrims, except the screaming of wild fowl, as they fly over the silent waters of this extensive lake.<sup>53</sup>

There is a very curious Breton legend extant,<sup>54</sup> and, it states, that our Divine Saviour gave the following promise to the glorious St. Patrick, at his grotto on the Lough Dearg island: "Whosoever shall enter this cave, having confessed and repented of his sins, and well established in faith, he shall purge away all offences, in one day and one night; while he shall see, likewise, the torments of the wicked, and the joys of the blessed." It is said, that each year, at the beginning of Lent, St. Patrick was accustomed to take a boat, which he steered, and he was absent for forty days. During this time, he had been engaged, making his Purgatory, as the legend goes; and, he always chose a distant and desert island, for the place of his retreat.<sup>55</sup> teresting little book, intituled the "Mirror of Penance," which was published in London.

<sup>49</sup> Three festivals were held yearly in his honour, on the 1st January, 24th July, and 16th December.

<sup>50</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 102.

<sup>51</sup> Sir William Stewart obliged James Magrath, the owner of this island, to enter into a recognizance, "not to allow Jesuits, friars, nuns, or any other superstitious order of Popery to enter thereon."

<sup>52</sup> See a communication to the London-derry Journal of June 12th, 1878, and headed, "Historical Notes on the Parishes of Ardstraw, Urney, and Termonaghan, Diocese of Derry," by Hy-Fiachre. Part xvii. Loughdery.

<sup>53</sup> This is taken from a Manuscript, in the National Library, Paris, fr. 1544, fol. 105, Cf., according to F. Denis, "Le Monde enchante," et Marie de France, tome ii., p. 423.

<sup>54</sup> The celebrated Spanish poet, Don Pedro Calderon de la Barca, among his numerous dramas, has made this the subject of one, "Purgatorio de san Patricio." The Dramatis personæ are St. Patrick, Angels, a king of Ireland, his daughter, and various other minor characters. This romantic Drama has been rendered into elegant English verse, by Denis Florence M'Carthy, and Certain fishermen saw him disembark one day on an islet, which no person durst approach, and there he went to the bottom of a cave, where the Magi celebrated mysterious rites. There were two subterranean routes in it; one of these led to the abyss of eternal pains, and the other to the land of joy and of youth. Whoever went in there could only issue from it, by the aid of magic words. As St. Patrick did not appear again to their gaze, the fishers supposed he had passed away for ever, and they said, that those evil spirits, he chased away from every other part of Ireland, had taken refuge in this subterranean cavern, and that they kept him there a prisoner, within the four walls of a dungeon, dark, cold, moist, miry and filled with venomous reptiles, under a chilling and penetrating rain, which drop by drop fell on his shoulders, and penetrated even to the marrow of his bones. On the eve of Easter, he reappeared to his monks, thin, pale and attenuated, like to a phantom. The year following, St. Patrick was observed anew to enter the same cave. His monks believed he remained there, so near the abyss of sorrows and the land of joy, that he witnessed whatever passed in both. Thus, by a strange concurrence of events, the magic cavern was changed into the penitents' cell, and the old barbaric rites and pagan superstitions yielded to the great Christian truths, and to the sublime meditations of St. Patrick on Hell and Paradise.<sup>56</sup>

In the year 439, it is stated, that St. Patrick received three assistant bishops, St. Secundinus—sometimes called Sechnall<sup>57</sup>—St. Isserninus—sometimes called Serenus<sup>58</sup>—and St. Auxilius,<sup>59</sup> or Ussaille, to aid him in his missionary labours.<sup>60</sup> By whom those prelates were sent, however, does not appear. By some writers, Auxilius and Secundinus are called nephews of St. Patrick, by his sister Darerca, but this is an unreliable account. Our first bishops in Ireland, after St. Patrick, are said, indeed, to have been Secundinus, Auxilius, and Isserninus. These were undoubtedly foreigners, and, it would seem, they came from Gaul. Although little is authentically known regarding him, yet Isserninus is always spoken of as coming from abroad. After his consecration, that bishop lived constantly in Ireland, until his death, which happened, about the year 469. With their assistance, St. Patrick probably consecrated other bishops, during the course of his mission. According to a very ancient document,<sup>61</sup> three hundred and fifty prelates, all illustrious and filled with the graces of the Holy Spirit, as also the founders of churches, lived about this period.<sup>62</sup> The first order called the most holy, flourished during four distinct reigns of Irish kings, viz.: in the time of Laogarius, of Aila Muil, of Lugada, son to Laogarius, and of Tuathail. These all followed the early discipline and rites, which seem to with an interesting introduction, it has been published in successive Nos. of Duffy's "Irish Catholic Magazine," vol. i., pp. 25 to 27, 45 to 50, 73 to 75, 101 to 107, 164 to 170.

<sup>56</sup> See Le Vicomte Hersart de la Villemarqué's "La Légende Celtique et la Poesie des Cloîtres en Irlande, en Cambrie et en Bretagne," Première Partie, sect. xvii., pp. 106 to 108.

<sup>57</sup> His festival is held, on the 27th of November.

<sup>58</sup> Perceiving some affinity between that name and Sezinus, Colgan gave himself the useless trouble of striving to identify two quite different persons. Lobineau, in his work, mentions St. Sezni, while adding, that scarcely anything is known about him, except his name. See "Histoire des Saints de Bretagne," p. 76. His festival occurs, at the 6th of March, as likewise, on the 7th of May, and on the 19th of September.

<sup>59</sup> His feast occurs, at the 27th of August.

<sup>60</sup> See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," A.D. CCCXXXIX. The Annals of Innisfallen have: "Secundinus et Auxiliarius (Auxilius) et Esserninus mittuntur in auxilium Patricii; nec tamen tenuerunt apostolatam, nisi Patricius solus."

<sup>61</sup> The text of this, in Latin, has been published, by Archbishop Ussher, and it is headed, "Incipit Catalogus Sanctorum Hiberniæ, secundum diversa tempora." This covers a series of years, from A.D. 433 to 664. See "Britanicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., pp. 473, 474.

<sup>62</sup> The document—from what source drawn we are not told—says regarding have been introduced, by our glorious Apostle. In that order of holy bishops, who were in St. Patrick's time, these first mentioned are Romans, and Franks, that is, natives of Gaul; while the Britons and Scots are ranked after them.<sup>63</sup>

The benign missionary greatly desired the conversion of Eugenius, another son to Niall of the Nine Hostages, and he resolved on visiting the fortress of that dynast, to announce the Faith of Christ. Accordingly, the holy man took his course, through that deep, wild and romantic pass, known as Bearnas-mor of Tir-Aodha,<sup>64</sup> and which still bears the name of Barnesmore,<sup>65</sup> in the northern part of Tirhugh barony. Thence, he emerged into Magh-Itha,<sup>66</sup> or Hithe, which was an extensive plain, in the present barony them: "Unum caput Christum, et unum ducem Patricium habebant: unam Missam, unam celebrationem, unam tonsuram (ab aure usque ad aurem) sufferebant. Unum Pascha, XIV. Lunâ post æquinoctium vernale, celebrabant: et quod excommunicatum esset ab unâ Ecclesiâ omnes excommunicabant. Mulierum administrationem et consortia non respuebant: quia super petram Christum fundati, ventum tentationis non timebant."

<sup>63</sup> As if it were intended to draw a distinction, between these contemporaries of St. Patrick, and saints, who flourished in Ireland, at a later period, the ancient document proceeds to give the following account, which (with parenthetical explanations) we thus present in a literal English translation: "The second Order of Catholic Presbyters. For in this Order, few were Bishops, and many were Presbyters, in number three hundred. They had one head, our Lord, they celebrated different Masses and different Rules, one Pasch (they observed) the fourteenth moon after the Equinox, one tonsure from ear to ear, they rejected female service, separating them (women) from Monasteries. This Order lasted, also, during four reigns; that is to say, from the last (years) of Tuathail, and through the whole reign of King Diarmata, and of the two grandsons (Domhnall and Fearghus) of Muredaig, and of Ædus, son to Ainmerech. They received (their) Mass (rites) from Bishop David, and Gilla, and Docus, Britons: their names are, the two Finians, the two Brendans, the Tuam Jairilaithea, Comgall, Coemgen, Ciaran, Columba, Cainecus, Eogenius mac Laisreus, Lugeus, Ludeus, Moditeus, Cormacus, Colmanus, Nesanus, Laisreanus, Barrindeus, Coeman, Ceran, Coman [Endeus, Ædeus Byrchinus], and many others.

"The third Order of Saints was this. There were holy Presbyters, and a few Bishops, in number one hundred: these dwelt in desert places, and lived upon herbs, water, and alms [of the faithful], they avoided property, and had different Rules and Masses, and diverse tonsures, [for some had the coronal, (Roman), and others the cæsarien, (old Irish), and they held a differing Paschal solemnity. For some celebrated the Resurrection, on the fourteenth moon, or on the sixteenth, with rigorous intentions. Those lived through four reigns; that is, Æda Allain (who reigned only three years, on account of his evil thought), and Domnail, and the joint rule of the sons, Mailcobus and Æda Slaine, and they continued until the great mortality. These are their names: Bishop Petranus, Bishop Ultan, Bishop Colman, Bishop Murgus, Bishop Ædanus, Bishop Loman, Bishop Senach. These are Bishops, and many others. The following, indeed, were Presbyters: Fechin Presbyter, Airendanus, Failanus, Coman, Commianus, Colmanus, Ernanus, Cronan, and many other Presbyters.

"The first Order was most holy, the second Order was holier, the third Order holy. The first glowed as the Sun, the second like the Moon, the third as the Stars."

Archbishop Ussher had two copies of this document, and from these, he gives different readings, inserted as marginal notes. The more recent copy was somewhat longer than the more ancient one, and he distinguishes it, by the Greek word, ἀνακεφαλαιώσις, meaning "a recapitulation." Then follow these sentences, as the addition: "Nota quod primus ordo erat Sanctissimus, secundus Sanctus sanctorum, tertius Sanctus. Primus sicut Sol in fervore claritatis calescit, secundus sicut Luna pallescit, tertius sicut Aurora splendet. Hos tres ordines B. Patricius superno oraculo edoctus intellexit; cum in visione illâ prophetiâ vidit totam Hiberniam flammâ ignis repletam, deinde montes tantum ardere, postea lucernas ardere in vallibus conspexit."

<sup>64</sup> Now commensurate with the barony of Tirhugh, in the county of Donegal.

<sup>65</sup> At present, the mailcoach road, from Sligo to Derry, runs through it, for about three miles in length. It is said, that Mon. De Thoyras Rapin—one of the French Huguenots who accompanied King William III. to Ireland—while composing his "Histoire d'Angleterre," resided in a small castle, at the western end of this gap. It is now in ruins. See James Fraser's "Hand Book for Travellers in Ireland," No. 104, p. 574.

of Raphoe. There, he founded a church, known as Donaghmore,<sup>67</sup> near the town of Castlefinn,<sup>68</sup> where he left one of his disciples, Dudubae<sup>69</sup> or Dubdubanus,<sup>70</sup> son to Corcan. It is now a rectory,<sup>71</sup> and it is near the River Finn.<sup>72</sup> Eugenius remained at Fidhmore, now said to be Veagh,<sup>73</sup> in the parish of Raymochy,<sup>74</sup> anciently called Rath-Maighe-h-Aenaigh.<sup>75</sup> There is an old graveyard, and a ruined church, in the townland and parish of Leckpatrick,<sup>76</sup> in the county of Tyrone. It lies between Strabane<sup>77</sup> and Londonderry. Unless we suppose an involution<sup>78</sup> in the order of narrative, it does not appear to be the place already referred to; yet, it is remarkable, that the denominations of Desert, and a place called Cloghcor,<sup>79</sup> "the upright stone," are near the townland of Leckpatrick. Not far from these localities is Whitefort,<sup>80</sup> a very remarkable and large rath, on a commanding site, and from which the celebrated Grianan of Ailech may be seen.<sup>81</sup> This circular caher was regarded as the regal fortress of the O'Neills, in Ulster. The word, Grianan, was generally used to signify a palace, or a distinguished residence, in a beautiful or sunny situation.<sup>82</sup> The word, Aileach, is stated, to mean a stone house; and, the name, Tir-Aileach, was applied to the surrounding country.<sup>83</sup> Tradition holds, that this remarkable stronghold was occupied

<sup>66</sup> It was so called, from Ith, uncle of Milesius, who, according to bardic tradition, was buried there.

<sup>67</sup> This church subsequently adopted the rule of St. Columba, and it is annexed to the diocese of Derry. See Rev. William Reeves' "Acts of Archbishop Colton in his Metropolitan Visitation of the Diocese of Derry, A.D. MCCCXCVII.," n. (v), p. 60. The Latin form is "Dominica magna." It need scarcely be observed, says Dr. Lanigan, that Domnach-mor or Donaghmore means "a great church." This etymology, however, may be questioned.

<sup>68</sup> This town and townland are in the parish of Donaghmore, and barony of Raphoe. They are shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheet 79. The extensive parish of Donaghmore itself, containing 46,738 acres, is described, on Sheets 69, 70, 77, 78, 79, 86, 87, 88, 95, ibid.

<sup>69</sup> Thus is he named, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>70</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite. Colgan identifies him, as the Dubanus, who is venerated, at the 11th of November.

<sup>71</sup> See Seward's "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," at the name.

<sup>72</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 163, p. 181.

<sup>73</sup> Such is the statement, found in a note to Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," but I know not on what authority. Veagh lies between the church of Donaghmore of Magh-Ith, and the royal palace of Ailech.

<sup>74</sup> This parish is in the barony of Raphoe, and it is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 46, 53, 54, 61, 62. The townland of Veagh is found on Sheet 54. Ibid.

<sup>75</sup> Here St. Brugach, a bishop, was venerated, on the 1st of November. See Dr. James M'Parlan's "Statistical Survey for the County of Donegal," p. 118.

<sup>76</sup> This parish, in the barony of Lower Strabane, is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 2, 5, 6, 10. The townland proper is described, on Sheets 2, 5.

<sup>77</sup> The town of Strabane is in the three distinct parishes of Camus, Leckpatrick and Urney, in the barony of Lower Strabane. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheet 5.

<sup>78</sup> This, however, is frequently detected, in St. Patrick's Tripartite Life, as, also, in his Life by Jocelyn.

<sup>79</sup> In the parish of Leckpatrick. See Tyrone Ordnance Maps, Sheet 2.

<sup>80</sup> See an account of it, and of other interesting objects of antiquity, about its neighbourhood, in a paper, read April 11th, 1870, by Dr. George Sigerson, "Observations on some Sepulchral Urns and Burial Monuments in the County of Tyrone, with remarks on the true site of the Battle of Knockavoe."—"Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. i., series ii., pp. 14 to 19.

<sup>81</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. i., series ii., for a paper, read on the 12th of August, 1878, "Exploration and Restoration of the Ruin of the Grianan of Aileach," by Dr. Walter Bernard, Fellow of the College of Physicians in Ireland, &c., with Plates xvii. and xviii., indicating ground plans and lateral sections, pp. 415 to 423.

<sup>82</sup> The accompanying illustration of its exterior, as seen at present, was drawn on the spot, by Mr. Joseph P. Addey, Master of Drawing in the Londonderry School of Art. This drawing has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>83</sup> The most complete topographical and from remote pagan times, as the chief residence of the northern kings. No doubt, too, they had many outlying forts. Formerly a great wood extended around Whitefort, and along the east banks of the Foyle. This may serve to throw some light, on a royal residence of Eugene, and on his place, Fidh-mor, or "the great wood," the exact locality for it not having been determined.

The Grianan of Aileach, as lately restored, County of Donegal.

The holy missionary was approaching Eoghan,<sup>84</sup> who was ancestor of the Cinel Eoghain, and his territory was near.<sup>85</sup> The families, descended from him, were seated in the present counties of Tyrone and Londonderry, as also in the baronies of Raphoe and Inishowen, in the county of Donegal.<sup>86</sup> Patrick had said to his people: "Take care that you meet not with the lion, Eoghan, the son of Niall." Resolving to compliment the illustrious stranger on his way, and as a mark of high-bred courtesy, Eoghan sent a guard of honour to meet his expected guest, and Muiredhach, his son, was appointed to its command. He was in front of the youths, when he met on the way, Sechnall, or Secundinus, who was in the rere, and among a host of clerics. Sechnall said to Muiredhach, "You should have a reward from me, if you could persuade your father to believe." "What reward?" asked he. "The sovereignty of thy tribe should for ever belong to thy heirs," said Sechnall. To this historical account of this locality will be found, in the "Memoir of the City and North-Western Liberties of Londonderry," part ii., sect. 2. pp. 217 to 234. Various engravings of the fort-site, and of parts of the Grianan, accompany this notice.

<sup>84</sup> According to Roderick O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," at least he had five sons, viz.: (1) Muiredhach, father of Muirheartach Mac Erca, King of Ireland, the ancestor of the O'Neils, and whose posterity gave sixteen monarchs to Ireland; (2) Fergus, ancestor to the O'Conors of Moyith; (3) Oilill, from whom the Muintir Kelly; (4) Fedhlim, ancestor to the O'Duibhdiorma of the Bredach, in Inishowen; and, (5) Eochy Binne, from whom the Cinel Binney, near the Foyle, are descended. See pars. iii., cap. lxxxv., p. 402.

<sup>85</sup> From him, it took the name of Tir-Eoghain, or Tir-Owen.

<sup>86</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (s), p. 34.

<sup>87</sup> This dramatic form of narrative is arrangement, Muiredhach assented. When the holy Apostle had preached, in the presence of the king, Eoghan embraced the Faith of Christ. St. Patrick had his first interview with him, at Fídh-mor, where a leac or flag was set up. "If you would receive the salutary doctrines of Christ in your country," said Patrick, "the hostages of the Gaedhil should come to you."<sup>87</sup> Personal comeliness and a fine presentable figure were deemed to be great recommendations, at that time, in Ireland; while the kings and chiefs felt greatly desirous, to boast of such distinctions. "I am not good-looking," said Eoghan, "my brother precedes me on account of my ugliness." "What form do you desire?" asked Patrick. "The form of that young man, who is bearing your satchel," said Eugene. He alluded to St. Rioc<sup>88</sup> of Inis-bo-finde, then said to have been so engaged. Immediately, Patrick covered them over with the same garment, the hands of each being clasped round the other. They slept thus, and afterwards awoke, having a like form, and with the sole difference of the tonsure. "I do not like my height," said Eoghan. "What size do you desire to be?" then enquired Patrick. Eoghan, who was of small stature, reached up his hand with his sword.<sup>89</sup> "I should like this height," said he. Then we are told, he immediately grew to the height desired, and that he so continued, for the rest of his life. Patrick afterwards blessed Eoghan, with his sons. "Which of your sons is dearest to you?" asked Patrick. "Muiredhach," said the dynast. "Sovereignty from him,"<sup>90</sup> for ever," said the saint. "And next to him?" asked Patrick. "Fergus," answered the king. "Dignity from him," replied the holy man. "And after him?" then enquired Patrick. "Eocha Bindech," replied Eoghan. "Warriors from him," said Patrick. "And after him?" then asked our saint. "They are all alike to me," answered Eoghan. "Therefore, they shall have united love," said Patrick.

Patrick next went to Ailech of the Kings,<sup>91</sup> and which is now known as Greenan-Ely, on a most elevated, commanding position, at the head of Loughs Foyle and Swilly.<sup>92</sup> Three concentric ramparts,<sup>93</sup> of an irregular circular outline, but now greatly dilapidated, ascend above each other in successive terraces, to the crowning cashel, or keep of the old fortress.<sup>94</sup> From adopted, from the Irish Tripartite. In addition to the foregoing sentence, the Latin Tripartite has, "sed quia extra patriam, eam amplexus, non alios obtinebis obsides, quam quas manu forti et gladio evendicabis."

<sup>88</sup> Colgan says, that St. Rioc was the nephew of St. Patrick, and a son of his sister Darerca.

<sup>89</sup> Such is the account, in the Irish Tripartite Life. In the Latin version, it is stated, he held up a spear, and obtained the request, that his stature should grow to equal its length.

<sup>90</sup> This means, that the right of sovereignty was to be attached to his race.

<sup>91</sup> See the Irish Ordnance Survey "Memoir of the City and North-Western Liberties of Londonderry," part ii. Ancient, sect. 2. 'Antiquities—Pagan, p. 217. This work appeared in 1837, in royal 4to, with fine local ground plans and engravings.

<sup>92</sup> The Greenan stands on an elevation of 302 feet, and its whole ambit lay, within the townlands of Carrowreagh, Speenoge and Toulett, in the parish of Burt, and barony of Inishowen. See it shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheet 47. On Sheet 55, to the south, we might probably trace the low lands, where a channel once connected Lough Foyle and Lough Swilly.

<sup>93</sup> Within the outermost enclosure, on the circular apex of the hill, 5½ acres are contained; within the second, 4 acres; within the third, about 1 acre is found; while, within the Cashel, there is about ¼ acre of surface.

<sup>94</sup> The Ordnance Survey Memoir presents views of its ground plan, and the galleries within its ruined walls, as found in 1837, with some sectional views, and admeasurements. These measurements have been more accurately set forth, and in detail, by Dr. Bernard, in the paper, to which allusion has been already made. A square-headed doorway enters the Cashel, as now restored, and three distinct platforms, ascended by means of side stone steps, are within the circle, which reaches interiorly, 77 feet 6 inches, in diameter, from wall to wall, as measured by Mr. Joseph P. Addey, who the height it occupies, one of the most magnificent and extensive views in Ireland may be obtained. For many ages past, this fortress had been deserted,<sup>95</sup> and a heap of scattered stones only marked the site ; but, of late years, these have been collected, and have been placed,<sup>96</sup> so as to re-build the great caher, on the lines of its original foundation, and according to a style and an arrangement, supposed to be very closely resembling the early structure. Here, too, is pointed out a stone, called by the name of St. Columkille.<sup>97</sup> It is thought to have been the former coronation stone of Aileach, and to have been that which St. Patrick blessed, when he accompanied Prince Eoghan to his palace, over Lough Foyle.<sup>98</sup>

Interior view of Aileach Fort.

At the period of our Apostle's visit, referred to about A.D. 442, it has been stated, that Eoghan—Anglicised Owen—had lived about forty-seven years, in the old Castle of Aileach.<sup>99</sup> Then, St. Patrick blessed the fort, and left his flag<sup>100</sup> there ; and, he prophesied, that kingship and pre-eminence kindly furnished a horizontal plan, and lateral sections. The illustration in the text has been drawn, on the spot, also, by the same gentleman ; it has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved by Mrs. Millard. At the highest part, the wall at present is about 17 feet 3 inches, in height, on an average ; while to suit the irregularities of ground, and to bring the top nearly on a level all around, the southern portion was raised a few feet higher than the northern. The width of this circular wall, at the base, averages above 13 feet. Several old roads, leading from the Greenan, can be traced around it, on the hill-sides.

<sup>95</sup> In A.D. 1101, King Murtach O'Brien of Munster, at the head of a large southern army, demolished the Grianan of Aileach, in revenge for the demolition of Kincora, by Donnell Mac Loughlin, in A.D. 1088. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 934, 935, and 967 to 969.

<sup>96</sup> This restoration has been effected, since 1874, with great labour and expense, by Dr. Walter Bernard, of Londonderry.

<sup>97</sup> See an account and engraving of it, in J. B. Doyle's "Tours in Ulster," chap. xv., pp. 302, 303.

<sup>98</sup> This it thought to have been the leac, alluded to in the Irish Tripartite Life, as having been left at Aileach.

<sup>99</sup> See Maghtochair's "Inishowen : its

should be over Erinn from Aileach. "When you lift your foot out of your bed to the flag, and your successors after you," said Patrick, "the men of Erinn shall tremble before you." He blessed the Island<sup>101</sup> of Enis-Eoghain—now formed into a peninsula—and the limits of which at present are known, as the baronies of Inishowen, East<sup>102</sup> and West,<sup>103</sup> in the County of Donegal. After this visit, our holy Apostle gave a blessing of valour to Eoghan.<sup>104</sup> Among our Manuscript memorials,<sup>105</sup> there is, likewise, an enumeration of the gifts bestowed by St. Patrick, on each of the sons of that potentate. He imparted those blessings, from Belach-ratha, or "the road-rath," now known simply as Ballagh,<sup>106</sup> in the barony of Inishowen East, and parish of Clonca, near Malin Head,<sup>107</sup> the most northern part of Inishowen. Here are Malin holy well, and the ruins of a church, near the sea-shore, said to have been the erection of St. Patrick himself. Eochaidh, the son of Fia-chra, son to Eoghan, was baptized with Eoghan. Patrick's covenant was made between them; and, it was decreed, that whosoever dared to transgress it, should not have children born to him, and his body should not decompose, in the clay.

Leaving Elagh,<sup>108</sup> the holy man, it is stated,<sup>109</sup> crossed the Foyle, at Culmore,<sup>110</sup> to enter on a new field of labour. Immediately, St. Patrick went into Daigurt, or Dagart, in Magh Dula,<sup>111</sup> probably within the bounds of the present county of Derry.<sup>112</sup> He built there seven Domhnachs, or great History, Traditions and Antiquities," chap. iv., p. 23.

<sup>100</sup> This was probably a coronation stone, having this tradition attaching to it.

<sup>101</sup> Such most likely it was, in the days of St. Patrick, when the parted waters of the River Foyle entered the ocean on one side, by Lough Foyle, and on the other, by Lough Swilly.

<sup>102</sup> This distinctive barony is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 30, 31. This district forms the extreme northern part of Ireland.

<sup>103</sup> This distinctive portion of the old territory is to be found, on Sheets 9, 10, 18, 19, 20, 28, 29, 30, 37, 38, 39, 46, 47.

<sup>104</sup> We have it thus translated, from the original Irish, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick:"—

"My blessing on the tuatha (territories)
I give from Belach-ratha,
On you the descendants of Eoghan,
Until the Day of Judgment.

"Whilst plains are under crops,
The palm of battle shall be on their men,
The armies of Fail (Ireland) shall not be over your plains;
You shall attack every tetch (tribe).

"The race of Eoghan, son of Niall, Bless O fair Brigid!
Provided they do good,
Government shall be from them for ever.

"The blessing of us both Upon Eoghan Mac Neill,

On all who may be born from him, Provided they are obedient."

<sup>105</sup> In the Book of Lecan, fol. 67, b., col. 1.

<sup>106</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheet 4.

<sup>107</sup> The town of Malin will be found, on the same Sheet, but this extreme point lies much more northerly. Bishop Pococke's "Journal" has noted a monastery, at Mawlin.

<sup>108</sup> The townland of Elaghbeg, in the parish of Burt, and barony of Inishowen West, is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 38, 47; while Elaghmore is in the parish of Templemore, in the North-west Liberties of Londonderry, and it is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Londonderry," Sheet 13.

<sup>109</sup> See Maghtochair's "Inishowen: its History, Traditions and Antiquities," chap. iv., p. 23.

<sup>110</sup> This townland is in the parish of Templemore, North-western Liberties of Londonderry. It is shown, on "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Londonderry," Sheets 13, 14.

<sup>111</sup> This name is said to be partly preserved, in that of Moyola, a river that passes by Castledawson, and which flows into Lough Neagh, at its north-west point. See "Acts of Archbishop Colton in his Metropolitan Visitation of the Diocese of Derry," A.D. MCCCXCVII., edited by Rev. William Reeves, D.D. Additional Notes, F., n. (f), p. 120.

<sup>112</sup> Colgan errs, when placing this territory in Kiennacht. See Index Topographicus, to "Trias Thaumaturga," p. 715.

churches,<sup>113</sup> during seven weeks he spent about the River Fochaine, or Fochmuine, now the Faughan,<sup>114</sup> a stream which flows, in a north-westerly direction, into Lough Foyle. These churches are called respectively, in the Irish Tripartite Life, Domhnach-Dola,<sup>115</sup> or Domhnach Dula,<sup>116</sup> Domhnach-Simlis,<sup>117</sup> Domhnach-Dara,<sup>118</sup> Domhnach-Senchua,<sup>119</sup> Domhnach-Minchluane,<sup>120</sup> Domhnach-Catte,<sup>121</sup> and Both-Domhnaigh.<sup>122</sup> Within the present counties of Derry and Tyrone, these churches seem to have been erected; and, it is probable, if some of their denominations have become obsolete, others may yet survive, in corruptions of topography, or in popular traditions.

Then Patrick proceeded into Tir-Eoghain of the Islands, according to the Irish Tripartite; but, it does not appear to have been a place, distinct from Inis-Eoghain.<sup>123</sup> A portion of this territory was then governed by Fergus, who was the son of Eoghan.<sup>124</sup> The holy Apostle there began to build a Disert,<sup>125</sup> or to measure out church foundations, at a certain place, called Achadh-Driman,<sup>126</sup> or Achadh-Droman.<sup>127</sup> However, Coelbad, son of Fergus,<sup>128</sup> or of Eoghan, violently drove him thence; and, St. Patrick said, in consequence thereof, at that place, his race should never have a goodly house <sup>113</sup> Colgan could not find any account of them, however, one only excepted, and, that obscure enough, called Badoney. Archdall might have passed this over, as a monastic erection, without swelling his "Monasticon Hibernicon" with it. Had such churches been really erected by St. Patrick, they would, in Dr. Lanigan's opinion, have been well known, and have been held in high estimation. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. ii., n. 13, p. 264.

<sup>114</sup> It rises near the boundaries of Derry and Tyrone Counties, among the Sperrin Mountains.

<sup>115</sup> This is omitted from the enumeration, as found in the Latin Tripartite Life. The site of this church has not been ascertained. Probably, it was near the Moyola.

<sup>116</sup> Among St. Patrick's domestics was "Sanctus Beschna præsbyter de Domnachedala, Sacellanus."—Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Vita Tripartita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xcviii., p. 167.

<sup>117</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life writes it, Domnach-Seinlis.

<sup>118</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life has it, Domnach-Daire.

<sup>119</sup> In the Latin Tripartite, Domnach-Senchua.

<sup>120</sup> In the Latin Tripartite, Domnach-Mionchluana. This is the old church of Clooney, in the parish of Clondermot, near Derry, mentioned in Rev. William Reeves' "Acts of Archbishop Colton in his Metropolitan Visitation of the Diocese of Derry, A.D. MCCCXCVII.," pp. 31, 32.

<sup>121</sup> The Latin Tripartite has it, Domnach-Catha.

<sup>122</sup> The Latin Tripartite writes it, Both-Domnaigh. This is now Bodoney, in the north of Tyrone County, and in the diocese of Derry. There are two parishes, bearing this name—viz., Upper Bodoney and Lower Bodoney—both in the barony of Upper Strabane. The former is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19. The latter is shown, on Sheets 11, 12, 13, 18, 19, 20, 26, 27, 28, ibid. The old church and cemetery of Bodoney are situated, near the Glenelly River, in Glenrone townland, Upper Bodoney parish. In 932, Muireacan of this place was abbot or corbe of Armagh. During that year, he crowned Aodh, son of Donnell, as the King of Ireland.

<sup>123</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>124</sup> So states the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>125</sup> There is a parish, known as Desertegny, in the barony of Inishowen West, and it is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 9, 10, 18, 19, 28, 29. It is questionable, however, if this be the place here designated. The name "Disert" is merely an Irish form of the Latin Desertum. It primarily signified "a sequestered place," and it was afterwards applied to the church, erected in such a spot; hence, it came to signify "a hermitage." As a prefix to the names of churches, it was exceedingly common.

<sup>126</sup> So is it named, in the Irish Tripartite. There is a townland, called Magheradrumman, in the parish of Donagh, in Inishowen, and, perhaps, the place here mentioned. See Rev. William Reeves' "Acts of Archbishop Colton in his Metropolitan Visitation of the Diocese of Derry, A.D. MCCCXCVII.," Additional Notes F., nn. (k, l), pp. 120, 121.

<sup>127</sup> So is it written, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>128</sup> Such is the relationship, as given, in the Latin Tripartite Life; but, in the Irish version, Coelbad is called the son of Eoghan.

<sup>129</sup> The Irish word, Eas, denotes a turbu-to live in. The event proved the truth of this prediction; for, Comman, son of Algasach, sprung from the race of Coelbhadh, who was at Eas-mac-Eirc,<sup>129</sup> wished to build a house there, but before he had the roof put on, it was broken down, and destroyed, by a young cleric, belonging to the family or church of Domhnach-mor<sup>130</sup> of Maighe-Tochair.<sup>131</sup> But, Aedh,<sup>132</sup> a son to the chief, felt greatly for the indignity, with which the Apostle had been treated, accosted him, and earnestly besought him, to accept a site for the founding of a church, not far from the spot abandoned. There was neither a bank nor a wall, between that field and the aforesaid Achadh-Droman. This gift, St. Patrick gratefully accepted. There he erected Domhnach-mor-Maighe-Tochair,<sup>133</sup> built on a beautifully picturesque site. It commands a fine view of the most extensive plain in Inishowen, the Lough of Strabreagy, the high ridges of Malin and Croagh, Culduff Bay, and far off in the distance, on a clear day, are seen some of the elevated peaks of Scottish mountains. Beside the old church stands a stone cross, more than six feet in height, hewn out of a solid stone block. It is ornamented with numerous scrolls and shamrocks. On each side of it, there is a square pillar, and on three sides belonging to each of these pillars, the figure of a human head is engraved. Besides the head, the figure of a heart, surmounting it, is on that pillar, nearest to the public road. This old monument is thought to be of the eighth century.<sup>134</sup> There, too, he remained for forty days, and he left Mac Cairthin in charge of it.<sup>135</sup> He was distinct, it is said, from the patron saint of Clogher; yet, the Rev. Dr. Lanigan remarks, that there is but one Maccarthen, or Carthen, on Tirechan's list. Ussher<sup>136</sup> had a Life of Maccarthen, Bishop of Clogher, which does not mention, that he had a brother similarly called.<sup>137</sup> Yet, it has been stated, that the Mac Cairthin, already named, was brother to that prelate, as well as his namesake. Too lightly, however, does Dr. Lanigan assume, the good people of that church in Inishowen wished, as he supposes, to claim the honour of its having been governed by so celebrated a prelate, and that the compilers of the Tripartite Life, finding this could not accord with the circumstance of correct biography, strove to introduce here a lent waterfall, coming over steep rocks, and falling with great force into an abyss. Colgan identifies, by conjecture, the present cataract—for others are similarly named in Ireland—with one descending from the steeps of Sliabh-snechta, or "snowy mountain," and which falls into a little river, running by Domnach-mor muighe-tochair, and into the ocean estuary of Traigh-brege, in Inishowen.

<sup>130</sup> Now the parish of Donagh, and it is in the barony of Inishowen East. It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 4, 10, 11, 19, 20, 21, 30.

<sup>131</sup> This plain lay within the parish, which was also called Townaghglyntachyr, and Donaghclantagh. These denominations are now decompounded, and preserved in common use, partly in Donagh, the parochial name, and partly in Glentogher, otherwise, Carrowmore, an extensive mountainous tract therein. The old name, in Irish, was Domnac Eilinne-tochair.

<sup>132</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life, he is called the son of Fergus. The Latin Tripartite Life, however, makes him the son of Coelbad.

<sup>133</sup> The place is probably not distinct from Domnachglenne Tochair. "This is now a parish church in Inishowen, and remarkable for the great resort of pilgrims on St. Patrick's Day. Here is still preserved the saint's penitential bed, and many other ancient monuments of that kind, fit objects for the devotion of the pilgrims. The church is near to Eas-mac-eirc, the remarkable cataract of Sliabh Sneachta."—Dr. James M'Parlan's "Statistical Survey of the County of Donegal," pp. 108, 109, A.D. 1802. 8vo.

<sup>134</sup> See, Maghtochair's "Inishowen: its History, Traditions and Antiquities," chap. iv., pp. 23, 24.

<sup>135</sup> The celebrated Father John Colgan, the Irish hagiographer, was a native of this parish, commonly called in his day, Domnach-glinne-tochair. See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 173, p. 181.

<sup>136</sup> See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 856.

<sup>137</sup> See, also, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiv. Martii. De S. Macarthenno, Epis. Clochorensi, pp. 738, 739, where a fragment of St. Maccarthen's ancient Life is introduced.

<sup>138</sup> While Colgan distinguishes two saints,

second Maccarthen,<sup>138</sup> as the well-known historic prelate,<sup>139</sup> thus named, was most probably too young to have been a bishop, at the period we are now engaged considering.<sup>140</sup> While St. Patrick was in that place, a certain bishop came to him, and this ecclesiastic belonged to the race of Corcu Theimne. He was attached to the little church of Toch,<sup>141</sup> supposed to be Cill Tog,<sup>142</sup> of Ceara,<sup>143</sup> or Carra district,<sup>144</sup> in the present county of Mayo. This district is now represented, by the modern barony of Cara.<sup>145</sup> Next, Patrick proceeded from Domhnach-mor-Maighe-Tochair, until he came to the limits of the Bredach, which is a small river in Inishowen, and which falls into Lough Foyle, at Maghbile.<sup>146</sup> There he met three Deachans,<sup>147</sup> or Deacons, the sons of Patrick's sister, in the country of Ailell, son of Eoghan. He ordained Oengus, or Ænguss,<sup>148</sup> the son of Ailell, in that place. He celebrated or remained there on a Sunday, and, therefore, it is thought, that it got the name of Domhnach-Bile, now Merville.<sup>149</sup>

When Patrick was in the territory of Enda,<sup>150</sup> at Ailech-Airtich,<sup>151</sup> Enda came to him. "Make to me a grant of this place," said Patrick. "As if we had no clerics of our own," said Enda. On the morrow, Enda came, and brought his son, Echu Caech,<sup>152</sup> or "Echu the blind," with him. Patrick so called, and the sons of Carthenn; he, also, remarks, that there are two distinct festivals, referring to this name—one of these occurring on the 24th of March, and the other on the 15th of August. He inclines to the opinion, that the patron of Domnach-mor Muige-tochuir, whose proper name does not seem to be known, was venerated on the 24th of March; while, the other, known as Aidus, and Bishop of Clogher, had his festival, on the 15th of August.

<sup>139</sup> St. Maccarthen, Bishop of Clogher, died about A.D. 506.

<sup>140</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. ii., n. 14, p. 264.

<sup>141</sup> It was in the region of Temenrigi i Ceru, and, as we are told, towards the setting of the sun.

<sup>142</sup> This church has not been identified.

<sup>143</sup> A considerable amount of information, regarding this territory, will be found in John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," at pp. 15, 16, 149 to 159, 184, et seq., 204, 205, 286, et seq., and Addenda, passim.

<sup>144</sup> See the "Book of Armagh," fol. 15, as quoted, in Petrie's "History of Tara Hill," in "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xviii., p. 47.

<sup>145</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," p. 419, n. 7.

<sup>146</sup> The town of Merville, is in the parish of Lower Merville, in the barony of Inishowen East, and it is shown on the "Ordinance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 21, 22.

<sup>147</sup> While, in Harris' Ware, St. Finian is made to be the founder of this church, in the sixth century; more correctly has Archdall, left St. Patrick, as the founder—although he is not warranted, in making him erect a monastery, at this place. See vol. ii., "Bishops of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 265, and "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 103. The latter statement has been followed in Dr. James M'Parlan's "Statistical Survey of the County of Donegal," pp. 116, 117, 118.

<sup>148</sup> According to Colgan, he was venerated, on the 18th of February, at Drum Bearta, where there was an ancient chapel, near the castle, belonging to the noble family of the O'Dogherties.

<sup>149</sup> That this was not a proper name, but rather the name of their Order, appears from the adjunct, in the Latin Tripartite, "sive Diaconos."

<sup>150</sup> The Cineal Eanna, or the race of Eanna, is said to have been in Tirconnell, and between the two arms of the sea, Lough Foyle and Lough Swilly. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xix. Februararii. De S. Baitheno Episcopo, n. 14, p. 370. Yet, this does not seem to have been the place alluded to, but rather Crich Enna Artech, "in Connacia," and to the north of Cruachan Aigle, where Domnal was Bishop of Aleach-mor. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xviii., xix., p. 131.

<sup>151</sup> Here, as Colgan remarks, the author of the Tripartite Life inverts the order of narrative, by relating the actions of the Maccarthen already mentioned, which must have taken place, at a time, when, before or after this Inishowen visit, he had been in Connaught. The Irish Tripartite states, Ailech Airtich was in Sonnacht.

<sup>152</sup> So is he called, in the Irish Tripartite. In the Latin version, he is named "Eochacium, sive Eochanum, cognomento Luscum, qui quiescit in Inbher." Colgan thinks, if he were numbered among the saints, he may have been the Eochadius, surnamed Úsneach had turned off to pray, and his people to baptize, to confer orders, and to propagate the Faith. The two Maccairthinns were there, at the time; namely, he who was venerated at Clochar, now Clogher, in the county of Tyrone, and he who was at Domhnach-mor-Maighe-Tochair. "Confer ye the degree of bishop upon my son," said Enda. "Let Patrick be consulted," said Patrick's champion, Maccairthinn of Clochar. "It is our duty," said the other; "I will confer the order." To this course, moreover, Maccairthenn of Clogher agreed. When St. Patrick heard of their proceeding on returning, he said, "You have conferred the episcopal order, in my absence, on the son of the Wolf; there shall be strife in the church of the one Maccairthenn for ever, and there shall be poverty in the church of the other." This prediction was fulfilled; for, afterwards, there was strife at Clochar; while there was poverty at the church of Domhnach-mor-Maighe-Tochair. St. Patrick likewise said: "Two persons shall profane the relics of that son, upon whom the degree was conferred, and that, too, after murder had been committed, by two robbers, who shall haunt the place. One hundred and twenty years must elapse, before a son of light<sup>153</sup>—born in southern parts—shall re-consecrate his church, and it shall be restored to me again." The whole of this prophecy was fulfilled. The first place, where his relics were deposited, was a high and beautiful spot; but, they were carried thence, after a short time, to a lower place. That first locality, where his relics were preserved, after some time was deserted; while, robbers and murderers were accustomed to dwell in it, and this was attributed to St. Patrick's imprecation. And, accordingly, his church was ceded to Ciaran Mac-an-tsaír,<sup>154</sup> but it was restored to Patrick again. As Patrick was in Tir-Enda Airtech, at Talach-liag,<sup>155</sup> in Leiter,<sup>156</sup> he struck wattles in the ground, with the intention of building a church there. But, these afterwards became a bush, or tree, from which leaves and branches sprouted. There happened to be three clerics there, in his company, of the same name, and he also made them equal in dignity, having consecrated them as bishops. The first of these was Domnaldus,<sup>157</sup> son to Crimthann, of the Hill of Usuey, in Meath, where his father had a property, and whose feast was celebrated, at the 1st of January. But, this conjecture is evidently destroyed, by the statement, that his remains were at Inbher, and there are many places so called, in Ireland. This Echu, the son of Enda, was afterwards known as Bishop Echan, according to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>153</sup> Allusion is here made to St. Kieran, patron of Clonmacnoise, whose feast is held on the 9th of September. Colgan remarks, that the present allusion has no reference to his birth, as this event took place, about A.D. 515; but, it rather means, that one hundred and twenty years after the prophecy, the place in question, was to become the property of St. Kieran's successors.

<sup>154</sup> Or "son of the artificer," a title by which St. Kieran of Clonmacnoise was so frequently designated.

<sup>155</sup> So is this place written, in the Irish Tripartite Life; it is Tulach-liag, in the Latin version.

<sup>156</sup> These localities have not been ascertained. The word Leiter, which enters so largely into the composition of Irish topographical names, is generally understood, in Connaught, to signify "a watery hill-side;"

in Cormac's "Glossary," it is rendered, leth tirim agus leth fluich, or "half dry and half wet," p. 105. Edited by Whitley Stokes, LL.D.

<sup>157</sup> Colgan remarks, that the Irish proper name Domnall corresponds with Daniel, and that there is a British saint of the latter name, who is alluded to, by John Bale, in "Scriptorum Illustrium Majoris Britanniae," cent. i., cap. lix. He lived A.D. 516, and his feast was held on the 1st of December, according to the "Martyrologium Anglicanum." Giraldus Cambrensis makes him Bishop, at the place, subsequently known as Bangor, in North Wales. See "Itinerarium Cambrie," lib. ii., cap. 6. In an Irish Life of St. Kieran of Clonmacnoise, we are told, that a priest, named Daniel, and a Briton by race, presented Inis Ainigin, to God, and to St. Kieran. Thence, Colgan infers, that Daniel was in Ireland, about the time of St. Patrick—but, indeed, this inference is very questionable. Again, it is noticeable, that the church of Ailech mor belonged by some right, to the monks of St. Kieran. But, an objection may be raised, that the first Domnaldus' father's name was Crimthann, a form which seems rather to have been used by the Irish, than by the Ailech-Airtich, regarding whom we have already spoken; the second was Domnaldus, son to Colgne, of Tulach-liag;<sup>158</sup> while, the third was Domnaldus, of Cuil-chonalta.<sup>159</sup> As if relating a second trip, the Latin Tripartite Life declares, that at the north of Lough Foyle, St. Patrick crossed the strait from Inishowen, and then proceeded towards Dun-Cruthen.<sup>160</sup> The situation of this place has not been clearly determined. Colgan threw out a conjecture,<sup>161</sup> that Dun-cruthen was the same as the present Dunboe,<sup>162</sup> in the district of Machare.<sup>163</sup> However, it is probable, that Duncruthen was situated elsewhere.<sup>164</sup> If not in, it was not far from, a district, called Ken-nacta,<sup>165</sup> now the barony of Kenaght, in Londonderry. Here, he erected a church, placing over it a bishop, called Beatus, and by his merits well deserving this name.<sup>166</sup> The Tripartite Latin Life represents him, as the intimate friend of a holy man, named Eugenius.<sup>167</sup> In the territory of Ken-nacta, he remained for seven Sundays, and he laid the foundations of seven churches, consecrated to the Lord.<sup>168</sup> One of these was Domnach-Airthir-Arda,<sup>169</sup> now bearing the local designation of Tamlaght.<sup>170</sup> Another church was called Domnach-Bregh-Muige,<sup>171</sup> and adjoining it was the miraculous well, known as Tiopra-Phadruic, or "Patrick's Well." While he was in this part of the country, a noble, named Sedna,<sup>172</sup> came to Patrick, and listened most attentively to his instructions. At this time, Setna's wife bore in her womb one, who was afterwards destined to become a child of light. The noble, his wife, and whole family, embraced the faith. When the son was Britons. The same objection may be taken probably to the second-named, and whose father is called Colgne. However, it lies not against the third Domnaldus, whose father's name is not given. Our Irish Martyrologists note the feast of a St. Domnall, at the 26th of April. Nothing can be pronounced, with certainty, regarding these holy bishops, named in the text. See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 55, p. 175.

<sup>158</sup> In ancient Ceara, there were three townlands, named Tulach; and, probably, one of these is here meant. One was called, Tulach Spelain, or "Spellan's Hill." This is now known as Cnoc Spelain, which rises to a considerable height, between the village of Balla and Slieve Carna, in the barony of Carra, county of Mayo. See John O'Donovan's "Genealogies, Tribes and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach," pp. 156, 157, and 196, 197, with n. (i.)

<sup>159</sup> This place has not been identified.

<sup>160</sup> It signifies "the fort of the Cruithneans," who, in the time of St. Patrick, had settlements in northern Ulster.

<sup>161</sup> He has been followed by Archdall. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 91.

<sup>162</sup> It is now a parish, in the diocese of Derry, and situated near the ocean. It is in the barony of Coleraine, and may be seen, described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Londonderry," Sheets 2, 3, 6, 7.

<sup>163</sup> Many places, bearing this name—máclaíne meaning "a field," or "a plain"—are found in different parts of Ireland.

<sup>164</sup> See Rev. Mr. Sampson's excellent work, "Statistical Survey of the County of Londonderry," p. 487.

<sup>165</sup> In early times, this territory belonged to the O'Conors of Glean Geimhan, of the race of Cian, son to Oilioll Olum, King of Munster, in the third century. A short time, before the English invasion, they were dispossessed by the O'Cathains or O'Kanes, of the race of Eoghan. See "The Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagáin and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," edited by Dr. O'Donovan, p. xvi., n. 69.

<sup>166</sup> Among several persons, bearing the name of Beoadh or Beoan, Colgan has endeavoured to discover who this Beatus was. Yet, he could not come to any decision.

<sup>167</sup> Very probably, this was intended for Eugenius, Bishop of Ardstrath, or Ardstraw, who lived in Tyrone, about the sixth century, and whose feast occurs, on the 23rd of August. If so, Beatus was not a contemporary, with St. Patrick.

<sup>168</sup> The Latin Tripartite then adds here, "quas proinde Dominicas appellavit."

<sup>169</sup> Now Tamlacht-Ard, or Magilligan, so called, because it was within the bounds of Airthir-Arda, or "the Eastern Heights," which rise in the extreme north-western parts of Londonderry County.

<sup>170</sup> This townland, in Magilligan Parish, barony of Keenaght, is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Londonderry," Sheets 5, 6.

<sup>171</sup> Colgan only informs us, that this place was in the territory of Kiennact. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Index Topographicus, p. 708.

<sup>172</sup> He is said to have been son to Trena, and grandson to Tigernach.

<sup>173</sup> This saint, whose feast is held on the born, he was delivered to St. Patrick for baptism. He also obtained the holy Apostle's blessing, and he was adopted as a spiritual son, to be instructed in piety and sacred learning. Afterwards, he was known as Kienanus,<sup>173</sup> Bishop of Damliag, or Duleek.<sup>174</sup> While there, St. Patrick foretold the future birth and holiness of St. Cannech,<sup>175</sup> and he was announced to that people, as the common patron of their region of Kiennacht.

During his progress, while founding many churches, St. Patrick came to the bounds of Lei, or Lea,<sup>176</sup> which was on the western<sup>177</sup> banks of the Bann,<sup>178</sup> where the fishermen were only able then to take fish, during the night-time. The potent servant of God ordered them, however, to set down their nets, in the daytime, when they captured a great number of fish. Thenceforward, by day and night, the fisheries of the Bann were found to be ever productive, and the fishermen thankfully preserved their steady sources of gain.<sup>179</sup>

CHAPTER XV.

ST. PATRICK VISITS THE TERRITORIES OF DALRIADA AND OF DALERADIA—HE PREACHES IN DALRIEDA—HE FOUNDS CHURCHES THERE AND IN DALARADIA—HIS MISSION NEAR LOUGH NEAGH, AT HY TUIRTRE, AND AT IMCHLAIR.

The territories of Dal-Riada,<sup>1</sup> in the northern part of Ulster, and of Dal-Araidhe,<sup>2</sup> in the eastern portion, were the next districts visited, by our indefatigable Apostle. These were two chief divisions of ancient Ulster. The 24th of November, was the eleventh in descent from Oilill Olum.

<sup>174</sup> It is curious, that the territory in Meath, where Duleek is situated, was also called Kienachta. See "Acts of Archbishop Cotton in his Metropolitan Visitation of the Diocese of Derry, A.D. MCCCXCVII." Edited by Rev. Dr. William Reeves. Additional Notes, F, n. (e), p. 124.

<sup>175</sup> His feast occurs, on the 11th of October.

<sup>176</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life states "venit in Leæorum fines." In the "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," the people of this district are called "Fir Li of the Lake," and they are also designated "Fir Li of the Bann." According to the "Book of Lecan," their district extended from Bir to Camus; and the O'Clerys' Irish Calendar, at the 9th of January, places Aghadowey, in Magh Li. See Dr. O'Donovan's n. (m), p. 123, and pp. 134, 135.

<sup>177</sup> In the time of St. Patrick, these people of Lei, or Li, were living on the west side of the Bann; although the Latin Tripartite Life has them, "ad Orientalem ejus ripam adjacentes." The Irish version agrees. Here, we have another proof of the comparatively modern character of these documents. Sliabh Callainn, now Slieve Gallion, was in ancient Li, and it is still on the west side of the River Bann. But, when the O' Cathains increased in power, the people of Li were driven across the Bann, and these were unquestionably on the east side of it, at the period of the English invasion. See ibid., n. (m.)

<sup>178</sup> Harris, without any warrant, states, that St. Patrick crossed the Bann, at Coleraine. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 19. For this mission, he was not obliged to cross that river.

<sup>179</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lviii., p. 25, and n. 51, p. 32; Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxi., p. 44, and nn. 47, 48, p. 49; Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxiv., lxxxv., pp. 84, 85, and nn. 91, 92, 93, p. 112, cap. lxxxix., p. 85, n. 99, p. 113, cap. xcvi., p. 87, cap. cxxiii., pp. 92, 93; Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. cviii., cix., cx., cxii., cxiii., cxiv., cxv., cxvi., cxvii., cxviii., cxix., cxx., cxxi., cxxii., cxxiii., cxxiv., cxxv., cxxvi., cxxvii., pp. 143 to 146, and nn. 155 to 192, pp. 180 to 182. Also Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," pp. 433 to 439, with the corresponding notes.

CHAPTER XV.—<sup>1</sup> This territory represented the district, ranging from the present village of Glynn—formerly called Glenfinneaght—about 30 Irish miles from the mouth of the Bush River. That valley, in which the old church of Glynn is situated, formed part of the southern boundary of Dalriada territory. Randal, Earl of Antrim, who died in or before 1639, gave this information to Archbishop Ussher, and as confirmation of the statement, he gave the following Irish distich:—

O bhuair d'a neigro ealta
So choir Gleanna Finneadta, regal seat of the province was at Emania, about one and a-half English miles west of Armagh. It is still designated, by that remarkable enclosure, called ῖοῦβε ἱρ εὐλὰχ ῖαν ῖεανν.

Ἀγίον Ὀὐλ Ῥιάδα νὰ ῖεανν

It is thus rendered into English, by John O'Donovan:—

"From the Buaish, which flocks fly over,
Unto the cross of Glenfinneaght,
Extends Dalriada of sub-divisions,
As all who know the land can tell."

—See the "Dublin Penny Journal," vol. i., No. 46, p. 362. The parish of Glynn is in the barony of Lower Belfast, and it is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 40, 41, 46, 47. The townland proper is on Sheet 40. It lies along the west shore of Larne Lough. Thus, the territory seems to have taken in, nearly the whole northern and eastern coast of the present county of Antrim, including the baronies of Upper and Lower Glenarm, and of Cary, with portions of Lower Dunluce and Lower Belfast Baronies. Dalriada was included in two well-known divisions. The first of these was the Route, containing nine Tuoghs or districts. 1. The Tough between the Bande and the Boys, or between the River Bann on the west, and the River Bush on the east, comprised the parishes of Coleraine, Ballyaghran, Ballywillen, Ballyrashane, Dunluce and Kildollagh; the part lying near the Bann was formerly called Moy Elle. 2. The Tough of Dunseverick and Ballenatoy was separated from the last by the Bush, and it contained Dunseverick and Ballintoy parishes, with that part of Billy parish, which lies within Cary barony. 3. The Tough of Ballelagh, containing the parish of Derrykeighan, and that part of Billy parish, which is in the barony of Lower Dunluce. Various allusions to the local history are found, in an elegant Poem, with engravings, intitled, "Dunluce Castle," in Four Books, by Edward Quillinan. It was privately printed, and it appeared, in a 4to shape, A.D. 1814. 4. The Tough of Loughgill is so called from the parish of Loughgill, which forms the chief part of it. 5. The Tough of Balle-money and Dromart was so called from the parish of Ballymoney and the townland Drumard therein, and it included the parishes of Ballymoney and Kilraghts. 6. The Tough of Killoconway, seemingly derived from Coil us g-Connmuis, or "O'Conway's wood," now forms the name for Kilconway barony, of which the Tough was a part; but, originally, the name belonged to the western part of Finvoy parish, where there is a large earthen enclosure in Finvoy glebe, formerly called Kilconway Fort. 7. The Tough of Killioguin, now known as the denomination of Killyquin, is the name of an estate, consisting of thirteen townlands, in the western part of Rasharkin parish. The original name was Coill uí Cuin, or "the wood of O'Conn"—the modern title O'Quinn—and it seems to have included Rasharkin parish, with the four towns of Craigs. 8. The Tough of Killiomorrie is so called, from Coill uí mhurrae, adraig, or "O'Murray's," and it lies around the village of Dunloy, in the eastern part of Finvoy parish. 9. The Tough of Magheredunagh received its name from Macáine, "a plain," and Ὀυν Εαδοαδ, "Dunaghy," the parish of which it chiefly consisted. The second division of Dalriada was known as the Glynnnes, and these were classed under seven Tuoghs. 1. The Tough of Munerie was about co-extensive with the parish of Ramoan and the Grange of Drumtullagh. 2. The Cynamond (minor territory) of Armoj and Raghlins comprised the parish of Armoj and Rathlin Island. 3. The Tough of Cary was synonymous with Culfeghrin parish, and the barony, which took its name therefrom, comprehends much more than the original territory. 4. The Tough of Glunmiconogh is perhaps a corruption of ḡleann meadonad, which expresses in English "the middle glens." In the "Act of Settlement and Explanation," the name is written Glendonaghie, which seems to be intended for Glendun. This forms the commencement of Lower Glenarm barony, and it consists on the north of the Granges of Inispollan and of Layd, and on the south of Layd parish. 5. The Tough of the Largie is so called from the Irish leárga, "the hill-slopes," and it bears this expressive denomination still, for that part of Ardclinis, which lies between Nappan and Lemnalary. 6. The Tough of the Parke was so called from Glenarm demense, and it included Tickmacrevan, Templeoughter and Solar parishes. 7. The Tough of the Larne comprised the parishes of Carncastle, Killyglan, Kilwaughter, and Larne. The most celebrated of those Glynnnes are Glenshesk, Glendun, Glencorp, Glanaan, Glenballymon, Glenariff, Glencloy and Glenarm. See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix FF. Dalriada, pp. 318 to 334.

<sup>2</sup> This territory is said to have derived its name from Fiacha Araidhe, a king of Ulster, who reigned ten years at Emania, and who flourished A.D. 236, according to Tigernach's Annals. Hence came the denomination Ὀὐλ, "posterity," and Ἀραδὲ, the proper name of the king. Dalaradia lay southwards from Dalriada territory. The boundaries between both territories are now undistinguishable, on the east and west; but, towards the middle, the River Ravel—which rises in the southern part of Dalriada, by two streams, one of which is called the

the Navan Fort,<sup>3</sup> which takes in a very large area of ground.<sup>4</sup> Ancient Ulster was nearly of the same extent, as the modern province, although its ancient boundaries have been subjected to considerable changes.<sup>5</sup> It is stated, that St. Patrick proceeded to Rori,<sup>6</sup> perhaps intended to designate the Clanna Roory, or the Sons of Rury, which was an epithet, applied to the most distinguished families of Ulster.<sup>7</sup> These boast a descent from the race of Ir, son of Milesius, in which line appeared Rudhraidhe Mor, who is said to have been King of Ireland, A.M. 3850. While his story is unknown, and his date uncertain, there must be some reality in his name, because it has been transmitted to so many distinctive tribes, and because from him, several northern localities have derived their names.

Towards the northern part of Dal-rieda, St. Patrick came to Carn-Setna,<sup>8</sup> or Carn-Sedna, where he met the king of this region, who was named Darius.<sup>9</sup>

Dungonnell River, and another the Ravel—was regarded as the true boundary. The Dungonnell River has its source, from a small basin, called Lough Eyish, in the townland of Cloughcor, at the edge of Ardclinis parish. The Ravel River, a northern branch, rises in a small lake, called Aganna-munican, on Slievane mountain in the parish of Dunaghy, and flowing through Glenravel, it joins the other branch, at Deshcart burying-ground. That the Dungonnell River, although latterly it has lost the name, was considered the true source, appears from the fact, that it divides the barony of Kilconway, in Dalriada, from Lower Antrim barony in Dalaradia. The two branches, united at Deshcart, then receive the name of the Clough Water, and flowing in a south-west course, this latter continues to separate both ancient territories, lying north and south, until it flows into the Main Water, at a place, called Glary Ford. Flowing southwards, the Main Water continues to be the boundary, until it reaches the village of Cullybacky. Roderick O'Flaherty extends Dalaradia from Newry, to Slieve Mis and Linnduachaill, or Magheralinn. See "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xviii., p. 190. This, however, seems to have reference, rather to the descendants of Fiacha Araidhe, than to the country which they occupied. Strictly speaking, the name Dalaradia, as a territorial designation, was applied only to the northern portion of this extensive tract. Thus, the Bishop of Connor was designated as the Bishop of Dalaradia, which shows, that the old territory and the diocese were co-terminated; while, the Bishop of Down was called, also, the Bishop of Uladh. A very interesting account of Dalaradia, and of its history, will be found in the learned work quoted, in the preceding note. See ibid. Appendix GG. Dalaradia, pp. 334 to 348.

<sup>3</sup> It is situated, in the parish of Eglis, and barony of Armagh. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Armagh," Sheet 12.

<sup>4</sup> Here reigned a long succession of native princes, whose sway extended over the province; and, here, from time to time, assembled those warriors of the North, whose valiant deeds are subjects, for the most ancient bardic poetry of the Irish.

<sup>5</sup> Thus, Louth, which now belongs to Leinster, was part of it; while Cavan, which is now reckoned in the province of Ulster, was considered formerly to be portion of Connaught. See in the Ulster Observer, of September 29th, 1864, the report of a learned Lecture, in Downpatrick, by the Rev. William Reeves, D.D.

<sup>6</sup> It seems, that Do rori is the reading, in the Irish Tripartite MS.; the commentator on Miss Cusack's Life of St. Patrick thinks it is probably corrupt, and that it includes some wrong form of the name for the reigning King of Dal-Riada. He appears to have been present, on the occasion of finding the child, as afterwards mentioned. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix T, p. 247.

<sup>7</sup> From this stock came, at various periods, certain chiefs, or founders of families, whose names are stereotyped in denominations of Ulster. Thus Eoch-Cobha, from whom the extensive baronies of Iveagh derived their names of Ui-Eathach, and Magh-Cobha, belonged to this race. Fagartach, from whom the barony of Kinalarty derived its name of Cinel Fagartach, or the race of Fagartach, was of this stock; and the ancient families of Magen, Macartan, O'Lavery, O'Garvey, Wards, and others of lesser note, trace their descent from him. See the Report of a learned Lecture, in Downpatrick, by the Rev. William Reeves, D.D., in the Ulster Observer of September 29th, 1864.

<sup>8</sup> This place has not been identified. There are many local names, in the county of Antrim, compounded with this word. Among these, there is a Carnside, in the parish of Billy, and barony of Cary, shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 3. This, from the text description, is likely enough to have been the locality.

<sup>9</sup> Of this potentate, we find no notice in our Irish Annals, unless he happens to be

This dynast happened to be engaged on an itinerary through Dalriada, and at the place already mentioned, a most extraordinary adventure befell him. There, he heard the screams of an infant, and these seemed to come from out of the ground. That cairn was demolished, and the sepulchre was opened. Then, a smell, as if that of wine, arose around them, and it appeared to come from the sepulchre. There, too, was seen a living child, with a dead mother. This woman had died of ague. She had been brought from across the sea to Errinn, and the child was born after her death, and burial. Seven days, it is said to have lived, in the tumulus. "That is bad,"<sup>10</sup> said the king. "That shall be his name, Olcan,"<sup>11</sup> said a Druid. Patrick afterwards baptized the child; and, he became, in course of time, Bishop Olcan, of the community of Airthir-Maighe,<sup>12</sup> or Armoys,<sup>13</sup> which means "the eastern plain," in the district of Dal-Riada.

From Erc<sup>14</sup> and Olchu,<sup>15</sup> the two sons of Eochaidh Muinreamhar,<sup>16</sup> the Irish and Scotch Dal-Riada are descended.<sup>17</sup> St. Patrick received welcome in their Irish territory,<sup>18</sup> from Erc's twelve sons.<sup>19</sup> Then, one of these, a junior, and designated Fergus Mor<sup>20</sup> Mac Erca, complained to the saint, that that Daire—son to Olchu, and grandson to Eochaidh Muinreamhar—who occupied, with his other brothers, Murbolg, now Murlough Bay, in the parish of Culfeightrin, on the north-eastern part of the coast of Antrim.

<sup>10</sup> The original "olc," in Irish, has this meaning, "evil." Olcan is a diminutive of "olc."

<sup>11</sup> The feast of St. Olcan, or Bolcan, has been assigned to the 20th of February.

<sup>12</sup> In the county of Antrim. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," p. 80, n. (t), and Appendix Z, pp. 287, 288.

<sup>13</sup> In the townland of Kilcroagh, at the southern extremity of this parish, an "Ancient Burying-Ground" is marked on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 13. There is a small Cashel, marked, also, "old burying-ground," in the townland of Knockans, on the same Sheet; yet, this is not locally known to have been a place for interments.

<sup>14</sup> From Erc the Dal-Riada of Alba, or Scotland, descended. He had twelve sons, and of these six, named Loarn Mor (great), Loarn Beg (little), Mac Nisi Mor, Mac Nisi Beg, Fergus Mor and Fergus Beg, conquered the sovereignty of Alba. The other six sons, Mac Decill (or Degil), Aongus, whose seed was in Albania, Eunna, Breasal, Fiachra, and Dubhthach, remained in Errinn. According to other accounts, Erc had another son, called Muirheadhach Bolg; but, Duald Mac Firbis thinks, that those accounts were not true.

<sup>15</sup> From Olchu the Dal-Riada of Ulster, from whom the Ruta is named, descend. He had eleven sons, occupying Murbolg in Dal-Riada, and these are named, Muirheadhach Bolg, Aodh, Daire, Aongus, Tuathal, Anblomait, Eochaidh, Seudna, Brian, Oiniu, and Cormac.

<sup>16</sup> Eochaidh Muinreamhar was son of Aongus, son to Fergus Aulaidh or Uaille, son of Fiachaidh Tathmail, or Taithmil, son to Fedhlimidh Lamhdoid, son of Cinge, son to Guaire, son of Cionaoth, or Cinde, son of Cairbre Rioghfhota, from whom the Dal-Riada descend. His mother Saraid, daughter to Conn, was married to Conary II., King of Ireland, and besides him, the parents had two other sons, called respectively, Cairbre Bascain, and Cairbre Musc. Now, Cairbre Rioghfhota, or Carbry the long-armed, avenged his father, who was killed A.D. 220, by slaying his murderer Nemed, A.D. 237, in the battle of Cinfhebrat. Conary II's brother-in-law, Art Aen-fir, succeeded him as sovereign, and had under his care the three Cairbres. The son of Art-Aen-fir, Cormac O'Conn, obtained several victories over the Ulidians and the Albanians, and after a reign over Ireland of forty years, he died A.D. 266. Probably, during this time, Cairbre Riada and his adherents obtained a footing, in those parts of Errinn and of Albany, which afterwards bore his name.

<sup>17</sup> Venerable Bede inaccurately connects the supposed and only temporary migration of the Scots, under Cairbre Riada, "qui duce Reuda de Hibernia progressi," with the permanent settlement of Fergus Mor Mac Erca, in Scotland. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. i. Also, Charles O'Conor's "Ogygia Vindicated," pp. 162, 163, note and p. 175, as also his "Dissertations on the History of Ireland;" Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix FF, pp. 319 to 321; and O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxiii., pp. 321 to 323.

<sup>18</sup> The Irish Tripartite's arrangement seems to refer it, according to the order of narrative, to Dal-riada; while the Latin Tripartite appears to place it in Dal-aradia.

<sup>19</sup> By Jocelyn, we are told, that these twelve brethren, who lived in Dalradia, and he had been unjustly excluded, from his share of the inheritance. He asked Patrick's intervention, that he might obtain it,<sup>21</sup> and the holy Apostle was successful, in the advocacy he assumed. Grateful for this, Fergus presented him with the part, in which Airthir-Maighe was situated.<sup>22</sup> But, as the disinterested missionary did not desire any gift for worldly purposes, Patrick presented to Bishop Olcan, what had been obtained, so that he might there begin an ecclesiastical foundation. Patrick then said to Fergus, "Though thy esteem with thy brothers is not great to-day; yet, it is thee and thy descendants that shall be chiefs, and the distributors of power. The kings of this land, and of Fortren, shall be from thee for ever." This prediction was fulfilled in Aedan Mac Gabhrain, who possessed Alba<sup>23</sup> by force of arms.

Mac Nisse—whose name is Latinized Macnessius—of Condere, now Connor, read his psalms with Patrick. Here, there is a portion of the Irish Tripartite missing; but, the Latin version relates, that Macnessius committed a dishonourable crime, which justly excited the holy Apostle's indignation. This was punished, and at a place, called Carn-lamha, or the "grave of the hand," that member having dropped from his body.<sup>24</sup> We may well regard the whole of this account as being simply legendary. The fall and punishment of Macnessius are said to have urged him to repentance, and, afterwards, he lived a most saintly life. Miracles attested his merits, in the sight of God, and his days were ended in beatitude.

The indefatigable Patriarch of Ireland left many cells and establishments, in the territory of Dal-Riada.<sup>25</sup> He founded Fothrat<sup>26</sup> or Fothraidh<sup>27</sup> church, and left two of his people in it, namely, the Presbyter Cathbadh,<sup>28</sup> and the monk Dimman.<sup>29</sup> This was in the territory of Éngus' race, so called, probably from Aongus, father of Eochaidh Muinreamhar. He also founded Rath-Mudhain,<sup>30</sup> now Ramoan,<sup>31</sup> the name of a parish so called, in the north whose father Erc had lately died, appointed a meeting for the division of their respective patrimonial portions.

<sup>20</sup> Fergus Mor was King of Dal-Riada, and grandson to Eochaidh Muinreamhar, Monarch of Ireland. In A.D. 503, he and his brothers conquered the greater part of Alba, and founded there the Kingdom of Scotland. He died in 529.

<sup>21</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life, Fergus said to St. Patrick, "If I am preferred before my brothers, in the division of our land, I shall offer some to you."

<sup>22</sup> Jocelyn thus relates it: This young nobleman, bestowed one half of his estate upon St. Olcan, who erected an episcopal See, in a place called Dercan. There the holy bishop lived holily and justly.

<sup>23</sup> His posterity, remarks Jocelyn, reigned in Albania, which they had conquered, to the twelfth century. See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. cxxxvii., p. 95, and nn. 143, 144.

<sup>24</sup> Such notion of retribution was probably borrowed from Job xxxi. 22, and it was a very general one among the Irish. Thus, the Latin Tripartite has it: "Ecce res mira! manus MacNessii extemplo abscissa in terram cadit."

<sup>25</sup> Now known as Ruta, or the Route, in the north of the county of Antrim. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix FF. Dalriada, p. 318.

<sup>26</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life. The modern name of this church is now unknown.

<sup>27</sup> It is so called, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>28</sup> Colgan suspects, that from him Loch Cathbad, in the adjoining territory of Daladrada, was called. However, no certain identification of this saint has been attempted, among the holy men, so named in our Calendars; although a suspicion is entertained, he may be the Cathub, son of Fergus, and of Achadh-Cinn, or Achadhnacill, venerated at the 6th of April, and, who died A.D. 554, it is said, at the age of 150 years. Here, Archdall, on the strength of Colgan's conjecture, has a church built by St. Patrick, at Achadhnacill, a place which is not mentioned, in any of our Irish Apostle's Lives. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 1, 2.

<sup>29</sup> Among the many saints, bearing this name, Colgan thinks it likely, he was either Diman, Confessor, venerated on the 3rd of November, or Diman, Presbyter, whose feast falls on the 27th of June.

<sup>30</sup> St. Ereclacius was venerated here, on the 3rd of March. See Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," n. (r), p. 79.

of Antrim County, and he left Presbyter Erclach in it. He placed, likewise, Bishop Nem,<sup>32</sup> at Tulach,<sup>33</sup> or Telach-Ceniul-Aenghusa,<sup>34</sup> which is thought to be possibly the Grange of Drumtullagh,<sup>35</sup> adjoining Ramoan, in the county of Antrim, and having an ancient burying-ground, called Kilmoyle.<sup>36</sup> The Dacheninndan,<sup>37</sup> or rather, the two Connennans,<sup>38</sup> his disciples,<sup>39</sup> had been left in Domhnach Cainri,<sup>40</sup> or Domnach Coinri,<sup>41</sup> in Cothraighe. This latter district is represented by the modern barony of Cary, in the north of Antrim. On the townland of Big House,<sup>42</sup> in the parish of Cuilfeightran, are the foundations of an ancient church, measuring 24½ feet, by 10 feet 9 inches, and called Drumnakill, or Drumnakeel,<sup>43</sup> which may be the place already mentioned. Enan<sup>44</sup> was left in Drui-Indich,<sup>45</sup> now probably Killeena,<sup>46</sup> where there was a burial-ground,<sup>47</sup> long since disused,<sup>48</sup> in the townland of Drumeeny,<sup>49</sup> parish of Ramoan. Besides the foregoing, a Bishop Fiachra,<sup>50</sup>

<sup>31</sup> See the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 8. There, the modern Protestant church occupies the site of the ancient one.

<sup>32</sup> Colgan calls him Nehemias, and his festival was celebrated, most probably on the 3rd of May, when the Martyrology of Donegal styles him Nēm, Bishop of Drum Dallain.

<sup>33</sup> The Latin Tripartite has this incorrectly printed Fulachensem; but, the correction occurs, in a note attached. Colgan states, that the place is now the parish of Tulachruisc, or Tullyrusk, in the diocese of Connor, and in the deanery of Dalmunia. This identification, however, is said to be incorrect. Archdall makes St. Patrick found this Tulach. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 14.

<sup>34</sup> So is it noticed, in the Irish Tripartite Life, which shows, that it lay within the territory of Ænguss' race.

<sup>35</sup> This parish, in the barony of Cary, is represented, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 7, 8, 12, 13. Kilmoyle, in this parish, is noted, on Sheet 8. Ibid.

<sup>36</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix T, p. 251.

<sup>37</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>38</sup> It is remarked by Colgan, that a St. Cennanan was venerated, at the 26th of March, while, a St. Cillen, son of Tolodhran, of the Desies in Munster, had his feast for the same day. Yet, on account of the latter and his locality, Colgan thinks it not likely those saints could be the two Connennans here noticed.

<sup>39</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>40</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>41</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite, Colgan remarked, that this name was obsolete, but he conjectured the church here noticed to have been Kill-Domnach. This latter name, even, has become obsolete at present. Dr. Lanigan does not credit the statements made, that St. Patrick founded all the churches, mentioned in his Acts. He thinks it probable, the church of Domnach-coinre had been founded, by a person, named Conry. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. iii., n. 22, p. 268.

<sup>42</sup> It is represented, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 5, 9.

<sup>43</sup> See ibid., Sheet 9. It lies on Murlough Bay.

<sup>44</sup> He is thought to have been venerated, at the 25th of March.

<sup>45</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix Z, pp. 284, 285. Incorrectly does Archdall make this an abbey, erected by St. Patrick, about A.D. 460. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 6.

<sup>46</sup> About twelve perches north of it are several large pillar stones, lying prostrate. The chapel, here, is vulgarly called Gobbin's Heir Castle. See an imperfect account of it, in William Shaw Mason's "Statistical Account, or Parochial Survey of Ireland," vol. ii. The Rev. Luke Conolly's account of "Parish of Ramoan," No. xxii., p. 506.

<sup>47</sup> It is now under cultivation. To the south-east is a long cave, running northwards, in the wall of which are two stones, and according to a report of the tenant of the land, one had a crucifix carved on it, and the other had a cross.

<sup>48</sup> Killeena is not shown on the Ordnance Survey Maps, but the place is marked as Gobbin's Heir Castle, on Sheet 9, for the county of Antrim. The term Castle is a complete perversion, however, since every feature of the spot is indicative of a purely ecclesiastical character: The two first words are a corruption of Goban paon, or "Goban the Artificer," of whom an interesting account is given by Dr. Petrie, in his "Ecclesiastical Architecture, and Round Towers of Ireland," part ii., sect. iii., subsect. 3, pp. 385, 386, 404, 405.

<sup>49</sup> In Glenshesk, a little west of the river, which bounds the parish, and on a little eminence, are the remains of an ancient chapel, 28 feet 9 inches long, and 15 feet wide, in the clear. The walls are about 10 feet high, and three in thickness. There or Fiachrius,<sup>51</sup> was set over Cuil-Ech-trainn,<sup>52</sup> which was also called Cowlofeghraine,<sup>53</sup> and Kilfeutre.<sup>54</sup> It is at present Culfeightran,<sup>55</sup> in the county of Antrim.<sup>56</sup> After crossing the Bush River,<sup>57</sup> Patrick also visited the ancient fortress, called Dun-Sobhairce,<sup>58</sup> or Duin Sebuirgi,<sup>59</sup> and which has been identified as Dunseverick,<sup>60</sup> on a steep rock, three miles east of the Giant's Causeway, and on the northern coast of Antrim County. St. Patrick's well was shown there, and he left a blessing upon it, as also upon the old fort,<sup>61</sup> which is now replaced by a more recently-erected castle,<sup>62</sup> on a most romantic site, and yet is it crumbling to decay, as a hoary ruin. About one mile eastwards from the old ruined Castle of Dunseverick, and near the sea-shore, are two burial-grounds, with the ruins of a church, on one of those enclosures. The church is popularly known as Dunseverick,<sup>63</sup> but marked on the Ordnance seems to have been a narrow window, in the east gable, as also in the north wall, near the altar end, and in the south wall. The font, together with some dressed sand-stone quoins, had been carried away to a field at some distance. Drumeeny is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 9.

<sup>50</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>51</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life. His feast day has been assigned, to the 28th of September, by Colgan.

<sup>52</sup> Its name is thus derived, Cuil eadct-pann, "the corner of the strangers."

<sup>53</sup> In the Registry of Cromer, at p. 453, where it is called the Rectory of the parish church of St. Fechtany.

<sup>54</sup> In the Taxation of Pope Nicholas IV., compiled for the year 1306.

<sup>55</sup> The old church stood here, in the townland of Churchfield, called Maghera-temple, in the Down Survey. This building, with the exception of the east gable, nearly entire, has been demolished; but, sufficient traces of the foundation remain, to show that it was of very large dimensions. The area of the old church, and the cemetery, are now in pasturage. Archdall makes this church, Kilitragh, four miles south of Ballintoy. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 9.

<sup>56</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dro-more," n. (s), p. 79.

<sup>57</sup> Formerly called the Buas. To it, under the poetic name, Bosca, Dr. William Hamilton Drummond alludes, in his interesting Poem, "The Giant's Causeway," book ii., pp. 37, 38, being the frequent scene, at its mouth, of the illusive forms, to which he thus refers:—

"Smooth glides the skiff, and up the rustling sand
Rolls the light surge, by Bosca's magic strand,
Where gay Morgana and her fairy train
Sport with the senses of the wondering swain;
Raised by her power, he sees a warlike line

Of plummy crests, and burnished muskets shine;

Anon they flit, and lawns and woods arise,

Chariots and steeds, and towers that reach the skies;

Now fades the scene, and bounding in the breeze,

Embattled navies sweep the azure seas;

Sail crowds on sail, the boiling wake grows hoar,

And whitening surges climb each sculptured prore.

— Gone is the pageant! — vanished from the view,

Like the thin vapour, or the morning dew."

<sup>58</sup> For an interesting account of Dun Sobhairce, with a view of the mediæval castle, and its identification, by John O'Donovan, see the "Dublin Penny Journal," vol. i., pp. 361 to 363. The place is said to have derived its name from Sobhairce, a King of Ireland, living here, about A.M. 3668. He is said to have been slain, within this fortress, by Eochaidh Echehenn, King of the Fomorians, or sea-pirates. "Book of Lecan," fol. 123.

<sup>59</sup> Thus is it called, in an ancient Life of St. Patrick, as found in the Book of Armagh. See Sir William Betham's "Antiquarian Researches," vol. ii. Appendix, pp. 34, 35.

<sup>60</sup> See a beautiful engraving of Dunseverick, in Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Ireland: its Scenery, Character," &c., vol. iii., p. 174.

<sup>61</sup> Of this, some traces are yet to be found, on the remarkable rock beside the sea-coast.

<sup>62</sup> Supposed to have been built, by the M'Quillans, and afterwards to have been occupied, by the O'Cahans, or O'Kanes.

<sup>63</sup> The accompanying sketch, drawn on the spot by the writer, June, 1879, has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved by Mrs. Millard. The interior of Dunseverick old church—which is quadrangular in shape—measures about 16 paces in length, by about

Survey Map, on the townland of Templastragh, and now in the parish of Ballintoy, barony of Carey.<sup>64</sup> There, St. Patrick rested on a stone, afterwards called by his name.<sup>65</sup> There he is said to have consecrated as bishop, St. Olcan, whom the Irish Apostle had previously under his tuition.<sup>66</sup> The foregoing places all seem to have been situated, in the ancient territory of Cathrigia, or of the Cathraighe, a sept, formerly occupying the modern barony of Cary,<sup>67</sup> in the northern part of Antrim County.

Dunseverick old Church, County of Antrim.

The force of early associations, no doubt, gave the Irish Apostle an interest, altogether special, in the religious condition of Dal-riada,<sup>68</sup> where he had now founded so many churches.<sup>69</sup> From the heights of Slieve Mish, on 6 paces in width: the walls were about 3 feet in thickness. A ruined eastern window is seen, but opposite on the west, no trace of a doorway can be observed, as the building is wholly wrecked on that end. The stones used are rudely dressed, and many are of cyclopean size. The coast limestone has been used. The adjoining graveyard on the south is crowded with graves, and somewhat detached, there is another much-used burial-ground; both cemeteries have been lately enclosed, with low stone walls. A curious old carved stone, with apparently the rude figure of a cross, at one end, has been built into an angle of the west wall, and probably at no very remote date. Those old cemeteries are on a rocky plateau, not far from the cliffs of the northern Atlantic Ocean.

<sup>64</sup> See the site of those objects, noticed in the text, on the "Ordnance Survey Town-

land Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 3.

<sup>65</sup> Regarding this object, there is now apparently no popular tradition.

<sup>66</sup> See Sir William Betham's "Antiquarian Researches," vol. ii. Appendix, p. 33.

<sup>67</sup> The reader will find a full descriptive account of its civil and ecclesiastical divisions, in Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix Z, pp. 281 to 288.

<sup>68</sup> In the Latin and Irish Tripartite Lives, this division seems, occasionally, to have been incorrectly confounded with Dal-riada; and, perhaps, a certain confusion of sequence, in the events narrated, may be traced.

<sup>69</sup> In his "Monasticon Hibernicum," Archdall has unauthorizedly converted many of these into monasteries.

<sup>70</sup> After the beginning of the ninth century, its southern bounds, where he was a slave for seven years, his eyes had ranged over its extent; perhaps, too, the business of his temporal master had frequently obliged him to visit, in person, several of its districts. Now, however, he was about to revisit the surviving friends in and the familiar scenes of Dal-Araidhe,<sup>70</sup> that large region in the east of Ulster, and which the territory of Dalaradia was associated with the names of Lethlobhar, now Lawlor, and Ua Loingsigh, or Lynch; both families having sprung from Fiacha Araidhe. Soon after the Anglo-Norman invasion, the English obtained a footing within this territory. Afterwards, it is frequently alluded to in our Annals, as Trian Congaill, or "Congall's portion," supposed to have been derived from Congall Claen, King of Uladh, in 637. Towards the close of the sixteenth century, this territory is presented to notice, as having merged, under a chief of the O'Neills, into the denomination of Clannaboy, from Clan Aodú buíde, or "Children of Yellow Hugh;" and, it was even subdivided into Upper or South Clannaboy, which lay southwards of the River Lagan, and was exactly commensurate with the modern baronies of Upper and Lower Castlereagh, in the county of Down, while Lower or North Clannaboy extended from the Ravel River southwards to the Lagan, containing the modern baronies of the two Antrims, the two Toomes, the two Belfasts, Lower Massereene, and the county of Carrickfergus, in the county of Antrim. Of the former, the following sub-districts are mentioned: 1. Castlereagh comprised that part of Knockbreda parish, which lay in the vicinity of O'Neill's castle. 2. Les Gillach-reves de la Gallagh comprehended a portion of Knockbreda, lying between Castlereagh and the Lagan. 3. Slut Neales, from Slúct, "the family" of Neales, embraced the parishes of Drumbo, Saintfield, Killany, with parts of Kilmore and Knockbreda, as also such portions of Blaris, Lambeg, and Drumbeg, as lie within the barony of Upper Castlereagh. 4. Les Mulchreives de la Tawne, a family called Mulchreives, occupied the west side of Knockbreda, from Ballymacarrett southwards. 5. The Slut Henrickies, probably derived from Slúct Enrí Caoí, "tribe of Henry the Blind," occupied part of Killinchy and Kilmoody in Lower Castlereagh, adjoining a small portion of Killinchy and Kilmore, which they held in the Upper barony. 6. The Slut Kellies, a family originally settled near Drumbo, occupied the greater part of Comber and Tullynakill. 7. The Slut Hugh Bricks, from Slúct Aodú breac, "family of freckled Hugh," held the N.E. portion of Comber, the S.W. of Newtownards, and the S.E. part of Dundonald. 8. The Slut Bryan Boye occupied five townlands, in the N.E. of Holywood parish. 9. The Slut Durnings and Slut Owen MacQuinn occupied some townlands in Holywood, Dundonald, and in the adjacent part of Newtownards. North Clannaboy comprised twenty sub-divisions, called 'Tuoghs or Cinements, thus distinguished: 1. The Tuogh of Clanaghartie contained the whole parish of Kilconriola, and that adjacent portion of Ahoghill, which lay eastwards on the Main Water. 2. The Tuogh of Muntercaille, or the tribe of Kelly, contained that part of Ahoghill parish, which lies west of the Main Water. 3. The Tuogh of Muntir Rividy contained the parishes of Drummaul, Shilvodan, and that part of Connor, south of the Kells' Water, with those parts of Ahoghill and Antrim, which lie in Upper Toome. 4. The Tuogh na Fuigh, called "the Feevah," or the woody district, contained the parishes of Duncane, Cranfield and Ballyscullion Grange. 5. The Tuogh of Muntermurigan or the tribe of Murrigan, comprised the parish of Rathcavan, with its district of Glenwherry. 6. The Cinament of Knockboynabrade has its name preserved in the townland of Knockboy, and in the word Braid, which is used to denote as well the parish of Skerry, as the River, which bounds it on the south. 7. The Tuogh ne Keart contained the parish of Ballyclug, and that portion of Kells, in the parish of Connor, north of the Kells' Water. 8. The Cinament of Duogh Connor contained the sixteen towns of Connor. 9. The Tuogh of Moylinny contained the parishes of Antrim, Donegore, Kilbride, Nalteen, Rashee, Ballycor, and Doagh, forming the modern barony of Upper Antrim. 10. The Tuogh of Killeadagh contained the Grange of Muckamore, and the northern two-thirds of Killead. 11. The Cinament of Kilmachevet contained the southern part of Killead parish. 12. The Tuogh of Maghery-morne contained the parishes of Inver, Glynn and Raloo. 13. The Tuogh of Braden Island, or Broad Island, was a territorial name for Templecorran parish, which, with Kilroot, constituted this district. 14. The Tuogh of Ballinlunny comprehended the parishes of Ballylinny, Umgall, Ballymartin, Templepatrick, Ballywalter and Molusk. 15. The Cinament of Ballinowre was represented by the present parish of Ballynure. 16. The Cinament of Carnall, Monkland and Carnemoney contained the united parishes of Coole and Monkstown, in the present parish of Carnemoney, together with the townland of Carnall, in the parish of Ballylinny. 17. Tuogh Cinament contained the northern portion of Shankill parish, or from Benvadegan, now the Cave Hill, to extended from Newry,<sup>71</sup> in the south of Down County, to Slemish mountain, in the Lower Barony, and in the county of Antrim. Here, Caelbadh<sup>72</sup> had been King of Uladh,<sup>73</sup> or circumscribed Ulster, for fifteen years,<sup>74</sup> and he ruled over Ireland, it is stated, for one year.<sup>75</sup> This monarch had twelve sons. In the Acts of St. Patrick, and noticed as his contemporaries, three of those sons are mentioned—however their relationship seems to have been more remote.<sup>76</sup> These are called, Saran,<sup>77</sup> Connla,<sup>78</sup> and Nad-Sluagh.<sup>79</sup> A prince, named Saran, is said to have succeeded his father Caelbadh, as King of Uladh.<sup>80</sup> However, during Saran's<sup>81</sup> term of rule, Patrick arrived in the principality of Dalaradia; but, the saint was treated with contumely and insult, by that prince. He was a fierce pagan, and a man of depraved morals, while he seems to have been unscrupulous, in his modes of action. Our saint determined that he would found a place, where, according to the Irish Tripartite Life, Lathrach-Patraic, or "Patrick's site"<sup>82</sup> was shown; but, the Latin Tripartite calls it Lettir-Phadruic, signifying, "Patrick's slope."<sup>83</sup> In after time, here was pointed out Slan,<sup>84</sup> the name given to a well, which Patrick dis-

Belfast. 18. The Tough of the Fall, alias, Mylone, contained the southern portion of Shankill, and the parish of Drumbeg, in which Belfast is now situated. 19. The Cinament of Dirrevolgie, alias, Fealough, was made up of those parts of Derryaghy, and of Lambeg, and of Drumbeg, which are in Upper Belfast Barony. 20. The Cinament of Clandermot comprised the parish of Tullyrusk, three townlands of Derryaghy, and the east portion of Camlin. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix GG, pp. 343 to 348.

<sup>71</sup> The parish of Newry is partly in the baronies of Oneilland West and Upper Orior, and this is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Armagh," Sheets 9, 22, 26, 29; as, also, partly in the baronies of Upper Iveagh, and the Lordship of Newry, and this portion is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheets 35, 40, 41, 46, 47, 50, 51. The town itself is shown, on the foregoing Sheets 26, 46, 50.

<sup>72</sup> He was the son of Crunn Badhrai, and the grandson of Eochad, from whom the territory of Ibh-Echach, or Iveagh, in Ulster. The baronies of Iveagh, in the county of Down, are comprised within this old territory. See an account of this territory and its history, in Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix HH, pp. 348 to 352.

<sup>73</sup> The extent of this province, and its history, are very minutely set forth, by the Rev. Dr. Reeves. See ibid., II., pp. 352 to 369.

<sup>74</sup> He was of the Ruderician race of Ulster.

<sup>75</sup> He was slain, by Eochaidh Muighmheadhoin, in A.D. 357. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 124, 125, and nn. (t, w), ibid. Unless there be a mistake in this date, or a link in the genealogy wanting, it is difficult to conceive, how his sons could have been living, over eighty years after his death, and when St. Patrick had now visited Ulster.

<sup>76</sup> See Roderick O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxvii., pp. 371, 372.

<sup>77</sup> He is said to have reigned over it, for twenty-six years. He was ancestor to the Macartans of Kinalarty, county of Down.

<sup>78</sup> He was ancestor to Magenís of Iveagh, in the same county. Several of his descendants were also kings of Uladh, and St. Fergus, Bishop of Down, who died in 583, was his great-great-grandson.

<sup>79</sup> He is said to have been grandfather to St. Cairbre, Bishop of Coleraine, hereafter mentioned, and from him also descended, it is stated, the celebrated Ængus the Culdee.

<sup>80</sup> See John O'Donovan's Cath muigh Rath, or "Battle of Magh-Rath," p. 330.

<sup>81</sup> According to Roderick O'Flaherty's opinion, this Saran was fourth in descent from Caelbadh; being the son of Mannius, son to Fathad, son of Conall, son to Caelbadh, King of Ireland. This Saran is said to have held the principality of Dalaradia, about the year 474. Bracan, called the son of King Caelbadh, and grandfather to St. Cathan, the son of Muadan, was either a brother or a relation to Saran, Conla and Nat-Sluagh. See "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxvi., pp. 371, 372.

<sup>82</sup> Now Glenavy, near Lough Neagh, and in the barony of Upper Massereene.

<sup>83</sup> Jocelyn seems to allude to this place, in these words, "qui Elom dicitur."

<sup>84</sup> Colgan declares, he is unable to identify this spot; but, he remarks, in Dal-aradia, and in Hy-Tuirtre, in the diocese of Connor, there were three miraculous wells, frequented by pilgrims, and by the people; one of these was in the parish of Schire (Skerry) Patrick, another in the parish of covered. There, too, Daniel, distinguished as Patrick's Angel, and who was called, from his short stature, "Abhac," signifying "a dwarf," rested from his well-spent life. Hence, as we are told, this church was denominated Lann-Abhaic,<sup>85</sup> or "the church of the dwarf."<sup>86</sup> It is now a parish, in the diocese of Connor, and denominated Glenavy, at present.<sup>87</sup> While, our saint was preparing for the erection of a church, here, Saran seized his hand to expel him from the place. Then Patrick predicted, that the dynast should be excluded from Heaven, and that his land even should be taken from him, during his lifetime, as a just retribution for the insult and injury he had perpetrated. While St. Patrick was engaged on his holy mission in Dal-aradia, he resolved to found a church, in that place, where Cill-Glas<sup>88</sup> was afterwards pointed out, but he found the people there hostile. He was repelled from the spot, at first; but, he finally succeeded in his attempt, and the place belonged to him, in after time. He left two of his people there, and these are called, Glaisiuc, or Glassicus,<sup>89</sup> and Presbyter Liber.<sup>90</sup> Regretting the discourteous and unworthy conduct of his brother, Saran, another of Caelbadh's sons, Conla<sup>91</sup> made an offer of his possessions and services.<sup>92</sup> He received Patrick with humility, and gave him Domhnach-Combair,<sup>93</sup> now known as Comber.<sup>94</sup> And Patrick blessed him, and declared that kings and chieftains should be of his race for ever.<sup>95</sup>

Our saint founded a church, or a cell, while he was in Dalaradia, at Creamchoill (Cranfield), and a third in the town of Connor.

<sup>85</sup> As the Britons usually called their churches, by the denomination Lann, so it has been inferred, by Colgan, that its patron must have been a Briton, by birth, or, at least, that he had been educated in Britain.
<sup>86</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 219, p. 183.

<sup>87</sup> The letter g having been prefixed by the English settlers; but, in Pope Nicholas' Taxation (1306) it was simply called Lennewy. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," n. (k), p. 47. Also, Appendix S, pp. 236, 237.

<sup>88</sup> The modern name for this church has not been discovered, but, Colgan has placed it, in the diocese of Down.

<sup>89</sup> No doubt, the church had been called after this saint; but, Archdall unauthorizably asserts, that St. Patrick specially built it for St. Glassan. See "Monasticum Hibernicum," p. 8.

<sup>90</sup> Colgan has made some ineffective guesses, to discover the identity of these, with corresponding names, entered in our Calendars.

<sup>91</sup> Jocelyn incorrectly calls him Colladius.
<sup>92</sup> It is now known as Comber, the head of a large parish, in the baronies of Upper and Lower Castlereagh, and shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheets 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16. The town itself is in the Lower barony, and on Sheet 10. It is situated, towards the north-west end of Strangford Lough, and the name is thought to have been derived, from the Irish word comair, which means "a confluence;" because where it stands, the River Enler enters Strangford Lough. A fuller account of it will be found, in Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix G, pp. 197 to 199. It was sometimes called Kill-Cumber. See ibid., GG, n. (r), p. 338.

<sup>93</sup> Colgan states, that this was a church, in his day simply called Comur, and that it was in the diocese of Down and Connor. See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 142, p. 114. Elsewhere, he incorrectly states, that it was Mag-Commuir, a monastery of Regular Canons, in the territory of Delmunia, in the Diocese of Connor. Ibid., n. 211, p. 183.

<sup>94</sup> So far as an inference can be drawn, from his gift of land to St. Patrick, he seems to have been a chief over part of southern Dalaradia.

<sup>95</sup> The Catalogue of the Ulster kings states, that no less than eight of them descended from this Conla, namely, his son, Euchod, besides Congal, Cu-Cuaranán, Tomultach, Moelbressail, Lethlobhar, Longsech, and his son Aidus. This shows, it is thought, how true the prediction of St. Patrick had proved to be.

<sup>96</sup> Colgan leaves, to those well versed in Irish antiquarian lore, the province of determining, whether this could have been Rath-more, a parish church of this region, or a chapel, called Kill-Domnach. However, the name of Domhnach Mor is now obsolete. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," n. (a), p. 51, and Appendix U, pp. 269, 270, GG, p. 338, and nn. (t, u), also p. 346.

Domhnach-mor,<sup>96</sup> in the plain, called Damhorna,<sup>97</sup> sometimes named<sup>98</sup> Machaire-Morna,<sup>99</sup> or more correctly Machaire Dha-morna, now Maghera-morne,<sup>100</sup> a territory, lying to the south of Larne town,<sup>101</sup> in the County Antrim.<sup>102</sup> St. Patrick also built a church, at Rath Sithe,<sup>103</sup> now Rashee parish,<sup>104</sup> in the barony of Upper Antrim, where an ancient episcopal See appears to have existed.<sup>105</sup> There, the servant of God left two of his people. No traces of a church now remain, in that spot, although the ancient cemetery is much used, as a place for interments. He also erected the church, called Kill-chonadhain, or Tulach,<sup>106</sup> or Telach-Conadain,<sup>107</sup> which is supposed to be, the chapelry of St. Cuning,<sup>108</sup> in the parish of Carncastle,<sup>109</sup> near Larne.<sup>110</sup> He built, likewise, at Gluarie,<sup>111</sup> in Latharna or Larne territory,<sup>112</sup> and now known as the church of Glenarm,<sup>113</sup> or Tickmacrevan.<sup>114</sup> This place is

<sup>97</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life has Magh-Damhairne.

<sup>98</sup> By Colgan, elsewhere. See "Trias Thaumaturga," n. 88, p. 177. Primate Dowdall's Registry of the year 1546, slightly departing from the Irish móðairn, or Modhorna, calls it Morine.

<sup>99</sup> The Terrier has noticed this place, as the Deanery of Mauchrimorne.

<sup>100</sup> It adjoins the parish of Inver on the south, and this district now gives name to an estate in the parish of Glynn. On account of its having been pronounced Mourne, this place has been sometimes confounded with the mountainous region of Mourne, in the county of Down. The name of the Antrim plain of Mourne has been preserved in Lough Mourne, a lake ninety acres in extent, and situated in the north-eastern part of Carrickfergus parish. See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 46. The Tuogh of Maghery-morne contained the parishes of Inver, Glynn and Raloo.

<sup>101</sup> The parish of Larne, in the barony of Upper Glenarm, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 35, 40. The town itself is shown on the latter Sheet.

<sup>102</sup> In this district, placed in Dail-na-raidhe, "quæ est contra mare in Aquilonali provincie plaga Ultorum," the celebrated St. Congall, Abbot of Bangor, was born. Vita S. Congalli, in the "Liber Kilkennensis," of Marsh's Library, Dublin.

<sup>103</sup> It means, "a fairy rath," showing how ancient is the Irish popular belief, in those imaginary beings. A charter of James I. annexed this parish, called Rathsith, to the Prebend of Carncastle.

<sup>104</sup> See it described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim." Sheets 38, 39, 44, 45. The townland of Rashee is on the latter Sheet.

<sup>105</sup> Our Irish Annals record the death of several among its bishops. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," n. (p), pp. 68, 69, and, also, Appendix T, p. 263.

<sup>106</sup> These names it had, according to the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>107</sup> This name for the place occurs, in the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>108</sup> Its foundations, measuring 48 by 20 feet, are yet to be seen, in the townland of Saint Cuning. The Calendar of the O'Clerys has a St. Conaing, son of Lacunan, at the 23rd of September.

<sup>109</sup> This parish, in the barony of Upper Glenarm, is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 29, 30, 34, 35. The townland of St. Cuning is on the latter Sheet. Under the name of Sancti Conic, by a charter of James I., it has been united to Rasharkan.

<sup>110</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," pp. 53, 54, n. (d). And, also, Appendix GG, n. (w), p. 338.

<sup>111</sup> Mac Laisre is said to have rested in it. His identity has not been ascertained.

<sup>112</sup> Originally, a considerable district, extending from the town of Larne northwards along the coast, was so called. A view and description of scenes here are given in the "Dublin Penny Journal," vol. ii., No. 64, pp. 93, 94. The original name of the town and harbour was Ollarba; and, this is found to have been afterwards corrupted, into Ulfreksfiord, Wulfrichford, Wulvriceford, Inver, Inverth, Ulderfleet Haven, Wolderfrith, Wolverflete, and Olderfleet.

<sup>113</sup> The accompanying view of this town is from a photograph, taken on the spot. This was transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>114</sup> The parish of Tickmacrevan, in the barony of Lower Glenarm, is noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 25, 29, 30, 34, 35, 39.

<sup>115</sup> In the parish are three small denominations, or townlands, called Glore, Glebe, and Old Church, joining each other; but, these seem to have been formed into subdivisions, from the original townland of Glore. On the Glebe is the churchyard, with the foundations of the ancient church, which measure 45 by 15 feet. See the Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiqui- still called "the Glore."<sup>115</sup> The charming scenes, in and about Glenarm, lie within the parish of Tickmacrevan.<sup>116</sup> An old church ruin<sup>117</sup> is within the Earl of Antrim's beautiful demense, and beside the river, which flows behind the main street of the town, into the Irish Sea.<sup>118</sup> A Franciscan Abbey<sup>119</sup>

Glenarm, County of Antrim.

formerly stood, on the site of the present Protestant church, which rises near the sea-shore.<sup>120</sup> St. Patrick founded a church,<sup>121</sup> likewise, in the valley, called Glennindechta,<sup>122</sup> or Gleann-indeachta,<sup>123</sup> which is now the church of Glynn,<sup>124</sup> ties of Down, Connor and Dromore," pp. 51, 52, n. (b), p. 87, n. (k), and Appendix U, pp. 264 to 270, CC, p. 299, GG, p. 338, n. (x.).

<sup>116</sup> This is properly speaking a union of Tickmacrevan and of Templeoughter. The Irish name, Teampall naácair, means "the Upper Church." The exact boundaries are now undistinguishable. In the Taxation of Pope Nicholas, Tickmacrevan is called "St. Patrick's church of Glenarm," but, by a capricious distribution, it is placed in the Deanery of Turtrye.

<sup>117</sup> This was formerly called St. Mary's, and at the Dissolution, it became appropriate to the Blessed Mary's Abbey of Kells. Here are traces of foundations, and a small portion of the cemetery, beside a stream, a little to the south of Glenarm Castle. There was the site of the former Templeoughter church.

<sup>118</sup> These various objects are denoted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 29.

<sup>119</sup> On the authority of Allemande, Archdall states, that it was founded in 1465, by Robert Bisset, a Scotchman. Pococke's Journal noticed some remains of this building. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 6. Only some foundations of it are now in the churchyard, and these seem to indicate, that it had been cruciform.

<sup>120</sup> Most probably, the old parish church of the place was in Bridge-street, where stood an ancient chapel and a burying-ground, beside the Glenarm River.

<sup>121</sup> It was situated, in that part of Trian Conguill, called Machaire-Morna, or Modhorna. The ruins of this church are on the banks of a river, in a shady glen, and they are interesting, from a picturesque point of view, and because the church had a distinctive nave and chancel. The former measures 44 feet 6 inches in the clear; and the latter 32 feet 2 inches, by 14 feet 4 inches. The original building, at a remote period, appears to have been the nave, and it has square windows; the chancel seems to have been superadded, and its east window is pointed.

<sup>122</sup> So is the name written, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>123</sup> So found, in the Latin version. This name is written Gleann fineáca, in an barony of Lower Belfast, county of Antrim.<sup>125</sup> St. Patrick also built a church, at Imlech Cluana,<sup>126</sup> in Semhne,<sup>127</sup> and there Coemhan's remains lie.<sup>128</sup> Semhne, or Shevny,<sup>129</sup> is thought to have been an ancient name, for Island Magee,<sup>130</sup> lying to the north-east of Carrickfergus,<sup>131</sup> in the county of Antrim. However, with regard to the greater part of the establishments, attributed to St. Patrick's foundation, Dr. Lanigan thinks, there is no sufficient authority to prove, that they owe their origin to the great Irish Apostle; while, it is supposed, the very names are calculated, to assign their erection to other persons.<sup>132</sup> We are told, by Jocelyn, that when St. Patrick made a journey through that part of Ulster, known as Dalaradia, he passed by a place called Mucoomuir,<sup>133</sup> where his disciple Benignus saw choirs of angels, filling that place with celestial splendour. Also, he heard from the skies a harmonious concert of the Divine praises. This vision disappearing, at length, he related to Saint Patrick, all he had witnessed. Being inspired by God, St. Patrick declared to his disciples, what that admirable vision portended. "Know then," said he, "that a son of life, whose name shall be Colmanellus, will build a church in that place, where he shall gather together many sons of light. These shall become with the angels, cohabitants of the heavenly city, and he himself shall be a primate and legate for all Ireland." In process of time, all happened to be true, as the saint foretold;<sup>134</sup> but, Colgan remarks, that it is not an easy matter to pronounce, whether such prophecy had reference to St. Colman of Dromore,<sup>135</sup> or to St. Colman Ela,<sup>136</sup> both of whom are known to have lived in Dalaradia.<sup>137</sup> Again, as we learn, St. Patrick founded Rath-Escuip-Indich,<sup>138</sup> or Rath-Easpuic Innic,<sup>139</sup> in the territory of Ui-Erca-Chein,<sup>140</sup> or Hua-Dercachein,<sup>141</sup> which has been called variously, in English records, Anderken and Sluthenderkeys.<sup>142</sup> Here, a Bishop Innoch, or Indich, Vinnoc, or Winnoc,<sup>143</sup> from whom this church de-old Irish verse. See Archbishop Ussher's "Works," vol. vi. "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xv., p. 146.

<sup>124</sup> Formerly called Glenfinneacht.

<sup>125</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," p. 56, n. (m.) Also, Appendix FF, n. (w), p. 329.

<sup>126</sup> It has not been identified.

<sup>127</sup> Said to have been a plain of Dalaradia, in the south of Antrim County. See John O'Donovan's Cath mughí Rath, or "Battle of Magh Rath," p. 211.

<sup>128</sup> Colgan seems to have mistaken the place, when he makes it lie in Hy-Tuirtre. Archdall unwarrantably states, that St. Patrick built an abbey here for St. Coeman. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 7, 8.

<sup>129</sup> As identified with Island Magee, it contained six churches, one of which, called Killenane, may have its name corruptly formed from St. Caemhan.

<sup>130</sup> See an account of it, in Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix V, pp. 270 to 272.

<sup>131</sup> This parish, in the barony so named, is noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 46, 47, 51, 52, 53, 57. The town itself is on Sheet 52.

<sup>132</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. iii., n. 23, pp. 268, 269.

<sup>133</sup> Now Muckamore, a little to the south of Antrim town, where the Six Mile Water flows into Lough Neagh.

<sup>134</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. xevi., p. 87.

<sup>135</sup> Venerated on the 7th of June.

<sup>136</sup> Venerated on the 26th of September.

<sup>137</sup> See ibid., n. 106, p. 113.

<sup>138</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>139</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life. It means, "the fort of Bishop Innic."

<sup>140</sup> So is it rendered, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>141</sup> It is thus written, in the Latin Tripartite Life. Colgan identifies this place, with the valley of the Braid, in the barony of Antrim. But this is incorrect.

<sup>142</sup> This district was in Dalaradia, and it is said to have been in the present barony of Castlereagh, County of Down, adjoining Strangford Lough. It is supposed to be the present Castle Espic, the ruins of which lie within a large rath, on its western shore. These are in a townland of the same name, and this has always been ecclesiastical property. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," n. 9, p. 443.

<sup>143</sup> Colgan identifies him with a Bishop Winocus, or Uindic, of Tuighnetha, or

rived its name, had been placed. He was a disciple of St. Patrick, but very little is known, regarding his history.<sup>144</sup>

Some time after the aforesaid Saran had incurred that malediction, already mentioned, he bore off many persons into captivity, from the district of Dal-Riada. During those ravages, Bishop Olcan<sup>145</sup> met him, and the poor people grievously complained, about their sad condition. The compassionate Olcan, respected for his holiness of life, interceded; but, this intervention was of no avail, unless he should assure Heaven to the tyrant Saran. The holy bishop alleged, that he had been a great persecutor of the Church, and notorious for his crimes, while he was still under the ban of St. Patrick's malediction. At first, Saran threatened death to the captives, as also to all monks and clerics.<sup>146</sup> However, the innocent bishop, believing too readily in the tyrant's feigned repentance and submission, or dreading the effects of his wrath, and accepting the promises he made to live like a Christian, received his professions, admitted him to baptism, and blessed him, saying, that he should obtain the rewards of eternal life. This whole transaction seems to have been incorrectly represented to the Irish Apostle; and, in consequence, he had prejudged the case, having conceived a strong dislike, regarding the action of his favourite disciple. It was reported to Patrick, that Bishop Olcan had promised baptism and Heaven to him, who had been formerly denied their possession. Wherefore, Saran's guilt was here laid upon Bishop Olcan, for having, even although unwittingly, sought to remove the malediction, and to falsify the prophecy of the holy Apostle. Olcan came, afterwards, from the north, humbly to offer submission, for he learned that Patrick was greatly scandalized, on account of what he had done. They met to the north of Cluain-Fiachna,<sup>147</sup> on the way, while going in different directions. Immediately, Olcan threw himself on his knees, and humbly besought his master's pardon for that offence, and it was at last obtained, yet with much difficulty.<sup>148</sup> As a reproof for his infraction of ecclesiastical discipline, and weak compliance with Saran's wishes, the holy Apostle declared to Bishop Olcan, that his establishment on earth should not be high, and that it must be thrice destroyed. These predictions were afterwards fulfilled; for, it was ruined by Scandal,<sup>149</sup> King of Dal Araidhe, as also by Cucuaran,<sup>150</sup> and it suffered by fire. It happened, that Macnessius,<sup>151</sup> the disciple of Olcan, and afterwards Bishop of Connor, was present. "Laechdich, son of Bresal, and Tynan, in the county of Armagh, and whose feast occurs, at the 29th of August.

<sup>144</sup> Regarding many of the churches, previously named and identified, Archdall in his "Monasticon Hibernicum," had pronounced their situation to be unknown.

<sup>145</sup> He was venerated, at the 20th of February.

<sup>146</sup> Thus is the matter stated, in the Irish Tripartite Life: "I cannot do so, indeed," said Olcan, "for Patrick has deprived thee of Heaven." "I shall kill thy people about thee, thyself excepted," said Saran, "and I will slay all these captives; and, wherever I shall find a priest (tailcend), I shall bring him under the edge of the sword."

<sup>147</sup> This is said, in a note, affixed to Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," to have been Clonfeacle, in the barony of Dungannon, and county of Tyrone, about five miles north of Armagh; however, we doubt much the correctness of this identification.

<sup>148</sup> Thus is the occurrence related, in the Irish Tripartite Life: "The chariot over him," said Patrick. "It is not allowable," said the charioteer, "that it should go over a bishop."

<sup>149</sup> This was Scanlan of the Broad Shield, father of Cöngal Claen, King of Ulidia, or Dalaradia, ten years, who was slain at the battle of Maghrath, near Newry, county of Down, A.D. 634, according to the chronology of the Four Masters, A.D. 636, following the Annals of Ulster and the Chronicon Scotorum, or A.D. 637, according to Tigernach.

<sup>150</sup> He was King of Ulidia and of the Cruithni. He was slain by Finnchu O'Ronan, A.D. 706, according to the "Annals of the Four Masters."

<sup>151</sup> His festival occurs, at the 3rd of September. He died A.D. 513.

his land, shall belong to the young boy bearing the satchel,"<sup>152</sup> said Patrick, "one of thy own people, i.e., Mac Nisse of Condere,<sup>153</sup> and to one not born as yet, namely, Senan,<sup>154</sup> of Inis-Altich.<sup>155</sup> Thy merit in heaven will be illustrious."

Afterwards, St. Patrick is said to have returned to Dalriada, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel, and with him went Olcan, who obtained from Prince Fergus, the son of Erc, the place for founding his church, at Armoy. Another of Saran's brothers, Nadsluagh, was a captive<sup>156</sup> on St. Patrick's arrival, in that part of the country. But, he received the Apostle, with great reverence and honour; while he made a voluntary tender of a site, whereon to erect a church. It would seem, that it was in a part of Nadsluagh's patrimony.<sup>157</sup> The place designated, and most delightfully situated, is now known as Coleraine,<sup>158</sup> where a flourishing town has been built, on the banks of the River Bann.<sup>159</sup> It was for some time the seat of a bishop, and also a monas-

Coleraine Town, on the River Bann.

<sup>152</sup> This account is not found in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>153</sup> A pretty full account of Bishop Mac Nisse, and of his church, will be met with in Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix T, pp. 237 to 264.

<sup>154</sup> It is difficult to find the Senan here alluded to, in our Annals.

<sup>155</sup> In the Index Topographicus to his "Trias Thaumaturga," Colgan writes, that this was in Ulster, but he gives no clue to its exact situation.

<sup>156</sup> Perhaps, he was detained as a hostage, according to a practice, which was then very usual.

<sup>157</sup> The account is thus given, in the Irish Tripartite Life: "You shall have from me," said he, "the site of your regles."

"Where will you give it me?" asked Patrick. "On the brink of the Bann, in the west," said Nadsluagh, "where the boys are burning the ratha (ferns). "It shall be mine, truly," said Patrick; "a descendant of mine and thine shall be there."

<sup>158</sup> The parish of Coleraine, in the barony, called the North-East Liberties of Coleraine, is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Londonderry," Sheets 3, 7, 8. The town and suburbs are shown on Sheet 7.

<sup>159</sup> The accompanying illustration, from a photograph, was drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard. This view is from the left bank of the Bann, and from below the bridge.

tery was there. The Irish Apostle accepted this place for Bishop Coirpre,<sup>160</sup> the son of Degill, who was the son of Nadslaugh. He is said to have rested in Cul-rathain,<sup>161</sup> on the eastern brink of the Bann, and it lay within a district, denominated Eilniu, where St. Patrick built many other cells.<sup>162</sup> Before this messenger of glad tidings left the territory of Dalaradia, he turned towards the former habitation of his harsh master Milchon; for, he recollected the three dear and pious children, that had known him, in the years of boyhood. According to our accounts, on this occasion, Patrick brought with him Guasacht,<sup>163</sup> whom he had consecrated bishop, and set over the church of Granard, in the territory of Teffia. He also induced Guasacht's sisters, the two Emirs, or Emerias,<sup>164</sup> to live a holy life, at Cluain-Bronaigh, now known as Clonbroney, to the west of Granard, in the county of Longford. It became a famous nunnery, and it was largely endowed with lands.

The way Patrick went, as we are told, in the Latin Tripartite Life, when he left the territory of Dal-Araidhe,<sup>165</sup> was through Fersait Tuama,<sup>166</sup> which is now known as Toome Bridge,<sup>167</sup> over the River Bann, in the county of Antrim. He thus entered, upon a new division of territorial jurisdiction: Loch Echach, now Lough Neagh, was on one side of it, and Sliabh-Callann, now Slieve Gallion,<sup>168</sup> on the other. Ui-Tuirtre<sup>169</sup>—the old name for this territory—was then on the west side of the Bann;<sup>170</sup> but the tribe was afterwards removed, or had been expelled,<sup>171</sup> to the east or Antrim side.<sup>172</sup> In this district, called Hy-Tuirtre,<sup>173</sup> to the west and north-west of Lough Neagh, St. Patrick remained for forty days,<sup>174</sup> in a place called Finnabhuir.<sup>175</sup> Here, he found a most eligible and pleasing site, for the foundation of a cathedral, having Sliabh Callann on one side, and Lough Neagh on the other. However, the Dynast of this place would not give his consent, and so Patrick was ordered away, being opposed by this chieftain, named Carthenn,<sup>176</sup> or Cairthen Mor, as he is sometimes called. He descended from Colla Uais,<sup>177</sup> Monarch of Ireland.<sup>178</sup> By the pagan Dynast Carthennus, Patrick was forced to quit this territory, and insult was added, which caused <sup>160</sup> His festival was held, here, on the 11th of November.

<sup>161</sup> It is said to derive its name, from cwl raethain, signifying, "the ferny corner."

<sup>162</sup> Such is the account given, by Tirechan, in his Life of St. Patrick, as found in the Book of Armagh. See Sir William Betham's "Antiquarian Researches," Appendix, p. 33.

<sup>163</sup> His festival was held, on the 24th of January.

<sup>164</sup> The 11th of December is the day assigned for their festival.

<sup>165</sup> A misconception of this meaning seems to occur, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>166</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life; the Irish version has it, Fersait-Tuama.

<sup>167</sup> The town of Toome, in the parish of Dunecane, and barony of Upper Toome, is noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 42.

<sup>168</sup> This is a high ridge of mountain, at the south-west of Loughinsholin barony, in the county of Derry.

<sup>169</sup> This tribe had been governed, by their own chiefs, for a long series of ages. During the centuries before and after the English Invasion, the O'Flinns seem to have there ruled.

<sup>170</sup> The territory comprised a considerable portion of the modern barony of Dungannon, in the county of Tyrone, and of the barony of Loughinsholin, in the county of Derry.

<sup>171</sup> By the O'Neills.

<sup>172</sup> Not adverting to the change of locality, or migration of the tribe, Colgan inverts the position of Slieve Gallien and Lough Neagh.

<sup>173</sup> See an account of it, in Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix BB, pp. 292 to 297.

<sup>174</sup> So is it stated, in the Latin Tripartite Life; in the Irish version, it is forty nights.

<sup>175</sup> The ancient church of Ardrea, in the barony of Loughinsholin, and county of Derry, seems to have occupied the position of the place here mentioned. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," n. 3, p. 445.

<sup>176</sup> See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxvi., p. 362.

<sup>177</sup> With his two brothers, he defeated the Ultonians, at the battle of Carn-eacha-lethderg, A.D. 332.

<sup>178</sup> He held this dignity, from A.D. 327 to this favourite of Heaven, to proclaim the retribution in store for him. St. Patrick predicted his downfall, and that of his posterity, while another should possess his territory, although then banished from a just share of his family's patrimony. Obeying the injunction of his Divine Master, and casting the dust from his feet, Patrick left the territory of his persecutor, and sought another field for his labours. We are told, likewise, that the chief had a younger brother, also called Carthenn, or Cairthend Beg, then exiled from that territory, and in another part of the country. But, the Almighty was pleased to rectify this unjust treatment, for him, who was destined to obtain the whole principality. This man, with his family, became converted,<sup>179</sup> and Patrick baptized him, and blessed his wife. "My debroth," said Patrick, moreover, "the being that is in thy womb shall be full of God's grace; and I shall bless a veil, upon her head."<sup>180</sup> The mother is called Mogan,<sup>181</sup> or Mugania, and the child, afterwards born in this family, was the holy virgin, St. Trea.<sup>182</sup> St. Patrick, as he had predicted, blessed a veil, which he placed on her. The angels, moreover, who brought this veil from Heaven, placed it on her head, and it fell down, over her dove-like eyes and modest cheeks. Then Patrick began to raise it up. "Why is it not good to leave it as it had been placed?" asked Trea. "It is good, indeed," answered Patrick. Afterwards, she never saw anything during her life, except what she saw through that veil.

To his great delight, the people of Hy-Tuirtre embraced the Christian faith, for Carthenn Junior, his wife, and children, had set them a good example. By his constant preaching and labours, on this mission, St. Patrick was enabled to reap a most abundant harvest. Wherefore, in that territory, he founded seven Domhnachs;<sup>183</sup> namely, Domnac-Fainre,<sup>184</sup> or Domhnach-Fainre,<sup>185</sup> Domnach-Riescaigh,<sup>186</sup> or Domhnach-Riascad,<sup>187</sup> Domnach-Fothairbe,<sup>188</sup> or Domhnach-Fothirbe,<sup>189</sup> Domnach-Righ-dhuinn,<sup>190</sup> or Domhnach-Righduinn, Domnach-Brain,<sup>191</sup> or Domhnach-Brain,<sup>192</sup> Domhach

331. He had two sons, Earc, from whom the MacCartains of Lough Foyle descended, and Fiachra Tort, from whom the Hy-Tuirtre, the Fir-Li, the Fir-Luirc, and the Hy-Mac-Uais descended. Fiachra Tort was grandfather to this Cairthainn.

<sup>179</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxviii., p. 85. And Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. cxxxviii. to cxi., p. 148.

<sup>180</sup> "When Patrick, at the holy fount, received

The chief Cartanus and his youthful spouse,

He prophesied: 'For that you have believed,

Prosperity and joy will bless your house:

And thou, young wife, before another year,

Shalt bear a child to God and angels dear."

—"Legends of the Saints; or, Stories of Faith and Love," St. Patrick, p. 16. Dublin: James Duffy, 1869, small 4to. The authoress was Miss Monica Healy, of Dublin, who died in September, 1876.

<sup>181</sup> She was a daughter to Fergus Mor Mac Nissi, who was King of Dal-Riada.

<sup>182</sup> St. Trea's festival was held, on the 8th of July, and, on the 3rd of August.

<sup>183</sup> The term is applied to churches, the names of which begin with "Domhnach."

<sup>184</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>185</sup> In the Registries of Armagh, it is generally written Domnachfenra, or Dompnachfionnray; and, it is now known as Donagherry, at Stewartstown, in the county of Tyrone, and it is near Lough Neagh. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix BB, n. (a), p. 294.

<sup>186</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>187</sup> This is now known, as the townland of Donaghrisk, in the parish of Desertcreat, which joins the last-named, on the west. Donaghheresca occurs, as the name of an independent church, in the Taxation of Armagh Diocese, A.D. 1291; and, in the ancient Registra of the diocese, it is represented as the Rectory of Domnachreasca, or Downaghryeske. Donoghreiske was a chapel, with two ballboes of Erenagh land belonging to it, according to the Dungannon Inquisition of 1609.

<sup>188</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>189</sup> This place and the following churches have not been identified.

<sup>190</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>191</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>192</sup> It has been suggested, that this was moelain,<sup>193</sup> or Domhnach-Maelain,<sup>194</sup> Domnach-libeir<sup>195</sup> or Domhnach-Li-buir.<sup>196</sup> The secondary spelling of the foregoing localities is that found, in the Irish Tripartite version of St. Patrick's Acts.<sup>197</sup>

St. Patrick thence travelled to a place, named Fera-Gaura,<sup>198</sup> where the people would neither receive him, nor hearken to his preaching. This district was, it seems, near Lough Neagh, to the south-east and south.<sup>199</sup> Here, St. Patrick was inhospitably treated; for the people drove him away. Then, filled with a prophetic spirit, he announced, that while they prevailed for the present time, by loading him with reproaches and injuries, because he wished to break the bread of life to them, he should be conqueror in the end; for, the Apostle declared, that they should go afterwards, with tribute to his church, in the winter time, and that extern tribes should finally get possession of their country. This prediction was literally accomplished. Then, the indefatigable herald of the Gospel visited Imchclair<sup>200</sup> district, lying around Donoghmore,<sup>201</sup> and to the west of Dungannon.<sup>202</sup> There, he baptized and blessed the people of that region. The holy man left with them Cruimther Colum,<sup>203</sup> also called Columbus Presbyter,<sup>204</sup> and Patrick's own Book of Orations,<sup>205</sup> and his bell; these were deemed to produce miraculous effects, at that time, when the Irish Tripartite Life was written.<sup>206</sup> possibly Donnabaran herenagh land, mentioned in Swayne's Register, fol. 60. It was in the Deanery of Tullaghoge, and county of Tyrone, to the west of Lough Neagh. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix BB, n. (c), p. 294. Dr. Lanigan will have it, that this church had been founded by a person, named Brain. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. iii., n. 23, p. 268.

<sup>193</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>194</sup> Rev. Dr. Lanigan supposes, that this church owed its origin, to a Mullen, or O'Mullen. This is thought to have been the old church of Desertlynn, in the county of Derry, and adjoining Artrea. It was so called, from the O'Lynn family, who also gave name to the barony of Loughinsholin, in which it is situated. The ruins of an old church are in the town of Ballymully.

<sup>195</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>196</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks, this church had been founded, by some one named Libeir, and that the very names of many among the churches, mentioned in his Acts, refer to founders, different from St. Patrick. Colgan acknowledges, that he could not identify one of the foregoing churches, in the territory of Hi-Tuirtre, although he had a list of those that remained there, in his time. He names some of these, as having been holy places, in days gone by; such as Ard-domnuich, Cluaineoin, Cluainte-bana, Cluainch-nuc, Cluain-Baith, Dun-chille Bige, Dunogcurra, Kill-gad, Kill-Olena. He thinks, some of the names of churches, in St. Patrick's Acts, must have become obsolete, and they probably lapsed into the foregoing denominations. See nn. 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238.

<sup>197</sup> In Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," there are some misty notices of the places already named.

<sup>198</sup> The Rev. Dr. Reeves conjectured, that this territory lay between Ui-Tuirtre, to the west of Lough Neagh, and Donaghmore, in the county of Tyrone.

<sup>199</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. iii., n. 24, p. 269.

<sup>200</sup> It was called also Magh-clair, meaning "a very level plain."

<sup>201</sup> This parish is in the barony of Middle Dungannon, and it is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 45, 46, 53, 54, 60, 61. The town and townland proper are on Sheet 46.

<sup>202</sup> The town of Dungannon, in Drumglass parish, and in Middle Dungannon barony, is noted ibid., Sheet 54.

<sup>203</sup> The festival of Cruimther Colum, as called in the Irish Tripartite Life, was celebrated here, on the 4th of June, as also on the 6th of December.

<sup>204</sup> Thus is he called, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>205</sup> According to other accounts, it was a Ritual Book.

<sup>206</sup> Archdall seized upon this observation, and thence made out, that the abbey of Donnaghmore, in Tyrone, had been founded by St. Patrick. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 682. The Tripartite, which alone could be appealed to, makes no mention, notwithstanding, of a church there, in St. Patrick's time. For the occurrences related, in the present chapter, the reader is referred to Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lviii., p. 25, n. 51, p. 32. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxxvi., p. 73, lxxxvii., p. 85, lxxxviii., p. 85, xci., p. 86, cxxxvii., cxxxviii., p. 95,

CHAPTER XVI.

THE IRISH APOSTLE FOUNDS CHURCHES IN HY-BRUIIN, AND AT TULACH-MAINE—HE PREACHES AT FINN-ABHUIR—HE VISITS THE OIRGAILLIANS—EOCHAID MAC CRIMTHAINN AND HIS CHILDREN—CLOGHER AND ITS NEIGHBOURHOOD—ST. MACCAERTHENN IS PLACED OVER THE SEE, ESTABLISHED AT CLOGHER—DESCRIPTION OF ALTADAVEN—MISSION IN HUA-MEITHTIRE—ST. PATRICK VISITS THE PEOPLE OF MUGHDOERNIA—THE CONVERSION OF THEIR CHIEFTAIN, VICTOR—ST. PATRICK IS OPOSED, BY THE PEOPLE OF FERA-ROIS.

WHILE the most holy Patriarch of Western Europe was thus engaged, travelling through Ulster, founding churches, providing for their government, and spreading everywhere the Kingdom of Christ, he happened to come into the territory of Hy-Briuin,<sup>1</sup> in the north. He rested there on Sunday, it is said; and, he measured out the boundaries for a church, which he built there, and, which, afterwards was known, as Domnach-airthir, otherwise Domnach-Airthir Maighe.<sup>2</sup> Here, he left a favourite disciple, named Conædus, by some writers, or Presbyter Conaeth, and, by Jocelyn, he is called Connendus.<sup>3</sup> He was a man of great virtue and learning, who could not bear to leave St. Patrick's society. After a few days, St. Connendus came to St. Patrick, and desired to abdicate his pastoral charge, through great humility. He found St. Patrick resting, at a place, towards the east, called Fiodh, or "the wood."<sup>4</sup> However, the holy Apostle commanded him, to return back to his church, and foretelling, that he need not fear the effusion of blood, for none should ever be killed, in that place; although, it was added, he should have few holy persons living near him, but rather men addicted to deeds of violence, and stealers of swine.<sup>5</sup> The event showed St. Patrick's prophecy to have nn. 36, 37, p. 110, n. 94, p. 112, nn. 96, 97, p. 113, nn. 101, 102, p. 113, nn. 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, pp. 114, 115. Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. cxxviii., cxxix., cxxx., cxxxi., cxxxii., cxxxiii., cxxxiv., cxxxv., cxxxvi., cxxxvii., cxxxviii., cxxxix., cxl., cxli., cxlii., cxliii., pp. 146 to 148, and nn., from 193 to 240, pp. 182 to 184. See, also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," the Irish Tripartite version, pp. 439 to 447, with accompanying notes.

CHAPTER XVI.—<sup>1</sup> This tribe is said to have been descended from Brian, the son of Fieg, and O'Flaherty adds, "ex quo Hy-briuin Borealis in diocesi Ardmachana."—"Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxvi., p. 364. It seems probable, this territory was in the modern barony of Dungannon, and county of Tyrone. Colgan thinks it to have been identical with Muinter Birn, in Tyrone, and to have been so called from Bruin, son to Muiredach Meith, son to Imchad, son of Colla Da Crioch.

<sup>2</sup> Jocelyn has noted this, as one of the seven churches, built by St. Patrick, in Hy-Tuirtrie. Colgan says, it must be distinguished from another Domnach Airthir, in Kienacht, diocese of Derry. Both, he states, have lost the ancient name, and he guessed, that the present church might have been identical with one, called Achadh-longa, or Achadh-logo, in his own time.

<sup>3</sup> There are names of Saints Connatus, or Condatus, Conna, or Conda, Connanus, or Condanus, in our Calendars, at various days. It seems difficult to identify this saint, with any one of those holy persons. It is thought, by Colgan, that the church of this priest, called here Domnach-Airthir, may not be different from one named Domnach-Foth-airbe, in Hy-Tuirtrie. This, however, seems to me an incorrect opinion.

<sup>4</sup> Colgan states, this was the southern district of Tyrone, belonging to the diocese of Armagh, and which once was well wooded. In his day, the trees had been greatly cleared away, although the name was retained.

<sup>5</sup> So is it stated, in the Latin Tripartite Life; but, in the Irish version, it is said to have been a place for pig-eaters.

<sup>6</sup> This is said to have been proved, when Connacan, son of Colman, son of Niall Frossach, lived, and went into this district. According to Irish historical accounts, Niall Frossach, who was King of Ireland for seven years, resigned in 765, and died at I-Colum-Cille, on his pilgrimage, eight years afterwards. The "Annals of the Four Masters" record the death of his son Colum, by the Cinel-Conaill, at A.D. 810. Also, the death of Connegan, son of Colum, is mentioned, during a hosting, made into Ulidia, in 853. See Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., pp. 368, 369, 422, 423, 486, 487. It is stated, in the Irish Tripartite been most true.<sup>6</sup> The Apostolic man Patrick went, afterwards, to Telach-Maine,<sup>7</sup> or Tulach-maine.<sup>8</sup> It is obvious, from the context, that the place, here referred to, must have been in northern Ulster.<sup>9</sup> There he received a welcome, from the local Dynast Maine, son of Conlaedh, who humbled himself, and who received all the welcome monitions of the holy missionary. For manifesting this obedient spirit, Patrick blessed him, and also blessed his wife. As a consequence of that benediction, she brought forth, at one birth, twin daughters. Patrick baptized these blessed ones. In due course of time, these virgins<sup>10</sup> were espoused to the Son of God; while, St. Patrick blessed veils for their heads, and received their religious vows. He left a senior with them, likewise, to instruct them, in the duties of their happy state. It would seem, that the holy Apostle resolved on the conversion of the Orgials, or Oriels; a great sept descended from the three Collas,<sup>11</sup> who con-

Life, that when with an army, Connacan was at the Fiodh, nine men moved off from a tree, which Artifex, a pilgrim, selected. He was beheaded; eight were liberated, however, in his land. A corresponding account was evidently added, at a later period, by some copyist of the Tripartite, to show the fulfilment of St. Patrick's prophecy.

<sup>7</sup> So is the name written, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>8</sup> It is thus rendered, in the Latin Tripartite. There is a Tullymoan, in the parish of Urney; while there is a parish, called Tullyniskan, in the barony of Dungannon. Both are in the county of Tyrone. However, this place has not yet been identified.

<sup>9</sup> There is only found one Tullymain, in the parish of Faughanvale, and barony of Tirkeeran, in the county of Londonderry. It may have been the place here indicated, in the opinion of the writer of a note, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick."

<sup>10</sup> Without exactly identifying these holy virgins, Colgan adds in a note, that at the 6th of July, our Calendars contain an entry, viz.: the three daughters of Maine, of Airiudh-Bainne, called Dermor, Ethne, and Cummán.

<sup>11</sup> The celebrated Cormac Mac Art had been succeeded in the sovereignty of Ireland, by his son Cairbré Lifechair, A.D. 268. The latter king was killed, in the battle of Gabhra, or Gawra; but, he left three sons, called Fiacha Srabhténé, Eochaidh, and Eochaidh Domhlén. Fiacha Srabhténé succeeded his father Cairbré A.D. 286, and he reigned for seventeen years, until he was slain, by the sons of his brother, Eochaidh Domhlén, in the battle of Dubhchomar, supposed to be at the confluence of the Rivers Boyne and Blackwater, in Meath, A.D. 322. Those sons were known as the three Collas, and their mother is called Olechia, the daughter of Updarius, and a Briton of Albania. They are severally named, Colla Uais, or the Noble, who was the eldest; Colla Meann, or the Stammerer, and Colla Fóchri, or the Earthly. Colla Uais assumed the sovereignty, after their victory, but, he only held it for four years; he and his brothers, with three hundred others, having been expelled into Alba, or Scotland, A.D. 326, by Muireadhach Ti-reach, their first cousin, and son to Fiacha, the former monarch. The three Collas returned to Ireland three years afterwards, and threw themselves on the mercy of Muireadhach, who not only forgave them, but, seeing they were brave men, took them into his service and confidence. He even gave them command in his army, and after some years, he proposed, that they should establish themselves, in some more independent position, than they could attain under him. He pointed to the Ulster kingdom, as an object worthy their ambition; and they, agreeing to make war against it, led an army into Fearnmaigh, now the barony of Farney, in the county of Monaghan, where they encamped on the Carn of Achaidh Leith Derg, which has not been identified. From this stronghold, they ravaged that country around them, until the Ulstermen, under their king Fergus Fogha, came to meet them. An obstinate battle was fought, in which the three Collas proved victorious, although Colla Meann perished there. King Fergus Fogha, the last King of Ulster, who dwelt in the Fort of Emhain, fell in that engagement, and his followers were driven over Glenn Righ, the valley of the present Newry Water, into the modern counties of Down and Antrim, from which they never afterwards returned. The victors destroyed Emania, and then took possession of the greater part of Ulster. This they held, as Swordland; and, from those warlike princes descended the Maguires, the Mac Mahons, the O'Hanlons, the Mac Canns, as also the Mac Donnells, the Mac Allisters, and Mac Dugalds of Scotland, with many other families. See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxv., p. 359; Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 118 to 125, with accompanying notes; and, Eugene O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. iii., pp. 72, 73.

quered the ancient Ultonians, and wrested from them, that portion of the Ulster province, lying westwards of Glenn Rígh, Lough Neagh, and the Lower Bann. Their territory formerly was comprised, generally speaking, within the present counties of Londonderry, Tyrone, Armagh, Monaghan, Fermanagh and Louth.<sup>12</sup> Patrick did not visit Ard-Macha<sup>13</sup> on that occasion, but went into the territory of Hy-Cremthand.<sup>14</sup> This district, it has been thought, was in the barony of Slane,<sup>15</sup> and county of Meath,<sup>16</sup> it being so called from Creamhthann,<sup>17</sup> a descendant from the Colla da Chrioch.<sup>18</sup> Here, indeed, we meet with a digression, in the order of narrative, as found in the Tripartite Lives, if the locality of Hy Cremthand be rightly identified; but, it seems more correct, to place it within the present county of Tyrone.<sup>19</sup> Here, too, it is stated, St. Patrick founded churches and residences.

While at Finn-Abhuir,<sup>20</sup> or Finnabhair,<sup>21</sup> in that district of Ultonia, known as Lemhuin,<sup>22</sup> or Lemania,<sup>23</sup> a vast concourse of persons had assembled. Three whole days,<sup>24</sup> without intermission, did the saint read the Four Gospels, and preach from a hill, to multitudes, that flocked from all parts to hear him. These persons thought they had not been there one day,<sup>25</sup> so effective and attractive were the saint's doctrine and discourses. In that assembly, the most holy virgin Saint Brigid<sup>26</sup> was present. Reclining her head, she slept. Saint Patrick, perceiving this, forbade any person to awaken God's beloved spouse. By the issue was manifested, that passage of the Canticles, which might be fitly applied to her: "I sleep, but my heart waketh,"<sup>27</sup> because her Heavenly Spouse imparted a knowledge of mysteries to her. When she awoke, the saint commanded her to tell, in the hearing of all the people, what she had seen. Obeying him, St. Brigid related, that she saw, at first, an assembly of men, all clothed in white, with ploughs, oxen, and fields all white; after that, she saw all of these stained with spots; and lastly, she observed them to become wholly black. In another vision, she beheld

<sup>12</sup> Shortly after the introduction of the Christian Religion, the descendants of Eóghan deprived them of the counties of Tyrone and Londonderry. See John O'Donovan's "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagáin and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," p. xix., n. 103.

<sup>13</sup> Now Armagh.

<sup>14</sup> This division, and its chiefs, are frequently mentioned, in the "Annals of the Four Masters."

<sup>15</sup> Colgan places this little district, in Southern Orgiell, and, he adds, "nunc ad Baroniam Slanensem spectans, vulgo Crimthainne dicta." See, also, John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (f), p. 152.

<sup>16</sup> According to Colgan.

<sup>17</sup> He was the son of Fieg, son to Deodatus, son of Rochad, son of Colla-da-Chrioch. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," i. Februarii. De S. Cinia sive Kinnia Virgine, n. 7, p. 235.

<sup>18</sup> See, also, ibid., xxi. Martii. Appendix ad Acta S. Endaei, cap. 3, 4, pp. 712 to 714.

<sup>19</sup> Most of our modern writers seem to follow Colgan's opinion, on this question; to us, the territory appears to lie, in the country around Clogher.

<sup>20</sup> So is it called, in the Latin Tripartite

Life. There were several places bearing this name, Finnabhair, in Ireland. The place here mentioned is said to be now called Findermore, a townland in the parish and barony of Clogher, shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 58, 64.

<sup>21</sup> It receives this form of spelling, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>22</sup> Lemania, or Liamhain, otherwise called Magh-lemna, according to Colgan, was in Tyrone, and in the diocese of Clogher. It was otherwise called Clossach. The River Blackwater ran through it, while the fort of Augher and the village of Ballygawley were in it, having Clogher on its western, and the church of Errigal Keeroge on its northern, boundary. As Clossach, it is frequently mentioned, in O'Mellan's Irish "Journal of the Wars of 1641."

<sup>23</sup> It is said to have been an open district of Tyrone.

<sup>24</sup> The Irish and Latin Tripartite Lives state, that he preached three whole days, and as many nights.

<sup>25</sup> According to Jocelyn, but the Irish and Latin Tripartite Lives have it one hour.

<sup>26</sup> The great Patroness of Ireland, whose feast occurs, on the 1st of February.

<sup>27</sup> Canticle of Canticles, v. 2.

<sup>28</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xciv.,

sheep, dogs and wolves, contending together. St. Patrick then interpreted the first part of her vision, as relating to his own time, wherein good works and faith were united together, and exercised ; the second state had reference to the following generation, which should indeed persist in the candour of faith, but, notwithstanding, should deface it with depraved works ; the third state, he referred to ensuing ages, wherein men should not alone abandon the exercise of good works, but, moreover, would profane their lives, by renouncing their faith. The contention of various animals was held to indicate a strife between good and bad clerics and laics, in the time of a long subsequent generation. None of the audience doubted, but that this interpretation of St. Patrick must inevitably happen.<sup>28</sup> Again, the holy virgin declared, that subsequently she saw two stones, the one little and the other big. A shower fell over each of these. The little stone increased, after it had received the drop, and, thereupon, silvery sparks burst from it. The large stone seemed to decrease, moreover, as the rain descended. Now, St. Patrick stood within the territory of Orgiell. The people of Oirgaillia, called also the Orgiellians,<sup>29</sup> were known as the posterity of the three Collas ; and, Eochaidh Mac Crimthainn<sup>30</sup> ruled over them, at that time, when St. Patrick was there.<sup>31</sup> The Dynast had four children ; two sons, Bressal, said to have been the eldest, and Cairpre Damhairgit ; he had, likewise, two daughters, one named Dearfraich,<sup>32</sup> and another called Cinnia.<sup>33</sup> The prophet Patrick explained the vision of St. Brigid, in an admirable manner, and as having, in the latter phase, a relation to Bressal and to Cairpre Damhairgit. The elder obstinately opposed the Gospel. Wherefore, he and his whole race were extirpated, in consequence of the dreadful imprecations denounced on them by St. Patrick ; while Carbríe, surnamed Damhairgid, most willingly embraced the principles of truth, and he enjoyed the blessings imparted to him, with his posterity. From him, too, a numerous succession of Orgiellian princes, and a line of many saints, descended.

When St. Patrick had come into the ancient territory of Hy-Crimthean, said also, to have been called the territory of Cinel Feradhaigh,<sup>34</sup> or Kinel-Farry, he proceeded straightway towards Cloghar, the chief seat of the Ergal Dynast, according to a popular tradition.<sup>35</sup> It is stated, likewise, that the Cloch-oir, or "golden stone," had been erected in the courtyard of the chief's residence ;<sup>36</sup> and, that, from it the place derived its denomination.

xcv., pp. 86, 87, and n. 105, p. 113. Sep-tima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. iv., pp. 149, 150, and n. 11, p. 184.

<sup>29</sup> The fanciful derivation of their name is said to arise, from their having detained hostages given to them, in golden fetters ; thus, or means "gold," and gall, "a hostage."

<sup>30</sup> A very beautiful blank-verse poem of Aubrey de Vere, intituled, "St. Patrick and King Eochaidh," thus commences :—

"Eochaidh, son of Cruimther, reigned, a king Northward in Clochar."

—See "Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 149 to 167.

<sup>31</sup> See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxvi., p. 364.

<sup>32</sup> She was mother to Tighernach, Bishop of Clones, in the county of Monaghan, according to the O'Clery's Calendar, at the 4th of April.

<sup>33</sup> Her feast occurs, at the 1st of February.

<sup>34</sup> It comprised the barony of Clogher, in the county of Tyrone, and it was the patrimony of the Mac Cathmhaoil family, also known as Mac Cawell, variously Anglicised into Caulfield, Campbell, Camphill and Howell. See John O'Donovan's "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagáin and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," p. xix., n. 102.

<sup>35</sup> For this and many other particulars which follow, a communication of "Oriel," Rev. Daniel O'Connor, headed "Clochar-na-Rígh, or Clogher of the Kings," in "The Northern Star" of June, 1871, is our authority.

<sup>36</sup> There is an extensive circular mound, with triple ramparts of earth surrounding it, on an elevated spot, within the Protestant bishop's former demesne ; and, this may

Being informed, how this king had passed a law, that no smoke must be seen in the neighbourhood, before smoke should issue from his castle ; the Apostle, for some sufficient reason, dared to disregard the Royal mandate. On a hill, not far from Clogher, he lighted a fire, at the dawn of day. This eminence is still known as Mullaghtinny, or "the hill of fire."<sup>37</sup> At Clogher, as the people state, St. Patrick confounded the Druids, by a miracle, which he Clogher Church, County of Tyrone.

there wrought.<sup>38</sup> The remnant of the celebrated Cloch-oir is even yet preserved, it is said, within the churchyard precincts,<sup>39</sup> where the present Protestant church stands,<sup>40</sup> near the site of St. Mac-Carthen's former church.<sup>41</sup> have been the site of the ancient chieftain's residence. In the "Annals of the Four Masters," this place is called Clochar-mac-n-Daimhne.

<sup>37</sup> It is said, this act greatly incensed the Dynast, who despatched messengers to arrest the saint. But, instead, these professed themselves Christians. Hereupon, the king himself, with two wolf-dogs, approached ; when these animals rushed forward, as if to devour the Apostle, yet, on approaching him, their rage departed, and they began to fawn before him. Then, they fiercely turned against their former master, whom they pursued and killed, in the townland of Kilnaheerly, in the parish of Clogher. It is needless to observe, this local legend differs much from the old written narratives.

<sup>38</sup> It was pretended, that a stone, called Kerdman Kelstach, could restore the dead to life ; and, when a young man, instructed for the purpose, feigned himself dead, he in reality died, nor was the idol able to restore his life. St. Patrick, thereupon, struck the Cloch-oir, with his Pastoral Staff, the celebrated Bachal Isa. Then, the head of the stone flew asunder, and, from it, a demon issued, but he immediately took to flight.

<sup>39</sup> There, it is pointed out, resting—not in its original site—against the side of the Protestant church—formerly the Cathedral—and it is a silicious sand-stone, as Richard Joseph Cruise, Esq., G.S.I., pronounced, who accompanied the Rev. Daniel O'Connor and the writer to Clogher, in June, 1878. The fragment is nearly an oblong square, five feet in height, being six feet three inches, in circumference.

<sup>40</sup> The accompanying illustration was drawn on the spot, by William F. Wakeman, and it has been engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>41</sup> So long as the kings of Ergal retained their power, the church and other religious institutions at Clogher appear to have withstood the Danish and Norwegian ravages. But, in the year 1380, Lord Mortimer with

The town of Clogher runs in a long street, having houses only on one side; the demesne wall of the bishop running along the opposite side, the graveyard and wall forming a continuation. Within the cemetery,<sup>42</sup> the site of the ancient church is shown, but the foundations are covered over with sods, while curious carved fragments of it are built into the adjoining walls. Here, St. Patrick resolved on erecting a See. Among his disciples was one, particularly distinguished for his bodily strength, and for his affectionate regards, towards that great master. His proper name was Aodh or Aidus, and his father's was Chaerthann. Most generally, however, that son obtained the better-known patronymic, Maccaerthenn.<sup>43</sup> This faithful follower was the staff of Patrick's declining years; for, he bore the master on his shoulders over fords of rivers and dangerous obstacles on the way.<sup>44</sup> Now, at one time, Patrick came by where the lordly Knockmany rises<sup>45</sup>—its brow even then crowned by a Pagan monument.<sup>46</sup> He was on his way from Clochar, and from the north, when that once strong man carried him across a difficult place, but with manifest signs of distress, and his breathing became short.<sup>47</sup> Maccaerthenn was then in the decline of life; yet, the Irish Apostle found him to be a useful co-labourer, and in every way obedient to his wishes. Then advertg to his distress, the Apostle had compassion for his weakness, and promised to give him a settlement for the remainder of his days. He afterwards left Bishop Mac-Carthen in Clochar, and the Domhnach-Airgid<sup>48</sup> was his forces destroyed Clogher. Fires, at various times, broke out in this city. Its church was rebuilt, in the eleventh century; yet, this too may have suffered complete or partial destruction.

<sup>42</sup> Here is an old stone font of circular shape, lying on the grass, with bent mouldings. It is two feet four inches in diameter, at the top.

<sup>43</sup> According to Sir James Ware, he died, on the 24th of March, A.D. 506. On that day, his festival is still held.

<sup>44</sup> Owing to this support, he was called "Patrick's Champion," and "Patrick's strong-man."

<sup>45</sup> Under its wood-crowned shadows, Clogher grew up as a giant, and extended its portals to Augher, the royal gateway, and to the historic houses of Ballyxally. William Carleton, a native of the country near Clogher, and who is yet well remembered in this neighbourhood, has written "A Legend of Knockmany," and a beautiful poem, called "Knockmany." The "characters" and "places" commemorated, by this celebrated Irish writer, are traditionally noted, by the people there, who are not a little proud of his genius and fame. Knockmany, as also Mullaghbenney and Killany, in the neighbourhood, are said to have been called after Queen Baine, whose death is recorded at A.D. 111, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 102, 103. Here, her cairn was raised. It has been admirably described and illustrated, by W. F. Wakeman, in his paper, "The Magalithic Sepulchral Chamber of Knockmany, County Tyrone." See "The Journal of the Royal Historical and Archaeological Association of Ireland," vol. iv. Fourth Series. July, 1876, pp. 95 to 106. From this commanding spot, there is a most extensive and charming prospect on every direction.

<sup>46</sup> There is thought to have been a Pagan Altar, with large pillars standing around in Crom-Cruach fashion. Here, in Pagan times, the Gods of the Gentiles are said to have been propitiated; and, even in Christian times, the Feast of Lammass, with its many festivities, continued to be celebrated, down to a late period. The Lammass games of Knockmany were long sustained. Tradition states, that athletic sports, were here enlivened by the rínka, an ancient Irish dance, in which the sons and daughters of Ergal joined. Hurlings and races, also, were favourite games. Until a recent period, races were run on the "race-road," extending under the foot of Knockmany. The memory of these olden practices is even now fading away; and, the Lammass or "Gooseberry Fair" of Clogher is at present the only remnant, to remind people of departed sports. The Blackwater flows, at the base of Knockmany.

<sup>47</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life thus relates the occurrence: When Maccaerthenn laboured to bring St. Patrick over, he sighed out, "Uch, uch," through weariness. "My debroth," said Patrick, "you were not accustomed to say that word." "I am old and infirm," exclaimed Mac Carthen, "and you have left all my early companions in churches, while I am still on the road." "I will then leave thee in a church," said Patrick, "that shall not be too near us for familiarity, and that shall not be too distant for intercourse between us."

<sup>48</sup> This, as we are told, was sent to St.

given to him, as a precious souvenir<sup>49</sup> of the Irish Apostle's fond remembrances. It is a highly ornamented reliquary,<sup>50</sup> enclosing Latin copies of the four Gospels;<sup>51</sup> and, even yet, it is preserved in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy, in Dublin. It is stated, traditionally, that Bishop Mac-Carthenn founded a monastery, before the chief's palace, at Clogher, when the royal family had been converted. Not many years ago, the walls of this foundation were supposed to be discovered, when a portion of the old cemetery was dug away, to make room for a more spacious thoroughfare, in that part of the town, known as Church Hill.<sup>52</sup>

Eochaid had a daughter, called Cinnia, or Cinnu,<sup>53</sup> and her father wished her to marry a man of noble family. This chieftain is called Cormac,<sup>54</sup> son of Cairpre Mac Neill. He also obtained the soubriquet of Cormac Caech. While she walked along, Cinnia met St. Patrick, with his companions, on the way. Patrick preached to her, that she might unite herself, to the spiritual prophet; and, she not only believed, but she furthermore resolved on embracing a religious life. Patrick instructed her, and baptized her afterwards. When her father subsequently sought to give her to the man of his choice, she and Patrick went to converse with him. Patrick requested that he would permit her to wed the Eternal Spouse. At last, Eochaidh agreed to this, on condition, that Heaven should be given to him in return, and that himself be not compelled, through any miracle, to be unwillingly baptized. Patrick then promised these two conditions; for, he had an intuition, that Providence must work out great results, in this case. The king afterwards consented, that his daughter Cinnu should be united to Christ, and thus Patrick regarded her, as one of his female disciples. The Irish Apostle then commanded a certain virgin to instruct her. This mistress, over the young novice, is called Cechtumbar<sup>55</sup> or Cethuberis,<sup>56</sup> of Druim-Dubhain,<sup>57</sup> in which place both virgins rest. This was a church beside Clocher. Cechtumbar is stated,<sup>58</sup> to have been the first of all the Irish virgins, who received the veil from St. Patrick. Perhaps, Cinnia may have been the person, to whom St. Patrick refers,<sup>59</sup> where he says, alluding to the conversions he had effected:

Patrick from Heaven, and while he was on the sea, coming over to Erinn.

<sup>49</sup> It has been described, by Dr. George Petrie, in the "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xviii.

<sup>50</sup> One of the figures, sculptured on it, is supposed to represent St. Mac Carthainn.

<sup>51</sup> Extracts have been made, from Dr. Petrie's account, in O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," lect. xv., pp. 322 to 327. A translation, from the Irish Tripartite Life of the passage relating to St. Mac Carthend, is there included.

<sup>52</sup> Scandalous to relate! the bones and ashes of the dead were not re-interred, in consecrated earth; but, when removed, they were used as surface dressing, for some surrounding fields. Thus, even the relics of St. Mac-Carthenn, and of his pious successors, may be mingled with the rich pastures, around the desecrated graveyard, where they had so long been deposited.

<sup>53</sup> Her feast occurs, at the 1st of February.

<sup>54</sup> He was the father of Tuathal Maelgarbh, who was King over Ireland for eleven years, and who was slain, in 538, by

Mael-mor, tutor of Diarmaid Mac Cearbhaill, who succeeded. The "Annals of Ulster" gives Tuathal's death at 543; those of Clonmacnois, at 547; but, Dr. O'Donovan, on the authority of Tighernach, says 544 is the true year. See "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 180 to 182, and n. (z.) With this agrees, also, the "Chronicon Scotorum."

<sup>55</sup> So is she called, in the Irish Tripartite Life; but, in the Latin version, the name is Cetamaria.

<sup>56</sup> Jocelyn, who thus calls her, says she was the first Irish virgin, that took the veil. This, the Monk of Furness repeats, where he gives her the name of Ethembria. Yet, where he got this information cannot be discovered.

<sup>57</sup> According to Colgan, she was interred in her own church, with many other holy virgins, and seven bishops.

<sup>58</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hibernie," i. Februarii. De S. Cinnia, sive Kinnia Virgine, cap. iv., and nn. 11, 12, p. 235.

<sup>59</sup> See "Confessio S. Patricii," cap. iv., num. 18. Father Joachimo Laurentio

"The sons of the Scoti, and the daughters of chieftains, appear now as monks and virgins of Christ. And, especially, one blessed Scottish lady, of noble birth, and of great beauty, who was an adult, and whom I baptized."

Altadaven,<sup>60</sup> one of the most charming retreats in Ireland, is situated in the parish of Errigle-Trough,<sup>61</sup> and barony of Clogher, about three miles south-east from this town. The glen itself extends, with irregular windings, nearly a mile from north to south; and, it is a scene of surpassing beauty. It is lined, on either side, by perpendicular walls of rocks, which vary in height, from one hundred feet, to even a greater altitude. In the valley below flows a stream, and its agitated waters run from Lough Mor, usually with a slender contingent of force, into the broad Blackwater. In former times, this secluded and romantic glen is traditionally held, to have been a seat of St. Patrick's Chair, Altadaven Glen.

Druidism. The people relate, that our great Apostle St. Patrick reached this spot, probably on some occasion, when he visited Clogher. He not only succeeded, it is said, in removing from here all traces of Druidic rites and superstition; but, he even converted this retreat, into a place of worship, for the true God. Here, surrounded by tangled underwood, is shown a rude altar formed of solid rock; and, in its middle, there is a portion marked out by deep carving, as if for the chalice. In front, its height is nearly four feet, while the altar-table measures not less than six feet in length, being in width more than two feet. In front of this altar, and on the Gospel side, is a Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., p. 202.

<sup>60</sup> It has been interpreted "the Glen of the Gods," or "the Glen of Demons;" but, the term, alt, more usually means "a cliff," or "glen-side," while oathán, "a young ox," or "bull," may more correctly account for the derivation.

<sup>61</sup> This parish is partly in the barony

Trough, and this portion is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Monaghan," Sheets 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6; and, a part is in the barony of Clogher, which is to be seen on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 59, 65. Altadaven is shown, on the latter Sheet.

<sup>62</sup> The accompanying sketch, drawn on the spot by the writer, was transferred to gigantic mass of solid stone,<sup>62</sup> called the chair of St. Patrick.<sup>63</sup> From the basement to the head, it measures not less than eight feet.<sup>64</sup> In the centre of a large block, some distance below the chair, there is a deeply-carved font, very elegantly moulded.<sup>65</sup> Although evidently not fed by any stream or fountain, the people there remark, that it has never been known to run dry of water. About half-way down the glen, a beautiful green sward, soft and smooth as a velvet carpet, opens on the view. Tall firs and forest trees stand around, in wavy branches, as a barrier against the outer scenery; while the blue heavens above form the only canopy. On the borders of this green sward, there is an icy-cold well of crystal clearness, and most agreeable to the taste. On every side, the surrounding scenery is majestic, and it forms no unstrained picture of a fairy-land; rocks, woods, precipices and ravines, in every conceivable shape and variety, reveal those enchanting delights, thrown out by nature's God, and with a lavish hand.

Intent still more on enlarging the bounds of God's spiritual fold, the great herald of salvation entered the territory of Hy-Meith,<sup>66</sup> or Hy-Meith-Tire,<sup>67</sup> to announce the Gospel to its chief and people. Eoghan,<sup>68</sup> or Owen, was the ruler, at this time, and he reverently received the messenger of Christ. He showed such great faith and confidence, as to beseech the wonder-working Patrick to resuscitate his grandfather, named Muiredach,<sup>69</sup> who had died a heathen, so that living once more, the deceased might receive eternal life. This was a truly sublime and charitable desire, and it pleased the holy man to assent. He prayed, and then raised Muredach to life. This pagan chief afterwards heard, from the Irish Apostle, the mysteries of Divine Faith; he was instructed and baptized; then did his soul once more the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>63</sup> This was pronounced to be a very silicious sandstone, of the Yoredale series, by Richard Joseph Cruise, Esq., M.R.I.A., and of the Geological Survey of Ireland, who accompanied the Rev. Daniel O'Connor, C.C., and the writer, on the occasion of an excursion here, and to Clogher, in June, 1878.

<sup>64</sup> "Though it presents to the eye the full shape and appearance of a high-backed chair, yet its form, and the measure of art displayed on it, tell us that in the age in which it was made, art was only in its swaddling clothes, and that science had as yet lent it but very feeble support."—"The Northern Star." Communication of Rev. Daniel O'Connor.

<sup>65</sup> In a communication, from William F. Wakeman, dated from Enniskillen, May, 1879, the writer is further informed, that on the lands of Lislane, not far from Clogher, in the direction of Aughentain, may be seen another St. Patrick's chair and a holy well. They are situated, in a most exquisitely beautiful wooded glen. The "chair" is simply a hollow recess, in the natural rock, and the well is a tiny spring, close to it.

<sup>66</sup> Thus is it called, in the Latin Tripartite Life of St. Patrick. There were two tribes, so distinguished, in the province of Oirghialla; the Ui Meith Macha, otherwise called the Ui Meith Tire, and the Ui Meith Mara. The Ui Meith Macha were so called, from their contiguity to Armagh, formerly denominated Macha, and the Ui Meith Tire, the same tribe, derived name from their inland situation, τῆς meaning "of or belonging to a country," because they seem to have lived chiefly in the inland county of Monaghan; while, probably, they were also located, on the south of the River Blackwater, and in the west of the county of Armagh. The Ui Meith Mara were so called, from μαρα, "of or belonging to the sea," because their country was a maritime one, and it extended from the former territory, into the county of Louth; while, probably, it included a part of the east and south of Armagh County. The name seems to be preserved, in the Anglicised name of "O'Meath," a district in the county of Louth, between Carlingford and Newry. Ui Meith Mara was apparently called, in more ancient times, Cualghne. See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. vii., sect. i., p. 51, and also John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (a), pp. 148 to 150.

<sup>67</sup> Such is the name it receives, in the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>68</sup> He was the son of Brian, son of Muiredach, son to Imchadh, son of Colla-focrich, according to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>69</sup> The Muiredach, grandson of Colla da Crich, here mentioned, was generally called Muiredach Meth, and from him the Ui-Meiths were designated.

escape the prison of the body, but this time it received the rewards of the just.<sup>70</sup> His friends buried him again, in a place, called the Erendé,<sup>71</sup> or Omna renne,<sup>72</sup> on the borders of Mughdorna and Ui-Meith; but, the locality belonged to the dition of Mughdorna. The people of Hy-Meth eagerly embraced the truths of Religion, so wondrously confirmed by these signs, and St. Patrick bestowed his special blessing on them, and on their chief. There our saint is said to have erected a church, at Teaghtalian, now known as Tehallan,<sup>73</sup> in the county of Monaghan. About three miles north-eastwards from the town of Monaghan,<sup>74</sup> and on the very summit of a beautiful hill, surrounding a most charming and fertile undulating tract of country,<sup>75</sup> is the old graveyard of Tehellan. It is evidently a very ancient foundation; and, at present, a Protestant church is within the enclosure. Close beside it, some grassy mounds cover the foundation walls of an earlier church.<sup>76</sup> This was a richly-endowed erection, in St. Patrick's time. There the Irish Apostle left relics, he had brought to Ireland, from beyond the sea; and, over it, St. Killian was appointed bishop.<sup>77</sup> While in this part of the country, a ridiculous legendary story is told of some thieves,<sup>78</sup> who were miraculously convicted of having stolen a goat,<sup>79</sup> belonging to the saint.<sup>80</sup> It seems probable, likewise, that the old church of Donagh<sup>81</sup> was within this territory, and <sup>70</sup> Jocelyn gives quite a different version of this narrative, to that recorded in the Tripartite Lives. By him, we are told, that the grandfather of the chief of Humes-tia—so does he render Hy-Meith—was called to life, to convince the Regulus, about the doctrine of the final bodily Resurrection, and as a test of God's power, in this matter. This, St. Patrick effected, at the tomb, before the chief and a multitude of his people. After signing it, with the Staff of Jesus, and causing the ground to be dug, he offered a prayer. Then arose the buried man, of immense size, and very fearful to behold. This great miracle caused all to believe in God's Providence. In an epistle, directed to a dear friend of his beyond the seas, it is said, St. Patrick deposed to such miraculous signs, in these terms: "Our Lord imparted to me, His unworthy little one, the virtue of working such signs among this Pagan people, so that never had the like been wrought even by the Apostles themselves. In the name of our Lord Jesus, I have raised from the dead bodies, turned into dust many years before. Notwithstanding, I pray that none esteem me for these, or other like miracles, as worthy to stand in comparison with the Apostles, or with any perfect men, considering I am a wretched sinner, and contemptible." Jocelyn calls special attention, to this great degree of St. Patrick's perfection; for, while working such wonders, he thought most humbly, regarding his own deserts. And the writer, too, even admires more this humility, than the saint's power of raising dead bodies to life.

<sup>71</sup> So is it written, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>72</sup> This is the name it has, in the Latin Tripartite Life. The writer of a note, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," states, it is probably the present Omra, or Oram, in the parish of Muckno, barony of Cremorne, and county of Monaghan. There is a large mound, with a circle of stones, on the top of a mountain, called Mulliyash. It borders on the county of Armagh, and it is called, in the Ulster Inquisitions, Owrarn-lisdonny.

<sup>73</sup> This parish, in the baronies of Cremorne and Monaghan, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Monaghan," Sheets 7, 9, 10.

<sup>74</sup> The parish of Monaghan, in the barony so called, is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Monaghan," Sheets 9, 10, 13, 14. The town itself is on Sheet 9.

<sup>75</sup> The writer, in company with the Rev. Daniel O'Connor, visited this place, in June, 1878.

<sup>76</sup> It was stated, by the sexton, that within the memory of persons living, some of the ruined walls, near the foundations, were to be seen. Old fragments of crosses have been found, beneath the surface.

<sup>77</sup> His feast occurs, on the 27th of May.

<sup>78</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life has it, that these were "ex gente de Hi Torrorra;" but, this is evidently a mistake for Ui-Meith-Tire, as found in the Irish version.

<sup>79</sup> See Richard Stanishurst, "De Vita S. Patricii, Hiberniæ Apostoli," lib. ii., pp. 62, 63.

<sup>80</sup> As a sequel to this legend, the Latin Tripartite adds: "Ad cujus miraculi augmentum et continuam memoriam accessit, quod imprecante Patricio tota posteritas istorum furum, velut auita hæreditate semper barbas, caprinis subsimiles, habeant."

<sup>81</sup> It lies near Glaslough. The parish of Donagh, in the barony of Trough, is on the tradition attributes its foundation to St. Patrick. Its ruins<sup>82</sup> stand on the top of a hill, within an old cemetery, and the view on every side is very beautiful, over an undulating country. It is evident, that in former times, a lake skirted the hill-side; and, its site is indicated, by a bog, at present. The church ruins measure 28 feet in length, by 25 in width, on the outside.<sup>83</sup> At some past time, additions and modernizations have been made, to serve for private burial enclosures. Several graves are seen, in the outer cemetery.

Donagh Old Church, County of Monaghan.

Thence, St. Patrick went into the district, called Mughorna,<sup>84</sup> or rather the Irish form of this territory was Crioich-Mughdhorna.<sup>85</sup> The word Crioich means a "nation," or "country," while the other denomination was derived, from Mughdorn Dubh.<sup>86</sup> In the time of St. Columba,<sup>87</sup> this district was co-extensive with the modern baronies of Cremorne, and of Farney,<sup>88</sup> in the county of Monaghan.<sup>89</sup> From an early date, the lords of Crioich Mughdhorna<sup>90</sup> are named, in the Irish Annals. The king of this district, also called Fearn-mhagh, or Farney, had a title to tribute.<sup>91</sup> When St. Patrick visited "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Monaghan," Sheets 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10. The townland proper is on Sheets 6, 7.

<sup>82</sup> The accompanying illustration has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, from a sketch, by the writer, in June, 1878, and the engraving is by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>83</sup> These measurements were taken, at the time, by the Rev. Daniel O'Connor, C.C., who accompanied the writer.

<sup>84</sup> So is it designated, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>85</sup> Colgan Latinized it into "regio Mughdornorum." The people, too, are called "Mughdorni."

<sup>86</sup> He was the son of Colla Mean, who fell in battle, A.D. 331. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 124, 125.

<sup>87</sup> His feast occurs, at the 9th of June.

<sup>88</sup> An interesting account of it will be found, in Evelyn Philip Shirley's Description of the ancient Dominion of Farney.

<sup>89</sup> Colgan, who is followed by Harris, and by other writers, makes Mughdorna the same as Mourne, in Down. See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. vii., p. 52. It is probable, that Mourne, also, was called Mughdorn, as Rev. Dr. Lanigan remarks, in his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. iii., n. 30, p. 270.

the Mughdorni, a chief, named Victor, presided over them; but, he felt an insuperable dislike to meet the glorious missionary, who had already reached the place, afterwards known as Domhnach-Maighen, now the parish of Donaghmoyné. When Victor,<sup>92</sup> who was in that place, heard that Patrick had come to it; during the night, he went away to avoid the saint, and fled from his residence, to a thorny brake, at the side of the town. This chief felt afraid, that if he appeared in the saint's presence, he should be forced by the bright evidence of doctrine, and by signs, to renounce idolatry. Darkness fell on the land, but God's servant illuminated the darkness. Coming to that place, where Victor was, a bright and subtle light issued from the saint. The splendour thereof pierced even to that secret place, where Victor was lurking. This miraculous portent was intended, to remove from his eyes the scales of sin. Thus, too, St. Patrick became as a light shining in darkness,<sup>93</sup> and this wonderful call of Divine Grace exerted an extraordinary influence, over the reason and feelings of Victor. A complete change took possession of his soul. Bowing with humble submission, to the decrees of Heaven, in his regard, the converted man desired most earnestly to be regenerated, in the saving waters of baptism. Then truly was he deserving the name of Victor, for he had accomplished the most difficult task, of having overcome his former deep-rooted prejudices. St. Patrick most cheerfully assented to his pious entreaties, and he became a Christian. Not that alone, but all the members of his household and his people were instructed in the faith, and thus regenerated. So fervent did Victor become, that he willingly made an offer of all his lands and possessions to the Irish Apostle, so that a church might there be built and endowed. At present, Donaghmoyné Protestant church<sup>94</sup> and cemetery<sup>95</sup> stand on the summit of a round hill, about two miles northwards from the charming little town of Carrickmacross.<sup>96</sup> Its physical position, in ancient times, was almost insular.<sup>97</sup> In the centre and highest part of the graveyard, some remains of the old church may be discerned; yet, no part of the walls can be seen.<sup>98</sup> It was an oblong building, and running from east to west; the measurements being, about 49 feet long by 23 feet wide, in the inside. The present thickness of the debris of side-wall is about 8 feet.<sup>99</sup> The churchyard<sup>100</sup> is surrounded by trees of ash and beech,

<sup>92</sup> The Mughdornians are regarded, as the descendants of Colla Meann, according to the "Book of Lecan." See Shirley's "History of the County of Monaghan," chap. i., pp. 3 to 11.

<sup>93</sup> See Dr. John O'Donovan's edition of "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," pp. 152, 153.

<sup>94</sup> Victor's name—not being Irish—fails to appear in our native Calendars. But, its Irish form, Buadhbeo, may lead to the discovery. A saint bearing this latter name is venerated, on the 17th of November. Colgan, however, has chosen to give the Acts of the present holy man, at the 28th of February.

<sup>95</sup> St. John, i. 5.

<sup>96</sup> Built in 1827.

<sup>97</sup> No monuments, in the cemetery, have an earlier date than the beginning of the last century.

<sup>98</sup> It is in the parish of Magheross and barony of Farney. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Monaghan," Sheet 31.

<sup>97</sup> West of it lies the dried-up bed of a lake, and north of it, there was another lake, not quite so well drained off, yet the site and outlines are quite visible.

<sup>98</sup> The accompanying sketch, taken on the spot, in February, 1879, by William F. Wakeman, and transferred to the wood, has been engraved by Mrs. Millard. In the foreground is the old church site, and immediately west of it, there is an enclosed tomb, with yew trees growing within the space. This is the burial-place of a local Catholic family, named Kernan, and they were relatives to the late Most Rev. Edward Kernan, Catholic Bishop of Clogher.

<sup>99</sup> It is stated, that a Protestant church had been built, on this site, probably subsequent to the Insurrection of 1641. See Evelyn Philip Shirley's "Some Account of the Territory or Dominion of Farney," chap. vii., p. 160. Yet, it seems equally probable, that it was on the site of the original church, founded by St. Patrick, and presided over by Victor.

<sup>100</sup> There is a beautiful Celtic cross of which in summer completely shut out the view; except towards the west, where the scene is by far the most extensive.<sup>101</sup> The churchyard is surrounded, by a modern wall, and it is approached, by a suitable entrance.<sup>102</sup> The ancient church-site of Donaghmoyne<sup>103</sup> is surrounded by steep, round hills of rich pasture and tillage land, clothed in many parts with modern plantations.<sup>104</sup> Here, most humbly did the good man place himself as a disciple, under St. Patrick, and profited so much by his instruction and training, that the novice soon was remarkable for great holiness and wisdom. In due process of time, Victor attained to such learning, and sanctity, that he was made a bishop. He is said to have ruled over a church, which had been built, by St. Patrick, within his former territory. The pious Bishop Victor well discharged the duties of his episcopal office. During this mission, the people of Mughdorna were converted by, and obedient to, St. Patrick. So pleased was the saint with these new converts, that he predicted, many warlike and distinguished chiefs, as also venerable prelates in the clerical profession, should white marble with design of interlacing closely resembling, if not actually copied from, the Cross of St. Muiredach, at Monasterboice. This cross is a monument, erected to the memory of the notorious William Stewart Trench, agent to the Marquis of Bath. Besides being an exterminating land-agent, he was a calumniator of the people of Farney, in his work, "The Realities of Irish Life." He died 4th August, 1872. The monument was made by Harrison of Dublin.

Donaghmoyne Church and Graveyard, County Monaghan.

<sup>101</sup> However, on no side can the eye reach beyond the borders of historic Farney.

<sup>102</sup> The churchyard is used as a burial-place by Protestants and Catholics alike, but principally by Catholics, and it is strewn with tombs and crosses of great variety.

<sup>103</sup> About half a mile, north-west of Donaghmoyne, lies the hill, on which stood Manning's Castle. This may be seen described and sketched, in Shirley's "Some Account of the Territory or Dominion of Farney," chap. vii.

<sup>104</sup> For most of the foregoing description of Donaghmoyne, the writer feels indebted, to the Rev. Daniel O'Connor, C.C., Corcahan, in a letter dated Monaghan, March 1st, 1879. He accompanied Mr. Wakeman to the spot, and insisted on defraying the expenses, in connection with the illustration. This, however, forms only a small part of the obligations, he has imposed so kindly, on the writer's grateful remembrance.

belong to their race.<sup>105</sup> He also imparted a special blessing.<sup>106</sup> Among the Mughdorni, St. Patrick's mission and preaching proved to be eminently successful.

Afterwards, Patrick went to the Fera-Ros,<sup>107</sup> who lived in Crich Rois,<sup>108</sup> a territory, not well defined, which lay, however, in the south of the County of Monaghan.<sup>109</sup> He advanced to Enach Conglais,<sup>110</sup> where he remained for a Sunday. While there, the Ui-Lilaigh<sup>111</sup> are stated to have given St. Patrick poisoned cheeses; but, knowing their intent, he made a sign of the cross over these, and immediately they were converted into stones. This miracle was a subject for great admiration to many present, and of confusion to the plotters against his life. His enemies were still actuated by malice, and he therefore wished to leave their district, so that he might go into another region. While Patrick travelled on Monday, across the ford of a certain river, southwards, the Ui-Lilaigh went with fifty horsemen,<sup>112</sup> to watch the ford,<sup>113</sup> and to slay him. Patrick then turned towards them, upon the banks, and to the south of the ford, when he raised his left hand, and said: "You shall neither come out of the ford here, nor go the other way; but, you shall be in that water, for ever." All were drowned, in that river, as he had declared, nor could their bodies be recovered, afterwards, although a diligent search had been made for them. Near Enach Conglais was shown a rock, or stones,<sup>113</sup> at the ford, where this miracle took place; and, its memory was preserved, in the name Ath-Hiliolaigh, or "the ford of the Ui-Lilaigh," which was given to the spot,<sup>114</sup> by those who bore the incident in remembrance.

CHAPTER XVII.

ST. PATRICK REVISITS MEATH—THE HYMN OF ST. SECUNDINUS—ST. PATRICK IS SAID TO HAVE PASSED FROM MEATH TOWARDS DUBLIN—HE VISITS NAAS—MIRACLES RECORDED, IN CONNEXION WITH BOTH PLACES—HIS JOURNEYS TO HY-GARCHON, AND THROUGH MAGH LIFFE—CHURCHES SAID TO HAVE BEEN FOUNDED BY HIM, IN THE PRESENT COUNTY OF KILDARE.

A SECOND time was the important province of Meath blessed, through the ministrations of St. Patrick. He entered by its northern parts,<sup>1</sup> and his first

<sup>105</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. iii., cap. xii., p. 151.

<sup>106</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. cxxxix., p. 95.

<sup>107</sup> The parish of Machaire Ros, or Magheross, and its town Carrickmacross, lie within their ancient district.

<sup>108</sup> It contained the church of Eanach-Conglais.

<sup>109</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (m), pp. 154, 155.

<sup>110</sup> Colgan says, it was Kill-eanagh (Killaney) in his day, and that it was a parochial church of the diocese of Clogher, in Orgiell. The parish, so called, extends into the counties of Monaghan and Louth, and the ruins of the old church are in the latter county, on the borders of the former.

<sup>111</sup> This name is now obsolete, nor is the tribe-name mentioned, by O'Dugan or O'Heerin, in their Topographical Poems.

<sup>112</sup> It was evidently a ford, on the River

Lagan, in some part of the parish of Killaney, on the borders of Monaghan and Louth.

<sup>113</sup> The Fourth Life of St. Patrick states, that St. Patrick's persecutors were turned into these submerged stones, which might be seen, by those walking near the place. See cap. lxxiv., p. 44.

<sup>114</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxx., lxxi., pp. 26, 27, and nn. 62, 63, p. 32. Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxii., lxxiii., lxxiv., p. 44, and nn. 49, 50, p. 49. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxix., p. 83, cap. lxxxii., p. 84, cap. xci., xciv., xcv., pp. 86, 87, cap. cxix., p. 92, cap. cxxxix., cxliii., pp. 95, 96, cap. cxlviii., p. 97, and nn. 79, 80, 81, 82, 87, 101, 105, 147, 152, pp. 112 to 115. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. i., ii., iii., iv., v., vi., vii., ix., x., xi., xii., xiii., pp. 149 to 151, and nn. 1 to 22, p. 184. Also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," pp. 450 to 457, with accompanying notes.

visit was paid to the castle at Rath-Cuile.<sup>2</sup> The people of the territory surrounding it were known as the Fera Cuil,<sup>3</sup> which territory was in Bregia ;<sup>4</sup> and, it appears to have been conterminous, with the present barony of Kells, in the county of Meath. Near them lived the Hy-Segain, a people situated to the north of Ardraccan, in the same county. Thus, both tribes appear to have taken in both the baronies—Upper and Lower—of Kells. Here, the Apostle refreshed their souls, with his heavenly counsels and doctrine, while the inhabitants responded to the graces afforded them, nor did their great missionary leave them, until he had imparted a very cordial benediction. Soon after this, he arrived at Bile-tortan,<sup>5</sup> near Ardraccan,<sup>6</sup> where he is said to have founded a church, which afterwards was called Domnach-tortan.<sup>7</sup> We are told,<sup>8</sup> if it is the same as Donaghmore, near Navan,<sup>9</sup> but such statement seems not well established. Over the place, called Domnach Tortan, St. Patrick appointed a priest, named Justin,<sup>10</sup> as its pastor, and he was a disciple of the holy missionary. From that quarter, Patrick went into the land of the Monarch Laogaire.<sup>11</sup> There, he measured out the foundations, for a church, which, in after time, was called Domnach Urchaile.<sup>12</sup> There, likewise, it is said, he remained for one night.

Among St. Patrick's disciples was the venerable Secundin,<sup>13</sup> or Seachnall.<sup>14</sup> As some of our Apostle's disciples discoursed together, regarding his gifts and virtues, one of them said, Patrick was the holiest man, left breathing upon the face of this earth. To whom Secundinus answered, "Truly, he had been CHAPTER XVII.—<sup>1</sup> Jocelyn states, that St. Patrick entered the plain of Bregh, by passing over the mountain, called Ficoth ; but, Colgan asserts, this is an error for Fuoit, or Fuaid, a mountain of Southern Ulster. This range of Sliabh Fuaid is now called the Fews Mountains, nearly in the centre of Armagh County. See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. iv., p. 167.

<sup>2</sup> There are several places, named Rath-coole, in Ireland. Perhaps, the place now called Cool, in the parish of Kilmainham Wood, was identical with this fort. It adjoins Moybolgue : lies to the south-west, in the barony of Lower Kells. Or it may have been Rathcoole, a townland in the parish of Dromin, and barony of Ardee, described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Louth," Sheets 17, 18.

<sup>3</sup> It was also called Fera-Cul-Breagh.

<sup>4</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (p), p. 297.

<sup>5</sup> This was its name, in pagan times. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Geart, or Book of Rights," n. (b), p. 151.

<sup>6</sup> The Irish Life remarks, it was near the community of Ard-Breccan ; but, this has reference to the monastic institution here, at a later period.

<sup>7</sup> The Ui-Dortain or Tortain were the descendants of Tortain, son of Fiach, son to Feidhlem, son of Fiachra, son to Colla da Crioch. These were seated, in that part of Meath, known as Oirghialla, in which was the celebrated old tree, called Bile-Tortan. It stood near Ardraccan.

<sup>8</sup> By Archdall, who has changed this church into a monastery, which was called, as he says, Bile-tortan. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 529.

<sup>9</sup> Colgan, to whom Archdall refers, does not say so. The parish of Navan, in the barony of Lower Navan, is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 25, 31. The town is on Sheet 25.

<sup>10</sup> In Tirechan's list of St. Patrick's disciples, there is a Justianus ; but, it is not possible to state, that he was identical with the present rector.

<sup>11</sup> Crioch-Leoghaire, "the country of Leoghaire," or the Ui-Leoghaire, "the posterity of Leoghaire," was in Southern Meath, near the banks of the River Boyne, and it extended around Tara, according to Colgan.

<sup>12</sup> Dr. O'Donovan, referring to a place, called Druin Urchaile, renders this name, the "Ridge of the Greenwood." He conjectures, that it might be Cnoc-Urchoille, or Spaniel Hill, in the county of Clare. See "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i. At A.D. 837, these authorities record the death of Domhnall, son of Aedh, its abbot. See pp. 456, 457, and n. (q). To us, it seems more probable, that it was a place, identical with Domnach Urchaile, which was undoubtedly in Meath, and perhaps, at a subsequent time to that of St. Patrick, it became the seat of a monastery.

<sup>13</sup> At the 27th day of November, his festival was kept.

<sup>14</sup> He is otherwise called, Seachnall Mac Ua Baird. He was the nephew of St. Patrick, and son of Darerca, according to some accounts ; others say, he was the son of Liamhain, another of St. Patrick's sisters.

most holy, had he not been endued with less fraternal charity, than behoved him." This coming to Patrick's hearing, through his disciples, the saint asked Secundinus, what moved him to utter such a personal censure. Secundin answered, "Because you accept not those means for living, and those rich presents, that are offered to you, and with which you might maintain great multitudes of holy men." To whom St. Patrick replied, "Charity obliges me, not to accept of such great charity; for, if I did accept of what would be given to me, I should leave not so much as a pasture for two horses, on behalf of those saints, who shall live after us." Secundinus then repented, that he had spoken those words, and he asked St. Patrick's pardon. With the Apostle's and Master's usual benignity, his disciple was easily reassured and forgiven.<sup>15</sup> The return of Patrick, to the scenes of his earlier labours in Meath, has been assigned, to the beginning of A.D. 443.<sup>16</sup> Then, too, he is thought to have founded many of his churches there, and to have left Bishop Secundin, at Domnach-Sechnall,<sup>17</sup> at present known as Dunshaughlin. This is said to have been a corruption of the former name; but, it may rather be interpreted, "the fort of Seachnall," as having been the site for his residence.<sup>18</sup> The aforesaid Secundinus, being a man of great learning and wisdom, signified to St. Patrick, that he desired to compose a hymn, in honour of a saint, who yet was living. But, because it was Patrick himself that he meant, Secundin concealed that saint's name. The glorious bishop answered, "It is just and reasonable, that people display the virtues of the saints, and that the Church should declare their praises,<sup>19</sup> which yet is more securely done after their death, when all occasion for sinning is removed. Praise thou, therefore, the clearness of the day, but not until the evening cometh; the courage of the soldier, but not until he has triumphed; the fortune of the sailor, but not until he hath landed, for the Scripture saith, thou shalt praise no man in his lifetime.<sup>20</sup> Yet, if you will put in execution what you intend, do it quickly; for, lo! death is at the door. Of all the bishops that are in Ireland, you are the first that shall depart this life." Secundinus composed the hymn,<sup>21</sup> in Latin, and within a few days afterwards, he died at Domnachseachluin, his episcopal city. He showed by frequent miracles, that he reigns with Christ. There was his body deposited, and he was the first of the Irish bishops, buried in Irish soil.<sup>22</sup> His hymn, too, many of the islanders were daily wont to sing,<sup>23</sup> and from its repetition they affirm, different and great wonders have happened.<sup>24</sup> Among various other favours, it obtained protection for many persons, against the designs of their enemies.<sup>25</sup>

<sup>15</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. clxxvi., p. 104.

<sup>16</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. iv., p. 271. Other accounts place it, at an earlier period.

<sup>17</sup> This designation has been interpreted as the Dominica, or church of Sechnall, it being called after this saint.

<sup>18</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 826, and Ware's "Opuscula S. Patricii," p. 150.

<sup>19</sup> Ecclesiasticus, xlv. 15.

<sup>20</sup> See Ecclesiasticus, xi. 30.

<sup>21</sup> It has been published by Colgan, and to it is prefixed, a "Prefatio Veteris Anonymi," giving substantially the legend or history of its composition, as found in the text. See "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. iii., pp.

211, 212. This Hymn in praise of St. Patrick, and beginning with "Audite omnes amantes," &c., is found in the Manuscript, classed 23, N. 15, at p. 79. This is in the Betham Collection of the Royal Irish Academy.

<sup>22</sup> See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. iii., cap. lxxxix., p. 165, and n. 115, p. 188.

<sup>23</sup> This testimony of Jocelyn gives us to understand, how very general was the knowledge of the Latin language, in Ireland, during his time, and previous periods; while, it indicates, moreover, how great was the devotion entertained for the great Irish Apostle.

<sup>24</sup> It seems to have been a recognised practice, among the most celebrated Irish saints, to recite this Hymn, which was a favourite and privileged devotion. This is mentioned, in the Life of St. Coemgen,

The year for the death of Secundin is said to have been 447, and the day fell on the 27th of November.<sup>26</sup> He is thought, by some, to have presided, over the See of Armagh ; but, this idea seems inconsistent, with the recorded Acts of St. Patrick, and with what we can infer, from other accounts. Nor do we find, that the See of Armagh had any existence, at this early time ; so that Seachnall must have been dead, before its foundation had been accomplished, by the Irish Apostle. However, as Secundin has been called Patrick's Vicar and Suffragan, while the Irish Apostle went on a visit to Rome ;<sup>27</sup> this might account for a received opinion, that the disciple had replaced his master, at Armagh, during the time of his presumed absence from Ireland. Yet, probably, the real explanation is to be found, in the circumstance, that before departing for the more southern districts of Ireland, St. Patrick had entrusted Sechnall with a very extensive jurisdiction, in the northern districts, and among others, over that tract, which afterwards belonged to the See of Armagh.<sup>28</sup> About this period, likewise, the Irish Apostle is said to have visited the country about Slane, to inspect the state of the congregations there formed, at the opening of his mission.

Old Church Ruins at Finglas, County of Dublin.

chapters xxiii. and xlviii., in the Life of St. Colman Ela, chapter xxv., and in the Life of St. Cannech, chapter xliii.

<sup>25</sup> Jocelyn adds, that those lying in wait for the protected were struck with that kind of blindness, "quam Acrisiam nuncupant Phisici." See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. clxxvii., p. 104. These accounts appear, in a more detailed form, in the Tripartite Life. See "Septima Vita S. Patricii," lib. iii., cap. lxxxix., xc., xci., pp. 165, 166.

<sup>26</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 134, 135, and n. (r).

<sup>27</sup> Rev. Dr. Lanigan asserts, that St. Patrick did not go to that city, after he had really engaged on the work of the Irish mission.

<sup>28</sup> Such is the very ingenious supposition of Rev. Dr. Lanigan, in his "Ecclesiastical

No wonder that the great actions of St. Patrick should be greatly magnified and even exaggerated, by the people, on whom he conferred such inestimable blessings; and, yet, it is to be lamented, that pure inventions should usurp the place of authentic biography, in reference to him. Thus, Jocelyn, probably alluding to a legend, current in his time, especially relates, that St. Patrick came in his journey, from Meath, so far as Finglas,<sup>29</sup>—where was a stream—to a hill, which is distant a mile from Dublin. At Finglas, there was an ancient church, and an old cemetery. There, too, the learned and distinguished ecclesiastical historian of Ireland, Rev. John Lanigan, D.D., lies interred, under a graceful Celtic cross.<sup>30</sup> When St. Patrick was there, Dublin is said to have been but a little village. Jocelyn remarks, that in after times, it underwent various changes of fortune, having been mainly inhabited by Norwegians, and by people from the Islands,<sup>31</sup> sometimes in alliance with, and sometimes opposed to, the kings of Ireland. We are told, that when the glorious bishop, St. Patrick, came near to the famous city of Dublin, he found it lying in the slough of paganism and idolatry. While contemplating it, from the hill alluded to, he blessed the territory around it. Dr. Lanigan remarks, parenthetically, but without attaching any credit to this account, that St. Patrick must be supposed, in such hypothesis, to have stood on that high ground, not far from the present Royal Canal.<sup>32</sup> We are told, he prophetically broke forth into these words: "That village, which now is very small, shall hereafter become very eminent. It shall be enlarged in riches and dignity. Neither shall it cease to grow, until such time as it will become the principal seat of all the kingdom."<sup>33</sup> The inhabitants of Dublin, hearing what great miracles and signs God had wrought, through his faithful servant, Patrick, went forth with great joy to meet him. The king of that place, it is said, had an only son, who lay sick, and who was even near to his death. Being entreated by his father, and by all the assembly, St. Patrick went to the place, where this sick son was, and fell upon his knees. Through prayer, he restored the child to perfect health. The people, on seeing this miracle, believed in the Author of Life, our Saviour Jesus, and they were baptized in his name. At this time, it is said, Alpinus was the king over Dublin. He and all the citizens were in sorrow and anguish, for the death of two cherished hopes of his principality. The king's only son, called Eochadh,<sup>34</sup> had died a natural death, in his bedroom. The king's daughter, and a sister to the young prince, had just been drowned, in the adjoining river, now known as the Liffey. Into its depths, she had ventured, for the purpose of bathing. Her name is stated to have been Dublinia, and from her Dublin is thought to have derived its name.<sup>35</sup> The young lady's body was drawn out of the waters, after

History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. iv., and nn. 36, 37, pp. 271, 272.

<sup>29</sup> A monastic institution, and an ancient Bishop's See, seem to have distinguished Finglas, in the early part of the eighth century.

<sup>30</sup> It was designed by his friend, the late George Petrie, LL.D. It is accurately figured in the foreground of the accompanying engraving, as shown by the artist. On reverse panels, inscriptions in the Irish language and character, and also in the Latin tongue, are to be found. The sketch here presented was taken on the spot, in 1872, and it was engraved, by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>31</sup> Colgan has a long note, on this passage of Jocelyn, in which he thinks certain historical contradictions are to be found. He refers the commercial importance of Dublin, to as early a period as that of Conn of the Hundred Battles, whose reign began A.D. 123.

<sup>32</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. v., n. 39, p. 275.

<sup>33</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. lxi., p. 90.

<sup>34</sup> Such was the name, borne by this son, according to the Antwerp copy of Jocelyn, but Cochadh, according to the Parisian one. See Colgan, n. 70, p. 112.

<sup>35</sup> This etymology of Jocelyn, for Dublin, is denied by Colgan, who states, that it

some considerable search,<sup>36</sup> and laid by her brother's corpse, in order that their obsequies might be solemnized together. According to the superstition of the pagans, the tombs were prepared. In the meantime, news was spread over all the city, that St. Patrick, the potent reviver of many dead persons, had been seen in the town. For, he, who burst asunder the gates of death and of hell, smoothed the path for his servant. The king and the people, who erewhile had said unto the Lord, "depart from us, we will not the knowledge of thy ways,"<sup>37</sup> were so cast down, saddened with weeping, and with lamentation, that all memory of their wonted fierceness, all their barbarous rudeness, and all the pride of their idolatry, were utterly subdued. The king, hearing of St. Patrick's arrival, greatly rejoiced, and caused him to come in, where his two children lay dead. He then promised, with all those present, if God restored his children to life, that he and the citizens would become Christians. Foreseeing such a gain of souls, in the sight of the king, his nobles, and all the commonalty, St. Patrick raised from death to life those princely children, whose corporal resurrection co-operated much towards the spiritual resurrection of their father, with the rest of his people. The king and all his subjects, being astonished at this great miracle, abjured the worship of idols, and they were baptized in St. Patrick's Well. At the time, this spring was close to the city. Near it, a church was afterwards built, and this became the resort of many pilgrims.<sup>38</sup> The famed Saint Patrick's comes from Dubh-linn, or "the black deeps." See n. 71, p. 112.

St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin.

<sup>36</sup> Jocelyn says, that some of the people entered the river, to find the body, and without taking off their garments. Others with incredible agility plunged into the deepest parts, while others searched near the sea, lest the corpse might be carried out thither, by the tide. Others again, getting into a vessel, used a golden buckler, to help them in peering through the deep water; where, at length, they found the royal maiden, lying among the sands, and seeming to be as if in a sleep.

<sup>37</sup> Job xxi. 14.

<sup>38</sup> Thus, Gregory, King of Scotland, is said to have made a solemn pilgrimage to this church, about the year 890. See Hector Boethius' "Scotorum Historia," lib. x., fol. 220.

Cathedral,<sup>39</sup> at present forming one of the principal objects of architectural interest,<sup>40</sup> in Dublin, is said to have displaced the original structure.<sup>41</sup> Jocelyn tells us, likewise, that St. Patrick built another mansion, near the church of the Holy Trinity,<sup>42</sup> and in the city, westwards from the Archbishop's palace.<sup>43</sup> From that day forward, King Alphinus,<sup>44</sup> and all the citizens of Dublin, obliged themselves, as also their posterity, by a vow, to the service of Saint Patrick, and to that of the Primates of Armagh. Moreover, as a perpetual gage of their service, they ordained, that every company of tradesmen should pay a yearly annuity to its Primate.<sup>45</sup> The king and the princes offered a talent of pure and refined gold to the saint, while the people gave what they could afford. All of their liberal gifts, the true professor of poverty, Patrick, bestowed upon the poor, reserving only a part, which he kept solely for the building of churches.<sup>46</sup> Our glorious bishop, according to Jocelyn, gave his benediction to the people of Dublin.<sup>47</sup> He blessed them with the blessing of Jacob, the patriarch, and of Moses, the servant of God, prophesying, and praying, if their deeds agreed with their words, that they might be unconquered and fortunate, but weak and unhappy, if ever they falsified their vows.<sup>48</sup> We are told, the saint washed Dublinia,<sup>49</sup> or Dublin, with the pure waters of evangelical

<sup>39</sup> A fine copper-plate engraving of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, with an engraved ground plan, drawn in 1790, by James Gandon, the celebrated architect, appears in Grose's "Antiquities of Ireland," with a history and description. See vol. i., pp. 1 to 5.

<sup>40</sup> The accompanying engraving is from a photograph of Frederick H. Mares, drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>41</sup> A very complete account of it will be found, in William Monck Mason's "History and Antiquities of the Collegiate and Cathedral Church of St. Patrick," Dublin, 1819, Roy. 4to, with interior and exterior illustrations, taken before the late restorations.

<sup>42</sup> In Walter Harris' posthumous work, "The History and Antiquities of the City of Dublin, from the earliest accounts," we find an engraving of the north prospect of the Cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity in Dublin, as it stood in 1766, with a succeeding historical sketch of this building. See Appendix, sect. i., pp. 371 to 376. An engraving, by T. Ranson, presenting a south prospect, and from a drawing by George Petrie, with a much fuller account, will be found in Rev. G. N. Wright's "Historical Guide to Ancient and Modern Dublin," pp. 107 to 128. The late restorations have effaced many of those architectural features presented.

<sup>43</sup> It is certain, that in the time of Jocelyn, the Archbishop's palace stood due west of the ancient Christ's Church Cathedral, and on the site of the present Protestant Synod Hall. There St. Laurence O'Toole lived, and his domestic chapel of St. Michael, the Archangel, was the original of the subsequent St. Michael's parochial church, which, with its surrounding graveyard and large piles of human remains, we have seen, in our time, completely removed.

<sup>44</sup> Neither Ath-Cliath, nor Dublin, nor King Alphin, are once mentioned in the Lives of St. Patrick—Jocelyn alone excepted—as Dr. Lanigan remarks, and he does not think the fables here recorded, to be worth the trouble of refutation.

<sup>45</sup> According to Jocelyn, every merchant ship was required to furnish a good-sized cask of wine, or honey, a hook of iron, or a measure of salt; from every tavern a vessel of mead or of ale, and from every shop a gift of shoes, or gloves, or knives, or combs, with many gifts of a similar kind.

<sup>46</sup> Ussher, at A.D. 448, and Harris, have referred to some of the foregoing legends. See "Primordia," cap. xvii. et seq. Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 20. The Rev. Dr. Lanigan thinks those stories were fabricated at Armagh, and that Jocelyn may have been induced to insert them, in his Life of St. Patrick, as a compliment to his patron, the Archbishop Thomas, or that some other hand may have foisted them into his Manuscript.

<sup>47</sup> In the Book of Lecan, belonging to the Royal Irish Academy, there is an Irish poem, on the Benediction bestowed on Dublin, by St. Patrick, fol. 191, a. b., line 40. In another Manuscript, belonging to the same collection, there is another poem, on St. Patrick's Visit to Dublin. This Manuscript is classified 23. E. 26. See p. 233.

<sup>48</sup> As Jocelyn remarks, this plainly was proved, when the Dublin people, becoming proud and regardless of the blessing of the saint, neglected to pay their appointed tribute to Armagh.

<sup>49</sup> A "History of the City of Dublin, from the earliest accounts to the present time; containing its Annals, Antiquities, Ecclesiastical History, and Charters; its present extent, public buildings, schools, institutions, &c., to which are added, Biographical doctrine. This he effected, with greater facility, by reason of a memorable event, that happened, while he was there preaching the Gospel.

At this time, the River Liffey, while the tide rushed up its current, afforded nothing but salt water, to the few people, then living in Dublin. When the tide happened to be out, then only, it is intimated, the water was sweet and drinkable. But, in that village, an honest matron, in whose house the saint lodged, complained to him, regarding this want of fresh water. The blessed bishop, taking pity on her, as also on the whole multitude, so lately regenerated, and that he might excite their thirst after the fountains of life, deemed it expedient, to manifest the Divine virtue and power. Next day, in the presence of many, he went to a commodious place. There, striking the earth with the end of the Staff of Jesus, and praying, he produced a fine well, which sparkled clearly from its source, full of sweet and pleasant water.<sup>50</sup> It also served, in curing many diseases. This spring, in after times, was called St. Patrick's Well.<sup>51</sup> It has been thought probable, that an old church of St. Patrick, "in insula,"—so called from its insular situation, in Dublin, on the River Poddle<sup>52</sup>—reached back to the Apostle's time. This was a parochial church, which had existence, in the twelfth century.<sup>53</sup>

Taking his leave of Dublin, St. Patrick went to a town, called Cnoc,<sup>54</sup> where he sent for one named Murinus, a man of Belial. He would not, in anywise, present himself before the saint, whose persuasive eloquence and holy influence, he deemed able to conquer the hardest heart. This man caused answer to be made, that the saint should suffer him to sleep, in his place of retirement. Knowing by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, that he was a child of perdition, then said Patrick: "Let him sleep, let him sleep, and before the general day of judgment, let him not awake nor arise." After this, the saint hastened on his journey. The wicked wretch died, and it proved a double death, both spiritually and corporally.<sup>55</sup>

* Notices of Eminent Men, and copious Appendices of its Population, Revenue, Commerce and Literature," has been published in London, A.D. 1818, in two large 4to volumes. It is illustrated, with numerous Plates, Plans and Maps. The most modern and researchful "History of the City of Dublin," by J. T. Gilbert, in three 8vo volumes, appeared from 1854 to 1859; and, this history gives most minutely the account of various public and private buildings, streets, and matters of general interest. In reference to the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, or Christ Church, the enquirer should consult vol. i., chap. iii., pp. 98 to 132.

<sup>50</sup> See Jocelyn's or "Sexta Vita S. Patrickii," cap. lxix., p. 90.

<sup>51</sup> Tradition still points to a remarkable spring of water, now covered over by St. Patrick's Cathedral, in Dublin, as being identical with this miraculous well. Primate Ussher determines its site, to have been in the North Close, not far from the steeple, "inter, privatas ædes inclusum nuperrime et obstructum." — "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 449. In a document of 1509, the house of the Prebendary of Howth is described as situated, near the well of St. Patrick. Another authority states, that it was in the outer court of the cloister of the Archdeacon of Glendalough and opposite to the north transept. There was another St. Patrick's well, situated south of Nassau-street, in Dublin; and, behind a house, No. 15, in that street, formerly called St. Patrick's Well Lane, was a spring, dried up about the year 1729, and supposed to have been the original well. See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. vii., p. 137.

<sup>52</sup> The course of this stream, rising near Drimnagh, is now under cover along the Coombe, and to its junction with the Liffey.

<sup>53</sup> It may have been a monastic church, at an earlier period, as Abbots and Bishops of Dublin are mentioned, before the Danish settlement. See John D'Alton's "Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin," pp. 16 to 26.

<sup>54</sup> It was anciently said to have been called Cnua, where a battle was fought, during the bardic period, A.M. 3579, by Conmael, son of Emir. In A.D. 220, it is said, Cumhal, the father of Fin Mac Cumhal, was slain here by Goll Mac Morna. Here is a pagan tumulus and an ancient castle. This place is known, at present, as Castleknock, near the Phoenix Park, Dublin. It is evident, that Jocelyn has confounded the story, related in the text, with one told about St. Patrick, at Naas. Or, perhaps, by Cnoc, which means Passing through Meath, as we are told, St. Patrick came into Leinster. In all places, he preached the Gospel, and the Kingdom of Heaven ; and, in suitable places, or when convenience urged, he ordained bishops. It would be utterly impossible, to set down the stupendous miracles, which, as tradition has it, he wrought in the course of those journeys. Like another St. Peter, the very shadow of his body produced miraculous cures. Many he received to baptism, knowing that their adversary would labour to entangle them in his snares, and he endeavoured to procure for them confirmation in faith. Fearing their relapse into infidelity, the Apostle was anxious to gratify their instant and pious wishes. Popular traditions, as well as documentary accounts, seem to indicate, that St. Patrick took a course, nearly due south from Tara towards Naas, which was then the court of the northern Leinster kings. This is evidently the truth, as appears from the whole tenor of his history.<sup>56</sup>

A suggestion has been offered,<sup>57</sup> that Donnaghmore,<sup>58</sup> on the borders of Meath and Dublin, may have had some connexion, with this his southern journey. Again, not far from Straffan,<sup>59</sup> and about three miles west from Celbridge,<sup>60</sup> in the county of Kildare, there is a very curious stone-roofed cell, but of dubious antiquity. This is now called St. Patrick's house. On the exterior, it is about 24 feet long, by 14 feet in width. The entrance door is on the south side, near the western gable ; and, on this same side appears a small, narrow, mullioned window. This little church is built, almost entirely with flag-stones ; and, it seems, nevertheless, to be very ancient. There are remains of a belfry, over the western gable ; and, on the east end, the traces of a window appear, but the wall beneath has crumbled away, and the altar probably was under the eastern gable. The size and style of building resembles very much that old cell, called St. Kevin's Kitchen, at Glendalough. Near the old building, at the foot of an elevated ridge, called Ard-rass,<sup>61</sup> and on the roadside, is shown St. Patrick's well.<sup>62</sup> In a grassy depression of the ground, but near the summit of the elevated mound mentioned, the country-people point out St. Patrick's bed, encircled with bushes, where it is said the holy man slept, without any shelter, for one night. From this spot, a fine view of the surrounding country is obtained. In the open pasture field, beneath, may be seen the old stone-roofed cell.<sup>63</sup>

We find it stated, that previous to the arrival of St. Patrick in Leinster, Christianity had made some progress there, owing to the labours of Palladius,<sup>64</sup> Isserninus<sup>65</sup> and other missionaries. These are supposed to have a peculiar shape of a hill, or mound, Jocelyn may have understood that Cnoc, near Naas, on which the kings of Leinster are traditionally said to have built a royal residence.

<sup>55</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. lxx., lxxi., lxxii., pp. 90, 91.

<sup>56</sup> See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na gCeart, or Book of Rights," n. (h), p. 227.

<sup>57</sup> By Rev. John Francis Shearman, in "Loca Patriciana," No. vii., pp. 137, 138.

<sup>58</sup> A parish, in the barony of Ratoath, county of Meath.

<sup>59</sup> This is a parish, and townland, in the barony of North Salt, shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County Kildare," Sheets 10, 14.

<sup>60</sup> This is a town and townland, in the parishes of Kildrought and Donaghcumper, in the baronies of North and South Salt, county of Kildare. See ibid., Sheet 11.

<sup>61</sup> This townland, Upper and Lower, is in the parish of Killadoon, barony of North Salt, and county of Kildare. See ibid., Sheets 10, 11, 14.

<sup>62</sup> Pilgrims yet frequent it, and hang up many votive offerings of rags, on an old thorn-tree, overhanging the well.

<sup>63</sup> The stone roof was nearly perfect, when visited by the writer, March, 1870 ; and, but for the Vandalism of persons, who wantonly opened a hole through its centre, it might have long resisted the inroads of time. This was intended to afford egress for smoke, as the old church was used, for the purpose of kindling fires, in the interior ; but, at present, it is open on two sides, and, it affords shelter for cattle, so that its interior is always left in a very filthy state.

<sup>64</sup> St. Prosper of Aquitaine records in his "Chronicle," that this holy man reached Ireland, in 430, or 431.

<sup>65</sup> He is said to have reached Leinster, in leavened the population, while it was still the privilege of our great Apostle, to attack pagan superstition, in its high places.<sup>66</sup> Again, it has been asserted, that St. Patrick's visitation to the more southern province did not take place, until he had previously held an interview with King Laoghaire Mac Neill, at the Feis, or Convention, of Tara.<sup>67</sup> To the year 438,<sup>68</sup> has been assigned the saint's writing and purification of the Seanchus, or History, and of the Feinechus, or Laws, of ancient Erin;<sup>69</sup> while, the writings and ancient books were collected and brought to one place, at the request of Patrick. The account runs, that three kings, Laoighaire,<sup>70</sup> Core<sup>71</sup> and Daire;<sup>72</sup> three saints, Patrick,<sup>73</sup> Benen<sup>74</sup> and Cairnech;<sup>75</sup> with three antiquaries, Ross,<sup>76</sup> Dubhthach<sup>77</sup> and Fearghus;<sup>78</sup> or, a committee of these nine distinguished persons<sup>79</sup> undertook this work of recension and revision.<sup>80</sup> The Feis or Senate of Tara is said to have invested the persons, thus selected, with authority for the purpose.<sup>81</sup> Their labours were directed, to revise the pagan laws of Ireland, and to make them harmonize with Christianity.<sup>82</sup> Having this object in view, they drew up a new Code, called the Seanchus-Mor,<sup>83</sup> or Great Antiquity.

438, with Auxilius and Secundinus, to assist St. Patrick, in his Apostolic labours.

<sup>66</sup> See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. vii., p. III. No. viii., pp. 139, 140.

<sup>67</sup> In 1792, Lieutenant Daniel Grose sketched the church and curious ruins, on the Hill of Tara. Of these, he gives a N.W. view. The engraving and description may be seen, in Grose's "Antiquities of Ireland," vol. ii., pp. 88, 89.

<sup>68</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 132 to 135.

<sup>69</sup> If this be the case, and if the Manuscript or a copy of it be extant, it should unite both the foregoing conditions of a historical and a legal collection of Tracts. Hitherto, a Codex, answering this description does not seem to have been recovered.

<sup>70</sup> This is intended for the supposed reigning monarch, who died A.D. 458, according to the Four Masters.

<sup>71</sup> Most probably intended for the grandfather of Aenghus Mac Nadfraich, the first Christian King of Munster. See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lxxxi., p. 385. But, the former was not contemporaneous with the period of Laoighaire's reign, nor with St. Patrick's mission.

<sup>72</sup> We are not able to distinguish this individual.

<sup>73</sup> This saint is intended for the Irish Apostle himself.

<sup>74</sup> This holy man is supposed to have been the successor of St. Patrick, in the Archbishopric of Armagh, and whose feast has been assigned to the 9th of November. His death is recorded at A.D. 467, by the Four Masters. According to our best authorities, Benignus could hardly have been an adult in 438.

<sup>75</sup> The death of Cairnech has been generally, fixed at A.D. 530, and it does not seem reasonable to suppose, that he could have assisted at a convention, attributed to nearly a century previous to that date.

<sup>76</sup> Thought by some to have been Ros, the son of Trichem.

<sup>77</sup> Supposed to have been Dubhthach Mac Ui Lugair, the chief man among the Irish bards.

<sup>78</sup> He is otherwise called Fergus, the poet. But, indeed, we may consider all this account as a fiction, and many of those persons here named as apocryphal, in relation to the work assigned them.

<sup>79</sup> Thus, do we read, from a translation of an old Irish Poem:—

"Laeghaire, Core, Dairi, the hardy;
Patrick, Benen, Cairnech, the just;
Rossa, Dubhthach, Ferghus, with science;
These were the nine pillars of the Senchus Mór."

—See "Introduction to Senchus Mór and achgabail, or Law of Distress," vol. i. Preface by W. Neilson Handcock, pp. v. to li., and p. 17.

<sup>80</sup> Whoever desires to read, concerning the "Senchus Mór," and its mode of preparation, may examine the introduction and body of this work, as lately edited by the Brehon Law Commissioners, vol. i., ii., iii.

<sup>81</sup> See Dr. Geoffrey Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii. Likewise, Charles O'Connor's "Dissertations on the History of Ireland," Diss. i., sect. 15, p. 197.

<sup>82</sup> It is said, that after the pagan bardic verses had been sung, and the laws had been collected and laid before Patrick, he corrected these, according to the written law, which he brought, while alterations and additions were made. Many of the accounts remaining to us, in reference to this subject, are puerile in the extreme, and do not stand the tests of severe criticism.

<sup>83</sup> The "Annales Ultonienses" call this the "Chronicon Magnum." There is a work, so called, in the British Museum. Again, there are fragments of a work, bearing a similar title, among the Manuscripts of

This compilation<sup>84</sup> referred to the just duties and religious offices of ecclesiastical and of secular persons.<sup>85</sup> They are supposed<sup>86</sup> to have been the same as the Canoin-Phadruic,<sup>87</sup> or the "Canones Patricii," mentioned by Jocelyn.<sup>88</sup> We are not able to ascertain what became of the Seanchus Mor,<sup>89</sup> but, Keating derives from it the Psalter of Cashel, the Book of Armagh, with other valuable remains of antiquity.<sup>90</sup> To account for King Laoghaire engaging St. Patrick on such a work, Charles O'Connor states, that the monarch had become a Christian, yet, that he again apostatized; however, this seems unreliable and inconsistent with old accounts. Nor, is it at all likely, that St. Patrick could have been engaged on a work of the kind, known as the Seanchus Mor,<sup>91</sup> apparently so inconsistent with his missionary avocations, and probably with the bent of his studies. Nor, is it reasonable to suppose, that St. Patrick, with St. Benignus, and St. Carnech, could have been thus employed, by a pagan king, and at a time when paganism so generally prevailed, among his councillors.<sup>92</sup> This account seems, however, to have been a mere bardic invention; and, we may dismiss its further consideration, as extraneous to the real series of St. Patrick's actions.

Enveloped in many curious contradictions of statement or speculation are various narratives, referring to our saint. Dunlaing, the reigning King of Leinster, about this time, lived at Naas, according to a very general opinion; while another conjecture has it, that as there is no account of him, or of his wife, Cuach,<sup>93</sup> when Patrick arrived at this seat of rule, the probability is, that they were not then living.<sup>94</sup> Here, about the year 448<sup>95</sup>—others have it at a much later period<sup>96</sup>—the illustrious missionary met Illand, or Illann,<sup>97</sup>

Trinity College, Dublin; one Codex classed H. 3. 17, and another H. 3. 18.

<sup>84</sup> It is distinctly stated, in the Trinity College Manuscript, H. 3. 18, that the Seanchus Mor was likewise called Cain Phadruig, or "Patrick's Law," and that no individual Brehon of the Gaeidhil has dared to abrogate anything found in it.

<sup>85</sup> Hence, this volume seems not to have been a collection of History and of Laws, but relating to Laws solely. See Dr. Petrie's "History and Antiquities of Tara Hill," p. 56. Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. xviii.

<sup>86</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. ii., p. 214.

<sup>87</sup> This was the name, which the Irish applied to St. Patrick's copy of the Gospels, and now known as the "Book of Armagh." See "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (l), pp. 132 to 134.

<sup>88</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxxv., p. 106.

<sup>89</sup> See Bishop Nicholson's "Irish Historical Library," chap. ii., p. 11.

<sup>90</sup> See Rev. Geoffrey Keating's "General History of Ireland," book ii., at the reign of King Laoghaire, where he gives a very particular account of the proceedings and care of the committee, appointed to revise the laws, and to preserve the poems, genealogies and chronicles of the ancients. Many of the books he names, as existing over two hundred years ago, now seem to have been lost, or they are not yet recovered.

<sup>91</sup> Although Dr. Petrie thinks the Seanchus

Mor does not date to St. Patrick's time; yet, he deems it highly probable, that such a work had been compiled, soon after the introduction of Christianity into this country. It is even very probable, that assisted by some of the converted literati of Ireland, St. Patrick may have laid a foundation for the revision of the old pagan laws and usages, to render them conformable to the Gospel doctrines. Perhaps, such a work, compiled by the labours of his successors, may have been ascribed to him, to give it greater authority with the people. See Dr. Petrie's "History and Antiquities of Tara Hill," p. 56.

<sup>92</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. xv., p. 371, and n. 162, p. 372.

<sup>93</sup> She was daughter to Caolbadh, son of Colman, son to Bliot, of the Sil Elaigh, in Hy-Bairrche of Magh Ailbhe. Besides their more celebrated sons, Illann and Oilill, another, called Eochaid, is remembered. See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. vii., p. 116.

<sup>94</sup> The date of his death is not recorded, yet, we are told, he was buried in the ramparts of Maisden, in his armour, and as if prepared for battle.

<sup>95</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 431, and "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. ccccxlvi., p. 518. Ibid.

<sup>96</sup> As at A.D. 460. See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. vii., p. 118.

and Alild, or Ailell, sometimes called Oilill,<sup>98</sup> the sons of Dunlaing, and who succeeded their father, on the throne of Leinster. They received, with respect and attention, the message of salvation, conveyed to them, and both were purified, in the waters of regeneration, having been baptized in a well,<sup>99</sup> which lay north of the town of Naas.<sup>100</sup> The site of St. Patrick's tent<sup>101</sup> was here shown, on the green of the fort, or great Dun, which stands in the centre of the town. While there, he also baptized Ailill's two daughters, Moghain and Feidelm.<sup>102</sup> Their father dedicated them to God and to St. Patrick. They lived as consecrated virgins, afterwards, and St. Patrick is said to have blessed the veil, which was placed on their heads.<sup>103</sup> At this place, too, one Foillen, an Oeconemus, or officer of the royal household, had conceived a strong prejudice against the Christian Religion. Messengers went from the saint, who desired to hold a conference with this steward of the Fort, at Naas. Then, Foillen ridiculed the holy man, against whom he had an enmity, and he refused to be converted. He feigned a profound sleep, when the Apostle of Ireland approached him.<sup>104</sup> The sleep of death, however, came over this unhappy man; and, his eyes never opened, afterwards, except to the horrors of perdition, in another life. This dreadful fate was long remembered, by the inhabitants of this place; and, the worst imprecation they could wish an enemy was conveyed in these words: "May his sleep be like the sleep of Foillen, in the Castle of Naas!"<sup>105</sup> We are told, by Colgan,<sup>106</sup> that this imprecation was used, in his time. Jocelyn states, however, that quite a corresponding event occurred at Cnoc, thought to have been Castleknock, just after Patrick had left Dublin. He calls that unfortunate man, who slept on to death, not by the name of Foillen, but by that of Murin.<sup>107</sup>

<sup>97</sup> The heroic prince Illann, who was a great warrior, died A.D. 506, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 164, 165.

<sup>98</sup> His death is recorded, at A.D. 526. See ibid., pp. 174, 175. Many Kings of Leinster, as also the great St. Loran or Laurence O'Toole, descended from him. See the author's "Life of St. Laurence O'Toole," &c., chap. i., pp. 11, 12, and note.

<sup>99</sup> It is said to have been north of the great Fort or Dun.

<sup>100</sup> In the writer's "Life of St. David, Archbishop of Menevia, Chief Patron of Wales, and Titular Patron of Naas Church and Parish, in Ireland," a special chapter has been devoted to the antiquities and history of this ancient town. Dublin, 1869, 12mo.

<sup>101</sup> It is said, to have been placed, eastward of the road.

<sup>102</sup> They were venerated, on the 9th of December, according to the Calendar of the O'Clerys. Jocelyn has omitted the whole of what is said about St. Patrick having been at Naas.

<sup>103</sup> Ussher's Tripartite mentions, in general terms, that the sons of Dunlung, who ruled in North Leinster, believed and were baptized. See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 826. Now, Ussher assigns their baptism, to A.D. 448. See his "Index Chronologicus," ad annum CCCXLVIII. This epoch was ruled, to harmonize with his calculations, according to which St. Patrick founded the See of Armagh, went to Great Britain, and effected other works, before he set out for Leinster. This system, however, cannot well be reconciled, with our received chronology, nor with the series of our saint's transactions, as given in the Tripartite Lives. The great objection, with regard to time, might indeed be got over, so far as concerns Illann. But, we cannot reasonably account for the baptism of Alild, at that early period, particularly as the Tripartite adds, that his daughters, Mughania and Fethlimia, were also baptized by our saint, and in the same fountain. Supposing Alild to have been then only twenty-four years of age, we should be obliged to admit, that he reached the term of over 100 years. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. v., n. 38, pp. 274, 275.

<sup>104</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life, Patrick was told, that the steward was asleep. "My debroth," said Patrick, "I should not be surprised, if it were his last sleep." His people went to awaken him, and they found him dead, owing to the disobedience he showed to St. Patrick.

<sup>105</sup> See the "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, &c. A Triple Leaf," chap. iii., pp. 66, 67. Hence, the imprecation, which, adds the Tripartite, a person wishing bad rest to another used to pronounce.

<sup>106</sup> See his "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, n. 73, p. 112.

<sup>107</sup> See ibid., cap. lxxii., p. 91.

<sup>108</sup> This territory took its name from Garchu, a descendant of Ugaine Mor, King

During this progress of St. Patrick through Leinster, he appears to have visited Hy-Garchon territory<sup>108</sup> once more, and Drichir, or Dricrin,<sup>109</sup> the prince of the country, inhospitably treated him.<sup>110</sup> This chief is reported to have been a son-in-law to King Leoghaire. But, St. Patrick was consoled for this bad reception, by meeting a very poor man, named Cillen, or Killin,<sup>111</sup> who slaughtered the only cow he possessed, in order to entertain the saint and his retinue.<sup>112</sup> He likewise gave to Patrick the quantity of flour, that he brought for his own support from the king's house.<sup>113</sup> Whereupon, St. Patrick prophesied, that Cilline's son, who is named Marcanus, or Marcan,<sup>114</sup> should be a future king, over the Ui-Garchon.

From Hy-Garchon, St. Patrick is said to have travelled through that level and pleasing region, through which the River Liffey ran.<sup>115</sup> Here, he founded churches, and he also provided for their good government. This district was called Magh-liffe, or the "plain of the Liffey." In it were founded, Killuassuille,<sup>116</sup> so called from St. Auxilius, or Usaille,<sup>117</sup> whom the saint left at this place, now known as Killashee,<sup>118</sup> or Killossy;<sup>119</sup> as also, Kill-Cuilinn,<sup>120</sup> now known as Old Kilcullen,<sup>121</sup> which belonged to St. Iserninus,<sup>122</sup> and to St. Mactail,<sup>123</sup> while other churches were established by him, of which a record of Ireland. We learn from the Scholiast, on the Martyrology of Aengus the Ceile De, that it was in one of the Fotharta of Leinster. See Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland." Introduction. Appendix A., Table v., p. 253, and chap. i., pp. 286, 290, 338.

<sup>109</sup> Such is the name, as written in the Irish Tripartite. This king's name does not appear in the Annals, but he was perhaps a near connection of Nathi, who opposed St. Palladius and Patrick, in the same country. He was a person of considerable importance, being a member of the same family, as the kings of Leinster.

<sup>110</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life states, that he refused Patrick, regarding his feast, at Rath-Inbhir, on Laeghaire's account.

<sup>111</sup> He does not appear to have been identified with any saint in our Calendars, although his pedigree has been traced, in Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland." Introduction. Appendix A., Table v., p. 253.

<sup>112</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan remarks, that this is a proof, furnished by the Tripartite, that St. Patrick did not always abstain from flesh-meat. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. v., n. 42, p. 276.

<sup>113</sup> This probably illustrates some old Celtic custom, the origin of which is now obscure.

<sup>114</sup> See the pedigree of the Ui-Garchon, given by Dr. Todd, in "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland." Introduction. Appendix A., Table v., p. 253. It should, however, be observed, that this pedigree appears to be incorrect and defective.

<sup>115</sup> In O'Connor's map of Scotia Antiqua, Magh-Liffe is erroneously made to be the county of Dublin. See "Dissertations on the History of Ireland," sect. xiii., p. 172. Ed. Dublin, 1812.

<sup>116</sup> Here Archdall states, incorrectly, that

St. Patrick founded an abbey, and that it was not far from Kildare. He calls Auxilius a nephew of St. Patrick. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 332.

<sup>117</sup> According to the "Annals of the Four Masters," he died on the 27th August, A.D. 454. On that day, the Calendar of the O'Clerys has his festival.

<sup>118</sup> This is a parish, situated in North and South Naas Baronies, and it is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kildare," Sheets 19, 23, 24. The townland proper is marked, on the latter sheet.

<sup>119</sup> Rawson places it, within a mile of Naas. See "Statistical Survey of the County of Kildare," p. vi.

<sup>120</sup> This was formerly a considerable town. It has given way, however, to the new Kilcullen, or Kilcullen-bridge, which was not founded, until the fourteenth century. See Seward's "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," at Kilcullen.

<sup>121</sup> The townland so called presents the chief antiquities of Kilcullen parish to view, and it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kildare," Sheet 28.

<sup>122</sup> Nennius, and some other writers, state, that Auxilius and Iserninus were ordained with St. Patrick. It is held, by some, that these disciples only received Minor Orders, at that time. The Ulster Annals indicate, that Iserninus died A.D. 469. See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 438, and "Index Chronologicus" at A.D. CCCCLXIX.

<sup>123</sup> He is said to have died, June 11th, A.D. 548. This saint could not have been there, if this date be correct, even as a disciple, of St. Patrick, at the time of Iserninus' appointment.

<sup>124</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Secunda Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxvi., p. 14, does not seem to have been preserved. Over these, too, he left holy ministers to preside;<sup>124</sup> for, in all such cases, the illustrious man resolved, that the seed sown should be tended, by industrious labourers.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ST. PATRICK APPROACHES LEIX—DESIGN ON HIS LIFE AND PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE—HE NEXT VISITS DUBTACH IN HY-KINSELLACH—HE CONSECRATES ST. FIACH AS BISHOP OF SLETTY—CRIMTHAIN, SON OF ENDA KINSELLAGH, PATRONIZES HIS EFFORTS AND FOUNDS MANY CHURCHES—ST. PATRICK THEN VISITS THE OSSORIAN DISTRICT.

HAVING accomplished the preceding series of transactions, St. Patrick next proceeded to visit the territory of Leix.<sup>1</sup> At the time, and long afterwards, this appears to have been one of the most important principalities in Leinster. But, while journeying towards it, some of the people, on the route, had contrived a snare for the saint and for his disciples.<sup>2</sup> According to Jocelyn, certain wicked people, living in the plain of the Liffey, had prepared an ambush for the holy missionary. This design seems to have been formed, and partially accomplished, on the western bank of the Liffey, as he approached the bounds of Leix. Some children of Belial dug deep pits<sup>3</sup> and holes in the way, where the saint, with all his retinue, was to pass. Those traps were covered over with branches and green sods of grass. But, a numerous and benevolent family, who had a knowledge of the trap laid for his destruction, sent him a timely warning. The saint, full of confidence in God, gave his benediction to this holy family, and so he, and his retinue passed, without receiving any detriment. The green sods, like solid earth, afforded them a firm passage. The saint commanded a pious matron,<sup>4</sup> or a young maid,<sup>5</sup> Briga,<sup>6</sup> or Brig,<sup>7</sup> who noticed them regarding the ambush laid, to call her father.<sup>8</sup> With his ten sons, and three daughters, St. Patrick converted that man to the Christian faith. His daughters became nuns, and these were veiled by the saint's own hands. Of the sons, five flourished in the world, it is said, in great prosperity, while five others became monks, remarkable for great perfection and sanctity, as the saint had prophesied concerning them. Again, the holy man had a prevision, that the evil-disposed should be a servile and a dependent race,<sup>9</sup> subject to strange rulers, while neither princes nor prelates were to spring from their line. It appears, from the narrative, that the Apostle had now arrived near, if not within, the Ui Ercain boundaries.<sup>10</sup> St. Patrick nn. 39, 40, pp. 18, 19; Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lviii., p. 25, and nn. 52, 53, p. 32; Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxv., p. 44; Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxviii., lxxix., lxx., lxxi., lxxii., pp. 90, 91, and nn. 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, pp. 111, 112; Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xiv., xv., xvi., xvii., xviii., pp. 151, 152, and nn. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, pp. 184, 185. See, also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 457 to 461, with the corresponding notes.

CHAPTER XVIII.—<sup>1</sup> It embraced at this time the greater part of the present Queen's County.

<sup>2</sup> The plotters had intended, as we are told, to draw them into bogs, there to kill them.

<sup>3</sup> The Irish Tripartite calls them water-pits.

<sup>4</sup> According to the Tripartite Life.

<sup>5</sup> As Jocelyn says.

<sup>6</sup> She is supposed to have been Briga, daughter to Fergna, son of Cobtach. Her feast is thought to be, at the 7th of January.

<sup>7</sup> So is she called, in the Irish Tripartite Life. We are told, that the name Brig differs from Brigid. We find, that the mother to St. Comgall of Bangor, born in Magheramorne, near Larne, County Antrim, was named Brig, and the Calendar of the O'Clerys mentions four holy persons named Brigh.

<sup>8</sup> The Irish Tripartite thus dramatically relates this occurrence: "For God's sake," said the little boys, "drive on, your horses," "Drive on, then, for God's sake, your horses," cried Patrick.

<sup>9</sup> Never having rest from persecution or complaints, as the Irish Life adds.

blessed Briga, and all her family, who belonged to the Hy-Erchon tribe, and he declared, that brave chiefs and estimable clerics should always abound among them.<sup>11</sup> Thus, St. Patrick and his companions providentially escaped from those dangers. In our Apostle's time, that place was known as Laigis micfinn;<sup>12</sup> and when the writer of his Tripartite Life flourished, it was a marshy spot, called Moin-Choluim. The Irish Tripartite Life apparently states, that here the saint pronounced a malediction, not on the territory Laighis, but on a Laighis, son to Find.<sup>13</sup> It is said, Moin Choluim<sup>14</sup> is now the old church of Moone,<sup>15</sup> giving name to a parish and to a barony, near Timolin,<sup>16</sup> in the south of the present county of Kildare. Then, Patrick alighted, from his horse, while on the hillock, which was then called Bile-Mac-Cruaich.<sup>17</sup> Afterwards, however, it was called Forrach-Patrick.<sup>18</sup> He said, that there should never be a foreign king or steward over the people there, and that when the King of Leinster should be distributing the animals for food, in his royal house, the Satrap, or Steward, of Hy-Ercon,<sup>19</sup> should be entitled to one-fourth of the cattle and heifers slain, for the king's kitchen.<sup>20</sup> It was declared, moreover, that they should have Patrick's respect, and their place was Patrick's forrach, or "seat."<sup>21</sup> They were destined to have, likewise, the dignity of laics and clerics, as also to have wealth and renown.<sup>22</sup> Eight princes, or justiciaries<sup>23</sup> they had, down to the reign of Conchobar,<sup>24</sup> son of Donnchadh,<sup>25</sup> son to Domhnall,<sup>26</sup> monarch at Tara; and, this succession was held to confirm the predictions of St. Patrick, in reference to them.<sup>27</sup> Traditions appear to abound, in this part of the country, which show it was blessed, by the presence of our great Irish Apostle.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>10</sup> This tribe seems to have been seated, in the south part of the county of Kildare.

<sup>11</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. cxx., p. 92.

<sup>12</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life states, that Laighs was the tribe-name of the youths, who committed the misdeed against St. Patrick and his companions.

<sup>13</sup> It is not, however, inconsistent with the former statement.

<sup>14</sup> It is said to have been formerly called, maem, and maem Cholum-chille, because the church had been erected, by the great Abbot of Iona, and because a fragment of St. Colum-Cille's Cross was there shown. Eventually, it became a Franciscan house. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., n. (c), p. 781, and Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes G, p. 280.

<sup>15</sup> This parish extends, through the baronies of East Offaly, Kilkea and Moone, Narragh and Reban East, and it is defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kildare," Sheets 22, 31, 35, 36, 38. The townland proper is on Sheets 36, 38.

<sup>16</sup> The townland, town and parish of Timolin, in the barony of Narragh and Reban East, are shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kildare," Sheet 36.

<sup>17</sup> Said to mean, "the tree of the son of Cruaich," supposed to have been of the Hy Lugair tribe.

<sup>18</sup> Identified, by William M. Hennessy, with the church of Narraghmore, a parish in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, Narragh and Reban East and West, in the county of Kildare. Its extent is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kildare," Sheets 31, 32, 35, 36. The townland proper is shown, on Sheets 32, 36.

<sup>19</sup> These are said to have been derived, from Ercan, eighth in descent, from Eochaidh-Finn-Fothart, founder of the Fotharts' tribe, in this part of the country.

<sup>20</sup> So states the Latin Tripartite Life. According to the Irish Life, it is said, the Ui-Ercain steward should have one shin (of beef), and the King of Leinster the other.

<sup>21</sup> It was also called, "Forum Patricii," and Narragh Patrick, in Archbishop Alan's "Repertorium Viride." In his time, it had many neighbouring churches succursal to it. Narraghmore, or the "great Forrach," was used to denote its site.

<sup>22</sup> Several memorials of St. Patrick exist, in that part of the country.

<sup>23</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life has, "octo supremi diacetes sive Justiciarii," apparently having jurisdiction, in their own locality.

<sup>24</sup> Conchobhar ascended the throne A.D. 818, and he died in 831.

<sup>25</sup> He reigned, from A.D. 766 to 792.

<sup>26</sup> He reigned, from A.D. 739 to 758. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., for the particulars of these foregoing eventful reigns.

<sup>27</sup> This indicates a period of composition, anterior to the time of the Anglo-Norman invasion of Ireland.

This glorious leader of men had now approached the bounds of Southern Leinster—known as Hy-Kinnselach<sup>29</sup>—and there dwelt<sup>30</sup> that Arch-Poet Dubtach, also called Dubhtach Mac Ui-Lugair,<sup>31</sup> who had formerly received him with such marks of honour, when many years before the glad tidings of Redemption had been preached at Temoria.<sup>32</sup> According to some authorities, Christianity had been already introduced to this territory. <sup>33</sup> That distinguished bard lived at a place, which is called Magh-Criathar,<sup>34</sup> and it was in the territory of Ui-Cinnselaigh.<sup>35</sup> This famous tribe received its appellation, from Eanna Ceinnsealach,<sup>36</sup> who was the fourth in descent from Cathaoir Mor,<sup>37</sup> a renowned Monarch of Ireland. He was the King of Leinster, about A.D. 358.<sup>38</sup> At a place, called Domnach-Fiecc,<sup>39</sup> or Domnach-Mor,<sup>40</sup> and said to have been also called Sleibhte, now Sleaty, or Sletty, within the modern barony of Slievemargue, or Slievemargy, and in the present Queen's County, both those friends now met each other. Patrick requested from Dubhtach a handsome youth, who should not be of a lowly family, and a man of one wife,<sup>41</sup> for whom but one son was born. At this time, Fiach<sup>42</sup> was a young gentleman of excellent education, and learning, remarkable as well for his eloquence, as for his personal attractions. He had married a wife, only a few years, before St. Patrick's visit. Within a short time, however, she died, and left behind her an only son, who was named Fiachra. When the desire of St. Patrick had been expressed, "Hem," said Dubhtach, "that is Fiacc,<sup>43</sup> the son of Erc—I am afraid—the man of those qualities, who went from me to the territory of Connacht, with poems for the kings." At these words, Fiacc came towards him. "What are you considering?" asked Fiacc. "Dubhtach for the crozier," said Patrick. "That will be a blemish to many, indeed," said Fiacc; "why should not I be taken, in place of him?" "You will be received, indeed," replied Patrick. This great saint, by an internal illumination of the Holy Ghost, said: "Behold a man of one wife, who according to the Apostle may be worthily advanced to the sacred order of

<sup>28</sup> See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. vii., pp. 122 to 127, and notes.

<sup>29</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Vita S. Brigide, n. 7, p. 565.

<sup>30</sup> Dr. Lanigan remarks, that his habitation was in some part of the present county of Carlow. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. v., p. 273.

<sup>31</sup> Regarding this remarkable personage, much interesting information will be found, in Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. i., ii., iii., iv., v., vi., pp. 1 to 104.

<sup>32</sup> The poetic name for Tara.

<sup>33</sup> It has been supposed, by St. Isserninus, or Bishop Fith, as the Book of Armagh calls him.

<sup>34</sup> According to the Book of Armagh, it is also called, Domnach-Mar-Criathar; but, its exact locality seems to be uncertain.

<sup>35</sup> This district comprehended a part of the counties of Wexford, Carlow, and Queen's County, according to one account. See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Writers of Ireland," at Fiach. However, in his account of ancient territories, Harris confines it to a great part of Wexford County. See ibid. "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. vii. Now, instead of thus confining it, he should have added to it, we are told, the county of Kilkenny. This Seward has done, but he has inaccurately included Wicklow. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. v., n. 45, pp. 276, 277.

<sup>36</sup> This warlike but cruel King of Leinster flourished, about the middle of the fourth century, and under the Irish monarch, Eochaidh Moighmeodhin. Some notices regarding him occur, in Rev. Jeffry Keating's "General History of Ireland," part i.

<sup>37</sup> He reigned, from A.D. 173, until A.D. 177, when he was slain, by Con-Ced Cathach, at Magh Agha. He was buried at Enach Ailbhe.

<sup>38</sup> The date of his death is not recorded, but it must have been much later. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (g), pp. 208, 209.

<sup>39</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>40</sup> It is said to have been, within the territory of Ui-Cinnsealach, called in Archbishop Ussher's work, the larger and more powerful part of Leinster. See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 863.

<sup>41</sup> See 1 Tim. iii. 2.

<sup>42</sup> He is called the son of Erc.

<sup>43</sup> Colgan has much, regarding this holy bishop, in "Prima Vita S. Patricii," Scholia and nn. 1 to 9, pp. 4, 7, 8.

priesthood, and even to the episcopal dignity." Then, Patrick began to instruct him, in the tenets of Divine Faith, and admonished him to be baptized. The young gentleman, wondering how the saint came to penetrate the very secret of his soul, then received baptism, which was administered by the Apostle. At first, Dubtach was unwilling to part with his disciple; but, at last, he consigned this young poet to the care of St. Patrick. With the holy Apostle's blessing, Fiach made great progress in learning, after St. Patrick had given him an alphabet,<sup>44</sup> written with his own hand, so that in one day, he learned the whole Psalter,<sup>45</sup> and, in a short time, he attained a sufficient understanding of the Sacred Scriptures. Successively was he invested with the different Holy Orders, and, in fine, he was made a bishop, over the church of Sclepten, or Sletty. While in this episcopal See, he governed a flourishing convent of monks. He received angelic teaching, and there was he celebrated, for the sanctity of his life, for his learning, and for his conspicuous miracles.<sup>46</sup> This distinguished prelate is said to have been the first bishop, who was ordained, in Leinster; and, we are told, that the Archbishopric of Leinster was given to him, by St. Patrick. Besides, Fiach's only son, Fiachra,<sup>47</sup> was also ordained.<sup>48</sup> Afterwards, the holy Patrick gave Fiach a case, containing a bell, a reliquary, a crozier, and a book-satchel. In addition, the Apostle is said to have left seven of his people, with him. These are named, Mochatoc<sup>49</sup> of Inisfail, Augustin<sup>50</sup> of Inis-beg, Tegan or Tecan,<sup>51</sup> also Diarmait,<sup>52</sup> and Nainnid,<sup>53</sup> Paul,<sup>54</sup> and Fedilmidh.<sup>55</sup> We are told, that, afterwards, Fiach resided in Domnach-Feic,<sup>56</sup> and that he was there, until three score of his people died with him. Then, an angel appeared to him and declared, that his place of resurrection should be in Cuilmaighe,<sup>57</sup> which was west of the River Barrow. It was told him, that there he should meet a boar, and that there, too, his companions should build their refectory; and, also, that where they should meet <sup>44</sup> Although Fiech, as a scholar of Dubtach, must have known how to write, yet in the very same chapter of the Tripartite Life, the saint is stated to have given him an alphabet, written with his own hand. This was presented, for the purpose of his learning it. Yet, it ought solely to be regarded, as the Roman alphabet, which he must have learned, to enable him to master the Latin language, in the opinion of Rev. Dr. Lanigan. Here, even, we have a proof, that the art of writing was known and practised, in Ireland, before the arrival of St. Patrick. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. v., n. 47, p. 277.

<sup>45</sup> The writer of the Irish Tripartite Life, relating this wonderful exercise of memory, adds, as has been related to me.

<sup>46</sup> See "Sexta Vita S. Patricii," cap. cxv., p. 91.

<sup>47</sup> The O'Clerys' Calendar states, he was of the same church, viz., Sleibhte, that his father governed.

<sup>48</sup> He was venerated, on the 12th of October, the same day as his father.

<sup>49</sup> He is said, to have been the same as Cadoc, honoured as an Apostle, in Wales and Britanny, on the 24th of January.

<sup>50</sup> He is said, to have been one of the first companions of St. Palladius.

<sup>51</sup> Colgan thinks, he had been commemorated, on the 9th of September.

<sup>52</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 10th of January.

<sup>53</sup> One, bearing this name, is said to have given Holy Viaticum, to St. Brigid, the great Abbess of Kildare; but, Colgan supposes, he must be distinguished from the present holy man.

<sup>54</sup> He is said, to have lived in a desert island, probably in the East Island of Aran, where the people have wonderful traditions regarding him. There, he was visited, by the great navigator St. Brendan.

<sup>55</sup> He is related, to have been the patron of Kilmore, where his festival is celebrated, on the 9th of August. See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. ii., pp. 46, 47.

<sup>56</sup> According to the Rev. Mr. Shearman, this place was east of the River Slaney, and in a plain, then called Magh-da-Con, "the plain of the two dogs." See "Loca Patriciana," No. ix., p. 186.

<sup>57</sup> This signifies, either the "wood," or the "corner of the plain," and, it might now be called Culmoy, or Coolmoy. On the same Ordnance Survey Townland Sheet, with Sletty,—the present name of Sleibhte,—there are several townlands, having the prefix of Cool, namely, Coolanagh, Coolhenry, and Coolrain.

<sup>58</sup> If he were King of Hy-kinsellagh, at the time when St. Patrick was there, pro-

a hind, there they ought to place the church. Fiacc thereupon said to the angel, that he would not go, until Patrick came to mark out the boundary for his place, and to consecrate it, so that he might get the property from him. The holy man went then to Fiacc, and marked out his place for him, and fixed its site. Crimthann<sup>58</sup> had been baptized a short time before, by St. Patrick; yet, as the king had a quarrel with the tribe and family of Fiach, he gave that patrimonial inheritance, not to him, but to the Irish Apostle.<sup>59</sup> For, the Ui-Ercan were then persecuted, by the reigning King of Leinster, Crimthann, son to Enna Ceinnselach, so that St. Fiach's brothers went into exile. Certain manachs, or monks, in Hy-Crimthann,<sup>60</sup> and the manachs in Ulster, and of Cend Enna,<sup>61</sup> in Munster, are said to have belonged to this tribe. Of this family, too, was St. Fiacc. We are told, that Fiacc, Aengus,<sup>62</sup> or Aengussius Magnus,<sup>63</sup> Ailill Mar,<sup>64</sup> or Alild,<sup>65</sup> Conall,<sup>66</sup> or Conald,<sup>67</sup> and Etirscell,<sup>68</sup> or Etherschel<sup>69</sup> were five brothers.<sup>70</sup>

It is said, that St. Patrick found a faithful friend in Crimthann, who is reputed to have been a pious man, although so hostile to his own immediate relatives. The Rev. Dr. Lanigan finds it difficult, to reconcile both those statements; however, historic experience proves, how the dictates of state-craft often denaturalize the closest family and tribal relationships. It is stated, that King Crimthann founded and endowed with lands, no less than seventy churches<sup>71</sup>—at first thirty and afterwards forty<sup>72</sup>—within his own territory of Hy-Kinnselach.<sup>73</sup> Among these are mentioned, the church of Domnach-Criathar,<sup>74</sup> and of Inisfail,<sup>75</sup> in which he left St. Mochonoc<sup>76</sup> and Mochadoc, bably about A.D. 444, he must have retained his bodily powers, for a very long time. Our annals have a record of his fighting battles, in the year 483. See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," or in 471, according to the Four Masters. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Vita S. Brigidæ, n. 8, p. 565. Colgan, however, quotes the same Four Masters, as stating, that Crimthann was killed in the year 465. See ibid. Septima Vita S. Patricii, n. 45, p. 185. Roderick O'Flaherty, in his Manuscript notes, to Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," at pp. 565 and 155, maintains, in opposition to Colgan, that this is the true account regarding Crimthann. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. v., n. 57, p. 279.

<sup>59</sup> It is said, that the King of Leinster, Crimthann, gave the fifth part of his father's possessions to Fiach, in lands, and thereon he built Sliebhte.

<sup>60</sup> This territory was distinct, from that of the same name, said to have been in Meath. That of the text was a part of Laeighis, and it was included, in the present barony of Maryborough East, in the Queen's County. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (q), p. 216.

<sup>61</sup> There was Cinel-Enna, in the barony of Raphoe, county of Donegal. There was another sept, bearing the same name, near the Hill of Uisnech, in Westmeath; but, no one, so called, is mentioned, as having been in Munster, except in the Tripartite Lives.

<sup>62</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>63</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life. This Aengus in question, called Eochaidh Guinneach, of the Ui-Bairrche, afterwards killed King Crimthann, son of Enna Ceinnselach, to avenge his exile, in 479. Then, Eochaidh was assisted, by the people of Ara-Cliach, a place in Idrome, county of Carlow. Eochaidh was alive in 489, for during that year, he assisted Muircheartach Mac Earca, at the battle of Cill-Osnadha. There, Aengus, King of Munster, was slain.

<sup>64</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>65</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>66</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>67</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>68</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>69</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>70</sup> Their father is said to have been the son of Erc. From an entry, in the "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 465, it appears, Mac Erc had been married to a daughter of King Crimthann, and, consequently, the latter must have been grandfather to St. Fiacc.

<sup>71</sup> See the "Vita Tripartita S. Patricii," lib. iii., cap. xxv., p. 157.

<sup>72</sup> In thirties and forties are the churches, which he gave to St. Patrick, the Irish Tripartite Life states.

<sup>73</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan will not admit, that St. Patrick erected so many as seventy churches, while he dwelt in that part of the country.

<sup>74</sup> So is it called, in the Latin Tripartite; in the Irish version, it is named Domnach-mor of Magh-Criathar.

<sup>75</sup> Now said to be Begery, otherwise called Beg-Erin, a small island, which lies or Mochatoc. He built another church at Inisbeg,<sup>77</sup> the Lesser or Little Island,<sup>78</sup> in which he left Erdit<sup>79</sup> or Eruditus, and Augustine,<sup>80</sup> who are thought to have been the companions of St. Palladius.<sup>81</sup> We are told, likewise, that St. Patrick next visited Magh-Reta, also called Magh-Reicheat.<sup>82</sup> He happened to be there, on a Sunday, when the people were then engaged, building a royal fort in that district, and they had just laid its foundations. This fort was known as Rath-Bacain.<sup>83</sup> Patrick sent a message to prevent their work, but no notice was taken of his remonstrances. Therefore he said, "Its building shall be troublesome, unless offering be done there every day." He also said, that the fort should not be inhabited, until the wind, called "gaeth," in Irish, should come from the lower part of hell. This seems to have been a play upon words, and it was intended to mean Gaithin,<sup>84</sup> son of Cinaed, who rebuilt Rathbacain,<sup>85</sup> in the time of Fedhlimidh,<sup>86</sup> and of Conchobhar,<sup>87</sup> at Tara.<sup>88</sup> In Rath-Bacain, it is said, the church of Domnach-mor,<sup>89</sup> or the "great church," was afterwards erected. The late Dr. O'Donovan, who well knew the locality of Morett,<sup>90</sup> considers this townland,<sup>91</sup> with a vast plain extending around it,<sup>92</sup> comprehending the Great Heath<sup>93</sup> of Mary.

close to Wexford Haven. See Professor O'Curry's "Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History," Appendix, No. ii., n. 22, p. 480.

<sup>76</sup> The Tripartite Life makes St. Patrick appoint as pastors, St. Conoc and St. Cadoc, over Inisfail; but, Conoc, or Mochonoc, and Cadoc, who was his nephew, flourished elsewhere. Nor did they live, as well-known persons, until the sixth century. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," at the 11th of February, where he treats about St. Conoc, and also, Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. v., n. 58, p. 279.

<sup>77</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," nn. 50, 51, 52, p. 186.

<sup>78</sup> Both places are said to have been, in the diocese of Ferns. See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 747, for unsatisfactory notices of them, under the county of Wexford.

<sup>79</sup> By Erdicus was probably meant Benedict. With Augustin, he had been in Ireland, it is stated, in the time of Palladius. Afterwards, he is said to have called upon St. Patrick, at Eboria.

<sup>80</sup> After the Gentiles occupied the church of Sletty, these churches were ruined and deserted; but, these saints' shrines are said to have been in Sleibte. This paragraph, as a parenthesis, was evidently added, by the transcriber, after A.D. 819, when Inis-Fail, or Beg- Erin, had been plundered.

<sup>81</sup> He is venerated, on the 6th of July. It would require great credulity, as Dr. Lanigan asserts, to believe, that those two companions of Palladius could have been left, at an obscure church, of which no trace is now to be found. In addition to this confusion, Augustin of Innisbeg is said to have been a disciple of St. Fiach. In such case, he was not placed there, by St. Patrick. Archdall, as usual, has changed these two churches into monasteries, and placed them in the county of Wexford. He adds, likewise, that they had been founded, by St. Patrick.

<sup>82</sup> Keating places this plain in Laoighis, or Leix; but, according to the Preface to the Feilire of St. Ængus, its position was to be found in Offaly.

<sup>83</sup> It has not been identified.

<sup>84</sup> Although he was a very celebrated chieftain of Leix, his deeds and death are omitted, in our Annals. His son Cinneidigh died, A.D. 898.

<sup>85</sup> This shows, it was within the territory of Leix. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (d), pp. 36, 37. There was another fort, having the same name in Latharna, or Larne, but that denomination is obsolete there, at present. See ibid., n. (g).

<sup>86</sup> He was the son of Crimthann, King of Munster, and he died, A.D. 847, according to the "Chronicon Scotorum." He is numbered among the Irish Saints, and his festival is on the 18th or 28th of August.

<sup>87</sup> He is said, to have reigned as King of Ireland, from A.D. 818 to 831.

<sup>88</sup> Colgan supposes this sentence, to have been an interpolation, in the Latin Tripartite Life, which he deems to have been more ancient, than it seems in reality to be.

<sup>89</sup> It has not been identified.

<sup>90</sup> This is a manor, in the parish of Coolbanagher, and in the barony of Portnahinch. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheets 8, 9, 13, 14. It lies near the old church ruins of Cuil-Beannchoir, alias, White Church.

<sup>91</sup> There is no place, called Rath-Baccain, or Beggan, within the manor of Morett, which was granted to the Earls of Kildare; but, there is a townland, named Rathmore—and it was a very large enclosure—in the adjoining parish and barony of Stradbally, a little to the south.

<sup>92</sup> About the middle of the third century, borough, and a level tract of country, extending to the base of that chain of conical hills,<sup>94</sup> reaching to the rock of Dunamase, to have been anciently called Laoighis Reta.<sup>95</sup>

Having left his blessing on the territory of Hy-Kinsellagh, St. Patrick entered Ossory, and he passed through Bealach-Gabhran,<sup>96</sup> on his way. The exact course he took is not very clearly defined. He had the consolation of enrolling under his standard of the Cross vast numbers of people. We learn, that having preached with great effect, the truths of revelation and the name of Christ, he founded many churches within Ossory's limits. According to a local writer, St. Patrick, when proceeding from Loaghis into the adjoining territory of Ui Duach, in Ossory, commenced the erection of a church, at a remarkable place, near the banks of the River Dineen. But, he was insulted by the chief of this territory, who forcibly drove him from that locality. Patrick was a man, possessing great force of character, and he had no notion of allowing this insult to pass unpunished. Thereupon, he pronounced anathema on the Chief of Ui Duach, and on his descendants.<sup>97</sup> We must suppose,<sup>98</sup> that all opposition to the teaching of our National Apostle, in Idough, ceased with this episode; since, he appears to have founded some churches a fierce battle is said to have been fought, on this plain, between the people of Leinster and those of Munster. The latter were defeated, with great slaughter.

<sup>93</sup> This is situated, partly in the parish of Killeale, barony of Maryborough East, and partly in the parish of Coolbanagher, in the barony of Portnahinch. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheet 13.

<sup>94</sup> The old Map of Leis, as shown in the "Journal of the Kilkenny and South-East of Ireland Archæological Society," presents Muret and its castle, as near the border of Leis, but in that part of Offaly, called Clanmalier, over which the O'Dempseys were chiefs. See vol. iv. New Series, p. 345. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (b), p. 192, and n. (r), pp. 216, 217.

<sup>95</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's communication, dated Stradbally, December 9th, 1838, in his Antiquarian Letters of the Irish Ordnance Survey, relating to the Queen's County, vol. i., pp. 220, 221.

<sup>96</sup> This is said to have been a well-known opening, under the Sliabh Margie, or Gabhran Hills, which gave name to that central district of Ossory, lying between the present town of Gowran and the borders of Tipperary. See John Hogan's "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," &c., part ii., chap. xiv., p. 133.

<sup>97</sup> Dr. John O'Donovan thus relates the popular tradition: He opened his lips to curse the territory, and pronounced the words Mullaheen, Mullaheen, Ui Duach—I curse, I curse, Ui Duach; but one of his disciples, who was related to the noble family of Ui Duach, with a view to avert the malediction from the territory and the people, added immediately after Bee shin ar deen a gruack—let that curse be on the thatch of their corn ricks. This rhyme, it appears, was sufficient to avert the curse, so far as it was pronounced by St. Patrick; but, his anger was not yet appeased, and he opened his lips again to bann the territory, saying, Mullaheen, Mullaheen, Ui Duach; the disciple added, Bee shin ar vaur na luachra—let that be on the tops of the rushes. The saint commenced his denunciation a third time, saying, Mullaheen, Mullaheen, Ui Duach, and the disciple averted it once more, from the land of the people, by adding, Bee shin ar an Dineen ruah—let it be on the red Dineen. Finding the counteracting lines of his disciple so opportunely added, after his own maledictory ones, St. Patrick felt his anger subsiding, and believing his disciple was inspired by heaven, thus to save his native territory from a heavy malediction, he left the matter so. The effects of the three curses are said still to remain, wonderfully plain, in the territory of Ui Duach. The thatch of the stacks and hay ricks is there most furiously assailed and stripped, by the winds; also, the tops of the rushes exhibit all the withering influence of the curse; and, the River Dineen, which has deserved for itself the soubriquet of the red and deceitful Dineen, is so subject to sudden floods and inundations, as to sweep away and destroy, not only men, cattle, and corn, but also the churchyards, which lie within the reach of its floods. See a paper, published in the Journal of the Kilkenny and South-East of Ireland Archæological Society. It is entitled, "Traditions of the County Kilkenny."

<sup>98</sup> See "The O'Brenans and the ancient Territory of Hy-Duach." A Lecture, delivered to the Members of the Ballyragget Temperance Club. By the Rev. Nicholas Murphy.

<sup>99</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey and ecclesiastical establishments, in the territory, the principal of which is said to have been the old church at Donoughmore,<sup>99</sup> in the present barony of Fassadinin. This is only one of the four churches bearing such a name in the ancient principality of Ossory.<sup>100</sup> It is stated, that the old church of Dysart,<sup>101</sup> in the barony of Fassadinin,<sup>102</sup> and situated at the confluence of the River Dineen, with the Duan Stream, is a church of Patrician origin,<sup>103</sup> and it is also in the territory of Ui-Duach,<sup>104</sup> or Idough. Again, it is recorded, that he left the relics of certain holy men, and some of his own people, in that place, where Martar-tech,<sup>105</sup> or "the house of relics," is this day, in Magh-Roighne territory.<sup>106</sup> The Apostle founded churches and establishments there; and, he said, that distinguished laics and clerics should spring from the district, and that no province should have sway over them, while they remained obedient to his law.

At Druim-Conchind,<sup>107</sup> or "the ridge of Conchind,"<sup>108</sup> in Mairge, according to one account, the cross-beam of Patrick's chariot broke, while he was going onwards towards Munster. He made another beam, from the wood of the druim,<sup>109</sup> or "ridge." This, however, broke immediately afterwards, when he procured another, and it broke, in like manner. Patrick said, that there should never be any implement made out of the timber, in that wood. This prediction had been fulfilled, in after time, for even a wooden pin was not made from it. There, also, was shown a place, called Patrick's Desert,<sup>110</sup> and, as a waste, it was subsequently associated with his memory. According to a popular tradition, in Ossory, St. Patrick had an interview with St. Ciaran,<sup>111</sup> the patron, who had already preached the Gospel there, and who had converted many to the true faith. This meeting is said to have been near the banks of the River Suir, and the townlands of Rathpatrick<sup>112</sup> and Rathkieran<sup>113</sup> are supposed to indicate the mansion places of the two saints, while sojourning Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheets 4, 5, 9, 10. The townland proper is shown, on the latter Sheet.

<sup>100</sup> According to Rev. Dr. Reeves: "Every place where Patrick used to remain on Sunday is called Domnach Mor, that is, from the number of the hosts that used to be about him, and used to give him great gifts." See a paper, "on the townland distribution of Ireland," published in "The Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. vii., pp. 488, 489.

<sup>101</sup> No remains of the church can now be seen, and only a corner of the burial-ground, the red Dineen having carried away the remainder.

<sup>102</sup> This parish of Dysart is defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheets 5, 6, 10, 11. The townland proper, Dysart Glebe, is on Sheet 10.

<sup>103</sup> Although the church had been founded by St. Patrick, its titular is said to have been St. Brendan, or Brenan, a native of Ui Duach. From him, it has been conjectured, that Brandon Hill derives its name. See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. xi.

<sup>104</sup> For several centuries, this territory was considered, as co-extensive with the barony of Fassadinin, in the county of Kilkenny. By O'Huidhrin, it is characterized, as "the fair wide plain of the Feoir," or Nore, and its chief is called O'Braonain. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagáin and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," pp. 94, 95, and p. lix., nn. 496, 497. In more ancient times, Ui-Duach had a greater extent, and it included Rathveagh, in the barony of Galmoy. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (e), p. 484.

<sup>105</sup> This place has not been identified.

<sup>106</sup> This is said to have been the nucleus of ancient Ossory, but its limits do not seem to be well defined. See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. xi., n. (1), p. 266.

<sup>107</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life. The Latin version has Druim-chonchinn, but without particularizing the district.

<sup>108</sup> This name is said to have been derived from an ancient hero, and the place itself is stated, to have been near Sleibhte, by the Rev. John Francis Shearman, in "Loca Patriciana," No. xi., p. 270.

<sup>109</sup> It is often Latinized "dorsum."

<sup>110</sup> The church site, at the bridge of Dysart, is said to represent the Latinized form "Desertum Patricii."

<sup>111</sup> His feast occurs, at the 5th of March.

<sup>112</sup> This townland is in the parish, so named, and barony of Ida, as described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for

in that neighbourhood.<sup>114</sup> However this may be, Patrick at length took his leave of the Leinster province, and having founded there a great number of churches and establishments, he left a blessing on the people, and the holy man prepared for a new mission, by crossing the lines, which bounded the Munster province.<sup>115</sup>

CHAPTER XIX.

MISSIONARIES IN MUNSTER, BEFORE THE VISIT OF ST. PATRICK TO THAT PROVINCE—HIS PREACHING AT CASHEL, AND THE CONVERSION OF KING ÆNGUS WITH HIS PEOPLE—ST. PATRICK VISITS MUSCRAIGHE-BREOGAIN AND HI-CUANACH—HE GOES TO ARACHLIACH AND TO HY-FIDHGENTE, SO FAR AS THE RIVER SHANNON, AND THEN HE RETURNS TOWARDS EASTERN MUNSTER.

THE reason why St. Patrick deferred his mission to Munster, for so many years, did not arise from any want of good feeling, towards the people of that province; but, from the fact, most probably, of their having had some apostles already at work, while he was journeying through the other Irish provinces.<sup>1</sup> Those holy men are said to have been, chiefly Saints Ailbe,<sup>2</sup> Declan,<sup>3</sup> Ibar,<sup>4</sup> and Kieran.<sup>5</sup> In addition to those persons, already converted by the preaching of his saintly predecessors, Patrick was now destined to add many thousands to the ranks of Christianity. His course, and that of his disciples, was turned towards Cashel of the Kings. It was so called, most probably, on account of a "stone fortress,"<sup>6</sup> which crowned its celebrated Rock, from a very early period. It is said, that in more ancient times, this city was also called Siath-Druim,<sup>7</sup> or "the sequestered hill," from siath, "quiet," and druim, "the ridge of a hill." Rather, we may say, Sig-Druim, "fairy" or "sprite-hill," it having been in pagan times the scene of pagan worship, should seem to be the true root for its denomination.

At this time, the celebrated Ænguss,<sup>8</sup> or Ængussius,<sup>9</sup> the son of Nadfraich, is said to have been king over Munster.<sup>10</sup> It seems probable, his royal the County of Kilkenny," Sheets 43, 44, 46, 47. The townland proper is on Sheets 43, 44.

<sup>113</sup> This parish has its boundaries conterminous with the former, but lying more to the west, in the barony of Iverk.

<sup>114</sup> See John Hogan's "St. Ciaran, Patron of Ossory," &c., part ii., chap. xiv., pp. 135 to 137. Here, too, it is stated, that the Irish Apostle was waited upon, by St. Declan, who came from Ardmore, over the mountains of Sliaibh-Cua, to Hynneone, now Mullachinneone, a townland in the parish of New Chapel, near Clonmel.

<sup>115</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxv., p. 44. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxv., cxvii., cxviii., pp. 91, 92, 93, and nn. 126, 127, p. 114. Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xix., xx., xxi., xxii., xxiii., xxiv., xxv., xxvi., xxvii., xxviii., pp. 152, 153, and nn. 33 to 54, pp. 185, 186. Also Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 461 to 466, with accompanying notes.

CHAPTER XIX.—<sup>1</sup> It seems, that there were Christians, in Munster, before St. Patrick's arrival, for he is represented, as having undertaken this southern mission, in order to extend and revive the Christian Faith. According to the Tripartite, his objects were, "fidei propagandæ et refovendæ." See "Vita Tripartita S. Patricii," lib. iii., cap. xxxi., p. 156.

<sup>2</sup> His feast occurs, at the 12th of September.

<sup>3</sup> His festival belongs, to the 24th of July.

<sup>4</sup> His feast is held, on the 23rd of April.

<sup>5</sup> He is venerated, at the 5th of March.

<sup>6</sup> Such is the English meaning of this word, according to O'Reilly's "Irish-English Dictionary."

<sup>7</sup> Sidh-Dhruim [Sheerim] or "Fairy-ridge" is by no means an uncommon topographical designation, in Ireland, where we have several places so named. See Dr. Joyce's "Origin and History of Irish Names of Places," part ii., chap. v., p. 178.

<sup>8</sup> The name is also written Oengus, and Aongus, by the Irish.

<sup>9</sup> This is the Latin form, and it is also rendered Æneās. Keating says, that Ængus reigned for thirty-six years, and that he was killed, at the battle of Killofnadh, in the county of Carlow. See "General History castle was on the summit of the celebrated Rock, now so magnificently coroneted with ruins. Pagan idols had been erected, at that epoch, in the place. But, when the monarch arose, in the morning, and entered a heathen temple, all those idols were laid prostrate, on the advent of Patrick and his people in Cashel. Although the king set them up again, in their former position; yet, still they tumbled down; for, as Dagon could not stand before the Ark of God's Covenant,<sup>11</sup> so these Idols could not remain in their place, when the blessed bishop drew near to them. Deservedly may he be called an Ark of the Covenant, for he carried, as in a golden vessel, the Divine Manna of contemplative sweetness, the table of the Divine Law, and the rod of heavenly discipline. Hearing about the glorious bishop's approach, King Ænguss then went forward to meet him, and he received the saint with great honour, at the side of the fort; for, already he had some supernatural manifestation, regarding a superior power, who accompanied his august visitor. The monarch then bade him and his attendants welcome to his court; and, he took them into the Fort, near to that place, where Leac-Patrick,<sup>12</sup> or "Patrick's stone," was afterwards seen. While St. Patrick was at Cashel, it is stated, that he preached an eloquent sermon,<sup>13</sup> which had a powerful effect, on the minds of his auditors. The king and his chieftains believed in the doctrine of Christ, which they approved, and Patrick, placing his hand on the monarch's head, gave him a special blessing.<sup>14</sup> After that, he baptized the sons of Nadfraech,<sup>15</sup> with many belonging to the household, and other Munster men besides, who were there. The Apostle left a blessing, and he predicted prosperity for them. Moreover, he blessed their strong Fort of Cashel.<sup>16</sup>

While our Apostle was baptizing Ængus, the point of his crozier, on which Patrick was leaning, went through the king's sandle-covered foot.<sup>17</sup> After-of Ireland," book ii. He does not mark the precise date, for that battle; but, it is assigned, by the Four Masters, to the year 489. Again, St. Naol, or Natalis, of Kilmanagh, who died A.D. 564, is said to have been his son. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvii. Januarii. De S. Natali Abbate et Confessore, cap. i., p. 169.

<sup>10</sup> The arrival of St. Patrick, in South Munster, is referred by Dr. Lanigan, to the beginning of A.D. 445, or according to Ussher, to the year 449. But, although Ængus may have been a young prince, baptized at this time, it seems pretty evident, according to Dr. Lanigan, that he could not have occupied the throne, until a period long subsequent to this arrival of the Apostle. It is more than probable, his father Natfraich was the hospitable entertainer of St. Patrick.

<sup>11</sup> See i. Kings, v. 3, 4, 5.

<sup>12</sup> The Third Life calls it Leac Cothirge. The latter was one of St. Patrick's names. In Colgan's time, this object was a rock, called Leac-Phadruic, outside the walls of Cashel city, and greatly worn, through the effects of time. See n. 57, p. 32.

<sup>13</sup> The words and a summary of this discourse are given, in the Tract of Richard Stanihurst, "De Vita S. Patricii, Hiberniæ Apostoli," lib. ii., pp. 44 to 56.

<sup>14</sup> According to the Third Life, cap. lx., p. 26.

<sup>15</sup> The baptism of Aongus is narrated, in Patrick Kennedy's "Legendary Fictions of the Irish Celts," pp. 325, 326.

<sup>16</sup> According to the Irish Life, he said, that only one race should be there for ever; while, the Latin Life has it, that the blood of only one person should there be shed. In note 56, to the Third Life, p. 32, Colgan adopts an explanation, that this prophecy is not intended to apply, in reference to the Kings of Munster generally, of whom, nine or ten came to a violent death; but, rather to the kings, descending from Ængus alone, and being at the seat of Cashel, or, perhaps, it referred to the posterity of Ænguss and of his brother Olild. As an additional objection might arise, that no less than six princes of Munster, viz.: Fergus Scandal, Moelgual, Corbmac son of Culenn, Fingune son of Kinneggan, Moelforthartac, and Fergrad, belonging to the race of Ænguss, all perished by a violent death; it may be replied, that the prophecy of St. Patrick did not apply absolutely, to the princes of Munster, descending from Ænguss and Ailill, but only to one individual, who perished at Cashel, as the words of the prediction seem strictly to signify. However, the foregoing prophecy is poorly authenticated.

<sup>17</sup> As Aubrey De Vere, in his Poem, has it:—

"thus called to follow Him whose feet
Were pierced with nails, haply the bliss rite
Some little pain included."

wards, the saint asked, why he did not make that circumstance known.<sup>18</sup> "Because," said the heroic king, "I thought it was a rule of the faith." "You shall have its rewards,"<sup>19</sup> said Patrick,<sup>20</sup> "for, your successors,<sup>21</sup> from this day forth, shall not die from wounds."<sup>22</sup>

From a Life of St. Ailbe, it has been supposed, Patrick convened a Synod at Cashel, where it has been assumed, that the proto-missionaries of Munster, Ailbe of Emly,<sup>23</sup> Declan<sup>24</sup> of Ardmore, Ibar of Beg-Erin,<sup>25</sup> and Kieran of Saigir,<sup>26</sup> contended, at first, regarding their several privileges and jurisdictions.<sup>27</sup> At length, these matters are stated to have been satisfactorily arranged, by the respective saints, already mentioned.<sup>28</sup> It is said, they made various constitutions, for the good government of the Irish Church, and for the establishment of ecclesiastical discipline.<sup>29</sup>

After this, the saint went to Muscraidhe-Breogain,<sup>30</sup> where he founded churches and establishments. One day, while he was washing his hands in a ford there, a tooth fell from his mouth into the water. Patrick went upon a hillock, to the north of that shallow; and, some of his disciples began to look for the tooth. Forthwith, it glistened in the ford, like to the sun, or to a shining star; wherefore, Ath-fiaclai was the future name of that shallow, and Cill-fiacla, now said to be Kilfeacle,<sup>31</sup> became the denomination of that church. There,

<sup>18</sup> "St. Patrick at Cashel, or the Baptism of Aengus" is one, among Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 95 to 103.

<sup>19</sup> See John O'Daly's "Kings of the Race of Eibher," a chronological Irish poem, by John O'Dugan, with an English translation, by Michael Kearney, A.D. 1635, pp. 15, 16, and n. 3. In Aubrey De Vere's Poem, we have a forecast, that the "kingly church" to be built on that "rock, high-place of idols once," should "stand

For aye, or wrecked, from ruin rise restored,
His witness till He cometh."

<sup>20</sup> Thus is he related to have pronounced these words:—

"The sons of Nadfraech, of sounding fame,
Of them shall be kings and chieftains;
Ængus from the lands of Feimhen,
And Ailill, his brother."

We are informed, that twenty-eight kings, ordained with the crozier, according to the Irish Tripartite—or twenty-seven, tonsured as Monks, according to the Latin version—of the race of Ailill and of Aengus, reigned in Cashel, until the time of Cenngegan, or Kenngegan, who is otherwise known as Finghuine, King of Cashel. He was slain, A.D. 897.

<sup>21</sup> These were descendants, from Aengus and Ailill, sons of Nadfraech.

<sup>22</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life adds, that no one was King of Cashel, until Patrick's comarb ordained him, and imposed the grade on him.

<sup>23</sup> This is now a parish, in the barony of Clanwilliam, and it is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 57, 58, 65,

66. The town is on Sheet 65.

<sup>24</sup> In his Life, there is no account of Declan having been at a Synod in Cashel.

<sup>25</sup> This is in the parish of St. Margaret's, in the barony of Shelmaliere East. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wexford," Sheet 38.

<sup>26</sup> His Acts state, that he visited Ængus, at Cashel, on a certain occasion, but they have no account of his being present, at a Synod, in that place. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," v. Martii, Vita S. Kyranii.

<sup>27</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., pp. 801 to 866, et seq.

<sup>28</sup> Harris confounded the narrative of Kieran's and Ibar's proceedings, relatively to St. Patrick, with what was said to have occurred at Cashel, between St. Patrick, Ailbe and Declan. So far as regards the appointments to Saigir and Beg-erin, Harris ought to have known, that in accounts concerning this matter, Kieran and Ibar are exhibited, as having been bishops in those places, even before St. Patrick's mission began in Ireland. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. vii., n. 71, p. 287.

<sup>29</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," pp. 20, 21.

<sup>30</sup> It was otherwise called Muscraidhe Chuir, from the family of the O'Cuirc, now Quirk. This territory is now included in the barony of Clanwilliam, in the southwest of the county of Tipperary. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," p. lxx., n. 609.

<sup>31</sup> This now is a parish, in the barony of Clanwilliam, and it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 59, 60, 67,

Patrick left the tooth, and it was afterwards preserved as a most precious relic. Four of his people, viz., Cuirthe,<sup>32</sup> also called Curcneus,<sup>33</sup> and Loscan, Cailech, and Bedan,<sup>34</sup> or Beoanus,<sup>35</sup> were left there, as custodians<sup>36</sup> of that much-prized depository. Then, St. Patrick took leave of the Muscraidhe people, and gave them a blessing. According to tradition,<sup>37</sup> while in the south part of this country, he founded a church, or monastery, on the summit of a hill, afterwards called Ardpatrick;<sup>38</sup> and, here are the remains of a Round Tower,<sup>39</sup> as also those of an ancient temple. The holy missionary 68. The townland proper is on Sheets 59, 67.

Ardpatrick Church and Round Tower, County of Limerick.

<sup>32</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>33</sup> According to the Latin version.

<sup>34</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>35</sup> According to the Latin version.

<sup>36</sup> Colgan labours, without any very satisfactory result, to connect their names with certain saints, noted in the Irish Calendars.

<sup>37</sup> See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," vol. i., p. 56.

<sup>38</sup> This parish is in the barony of Coshlea, and it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheets 48, 56. The townland proper is on the latter Sheet.

<sup>39</sup> About fifty years ago, a great portion of the Round Tower fell. The old church was a large, plainly-built structure, with walls of unusual thickness. Its doorway, which is in the south side wall—there appears to have been no chancel—was anciently surmounted by a machicolation, or bartizan. This contrivance was commonly, in castles, styled by our peasantry a "murdering hole." It projected from the highest part of the church wall, and the corbels which supported it still remain. From this kind of vantage point missiles, or scalding water, or melted lead, might be poured upon the heads of people, endeavouring to force the door. There is a perfect example of the bartizan, surmounting the only doorway of Jerpoint Abbey, in the county of Kilkenny. The round tower of Ardpatrick must have been one of the finest, in Ireland, and it must have looked very grand from its highly-elevated position. It is built, in regular courses of masonry. Only about 25 or 30 feet of the structure remain, and the stonework is Roman-looking. Close to the church, there is a very deep well, lined with stones, but now choked up, with those that have fallen. The foregoing descriptive particulars have been furnished, by William F. Wakeman, in a letter, dated Enniskillen, October 17th, 1879. He also drew the illustration here presented, on the spot, and transferred it to the wood. It has been engraved, by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>40</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>41</sup> Colgan describes it, as a mediterranean

afterwards went to Aradha-Cliach,<sup>42</sup> or Aracliach,<sup>41</sup> a territory which comprised the present parish of Kiltelly<sup>42</sup> and the barony of Coonagh, in the east of Limerick County.<sup>43</sup> He came to a place, called Jochtar-Cuillenn, or Huachtar-chuillen, now Cullen townland and parish,<sup>44</sup> in the old territory of Ui-Cuannach.<sup>45</sup> There, Olild, or Ailill, the son of Cathbadh, son to Lughaidh, belonging to the Eoghanacht<sup>46</sup> of Airthir<sup>47</sup>-Cliach, and a chief over this part of the country, met him. For a time, that Dynast resisted the grace of God, which worked through the preaching and merits of St. Patrick. But, a great family affliction befell him, and this was the means of effecting his conversion. His wife went to the hillock, where the clerics were, one day, and she cried aloud in a distracted manner, that the swine had torn in pieces and had devoured her son Ailill, who was greatly beloved by his parents. Soon the father appeared, with humble and subdued mien,—for he was overcome with grief,—and Ailill said to St. Patrick, “I will believe, if you resuscitate my son.” Therefore, the holy Patrick commanded the boy’s bones to be collected, and then he directed a Céle-Dé<sup>48</sup> of his people, who was called Malach,<sup>49</sup> or Malachias,<sup>50</sup> Britt,<sup>51</sup> to resuscitate him. But this disciple, who was very humble, said, “I will not offend the Lord;” for, he was seized with a doubt, that the Almighty would effect a miracle, through so unworthy an instrument. Patrick then said, “That is pitiful, O Malach; thy house on earth shall not be high, and it shall be a small one; thy house shall only be the house of one man.” His house was in the north-eastern angle<sup>52</sup> of the southern Deise, and its name was Cill-Malaich,<sup>53</sup> so called after the founder. Five persons could never be supported there, according to the Irish Tripartite Life; while the Latin version has it, that the land attaching to the place was so scant, as scarcely to serve for the feeding of five cows. Afterwards, St. Patrick commanded Bishops Ibar<sup>54</sup> and Ailbhe,<sup>55</sup> to resuscitate the boy. The region of Munster, and near to the city of Limerick, towards the east.

<sup>42</sup> It is situated, partly within the barony of Smallcounty, and partly within that of Coonagh. It is defined, on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick,” Sheets 23, 24, 32, 33.

<sup>43</sup> According to Dr. O’Donovan, in “The Topographical Poems of John O’Dubhagáin and Giolla na Naomh O’Huidhrin,” n. 755, pp. lxxiii., lxxiv. Ui-Cuannach seems formerly to have included Crota Cliach, now the Galtée Mountains, in the county of Tipperary. It was only a portion of Ara Cliach.

<sup>44</sup> These lie in the barony of Clanwilliam, and it is shown, on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary,” Sheet 58.

<sup>45</sup> Now the barony of Coonagh.

<sup>46</sup> The descendants of Eoghain Mor, son to Oilioll Olum, who flourished in the second century of the Christian era, were called Eoghanachts, by the Irish genealogists. See Dr. O’Donovan’s “Annals of the Four Masters,” vol. i., n. (b), p. 109.

<sup>47</sup> This signifies, in English, “east,” or “eastern.”

<sup>48</sup> This name Céle-Dé was equivalent to the special designation servus Dei, conferred on those, in the early Church, who adopted the practices of the monastic life. This is the earliest known application of the Irish equivalent Cele-De, which Colgan, as Rev. Dr. Reeves observes, incorrectly rendered in Latin, by cuidam advenæ, instead of monacho, or servo Dei. See Essay, “On the Celi-de, commonly called Culdees,” by Rev. Dr. Reeves, in “Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy,” vol. xxiv., pp. 121, 122.

<sup>49</sup> So is he called, in the Irish Tripartite Lives.

<sup>50</sup> Thus is he named, by Jocelyn. His identity does not appear to have been determined.

<sup>51</sup> This word signifies, that he was a native of Britain.

<sup>52</sup> So states the Irish Tripartite Life; while the Latin Life has it, “in orientali limite.”

<sup>53</sup> Several places, bearing this name, are in Limerick; and, there are three Kilmaloges, in the south of Tipperary. This appears to be Kilmaloo, in the parish of Kinsalebeg, in the south of the barony of Decies-Within-Drom, county of Waterford, according to a note, 6, p. 468, in Miss Cusack’s “Life of St. Patrick.” This district was marked, as we are told, on old maps, as South Decies. It is said to be within the diocese of Lismore. However, South Deise was situated in the county of Limerick.

<sup>54</sup> His feast occurs, at the 23rd of April.

<sup>55</sup> His festival is held, on the 12th of September.

<sup>56</sup> It is thought, that as St. Patrick conse-

Apostle prayed to the Lord with them ; and, accordingly, the boy was afterwards resuscitated, having regained his former figure and health.<sup>56</sup> The legend states, that he subsequently preached to the hosts, and to the multitudes, who were present, dilating on the shortness of life, and on its fleetness, whereby man so soon passes to the future of an eternity, either of delights or of misery. All this happened, in St. Patrick's presence. Ailill, his wife, and family, thereupon believed ; moreover, all the Ui-Cuanach embraced the Faith, and were baptized, at that place. There, too, four great stones were set up, to commemorate the four, chiefly concerned in this transaction, viz. : Patrick, Ailbhe, Bishop Ibar, and the resuscitated boy. This monument was shown, in after time.<sup>57</sup> Four persons, living in the north, stole Patrick's horses and those of his companions. The saint not only forgave them, but even admitted the delinquents among his servants. One of these was a leech, and a learned man, whose name was Coen-chomrachus, or Caencomhrae ;<sup>58</sup> another was a carpenter ; another was an Oeconomus, or a bondman ; but the fourth was a groom, whose name was Aedh. Patrick called this latter, and blessed his hands. The saint told him, that his name should be Lam-Aedh, from that day forward ; and, that from him, the Lamhraighe family should descend.<sup>59</sup>

A very idle legend is next given, in the Tripartite Life of our saint, and referable to his residence, in this part of the country.<sup>60</sup> Similar popular traditions prevail, in various neighbouring districts.<sup>61</sup> We are told, that St. Patrick desired to remain, and to build a church, by the side of Clar,<sup>62</sup> now crated Bishop Ailbe, he likewise held a Synod, in the city of Emly ; for, it is stated, in the old Life of St. Declan, that with him and many other holy disciples, various constitutions referring to Christian discipline were framed by them. Father Villanueva says, "Dolendum sanè est non extare has christianæ rigoris constitutiones, canones nempe in illa synodo editos."—"Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., pp. 11, 12.

<sup>57</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life adds, that the father said—we may presume in admiration at the miracle—"God cures by the hand of the physician."

<sup>58</sup> He does not seem to have been identified.

<sup>59</sup> We are not further enlightened, regarding this person and his posterity.

<sup>60</sup> The story is thus recorded : At that time, the pains of childbirth seized Ailill's wife, who was enciente, so that immediate death was greatly apprehended. Delirium seems to have seized on her, and she was in a state of deep melancholy. Patrick asked what was the matter with her. The woman answered, "I saw an herb, floating in the air, and I saw not the like of it on earth. I shall die, or the being in my womb shall die, or we shall both die, unless I taste that herb." Patrick asked her what was the species of that herb. "Like to rushes," said the woman. Patrick thereupon blessed some rushes, and they were in appearance like the herb of her vision. The woman then ate them, when she was forthwith relieved from her melancholia, and pains.

After some time, she gave birth to a son. The saint also baptized him, and gave him blessing. It is reported, that Patrick said all women, who eat of that herb, should be healed in their infirmities.

<sup>61</sup> It is related, that on Christmas Eve, while travelling, between Kilmallock and Kilfinane, St. Patrick came to the townland of Ballinanima, in the parish of Bultadin. The Apostle happened to ask hospitality from a man, who had neither fire nor milk. Upon this, he told that peasant to go and bring in the rushes—then covered with snow—which he heaped on the hearth, and they immediately ignited. A local Irish phrase commemorates the miracle as follows :—Bailenanima a lapaín luadain ghlá—"Bailenanima where the green rushes light (burn)." Hence, the people there believe, that the green rushes of this townland ignite, when placed on the fire, no matter at what season of the year. Regarding the want of milk, it is stated, that a cow, which had newly calved, came to the door of the house, while the saint was within—and it is asserted, that there is a newly-calving cow, on Christmas Eve, in Bailenanima, ever since. Such is the communication of Mr. D. A. O'Leary, dated, November 10th, 1877, and directed from Kilbolane Cottage, Charleville.

<sup>62</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life. On this stands a remarkable cromlech, which is thought to be the tomb of Oilioll Olum, King of Munster, in the third century.

<sup>63</sup> It rises about three miles, to the north-west of the village of Galbally. See Dr.

known as Sliabh-Claire, a considerable hill,<sup>63</sup> situated a short distance to the east of Duntryleague church.<sup>64</sup> It was near the castle of Rath-Cairbre and Brocain. However, he was opposed by the posterity of Cairbre and of Colman. When the saint began there the erection of a church, he was not permitted to proceed with it. Then, Patrick said, that never should a king or a bishop come from the race of those, who had opposed him. He also declared, that the place should belong to himself, afterwards, and this his prophecy was duly accomplished; for, he left a man of his people there,<sup>65</sup> namely Caemhan,<sup>66</sup> of Cill-Rath.<sup>67</sup> The holy Apostle had resolved, likewise, to build a church, in a very agreeable situation, within Ara territory, where a local magnate, named Dola,<sup>68</sup> opposed him. Ibar<sup>69</sup> there selected a place of residence, as we are told,<sup>70</sup> in Grian,<sup>71</sup> said to be the church and parish of Grean.<sup>72</sup> Here, Patrick said, that there should not be a house, belonging to Dola, in that spot, or if there should be, it could only suffice for the lifetime of two or three members, belonging to his family, and even these should be subject to strange masters. The other descendants of Dola removed to Airthier-Cliaich,<sup>73</sup> and Dal-Modola,<sup>74</sup> or "the race of Dola," was their denomination, until the Tripartite Life had been written. So was Patrick's prophecy again fulfilled. A certain evil-minded dynast of those parts, called Nena,<sup>75</sup> went to the holy man, who refused to receive him; for, he said, that the chief should not be prosperous. None of his successors occupied the place, afterwards, but these were subjugated by the people of Museraighe-Mittine.<sup>76</sup> The enslaved race were called Menraighe,<sup>77</sup> or Men-rige.<sup>78</sup> Here, the holy man laboured with great zeal, although meeting adversities, until he had placed the Church on a satisfactory footing. Patrick then resolved on leaving this place. But, the women of Grian, filled with emotion, because he had been to them so kind a father and pastor, came to bewail his depar-

O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 1600, vol. vi., n. (q), p. 2150.

<sup>64</sup> This townland is in the barony of Coshlea. See it noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheets 41, 49.

<sup>65</sup> This happened, when some years had elapsed.

<sup>66</sup> In his attempt to identify this Caemhan, with a holy man so named, belonging to the Island of Aran, it is clear, that Colgan mistakes the mountain Claire, for the county so called, Clare, in Munster. See his note 88, to the Second Part of the Latin Tripartite, p. 177, in his "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>67</sup> Now probably Raheen, in the parish of Ballyscaddan, adjoining Knocklong, in the barony of Coshlea, and county of Limerick. It is convenient to Sliabh-Claire, near which, in his MS. notes to Colgan, Roderick O'Flaherty wrote, that Kilrath was situated. See, also, Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 424.

<sup>68</sup> Colgan seeks to identify him with Dola, the son of Laidir, surnamed Aradh, the son of Cucorb, and the ancestor of St. Scuthin, of St. Ailbe, Bishop of Emly, and of St. Mochuaroc, as found in the "Sanctilogic Genealogies of the Irish Saints," chap. xxix.

<sup>69</sup> Most likely, he was venerated at the 23rd of April.

<sup>70</sup> Only in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>71</sup> So is it called, in the Irish Tripartite Life; but, in the Latin version, we read, "Grian-ara, i.e. sol sive solarium, Arae regionis."

<sup>72</sup> It contains the town of Pallas-Green, in the baronies of Coonagh and Clanwilliam, in the county of Limerick.

<sup>73</sup> Colgan writes of it, "in regione de Airthier-chliach regioni Arae vicina."

<sup>74</sup> There are two townlands, named Dollas, in the parish of Croone, barony of Coshma, and county of Limerick.

<sup>75</sup> This name only occurs, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>76</sup> This district comprised fifteen parishes, in the Deanery of Musgrylin, in the north-west of the county of Cork, according to the "Liber Regalis Visitationis." It was also called Muscraide Uí Fhlóinn, after the establishment of surnames. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (v), p. 44. In the "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," O'Donovan writes, that it was the ancient name of the barony of West Muskerry. See p. lxix., n. 602.

<sup>77</sup> So are they designated in the Irish Tripartite, and we are told, that their district was in the county of Cork, in South Munster, near to Muskerry Mitine.

ture. They shed tears, and expressed with every sign of sorrow, for the loss they were about to sustain. Patrick therefore blessed them, and he said, that the children they should bear, even when affiliated to extern tribes, must become illustrious and honoured in the nation.

Patrick desired to bid the people of Aradh-Cliach farewell, and he came to a mountain, which was called Teidhil,<sup>79</sup> said to be near the church, and in the parish, of Kilteely,<sup>80</sup> or Kilteel, where it is stated,<sup>81</sup> that the Knights Templars afterwards had a church, on an eminence. When he was bidding the people a farewell, two of his disciples, called Muin, or Munis, and Lomchu, also denominated Longa, remained behind him. They were sent for, and found asleep, under a bush, near the hill. This was told to St. Patrick. "Here their place of death and of resurrection shall be," said the Apostle. His prediction was true, for they rested in their church,<sup>82</sup> which was known as Kill-Teidhil.<sup>83</sup> He went after this to Hy-Fidhgente,<sup>84</sup> which territory adjoined Ara Cliach. From the latter, it was separated, by the river Samhair.<sup>85</sup> There, Lonan, son of Eirc, was chief ruler, and he received the saint and his companions with distinguished honour. He provided a grand banquet,<sup>86</sup> for so illustrious a guest, at his castle, which arose on the summit of Mullach-Cae, or Mount Kea,<sup>87</sup> over against Carn-Feradhaigh,<sup>88</sup> or Carn-Feradhuic,<sup>89</sup> on the south. There, Deacon Mantan,<sup>90</sup> or Montan, a man of Patrick's people, was preparing the banquet along with the king. The Irish Apostle was greatly displeased, because the chief persons concerned had not yielded readily to the demands and insults of some importunate strolling buffoons,<sup>91</sup> called Druids, who required the meat, prepared for this banquet. We are told, that their chief, or conductor, was one Derg, or Derc, the son of Scirire, or Shirius, of the Southern Desi,<sup>92</sup> which was also called Deis-Beag.<sup>93</sup> Thereupon, the prophetic

<sup>79</sup> Thus are they named, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>79</sup> The Irish Tripartite remarks, that it is the name of a hill.

<sup>80</sup> This is in the baronies of Coonagh and Smallcounty, and towards the east of Limerick County. It formed part of the ancient Ara-Cliach.

<sup>81</sup> By Archdall, in his "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 425. For this statement, he quotes Smith's MSS.

<sup>82</sup> Colgan scarcely succeeds, in his conjectures, regarding the Munis and Lomchu, who were buried there.

<sup>83</sup> Archdall distinguishes this place from Kilteel. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 425.

<sup>84</sup> Its people are also called "Nepotes Fidgenti." Their territory was bounded on the north, by the River Shannon, on the south, by Slieve Luachra, on the east, by the rivers Maigne and Morning Star, and on west, by Kerry. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. v., n. (c), p. 1580.

<sup>85</sup> This is now the Morning Star River. It rises, in the south of Limerick County, and it flows into the Maigne.

<sup>86</sup> "St. Patrick at the Feast of Knock Cae; or the Founding of Mungret," is a poem of Aubrey De Vere, and to be found among his "Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 127 to 141.

<sup>87</sup> It is thought to have been, on the borders of the counties of Cork and Limerick.

<sup>88</sup> So called, in the Irish Tripartite Life. It is supposed to be the ancient name of Seefin, in the barony of Coshlea, in the south of Limerick County. As referring to St. Patrick, at this place, a legend, concerning Ardpatrick, will be found in Duffy's "Hibernian Magazine," vol. i., in the article, "Seefin and its Environs," by Martin Haverty, the Editor.

<sup>89</sup> It is thus denominated, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>90</sup> It is thought, that the present holy man was venerated, on the 2nd of March, and that Kilmantan, the ancient name for Wicklow town, had its origin from him. An elegant aquatinta view of the Franciscan Abbey ruins, in 1793, at Wicklow town, is to be found, in Jonathan Fisher's "Scenery of Ireland, illustrated in a Series of Prints," &c., Plate xxvi.

<sup>91</sup> So are they designated, in the Latin Tripartite Life; in the Irish version, these strollers are called artists.

<sup>92</sup> This was a territory, lying around the hill of Knockany, and containing Brugh-na-Deise, now the town of Bruff, in the barony of Coshma, and county of Limerick. Dr. O'Donovan quotes an extract, from a historical tale, in the Book of Leinster, where the hero Cuchullin is introduced, as stand-

Patrick said, there should not be a king, or an heir apparent, or a bishop, in Lonan's family<sup>94</sup> for ever; while he assured Mantan, the deacon, that his church should not be exalted on earth, but that it should be the abode of the very dregs of the people, and that swine and sheep should trample on his own remains.<sup>95</sup> The Irish Apostle had a foreknowledge,<sup>96</sup> that a youth, named Nesson,<sup>97</sup> with his mother, was then on his way, with a cooked wedder, carried in a basket, probably as an offering for Lonan's table. Then, St. Patrick begged of the boy, to give him the wedder to save his honour. The son, at once, gave it cheerfully, although the mother was unwilling to do so, through fear of the king. Patrick, afterwards, gave that food to the players; but, no sooner had they partaken of it, than they dropped dead. Then, to Nesson, who had saved his reputation, the Apostle promised, that he should be honoured among the nations. And soon St. Patrick baptized him, ordained him deacon, and founded for him a monastery and church, named Mungarit,<sup>98</sup> now Mungret.<sup>99</sup> His mother endeavoured to excuse herself; but, he said, that she should not be buried in her son's church. This came to pass, for her grave lay to the west of Mungarit,<sup>100</sup> and the bells of its great church were not heard in that place.<sup>101</sup>

Having learned of his arrival, the men of Thomond,<sup>102</sup> to the north of Luimnech, went in fleets of boats, over the Shannon, to meet St. Patrick, southwards, so far as Domhnach-mor,<sup>103</sup> of Magh-Aine,<sup>104</sup> and to a place,

ing on the top of Knockany, near Bruff, and thus he points out the mountains, and other features of the country, to his tutor, Laigh: "Say, my tutor, Laigh, dost thou know what territory we are in?" "I know not, indeed." "I know then," said Cuchullin: "Ceann-Abhrat Sleibhe-Cain, this [mountain] to the south; the mountains of Eibhlinni, these to the north; the River Luimneach is that bright river, which thou seest; Druim-Collchoilli is this on which we are, which is called Aini-Cliach, in the territory of Deis-Beg; to the south of us is the army in Cliu-Mail-mic-Ugainne, in the lands of Curoi, son of Dari." Slieve Eibhlinni extended from near Roscrea, to the north-eastern boundary of Limerick.

<sup>93</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 1560, vol. v., n. (d), pp. 1580, 1581.

<sup>94</sup> Loneis is added in a gloss, as the tribe-name of this family. The Third and Sixth Lives have those events in Ormond.

<sup>95</sup> It is a remarkable circumstance, that Colgan himself witnessed such a desecration of the grave-yard, on Kilmantan Hill, in the town of Wicklow. Since 1798, the grave-yard has been enclosed, and it is now used—strange to relate—as a vegetable garden, in the spot so well remembered, by the oldest inhabitants.

<sup>96</sup> Then Patrick is said to have proclaimed, in the stanza of an Irish Poem, thus translated:—

"The youth who comes from the north,
To him is vouchsafed the triumph;
To Cothraige he comes,
With his little wedder on his back."

<sup>97</sup> He is venerated, at the church of Mungret, on the 25th of July. He is said to have died, A.D. 551.

<sup>98</sup> It lies about three miles south-west of Limerick City. The "Annals of the Four Masters" record the death of several among its abbots, and airchinnechs, besides its various devastations, by the Danes. A portion of the abbey and its church still remains.

<sup>99</sup> It is now a parish, in the barony of Pubblebrien, and it is defined, on the "Ordinance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheets 4, 5, 12, 13.

<sup>100</sup> The exact site is not more particularly defined.

<sup>101</sup> Such is the account in the Latin Tripartite Life; however, the Irish version states, that they were almost together, and only separated by a wall.

<sup>102</sup> This territory was also called Tuath Mumha, or North Munster; and, it extended from Leim Chonchulain, or Loop Head, to Bealach-mor, or Ballaghmore, in Upper Ossory, and from Sliabh Echtghe, or Slieve Aughty, on the borders of the counties of Clare and Galway, to Sliabh Eibhlinne, now the Slieve Phelim range, in the county of Tipperary. The southern boundary of this great territory is still preserved, in that of the diocese of Killaloe. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (w), pp. 260, 261. St. Patrick's journey into Thomond is noticed in the Hodges and Smith MS. classed 23. N. 22. p. 423. R.I.A.

<sup>103</sup> Several places, bearing this name, occur in Ireland, but the present one seems to defy identification.

<sup>104</sup> Mention is made of a Magh-n-Aidhne, at A.M. 3727, and of a Magh-Aidhne, at A.M. 3872, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters." The learned editor called Dun-Nocfene,<sup>105</sup> or Dun-Naoc-Fene.<sup>106</sup> We are told, that he preached to them the Word of God, and that he baptized them in Tir-glais,<sup>107</sup> beyond the bounds of their own territory. By many, this place has been identified with Terryglass, on the east side of Lough Derg, in the barony of Lower Ormond, and county of Tipperary.<sup>108</sup> This is by no means certain, however, and the place, in question, may possibly be sought for, within the bounds of the present county of Limerick.

While St. Patrick was in this part of the country, Cairthenn,<sup>109</sup> or Carthenn,<sup>110</sup> son of Blat,<sup>111</sup> or Blodius,<sup>112</sup> the senior of the Clann-Toirdhelbhaigh,<sup>113</sup> believed in the Lord, and the holy Apostle baptized him, at Saingeal,<sup>114</sup> or Sangul.<sup>115</sup> No children were born to Cairthenn, except such as were deformities, to that time. It was then that Eochodius,<sup>116</sup> also called Eochu Ballderg,<sup>117</sup> was born to Cairthenn, and he was at first a monstrosity, in appearance. But, St. Patrick procured, by his prayers and blessing, that he should be perfect, in all his senses, and of elegant personal shape. Although St. Patrick did not cross over to Thomond, at this time, he went to Finnine,<sup>118</sup> nevertheless, and this place lay to the north-west of Domhnach-mor,<sup>119</sup> a hill from which he could see that country to the north and identifies it with a level district, in the present county of Galway, and comprised within the diocese of Kilmacduagh. See vol. i., n. (m), p. 45. Also, pp. 52, 53, and n. (k). This, however, cannot be the territory, mentioned in the text.

<sup>105</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life, which adds, that it was then, at the time of writing, so called.

<sup>106</sup> As rendered, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>107</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life adds, to the south-east of it.

<sup>108</sup> The monastery here was founded by St. Colum, son of Ninnidh. He descended from the race of King Cathaoir Mor. He died on the 13th December, A.D. 548, and on that day, his festival was kept,

<sup>109</sup> So is he called, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>110</sup> Thus is he named, in the Latin Tripartite. In the n. 76, affixed, we find the words "Theodoricianæ familiæ progenitor" added, as if they had been omitted, through some mistake, from the printed copy of the Tripartite. This Carthen Fionn, also called Carthen more, or the great, was regarded as the chieftain of North Munster. Book of Lecain fol. 219 a. He is placed, at the head of the illustrious family of the O'Briens, in Thomond, in Keating's pedigrees. This prince is said to have been the immediate ancestor of Earl Inchiquin and of Sir Lucius O'Brien, who lived towards the close of the last century. See Comerford's "History of Ireland," p. 229.

<sup>111</sup> This name is given him, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>112</sup> Such is his name, in the Latin version.

<sup>113</sup> Dr. O'Donovan states, that Magh-Ua-Toudhealbhaigh was a plain, near the Shannon, in the parish of Killaloe, in the east of the county of Clare. See "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., n. (y), p. 94. Elsewhere, he defines the territory of this sept, as bounded on the north by Ui-Conghaile; on the east, by the Shannon; on the south and south-west, by the River Shannon; and, on the west, by Glenomra, the territory of O'Kennedy. See "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin," p. lxxxii., n. 737.

<sup>114</sup> Now said to be Singland, a townland in St. Patrick's parish, about one mile south-east from the city of Limerick. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., n. (y), p. 935. This event of the chief's baptism did not take place, in 434, as the local historian Ferrer states; but, at least, twelve years later. See, likewise, Vallancey's "Collectanea," part iv., p. 439.

<sup>115</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life here adds a parenthesis, that a different angel went to converse with him that day, and not Victor. This seems to be a play upon the words, Sain-angel, "particular angel." Singland was regarded as the seat of O'Comhneen, or O'Coneen. See Ferrar's "History of Limerick," part iii., chap. iii., p. 184.

<sup>116</sup> So is he called, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>117</sup> Or "Eochy of the Red Spot." He was the eldest son of Cairthenn Finn.

<sup>118</sup> So is it called, in the Irish Tripartite Life; but, in the Latin version, it is called Fintine. This spot has not been identified. It may be Knockpatrick, or St. Patrick's Hill, near Limerick, which affords a beautiful, bold, and extensive prospect, over the Shannon, the surrounding country, and the ocean. The scene is diversified with every feature required, to form a charming landscape. Ard-Patrick, or the Height of Patrick, is a beautiful green hill, at the Limerick side of the Hournas. It rises near the River Shannon. By a native poet, a chieftain is represented as riding where—west of Luimnech.<sup>120</sup> The bays and islands of the River Shannon were beneath him, when he gave a blessing to the men and district of North Munster. Its people had come, with a profusion of gifts, to meet the holy Patrick. He also blessed the islands, and he prophesied, regarding the saints that should appear in them; he announced their names, and the time in which they should come. "That green island in the west," said Patrick, "near the mouth of the sea, the lamp of the people of God shall shine in it. He shall be the head of counsel to this district." He alluded to St. Senan<sup>121</sup> of Inis-Cathaigh,<sup>122</sup> who was to flourish six score of years after that time. He did not go across Luachair<sup>123</sup> or Kerry, into Western Munster; but, he prophesied, that the renowned Brenainn, or Brendan,<sup>124</sup> called the Navigator, of the Ua-Alta family, who was to be the bright particular star of that region, should be born one hundred and twenty years later,<sup>125</sup> and like all the great Apostle's other predictions, as we are told, this was truly fulfilled.<sup>126</sup>

CHAPTER XX.

ST. PATRICK PROCEEDS TOWARDS SOUTHERN MUNSTER—HIS MISSION AMONG THE DESII—HE VISITS MUSCRAIGE-THIRE—RESULTS OF HIS LABOURS IN MUNSTER—HE BLESSES AND TAKES LEAVE OF THE PEOPLE.

OUR next account of the illustrious Apostle represents him, as returning towards Desmond, or South Munster.<sup>1</sup> From surviving traditions, it seems pro-

"The blest Hill of Patrick slopes green with its tall Guebre tower on his way."

Nearly half a century ago, this round tower fell, still leaving traces of its remains, near an ancient church, on the summit of Ard-Patrick. The time of these foundations is at present unknown; but, they certainly date back to a remote period. See R. D. Joyce's "Ballads, Romances and Songs," Sir Donnall, stanza v., p. 109, and note, ibid.

<sup>119</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life; but, according to the Latin, we only read, that it was "juxta Domnach-mor." The parish of Donaghmore, in the barony of Clanwilliam, is defined, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheet 13. It is erroneously stated, that in the year of our Lord, 433, St. Patrick—according to a local historian—crossed the Shannon, at Lumneach, or Limerick. He was then on his way to Connaught, it is said. At St. Patrick's well, in the southern suburbs of Limerick, a large rock is shown, which served for his bed. In the year mentioned, he is said, also, to have founded a famous monastery, at Mungret. See, Ferrar's "History of Limerick," part i., chap. i., p. 4, and chap. iv., p. 427.

<sup>120</sup> The ancient name, for the present city of Limerick.

<sup>121</sup> He was the son of Gergenn, son of Dubhthach. His feast occurs, at the 8th of March.

<sup>122</sup> Now Scatteray Island, in the River Shannon.

<sup>123</sup> This word is said to mean, "a rushy district." Probably it is now Slieve-Logher, a range of mountain, which divides the county of Limerick from that of Kerry, and which extends into Cork County. For a full description, the reader is referred to Eugene O'Curry's "Battle of Magh-Lena," p. 24.

<sup>124</sup> His festival occurs, at the 16th of May.

<sup>125</sup> This, however, does not tally with received chronology, and Colgan suspects an error of some scribe, in placing cxx. for xxx.

<sup>126</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lx., lxi., lxii., p. 26, nn. 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, p. 32. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxiv., lxxv., lxxxiii., lxxxv., lxxxvii., xxxix., xl., xli., xlii., xliii., xlv., xlv., xlv., xlvii., pp. 155 to 158, and nn. 55 to 79, pp. 186, 187. Also Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 466 to 472, with corresponding notes.

CHAPTER XX.—<sup>1</sup> Harris has committed a serious blunder, where he says, that Desmond or Desmond is West Munster, and now Kerry. See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. vii., sect. i., pp. 49, 51. Kerry, or, at least, the greatest part of it, was not included in the ancient Desmond. It belonged to Iar-Muin, or West Munster. Some parts bable, he made a détour, through the western part of the present county of Limerick, and now known as the baronies of Lower and Upper Connello.<sup>2</sup> A mountain, anciently called Luachra,<sup>3</sup> arose near St. Ita's<sup>4</sup> nunnery, and the name may probably afford a clue to the direction of his journey. However, it must be observed, that in a very disconnected and general manner, the transactions of St. Patrick, in South Munster, are related. Hence, it is no easy matter to arrange them, in any intelligible sequence.

While St. Patrick was in the southern part of the Desii, he had laid out the lines for building a church, and on a hill, called Ard-Patrick.<sup>5</sup> The foundations long afterwards were to be seen, as also a rock, called, in Latin, Lapis Patricii. The chief or dynast of the place is named Derbhallus, the son of Aidus, in the Tripartite. This chief was a scoffer and sceptic, who wished to put the holy missionary's powers at fault. According to Jocelyn, this noble man of Munster—and by him named Cearbballus—would not permit St. Patrick to build a church, within his territories. Not far from the nobleman's house, there was a fair and spacious lake, called Loch Longa,<sup>6</sup> very pleasant to behold; but, owing to the interposition of a great mountain, called Kennsebhrad,<sup>7</sup> his house was deprived of that grateful prospect. The saint urged this noble man, very much, to give him leave to build a church. The chief answered, "If you remove this great mountain, that deprives my house of the pleasant prospect over that broad and spacious lake, lying in Fera-Maighe-Feine,<sup>8</sup> on the further side, I will then yield to your request for building a church." The saint offered up to God his prayers, and the earth, it is related, swallowed down the mountain. Notwithstanding, the perfidious man would not stand to his former promise. Wherefore, the saint prayed to God, a second time, when the mountain forthwith swelled up, to its former height and greatness. St. Patrick predicted, moreover, that no magnate or bishop should issue from his family, and that himself even must soon loose his hold, upon the land, by being called away from life.<sup>9</sup> Belach Legtha, or "the melted pass," is the name for a very remarkable depression on the

to the east of modern Kerry might have been comprised in Desmond, such as these adjoining the county of Cork, which was the real Desmond. It could not be said, that St. Patrick had turned back from Luachra, adjoining Kerry, when going into Desmond, if Kerry, generally speaking, were that same territory. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. viii., n. 86, pp. 292, 293.

<sup>2</sup> A moat, containing seven acres, is situated near Cluincach church, in the barony of Upper Connello, diocese and county of Limerick. According to a popular legend, an enormous serpent encircled this moat, and his head reached to his tail, at a time when St. Patrick arrived there. The Apostle is said to have rested his hand on a stone—where "rounds" are still made by the people—and thence he cast a Missal, which struck and killed the serpent. The foregoing information was communicated to the writer, in a letter from Mr. D. A. O'Leary, Kilbolane Cottage, Charleville, 10th of November, 1877.

<sup>3</sup> Rev. Dr. O'Brien in his "Irish Dictionary," at the word Muscrith, has Muscrith Luachra, the land, he says, lying between Kilmallock, Kilfinane, and Ard-patrick. From what follows in the Tripartite Life, it is plain, that the Luachra to which it alludes, lay more to the west. It was not far from the borders of the county of Kerry; and, it may have been the district alluded to, by Dr. O'Brien, which was distinguished by the epithet, Muscrith, because it was a pleasant country.

<sup>4</sup> The feast of this holy woman is kept, on the 15th of January, at Killeely.

<sup>5</sup> Now a parish and church, in the barony of Coshlea, where there is a round tower, in Limerick County. See Ferrar's "History of Limerick," chap. v., pp. 433, 434.

<sup>6</sup> It has not been identified.

<sup>7</sup> Called Cenn-Abhrat, in William M. Hennessy's translation of the Irish Tripartite Life. It is said to be one of the Ballybowra mountains, in Cork County.

<sup>8</sup> The ancient name for the present barony of Fermoy, in the county of Cork. It was formerly the territory of the O'Dugans. After the English invasion, it was granted to the Flemings, from whom it passed by marriage to the Roches. Wherefore, it was called Criocho Roisteach, or Roche's country. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," n. (g), p. 78, and n. (s), p. 82.

mountain's side, and this stood as a traditional memorial of the miracle, in olden times. The territory of Deis-Beag is said by Dr. O'Donovan<sup>10</sup> to have been around the hill of Knockany, and it contained Brugh-na-Deise, now the town of Bruff,<sup>11</sup> in the barony of Coshma, and county of Limerick.<sup>12</sup>

St. Patrick is said to have visited the Decies country, after a laborious mission, which greatly taxed his strength. Here, he was protected, by the chieftain of the territory, called Fergar,<sup>13</sup> the son of Ross, and by all his nobles. A great convention was there summoned; but, while St. Patrick attended, at the hour appointed, the dynast and his following delayed for many hours.<sup>14</sup> While there, our saint also regulated and organized the local ecclesiastical concerns.<sup>15</sup> We are informed, that Patrick's Well was there, and also the church of Mac Clairidh, one of the Apostle's people.<sup>16</sup> The holy man always desired, that the inhabitants of the country should be kind and hospitable towards strangers; yet, the fishermen, who lived there, gave his people a refusal, although those were successful, in taking many fish. The case, which contained our saint's books, fell into a river, through the in-cautiousness of one who carried it. According to tradition, St. Patrick then left a bann, upon the streams of that place; and, he said, that they should not be fruitful, and that there should never be any mills upon them, excepting the mills of strangers, notwithstanding a great number, which had existed there, to that very time. Afterwards, while he was near the Suir's banks,<sup>17</sup> he was very kindly received, by the inhabitants, who were living there. In consequence of such courteous demeanour, and liberality, he blessed the River Suir, and the country around it. Thenceforward, it was fruitful in fish, except at places, where those streams<sup>18</sup> of the Desii flowed into it.

The holy man went northwards, into the country, at that time called Muscraige-Thire.<sup>19</sup> There, he desired to extirpate the briers of idolatry, and to sow, instead, the pure wheat of evangelical doctrine. While in this part of the country, God was pleased to crown his mission with great success; and, instructing many of the people, in the saving doctrines of Grace, he afterwards regenerated them, through the laver of Baptism. Here, he converted two brothers, called Munech,<sup>20</sup> or Muinnech,<sup>21</sup> and Meachair.<sup>22</sup> These be-

<sup>9</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxxix., pp. 93, 94. Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xlviii., p. 158.

<sup>10</sup> See "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. v., n. (d), pp. 1580, 1581.

<sup>11</sup> The parish of this name is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheets 31, 32, 39, 40. The town itself is noted, on Sheet 32. The townland is marked, on Sheets 31, 32, 40.

<sup>12</sup> See Miss M. F. Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 472, 473, and nn. ibid.

<sup>13</sup> He is thus called, in the Latin Tripartite Life; in the Irish version, his name is rendered Fergair.

<sup>14</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life, when Fergair came, Patrick said to him, after his arrival, "How slowly you have come!" "The country is rough," he answered. "True, indeed," replied Patrick, "but, there shall be no king from you. What delayed you to-day?" "The rain delayed us," responded the king. "Your meetings shall be showery for ever," then said Patrick.

<sup>15</sup> See Vita Tripartita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xlviii., xlix., p. 158. Not a word is mentioned about Declan, by the writer, while bringing St. Patrick through the Decies territory, as Dr. Lanigan remarks; but, he mistook the exact location of those Desii.

<sup>16</sup> This account is only to be found, in the Irish Tripartite Life. It further states, that assemblies were not held, by the Desii except at night; because Patrick left a stern sentence upon them, it being towards night, when they went to meet him.

<sup>17</sup> Probably, in the present county of Tipperary.

<sup>18</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life has "glaise," in the original Manuscript.

<sup>19</sup> The ancient name of that district, now comprised within the baronies of Upper and of Lower Ormond, in the northern part of the county of Tipperary. It contained the ancient churches of Cill-Cheire, now Kilkeary, near the town of Nenagh, and of Leathracha, now Latteragh, about eight miles southwards from the same town.

<sup>20</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>21</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

longed to a very influential family. They were sons to Forad,<sup>23</sup> the son of Conla. Especially was Munech remarkable, for his ready obedience to the call of God, when he was baptized by St. Patrick, together with his son. The Apostle gave his blessing, to the latter, and he predicted, that not alone should renowned chiefs and holy bishops descend from him, but even the principal rulers of the land. Meachair did not so readily come to the fold, and Patrick declared, that rivals and disobedient nobles should arise in his line. The eldest brother of their family, called Furech,<sup>24</sup> or Furic,<sup>25</sup> however, remained obstinate in his infidelity; for, he was a man of hard heart, and of irascible temper.<sup>26</sup> So he continued, to the end of his life.<sup>27</sup> To this period of his career, and, most probably, while St. Patrick was on his journey,

<sup>22</sup> He is called Meacharius, in the Latin Tripartite Life, and Mechar in the Irish version. This name greatly resembles Meaghar, or Maher, yet a very prevailing one, in this part of Tipperary.

<sup>23</sup> Also called Forat, in the Irish Tripartite Life. In Miss Cusack's Irish Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, the translator introduces the following version, from an original Irish poem:—

“Muinnech the Great believes
In Patrick, before all;
That there might be over his country
Chieftains of his race for ever.

“Mechair believed
For he was a true, just man.
Patrick gave him a lasting blessing—
The companionship of a king.

“Fuirec, the furious man, Opposed, though he was hoary and old;
His ultimate fate, after this world,
Is not to be deplored.

“When Cothraige imposed
A tribute (cain) upon noble Eri,
On the host of this island
He conferred a lasting blessing.

“Choice was this blessing,
Which he conferred seven-fold
On each one who would observe
His plain rule, his law.

“Whoever would disobey
The noble, just rule,
Should not see him, he said,
In the region of the saints.

“Patrick's cain in great Munster,
Was imposed on each family,
Until Dungalach violated it,
[Who was] of the race of Failbhe Flann.

“Dungalach, son of Faelghus,
Grandson of just Nadfraech,
Was the first who transgressed,
Patrick's cain from the beginning.

“It is related in histories,
All ages know it,
That his successorship is not found
In Cashel of the Kings.

“There is not of his progeny
(Though he won battles)
A noble bishop, or herenagh,
A prince, or a sage.

“Saergus the Young, also—
* * * * *
Violated the cain he had adopted
For the vehement Dungalach.

“It is seen that illustrious men
Are not of his wondrous family;
If there are now, they will not Be found till Judgment comes.”

<sup>24</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>25</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite.

<sup>26</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life states, afterwards, that Munech was destined for the kingdom, by St. Patrick, who also called to himself the twelve sons of Munech, as they are thus named, viz.: Muscan, Keallachan, Imchadh, Dubthach, Gartne, Lamnith, Trian, Carthach, Niell, Nandith, Macnesse and Conenn. With the exception of Muscan, these sons came slowly to the Apostle; wherefore Muscan was destined by him for the kingdom, before all his brothers, and when the Latin Tripartite Life was written, the principality seems to have belonged to his race. Conenn excused himself, because he was obliged to set out a hedge. Then Patrick said, that his posterity should always want houses and fields to be completely surrounded with walls or hedges, and should they dig the earth, and then set out a hedge, it must soon fail, while if they placed islands in prominent sites, those erections should not be firm. Keallachan said, that on account of dues owing—whether by another to him, or by him to another, the Tripartite writer knew not—he had been obliged to arrive late. Patrick said to him, that wherever in Munster his amnesty should be violated, and that Keallachan should be the transgressor, even though others were free for any reason, through the province of Munster,<sup>28</sup> the Cistercian monk, Jocelyn, ascribes the subjoined incident. At that time, when this Angel of Peace, as we are told, passed through the country of Ciarraghe,<sup>29</sup> he saw two brothers, respectively named Bibradius, and Locradius, engaged in an angry debate, about the partition of their dead father's inheritance. So much did they wrangle, that from high words, they came to blows, and dealt out strokes, with their iron weapons. Fearing lest so heinous a sin as fratricide should be committed, in his presence, with his holy prayers, the Apostolic man so paralyzed their hands and arms, that these remained stiff and inflexible, while raised in the air. Upon seeing this stupendous miracle, the two brothers referred their cause to the saint's arbitration. Blessed Patrick then, not only renewed between them a league of brotherly love; but, he also restored to them, the perfect use of their arms and hands. The place, where this miracle happened to those two brothers, was bestowed upon the saint, to accomplish the building of a church.<sup>30</sup>

Seven years St. Patrick is said to have spent in Munster.<sup>31</sup> There, he founded cells and churches, while he ordained bishops, rectors, and ecclesiastics, in every grade. He also healed all sick persons, and he resuscitated the dead. Now, he was about to leave, with increased ardour for the fair plains of Leinster. When going away from Munster, the princes and nobles of the province assembled, it is thought at Cashel; and, in testimony of the services he had rendered, those chiefs charged themselves with an annual tribute for the great Irish Apostle, and for his successors, in the See of Armagh. This tax, called by the Irish, Cain Phadruigh, was regularly paid, for some ages.<sup>32</sup> The veneration, in which they held him, caused a great stone, on which he used to celebrate the Divine Mysteries, and other religious ceremonies, to be preserved, with respect. It was never should he or his tribe escape the condemnation of death, or as an alternative, seven female servants should be given in atonement for the offence. Carthach said, that he would have believed, if only they should await his foster-father, as it was desirable to know, whether or not his approbation might be obtained. Patrick declared that those of his race, prudent and ingenious in their worldly-wise conceits, should be aliens in this principality. The Irish Apostle's pronouncements, in each case, were literally fulfilled. In the foregoing account, some words of the original Latin are obsolete, or obscure, and for want of more accurate information, regarding customs long since disused, the application of terms may be misplaced; we think, however, the rendering is substantially exact, and the meaning attached, closely in accordance with the terminology.

<sup>27</sup> See the Latin Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, lib. iii., cap. li., lii. Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," p. 159.

<sup>28</sup> We also find, among the Hodges and Smith collection of Manuscripts, classed 23. L. 22, at p. 432, a legendary account, relating to the journey of St. Patrick and of Oisín, into the Southern Eily. This, we do not consider to be very ancient.

<sup>29</sup> Whether this means Ciarraighe Chuirche, now Kerrycurrihy, a small barony, southwards in the county of Cork, or the present county of Kerry, may be questioned. Ciar, the son of Fergus, King over Ulster, and <sup>o</sup> Meadhbh, Queen over Connaught, is said to have been ancestor to all the Ciarraighe. See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xliii., xlv. Also Dr. O'Donovan's "Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagáin and Giolla na Noamh O'Huidhrin," p. lxiv., n. 554, pp. lxxi., lxxii., nn. 627, 628.

<sup>30</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxvi., p. 82.

<sup>31</sup> The learned calculate, as we are told, in the Irish Tripartite Life, he made an offering, on every seventh ridge, that he traversed, while in Munster.

<sup>32</sup> In the time of Dungalac, the son of Foelgass, of the race of Failbe Flann, this tribute fell into disuse, or it was refused, through the fault of Soergass Hua Maol-Cobthaigh. For such neglect, Dungalac himself, through his posterity, was supposed to incur Divine judgments, as none of his race held the principality of Cashel, or was extant, when the Latin Tripartite Life had been written. It adds, "vel futurus creditor ex iis Episcopus, Dominus, vel Doctor oriundus." Colgan endeavours in nn. 80, 81, to show that, if very gross ignorance of Irish history be not in question, a part of the Latin Tripartite Life here must have been written, before A.D. 840, or 850; since, Maelgualai, the son of Donnag, King of Munster, murdered by the Norsemen, in 857, was a descendent of Failbhe Flann. Colgan there shows, that others of the royal called Leach Phadrinc, or "Patrick's stone."<sup>33</sup> Afterwards, the kings of Cashel<sup>34</sup> did themselves the honour to be crowned upon it.<sup>35</sup> Most probably, this is the large square stone, still remaining on the Rock of Cashel, as forming the pedestal of an ancient Irish cross. When leaving Munster, St. Patrick went to its northern bounds,<sup>36</sup> at Brosnar,<sup>37</sup> also called Brosnacha,<sup>38</sup> or the Brosnach River,<sup>39</sup> whither the men of that province followed after him, in great crowds, and as if with one accord. The members of their households,<sup>40</sup> without distinction of age or sex,<sup>41</sup> were in this vast multitude; for, as the Irish Apostle, now advanced in years, did not appear determined to revisit that part of the country, all felt desirous to receive his parting benediction. While loud acclamations arose, on all sides, that blessing he cheerfully bestowed on them.<sup>42</sup> From an eminence, also, he offered a kindly prayer, for that beautiful region, he was now about to leave for ever.<sup>43</sup>

While here, the glorious Patrick resuscitated a Munster man, called Fot,<sup>44</sup> or Fotus, the son of Derad, or Deratius. He had been twenty-seven years dead.<sup>45</sup> This miracle, occurring before the whole assembled multitude, caused the Apostle to be wonderfully extolled. It was here, too, he blessed Munster race flourished, and were in possession of the principality, according to our country's records.

<sup>33</sup> It bears all the marks of a most remote antiquity; and, most probably, long before the advent of the Apostle of Ireland to Cashel, it was used by the Druids in their sacrificial observances. St. Patrick's visit to Cashel is noticed in the Hodges and Smith MS. classed 23. L. 22. p. 390. R.I.A.

<sup>34</sup> Cashel was so called, from the Irish Cais, tribute, and all, a stone, because the petty princes of Munster formerly paid tribute upon a large stone there, to the king of that province. This is one derivation of the word. Another may be seen, in a previous chapter.

<sup>35</sup> See L'Abbé Ma-Geoghegan's "Histoire de l'Irlande," in which he quotes the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick. Seconde Partie, chap. i., p. 261.

<sup>36</sup> This shows, Colgan was wrong, when placing Brosna in Munster. There are two rivers, and a small village, named Brosna, in the King's County. The larger one rises at Bunbrosna, in Westmeath, and traversing the latter county fifteen or sixteen miles, in a western direction, it joins the River Shannon, at Shannon Harbour. The little Brosna rises, near the village of that name, in the parish of Kilmurray, to the east of Shinrone. It runs a few miles northwards to Birr, forming the boundary, between the King's County and that of Tipperary, before its entrance to the River Shannon.

<sup>37</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life gives it the following derivation: "Brosnar enim patrio sermone, clamores, vel tumultum ex lætitia procedentem significat."

<sup>38</sup> We are told, in the Irish Tripartite Life, that this place was so called, on account of the shouts of joy the people raised, when they here gazed upon him; the native word, brosnugad, signifying, "an incentive," or "excitement." By others, again, the village of this locality is said to derive its name, from the Irish word, brosna, "a faggot," or "a bundle of sticks."

<sup>39</sup> So is it noticed by Jocelyn. The Tripartite Life does not, indeed, mention a river, but a place so called. There is a town, called Brosna, placed by Seward, in his "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," in Clonlisk barony, King's County. This is far away, from the Brosna River. The Third Life states, that St. Patrick came "ad flumina illa quæ dicuntur Bresnacha."

<sup>40</sup> In the Irish Tripartite Life, the original word is teclá, which William M. Hennessy seems to think, by a note of interrogation affixed, may also mean "hillocks."

<sup>41</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life states, that men, youths, and women, were there assembled. According to Jocelyn, King Oengus, being attended, by twelve of his princes, and by 14,000 of his subjects, followed the saint, when he came as far as Cothach, a town lying upon the River Brosnach.

<sup>42</sup> A poem, in four quatrains, by St. Patrick, giving his benediction to the people of Munster, is one of the traditional memorials of this blessing; and, there is a copy of it, among the Betham Manuscripts, in the Royal Irish Academy, classed 23. C. 19. See O'Longan MSS., vol. xxii., p. 325.

<sup>43</sup> We find the following rendering, in the Irish Tripartite Life: "A blessing on the men of Muman, men, sons, women. A blessing on the land that gives them food. A blessing on all treasures produced upon the plains. A blessing upon Munster. A blessing on their woods, and on their sloping plains. A blessing on their glens. A blessing on their hills. As the sands of the sea under ships, so numerous may be their homesteads, on slopes, on plains, on mountains, and on peaks."

the private banquet, prepared for himself and for his disciples, so that it sufficed for the refecton of the vast multitudes, who were present, from all the adjacent parts of Munster, including the Ossorians, and strangers from other parts of Ireland.<sup>46</sup> He was with Bishop Trian,<sup>47</sup> or St. Trianus,<sup>48</sup> a pilgrim of the Romans, who is said to have then lived, at a place, called Craibhech,<sup>49</sup> or Creevagh.<sup>50</sup> More succinctly are the foregoing particulars related, in the Irish, than in the Latin Tripartite, Life of our saint; while Jocelyn has added legendary matter, in reference to them,<sup>51</sup> and which we do not find drawn from any other known source.<sup>52</sup>

CHAPTER XXI.

THE PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE OF ST. PATRICK, WHILE PASSING THROUGH HY-FAILGE, AND MARTYRDOM OF HIS CHARIOTEER, ODHRAN—THE APOSTLE RETURNS TO LECALÉ—JUDGMENT VISITED ON TRIAN—CONVERSION OF MACHALDUS, AND HIS SUBSEQUENT MISSION IN THE ISLE OF MAN—DRUMBO—EUCHODIUS, KING IN ULSTER—HIS SON, ST. DOMANGART—ST. PATRICK LAYS THE FOUNDATION OF A CHURCH, AT LOUTH; BUT, HE IS WARNED BY AN ANGEL, TO FOUND HIS GREAT CATHEDRAL, AT ARMAGH.

AFTER the illustrious bishop had thus confirmed the people of Munster, in knowledge, and in a love for the true God, blessing them, he took a journey,

<sup>44</sup> The Third Life calls him, "Fota filius Forath."

<sup>45</sup> The Third Life states, he was only ten years in the tomb, and that fourteen other men were raised to life with him.

<sup>46</sup> Jocelyn thus records these incidents: By Divine Providence, in happened, that no victuals could be had for that great company. However, the blessed Bishop, desirous of giving the multitude a spiritual and corporal refecton, commanded a cow, by whose milk St. Trianus lived, to be made ready for supper. But, what was this among so great a company? remarks Jocelyn. Patrick therefore directed his prayers to the heavenly sanctuary, and, lo! there ran out of the adjoining wood two large stags, and two large hogs. These presented themselves before the saint. He ordered, that they should be killed, and that likewise they should be made ready for feeding the multitude. All the company sat down to supper, and that little provision was laid before them. This resembled the multiplication of the five barley loaves and two fishes. (St. Matt. xv.) By virtue of the saint's benediction, the five animals served to satisfy all the people present so plentifully, that a great deal was gathered up, after the feast, and carried thence. This miraculous multiplication of food, adds Jocelyn, need not seem incredible, to any, who will reflect with due consideration, upon our Saviour's promise: "He that believeth in me, the works that I do, he shall also perform, and greater than these he shall do." (St. John, xiv. 12.) Then follow circumstances, too ridiculous for publication. Jocelyn adds, to the foregoing account: "Nos vero nihil impossibile Deo dicimus, sed factum hoc fuisse nec

negamus nec astruimus."

<sup>47</sup> No very definite account of him is given, by Colgan, who refers to a holy man of the name, whose feast occurs, at the 22nd or 23rd of March; but, no correct identification is there to be found.

<sup>48</sup> The Third Life calls him Tria.

<sup>49</sup> Such is the denomination given, in the Latin Tripartite Life; in the Irish version, it is Craibhecha; in Jocelyn, it is called Chothach; while, in the Third Life, it is Croibech.

<sup>50</sup> There is a place, so called, in the parish of Clonmacnois, King's County, and a Creeve, in the parish of Ardnurcher, or Horseleap, in the south of Westmeath County. Both of these places lie near to the northern Brosna River.

<sup>51</sup> Thus Jocelyn says, that Fota was included among nineteen others, who were raised from the grave. He then adds: All those, who were so miraculously restored to the number of the living, related in the hearing of all the assembly, what they had seen, touching the torments of hell. They likewise proclaimed Patrick's God, to be the true and living God. King Oengus, and his subjects magnified the Lord, and honoured the saint, as their high priest, and their proper Apostle. Those men, who were revived, St. Patrick christened. Afterwards, they became monks, under the obedience of St. Trianus, with whom they lived, until overtaken by a second death. King Ængus, and the hosts assembled, bidding St. Patrick farewell, returned to their respective homes. See, also, the Third Life.

<sup>52</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxiii., p. 26,

towards the North. He first went through the territory of Hy-Failge,<sup>1</sup> which before the English invasion, comprised the present Baronies of Ophaley, in the county of Kildare, with parts of the King's and Queen's Counties. Here, two powerful chieftains ruled, at this time; one, evil-inclined, being named Failge Berraide,<sup>2</sup> or Foilge Berrad,<sup>3</sup> while the other, called Failge Ros,<sup>4</sup> had a singular affection for St. Patrick, whom he treated with every mark of respect. Now, Foilge Berrad had boasted, that if he met Patrick, he would kill him, in revenge for the destruction of his god, the idol Crom Cruach. This boast of Foilge was concealed from Patrick, by his people. As they travelled through Hy-Failge, Odran,<sup>5</sup> his charioteer, said, "Since, I have been a long time driving for you, O Patrick, let me take the chief seat for this day. Be you the charioteer, O father!" St. Patrick did so, at a place, called after his disciple, Desert Odran,<sup>6</sup> whither Foilge had come. Mistaking the master for his servant, that wicked chieftain dealt a thrust of his spear, through Odran,<sup>7</sup> who was in the guise of Patrick.<sup>8</sup> This tragic event happened, near a mountain,<sup>9</sup> called Brig-damh;<sup>10</sup> and, it is stated to have been over a stream, called the Suainin, which is said to have been in the parish and barony of Geashill,<sup>11</sup> in the King's County.<sup>12</sup> By Colgan, this martyrdom of Odhran has been ascribed to about, or after, the middle of the fifth century;<sup>13</sup> or, as Ussher calculates,<sup>14</sup> at A.D. 456.<sup>15</sup> As to Foilge Ros, St. Patrick and nn. 60, 61, p. 32. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxvi., lxxvii., lxxviii., pp. 82, 83, and nn. 77, 78, p. 112, cap. xcvi., p. 87, cap. cxxviii., cxxix., pp. 93, 94. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xlviii., xlix., l., li., lii., liv., lv., lvi., pp. 158, 159, and nn. 80, 81, 82, 83, p. 185. Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 472 to 476, with the accompanying notes.

CHAPTER XXI.—<sup>1</sup> It obtained this name, from Ros Failge, or "Ross of the Kings." He was the eldest son, it has been said, of Cathaoir Mor, King of Leinster, and Monarch of Ireland, slain A.D. 122. Yet, this statement seems inconsistent with the Tripartite narrative, where Failge Ros is made to be a contemporary of St. Patrick. Perhaps, however, a distinction is to be drawn regarding the former and the latter.

<sup>2</sup> In the other Acts of St. Patrick, excepting the Tripartite Life, only one Failge, or Foilge, is mentioned. Jocelyn calls him "Foylge Rufus."

<sup>3</sup> In the Third Life, he is called Foilge, and there, a miraculous circumstance, in reference to him, is introduced. Foilge Berrad's name occurs not, in the right line of the O'Conor Faly pedigree; but, he is mentioned, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 162, 163, at A.D. 501, as having slain Fiacha, son of Niall, at the battle of Freamhain, thought to be the hill of Frewin, in the townland of Wattstown, parish of Portlennon, and County Westmeath. See ibid., p. 89, n. (w.)

<sup>4</sup> From him were descended, it is said, the great families of O'Conor Faly, O'Dempsey of Clanmalier, and O'Dunne of Hi Regan, or Iregan. See John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," p. 193, n. (b), and pp. 216, 217, n. (r.)

<sup>5</sup> His festival was held, according to some Martyrologies, on the 19th of February.

<sup>6</sup> As if all Hy-Failge were in the particular district he selects for its position, Archdall conjectured, that Disert-Odhrain was identical with Tir-Oenaichs, in the Queen's County. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 594.

<sup>7</sup> There is an account of this matter, and a spirited woodcut illustration of Odhran's martyrdom, in Miss M. F. Cusack's "Patriot's History of Ireland," chap. iv., pp. 66, 67, 120.

<sup>8</sup> Then we are told, in the Irish Tripartite, of the result. "My anathema," cried Patrick. "Upon the tree of Bridam," said Odran. "Be it so," replied Patrick. Foilge died at once, and went to hell, it is stated.

<sup>9</sup> Although it was the site of several battles, recorded in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," as at A.M. 3501, and at A.D. 596, vol. i., pp. 28, 29, and n. (a), and pp. 222, 223, n. (o), yet the place has not been clearly identified.

<sup>10</sup> This denomination signifies "the hill of the oxen."

<sup>11</sup> The extent of both is the same, and shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the King's County," Sheets 17, 18, 19, 24, 25, 26, 27, 32, 33.

<sup>12</sup> The writer of a note, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," &c., incorrectly has the barony of Geashill, in the Queen's County.

<sup>13</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xix. Februarii. De S. Odrano Martyre, cap. v., p. 371.

<sup>14</sup> See his "Index Chronologicus," at that year.

blessed him, and his children were in the district, at that time, when the Irish Tripartite Life was written.

Again, St. Patrick seems to have returned towards Lecale, in Ulster, although the exact course he took, through Leinster, cannot well be ascertained, from any of his biographers. However, we are informed, that he passed along the public highway, known as Midh-Luachra.<sup>15</sup> In Mudornia,<sup>17</sup> he found a company of carpenters, cutting down great oak or yew trees.<sup>18</sup> But, their axes were edgeless, and those poor men were quite wearied and out of breath, while the skin and flesh were torn from their hands, even to the very sinews and bones. Those wretched persons were slaves, belonging to Trian,<sup>19</sup> son of Fiac, son to Amalgad.<sup>20</sup> Those men are related, to have borne, in subjection and affliction, the rule of their cruel task-master ; so much so, that they were not allowed whetstones, to sharpen their axes or irons, in order that their work might become the heavier and more difficult. The saint, compassionating their distress, gave them his blessing ; whereupon they recovered strength, their hands were healed, and their hatchets became so sharply edged, that they cut the solid trees, with as little difficulty, as if these had been tender twigs. This prodigious effect of the saint's blessing continued with them, until such time as he procured their release. To effect this object, he went to their cruel lord ; but, Trian would not admit the saint's intercession, on behalf of those serfs. Before the doors of that chief's castle, and at a place known afterwards as Rath-Trena, Patrick sought by watching, prayer, and fasting, to soften his obdurate heart. According to a curious custom<sup>21</sup> of our ancestors, our holy Apostle is said to have fasted, at or before Trian's fort ; but, without having his petition granted, ere he departed. The saint, after three days' fast and prayer, came again, with great submission, to procure their exemption from bondage. But, he found this cruel chief to be like another Pharaoh. Presently Trian got up into his chariot, and with a design to aggravate still more the yoke of affliction. St.

<sup>15</sup> With this computation, the Rev. Dr. Lanigan seems to agree. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. xi., n. 114, p. 305.

<sup>16</sup> According to the Tripartite Lives of our saint. This is said to be the Moyry Pass—also called Slighe-Midluachair—and it lies between Dundalk and Newry. See the "Ulster Journal of Archaeology," in an article, on the Kilnasagart stone, which is near that pass. It was one of the principal roads, leading from Tara, into the north of Ireland. Its exact position has not been ascertained ; but, it is thought, to have extended into the county of Down. See O'Flaherty's "Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. lx., p. 314. Also, Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 102 to 105, and nn. (l, n). Also, vol. ii., pp. 968, 969, and n. (x.) See, likewise, John O'Donovan's "Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights," Introduction, p. lix.

<sup>17</sup> So is the district denominated, by Jocelyn. Most likely, it was Crich-Mughdorn, or Cremorne, in the county of Monaghan.

<sup>18</sup> While the Irish Tripartite Life states, these trees to have been of yew, the Latin Tripartite calls them oak trees.

<sup>19</sup> He is said to have been brother to St. Patrick's first Ulster convert, Trichem.

<sup>20</sup> This seems to be a mistranscript for Imchadh, as found in the pedigrees.

<sup>21</sup> Some illustrations of this practice are explained, in the Irish Laws of Plaintiff or Creditor, and of those relating to Defendant or Debtor, in the case of distraint. If the Defendant or Debtor were a person of chieftain grade, it was necessary, not only to give notice, but also to "fast upon him." This fasting upon him consisted, in going to his residence, and in waiting there for a certain time without food. If the Plaintiff did not, within a certain time, receive satisfaction for his claim, or a pledge for it ; forthwith, accompanied by a law-agent, witnesses, and others, he seized his distress. This equivalent, when seized, in certain cases was liable to a "stay," (anadh), which was a period, varying according to fixed rules, and during which the Debtor received back the distress, and retained it in his own keeping, the Creditor still having a lien upon it. The further proceedings up to and in case of forfeiture are also fully explained in an "Introduction to the Brehon Laws of Ireland," vol. i., p. xiv.

<sup>22</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life thus records this event : "Quod videns vir Beatus pramonendo, quam possit tyranno inferre vindictam, sputum ejecit, cujus pars cecidit in

Patrick even wrought a miracle, to effect his purpose.<sup>22</sup> God, however, avenged the contempt, offered to his new Moses; for lo! Trian's horses precipitated themselves, and with great violence, into a stagnant pool of water, where the man of Belial was drowned. Then his captives, or slaves, were restored to their long-expected liberty. In memory of this remarkable judgment, the pool or lake thenceforth received the denomination, Loch-Trena.<sup>23</sup> He will not arise out of that lake, adds the Irish Tripartite, until the vespers of judgment, and, even then, it will not be to happiness.

Moved by this example, the wife of that king followed Patrick, in sighs and tears. She performed penance, and knelt before the holy man, so that she and her offspring might not suffer. Patrick blessed her and the beings she then carried in her womb. One of these was Setna,<sup>24</sup> or Sedna, otherwise called Sedonius,<sup>25</sup> and Iarlaid,<sup>26</sup> or Hiarlath,<sup>27</sup> was the other; and both were sons of Trian, being distinguished for their future sanctity. Sechnall<sup>28</sup> baptized Setna, and it was Patrick that baptized Iarlaid. The holy Apostle said, that the latter should be his successor afterwards, in the See of Armagh.

There was a man, who lived, about this period, in the country of Uladh,<sup>29</sup> and at a place called Magh-Inis,<sup>30</sup> or "the Insular plain." He is said to have been impious, and a son of death.<sup>31</sup> His name was Mac Cuill,<sup>32</sup> Latinized, Machaldus, or Maccaldus,<sup>33</sup> and he was leader of a robber band,<sup>34</sup> who were plundering and killing the people, belonging to this region. On a certain occasion, the Blessed Patrick and his companions passed by; and, Maccaldus, from an eminence, perceived their approach. Full of malice, this tyrant<sup>35</sup> desired to kill the holy missionary.<sup>36</sup> Mac-Cuill said to his followers: "Behold the tailcenn<sup>37</sup> and celebrated preacher of false doctrine, that prophet, who is deceiving everyone, wishing to destroy the tenets and idols of our fathers; teaching about a new and an unknown God; let us arise, and make an attack on him, and then we shall see if his God can assist him." Then it was resolved, to lay a snare for the saint. The robbers brought one of their people, called Garbanus, or Garban, on a bier, as if he were jacentem coram eis petram: qua tacta illico in tres partes coram oculis præsentium divisa concepuit; una vero pars impetu subitaneo perlata est in locum valde remotum." Then, Patrick said, according to the Irish Tripartite Life, "Two-thirds of the fast on the rock, another third on the fort and king, and on the district. There shall not be a king nor roydamhna of the children of Trian. He shall die prematurely, and he shall go down to a bitter hell."

<sup>23</sup> Anglicised "the lake of Trian.

<sup>24</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>25</sup> So is the name written, in the Latin Tripartite Life. He is said to have been venerated, on the 16th of June.

<sup>26</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>27</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>28</sup> The patron saint of Dunshaughlin, in the county of Meath.

<sup>29</sup> "In Uladh, near Magh Inis, lived a chief, Fierce man and fell."

Thus commences one of Aubrey de Vere's poems, headed, "St. Patrick and the Impostor; or Mac Kyle of Man." See "Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 86 to 93.

<sup>30</sup> Now Lecale, in the county of Down.

It was also called Leth-cathuail. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (w), p. 36.

<sup>31</sup> In the Third Life, he is called Maguil. See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxiii., p. 27. Probus calls him Mac-fail. See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. ix., x., pp. 52, 53.

<sup>32</sup> Colgan refers his Acts and festival, to the 25th of April. Jocelyn calls him Maguil. He is noted, in the Irish Tripartite Life, as in the text.

<sup>33</sup> Thus is he noticed, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>34</sup> Jocelyn has his name "Maguil, qui et Machaldus." See cap. cli., p. 98.

<sup>35</sup> The Fourth Life of our saint calls him a Cyclops. See cap. lxxxi., p. 45.

<sup>36</sup> We are told, by Jocelyn, this man placed, on his own head and on the heads of his companions, certain diabolical signs, which are called Diberc, so that all might behold, how devoted was their brotherhood to the service of Satan.

<sup>37</sup> This term, as addressed to our saint, is only in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>38</sup> The author of the Fifth Life, thus incorrectly interprets its meaning in Latin, dead, and to be pretentiously resuscitated by St. Patrick. Thus, they thought to deceive our Apostle. The robbers threw a cover over the face and body of their comrade. "Cure for us," said they to Patrick, "our companion, and beseech your God to awake him from death." "My debroth,"<sup>38</sup> replied the saint, "I should not wonder, if he were really dead." He also added: "the covering of Garban shall be the covering of a dead body; but, I tell you even more, for it is Garban who shall lie under it." His friends removed the covering from Garban's face, and they found it to be so.<sup>39</sup> They afterwards became mute, with fear and astonishment; and, then they cried out, "Truly this is a man of God." They were all moved to repentance, for their impious act, and they believed at once, receiving baptism, and promising a change of life. Mac Cuill professed the Faith, also, and he resolved on doing heroic acts of penance. He went to the sea, and embarked in a cot, formed out of one hide, obeying the command of Blessed Patrick. Garban was awakened from death, however, through the prayers of our Apostle. To satisfy more fully for his crimes, Mac Cuill made his confession, and he was told, to leave his native country and friends, to give all he possessed to the poor, and afterwards to live an austere life. That very day, he resolved to make a perpetual sacrifice of the world and of its goods. His right hand was kept, during the sea-course, towards Magh-Inis, and God's holy providence, guiding his bark over the waves, at last he reached Manann,<sup>40</sup> or Eubonia,<sup>41</sup> now called the Isle of Man, in the Irish sea.<sup>42</sup> He found there two venerable persons, who had landed before him, on that island,<sup>43</sup> and who are called, Coninnri,<sup>44</sup> or Conderius,<sup>45</sup> and Romael<sup>46</sup> or Romailus.<sup>47</sup> These preached the word of God, and established the faith, in Manann; and, through their teaching, the people of that island were baptized, and they believed in Christ.<sup>48</sup> Those missionaries were very exemplary, in their conduct and conversation. When they saw

"quod laboratis, non proderit vobis." Colgan renders it correctly, as "Deus meus iudicii," or, "judicem."

<sup>39</sup> Thus were verified the words of St. Peter Chrysologus: "Qui jocari voluerit cum diabolo, non poterit gaudere cum Christo."—"Breviarium Romanum," iv. Dec. Noct. ii., Lect. v.

<sup>40</sup> Camden has it Menania, in "Britannica," col. 1439. But, Orosius added the letter M, as a prefix to the original Evania, and thus made the name, Mevania. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xiii. Januarii. De S. Connano Episcop. Manniæ, n. 4, p. 60. From the latter designation came Mannia, now Man.

<sup>41</sup> Ard-Ebnanensis is also a name given to the Isle of Man. This denomination, Ard-ebnanensis, is considered to have been derived, from Ard-Ebnana, the "hill of Evania," or Man. The Irish called the island, Eumhonia, i.e. Eubonia, as Gildas and others have it. They termed it, also, Eumhania, or Euvania, whence came Evania.

<sup>42</sup> The Manx have a legend, that St. Maughold, a leader of banditti in Ireland—either as a punishment, or according to other accounts, by a voluntary act of penance—was bound hand and foot. Afterwards he was driven ashore, in a small boat, and on the north part of the island, that now bears his name. Released from his perilous situation, he retired to the mountains. He there consecrated his life to religion. Becoming exemplary for piety, at length he was elected bishop over Man, by the wishes of the clergy and people. It is said, St. Brigid from Ireland visited him, owing to his reputation for sanctity. She is even said to have received the veil from his hands. See "The Illustrated Guide and Visitor's Companion through the Isle of Man," By a Resident, pp. 22, 23. However, in the latter particular, Maughold has been confounded with St. Maccalle.

<sup>43</sup> The conversion of the Robber Chief, Machaldus, is told in Patrick Kennedy's "Legendary Fictions of the Irish Celts," pp. 327, 328.

<sup>44</sup> He is thus designated, in the Irish Tripartite Life. In the Fourth Life, he is called Conindrius, and his feast is referred, by Colgan, to the 17th of November.

<sup>45</sup> He is thus named, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>46</sup> So is he called, in the Irish Tripartite Life. He is named Romulus, in the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Lives, while Colgan refers his festival, to the 18th of November.

<sup>47</sup> He is thus named, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>48</sup> See Rev. J. R. Cumming's "Isle of Man, its History, Physical, Ecclesiastical,

Mac Cuill, in his hide-bound cot, they took him off the stormy sea, and they received him kindly. Afterwards, he learned letters and Divine knowledge from them.<sup>49</sup> He spent, also, his whole time with them, until he became a bishop, in the place, after their death.<sup>50</sup>

One Sunday, St. Patrick slept on a rising ground, over the sea, at Drombo, which means "the ox-ridge." According to some authorities, the place is to be regarded as Drumboe, a parish near Lisburn, in the county of Down, where a Round Tower<sup>51</sup> may now be seen, and near the site of an ancient church.<sup>52</sup> The River Lagan traces the western boundary;<sup>53</sup> and, it is thought, in ancient times, there had been a small fortified town, on the hill of Drumboe. Others state, however, that a hill, between Saul and Quoile, or Coyle Castle, where fragments of masonry and human remains were found, must more correctly indicate the position of Collum bovis, the Latin designation for Drumbo. The latter hill overhangs Coyle River, and it is conjectured to be near the strait, called Collum bovis.<sup>54</sup> There, our saint heard a noise, made by Gentiles, who were engaged digging a rath, on the Sabbath. He called them, and told them to cease. But, they heeded him not, and began to mock him. Whereupon, Patrick said, "My debroth, your labour Civil and Legendary." Van Voorst, 1843, 8vo.

Drumbo Round Tower, County of Down.

<sup>49</sup> This is Mac Cuill, or Machaldus, of Mann, or of Ard-ebanensis, as St. Patrick's Tripartite Lives remark, a famous bishop and abbot. May his holy favour assist us, is the devout concluding prayer.

<sup>50</sup> According to the "Annales Ultonienses," Maccaldus departed this life, A.D. 488.

<sup>51</sup> This is about 35 feet high, and 47 in circumference. The accompanying illustration presents it, from a drawing of William F. Wakeman, on the wood, engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>52</sup> The church ruins were 45 feet in length, by 20 broad, according to the "Ancient and Present State of the County Down," by Walter Harris, published in Dublin, A.D. 1744.

<sup>53</sup> See "The Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 81.

<sup>54</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 345, and n. 6, ibid. The Rev. David B. Mulcahy is of opinion, that this place should be at Ardbo, in the county of Tyrone, and west of Lough Neagh. Letter, dated Ballinafof, Belfast, 21st Oct., 1878.

<sup>55</sup> Three Catalogues of the Ultonian kings, and written by different persons, were in shall not profit you." On the following night, a great tempest arose, and destroyed their work. This happened, according to the word of the holy man, and as a punishment for their impiety.

About this time, Euchadius, or Eochaidh, son of Muredac, happened to be king in Ultonia.<sup>55</sup> He was descended, from an illustrious family, on whom, however, he conferred little honour. He was not only an unbeliever himself, but he prosecuted, in a tyrannical manner, those who became Christians. Two maidens, who had offered their virginity to the Lord, he bound and sent on the waves, to be drowned, as they refused to adore idols and to marry. When the Apostle heard this, he besought the king regarding them, but in vain. Then, Patrick said to Eochaidh, that there should never be a king from him, nor enough of his race to constitute an assembly or army, in Ultonia, but that his tribe should be scattered, that his own life must be short, and that he should meet a tragic fate. "Your brother, Cairell,<sup>56</sup> shall have an advantage over thee, since he favourably granted me a request," said Patrick, "and you have lost it, through your disobedience. Hence, Cairell shall reign as a king, and there shall be kings and chiefs of his race, over your children, and over all Ulster." Wherefore, from him proceeded the race of kings, and his son Deman<sup>57</sup> succeeded, according to the words of Patrick. The wife of Eochaidh cast herself, at the feet of the holy Apostle. According to some accounts, we should infer, that her name was Derinilla.<sup>58</sup> He baptized her, and blessed the child in her womb, afterwards the excellent and illustrious son, Domangart,<sup>59</sup> or Donard, son of Eochaidh, and from whom Slieve Donard, in the county of Down, is named.<sup>60</sup> Regarding this holy man, a strange tradition prevailed. He it was, whom Patrick left in his body,<sup>61</sup> according to the popular legend, and that he should be there for ever is not the least remarkable phase of the popular belief.

Then, our saint turned back to the territory, which bore the denomination of Cricoch-Rois, or Feara-Rois.<sup>62</sup> Within its bounds was Druim-Mor,<sup>63</sup> over Cluain-Cain.<sup>64</sup> Here, he had desired to remain permanently, and to build a church. Having selected a most beautiful and convenient site, St. Patrick intended to erect an episcopal See, in a place, called Ludha,<sup>65</sup> or Lughmagh, Colgan's possession. Those records agreed with the statements, contained in the text.

<sup>55</sup> He reigned over Uladh, and died A.D. 526. He was succeeded, by another Eochaidh, of the Clanna Rury, from whom descended St. Fergus, Bishop of Down, who died on the 30th March, 583.

<sup>57</sup> He reigned fourteen years, having been slain, A.D. 565, by the shepherds or herdsmen of Boirinn. After death, his brother Baodan succeeded. He reigned twenty years, and he died, A.D. 585. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix I., p. 202, and n. (y). Also, II., p. 353, and nn. (f, g).

<sup>58</sup> Thus, our records state, that St. Donard's mother was Derinilla. According to St. Ængus the Culdee, she was also mother to St. Mura of Fahan, in Inishowen; to St. Mochumma of Druimbo; and, besides others, to St. Cillen of Achadhacail, in Lecale, beside the estuary of Dundrum.

<sup>59</sup> His feast occurs, at the 24th of March.

<sup>60</sup> He had a church there, as also at Rath-Murbhuil, now Maghera, between New-castle and Castlewellsan, county of Down, and over which he was bishop.

<sup>61</sup> Colgan characterizes this as a fable, unworthy of attention.

<sup>62</sup> It is said to have embraced a portion of the barony of Farney, in the county of Monaghan, with some adjoining districts, in the counties of Meath and Louth. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (o), p. 59, and n. (l), p. 122.

<sup>63</sup> It was also called probably Druim-Charadh, being situated in the diocese of Armagh and county of Louth, according to Colgan. See "Trias Thaumaturga," nn. 96, 97, p. 187. The Four Masters, at A.D. 868, call this Druim-Caradh of Ard-Cianachta, which O'Donovan, in his notes, writes, is now Drumcar, a townland, in a parish of the same name, in the barony of Ferrard, and county of Louth.

<sup>64</sup> Anglicised, "the beautiful meadow." Colgan thinks the place to have been identical with Louth, although in his day there was a chapel, at a spot, known as Cluain, in the county of Louth.

<sup>65</sup> It would appear, from the Tripartite Life, that Druim Mor was another name, for this place.

now Louth.<sup>66</sup> Here, too, the people had a tradition, that the great Apostle of Ireland lived, for some time.<sup>67</sup> But, an angel desired him to desist from that work ; because a St. Mochtheus, who came out of England, on a pilgrimage, into Ireland, should build in that place. "It is not here you have been destined to stay," said the Angel. "Where shall I go?" asked Patrick. "Pass on to Macha, northwards," replied the Angel. "The cluain below is fairer," answered Patrick. "Be its name, therefore, Cluain-Cain," the Angel said. "A pilgrim of the Britons shall come, and he shall occupy it, and, afterwards, it shall be yours." At the word, "Deo gratias ago,"<sup>68</sup> replied Patrick.

Louth Abbey, County of Louth.

Then, obeying such a Divine admonition, the holy man went to a place, eastwards, and there he proposed to erect a temple, which long afterwards was destined to bear his name. Here he lived, for a time, pending the arrival of a distinguished Briton. That place is now known as Ardpatrik,<sup>69</sup> or "the hill of Patrick." Many—if not most—of St. Patrick's foundations occupied elevated sites, as may be seen by those, who desire to visit his churches. In fine, the illustrious pilgrim, Mochtius<sup>70</sup>—locally designated Moutee—came to that place, where he built an oratory, with other suitable offices. The fertile fields

<sup>66</sup> Archdall gives an interesting account of this place, in his "Monasticon Hibernicum," pp. 469 to 479. The accompanying view of the ruined abbey, at this place, was drawn on the spot, by the writer, in June, 1879. It was transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>67</sup> Such account, Archbishop Ussher received, from the inhabitants, in his day. See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 854. Jocelyn and the Tripartite Lives also favour this tradition.

<sup>68</sup> "I give thanks to God."

<sup>69</sup> It is situated, about a mile eastwards from Louth. It afterwards belonged to St. Columba, and it was a ruin in Ussher's time. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," pp. 6, 7, nn. (p. r.) Also, Corrections and Additions, pp. 461, 462.

<sup>70</sup> This saint's feast occurs, at the 24th of March, as also on the 19th of August.

<sup>71</sup> "At Cluain Cain, in Rosa, unbent yet old, surrounding it are even yet most attractive.<sup>71</sup> This was known as Cluain-Chaoin, now Clonkeen.<sup>72</sup> The people around here seem to have been called Dalruaintir,<sup>73</sup> or Dal-Runter.<sup>74</sup> These went after him, to keep him, there, as one presented him to another. He blessed them, afterwards, and he prophesied, that distinguished chiefs and clerics should issue from them, and that they should have possessions outside their territory, because they followed him, out of their own country, when he left them.

Dwelt Patrick long. Its sweet and flowery sward.

A saint Mochteus,<sup>75</sup> or Mautaneus,<sup>76</sup> is ranked among the disciples of our great Apostle.<sup>77</sup> According to the legend, one day, as Blessed Patrick and he were in spiritual conference, an angel tendered a letter,<sup>78</sup> wherein the former was commanded to bestow that place, with all its appurtenances, upon St. Mochteus. It is also stated, that himself was to erect his Archiepiscopal See at Armagh. Obeying most willingly this Divine command, the Irish Apostle committed to St. Mochteus the care of twelve lepers. These, St. Patrick himself was accustomed to tend;<sup>79</sup> but, afterwards, as we are told, at Ard-Phadraig, their food used to be given to them, each night, by Mochta. Our saint

He to the rock had delved with fixed resolve
To build thereon to God ere yet he died.
Then by him stood God's angel, speaking thus,
'Not here, but northward.' He replied, 'Oh, would
This spot might favour find with God! Behold!
Fair is it, and as meet a church to clasp
As is a true heart in a virgin breast
To hold the Faith of Christ. The hinds around
Name it "The beauteous meadow."'
'Fair it is,'
The angel answered, 'nor shall lack its crown.
Another's is its beauty. Here, one day
A pilgrim from the Britons sent shall build,
And, later, what he builds to thine shall pass:
But thou to Macha get thee.' "

—Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick," p. 171.

<sup>72</sup> This parish, in the barony of Ardee, is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Louth," Sheets 13, 14.

<sup>73</sup> According to the Tripartite Life. This family is called Mocruntir, recte, Mac Uiruntir, by Adamnan, in lib. i., ch. xviii.

<sup>74</sup> The Book of Armagh states, that the three Magi, who opposed St. Patrick, were members of this race; and, it appears, that the locale of the family was at Clonkeen, in Fer-Ross. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," lib. i., cap. xviii., p. 47, n. (c.)

<sup>75</sup> In his Second Preface to the Life of St. Columba, Adamnan says of him: "Prose-lytus Brito, homo sanctus, sancti Patricii episcopi discipulus." See "Trias Thaumturga," p. 336.

<sup>76</sup> In some editions of Adamnan, for Mochteus, we find Mavcteus. Colgan's edition has Mautaneus; but Ussher's M.S. had Mochteus. More regarding this saint will be found in Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 855.

<sup>77</sup> See "Annales Ultonienses." Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus iv.

<sup>78</sup> The Irish Tripartite remarks, that it ran to this effect: "Mochta, the devoted, the believing, let him be in the place he has taken."

<sup>79</sup> We are told, by Jocelyn, that St. Patrick, through profound humility and charity, kept a leper always in his company. He tended most carefully this afflicted man, washing with his own hands the ulcers of that person, and providing him with all necessaries of life. This leper, living with the saint, being deprived of his bodily health, laboured by frequent prayers, and by other exercises of piety, to procure and to preserve the health of his soul. Fearing to be offensive to others, he withdrew from the company of men, and lived a solitary life, in a great hollow tree. One day, he requested a Christian, that passed by, to bring him out from a neighbouring place a bundle of reeds. The man went to that place, and as he plucked up the reeds, a fountain gushed out, whereof he gave notice to the leper, when he brought him the reeds. The leper replied: "Know then, my dear brother, that God sent thee hither, to wash me in that fountain, and lastly to bury me in that place." Which words being spoken, he gave up the ghost. As the Christian washed that leper, in the miraculous water, there remained not one spot of leprosy upon him. So burying him, the Christian departed. This is said to have occurred, at the place, afterwards known as Clonmacnoise, between Meath and Connaught. Afterwards, when St. Munis returned from Rome, with sacred relics, he saw there a departed from that locality, for a place he was destined to render so celebrated, as the seat of Ireland's primatial See; notwithstanding, that the good people of Louth appear to have had a most earnest desire, to retain their great missionary among them. Long after St. Patrick's departure, they used to point out Leach-Mochta, or "Mochta's stone," which was a remarkable rock, where the two saints were accustomed to meet,<sup>80</sup> for their mutual edification.<sup>81</sup> Here, likewise, the glorious Apostle of Ireland often visited Mochta,<sup>82</sup> and they engaged, in various holy conversations and counsels.<sup>83</sup> There, too, St. Mochta lived, afterwards, until the time of his death.

CHAPTER XXII.

ST. PATRICK IS SAID TO HAVE PRESIDED OVER THE SEE OF CLOGHER—HE IS REPORTED TO HAVE VISITED BRITAIN, AND THE ISLE OF MAN—BAPTISM OF THE PRINCESS MUNESSA—ST. PATRICK RETURNS TO IRELAND—HE JOURNEYS TOWARDS ARMAGH, AND RECEIVES FROM DAIRE THE SITE FOR HIS GREAT CATHEDRAL—ST. PATRICK MEASURES OUT ITS BOUNDARIES—VARIOUS WONDERFUL EVENTS ARE RECORDED, AFTER ITS ESTABLISHMENT.

It has been thought, that St. Patrick spent about two years in Louth, and in some of the adjoining districts of Ulster. Following his system, in placing the foundation of Armagh, at A.D. 445, Ussher brings St. Patrick to Louth, in the year 443.<sup>1</sup> Upon a similar principle, Dr. Lanigan thinks 453 preferable, for his own theory. Our saint departed from Munster, as it has been supposed, in the year 452. For his progress towards Ulster, as also for his delay in Maghinis, his stay at Louth, and in other places, it has been computed,<sup>2</sup> that we may allow, at least, another year to have elapsed, if not a longer time.

According to some accounts, the Irish Apostle governed the See of Clogher, about the middle of the fifth century.<sup>3</sup> Afterwards, the holy man, named great light, surrounding the spot, during the silence of night, and where that leper had been buried, while Angels, keeping watch, were singing canticles. At a subsequent time, St. Kieran founded a great religious establishment there, and he paid marked honour to the relics of the buried leper. See Sixth Life, chap. cxiii., pp. 90, 91. See, also, the Seventh Life, lib. i., chap. xxiv., xxv., p. 132.

<sup>80</sup> The Irish Tripartite has it, that Patrick used to come every day, from the east, or from Ard-Phadraig, while Mochta used to come from the west, or from Lughmadh.

<sup>81</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. lxxv., lxxvi., lxxvii., and nn. 96, 97, 98, p. 185.

<sup>82</sup> In direct opposition, not only to the Tripartite, but to Jocelyn, Archdall makes St. Patrick himself the founder of the monastery of Louth. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 469. He mistook what they stated, about the saint, on quitting that part of the country, when he gave up the church and ecclesiastical property of Ardpatrick, to Mocteus. In the opinion of Dr. Lanigan, that account, regarding the addition of such possessions to the house, at Louth, seems referable to those times, when monasteries were richly endowed. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. xii., n. 121, p. 309.

<sup>83</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lix., pp. 25, 26, cap. lxxii., p. 27, cap. lxxix., pp. 27, 28. Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxvii., p. 44, and nn. 49, 50, 51, pp. 49, 50, cap. lxxx., lxxxi., lxxxii., pp. 45, 46, and nn. 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, p. 50. Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. ix., x., xi., xii., pp. 52, 53, and nn. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, p. 63. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxiii., p. 81, cap. cxlii., pp. 90, 91, cap. cxxxii., cxxxiii., p. 94, and n. 134, p. 114, cap. cli., clii., pp. 98, 99, and nn. 156, 157, 158, 159, pp. 115, 116. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. lvi., pp. 159, 160, cap. lvii., lviii., lix., lx., lxi., lxii., lxiii., lxiv., lxx., lxxvi., lxxvii., pp. 160 to 162, and nn. 84 to 98, p. 187. Also Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 477 to 483, with accompanying notes.

CHAPTER XXII.—<sup>1</sup> See his "Index Chronologicus," ad A.D. cccclxiii. and cccclv.

<sup>2</sup> By Rev. Dr. Lanigan. See his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. xiii., and n. 134, pp. 312, 313.

<sup>3</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Clogher," pp. 176, 177.

Carthan or Maccarthen—classed among St. Patrick's disciples<sup>4</sup>—succeeded, when he is said to have been old.<sup>5</sup> The Tripartite Life, in that passage referring to him, does not treat about the foundation of Armagh, during an intervention of many chapters.<sup>6</sup> But, there seems to be some anachronism in the narrative order, nor are we reliably informed, that any saint specially presided over the See of Clogher, in those early days.

Seeing that the harvest was great in Ireland, while the workmen were few, our saint took shipping, in order to reach Britain, as we are told, there to gather many co-assistants and fellow-workmen, to aid him in cultivating our Lord's vineyard.<sup>7</sup> In those days, the Arian heresy, and Pelagianism, took great root in Britain. These pestilent dogmas the blessed bishop endeavoured to extirpate. With signs and sermons, he laboured, in bringing the people to the former integrity of Faith. It is said, that he repaired various monasteries, destroyed by the pagans, that he built others, and furnished them with monks. These lived, according to the rule of life he assigned them. It was his custom, we are told, not only in cities, but even in the principal towns, to install bishops, selected from among his disciples. This he did, to the end, that the faithful should not be deprived of the Sacrament of Confirmation. He desired, they always should have present for their services, one who could minister in the episcopal office; while the dioceses being not too extended, the presence and the care of their pastors should be better supplied.<sup>8</sup> He foretold many adverse and prosperous things, that should happen; and, especially did he predict the future sanctity of Blessed David,<sup>9</sup> then in his mother's womb. Many places were rendered illustrious, there, through his miracles, and redolent of memories, connected with his holy life and conversation. Among his miracles, while in Britain, a very conspicuous one was this. A certain evil-doer, named Melinus, like Simon the Magician, asserting himself to be a God, attempted to fly by magic arts in the air. At the prayers of the saint, however, he fell headlong, was dashed in pieces, and so he miserably perished.<sup>10</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan is of opinion, notwithstanding, that A.D. 427 to 432 included the only period, to which we could assign any preaching of St. Patrick, in Britain. A young lady of great beauty, and named Memessa,<sup>11</sup> or Munessa<sup>12</sup>—called also Muneria<sup>13</sup>—was

<sup>4</sup> His name is found in Tirechan's list, where he is called Carthen. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 268. He is even said to have been with St. Patrick, in Italy. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 856.

<sup>5</sup> See Jocelyn or Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxliii., p. 96. The Tripartite makes mention of this appointment. See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. iii., p. 149.

<sup>6</sup> It seems to convey the impression, however, that the See of Armagh then existed.

<sup>7</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life states, that St. Patrick—not only thrice, but more frequently—visited Britain. We are even told, that he went into other European nations and regions, beyond the sea, for the purpose of bringing holy men and virgins, to assist in the works of his mission, especially as those were attracted, by the fame of his labours and miracles, they having a desire to see him, and to embrace his holy doctrine or rules for their manner of living.

<sup>8</sup> The state of Britain, however, being then disturbed by the Saxons, is thought to refute such statements as the foregoing. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., num. xi., n. 118, pp. 305 to 307.

<sup>9</sup> His feast occurs, at the 1st of March.

<sup>10</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xcii., p. 86. Jocelyn states, that St. Germanus, a wise and holy disciple of St. Patrick, was consecrated a bishop, and placed over the church of Man, and that his See was established, at a certain promontory, afterwards known as Patrick's Island, because our Apostle had dwelt there for some time. The Rt. Rev. Dr. Moran is of opinion, that the bishop in question was no other than the St. Germain of Auxerre, who visited Britain a second time in 448, who laboured in Ireland, under the guidance of St. Patrick, as also in Wales, and probably in the Isle of Man. See "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. i., p. 10.

<sup>11</sup> According to Jocelyn.

<sup>12</sup> See Vita Tertia S. Patricii, cap. lxxviii., p. 27, and nn. 74, 75, p. 34. Colgan deems daughter to a great prince, in Britain.<sup>14</sup> By contemplating the works of creation, she had attained to such a perfect knowledge, and love of the Creator, that for his sake, she despised all worldly things. Her parents laboured very much, but neither by fair nor by foul means could they enforce her, ever to contract with any of the great lords, that were suitors for the honour of her companionship, so constant was she in the purpose of dedicating her virginity to the great Maker of all things. We are told, that her familiars even resorted to magic arts, that their purposes might be effected. Seeing no persuasions could prevail with their daughter, her parents sent her into Ireland, where St. Patrick, then so celebrated, accepted her profession of Faith, and was destined to take her under his charge.<sup>15</sup> The saint received her with great joy, instructed her in the Christian Religion, and after she had abjured paganism, he baptized her. After receiving the Blessed Sacrament, by way of Holy Viaticum, and being engaged in devout prayer, she yielded up her pure soul. This holy virgin was carried by Angels to her heavenly Spouse.<sup>16</sup> The Irish Apostle had her buried in that place—now unknown<sup>17</sup>—where she departed to Christ, and there a cell was soon afterwards built, where holy virgins consecrated to the service of God lived, according to his prediction.<sup>18</sup> On Patrick's return from Britannia,<sup>19</sup> it is traditionally believed, that he converted Eubonia, or the Isle of Man,<sup>20</sup> which then was subject to Britain, as Jocelyn states, while others have it inhabited by Irish people.<sup>21</sup> According to some authorities, Romulus<sup>22</sup> and Coindrus<sup>23</sup> were the first preachers of the Divine Word, in this place;<sup>24</sup> while others relate,<sup>25</sup> that St. Patrick was the proto-missionary among the Manx.<sup>26</sup> The like labours he this, or Monessa, to be the right form for her name. A saint thus named, is found in our Calendars, at the 4th of September. Ness, or Nessa, is another rendering of her name.

<sup>13</sup> She is thus named by Probus, in the Fifth Life, lib. ii., cap. xxv., p. 59.

<sup>14</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks, it may be doubted, whether the Britain, here alluded to by Probus, or by his earlier authorities, was not rather Belgic than insular Britain.

<sup>15</sup> Dr. Lanigan remarks, that no clue, as to the time when this happened, can be obtained.

<sup>16</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clix., p. 100.

<sup>17</sup> It is difficult to ascertain, from the statement in the Latin Tripartite Life, whether or not, this place is to be distinguished from Coll-na-ningean, near Armagh.

<sup>18</sup> The Fifth Life adds, that the memory of that holy woman was venerated there, at the actual time of writing. See lib. ii., cap. xxv., p. 59.

<sup>19</sup> This is called "propria patria," by Jocelyn.

<sup>20</sup> About the year 440 or 444, it is said St. Patrick founded a church in the Isle of Man, when the Britons inhabiting it were converted to the true faith, and had abandoned the superstitious rites of the Druids. He appointed St. Germanus bishop over the islanders in 448. Under this prelate and his successors, the inhabitants continued for many years, free from foreign invaders, until it fell at last under the sway of the Scots or Northmen. From Germanus, the Cathedral in Peel Castle and the parish of Kirk German are named. At Peel are the ruins of a church, once consecrated to St. Patrick. See "The Illustrated Guide and Visitor's Companion through the Isle of Man." By a Resident, pp. 5, 6, 22.

<sup>21</sup> See Nennius "Historia Britonum," cap. viii.

<sup>22</sup> This missionary seems to be the Roman Ruadan, copied into the "Martyrology of Donegal," from Marianus, at the 18th of November.

<sup>23</sup> Also called Conindrius, Connidrius, Coindrius, Coninnri, or Conderius, whose feast is set down at the 17th of November. Both of these holy men are alluded to, as having been ordained to succeed St. Germanus, the first bishop of Man. See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. CCCCLXXIV., p. 522.

<sup>24</sup> Thus Probus states, "primi docuerunt verbum Dei et baptismum in Euonia, et per eos conversi sunt homines insulæ ad Catholicam fidem."—"Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. xi., p. 53. In the Fourth Life, they are not expressly said to have been the first Apostles in the island. See cap. lxxxi.

<sup>25</sup> The "Chronicon Manniæ" states, regarding our saint, "primus fidem Catholicam predicasse fertur Mannensibus." See Johnstone's "Antiquitates Celtæ Normanniæ," p. 43.

<sup>26</sup> See Ussher's "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xv., pp. 335, 336.

<sup>27</sup> Ussher has copied this statement, in his accomplished, as we are told, in several other isles. Through the prayers of Patrick, all venomous animals were driven from those islands, that preserved their faith. But, the dwellers in some other lands, being aliened from the faith, afterwards renounced the law of God, which Patrick preached unto them. Coming back into Ireland, he brought with him many learned and religious men, as we are told by Jocelyn. Thirty of these missionaries were installed by him, as bishops over several Episcopal Sees.<sup>27</sup> Those laboured assiduously in the Lord's vineyard. In obedience to the direction he had received from an Angel, Patrick left Louth,<sup>28</sup> moving onward, and towards Magh-Macha,<sup>29</sup> or as more usually called, Machaire-Arda-Macha,<sup>30</sup> for that place and district, known as the Height of Macha;<sup>31</sup> for, it was so called, from a celebrated woman, Macha Mongruadh,<sup>32</sup> foundress of the royal fort Emania,<sup>33</sup>

"Primordia," cap. xvii., pp. 870, 872. See, likewise, Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 22.

<sup>28</sup> The journey of St. Patrick from Louth, towards the north, is thus poetically described:—

"Patrick then,
Obedient as that Patriarch Sire who faced
At God's command the desert, northward went

In holy silence. Soon to him was lost
That green and purple meadow-sea, embayed

'Twixt two descending woody promontories,

Its outlet girt with isles of rock, its shores
All white with meadow-sweet. Not once he turned,

Climbing the uplands rough, or crossing streams

Swoll'n by the melted snows. The brethren paced

Behind, Benignus first, his psalmist, next Secknall, his bishop, next his brehon Erc, Mochta, his priest, and Sinell of the Bells, Rodan, his shepherd, Essa, Bite and Tassach,

Workers of might in iron and in stone,
God-taught to build the churches of the Faith

With wisdom, and with heart-delighting craft;

Mac Cairthen last, the giant meek that oft On shoulders broad had borne him through the floods.

His rest was nigh. That hour a stream they crossed,

Deep stream, and, 'neath his load, the giant sighed:

Saint Patrick said, 'Thou wert not wont to sigh;'

He answered, 'Old I grow. Of them my mates

How many hast thou left in churches housed

Wherein they rule and rest?' The saint replied,

'Thee also will I leave within a church
For rule and rest; not to mine own too near,

For rarely then should we be seen apart,
Nor yet remote, lest we should meet no more.'

At Clochar soon he placed him. There long years
Mac Cairthen sat its bishop.

"As they went,
Oft through the woodlands rang the battle shout;

And twice there rose above the distant hill
The smoke of town new-fired. Yet, none the less,

Spring-touched, the blackbird sang; green, grassy lawns

The cowslips changed to golden; and grey rock,

And river's marge with primroses were starred;

Here shook the windflower, there the bluebells gleamed

As though a patch of sky had fallen on earth."

—"The Legends of St. Patrick," by Aubrey De Vere. "St. Patrick and the Founding of Armagh Cathedral," pp. 172, 173.

<sup>29</sup> This is thought, by Dr. Lanigan, to have been a small territory.

<sup>30</sup> Or "the plain of Armagh."

<sup>31</sup> It is called Altitudo Macha, and Altima-macha, in the "Book of Armagh."

<sup>32</sup> Some say she was Macha, the wife of Nemhidh.

<sup>33</sup> It is supposed to have been a royal residence of the Ulster kings. The old Irish writers called it Emhain-Macha. It is mentioned, in Fiech's hymn, but not as a royal residence; however, it is said, that in Armagh, the seat of royalty was maintained.
According to Lynch's translation, there has been added, regarding this place: "Long has been the prerogative of Emania." Thus, Colgan writes some description of its noble ruins. "Emania prope Ardmacham, nunc fossis latis, vestigiis murorum eminentibus, et ruderibus pristinum redolens splendorem."
—"Trias Thaumaturga," *Prima Vita S.
Patricii*, n. 15, p. 6. Emania is near to where Armagh now stands; and, according to O'Donnell, it still existed, in St. Columba's near the present city of Armagh.<sup>34</sup> A certain prosperous and venerable person was there, named Daire,<sup>35</sup> or Darius.<sup>36</sup> He lived at a place, called Rath-Daire, which has not been identified. From him, Patrick humbly asked a site,<sup>37</sup> for his Regles,<sup>38</sup> or church. The chief wished to know that spot he desired for selection, and the holy man requested, what seemed to him a most eligible and beautiful site. Daire at first refused that hill, which St. Patrick had requested; but, instead of it, he granted a stony rath, or place,<sup>39</sup> in the low ground, called, in some of his Acts, Fearta,<sup>40</sup> or Da Ferta.<sup>41</sup> Holy Patrick founded a church there, and he remained a long time, in that place.

One day, two steeds belonging to Daire were brought to graze at St. Patrick's regles. The pasture here was fertile and grassy. Those horses died, at once, after they had tasted the grass. His servant told this to Daire, and he added the following, to excite the chief's indignation: "That Christian hath killed your steeds, because they ate the grass which was at his Regles."<sup>42</sup> Daire felt very angry on receiving this information, and he ordered servants to plunder the cleric, and to expel him from the Ferta. Then a colic<sup>43</sup> seized Daire, immediately, so that he was near dying. His wife thereupon recalled to mind the plundering of St. Patrick, and she told Daire, the cause for his approaching death was owing to that attack, directed against the holy missionary. She sent messengers, instantly, to beg water, sanctified by his prayers from Patrick, in order that her husband might be restored to health. Patrick then said, "Only for what that woman has done, there should never be any resurrection from death, for Daire." Wherefore, Patrick blessed water, and gave it to the servants, with orders to have it sprinkled over the horses and over their former owner.<sup>44</sup> They did, as had been directed, and immediately Darius recovered, so that all were released from death.<sup>45</sup> A brazen cauldron<sup>46</sup> was next brought to Patrick, as an offering from the chief. "Deo gratias," said the saint. Daire asked his servants, what Patrick said on receiving it. They answered, "Gratzicum."<sup>47</sup> "This is little reward, for a good offering, and for a good time. See O'Donnell's or Quinta Vita S. Columbæ, lib. i., cap. lxxxiv., p. 402. The growth of Armagh, however, contributed to its downfall.

<sup>34</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol i., p. 10, n. (w), and p. 143, n. (b.)

<sup>35</sup> He was the son of Finched, son to Eoghan, the son of Niallan, from whom the Hi-Niellain race derived name and origin.

<sup>36</sup> So is he called, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>37</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life, "in quo Deo domum in terra, sacramque excitaret ædem."

<sup>38</sup> This is the term found, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>39</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life thus relates this occurrence: Daire asked, "What place do you desire?" "This great hillock below," said Patrick. That was where Armagh afterwards stood. "I will not give it," said Daire; "but I will give you a site for your regles, in the strong rath below." There the Ferta or De-Fearta might be seen, when the Irish Tripartite Lives were written.

<sup>40</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 851.

<sup>41</sup> Meaning "the two graves."

<sup>42</sup> The Latin Tripartite has it, "in ejus agello," or in his "paddock." Probus only mentions one horse.

<sup>43</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>44</sup> Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxi., p. 100.

<sup>45</sup> These events form the subject, for an illustration, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," &c., at p. 393. The upper part represents Daire's donation of land for the church of Armagh. In the next compartment is shown that site marked out, and where the fawn was found; while below, Daire is shown, lying on his death-bed, and about to be sprinkled with the holy water sent by the saint. The dead horses are on the ground outside.

<sup>46</sup> Many of these ancient cauldrons, and of large size, have been found, in bogs and other places, throughout Ireland. The material and workmanship were excellent and durable, in many of those vessels, which are usually of great size. According to the account, in the Book of Armagh, the present one held three firkins. It is also called, "anenum mirabilem transmarinum." Probus calls this, "anenum cyphum," in lib. ii., cap. vi., p. 52, but Colgan remarks, cauldron," replied Daire. He then ordered this vessel to be brought to him, again, and when it was demanded, "Deo gratias," was still St. Patrick's expression. Daire afterwards asked, what Patrick said, when they were taking the cauldron away from him. The servants answered, "He said the same thing, as when we were bringing it to him, which was "Gratzicum." <sup>48</sup> "This, then, is a good word with them," replied Daire; "Gratzicum, Patrick said, when giving the cauldron to him, and, again, Gratzicum, when taking it away from him." Then Daire and his wife went with submission to St. Patrick, and the chief gave the cauldron most willingly to the holy man, as also that hill, which he had before asked. <sup>49</sup> This gift Patrick gratefully accepted, and he blessed them. Afterwards, he founded a church in that place, called Ard-Macha, and it was destined to be renowned, in after time.

In the various Lives of St. Patrick, it is stated, that at a spot, which was known as Drumsaileth, or Druymaileach, <sup>50</sup> otherwise, "the ridge of willows," Salicetum <sup>51</sup> or Sailech; <sup>52</sup> and, on a high ground, <sup>53</sup> Daire gave him the site, for a church. <sup>54</sup> This account runs, that both St. Patrick and Daire went forth, to view the admirable and well-pleasing gift, and they ascended that height. There, they found a roe, and a little fawn with her, lying on that spot, where an altar of the Northern Church in Ardmacha stood, at a time, when the Acts of St. Patrick, contained in the Book of Armagh, had been written. <sup>55</sup> The eminence to which St. Patrick first went, at the north side of Armagh, can hardly be any other than that, on which the new Catholic Cathedral, dedicated to him, is now built. <sup>56</sup> On the 17th of March, 1840, its foundation-stone was laid, by the Most Rev. Dr. Crolly. <sup>57</sup> The style is that known, as perpendicular Gothic. <sup>58</sup> The plan of this Cathedral, <sup>59</sup> described in technical fashion, is as follows:—A cruciform area includes a nave and chancel, or this is incorrect, because a "cyphus" could not contain "metretas ternas." See ibid., n. 4, p. 63.

<sup>47</sup> Such is the form of expression, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>48</sup> In the Third Life, this expression is found "Crazacam" and "Grazagam." In the Fourth Life, it is "Graticum." In the Fifth Life, we find it "Grazagam." In the Sixth Life, it is better expressed, as "Gratias agam," as also in the Latin Tripartite, where it is "Deo Gratias."

<sup>49</sup> Probus writes: "Accepit ergo ab eo S. Patricius prædium optatum et placitum sibi."

<sup>50</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxii., p. 28, and Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxliii., p. 101.

<sup>51</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," p. 857, and in his "Index Chronologicus," ad A.D. ccccxlvi., as also in Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. i., p. 289, it is so termed.

<sup>52</sup> According to Probus, book ii., chap. iii. In Harris' Ware, it is said to have been called Druim-Sailech, "from the Plenty of Salleys there growing." See vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 19, note.

<sup>53</sup> See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. iii., p. 52, and n. 3, p. 63.

<sup>54</sup> Seward states, that the Cathedral of Armagh was called Druim-Sailec. See "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," at the word Armagh. This, however, was the name of the hill, before the Cathedral had been built.

<sup>55</sup> See the Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ancient Churches of Armagh," p. 7.

<sup>56</sup> The height is now called Banbrook Hill. It lies between the Protestant Cathedral and the railway station, and from it may be obtained a view, almost unexcelled for great loveliness. The city, with its narrow streets and that air of antiquity which pervades it, lies to the south and west. The Ridge of Sallows, the Ferta Martyrum, and other historic eminences, revered even under their modern titles, confront the spectator; religious edifices and public buildings, every one of them hallowed by their association with the past, or occupying ground made sacred by the memories of sacred things, present themselves on all sides.

<sup>57</sup> On Sunday, the 24th of August, 1873, enormous crowds gathered to the ancient city of Armagh, from every point in the North of Ireland, from Leinster, Connaught and Munster, from all parts of the British Empire, and from the United States of America, to assist at the ceremony of dedication of the new Cathedral.

<sup>58</sup> The architect, Mr. Duff, of Newry, furnished the original design, but he died when the structure had been raised to the summit of the aisle walls, and the arches had been raised between nave and aisles. Afterwards, Mr. J. J. Mc'Carthy, R.H.A., Professor of Architecture to the Catholic choir, with two western towers,<sup>60</sup> north and south transepts, and aisles to both the nave and chancel. The measurements of the walls are—total length in the clear, 210 feet; width across nave and aisles, 72; across transepts, 112; height from floor to ridge, 91 feet.<sup>61</sup> The nave is separated from the aisles on each side, by six bays of clustered shafts, with moulded capitals and bases, and deeply-moulded arches; the chancel bay is separated from the aisles, by three bays of similar shafts and arches.<sup>62</sup> The principal entrance to the Cathedral is by a finely-wrought and richly-moulded doorway, in the west end of the nave; and by smaller doors of a similar character in the towers<sup>63</sup> are approaches. The interior of this noble Cathedral presents an imposing University, was charged by Archbishop Dixon, in 1854, with the execution of the task. He began, by altering materially the design, on which his predecessor had been working.

St. Patrick's Catholic Cathedral of Armagh.

<sup>59</sup> The accompanying side view of this fine structure has been drawn, from a photograph, on the wood, and it has been engraved by William Oldham.

<sup>60</sup> The towers rise in successive stages, until they terminate in the bell stages, containing two double light-mullioned and traceried openings, on each face. From these stages rise the graceful broach spires, with tiers of lucarns on alternate faces, each lucarn terminated with gilt cross, until the entire is terminated with beautifully-wrought iron gilt crosses.

<sup>61</sup> The windows of the aisles are three-light, and are filled with moulded mullions and elaborate tracery. The east window is seven-light, and formed of moulded mullions, with rich and varied tracery. The north and south windows of transepts are five-light and traceried.

<sup>62</sup> Over these arches are the triforia, consisting of marble shafts, with moulded bases and carved capitals, deeply-moulded tracery filling the arches. Above the triforia rises the clerestory, containing in each bay three-light traceried windows.

<sup>63</sup> Over the west door of the nave is a series of moulded and canopied niches, to be hereafter filled with figures of saints. Under these niches is a string-course, on which the following inscription is carved:—“Soli Deo omnipotenti, trino in personis, sub invocatione Sti. Patritii, Hibernorum Apostoli. A.D. MDCCCLVI.” Rising above the niches is an elaborate seven-light traceried window, and the west gable terminates in a floriated cross.

<sup>64</sup> The high altar is placed in an advanced position within the choir, and behind it are situated the chapel and altar of the Blessed Virgin. At the end of each choir aisle are appearance.<sup>64</sup> Its site, perhaps, is one of the finest to be found, in the world.<sup>65</sup> It commands a view of the surrounding country, for many miles. This prospect is unrivalled, for picturesque beauty, and for charming variety of scenery; while, the noble towers, and their surmounting spires, are objects of imposing height, from all points of approach.

Following the legend,<sup>66</sup> St. Patrick's companions wanted to catch the fawn, which fled to the northern hill;<sup>67</sup> but, the saint objected, and he would not permit them to kill it.<sup>68</sup> He even took up the fawn with care, and carried it on his own shoulders. The roe followed him, like a pet sheep, until he laid down that fawn on another eminence, at the north side of Armagh.<sup>69</sup> There, according to the statement of those who are familiar with the ground, miraculous attestations were to be witnessed, in after time. The particular spot was called Telac-na-liece,<sup>70</sup> or Tualach na Leke,<sup>71</sup> afterwards Tullyleckeny.<sup>72</sup> Were we to credit Jocelyn, the glorious bishop, with God's help and favour, began the building of a city,<sup>73</sup> remarkable for its situation, greatness and compass.<sup>74</sup> He brought, likewise, many principal citizens to inhabit there. The city itself, in due course, was adorned with fair and decent churches, wherein were ordained, by the saint, clergymen for singing the Divine Office, for the government of souls, and for instructing the people. There were, besides, monasteries furnished with monks, and with sacred virgins. Furthermore, we are told, that the next night, after this dotation, the saint saw Angels tracing out the form and compass of a fair city, that was to be built, in that pleasant and beautiful region. One of the Angels commanded him the succeeding day, to seek a place, called Tobar-Patraic, or "Patrick's well,"<sup>75</sup> where he should cure certain lepers, sixteen in number, and who were covered over with ugly sores.<sup>76</sup> The saint did so, accordingly, and he baptized those a chapel and an altar. The Primatial throne and stalls are placed in rubrical position, in advance of the high altar. The stone pulpit stands against the easternmost pier of nave, on the epistle side, and the baptismal font is placed within a massively-screened enclosure, towards the west, in the north aisle. The foregoing description and details are furnished, from the Dublin Freeman's Journal, of August 23rd, 1873.

<sup>65</sup> In Harris' Ware, it is stated, that Armagh took its name, from its situation on an eminence, as the high field. See vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 19, note.

<sup>66</sup> Contained in the Book of Armagh, as quoted by Dr. Reeves, in his "Ancient Churches of Armagh," p. 7.

<sup>67</sup> Where the Sabhall is to-day, is noted in the Irish Tripartite Life of the saint.

<sup>68</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life then adds: "Prohibuit Patricius, et dixit, Serviat sibi postea."

<sup>69</sup> Regarding this roe or fawn, the following legend is given, as a continuation in the Latin Tripartite: "Statim enim horis ibat ad pascua, et redibat ad ædiculam, quam pro ea fieri curavit vir sanctus, ad instar mansuetissimæ ovis, et præbebat se mulgendam ancillis Christi juxta dicenda."

<sup>70</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life. Likely, it was that hill, a little further north of the new Catholic Cathedral, and over which an old road passed to the Callen or Geary's bridge, between Tullyelmer and Drumcairn, leading to Charlemont. There is a townland named Longstone, adjoining the right of the lunatic asylum, and a little to the north of Armagh. This may be the place, here called Telac-na-liece, meaning "the hill of the stones."

<sup>71</sup> This is the form of name, as contained in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>72</sup> In an Inquisition, taken at Armagh, 9th September, 1633. It is now absorbed in the corporation, and being placed in the same group with the Desert, as parcel of Knockadreeine, the ancient name for that hill, on which now stands the new Catholic Cathedral.

<sup>73</sup> Alluding to this foundation, Probus writes, "in quo loco jam civitas est Ard-mach nominata, ubi Sedes Episcopatus et regiminis est Hiberniæ." See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. vii., p. 52.

<sup>74</sup> The 22nd stanza of St. Fiech's Hymn, thus alludes to this metropolitan city:—

IN ARD MACHA FÍL IUGÉ, IR CIAN DO PE-pacht EMAIN,
IR CÉIL MÓR DÁN LETHGLAIRE, NIMHOL
CÉO WICHIB TEMAIR.

Thus translated into English:—

"In Ard-magh there is sovereignty: it is long since Emain passed away;

A great church is Dun-Lethglasse; I wish not that Tara should be a desert."

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., March, 1868, p. 291.

lepers in that well. This miracle, coming to the people's knowledge, furnished a main help towards the building of Armagh. At the saint's request, an Angel moved out of its place a great rock, that was likely to make an entrance into the city very incommodious and difficult.<sup>75</sup> The dimensions St. Patrick measured out for the Ferta<sup>78</sup> were one hundred and forty feet in the Lis, or "fort;"<sup>79</sup> twenty feet for the Tigh-mor, or "great house;" and seventeen feet for the cuille, or "kitchen;" seven feet were allotted for the aregal, or "oratory." We are informed, that it was thus the houses of the Congbail, or the churches,<sup>80</sup> were always built. Patrick and his divines, Daire and his wife, with the nobles of Airther, or Oirthir,<sup>81</sup> also known as Orior,<sup>82</sup> came to the hill, in order to inspect this site for the church, to mark out its boundaries, and to have it blessed and consecrated.<sup>83</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life tells us, regarding the way Patrick measured that rath, which seems to have surrounded the early church and cemetery at Armagh. An Angel went before him, and Patrick followed with his people, and with other holy men of Erin. The Bachall Isa, or "Staff of Jesus," was held in Patrick's hand, while he was engaged, in that solemn rite of consecration.<sup>84</sup> He said, great should be the crime of anyone, who dared to transgress within that sanctuary; as, on the other hand, their reward should be great, for such as fulfilled the will of God, in that holy place. Besides the church here erected, its holy founder established habitations<sup>85</sup> and out-offices, for the clergy and religious,<sup>86</sup> destined to serve in or near it.<sup>87</sup> This foundation of Armagh is placed, so early as A.D. 444,<sup>88</sup> or 445.<sup>89</sup> A Catalogue of bishops,

<sup>75</sup> The Third Life calls it, "fons Patricii, in latere Ardmacha."

<sup>76</sup> The Third Life states the number as twelve men, who were healed there, on each Sabbath. See cap. lxxxiii., p. 28.

<sup>77</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxiii., clxiv., p. 101.

<sup>78</sup> No remains of the buildings, at the Fertæ Martyrum, are now to be found; but, the Rev. Dr. Reeves, has determined its situation, as having been in Scotch-street, Armagh. It was a nunnery, called Temple-fertagh, and it was suppressed, at the time of the Reformation. See "Ancient Churches of Armagh," p. 5 et seq.

<sup>79</sup> This seems to have surrounded all the buildings.

<sup>80</sup> Thus is it explained, eclais, or "ecclesia," in an ancient Glossary, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, classed as H. 3. 18, at p. 524.

<sup>81</sup> Thus Oirthear, Airthery, Airthera, Artheria, or Airtheair, means "eastern," Latinè, "Oriente, comparatione ceterioris partis Ultoniæ."

<sup>82</sup> The district of Orior, "regio Artheriorum sive Orientalium," lying about Armagh, was in the eastern part of Oirghialla, an extensive northern territory.

<sup>83</sup> The Rev. Dr. Todd remarks, that this applies to the first ecclesiastical establishment created by St. Patrick, at Armagh, and not to the Cathedral or religious houses afterwards built there. See "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. iii., pp. 476, 477.

<sup>84</sup> This ceremonial forcibly reminds us of the rite, contained in the present "Pontificale Romanum," on similar occasions.

<sup>85</sup> This is mentioned, by Probus: "aedificavit in eo monasteria et habitationes religiosorum virorum." — "Quinta Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., cap. vii., p. 52.

<sup>86</sup> See also the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>87</sup> Jocelyn, and, after him, strangely enough, Archbishop Ussher, state, that St. Patrick built here a noble city. See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxv., p. 101. Also, "Primordia," cap. xi., p. 358.

<sup>88</sup> So state the "Annales Ultonienses." "A.D. 444. Ardmacha fundata est." — Dr. O'Conor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus iv.

<sup>89</sup> See James Stuart's "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh," chap. i., p. 82. Colgan says, in his "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. i., p. 291, that this is the most probable date for its erection. Colgan, too, adduces, in favour of this date, a most extraordinary argument, viz., that it is the only one, which will leave room for the incumbencies at Armagh of Secundinus and of Sen-Patrick. He proposes this argument, just after having quoted Ussher. This latter writer rejects Secundinus and Sen-Patrick from the list of Armagh prelates; because, in the hypothesis of 445 having been the true date, there was no place for them. Notwithstanding, Colgan thought, that, in order to provide room for them, it ought to be received. Now, he might have easily discovered, that, were we to admit, with the above Catalogue, those persons to belonging to that See,<sup>90</sup> and said to have been taken from the Calendar of Cashel, was published by Ussher,<sup>91</sup> to determine local chronology,<sup>92</sup> by a relative comparison of succession dates.<sup>93</sup> At the year 445, likewise, it is supposed, by Harris,<sup>94</sup> that Armagh had been founded, by the Irish Apostle; but, owing to the fact, that the greatest part of Leinster and of Munster had not then been reclaimed from paganism, he had not the power to make it what he desired, viz., the Metropolitan and Primatial See of all Ireland.<sup>95</sup> However, he went to Macha, for the express purpose of establishing his See there,<sup>96</sup> and, as soon as this church had been erected, Armagh became have been bishops of Armagh, this See should have been founded several years before A.D. 445.

<sup>90</sup> Should we stand by this Catalogue, according to the Rev. Dr. Lanigan, it must follow, that the See of Armagh existed, more than fifteen or sixteen years, before A.D. 445. Therefore, Dr. Lanigan argues, it should have existed, prior to St. Patrick's mission, or, at least, more than six years before the time calculated by Ussher.

<sup>91</sup> See his "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 875.

<sup>92</sup> In that Catalogue, eighteen years are reckoned for the administration of Iarlath. This computation Ussher ingeniously stretches to the year 483. Wherefore he places Iarlath's accession at A.D. 465. Ten years are assigned to Benignus, the immediate predecessor of Iarlath; and thus Ussher goes back to A.D. 455. Benignus is placed after Sen-Patrick. According to the said Catalogue, this latter prelate governed for ten years, and thus we are brought to A.D. 445. This is then the alleged year for the foundation of Armagh. All this might do very well, did not the catalogue mention Secundinus, as a predecessor of Sen-Patrick, and holding the See for fifteen years, or, as one of Ussher's copies had it, for six years. In Colgan's edition, Secundinus ruled xvi. years. Again, prior to Secundinus, St. Patrick himself presided over that metropolitan See. To get rid of difficulties, pointed out, Dr. Lanigan maintains, that neither Secundinus, nor Sen-Patrick—a personage whose existence he otherwise admitted—were ever bishops of Armagh. The immediate predecessor of Benignus, he considers to have been the great St. Patrick himself. Dr. Lanigan agrees with him, as to Secundinus, and also as to Sen-Patrick; not, however, for the purpose of propping any hypothesis, but because he thinks, there was no such person, distinct from our great Apostle. Notwithstanding, some writers have imagined, that there was a distinct personage so called. What then becomes of the authority of that catalogue? Ussher is forced to acknowledge, it is wrong from its very beginning. How then can we depend on its computation for the episcopal years of St. Benignus? It must be recollected, likewise, that in the said catalogue there is no reference whatever to the years of the Christian era. The compilers of the Ulster Annals are supposed, to have been Charles Maguire and Roderick Cassidy. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," p. 5. Also, Nicholson's "Irish Historical Library," chap. ii., p. 14, and Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., chap. xii., p. 90.

<sup>93</sup> Colgan has also published it, in his "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. ii., p. 292. The following is a transcript of this Catalogue: "Patricius (annis.) Secundinus XVI., Patric, Senior, X., Benignus X., Hierlatius XVIII., Corbmacus XV., Dubthacus XVI., Alildus XIII., Alildus X., Duachus, Fiachrius, al. Hifrachrius, Fedlimius XX., Caerlanus X., Eochodius. Senachus. Maclasiurus. Tomenius XXXV., Seginus XXVII., Flanniussebhla XXVII., Subneus XV., Congasacius XX., Kele-petrius VII., Ferdachricius X., Foennelachus III., Dubhdaetha XV., Arectactus I., Cudiniseus IV., Connmacus XIV., Torpachus I., Nuadus III., Mac-longsechus XIII., Artrigius II., Eugenius Monaster VIII., F. Tarannanus XIV., Diermitius IV., Fethgna XXII., Anmirius I., Cathasacius IV., Moelcova V., Maelbrigidus XXIX., Joseph IX., Moel-Patricius I., Cathasacius XX., Muredacius IX., Dub-daletha XXXIII., Murecanus III., Moel-murius XIX., Amalgadius XXX., Dub-daletha XII., Cumascacius III., Moelisa XXVII., Domnaldus." As the Catalogue ends, with the latter Archbishop, who ruled the See from A.D. 1092 to 1106, Colgan thinks it must have been compiled within these dates, since the term of his incumbency is not completed. Nor is the number of St. Patrick's years of rule determined, and this seems to show, that four of his vicar or assistant bishops were under him, until his death, assigned to A.D. 493. He does not know, if the omission of dates, for the incumbency of other prelates, were the choice of the writer, or an error of transcribers. The numerals affixed designate the years of the preceding Archbishops' government in the See.

<sup>94</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Armagh," p. 19.

<sup>95</sup> This is in direct opposition, likewise, to the statements generally given, in the various Lives of St. Patrick.

the ecclesiastical seat of government for all Ireland.<sup>97</sup> That the primatial See of Armagh could not have existed,<sup>98</sup> at an earlier date than 454, or 455,<sup>99</sup> is an opinion entertained by the Bollandists<sup>100</sup> and by Rev. Dr. Lanigan.<sup>101</sup> Other calculations,<sup>102</sup> especially the placing of Trim church, as an ecclesiastical erection, twenty-five years,<sup>103</sup> before the foundation of that at Armagh,<sup>104</sup> should bring the latter event, to either A.D. 457,<sup>105</sup> or 458,<sup>106</sup> as noted in an extract,<sup>107</sup> from an unpublished work of Roderick O'Flaherty,<sup>108</sup> and intitled, "Ogygia Christiana." <sup>109</sup> We may safely believe, that Tirechan knew something as to the time, when Armagh had been founded, and that his reason, for specifying the twenty-second year prior to it, was chiefly, because such a date corresponded with A.D. 433.<sup>110</sup> It is computed, by Sir James Ware, that Armagh was founded A.D. 455,<sup>111</sup>—although he had previously noted A.D. 445<sup>112</sup>—and governed for ten years by St. Patrick, until Benignus became its bishop. Then, in 465, or in the very year of his appointment—as his English translator, Harris, states—Benignus resigned the See to Iarlath.<sup>113</sup> These accounts lead to some confusion, in seeking to ascertain the exact date, for that important ecclesiastical foundation.

Among the favourite disciples of St. Patrick, Benignus,<sup>114</sup> or Benen, is most particularly noticed. He seems to have been attached to the Apostle, as a constant companion. Daire's daughter, who is named Ercnait,<sup>115</sup> or

<sup>96</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 859.

<sup>97</sup> Giraldus Cambrensis has expressed it very perspicuously, in a few words: "Baptizatus catervatim populus, et tota jam insula ad fidem Christi conversa, apud Ardmacham sibi sedem eligit; quam etiam quasi metropolim constituit et proprium totius Hiberniæ primatiæ locum."

<sup>98</sup> In blank verse does Aubrey De Vere record "St. Patrick and the Founding of Armagh Cathedral." See "Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 171 to 188.

<sup>99</sup> This computation is also that in Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Armagh," at St. Patrick, p. 21.

<sup>100</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Februarii xvii. Commentarius Prævius ad Acta S. Patricii, sect. v., p. 523.

<sup>101</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. xiii., p. 313.

<sup>102</sup> See the Sixth Life, cap. lii., and the Tripartite Life, lib. ii., cap. ii.

<sup>103</sup> As quoted by Ussher, Tirechan states, that the church at Trim was built the twenty-second year—or about A.D. 433—before the foundation of that at Armagh. See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 854.

<sup>104</sup> It may be worth observing, that even in Jocelyn's Life of St. Patrick, and in the Third and Fourth Lives, the preaching of our Apostle in Munster is treated of many chapters, before mention is made of his foundations at Armagh, which is not spoken of until towards the close of his southern mission.

<sup>105</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 142, 143. Also, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," vi. Martii. Vita S. Cadroe, n. 49, p. 503. The Annals of Clonmacnoise and of Senat-

Mac-Magnus accord.

<sup>106</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. xiii., n. 146, p. 318.

<sup>107</sup> This is found, as a manuscript addition to Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," at p. 318, in a copy, once belonging to him, and now in the Dublin Society's Library.

<sup>108</sup> Thus, he writes, "Ardmacha metropolis A. 458, a S. Patricio fundata est; et S. Benignus ab eo sibi substitutus immediatus successor."

<sup>109</sup> The Rev. Robert King notes, in his "Memoir Introductory to the early History of the Primacy of Armagh," the foundation of this city, by St. Patrick, at A.C. 457. See p. 68.

<sup>110</sup> Hence, Colgan has, in his "Index Chronologicus ad Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," at A.D. 455: "Ardmacha extracta, et in sedem totius regni metropolitani erecta per S. Patricium secundum S. Tirechanum."

<sup>111</sup> See his work, on the Bishops of Ireland, which did not appear, until the year 1665.

<sup>112</sup> Following the Ulster Annals and Ussher, in the Antiquities of Ireland, published A.D. 1654, cap. 29, and in his Annotationes ad S. Patricii Opuscula, published A.D. 1656, at p. 141.

<sup>113</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 35. Although Dr. Lanigan does not agree with Ware, as to the latter assertion; yet, there is no necessity for Harris recurring to any presumed typographical error of Ware, in setting down, A.D. 455. Such supposed mistake is not marked, even in the Errata to his work.

<sup>114</sup> His feast is referred, to the 9th of November.

<sup>115</sup> She is thus named, in the Irish Tripart-

Ergnata,<sup>116</sup> greatly admired the personal appearance of St. Benen, and sweet to her were the charming tones of his voice, when engaged chaunting the sacred Psalms, and other Church Offices. Indeed, through their ears, did he devotionally move the souls of all hearers. A wasting disease seized upon Ergnait, so that she is said to have died of it.<sup>117</sup> Benen carried cretra<sup>118</sup> to her from Patrick, when she suddenly arose alive, and thenceforward she loved him spiritually.<sup>119</sup> After a long life of religious devotion, she died, and she was buried, it is said, at Tamlaght-bo, now Tamlaght, in the parish of English, and lying north-westwards from Armagh. This was the church, which she had founded. But, the O'Clerys' Calendar gives this Eargnat,<sup>120</sup> Virgin, as belonging to Dun-da-en,<sup>121</sup> in Dal-Araidhe, and now the parish of Duneane, in the county of Antrim.

One time, and apparently, when a British king's daughter<sup>122</sup> arrived in Ireland, it is stated, that nine daughters, belonging to the king of the Longobards,<sup>123</sup> or Lombards, likewise came, on a pilgrimage, to St. Patrick. According to the opinion of some writers,<sup>124</sup> these adventurers issued forth from their primitive Scandinavian settlements,<sup>125</sup> towards the close of the fourth century.<sup>126</sup> They migrated to Southern Europe. Although usually applied to Italy, yet Leatha, with ancient Irish authors, signified Letavia, or Armorica,<sup>127</sup> on the eastern coast of France. It has been thought, that Brittany or Armorica may have been known, in ancient times, as a seat of the Lombards,<sup>128</sup> even before the time,<sup>129</sup> usually assigned for their occupation of Italy.<sup>130</sup> It is said, that messengers came from those virgins to St. Patrick, when they were at a place, called Ferta Minor,<sup>131</sup> and to know, if they should proceed to him. Then, Patrick declared to their messengers, that three of the maidens<sup>132</sup> should go to Heaven, and in that place, called Coll-naningean,<sup>133</sup> or "The hazel tree of the virgins." This was near to and on the tite Life. Her festival is said to have fallen, on the 8th of January.

<sup>116</sup> Her name is thus given, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>117</sup> This is the account, contained in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>118</sup> Such is the Irish Tripartite statement; but, in the Latin Tripartite, it is said, Benignus carried water, blessed by St. Patrick, and that he sprinkled it over her.

<sup>119</sup> The Latin Tripartite here states, this narrative was taken from that of an old author.

<sup>120</sup> See their notice of St. Benen, at the 9th of November.

<sup>121</sup> Signifying, according to Joyce, in his "Origin and History of Irish Names of Places," "the fortress of the two birds." See part ii., chap. ix., p. 247.

<sup>122</sup> About Munessa we have already treated. However, Crumtheris may here be meant. Jocelyn calls her simply the King of Britain's daughter, and he remarks, that nine holy maidens came with her.

<sup>123</sup> These are said by their historian, Paulus Diaconus, to have been so called, from the length of their beards.

<sup>124</sup> Such as Kranztius.

<sup>125</sup> Paul Warnefrid, surnamed the Deacon, "De Gestibus Longobardorum," lib. i., and Grotius, in his Prolegomina to "Historia Gothorum," p. 28, assigns them such origin. Cluverius, in his "Germania Antiqua," lib. iii., cap. xxvi., pp. 102 et seq., denies it. About the time of Augustus and Trajan, they are discovered, for the first time, between the Elbe and the Oder. See Gibbon's "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," vol. vii., chap. xlii., pp. 270, 277.

<sup>126</sup> The Lombards, who settled in Italy, are first mentioned by Prosper Aquitanus, Bishop of Regium, in the year 379.

<sup>127</sup> See on this subject, the Scholiæ of the old commentator, on St. Fiach's Hymn, as, also, Colgan's notes 14, 15, on the same. "Trias Thaumaturga," pp. 4, 8. Likewise, his note 9, to Probus, lib. i., cap. xii., pp. 48, 62.

<sup>128</sup> Colgan says, that the connection of the Longobard virgins, with the daughter of the British king, gives some countenance to this conjecture.

<sup>129</sup> It has been asserted, that the Lombards were in Leatha, or Italy, during the time of St. Patrick.

<sup>130</sup> According to Baronius, they did not settle there, until A.D. 568. See Baronius' "Annales Ecclesiastici," tomus vii., at A.D. 568, num. i., p. 486.

<sup>131</sup> According to the Fourth Life, chap. lxxxviii., p. 46.

<sup>132</sup> Colgan says, perhaps, these were the daughters of Enoch, venerated at the 9th of east side of Armagh. The place, called Ferta Minor, has eluded enquiry. About five miles from the city, there is an ancient burial-ground,<sup>134</sup> called Clonfeacle, which adjoins Blackwater Town,<sup>135</sup> on the banks of that celebrated river so denominated, in the county of Armagh. That place is traditionally held, to have been an ancient foundation of St. Patrick. It is said to have borne the denomination of Fertamore,<sup>136</sup> but it hardly had been identical with Ferta Minor. The Irish Tripartite Life informs us, that the Apostle said: "Let the other maidens go to Druim-fenneda,<sup>137</sup> and let one of them proceed, so far as that hill in the east." This mandate was duly obeyed. One of these virgins, who is called Cruimthir, or Crumtheris,<sup>138</sup> went, afterwards, and she occupied Kenngobha,<sup>139</sup> or Cengoba,<sup>140</sup> which the Rev. Dr. Reeves explains to be "the hill of grief."<sup>141</sup> We are told, that it was a stone oratory,<sup>142</sup> and that some of its ruins remained.<sup>143</sup> St. Patrick saw, with his own eyes, three of this holy number of virgins ascend into Heaven.<sup>144</sup> It is stated, that Benen used to carry fragments of food to Crumtheris every night, by orders from St. Patrick.<sup>145</sup> There, too, the holy bishop planted an apple-tree in Achadh-na-elti,<sup>146</sup> and which he took from a fort, in the north of that place, where she dwelt. Hence, it was called Abhall-Phadruic, "the apple," or "the orchard of Patrick,"<sup>147</sup> in Cengoba.

Whether an identical transaction, or otherwise, Jocelyn relates a miracle, similar to that one already recorded, as having taken place at Cill-fiacla, or Kilfeacle, in the county of Tipperary. He tells us, how St. Patrick and his companions once went to a river, called Dabhall,<sup>148</sup> and that, towards the close of day, they set up a tent, on a beautiful meadow, near the brink. Thither, it is said he went, to wash his hands and face in the river; but, whether owing to declining years, or through some other cause, a tooth being loose fell into the water. His disciples long sought for it, yet in vain. However, on the night succeeding, a very bright light shone over the water, and attracted them thither, when they found such brightness proceeded from his tooth, which was thus miraculously recovered from the river. Giving praise to God, it

September. He adds: "Cum nomen illud earum patris sit Hibernis familiare."—Ibid., n. 69, p. 50.

<sup>133</sup> From the context, in the Tripartite Lives, this place does not seem to have been distinct from Ferta Minor.

<sup>134</sup> It was within the territory of Donnagh-Munter-Cullen.

<sup>135</sup> It lies within the parish of Clonfeacle, in the barony of Armagh. The townland, likewise, is called Lisbofin. Both are shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Armagh," Sheet 8.

<sup>136</sup> It formed a portion of the primatial lands of Armagh.

<sup>137</sup> The English of this is, "the ridge of the declivity." The name seems now to be obsolete, but it would be thoroughly realized, in the situation of Clonfeacle.

<sup>138</sup> Her name does not appear discoverable, in any of our Calendars.

<sup>139</sup> So is it written, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>140</sup> Thus it is written, in the Irish Tripartite Life. There she built a religious establishment. In Colgan, it is called a mount, and in the eastern vicinity of Armagh.

<sup>141</sup> The country tradition connects the memory of the nine pilgrim virgins with Armagh-Breague, in Upper Fews. The latter place, however, is eight or nine miles south from Armagh. Nor can it be the great fort of Kinnigo, which lies four miles north, adds the writer of a note, in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," &c.

<sup>142</sup> See Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture and Round Towers of Ireland," part ii., sect. iii., sub-sect. 2, p. 350.

<sup>143</sup> However, Dr. Reeves was unable to discover the accuracy of this statement.

<sup>144</sup> According to Jocelyn.

<sup>145</sup> According to the legend, it was the milk of the tame doe, already mentioned, and for which a house had been built by St. Patrick, that used to be given to Cruimther's lap-dog.

<sup>146</sup> This place has not been identified.

<sup>147</sup> This place has not been discovered; but, from the narrative, we may learn how early the cultivation of apple-trees had been in Ireland. Even to the present time, Armagh County is celebrated for its orchards and fruit.

<sup>148</sup> This evidently incorrect spelling is, no doubt, intended for the River Blackwater.

<sup>149</sup> In June, 1879, the writer took a sketch was brought to St. Patrick, who built there a church,<sup>149</sup> in which the tooth was afterwards preserved, as an altar relic.<sup>150</sup> Hence, the finely-situated spot—about five miles from the Metropolitan city of Armagh—got the name Clucyn-fiacal,<sup>151</sup> or “the meadow of the tooth,” and it was a place afterwards renowned for miracles.

Clonfeacle Cemetery, County of Armagh.

One night, after prayer and vigil, when Patrick was resting his wearied limbs, and sleeping at the fountain, called Tiprad-Cernai,<sup>152</sup> or Tibrad-Cherna,<sup>153</sup> in a field of Tir-Tipraid,<sup>154</sup> the Angel of God came and awoke him, a little before daylight. Patrick said to this heavenly messenger: “Is there anything wherein I have offended God, or does his anger rest upon me?” “No,” said the Angel, “and, moreover, you are informed from him, that if it be your desire, that there shall be no other share for anyone else in Erin. And, the extent of the termon, belonging to your See, shall reach from Droma-Bregh,<sup>155</sup> to of the old graveyard, which now occupies its site, and which is overcrowded with graves. Beside it is the modern Catholic Church of Clonfeacle. The sketch in question was transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and being engraved by Mrs. Millard, it furnishes the illustration, given in the text.

<sup>150</sup> The shrine of St. Patrick’s tooth is a beautiful object of ancient art, and it was exhibited in the Royal Irish Academy, by the late Dr. Stokes, who described it to the members. It is now preserved in the Museum, attached to that Institution. It probably belonged to this place.

<sup>151</sup> So is the name written by Jocelyn, who incorrectly translates it, “Ecclesia dentis.”

<sup>152</sup> So the place is called, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>153</sup> It is thus written, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>154</sup> These places do not appear to have been identified.

<sup>155</sup> This was a part of Breagh territory, apparently the hilly part of Bregia, in the northern part of Meath County, and adjoining Cavan. See “Annals of the Four Masters,” Dr. O’Donovan’s edition, vol. i., at A.D. 513, p. 168, n. (o.) Also, “Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights,” n. (x), pp. 11, 12. Sliabh-Breagh, now Slieve Brey, in the south of Louth County, was mentioned by the Synod of Rath-Braesail, as having been the southern boundary for the diocese of Armagh; Cuaille Ciannacta, which is Sliabh-Mis,<sup>156</sup> and to Bri-Airghi.”<sup>157</sup> Whereupon, Patrick replied: “My debroth, truly sons of life shall come after me, and I wish they may have honour from God, and ecclesiastical rights in the country, after I shall have departed.” This self-abnegation and charity pleased the Almighty, and his Angel said, “That is manifest, and God shall give all Erin to you, while every noble, that shall be in it, must belong to you.” Full of gratitude for this promise, “Deo gratias,” said Patrick, according to his accustomed pious exclamation. A very legendary and unauthentic story is related,<sup>158</sup> in which the names of Colman, son to Aidus, and grandson to Ailill, of the Ui-Bre-sail family,<sup>159</sup> and, also, of a sister,<sup>160</sup> or female relation,<sup>161</sup> to St. Patrick, are associated. But, in the narrative of a scandal,<sup>162</sup> which is said to have originated from their familiar intimacy, there are contradictions, obscurities, or irreconcilable accounts, too evident for any serious refutation. It is stated, that the holy bishop was highly incensed, on account of their transgression, and especially was he indignant, because his own relative had fallen into disgrace. The legend relates, that Patrick came into the church, from the eastern side, and that Lupait, or Lupita,<sup>163</sup> went to meet him, until she prostrated herself before the chariot, at that place, where a cross afterwards stood, in Both-Archall.<sup>164</sup> “The chariot over her,” cried Patrick, and it passed over her thrice, for she used still to come in front of it.<sup>165</sup> However, Lupait implored of Patrick, that he would not take away Heaven from Colman, with his progeny. The saint did not take it away, but he declared, they should be sickly. From the children of Colman, moreover, proceeded the Ui-Faelain,<sup>166</sup> and the Ui-Dubhdara,<sup>167</sup> as our genealogists relate.

now the mountain top of Coolkenagh, in the parish of Errigal-Keerogue, in the county of Tyrone, having been then, as it is now, the northern boundary.

<sup>156</sup> This was the well-known mountain of Slemish, in the county of Antrim.

<sup>157</sup> Bri-n-aivige, which is called by Colgan, Brigraidhe, lay to the west. Bri, which signifies “a hill,” or “a rising ground,” is pronounced Bree. This is the name of a townland, in the parish of Muckno, in the county of Monaghan, and being on the west of the county and diocese of Armagh. “Presuming the identifications to be correct,” adds the writer of a note in Miss Cusack’s “Life of St. Patrick,” “it would appear that at this period the church of Armagh had a territorial jurisdiction over what now constitutes the diocese of Armagh, part of Meath and Connor, and the entire of Down and Dromore. This is an additional evidence of diocesan episcopacy to that afforded by the Synod of Uisnech, held in 1107, at which the “Chronicum Sclorum” records the division of the old diocese of Meath between the Bishops of Cluain-mac-Nois and Clonard. According to the theory of King, Reeves, and Todd, diocesan episcopacy, in its present acceptation, was not introduced into Ireland until 1118.”

<sup>158</sup> Reasoning from dates, names and circumstances set down, Colgan very justly arrives at this conclusion.

<sup>159</sup> Their territory, afterwards called Clan-brassil, lay to the south of Lough Neagh, in the counties of Armagh and Down, being in the latter called Clanbrassil Mac Coolechan.

The former obtained its name, from Bressal, great-grandson to Colla da Crioch, the latter from Breasal, son of Aedh Roin.

<sup>160</sup> In the Irish Tripartite Life, she is called Lupait. In his notes, Colgan maintains, that the word in Irish, suir, means either a “sister,” or a “relative.” In another part of the Tripartite, Lupait is stated to have been placed over the nunnery of Druimcheo, near Ardagh, in the county of Longford, of which her nephew, St. Mel, was bishop. From a note of Colgan, it appears, she was buried in the Ferta, beside Armagh.

<sup>161</sup> In the Latin Tripartite Life, no particular name is given, nor more than as we have recorded it, in the text.

<sup>162</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life states, that Colman fixed his attention on Lupait, at Imduail, and that Aedan, the saint of Inis-Lothair, was the son of Lupait and of Colman. His feast is said to have been held, on the 27th of September.

<sup>163</sup> Her feast has been assigned, to the 27th of September.

<sup>164</sup> This place has not been identified.

<sup>165</sup> Where she went to heaven was at the Ferta, as we are told, and she was buried by Patrick. It is said, also, that her ecnaire, or requiem, was sung.

<sup>166</sup> This was the name of a tribe and of a territory, containing about one-half the northern part of the present county of Kildare. See John O’Donovan’s “Leabhar na g-Ceart, or Book of Rights,” n. (a), pp. 205 to 207.

<sup>167</sup> These were ancient chiefs of Ferma-

Soon after the foundation of his religious establishment at Armagh, several of the monks were engaged in agricultural operations required by the rule, which St. Patrick imposed. Those labourers were cutting corn, in harvest time, at Trian-Conchobhair, or "Conor's district," then near the present city. They were obliged, not only to abstain from food, but even from using water for drink. They were seized with great thirst, as the day seems to have been extremely warm. We are told, in the Irish Tripartite Life, that a vessel of whey was taken to them from Patrick, although he had persuaded them, like the devout Christians in the primitive Church,<sup>168</sup> to observe abstinence even from drinking water, and which was to last from tierce until vesper time. One of those disciples, named Colman,<sup>169</sup> with a heroic spirit of self-sacrifice, fell a victim to this rigorous fast, and rather than break through the established discipline, he died, owing to the burning thirst experienced. When St. Patrick heard of this, he is said to have exclaimed: "My debroth, there will be abundance of food and ale and prosperity in this city after us." As a distinction, and for his devotion to rule, Colman was the first man buried by St. Patrick, at Armagh, and in a newly-laid-out cemetery.<sup>170</sup> At the cross, by the door of St. Patrick's house, his remains were deposited; and, in after time, he was venerated, as Colman Itadach, or "Colman the Thirsty." When the Irish Apostle was at a place, called Druim-Chaile,<sup>171</sup> or Druim-chaula,<sup>172</sup> as we are told, angels went, and took from off the road a stone, which lay before the chariot. Its name was afterwards Leac-na-Naingel, or "the stone of the Angel." Raising both his hands, St. Patrick blessed Ard-macha, from that spot. While he was near the church of Armagh,<sup>173</sup> he had also a miraculous vision, and being absorbed in heavenly contemplation, our Divine Lord appeared to him, and manifested the manner and form, in which the good and bad should approach him, on the Day of General Judgment.<sup>174</sup>

CHAPTER XXIII.

ENQUIRY REGARDING ST. PATRICK'S JOURNEY TO ROME, AFTER THE FOUNDATION OF ARMAGH—COROTICUS—MIRACULOUS OCCURRENCES—REPUTED RESIGNATION OF THE SEE, AT ARMAGH, TO ST. BENIGNUS.

It has been generally thought, that St. Patrick fixed his residence, chiefly at Armagh, after he had built the first church there, and had constituted that nagh, and sometime of Farney. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., at A.D. 1076, pp. 908, 909, at A.D. 1097, pp. 956, 957, and at A.D. 1118, pp. 1006, 1007.

<sup>168</sup> Thus we read in the Life of the Abbot, Silvanus, of Mount Sinai, how he and his disciple Zachary, travelling one day, the latter wished to drink some water, which he found on the way. The abbot stopped him by saying, "My child, this is a fast day." See Tillemont's "Memoirs pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome x., p. 451.

<sup>169</sup> By some of our Calendarists and ecclesiastical writers, his feast has been assigned to the 5th of March.

<sup>170</sup> Ussher assigns the death of this Colman, to A.D. 445; the "Annals of the Four Masters," however, place the foundation of Armagh Cathedral, at A.D. 457.

<sup>171</sup> It is thus noticed, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>172</sup> It is so written, in the Latin Tripartite Life. No identification has been given.

<sup>173</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life states, it was in a place, where a cross was set up, and towards the north. It may have been on that hill, where the Catholic Cathedral is now built.

<sup>174</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Vita S. Patricii," cap. lxxviii., p. 27, cap. lxxx., lxxxi., lxxxii., lxxxiii., p. 28, and nn. 74, 75, 76, 77, p. 34, and n. 88, p. 35. Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxii., lxxxiii., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvi., lxxxvii., lxxxviii., pp. 45, 46, and nn. 60 to city his Primatial See.<sup>1</sup> When he had brought the whole Island to the Faith<sup>2</sup> in this place did the saint erect his Archiepiscopal seat, intending to make it the principal and the metropolitan church of all Ireland. That this his intention might be understood, for all succeeding ages, he purposed to make a journey to Rome,<sup>3</sup> there to have it confirmed and ratified by Apostolic authority.<sup>4</sup> He also desired, to procure some relics of the Apostles and other saints,<sup>5</sup> according to the Tripartite Lives, which relate, that he was transported to Rome, and, in a miraculous manner,<sup>6</sup> towards the end of his life, and when he was already advanced in years. An Angel, appearing to the saint, expressed approval of this project.<sup>7</sup> Again, the holy man wanting means to be provided for his journey, by Heaven's decree miraculously were coaches<sup>8</sup> sent, to carry him and his retinue, so far as the water side. It is recorded, that he went in one day to Comur-tri-nuisce, said to have been that place in Leinster, where the three rivers, Suir, Nore and Barrow meet, in the present county of Waterford.<sup>9</sup> Before St. Patrick set out for Rome, in search of those relics, it is related, that he entrusted Sechnall, or Secundinus,<sup>10</sup> with a care and charge over the archbishopric of Armagh, and the primacy of Ire-71, p. 50. Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. iii., iv., v., vi., vii., viii., p. 52, and nn. 2, 3, 4, 5, p. 63, cap. xxiv., xxv., xxvi., p. 59, and n. 28, p. 63. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxvii., p. 85, cap. xcii., p. 86, cap. xcvi., pp. 87, 88, cap. cxliii., p. 96, cap. cxli., p. 98, cap. cxix., cxli., cxlii., cxliii., cxliv., cxlv., pp. 100, 101, and nn. 95, 103, 107, 151, 157, 158, 160, pp. 112, 113, 115, 116. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. lxviii., lxix., lxx., lxxi., lxxii., lxxiii., lxxiv., lxxv., lxxvi., lxxvii., lxxviii., lxxix., lxxx., pp. 162 to 164, and nn. 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, p. 187. See also Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," &c., pp. 483 to 491, and the accompanying notes.

CHAPTER XXIII.—<sup>1</sup> If we are to believe Jocelyn, St. Patrick brought to dwell therein twelve citizens, whom he had from all parts diligently and discreetly chosen; and these he instructed in the Catholic institutes of the Christian faith. He beautified the city with churches, built after a becoming and an ecclesiastical fashion; for the observance of divine worship, for the government of souls, and for the instruction of the Catholic flock. He appointed therein clerical persons; and he instituted certain monasteries, filled with monks, and others, filled with nuns, and placed them under the discipline of all possible perfection.

<sup>2</sup> From these words, it is plain, that Jocelyn supposed, St. Patrick had preached through all Ireland, before he founded Armagh.

<sup>3</sup> There is not a word about this journey, in the other Lives of St. Patrick, excepting the Tripartite Acts.

<sup>4</sup> The Tripartite Lives of St. Patrick do not mention the Apostle, as applying for a confirmation of his metropolis, or his obtaining the pallium. Nor, in the other Lives is the least allusion to any application made by him, for the confirmation of Armagh.

<sup>5</sup> The matter is thus related, in the Irish Tripartite Life of our saint. "The Angel went to Patrick in Ard-Macha. 'This day,' said he, 'the relics of the Apostles are distributed in Rome, throughout the four parts of the globe; and, it should be becoming that you would go there.'"

<sup>6</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life states: And the angel bore Patrick in the air. At the southern cross, in Aenach-Macha, it was that four chariots were brought to him. The Latin Tripartite states, that this happened near the church.

<sup>7</sup> This story was patched up, Dr. Lanigan has asserted, to give a degree of lustre and dignity to the relics, which in later times used to be shown publicly at Armagh. Having got hold of it, Jocelyn took care to add a good deal of his own invention. But, owing to his ignorance of ancient ecclesiastical discipline, his additions are very clumsily introduced.

<sup>8</sup> Four was the number, according to Jocelyn and the Tripartite Lives.

<sup>9</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life, from this place, he set out for the Eternal City, and he reached it, in a similar miraculous manner.

<sup>10</sup> This is the holy bishop, to whom we have already alluded, as having died at Dunshaughlin, November 27th, A.D. 447, and as having been buried there, after he had composed a celebrated Panegyric, in metre, and referring to the virtues and merits of St. Patrick. A legendary story is told, in the Tripartite Lives, regarding some transactions occurring to him at Armagh, during the absence of St. Patrick. This devout Hymn, by Seachnall, is preserved in Manuscripts of the eighth century. About the year 1760, Michael, son of Peter O'Longan, transcribed a 4to paper Manuscript, of 226 written pages, and it includes, Hymnus Sancti Secundini seu Seachlan, in Laudem Sancti Patricii, at p. 79, vol. xviii.

land.<sup>11</sup> This statement supposes the foundation of the church and See there, to have been already fully established, and that the Apostle's supremacy over the Irish Church had been recognised.<sup>12</sup> Therefore, as generally supposed, St. Patrick, blessing and taking his leave of those whom he left at Armagh, went with some of his company to Rome. According to one account, after eight years' labour,<sup>13</sup> he resolved on taking this journey. The Bollandists have assigned his departure, for that city, to A.D. 455, or 456.<sup>14</sup> The local historian of Armagh states, that his visit to Rome, and his honourable reception there, by Pope Hilarius,<sup>15</sup> should be referred to the year 461.<sup>16</sup> The learned Archbishop Ussher<sup>17</sup> affixes that Roman voyage of our Apostle to A.D. 462.<sup>18</sup> It surpasseth our abilities, writes Jocelyn, to set down the innumerable signs, which St. Patrick wrought, during his journey going and coming from Rome; for, in all places, did he manifest signs of his sanctity. Whosoever he remained during the night, or abode on the way, he left behind the proofs of his sanctity, in the healing of some diseased person, inasmuch, that churches and oratories were built in those places, and called after his name. Those were redolent of his holiness, and imparted the benefit of his miracles, to many who sought the same. And, after his return, he remained for a time in Britain, and founded there many monasteries, and he rebuilt many others, which had been destroyed by the heathens. He filled them with convents of holy monks, who assented to that form of rule which he had appointed. However, in many country places and towns, the inhabitants rudely drove away our saint while journeying, lest he should abide during the night among them. These and their posterity could never prosper, or become rich, therein; but, strangers and aliens possessed the wealth and the dominion, in such localities. According to various writers, when St. Patrick went to Rome, he acquainted the Pope, about the affairs of Ireland, as also the cause for his journey having been undertaken. His Holiness, embracing the saint as the Apostle of Ireland, honoured him with a pall<sup>19</sup> of the Betham Manuscripts, in the Royal Irish Academy. It seems to have been copied from Colgan.

<sup>11</sup> This is a mistake, and for a double reason, observes Dr. Lanigan; first, because there was no such absence of St. Patrick, in Rome; and, secondly, because Secundinus had been dead since A.D. 448. Therefore, the latter had departed some years—ten according to the Tripartite itself—before that See had been founded. Upon this mistake, was built the introduction of Secundinus to the catalogue of the prelates of Armagh. Again, there is a false calculation of the Bollandists, who assign the death of Secundinus to A.D. 459. He had acted as a vicar and suffragan of St. Patrick elsewhere, and during a real absence of the latter from certain parts of Ireland.

<sup>12</sup> In St. Patrick's Epistle against Coroticus, he says, "Hibernione constitutum episcopum me esse fateor."

<sup>13</sup> During A.D. 439, according to Father Peter Ribadeneira's "Lives of Saints," &c., translated by W. P., Esq., part i., p. 159.

<sup>14</sup> This was consistently, with their placing the foundation of Armagh in 454, which should bring it within the pontificate of Leo the Great. Rev. Dr. Lanigan thinks, it is scarcely credible, that the appearance at Rome of such a great saint as Patrick, announcing the conversion of a whole nation, could have been overlooked during the enlightened times of that Pope. His transactions and those of various distinguished persons, with whom he had intercourse, have been very generally and minutely recorded.

<sup>15</sup> He governed the church, from A.D. 461 to 468.

<sup>16</sup> See James Stuart's "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh," chap. i., p. 84.

<sup>17</sup> A story, told by Jocelyn, who has done so much injury to our Church history, led Ussher astray on this point. Jocelyn says, that St. David was in his mother's womb, when St. Patrick had been in Great Britain, on his return from Rome. Now, Ussher imagined, that St. David was born in 462, and therefore to it he assigned St. Patrick's Roman tour. See his "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 870.

<sup>18</sup> But, in this date, he widely departs from his former computations; for, having assigned the foundation of Armagh to A.D. 445, he should, consonantly with Jocelyn, his chief authority, have placed St. Patrick's journey to Rome, very soon after that epoch.

and constituted him as his own Legate<sup>20</sup> over all Ireland.<sup>21</sup> The Pope confirmed with his Apostolical authority, all that the saint had ordered, disposed, or done in Ireland. His Holiness, likewise, gave him rich presents and precious gifts.<sup>22</sup> Among other benefactions given, were relics of the Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, with some of St. Stephen, the Protomartyr, and that which excelled all, his Holiness bestowed upon him, namely, a certain linen, dyed with our Saviour's blood.<sup>23</sup> The Blessed Bishop, after his return to Ireland,<sup>24</sup> placed all these rich relics in a shrine, behind the high Altar, in the Metropolitan church of Ardmagh. These relics of Letha are said to have been miraculously abstracted from St. Patrick,<sup>25</sup> who then sent messengers, to the Abbot of Rome.<sup>26</sup> The relics were afterwards restored.<sup>27</sup> Notwithstanding the foregoing very circumstantial narrative, St. Patrick's Confession—generally allowed to have been composed towards the close of his life, in the opinion of Dr. Lanigan—seems to disprove the idea,<sup>28</sup> that he left Ireland, after the foundation of Armagh. In the scene of his labours, and among the Irish people, the Lord had commanded him to remain, for the remainder of his Accordingly, the visit of our saint, to the Eternal City, should not have been later than 446, or 447.

<sup>19</sup> As to what Jocelyn says, regarding the Pallium, it is quite sufficient to observe, that no such ornament, as granted to archbishops or bishops, was used in the Western Church, until the sixth century.

<sup>20</sup> Respecting the legatine authority, such as understood by Jocelyn, Dr. Lanigan argues, that St. Patrick had no occasion for its being conferred on him.

<sup>21</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls him Legate of the West.

<sup>22</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life very foolishly relates, that sleep came over the inhabitants of Rome, so that Patrick brought away a sufficiency of the relics. The Latin Tripartite Life states, "Nec diu Romæ substitit dum pio astu, furtive sacrarum locorum custodibus nescientibus et dormientibus, sed summo, ut creditur, connivente Pontifice, accepit ingentem sanctarum reliquiarum multitudinem: quas secum in Hiberniam asportavit, et in Ecclesia Ardmachana pretiosis thecis, gemmis et auro cælatis, inclusas constituit."

<sup>23</sup> The Tripartite Lives mention the relics of three hundred and sixty-five various saints, with the relics of the Apostles Peter and Paul, and of the Martyrs Laurence, and Stephen, with similar precious remains; as also a cloth on which was the blood of Christ, and, besides, he procured the hair of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Patrick, instructed by the Angel, with the holy Synod of Ireland approving, left this precious collection in Armagh, according to the will of God. Lately has appeared, in Calcutta, a work, edited by Whitley Stokes, and privately printed, "Three Middle-Irish Homilies on the Lives of Saints Patrick, Brigid and Columba," 1877, 8vo. These are given from the "Leabhar Breac," the Irish on one side, and an English translation on the other. The Homily on St.

Patrick makes him of the Briton race of Dumbarton, born at Nemthur, and it states, that he went to Rome for the third time. See pp. 4, 5, 36, 37. It inverts very much, the received accounts of the Apostle's Acts. It tells us, that Brigit was with Patrick, at Essruaid, or Assaroe.

<sup>24</sup> This happened A.D. 463, according to Stuart's "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh," chap. i., p. 84.

<sup>25</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life states, that through the carelessness of the keepers, these miraculously disappeared, and could not be found, in the shrine. St. Patrick had an admonition, that they were taken back to Rome.

<sup>26</sup> The messengers, on stating the circumstances—for the relics had gone to Rome—brought an Epistle from him, as we are told, directing that the clerics and people of Armagh should watch the relics with lamps and torches by night for ever—for the relics were returned by the Sovereign Pontiff. With Mass and Psalmody by day, and with prayers by night, those relics were to be honoured, and it was prescribed, that the clerics should elevate them every year—for multitudes desired to see and venerate them. These instructions were faithfully carried out, by the Irish Apostle. It was the custom in the church at Armagh every year, to expose those relics at Easter, and at Whitsuntide, to be seen, and to be honoured, by all the people.

<sup>27</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxiv., p. 28. Also, Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxvi., clxvii., pp. 101, 102, and Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. lxxxi., lxxii., lxxxiv., p. 164, and nn. 107, 108, p. 187.

<sup>28</sup> Had it taken place, it must have been mentioned, in some of the Roman or other documents of the day. But most records of that date are unfortunately now lost or missing. The Rev. Dr. Todd adopts the same opinion as Dr. Lanigan, in his "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," &c., chap. iii., pp. 481, 482.

life.<sup>29</sup> Moreover, having been already invested with full powers,<sup>30</sup> such as those Palladius had enjoyed, for propagating the Gospel, and for establishing those means, necessary to preserve the Christian Faith in Ireland, our Apostle was not under any necessity of applying to Rome, for a confirmation of those privileges annexed to his Metropolitan See.<sup>31</sup> Besides, it must be stated, that Ireland was then, from Rome, the remotest corner of Christian Europe. Intercourse between Ireland and Rome was particularly difficult and most perilous, at that time.<sup>32</sup> Some writers have not only impugned this visit of St. Patrick to Rome,<sup>33</sup> but they have even denied his communion with the Roman See.<sup>34</sup> These assumptions, however, have been most satisfactorily dealt with, by learned Catholic divines<sup>35</sup> and historians.<sup>36</sup> A few divergencies of discipline and rites form no sufficient grounds for supposing, that the Irish National Church differed, in doctrinal and moral teaching, from the Universal Catholic Church, elsewhere, from the times of St. Patrick, through all succeeding ages, and down to the present age.<sup>37</sup> Historical evidence is so very clear, and even from well-known Protestant sources,<sup>38</sup> that it must only require a little investigation of records, which are now readily accessible, to enlighten most students regarding modern contro-

<sup>29</sup> See "Confessio S. Patricii," p. 17.

<sup>30</sup> St. Patrick's right of selecting a metropolis flowed, it is supposed, from the extensive nature of his mission. For, he had been sent, not to a part, but to the whole island. Dr. Lanigan maintains, that there being no other bishop in the country, when St. Patrick arrived, there was, in point of fact, originally no bishop over all Ireland.

<sup>31</sup> The bishops, whom in process of time he appointed to various Sees, having derived their authority from him, became, ipso facto, his suffragans. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. i., and nn. 1, 2, 3, 4, pp. 318 to 322. But, there can be no doubt, such appointments had been sanctioned or approved of, either directly or indirectly, by the Sovereign Pontiff.

<sup>32</sup> "How natural, therefore, that Celestine, when sending Patrick to so distant a land, should give him plenary powers as to the appointment of bishops, the confirming of abbots, the making of disciplinary laws and decrees in national and provincial Synods, with authority to continue the same ecclesiastical system, until the Sovereign Pontiff should find it wise and practicable to alter that arrangement. What other settlement, in fact, could we conceive Celestine, in the circumstances, to have made with St. Patrick, when sending him to convert this island?"—Most Rev. Dr. Donnelly's "Lecture on the alleged Protestantism of the Irish Primitive Church, and the Anglo-Norman Theory." Delivered on Tuesday evening, April 15th, 1879, for the Catholic Young Men's Society, Monaghan. Reported in the People's Advocate, of April 19th, 1879.

<sup>33</sup> Thus, the Rev. Hubert M'Loughlin states: "From the time of his arrival as a missionary in Ireland, he never left the country of his adoption."—"Biographical Sketches of Ancient Irish Saints," sect. i., p. 12.

<sup>34</sup> See, among others, Henry J. Monck Mason's "Testimony of St. Patrick against the false pretensions of Rome to Primitive Antiquity in Ireland." Dublin, 1846. "A Compendious Ecclesiastical History from the earliest period to the present Time." By the Rev. William Palmer, M.A., of Worcester College, Oxford. London: 1840. The Rev. Dr. Todd, more particularly, has endeavoured to sustain by theory and argument, that the Irish Apostle did not receive his mission and authority from Rome. See "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," &c., chap. i., pp. 265 to 338.

<sup>35</sup> On this subject, the reader is especially referred to Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's work, "Essays on the Origin, Doctrines, and Discipline of the Early Irish Church," part i., chap. i. to iv., and part ii., chap. i. to vii., pp. 1 to 79.

<sup>36</sup> See "Dissertations chiefly on Irish Church History." By the Rev. Dr. Matthew Kelly, Edited by Rev. Daniel MacCarthy, D.D., pp. 220 to 335. Rev. James Gaffney's "Ancient Irish Church: was it Catholic or Protestant?" passim.

<sup>37</sup> See Rev. A. O'Connor—a Protestant clergyman—thus writes, in reference to St. Patrick: "Fully instructed, formally authorized, and attended by numerous Irish Christians, he returned to Ireland, and planted the religion of the Cross from sea to sea."—"History of the Irish People," Book i.

<sup>38</sup> Thus, the learned Archbishop Ussher, quoting ancient authorities, makes St. Patrick derive his mission, from Pope Celestine I., at Rome. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," at the close of cap. xvi., and at the beginning of cap. xvii. Also, Bishop Lloyd's "Historical Account of Church Government, as it was in Great Britain and Ireland, when they first received

versies on this question.<sup>39</sup> We shall proceed, therefore, with the biographical series of our saint's Acts.

A wicked king among the Britons, who is called Corthech,<sup>40</sup> Coritic, Caroticus,<sup>41</sup> Chairtic,<sup>42</sup> or Cereticus,<sup>43</sup> lived in the time of St. Patrick; and, while some accounts seem to make him a pagan,<sup>44</sup> yet from circumstances detailed, regarding him, we may probably infer, that he was a nominal Christian,<sup>45</sup> but a remorseless tyrant.<sup>46</sup> St. Patrick himself alludes to those raiders he led, as infamous and apostate Picts.<sup>47</sup> The Bollandists—although not drawing any certain conclusion—have a conjecture,<sup>48</sup> that his name signified, he had been king of Ceretica, the part of Wales,<sup>49</sup> now known as Cardiganshire. Some have thought he was a Cornish ruler. That he reigned in Cornwall would seem probable enough,<sup>50</sup> if the martyrdom of St. Fingar and of his companions<sup>51</sup> there could be traced to his wicked agency. We are told, that the impious chief mocked the teaching and salutary admonitions<sup>52</sup> the Christian Religion." Also Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," pp. 10, 11.

<sup>39</sup> In quoting Mr. Phelan's book, the "Case of the Church of Ireland stated by Declan," the Rev. Robert King asserts, that regarding St. Patrick's Roman commission, the opinion of Archbishop Ussher, on this point, is not to be allowed. See "A Primer of the History of the Holy Catholic Church in Ireland," vol. i., book i., chap. iv., p. 30. Similar incorrect ideas pervade his "Memoir introductory to the early History of the Primacy of Armagh," Preface, and p. 68.

<sup>40</sup> According to the Tripartite Life.

<sup>41</sup> Under different forms, this was a very common name, among the ancient Britons. It was originally the same as that of the great Caractacus, or Caratacus, whose exploits are to be found recorded, in John Speed's "History of Great Britaine." The Fifth Booke, chap. vi., pp. 175, 176. A wicked British king, Careticus, is mentioned, as living in the sixth century. See Ranulphus in his "Polychronicon," in Gale's "Scriptores XV.," at p. 225. Cereticus, another British king, who lived about A.D. 620, is spoken of by Camden, in his "Britannia," col. 862. We find in Bede a Cerdic—likewise a British prince—who flourished towards the latter end of the seventh century. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. xxiii., p. 324.

<sup>42</sup> He is so designated, by Probus.

<sup>43</sup> So he is called, by Jocelyn, in the Sixth Life, cap. cl., p. 98.

<sup>44</sup> Thus do we read, in the Third Life: "Nunciata sunt S. Patricio mala opera ejusdam regis Britonum, Coritic crudelis, et immitis tyranni, ut converteret eum ad viam veritatis. Hic Coritic namque erat persecutor, et interfector Christianorum, misitque Patricius ad eum epistolam; sed rex ille deridebat doctrinam Patricii." See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxii., p. 27.

<sup>45</sup> See Tillemont's "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique des six premiers siècles, avec une Chronologie et Notes," tome xvi., p. 462.

<sup>46</sup> In terms of loathing—yet not calling him an infidel—does Jocelyn mention this king. See Sixth Life, cap. cl., p. 98.

<sup>47</sup> See Rev. Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. ii., pp. 359, 360.

<sup>48</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo, Apostolo et Primate Hiberniæ. Prelude to his Epistle to Coroticus, p. 538.

<sup>49</sup> Jocelyn states, that Cereticus was a native of that part of Brittany, called Wales. It seems probable, that the name Coroticus or Cereticus is the same, being no other than Caraduc. So it appears, as written in the Welsh, or, Caradeuc, as spelled by the Bretons. The name Corotic, Caretic, Ceretic, Cerdic, was one usual, among the Britons, not alone in Ceretica, but wherever there were people of that race.

<sup>50</sup> There is a statement in the Life of St. Crantock—venerated at the 16th of May—that the territory of Ceredig, a king of Cornwall, was in his old age devastated by hordes of Irish. What else could have been expected, but that fierce retribution would be sought by the people, whom he had so grievously wronged? And seeing that the great Irish Apostle had terrified the soldiers of Ceredig, by denouncing God's judgments upon them and upon their chief, stigmatizing them as "fellow-citizens of devils, and murderers of the brethren of the Lord," what more likely to have happened, according to the Rev. John Adams, than that Crantock, being fully aware of the enormity of the crimes committed by his father's troops, and of the terror which the saint's scathing denunciation had struck into their hearts, should have fled for mercy to St. Patrick, rather than lead those guilty soldiers against the avenging host? See "Journal of the Royal Institution of Cornwall," 1874. Num. xv. S. Crantock.

<sup>51</sup> Their feast has been assigned, to the 23rd of February.

of St. Patrick. However this may be, he was a noted marauder, and he is thought to have conducted an expedition against the Irish,<sup>53</sup> landing apparently on some part of the southern<sup>54</sup> or eastern coast. Here, his bands plundered the inhabitants, while they committed still greater excesses and even murders. He brought away numbers of captives, whom he sold to the Picts and Scots;<sup>55</sup> and, among the rest were many of St. Patrick's neophytes. From an epistle<sup>56</sup> written to him, by the holy Apostle, we learn, that several of these were foully murdered soon after their baptism,<sup>57</sup> and on the very day following their confirmation, while the chrism was yet shining on their foreheads.<sup>58</sup> A few words of it give an exact description of that ancient ritualistic practice or discipline, according to which, the sacrament of confirmation or chrism used to be administered immediately after baptism, by the bishop, in case he were the baptizer, or that he happened to be present on the occasion.<sup>59</sup> We learn, also, that the white garment of newly baptized persons was then in use.<sup>60</sup> Such practices continued, for some hundreds of years, even with regard to infants. Alcuin writes, in illustration of the custom, when treating about infant baptism.<sup>61</sup> St. Patrick gives the epithet of apostates to those Picts,<sup>62</sup> who had purchased the captives; and, it seems probable enough, that those lawless bands, with some roving Scots, had then penetrated into the southern parts of Britain, for the purpose of gaining booty, towards the middle of the fifth century.<sup>63</sup> Probably, Coroticus and his followers carried on a trade in making slaves, and in bringing them as captives to Great Britain. The Saxons engaged those troublesome invaders

<sup>52</sup> See Probus, or Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxvii., p. 59.

<sup>53</sup> We find it written: "a latrunculis jubente Corotico," &c. It has been supposed, Corotic in person formed one of the armed party, that landed in Ireland. See Tillemont, as already cited. It is, however, difficult to determine, from the Epistle, whether he was so, or had only ordered his soldiers on that wicked expedition. Whether this were the case or not, for the results he was no doubt responsible. The text is so obscure, and many parts of it are so corrupt, that minor questions of this kind cannot be easily decided. At any rate, whatever occurred was perpetrated, in consequence of his directions.

<sup>54</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan is of opinion, he landed in Munster, which St. Patrick left, A.D. 452.

<sup>55</sup> By Scots are here meant those of that nation, who still remained pagans, and of whom, generally speaking, a smaller number in proportion had been converted, than of the other inhabitants.

<sup>56</sup> This is the best—and indeed the only good—authority, with regard to what concerns Coroticus.

<sup>57</sup> In the Epistle against Coroticus, St. Patrick alludes to rules and ceremonies relative to the administration of baptism. He speaks of the white garment, of chrism, &c. The 19th canon of what is called St. Patrick's Synod runs thus: "Octavo die Catechumeni sunt; postea solemnitate Domini baptizantur, id est, Pascha, Pentecoste, et Epiphania." From the mention of Epiphania, it seems, that this canon must be very ancient; and, Dr. Lanigan finds no reason for denying, that St. Patrick himself was the author of it.

<sup>58</sup> We find nothing, that may lead us to ascertain, on which of the solemn times for administering baptism, it happened; or, whether it occurred at Easter, Whitsuntide, or the Epiphany. On this last festival, also, baptism used to be administered solemnly in Ireland.

<sup>59</sup> "De sanguine innocentium. Christianorum, quos ego numeros Deo genui, atque in Christo confirmari, postera die qua chrisma neophyti in veste candida flagrabat in fronte ipsorum."

<sup>60</sup> A similar passage occurs, where we read: "Baptizavit Maximinus episcopus Basilium et Eubulum, et vestivit albis, atque ungens eos sancto chrismate," &c.—Amphilochius, Vita S. Basilii, cap. v.

<sup>61</sup> In his Treatise, "De Officiis," cap. de Sabbato Paschae," we read: "Postea vestiatur infans." * * * "Si vero episcopus adest, statim confirmari eum oportet chrismate."

<sup>62</sup> Many of the Southern Picts had embraced the Christian faith, on the preaching of Ninian. It seems, afterwards, that some of them had apostatized. The Northern Picts could not have been called apostates in St. Patrick's time. These people were first converted by Columkille, in the sixth century. To the epithet, apostates, the saint adds, that the Picts were most unworthy and abandoned.

<sup>63</sup> To oppose such rovers, Vortigern, near Stamford, defeated,<sup>64</sup> and obliged them to fly from Southern Britain.<sup>65</sup> Nor do we find the Scots and Picts again united against the Britons, whereas not long after, the Picts became allied to the Saxons. Such historic coincidences are supposed to establish the genuineness, accuracy, and antiquity of St. Patrick's Epistle; for, none other than a contemporary could have written with such exactness, and so very conformable to the state of that country and of those times. St. Patrick sent a comminatory epistle, by a holy priest, who had been a disciple from his younger days.<sup>66</sup> It required the marauders to restore the baptized captives, with a part of their booty. It must not be understood, from a word, used by him in this letter, that infantia<sup>67</sup> really meant, what we usually call infancy,<sup>68</sup> as it has been supposed to be, by the learned author Tillemont.<sup>69</sup> Some clerics or younger ecclesiastics also accompanied the priest, and these must have been natives of Ireland. It has been conjectured, St. Benignus might have been that holy priest,<sup>70</sup> entrusted with St. Patrick's message.<sup>71</sup> The original letter of St. Patrick seems to have been lost, in the wreck of time; but, we may infer, that the priest and his attendant ecclesiastics were received contumeliously, for their object could not be attained. This urged the Apostle to address a minatory letter, against Coroticus and his wicked companions. He pronounced solemnly a sentence of excommunication against them, thus hoping to reclaim these wicked persons from their evil courses. This denunciation seems to include Coroticus, together with his associates. On that account, St. Patrick gave directions, that the Epistle should be read in the presence, not only of his subjects, but also of Coroticus himself. Had he not been a Christian, he could not have been excommunicated. The saint expresses his wish, that those robbers and murderers, of whom Coroticus was the chief, may return to God.<sup>72</sup> This plainly alludes to some profession of Christianity. We are told, by Jocelyn, that instead of repenting, Coroticus derided the saint, and became more obstinate in perpetrating mischief and iniquity. When the saint understood this, he prayed to God, and Jocelyn likewise relates, that Cereticus was chastised by God, in a very remarkable manner.<sup>73</sup> It may be true, that soon afterwards he disappeared from this King of Britain, invited over to his aid the Anglo-Saxons, about A.D. 450. See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. CCCCL.

<sup>64</sup> See Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. i., cap. xv., pp. 57 to 59.

<sup>65</sup> See Warrington's "History of Wales," vol. i., book ii., pp. 67, 68.

<sup>66</sup> "Et misi epistolam cum sancto presbytero, quem ego ex infantia docui, cum clericis," &c. This holy priest, thus mentioned by our saint, might have been fourteen or fifteen years old, when the saint began to instruct him. Yet he might have been called an infans.

<sup>67</sup> Tillemont seems to think, in reference to this expression, that the raid of Coroticus occurred about thirty years, after the landing of the Irish Apostle, for the work of his mission.

<sup>68</sup> We find infantes paraphristonæ, "choir boys," or infantes monasterii, "novices," in monastic establishments. According to statutes of the Benedictine Order, we read, that infantes were bound to hear the rule expounded every day. This circumstance shows, that these were supposed to have arrived, at a certain age of discretion. See Ducange's "Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis," at the word INFANTES.

<sup>69</sup> He found much perplexity, in some chronological points, relative to St. Patrick, and at that age, at which boys used to be dedicated to the ecclesiastical grade. See "Memoirs pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xvi., pp. 462 and 784.

<sup>70</sup> Supposing him to have joined the Irish Apostle, as a mere youth, in 433, he could have been entitled to the name of a holy priest, about A.D. 450.

<sup>71</sup> It is not improbable, Dr. Lanigan thinks, that Benignus was the person. Were it necessary, we may recur to another explanation, by supposing, that the said priest had been one of those persons, who had accompanied our Apostle to Ireland, and that he had been under his care when on the continent.

<sup>72</sup> "Quod si Deus inspirat illos, et quandoque Deo respiciant, et vel sero penitent," &c.

<sup>73</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cl., p. 98.

world; but, much of what St. Patrick's Acts state is evidently tinged with fable.<sup>74</sup>

Two Ulstermen, named Dubhan,<sup>75</sup> or Dubhanus,<sup>76</sup> and Dubhaedh,<sup>77</sup> or Dubhedus,<sup>78</sup> who were brothers,<sup>79</sup> stole two of Patrick's horses from the land, east of Nemhed,<sup>80</sup> in reference to Armagh. This place was afterwards called Tir-Suidhe-Patrick, or "the seat of Patrick"—perhaps, because the Apostle resided there. They carried them off into a moor or marsh, to the south of Armagh. Dubhan said, that he would not take what belonged to the tailceann, lest he might incur Divine anger, and receive punishment. "I will take, what comes to me," said Dubhaedh. Full of contrition, Dubhan went immediately, and he did penance. "Your comrade's journey is not a fortunate one," said the prophetic Patrick, to whom it was revealed in a vision. Dubhaedh then got a fall, so that his head was fractured, and he died instantly. Counsellor by the Apostle, Dubhan became his disciple, and he was ordained, after having received proper instruction. Then the holy Patrick said: "Here thy resurrection shall be." After spending a life of great sanctity, Dubhan<sup>81</sup> died, and he was buried at Armagh, in fulfilment of St. Patrick's prophecy. Again, while Patrick was at Armagh, wheat fell like manna from Heaven, at one time, in a desert place, near a hill. One Setna,<sup>82</sup> son of Dallan, carried to Patrick so much of this manna, as could be placed on the back of a horse. He brought it, as a gift, from the hill, named Druim-nic-Ublae,<sup>83</sup> and said to have been in Crimthainn,<sup>84</sup> in Oirgiell territory. A grain of that wheat dropped out of the bag, while on the way, when the horse fell, and he could not rise, until moved by a vision of what occurred. Patrick himself came to that spot. "This is the reason," said the saint through his spirit of prophecy, "for a grain of that wheat dropped out of the sack, and on that spot, where the horse fell." That grain was found, afterwards, and a cross was erected on the way, southwards, in memory of such a miraculous event. The place was called, also, Slige Neimhead, which meant, the "holy" or "heavenly way." This name, Patrick declared it must bear, through future time.

One day, a religious couple, who are named Berach and Brig, or Briga, brought three pieces of cheese, and butter, as an humble offering for the support of those youths, trained by St. Patrick in learning and piety. This was graciously received by him. But, a druid came there, whose name is only given as Gall-drui, or "foreign druid." He said to the saint, "I will believe in you, if you convert those pieces of cheese into stones." This <sup>74</sup> Such as Coroticus having been, in punishment for his crimes, changed into a fox. See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. c., p. 167. Also, Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. x., nn. 99 to 109, pp. 296 to 302. Also, Father Joachim Laurenza Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii Opuscula," &c. Appendix V., pp. 339 to 369.

<sup>75</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>76</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>77</sup> So named, in the Irish Tripartite Life.

<sup>78</sup> Thus called, in the Latin Tripartite.

<sup>79</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls them "fratres germani."

<sup>80</sup> Nemed or Neimheadh, means "a sanctuary," or "glebe land," "a holy wood," or "wood of the sanctuary" or "glebe." See Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture and Round Towers of Ireland," part i., sect. iii., p. 61.

<sup>81</sup> Colgan remarks in a note 109, that a saint of this name, and a Briton, was venerated, at the 11th of February. Another so designated is commemorated, in the Irish Calendars, at the 11th of November. At this latter date, Colgan promised to treat about the present holy man. See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. lxxxiv., pp. 164, 165, and pp. 187, 188.

<sup>82</sup> The Calendar of the O'Clerys mentions, that St. Sedna, of Druim-Mac-Ublai, was venerated there, on the 9th of March.

<sup>83</sup> No church bearing this name is to be found, at present, in the baronies of Slane. It was plundered, by the foreigners, A.D. 830. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 444, 445, and n. (f.)

<sup>84</sup> According to Colgan. See nn. 110, 111, p. 188. This district is supposed to have been comprised, within the baronies of wonder God performed through Patrick. "Again, convert them into cheese," said the druid, and Patrick did so. "Convert them into stones again," said the druid, and Patrick again complied with his request. "Convert them again," cried the druid, but Patrick then said, "No, but they shall remain as they now are, and in commemoration of this transaction, until a servant of God, named Dicuill<sup>85</sup> of the Ernaidhe,<sup>86</sup> or 'prayer-house,'<sup>87</sup> shall come here." The druid then believed in Christ, after witnessing so many miracles, and he was baptized.<sup>88</sup> Patrick flung his little bell<sup>89</sup> into a dense bush or grove there, as he had a forecast, that Dichuill should find it. A birch<sup>90</sup> grew through its handle. This it was that Dicuill found, when afterwards he came to Ernaidhe. Two of the stones, transformed from the cheese, were in that place;<sup>91</sup> the third one, moreover, was carried by Dicuill to Lughmagh, when he was abbot there. It was to be seen, afterwards, in Gort-Conaigh,<sup>92</sup> or Gortchonuigh,<sup>93</sup> meaning "garden," or "field of the fire-wood," whither it had been brought. This was the name of a monastery,<sup>94</sup> in the barony of Cremorne, and county of Monaghan. Many miracles were wrought, in the place where it was kept, through the merits of St. Patrick.<sup>95</sup>

St. Patrick presided over Armagh,<sup>96</sup> for some years;<sup>97</sup> but, it has been Upper and Lower Slane, in the county of Meath.

<sup>85</sup> Colgan writes, that another Dichuill, from being an Abbot over Ernatiensis, became Abbot of Louth, A.D. 700. A St. Dichuill is said to have been venerated, in that church, on the 1st of May.

<sup>86</sup> Ernatiensis was the Latinized form of Ernaidhe or Urnaiahe. It is now Anglicised Urney, Nurney, and Farney. The present place is conjectured by Colgan, to have been the same as Cluain-Braoin, beside the church of Louth. However, an Inquisition, the 4th James I., found, that the king was seized of the priory of Louth and its possessions, inter alia, the rectory of Faghart, including with others the tithes of Orney, alias Nurney. There are still some remains of the ancient church, at Urney, in the present small parish of Faughart, a little north of Dundalk, in the county of Louth. See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," vol. i., p. 614.

<sup>87</sup> In Latin called Oratorium, and in English "an oratory." See, on this subject, the "Acts of Archbishop Cotton in his Metropolitan Visitation of the Diocese of Derry, A.D. MCCCXCVII." Edited by Rev. William Reeves, D.D., n. (o), p. 16, 17.

<sup>88</sup> See Edmund L. Swift's "Life and Acts of St. Patrick," &c., chap. cliv., pp. 207, 208.

<sup>89</sup> It is called the betechan, and it is said to have been a little iron bell, which was afterwards kept in the Ernaidhe of Dicuill.

<sup>90</sup> In the Irish language, it is called bethe.

<sup>91</sup> In the Fourth Life, chap. lxxiv., p. 44, in the Sixth Life, cap. cxix., p. 92, and in the Seventh Life, lib. iii., cap. xiii., p. 151, a somewhat similar miracle, but a distinct one from the present, is recorded, in which men are said to have been turned into stones. The present miracle seems, however, to have been more obscurely related, in the Third Life, cap. lxxvi., p. 27, where "S. Patricius de uno lapide fecit massam molissimam, quæ de paputa (recte paputo) lacte copulari solet," &c. By the word paputo, Colgan understands pap, or the soft food, prepared for infants. See ibid., n. 73, p. 34.

<sup>92</sup> So is the name written, in the Irish Tripartite Life. There is a townland called Gorteens, in the parish of Donaghmoyn, in Farney Barony, county of Monaghan. This is likely enough to have been the site for this ancient monastery.

<sup>93</sup> According to the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>94</sup> The "Annals of the Four Masters" record the death of Flann Feabhla, abbot of Gort Conaigh, in Mughdhorn-Maighen, at A.D. 735. See Dr. O'Donovan's edition, vol. i., pp. 336, 337, and n. (c.)

<sup>95</sup> See Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. ix., p. 46, and nn. 73, 74, p. 50. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xli., p. 96, cap. cliv., p. 99, and n. 148, p. 115. Also, Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xciv., xcv., p. 166, and n. 119, p. 188. Also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 491 to 495, with the accompanying notes.

<sup>96</sup> The words of St. Bernard, in his Vita S. Malachie, cap. vii., and relating to Armagh, are "in qua et vivus praeftuit." These cannot be understood of St. Patrick having merely founded that See.

<sup>97</sup> The various Lives of our saint relate, that he then formed a permanent residence, and that he ruled there for a considerable period. Archdeacon Cotton, in his "Fasti Ecclesiae Hibernice," states, that he resigned this See, either as coadjutor or as absolute Archbishop to Benignus, in 455. See vol. iii., p. 4.

<sup>98</sup> Thus, from some passages, in the metrical Acts of St. Senan of Iniscathy—venerated at the 8th of March—it was supposed thought, that other bishops were there, even during his life-time.<sup>98</sup> It is said, that he resigned the government of the See,<sup>99</sup> to St. Benignus, before his own death.<sup>100</sup> This conjecture may have arisen, from what is stated, that the See having been presumably established, about A.D. 457, and that the death of Benignus took place ten years later.<sup>101</sup> However, it seems improbable, that Benignus governed that See for ten years;<sup>102</sup> his accession taking place, it has been thought, at A.D. 458. Hence, it was concluded, that St. Patrick gave up Armagh, when established, to Benignus.<sup>103</sup> Constantly is the latter called his successor, not merely in that See, but, in the primacy over Ireland. In such a manner is this recorded, as plainly to indicate, that he came next to St. Patrick, after the illustrious Primate's death.<sup>104</sup> Even, the Tripartite Life<sup>105</sup> alludes to Benignus, as rather a young man, and as still a disciple, when St. Patrick presided over Armagh.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE IRISH APOSTLE'S MISSIONARY LABOURS, HABITS, AND DEVOTIONAL EXERCISES—THE COUNCILS AND SYNODS OF ST. PATRICK—VARIOUS MIRACLES WROUGHT BY THE HOLY MAN—HIS CONSECRATIONS AND ORDINATIONS—ENUMERATION OF HIS OFFICIALS AND DISCIPLES.

THE venerable Patrick had a grateful recollection of the place, with which his early missionary labours had been connected, in Ulster; and, there he sought a home and rest, but only for heavenly contemplation. Between Armagh and Sabhul, or Saul, his favourite retreat, the great Apostle passed his declining years; although, some intervals of this time may have been employed, in short episcopal visitations. He had provided bishops for other Sees, and he had probably settled, at least, in many instances, their respective bounds and jurisdictions. According to Jocelyn, having laid the foundation of the church, he established a regular institute. A Life of Ciaran of Cluain<sup>1</sup> states, that the order of Patrick was one of the eight orders which are in Erin. Our Apostle lived under a sanctified rule, during the years, which remained to him, leading a life of contemplation.<sup>2</sup> It is said, he that our holy Apostle prophesied he should become a successor at Armagh. Sir James Ware rejects the latter conclusion. See his work, "De Præsulibus Hiberniæ Commentarius," &c., pp. 2, 3.

<sup>99</sup> According to P. Pius Bonifacius Gams, this resignation of St. Patrick took place, A.D. 455. See "Series Episcoporum Ecclesiæ Catholicæ quotquot innotuerunt a Beato Petro Apostolo," p. 206.

<sup>100</sup> James Stuart places this supposed resignation of the bishopric of Armagh, in favour of St. Binen, so early as A.D. 454. See "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh," chap. i., p. 84.

<sup>101</sup> The "Annals of the Four Masters" place the foundation of Armagh, at the year 457. See O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 142, 143. Then they assign the death of Benignus, to A.D. 467. See ibid., pp. 146, 147.

<sup>102</sup> It is stated, that he abdicated this function, A.D. 465, and that three years, afterwards, he departed this life, at Armagh, or as some have it, at Ferlingmere, in England, on a 9th of November. See Sir James Ware, "De Præsulibus Hiberniæ Commentarius," &c., pp. 2, 3.

<sup>103</sup> What then becomes of the ten years, which Tirechan's catalogue allows for St. Patrick, or rather for the real St. Patrick? asks Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>104</sup> Benignus is never mentioned, in our old documents, as an administrator of Armagh, but as a successor there to St. Patrick. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. ii., and nn. 8 to 11, pp. 323, 325, 326.

<sup>105</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. lxxii., pp. 162, 163.

CHAPTER XXIV.—<sup>1</sup> Chapter xlvii. is quoted in the O'Clery's Calendar.

<sup>2</sup> This manner of life is likewise attested, in a stanza of St. Fiech's Hymn:—

ba lein parráice combeba, ba rab in-vayba cloeni,

chiefly dwelt in Saball, or in the monastery, which he had founded at Armagh. Nor did our great Apostle willingly leave those holy places, unless some cause of inevitable urgency called him forth; nevertheless, once in every year he celebrated a council, that he might bring back to the right rule and observance those matters, which he knew to need reformation. No like work to his was ever done. The Apostles planted churches, on the wayside, over which the world's traffic passed and crushed out their existence. The labours of the Saint of Ireland were answered by a perennial harvest,<sup>3</sup> so that, in reality, our island well deserved, in future times, to be called the Island of Saints.<sup>4</sup>

The course which the saint held in his devotion, as it was most admirable, so did he continue it daily, without any intermission. Every day was he wont to recite devoutly the whole Psalter, with Canticles, Hymns and St. John's Revelation;<sup>5</sup> besides these, he offered two hundred other prayers. Three hundred times in the day, with genuflections, did he prostrate himself in prayer and adoration, before God; and, in singing the canonical hours, he was accustomed to bless himself a hundred times, with a sign of the Cross. Moreover, it was his custom every day to celebrate Mass, with great devotion and reverence; neither did he omit to preach constantly to the people, nor to teach his disciples. The night-time, which he divided into three parts, was spent in a most holy and austere manner. The first part of it he employed, in reciting twice fifty Psalms, and in making two hundred genuflections; the second part, he passed immersed in cold water, his heart, eyes and hands being directed towards Heaven, while saying the third quinquagenary of Psalms, with other prayers.<sup>6</sup> The third part, he allotted to his sleep, having for his bed a bare stone, with another stone serving for a pillow.<sup>7</sup> He scarcely allowed himself any rest, and he preferred, for the sake of mortification, such an uncomfortable posture. His loins were girt with a ἵερο ὑμῶν αὐτῶν καὶ ἐν τῇ ψαλμῶν οὐκ ἐστὶν.

It is thus Englished :—

“Patrick walked in piety till his death : he was powerful in the extirpation of sin : He raised his hands in blessing upon the tribes of men.”

<sup>3</sup> The Rev. A. O'Connor's “History of the Irish People,” book i.

<sup>4</sup> On this subject, the reader is referred to a small work, intitled, “Insula Sanctorum, the Island of Saints;” a Title applied exclusively to Ireland. Proved by Historical Evidence from the Ninth Century to the present.” London, 1872, 12mo.

<sup>5</sup> The Thirteenth Strophe of St. Fiech's Hymn is :—

immun ocur abcolipp, na tñi coicet nor canao, pñochao baiteo apñigeo, de molao
De ni anao.

It is thus Englished :—

“Hymns, and the Apocalypse, and the thrice fifty (Psalms) he was wont to sing,

He preached, baptized, and prayed; from the praise of God he ceased not.”

<sup>6</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life has a fourth division of these holy nocturnal exercises; however, the variation of statement does not materially alter the account, as given by Jocelyn.

<sup>7</sup> This is recorded, too, in the Sixteenth Strophe of St. Fiech's Hymn :—

poaro por leicc lunn iapum, ocur eulche fluch imbi, ba coirthe apñochair, ni leicc a choip
hi tñmni.

The following is its English translation :—

“He slept on a bare stone then, and a wet sackcloth around him : A bare rock was his pillow; he allowed not his body to be in warmth.”

<sup>8</sup> In Fiech's Hymn we find this stanza :—

ni congebeo uacht rini so feirr apñoch hi lunnib, por nim conpna a pñge, pñochair
pñoe imni.

The following is an English translation :—

rough and coarse hair-cloth, steeped in cold water, to keep his body in due subjection, lest it should rebel against the spirit.<sup>8</sup> His fasts were frequent and long continued, while he lived on the coarsest food, and offered himself, as a living holocaust, to the Almighty. Moreover, he remained, from Shrovetide until Easter without food.<sup>9</sup>

We are notified, that until the fifty-fifth year of his age, after the apostolic manner, St. Patrick was accustomed to travel on foot; afterwards, however, according to the usage of the country, and owing to the fatigues of his journeyings, he was obliged to make use of a chariot. The glorious bishop, over his other attire, wore a white robe or hood. Thus, he represented, by the form and colour of his garment, the purity of his inward thoughts.<sup>10</sup> He would accept of no gifts or presents, esteeming it happier to give than to receive. If, sometimes, rich men bestowed presents upon him, he would without delay give them to the poor, easing himself from all earthly goods, as from a heavy burthen. In his countenance, in his aspect, in his conversation, in his gait, even in the motion of his body, and in his general deportment, the beholders might learn lessons of edification, his speech being tempered with sweetness, and seasoned with the salt of discretion. He accommodated himself to all classes of people, and on all occasions. He is said to have been versed in four languages, the English, Irish, French and Latin. A writer of his Acts maintains, that he attained to good insight in the Greek.<sup>11</sup> Whatsoever he foretold came to happen, without any ambiguity. He is said to have prophesied, regarding the Saints of Ireland, and especially regarding all the Saints of Munster and Connaught, that were to be born within the compass of one hundred years, and so clearly, that he mentioned their names, acts and the places of their habitation. When giving his benediction, he extended his right hand; and, in fulminating his malediction, he stretched out his left hand. Those whom he blessed, God's blessing alighted upon them, and those whom he denounced, God's malediction came upon them. When any difficult or obscure questions were put unto him, he was wont, through profound humility, to answer, "I know not, God knows." And though in all virtues he equalled, or rather surpassed, other saints; yet, in humility did he far surpass himself. Hence, it came to pass, that in his letters he styled himself, the greatest sinner, the least and most despicable among men. Setting aside little to his own merits, in the signs he wrought, he deemed himself unworthy to be compared with any perfect man.<sup>12</sup> He called himself homuncio, or "the little man," because he was small of stature. He was exercised in manual works, like St. Paul. He tilled the ground, and

"The cold of the weather deterred him not from passing the night in ponds:
By Heaven his kingdom was protected:
he preached by day on the hills."

From Shrovetide till Easter [to be] without food,
No penance was greater than his penances."

<sup>9</sup> According to the O'Clery's Calendar, this is stated in his own Life, and Cuimin of Coinderc proves it in that poem, the beginning of which thus commences:—

CAPAIR PATRAIC PUITE MACA
MAC CALPUINN FA HÁIRIO NÍAGAIL,
O INIO GO CAIRIS SAN BÍAD
NÓCAP MIO PÍAN DA PÍANÁIBH.

The following translation is given:—

"Patrick of the fort of Macha loved,
Son of Calpurn of high rule,

<sup>10</sup> Following St. Patrick's example, the Irish monks, in after time, were clothed in white woollen garments.

<sup>11</sup> See "Life of the Glorious Bishop St. Patrick, Apostle and Primate of Ireland. Together with the Lives of the Holy Virgin S. Bridgit and of the Glorious Abbot Saint Columbe, Patrons of Ireland."

<sup>12</sup> Father Stephen White accuses Giraldus Cambrensis with having landed St. Patrick alone, although many Irish Saints were also deserving of notice. See "Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. ii., pp. 14, 15.

<sup>13</sup> The O'Clery's Calendar states, that employed himself occasionally in fishing ; but, especially in the building of churches,<sup>13</sup> in the teaching of his disciples and the people, and in the administration of Sacraments, was he busily engaged. He daily wrought so many and such great miracles, that he appeared second to no other saint. The blind, the lame, the deaf, the dumb, the palsied, the lunatic, the leprous, the epileptic—all who laboured under any disease—did he, in the name of the Most Holy Trinity, restore to the power of their limbs, and to entire health. He even raised the dead to life.<sup>14</sup> It was he, moreover, that brought the people of Erin, both men and women, from the darkness of sin, and vices, and paganism, to the light of faith, and piety, and knowledge of the Lord.<sup>15</sup> These great labours of our saint should appear to be incredible, adds one of the authors of his Acts, did we not reflect, that they received the ample rewards of Divine Grace ; yet, the weight of human testimony is so great, that human understanding must yield to the evidence available.

Having accomplished the foundation of his church at Armagh, St. Patrick is supposed to have next directed his attention, to the celebration of solemn Councils at times convenient, and in which he reformed anything he found to be prejudicial to the Christian Religion, or contrary to the Church canons.<sup>16</sup> He applied to the framing of decrees, for the good government of the whole Irish Church, for the direction of sound doctrine and good morals, according to justice and ecclesiastical institutes. The records of two Synods, he is said to have held, are still preserved. One of these is known three hundred alphabets he wrote, and three hundred churches he erected, as these lines prove :—

ՅՐ ճՅՈ ՁԻԶԵՐԻ ՈՐ ԴՅՈՅՈՒՆ,
ԵՃ ԵՆԼ ԼԻՔ Ե ԼԱՐՈՒ
ՅՐ ճՅՈ ՇԵՆԼԼ ՇԱՐՈՒ ՇՈՐՈՇԱՐԻՆ, ՐՈՐ ՇՈՇԱՐԻՆ ՇՈ ԼԱՐՈՒ.

The following is the English translation :—

“ Three hundred alphabets he wrote,
Beautiful was the touch of his hand ;
Three hundred beautiful churches he founded,
He raised them from the ground.”

At the word Alphabets, Dr. Todd says, in a note : “ This may, perhaps, allude to the ceremony of writing the Greek and Roman alphabets, on the floor of a newly consecrated church.”—“ Martyrology of Donegal,” pp. 78, 79, and n. 2.

<sup>14</sup> These miracles of St. Patrick are thus alluded to, in the Hymn of St. Fiach, at stanza 17 :—

ՔՐՈՇԱՅՈ ՔՐԵԼԱՅ ՇՈ ՇԱՅ, ՇՈ ՅՈՒՔ ՄՈՐ
ՔԵՐՇԱ ԻԼԼԵՑԻ,
ԻՇՇԱՅ ԼՍՐԵՒ ԼԱ ՏՐԱՐԵՒ, ՄԱՐԻՆ ՇՈՐ ՔՐՍՐ-ՇԱՅ ՇՈ ԵՅԵՑԻ.

These lines are thus rendered, in English :—

“ He preached the Gospel to all : he wrought great miracles in Letha ;
He healed the lame and the lepers : the dead he restored to life.”

He merited to be the reviver of three-and-thirty dead persons. See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxvi., p. 28. Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxix., p. 59. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxxiii., clxxxiv., clxxxv., clxxxvi., pp. 105, 106. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. lxxii., p. 139, lib. iii., cap. xcvi., xcvi., xcix., pp. 166, 167.

<sup>15</sup> So do we read, in the “ Martyrology of Donegal ;” and, in the Hymn of St. Fiach, in the additional tradition of the ancient Irish :—

ՔԱՏՐԱՅՈ ՔՐՈՇԱՅՐ ՇՈ ՔՐՈՇԱՆ, ՔՈ ՇԻՐ
ՄՈՐ ՔԵՐՇ ԻԼԼԵՑԻ ;
ԻՄՈՒ ՇՈՒՐՐԱՏ ՇՈ ԵՐԱՐՇ ԻՆ ՇԱՅ ՇՈՐ
ՔՐԵ ՇՈ ԵՅԵՑԻ.

The following is the English translation :—

“ Patrick preached to the Scoti : he endured great toil in Letha :
With him will come to judgment every one whom he brought to the life of faith.”

<sup>16</sup> We are told, that he drafted and established such constitutions, as were conformable to those holy canons, and formed them, for the advancement of religion, piety, and a good life. See Jocelyn's Life of St. Patrick, cap. clxviii., p. 102. Also “ Life of the Glorious Bishop St. Patrick, Apostle and Primate of Ireland,” &c.

<sup>17</sup> See Wilkins' “ Concilia,” tomus i., p. 4. There, it is quoted, as being “ ex Andegavensi Bibliotheca ;” also, Spelman's “ Concilia,” tomus i., p. 52. There, we as the Synod of St. Patrick.<sup>17</sup> In it are some canons, which some think to have been enacted, at a later period, and which probably had been drawn, from those of distant countries. Another of these Synods is that known, as the Synod of Bishops, i.e., of Patrick, Auxilius and Isserninus.<sup>18</sup> In the main, among its canons, little can be discovered to demonstrate any doubt,<sup>19</sup> about its having been held, by those bishops named, and in Ireland.<sup>20</sup> We also meet with "Canones S. Patricio adscripti."<sup>21</sup> Their study throws much light, on the history and antiquities of Ireland's primitive Church, although questions have been raised, regarding their authenticity. Having placed the foundation of Armagh, at A.D. 445,<sup>22</sup> Archbishop Ussher relegates the Synod there, to A.D. 448.<sup>23</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan refers this Synod, to about 456, while Saints Isserninus and Auxilius<sup>24</sup> were yet living. In the order of events, it is natural to suppose, the latter convention followed St. Patrick's settlement at Armagh. Very ingenious, and indeed very reasonable, conjectures have been advanced, by Dr. Lanigan, to show why the names of various other bishops, then resident in Ireland, had not been affixed to those Synodal decrees, as well as the names of Auxilius and Isserninus. In the canons, we find sufficient evidence of a well-ordered and extensive church organization then in Ireland. Bishops, priests and deacons, clergy in minor orders, abbots, monks and nuns, are mentioned.<sup>25</sup> Bishops are alluded to, find it entitled, "Synodus alia S. Patricii, cujus annus haud liquet." Father Joachim Laurence Villanueva, in his work, "Sancti Patricii Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., has published the text of this Synod, and he has added to it very learned commentaries. See pp. 103 to 142.

<sup>18</sup> Among its decrees, we find the following penitential canon: "A Christian who has committed murder, or fornication, or gone to a soothsayer, after the manner of the Gentiles, for every such crime shall do a year of penance: when his year of penance is accomplished, he shall come with witnesses, and afterwards he shall be absolved by the priest." The full text of this Synod, with lengthened and researchful commentaries, will be found, in Father Joachimo Laurentio Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., pp. 1 to 102.

<sup>19</sup> The critical Tillemont could find no reason, for suspecting the genuineness of the canons of this Synod, except in two or three of them. See his "Memoirs pour servir a l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xvi., p. 786.

<sup>20</sup> Thus, Spelman's "Concilia," tom. i., p. 52, has, circa A.D. 456. In Wilkins' "Concilia Magnæ Britanniae," tomus i., p. 2, this Synod is said simply to have been held, A.D. 456. The Decrees are published from a Canterbury Manuscript, classed, as, MS. C.C.C. Cant. 279, 20.

<sup>21</sup> These are printed, in Wilkins' "Concilia," vol. i., p. 6. They have been taken, "ex Opusculis S. Patricii," per Jac. Waræum, p. 39. Reference is likewise made to D'Achery's "Spicilegium," tom. ix., and printed, "ex MSS. Corbiensi and S. Germ. Paris." Martene and Durand, in their valuable collection, "Anecdota Thesaurus," tomus iv., have extracted their insertions, "ex MS. Bibl. Bigotianæ." These interesting collections have been reprinted, by Abbé Migne. See, also, Father Joachim Laurence Villanueva's edition, with learned scholia, in his work, "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., pp. 143 to 175. Also, Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 62, 178 to 180.

<sup>22</sup> The Four Masters do not seem in agreement with themselves, when they affix the foundation of Armagh to 457, and when assigning the date of St. Usailles' or Auxilius' death, to A.D. 454. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 142, 143.

<sup>23</sup> Harris has followed the same computation. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 20. Also, James Stuart, in his "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh," chap. i., p. 82.

<sup>24</sup> The death of Auxilius has generally been assigned to 454. See the Annals of Ulster, in Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 827. The Four Masters, and Ussher, as quoted by Colgan, in his "Trias Thaumaturga," Secunda Vita S. Patricii, nn. 39, 40, pp. 18, 19, place the death of Auxilius, at A.D. 454, while that of Isserninus is set down, at A.D. 469. If the former were the true date, we might calculate, that the Synod was held, immediately after the foundation of Armagh. Auxilius seems to have died, very soon after St. Patrick's erection of that See, and in the year 460, according to Rev. Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>25</sup> An old anonymous poem, on the duties of a priest, according to the Canons of St.

and, in such a manner, as to show, that their number was duly proportioned to that of the inferior clergy, in nearly every important district of Ireland. Two of those decrees require, that no strange cleric be allowed to baptize, to build a church, to consecrate, or to officiate in an unconsecrated church, unless he shall have obtained faculties, required from his own or from the proper bishop.<sup>26</sup> The allusion, made to pagans,<sup>27</sup> proves the great antiquity of this canon. It is ruled, likewise, that a bishop, who may go into the diocese of another, shall not attempt to ordain anyone, unless he obtain permission for so doing, from the ordinary.<sup>28</sup> Such regulations, not only disprove the non-diocesan theory of some writers, but establish, also, the defined local limits of our early bishops' respective jurisdictions. Regulations like these could not have been made for Ireland, were there only a few bishops, throughout its whole extent. Among those rules, it had been specially decreed, that no priest must presume to offer Sacrifice in a church—even although he happened to be the founder—until his own particular bishop should have consecrated it.<sup>29</sup> Nor are there any grounds, for presuming, these canons had been interpolations, after St. Patrick's time.

It is probable, active duties, devolving on all the newly-appointed bishops, in various parts of Ireland, would not readily permit of their absence. But, after the death of Secundinus, it is likely, St. Patrick regarded Auxilius and Isserninus, as being the most experienced prelates, and the best versed in canon law, because they had studied, in the first continental schools of sacred science. They probably aided the great Irish Apostle, in a representative capacity, to draw up some brief and excellent decrees, suggested by special wants of the Irish Church. Those decrees also evince a good acquaintance, with more ancient ecclesiastical canons. They seem, however, more to resemble pastoral instructions to the Irish clergy, than the decrees of a regularly convened Synod.<sup>30</sup> Politic motives may account, too, for omitting the formal convocation of a national Synod. At the time, probably, a pagan king ruled over all Ireland; and, it was possible, his suspicions and indignation might be aroused, if a council of bishops assembled, in any part of his dominions, and without his permission. Besides, there Patrick, containing 28 verses, will be found, in vol. ii., folio Manuscript Paper, in the Betham Collection of the Royal Irish Academy. It contains 534 numbered pages, besides a few pages, at the beginning, not numbered. It was compiled, A.D. 1796, by Michael Oge O'Longan.

<sup>26</sup> See Father Joachim Laurence Villeneuve's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula et Scriptorum quæ supersunt Fragmenta," p. 4.

<sup>27</sup> There is added, "Nam qui a gentibus sperat permissionem, alienus sit." See ibid., can. xxiii., xxiv.

<sup>28</sup> See ibid., can. xxx., p. 5.

<sup>29</sup> The xxiii. canon runs thus: "Si quis Presbyterorum Ecclesiam ædificaverit, non offerat antequam adducat suum Pontificem ut eam consecret quia sic decet." See ibid., p. 4. See also the admirable notes, 37 and 38, of the very learned editor just quoted, at pp. 86 to 90.

<sup>30</sup> See the Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. iii., iv., with notes 22 to 29, pp.

331 to 334.

<sup>31</sup> However, among the Brehons and learned Druids, the Irish Apostle was received as a wise man and as a scholar, and many of them adopted the doctrines he promulgated. See Richard Rolt Brash's "Ogam Inscribed Monuments of the Gaedhil in the British Islands, with a Dissertation on the Ogam Character," &c. Illustrated with fifty Photo-lithographic Plates. Edited by George M. Atkinson, chap. i. Antiquity of Letters in Ireland, p. 5. London, 1879, 4to.

<sup>32</sup> It is most probable, the ancient Brehon code underwent revision, when Christianity introduced a new mode of procedure, and a kindlier feeling among the Irish, while, the Seanchus Mor was sometimes called the Cain Phadraig, meaning Patrick's Law or Tribute as containing special ecclesiastical ordinances. See J. Roderick O'Flanagan's "Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal of Ireland, from the earliest Times to the reign of Queen Victoria," vol. i. Introduction, p. 3. London, 1870, 8vo.

were other pagan chiefs, who, as local dynasts, would probably have interfered, to prevent that action, necessary to be taken, by prelates thus assembled.<sup>32</sup> St. Patrick was essentially a man of great prudence, and eminently practical, in his course of proceedings; and, it is likely, he wished to regulate unostentatiously, whatever served the infant Church, under prevailing circumstances.<sup>32</sup> Among the host of illustrious authors,<sup>33</sup> belonging to the Benedictine Maurists, D'Achery and Martene have rendered peculiar services to Catholic Ireland, for having established the authenticity of those councils and decrees, attributed to Saints Patrick, Auxilius, and Iserminus. Those acts especially affirm the supremacy of Rome, and identify our Irish Church doctrines, with those of the Universal Church.

Saul Church and surroundings, County of Down.

After many years, when the Dynast of Clochar, Eochaidh,<sup>34</sup> or Echu,<sup>35</sup> as an unbeliever, reached the end of his life, St. Patrick lived in Saul.<sup>36</sup> When his friends remained by him, and wished to learn his last instructions, Eochaidh said, "Let me not be buried, until Patrick comes." After the Dynast finished these words, his spirit departed. When his death was miraculously manifested to St. Patrick, he decided on going among the Hui-Niall, and to Clochar-mac-Daimhin, where he found the corpse of Eochaidh, who had been inanimate for twenty-four hours. Then, Patrick entered that <sup>32</sup> Here may be mentioned, Montfaucon, Mabillon, and Ruinart, as also Calmet. The reformed Congregation of St. Vannes was organized, in 1600. In turn, this was absorbed by the Congregation of St. Maur, founded A.D. 1627, on the Loire, near Vincennes. To this, all the Benedictine Houses of France, including St. Germain des Pres, became affiliated. See an interesting work, Charles M'Carthy's "Lives of the Principal Benedictine Writers of the Congregation of St. Maur." London, 1869.

<sup>34</sup> He is so called, in the Tripartite Life. See ante.

<sup>35</sup> Thus is he called, by Jocelyn.

<sup>36</sup> The accompanying aspect of Saul—differing in point of view from an illustration already given—has been drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and from a photograph, taken on the spot, by the Rev. Bernard M'Cann, C.C. of Saul, who kindly forwarded it to the author. It was engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>37</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga,"

house, where the body lay, and he sent out those persons, who were in attendance. Bending his knees to the Lord, and shedding tears, he prayed. Then he said, in a clear voice, "Rise, O King Echaïdh, in the name of Almighty God." Immediately, at the voice of God's servant, the Dynast arose. When he had composed himself, he spoke. Then, the grief and lamentations of the people were changed into joy. Forthwith, Patrick instructed the king, in the rule of faith, and afterwards baptized him. He also commanded him, before the people, that he should describe the pains of the impious, and the joy of the saints, and that he should speak to them, so as they might believe unhesitatingly, all that had been said, about the pains of hell, and the joys of the blessed. The king spoke truly, regarding these things, and as he had been commanded. Afterwards, Patrick offered him a choice, to remain fifteen years, in the chief kingship of his territory, if he should live piously and truthfully, or to go to heaven immediately, if he so preferred it. The king said: "Though the sovereignty of the entire globe were given to me, and though I might live for many years, I should only count it all as nothing, in comparison with the good shown to me. Hence it is, I pray more and more, that I may be freed from the miseries of this present life, and be sent to receive the eternal joys, exhibited to me." To him Patrick then said, "Go in peace, and journey to the Lord." Eochaidh, thereupon, gave thanks to God, in the presence of his people, while he commended his soul to the Lord, and to St. Patrick. Soon, afterwards, his spirit departed for Heaven.<sup>37</sup>

The Blessed Patriarch, by repeated prayers, begged to know in what state Ireland was, in the sight of Divine Majesty. God complied with the desires of his heart. Once, being in prayer, St. Patrick saw all this island in flames, rising upwards even to Heaven. An Angel told him, that such was the state of Ireland, in the sight of God, for that present time. Within a little while, mountains of fire appeared, ascending to the very clouds. A short while, afterwards, he saw brightsome torches shining; then, he beheld small lights, and lastly, he beheld afar off coals raked in ashes, but yet burning. The Angel, appearing to him, then said: "By that variety is expressed the several states of change Ireland shall undergo, in succeeding times." Wherefore, bathing his face in tears, Patrick often repeated those words of the Royal Prophet: "Will God reject for ever? or will he never chose to be more favourable again? Or will he cut off his mercy for ever, from generation to generation? Or will God forget to show mercy? Or will he in his wrath restrain his mercies?"<sup>38</sup> The Angel said, "Look towards the north, and there shalt thou see that change, caused by the right hand of the Highest, for the darkness is to be dispersed by a coming light." The saint lifted up his eyes, and he saw a little light arising in Ulidia, which striving for a long space with the darkness, finally chased it away. Afterwards, it illuminated all the country, never ceasing to increase, until it brought Ireland to its former bright and flourishing state. According to the saint's interpretation, the fire designated that present devotion, and zeal for Religion and Charity, wherewith the inhabitants were inflamed, in his days. The flaming mountains were emblematic of those saints, who were conspicuous for miracles, for virtuous lives, and for learning. The diminution of light, indicated a decrease of sanctity; while the mist, overclouding all the land, betokened that infidelity should prevail, but only for a time, in the country. The various changes and intervals were intended to represent distinct epochs. The Irish thought, that the era of darkness was intended to fore-token the rule in Ireland of those Norwegian and Pagan Kings, Gurmund and Turgesius.<sup>39</sup> For, during their time,<sup>40</sup> the saints of God were in caves and hiding-places, to escape from the fury of their persecutors. During this period, too, various rites happened to prevail. These differed from the earlier ecclesiastical practices and canons. Novelties were introduced, likewise, in administering sacramental rites. That light, which issued from the north, was supposed to indicate the happy advent of St. Malachy,<sup>41</sup> who, first ruling over the Church of Down, and afterwards presiding as Primate of Armagh, brought Ireland, at last, to a wholesome state of Christian discipline. On the contrary, the first English invaders of our country considered, that light was intended to symbolize their arrival; and, in their opinion, also, that improved state of ecclesiastical affairs, they had introduced, by planting and propagating Religion, and by causing to be observed, with a better rule, sacramental institutes and Church laws. Honest Jocelyn, who thus relates such particulars, says, he would not undertake to solve this disputed question, for either party; but, he rather thought its discussion and definition should be left to Divine decrees.<sup>42</sup>

Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxx., p. 83, viii., p. 150. Also Miss Cusack's "Life of and Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. St. Patrick," p. 454.

Frequently did the Apostolic man travel about through Ultonia, while teaching its people the truths of Divine faith. While thus engaged, at one time, St. Patrick, with his holy family, ascended a little elevation, not far distant from that valley, where afterwards the monastery of Bangor was built. From this hill-top, they saw all the valley replenished with a celestial brightness, and filled with Angelic choirs. This admirable vision moved the whole company, to entreat our saint to build a church, in that sacred spot. Patrick would not do so, but prophesying, he foretold, "After the lapse of sixty years, and when these are completely expired, there shall be born a son of light, named Comgall,<sup>43</sup> which word is interpreted 'a fair pledge.' He shall be dear both to God and man, and he shall build a church, in that place. Therein shall be gathered innumerable troops of the children of light, who shall dedicate themselves to the service of Christ." Not one iota of all this passed unaccomplished; for, within the time foretold, was born Comgallus, who built the monastery of Bangor. Therein he brought to Christ, by means of the Gospel, many thousands of perfect monks; inso-much, that this holy place became the fruitful mother of saints. As a vine, fructifying in sweetness of odour, did it extend branches to the sea, and its plants reached beyond the sea. It filled Ireland, Scotland, and many other islands, with perfect monks, and with numerous monasteries, while foreign countries were benefited by its missionaries. One of these sons of that monastery, named Luan,<sup>44</sup> founded a hundred monasteries; another, named Columban, a most holy man, and full of Divine grace, erected many monas-

<sup>38</sup> Psalms lxxvi. 8, 9, 10.

<sup>39</sup> Giraldus Cambrensis mentions these, as having disturbed the tranquillity of Ireland, but not as holding permanent rule over the Island. See "Topographia Hiberniæ," Dist. iii., cap. xlvii.

<sup>40</sup> In the ninth century. While most of our Irish historians admit only of an Irish succession of monarchs, on the throne of Ireland, with partial conquests by the Danes and Norwegians; Dr. Geoffrey Keating asserts, that Turgesius, the Dane, usurped the sovereignty of Ireland, from A.D. 866 to 879, when he was slain, by Maolseachlain, the succeeding monarch. The warlike exploits and tyrannical reign of this Northman freebooter are related, in his "History of Ireland," part ii., A.D. 813 to 879.

<sup>41</sup> His feast occurs at the 3rd of November. From a Manuscript copy of Jocelyn, Ussher introduces, also, the name of St. Celestine—meant for St. Celsus—his predecessor in the See of Armagh. See "De Primordiis Britannicarum Ecclesiarum," cap. xvii., p. 916. St. Celsus and St. Celestine have a festival, at the 6th of April, in the Roman and Irish Martyrologies.

<sup>42</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxv., pp. 103, 104, and nn. 164, 165, p. 116.

<sup>43</sup> His festival occurs, on the 10th of May.

teries, and he was the father of numberless holy monks. He built the famous Monastery of Luxovium,<sup>45</sup> in France, and of Bobbio,<sup>46</sup> beyond the Alps, where his days ended, most gloriously and happily. Jocelyn declares, it would be quite superfluous to dilate more, on the splendour of this church, at Bangor, since it has received a sufficient description, in the Acts of St. Comgall, first abbot of the place, and in those<sup>47</sup> of St. Malachy,<sup>48</sup> Archbishop, and Legate of the Apostolic See, in Ireland.<sup>49</sup>

Envyng the progress of the Christian Religion, and our saint's glory, some wicked man suborned a woman, that used to beat and to dress flax, and who lived by that path the saint was to pass. She was engaged to hide a quantity of flax in a hollow tree, not far off, and when the saint passed that way, they wished her to cry out against him and his holy company, and to accuse them of having stolen the flax. That woman did as she had been directed, by those wicked men, who rushed out of their hiding-places, when the woman began to cry. Flocking about the saint, and his companions, they were accused as guilty thieves, and worthy of torments and of death. Near that place, where such a tumult was excited, a person had been buried. Him the saint revived, and this man gave testimony, clearing the saint, and his companions from that slander, by showing where the flax had been secreted. The contrivers of mischief, owing to this miraculous event, were reclaimed from idolatry, to the acknowledgment of a true God, so that they found mercy in his sight, while the holy servants of their Divine Master miraculously escaped, from the plots of their enemies.<sup>50</sup> Oftentimes did the glorious saint see our Saviour, with the heavens open, and our Lord Jesus, standing in the midst of multitudes of Angels. This sometimes happened, when he said Mass, and at other times, as when he devoutly sung St. John's Revelations. Besides, the Angel Victor, so often mentioned in his Acts, was wont to appear thrice every week, to refresh his mind, with Divine colloquies and discourses. When souls had departed from this life, our Blessed Patrick saw full often some go to endure the pains of hell, while others were sent to enjoy the delights of heaven. One example of a very remarkable kind, and which the saint himself, for the sake of edification, was wont to relate, may here be mentioned. A great nobleman, who lived in much prosperity, and who died with no less fame, was accounted, by those that knew his life and end, to have lived most happily, and to have been pleasing to God; whereas, a poor, despised lazar, who passed all his life in great misery, who wanted even the honour of burial, after his death, and whose body had become a prey to fowls of the air, was esteemed a most wicked man. But, the Blessed Bishop knew the blindness of human judgment, and told several persons, that he saw the rich man's soul buried in hell, while the poor man's soul had been carried up to heaven. This the saint saw, in a vision concerning these two men, and he was wont to recite something similar, regarding many other persons.<sup>51</sup> While St. Patrick, and a holy man, called Winnoc,<sup>52</sup> sat together, and were engaged in conversation, about religious matters, one day, a cloak descended

<sup>44</sup> The feast of St. Luan, or Moluan, occurs, on the 4th of August.

<sup>45</sup> Or Luxeu.

<sup>46</sup> An episcopal town, seated on the River Treba, in Northern Italy.

<sup>47</sup> Allusion is made to St. Bernard's "Vita S. Malachiae."

<sup>48</sup> His festival is held, at the 3rd of November, as already stated.

<sup>49</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xcviii., p. 88.

<sup>50</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxviii., pp. 26, 27. Also, Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxlvi., p. 97.

<sup>51</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxx., clxxxi., pp. 104, 105.

<sup>52</sup> Said to have been Bishop of Rath-Easpuic Innech, who is venerated, at the 29th of August. He is said, likewise, to have been connected with the church of Teaghneatha, or Tynan, in the county of Armagh.

<sup>53</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxi.,

from Heaven. Thereupon, our Irish Apostle cried out, "O Winnoc, take that cloak, sent thee, because thou hast left all things for God's sake." In reply, the holy man said, "This cloak is rather sent from God to thee, who hath made thyself poor, while possessing many things, and who remaineth unclothed, while thou hast covered many persons." While this contest of humility prevailed, the cloak ascended before their sight, towards the clouds; but, soon, two cloaks were seen descending, and these respectively alighted on the holy men's shoulders.<sup>53</sup> While St. Patrick was resting one day, on the lands<sup>54</sup> of a certain plebeian, his horses were grazing in the fields, belonging to that man.<sup>55</sup> Being of an avaricious disposition, he upbraided the saint, by using contumelious words, and taking up stones to cast at the horses, they were driven away from his pastures. But, a just retribution fell upon the owner, for his former fertile field became barren, and no crops could be raised there, in after times.<sup>56</sup> Another miracle is related, regarding a certain good man, who loaded two waggons with rods, at the request of St. Patrick; and, for some necessary reason, he brought these to a spot designated. A fire took place there, and one of the waggons immediately rolled to a distance, while the other remained; but, although it was completely surrounded by the flames, not a single twig was destroyed.<sup>57</sup> We find it related, that at one time, St. Patrick was passing a place, where a great number of men laboured, yet in vain, to raise a large stone. The holy man approached them, he prayed and blessed that stone, and immediately it was raised in the place designed for it, to the great admiration of all, who were present. The labourers were converted to the Christian faith, and they received baptism, at the hands of our saint.<sup>58</sup> At a place, called Tedna, which, in the time of Jocelyn, belonged to the Metropolitan See of Armagh, the holy Apostle placed the veil, on the heads of four virgins, consecrated to God, and there were shown marks of their feet, where they stood upon a stone. These remained, even to the twelfth century.<sup>59</sup> The Latin and Irish Tripartite Lives, towards the close, briefly recapitulate various miracles of St. Patrick, which they had previously counted, more in detail. The fame of St. Patrick's great virtues and works excited a holy man of distinguished merit and virtue, who was named Vinualocus,<sup>60</sup> and living in Brittany, in France, to leave his native soil, and to visit Ireland, there to become St. Patrick's disciple and scholar. The night before he was to begin this journey, in a vision, he saw a most venerable man, attired in episcopal robes. This man said to him: "Know, my dearest Vinualocus, that I am Patrick, to whom you repair. Know that the time of my dissolution is near, so that before you can come where I am, I shall have departed from life. It is the will of God, that you forsake not this place." Then, the vision disappeared. The holy Vinualocus obeyed the Divine admonition, and he remained in Lesser Britain.<sup>61</sup>

p. 27, and n. 69, p. 34. Also, Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxlix., pp. 97, 98, and n. 154, p. 115.

<sup>54</sup> Jocelyn relates, that this occurred, near Roscommon, in Connaught.

<sup>55</sup> The Fifth Life, lib. ii., cap. xxviii., relates this matter, with some variations. It states, that the animals, in question, were oxen, unyoked from St. Patrick's chariot. It also places the lands, "in campo Hanyr," and, it is said, the sea covered them. The account adds: "Arenosa ergo et infructifera eadem terra facta est a die, qua male dixit eam S. Patricius, usque in hodiernum diem."

<sup>56</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxiv., p. 27. Also, Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cliii., p. 99.

<sup>57</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxv., p. 27. Also Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clv., p. 99.

<sup>58</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. li., p. 25. Also Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xlii., p. 78.

<sup>59</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. ciii., p. 89.

<sup>60</sup> His festival occurs, at the 3rd of March.

<sup>61</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxxii., p. 105. Surius relates the foregoing

The glorious Bishop, with indefatigable labour and preaching, and with marvellous miracles often repeated, converted the whole kingdom of Ireland to the Christian Religion. He consecrated or ordained bishops, priests, and other clerics, in all places, that he thought convenient for his purposes, and the number of those ecclesiastics has been variously estimated. In some ancient accounts, we have no defined number, as in the Third,<sup>62</sup> Fourth<sup>63</sup> and Fifth<sup>64</sup> Lives of the saint. According to Jocelyn, no less than three hundred and fifty bishops<sup>65</sup> he consecrated with his own hands; <sup>66</sup> five thousand<sup>67</sup> did he invest with the holy functions of the priesthood; <sup>68</sup> but, the number of those, that were ordained in minor orders, as also of monks and of nuns professed, was so incalculable, that God alone knew the exact enumeration.<sup>69</sup> As if to accommodate the number of bishops to the days of the year, Nennius, and other writers after him,<sup>70</sup> have 365.<sup>71</sup> Again, the Latin Tripartite Life tells us, that no less than 370 bishops received consecration from him.<sup>72</sup> However, Dr. Lanigan does not think it probable, that such a number of bishops could have been consecrated for the Irish Church,<sup>73</sup> during the lifetime of St. Patrick; and, it is probable enough, the appointment of many, whether as bishops, or as chorepiscopi, must be referable to a period succeeding his Apostolate. The old Catalogue, published by Ussher, does not give the number of three hundred and fifty bishops, only for St. Patrick's time; but, for the whole period, of about one hundred years,<sup>74</sup> that extended to near the end of the reign of King Tuathail, that is, to near A.D. 554. Hence, for such an interval, between bishops, properly so called, and chorepiscopi, about 350 in all might be a very credible number.<sup>75</sup> miracle, in Vita S. Winwallocci, Martii iii. See "De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis," tomus ii., pp. 49 to 54.

<sup>62</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. xciv., p. 29.

<sup>63</sup> It states, "post Episcopos, Præbyteros, Diaconos, reliquosque ordines Ecclesiasticos constitutos," &c. See Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xcvi., p. 47.

<sup>64</sup> Probus, when about relating the death of our Apostle, says, that after St. Patrick had converted a great number of people to the true Faith, he ordained bishops and priests, for their service. We thus read, "post Episcopos et Presbyteros in Ecclesiis ordinatos, post totum Ecclesiasticum ordinem bene ac perfecte compositum," &c. See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxv., p. 60.

<sup>65</sup> To the first order of Irish saints, beginning with St. Patrick, 350 holy bishops are assigned, in an old Catalogue. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 913.

<sup>66</sup> The "Martyrology of Donegal," edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, states: Three hundred and fifty holy bishops, and three hundred priests, was the number, on whom he conferred orders. Thus is it given, in an Irish stanza:—

Seacht ccaoga fánct ríuít earpucc
Ro oiríne in cáó,
Im tpi ceo ciumíteir nóg,
Fóir tóipmág gíao.

Thus is it rendered into English:—

"Seven times fifty holy learned bishops
This holy man consecrated,
With three hundred virgin presbyters,
Upon whom he conferred orders."

<sup>67</sup> This, too, is the number given, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>68</sup> An Irish Franciscan of learning and genius, Father Bonaventure Baron, in an elegant Latin Panegyric on St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, refers to this extent of his labours. See "Opuscula, Prosa et Metro, Argumento etiam Varia," tomus ii., p. 177.

<sup>69</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. clxxxv., p. 106.

<sup>70</sup> See Archbishop Ussher, "De Primordiis," cap. xvii., p. 950.

<sup>71</sup> This is a favourite number, as Bishop Lloyd has observed. See "Historical Account of Church Government, as it was in Great Britain and Ireland, when they first received the Christian Religion," chap. iv., sect. 3, p. 92.

<sup>72</sup> See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. xcvi., p. 167. The Irish Tripartite version states, that he consecrated three hundred and fifty, or three hundred and seventy bishops; and, that he ordained three thousand priests and persons of all other orders, in the Church.

<sup>73</sup> A general ecclesiastical rule prevailed, that bishops were not to be appointed, unless there had been a necessity for their creation.

<sup>74</sup> There can be no doubt, that after St. Patrick's death, the number of bishops increased rapidly, and still more so that of the chorepiscopi. However, in our old Irish documents, these are usually included, under the general denomination of bishops.

The list of St. Patrick's disciples, as furnished by Tirechan, may aid, in some measure, to distinguish some of those primitive bishops, consecrated at this early period. Tirechan's list has been published by Ussher,<sup>76</sup> and their names run as follows: Benignus,<sup>77</sup> Bronus,<sup>78</sup> Sachellus,<sup>79</sup> Cethiacus,<sup>80</sup> Carthacus,<sup>81</sup> Cartenus,<sup>82</sup> Connanus,<sup>83</sup> Firtnanus,<sup>84</sup> Sigeus,<sup>85</sup> Cetennus,<sup>86</sup> Seneaticus,<sup>87</sup> Olcanus,<sup>88</sup> Iborus,<sup>89</sup> Ordus,<sup>90</sup> Nazarius,<sup>91</sup> Miserneus,<sup>92</sup> Senachus,<sup>93</sup> Secundinus,<sup>94</sup> Gosachus,<sup>95</sup> Camulacus,<sup>96</sup> Auxilius,<sup>97</sup> Victorinus,<sup>98</sup> Bressialus,<sup>99</sup> Fiecus,<sup>100</sup> Menathus,<sup>101</sup> Cennanus,<sup>102</sup> Nazarus,<sup>103</sup> Melus,<sup>104</sup> Maceleus,<sup>105</sup> Mac-

<sup>75</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. v., and nn. 30, 31, 32, pp. 334 to 337.

<sup>76</sup> See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 950. This again has been reproduced, by Colgan, in "Trias Thaumaturga," and corrected, in Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 268.

<sup>77</sup> According to Rev. Dr. Lanigan, he was not raised to the episcopacy, during the lifetime of our Apostle. His feast is at the 9th of November. It is extremely doubtful, at what particular time others had been made bishops. The places, with which many were connected, or other particulars referring to them, seem to have eluded investigation.

<sup>78</sup> Bishop of Caisel-iorra, venerated at the 8th of June.

<sup>79</sup> He has not been identified.

<sup>80</sup> He is not known.

<sup>81</sup> Who Charthacus was, we cannot well discover; for, it is hard to believe, that he was the celebrated Charthach, grandson to King Aengus of Cashel, and who, having flourished in the sixth century, was master to the still more celebrated Carthach, or Carthage, of Lismore. Unless we should admit, that there is an error in the list, it may be concluded, that he was a still older Carthach, probably belonging to the same illustrious family, and venerated at the 5th of March.

<sup>82</sup> More correctly Carthennus, or Maccarthennus, Bishop of Clogher, venerated at the 24th of March, and 15th of August.

<sup>83</sup> Several saints, called Conon, or Connan, are found, in our Irish Calendars.

<sup>84</sup> His identity has not been discovered. Colgan suggests, that Finnianus might be the more correct reading—probably Bishop Finnian or Finnbar Hua-Bar-dene, who died A.D. 439.

<sup>85</sup> He is unknown. Colgan says, probably he was Sigenus, venerated on the 21st of January.

<sup>86</sup> His history is not known. Perhaps he was the Cethenus, mentioned in the Latin Tripartite Life, part ii., chap. xli., p. 135.

<sup>87</sup> His identity has not been traced. Perhaps, Senchadhus, who is venerated at the 17th of December.

<sup>88</sup> Most probably, Olcanus, or Bolcanus, venerated at the 20th of February, or on the 2nd of October.

<sup>89</sup> Or Ibarus. Probably, that bishop, venerated on the 23rd of April.

<sup>90</sup> He is not known. Perhaps, Odrinus, or Odranus, venerated, at the 18th of February.

<sup>91</sup> Little is known regarding him. Perhaps, however, he was Nazarius Brito, venerated at the 26th of October.

<sup>92</sup> According to Rev. Dr. Lanigan, Miserneus is probably only another name for Isserninus or Esserenus, and made up in the customary manner by prefixing the endearing letter m. It would appear very strange, if having particularly mentioned Secundinus and Auxilius, Tirechan would have omitted their venerable colleague, Misserminus, or Isserninus.

<sup>93</sup> Several saints are called Senach, or Sinach, in our Irish Calendars.

<sup>94</sup> Or Seachnall, Bishop of Dunshaughlin, venerated on the 27th of November.

<sup>95</sup> Colgan says, this is intended for Guasactus, Bishop of Granard, venerated at the 24th of January.

<sup>96</sup> His history is not known. Perhaps, Caimlacus, or Caimlucius, venerated on the 3rd of November.

<sup>97</sup> Bishop of Killossy, venerated, at the 19th of March, or at the 27th of August.

<sup>98</sup> According to Colgan, this name is intended for Victor. Perhaps, he was the saint, whose festival is assigned to the 28th of February; or, perhaps, to the 17th of November, as being identical with Aenghus, i.e. Buaidhbheo.

<sup>99</sup> His identity has not been discovered. A St. Bressalus is venerated, on the 18th of May, and another so called, at the 30th of September, according to Colgan.

<sup>100</sup> Bishop of Sletty, venerated at the 12th of October.

<sup>101</sup> He is otherwise unknown. Colgan thinks, he may have been Monachus, said to be mentioned in the Latin Tripartite Life, part iii., chap. xciv. However, this is a mistake. Or, he supposes Menathus, to have been a Manchan, venerated on the 14th of February.

<sup>102</sup> He is not known. Perhaps, Bishop Kianen of Duleek.

<sup>103</sup> His history is not known.

<sup>104</sup> Or Mel, Bishop of Ardagh, venerated on the 6th of February.

<sup>105</sup> Colgan says, perhaps he was Macetus,

taeus,<sup>106</sup> Culeneus,<sup>107</sup> Asacus,<sup>108</sup> Bitheus,<sup>109</sup> Falertus,<sup>110</sup> Seseneus,<sup>111</sup> Muirethchiser,<sup>112</sup> Temoreris,<sup>113</sup> Daigreus,<sup>114</sup> Justinus mac hua Daimene,<sup>115</sup> Olteanus,<sup>116</sup> Domnallus, with many others.<sup>117</sup> It does not appear from Tirechan, that all of these were bishops;<sup>118</sup> since, he only calls them disciples of St. Patrick.<sup>119</sup>

A list<sup>120</sup> of the twenty-four persons, who formed the household of St. Patrick, is found among our ancient Irish Manuscripts. Thus, in the Book of Ballymote,<sup>121</sup> as also in that of Lecan,<sup>122</sup> a list of the chief persons of St. Patrick's own family is contained.<sup>123</sup> The Book of Lecan contains, likewise, the names of converts to the preaching of St. Patrick.<sup>124</sup> Again, do we meet with a Poem,<sup>125</sup> on the office-holders in the household of St. Patrick. The Officials and Members of St. Patrick's family are thus commemorated, in the translation of an Irish Poem,<sup>126</sup> as set forth in the following terms:—

or Maccetus, about whom the Latin Tripartite Life treats, at part ii., chap. xli., p. 135, and at part iii., chap. xcvi., p. 167.

<sup>106</sup> Some of St. Patrick's disciples were not advanced to the episcopacy, until after their illustrious master's death. For instance, Mactaleus, who was Bishop of Kilcullen, must have been very young, when St. Patrick died. It is related, that he lived until A.D. 549. His feast is at the 11th of June. Even supposing he had not lived so long, he could not have been bishop there, until after the death of Isserminus, in the year 469. See Ussher's "Index Chronologicus," ad A.D. cccclix. and cccclxix.

<sup>107</sup> Colgan thinks his feast was at the 18th of February. Might Culeneus, have been the same as St. Mac-Culindus, asks Dr. Lanigan, and who is said to have been Bishop of Lusk, where his memory was celebrated, on the 6th of September, and he is said to have died, in 497? See Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other Principal Saints," vol. ix., at the 6th of September, and Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," county of Dublin, at Lusk. Also "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. v., n. 36, pp. 337, 338.

<sup>108</sup> Probably, the same as Assacus, or Assichus, Bishop of Elphin, and venerated on the 27th of April.

<sup>109</sup> Probably, Bite, the son of Assicus, already mentioned in St. Patrick's Acts. There is a St. Biteus, Abbot of Inis-Cumhraidhe, now Inishcoursy, at the 22nd of July.

<sup>110</sup> The proper rendering is said to be Fulertus, Felartus, or Fulartus. He is not known.

<sup>111</sup> He was probably the Sezinus, or Sezni, according to Dr. Lanigan, of Guic-Sezni, in Britany. Colgan says, the name should be Sesenus, venerated at the 31st of August.

<sup>112</sup> His place in our history is not known, although Colgan thinks, he may have been Murdhebar, venerated on the 3rd of November.

<sup>113</sup> To this we find added, "qui fundavit ecclesiam sanctam Cairce (Cairrec), quam tenuit familia Clonoauis." Colgan thinks he may have been St. Morthennis, or Domorthennis—also called Orthinus, Bishop—who is venerated on the 11th of January.

<sup>114</sup> Colgan states, that he was venerated, on the 30th of September, at Cluain Accair.

<sup>115</sup> Instead of Justinus mac Hy-Daimene, according to Dr. Lanigan, read, Justinus Mac-hua Daimene, that is, a person belonging to the family of Daimene, who was no other than St. Endeus of Arran, venerated on the 21st of March. See, also, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 268.

<sup>116</sup> Or Olcanus. Whether he differs from the former so named, or not, is unascertained.

<sup>117</sup> There is a St. Domhnall, at the 16th of April. Afterwards, is added, "et alii quamplurimi." By these words, it is reasonable to presume, that Tirechan alludes, not to the whole nation, but merely to St. Patrick's particular disciples.

<sup>118</sup> However, Ussher seems to speak of these disciples, as if they were all bishops, and living in St. Patrick's time. See "De Primordiis Ecclesiarum Britannicarum," cap. xvii., p. 950. But Dr. Lanigan thinks, it cannot be admitted, that there were then about eighty bishops in Ireland.

<sup>119</sup> When quoting Tirechan's Catalogue, Colgan calls them simply disciples; and, he mentions the festival days of several among them, yet without giving them the title of bishop.

<sup>120</sup> A copy of this is to be seen, in the Leabhar Breac, at fol. 110 (now 99), b. b.

<sup>121</sup> At fol. 119, a. col. 2, line 42.

<sup>122</sup> At fol. 44 b. col. 3, line 36.

<sup>123</sup> Also, in the Royal Irish Academy's Manuscript, classed 23. D. 9., at p. 6.

<sup>124</sup> At fol. 113, a. col. 3.

<sup>125</sup> This is in the Book of Lecan, at fol. 44, b. col. 4 line 12. See, also, the Manuscript, classed 23. E. 26, at p. 240, in the Royal Irish Academy.

<sup>126</sup> This is to be found, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 134 to 141, with illustrative notes, and the Irish text. It may be compared, likewise,

"The family of Patrick<sup>127</sup> of the prayers, who had good Latin, I remember; no feeble court [were they], their order, and their names. Sechnall,<sup>128</sup> his bishop without fault; Mochta<sup>129</sup> after him his priest; Bishop Erc<sup>130</sup> his sweet-spoken judge; <sup>131</sup> his champion, Bishop Mac-caeirthinn; <sup>132</sup> Benen, his psalmist; <sup>133</sup> and Coemhan,<sup>134</sup> his chamberlain; Sinell<sup>135</sup> his bell-ringer, and Aithcen<sup>136</sup> his true cook; The priest Mescan,<sup>137</sup> without evil, his friend and his brewer; The priest Bescna,<sup>138</sup> sweet his verses, the chaplain of the son of Alprann. His three smiths,<sup>139</sup> expert at shaping, <sup>140</sup> Macecht, Laebhan,<sup>141</sup> and Fortchern.<sup>142</sup> with the statement, in the Latin Tripartite Life, part iii., chap. xcvi., p. 167, and nn. 120 to 135, p. 188. See, also, Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick," &c., p. 501.

<sup>127</sup> This poem is very incorrectly deciphered and translated by Dr. O'Connor. His errors are corrected in this edition of it, from a fuller and better copy, preserved in the Book of Lecan, fol. 44. b, and from a prose list of the twenty-four persons, constituting the household of St. Patrick, prefixed to it. A list of the principal persons, mentioned in his poem, is also given, in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, lib. iii., cap. 98, p. 167.

<sup>128</sup> He is already mentioned, in Tirechan's list.

<sup>129</sup> His feast is assigned, to the 24th of March.

<sup>130</sup> Bishop of Slane, and venerated on the 2nd of November.

<sup>131</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life calls him a Brehon.

<sup>132</sup> Already alluded to, as Bishop of Clogher. The Irish Tripartite Life calls him "St. Patrick's strong man."

<sup>133</sup> Already alluded to as St. Benignus.

<sup>134</sup> His identity has not been discovered. In the Irish Tripartite Life, he is called Caemhan of Cill-Ruada, and St. Patrick's youth.

<sup>135</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls him, "Senellus de Kildareis, Campanarius." The Irish Tripartite corresponds. In the prose list, preserved in the Book of Lecan, he is called, Σινελλος Κηλδαιος ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, i.e. "Sinell of Killairis, his Ostiarius." Perhaps, he is the same as the Senellus Senior, or Sineal, said to have been venerated, at the 12th of January, or at the 12th of September. Other saints, so called, are in our Calendars.

<sup>136</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls him, "Athgenius de Leath-donnaich, coquus." The Irish Tripartite corresponds. He is the patron saint of Badoney church, near Strabane, county of Tyrone.

<sup>137</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls him, "Sanctus Meschanus de Domnach" [Mescain] "juxta Fochmuine fluvium, Cerviciarius." The word in brackets, omitted by Colgan, has been supplied from the Book of Lecan. His church, not yet identified, was situated, near the River Faughan, in the county of Londonderry. The Irish Tripartite Life calls him, Cruimther Mesean, from Domhnach-Mescan, at Fochan, his brewer.

<sup>138</sup> In the Latin Tripartite Life, we read: "Sanctus Beschna præsbyter de Domnach-dala, Sacellanus." The church, called Domnach-Dula, in the prose list of the Book of Lecan, was in the plain of Maghdala, through which the Moyola river, in the county of Londonderry, flows. The Irish Tripartite Life has it, Cruimther Bescna, from Domhnach-Dala, his Mass-priest.

<sup>139</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life states, "Sanctus Maccectus de Domnach-leobain, qui reliquiarium illud famosum Frim-faid-heach nuncupatum fabricavit, et Sanctus Fortchernus de Rath-aidne duo fabri ferrarii." However, Dr. O'Donovan thus corrects the text, on the authority of the Book of Lecan, inserting these words within brackets after Maccectus [de Domnach-Arnoin et Sanctus Leobanus]—qui, &c. He concludes: "et Sanctus Fortchernus de Rath-Semni, tres fabri ferrarii." The Irish Tripartite Life has it: his three smiths, Mac Cecht, Laeban from Domhnach-Laebhan (who made the Findfaithnech), and Fortchern in Rath-Adine.

<sup>140</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life has it, the smiths making the bells, i.e., Mac Cecht, and Cuana, and Mac Fail.

<sup>141</sup> Two saints, called Leaban, are noted in our Calendars. One St. Leoban of Ath-Eguis was venerated, on the 1st of June; and the other, on the 9th of August. Domhnach-Leobain was called Cill-Leobain, in Colgan's time, and it was a parish church, in the diocese of Clonfert. Dr. O'Donovan identifies it, as Killian.

<sup>142</sup> The Latin Tripartite has "Sanctus Fortchernus de Rath-aidne, faber ferrarius," but the Book of Lecan, in the prose list, has him of Rath Semhni. His festival was celebrated, on the 11th of October, at Cill-Fortchern, in Idrone, county of Carlow, and at Trim, in the county of Meath.

<sup>143</sup> Thus are they named, in the Latin Tripartite: "Sanctus Essa, Sanctus Biteus ac

His three artificers,<sup>143</sup> of great endowment, Aesbuite,<sup>144</sup> Tairill,<sup>145</sup> and Tasach.<sup>146</sup>

His three embroiderers,<sup>147</sup> not despicable, Lupaid, Erca, and Cruimthiris.<sup>148</sup>

Odhran,<sup>149</sup> his charioteer, without blemish, Rodan,<sup>150</sup> son of Braga, his shepherd.

Ippis,<sup>151</sup> Tigris, and Erca, and Liamhain, with Eibeachta :

For them Patrick excelled in wonders, for them he was truly miraculous. Carniuch<sup>152</sup> was the priest that baptized him ; German<sup>153</sup> his tutor, without blemish.

The priest Manach,<sup>154</sup> of great endowment, was his man for supplying wood.

His sister's son<sup>155</sup> was Banban, of fame ; Martin<sup>156</sup> his mother's brother.

Sanctus Tassa, tres fabri ærarii, vasorumque sacrorum fabricatores." In the prose list of the Book of Lecan, these are called Εἰρη, Βίτε, and Τάσαν. The authority given for that list is Flann's poem ; yet, here, they are called Διγμυτε, Ταιρill, Τάσac.

<sup>144</sup> Colgan thinks this Essa a corruption for Ossa, or Ossan, as St. Patrick had a disciple so called, at Trim.

<sup>145</sup> This name is found only in Flann's poem.

<sup>146</sup> This was not Bishop Tassach of Ratholp, near Downpatrick, who administered the Viaticum to St. Patrick, but Assagh, Bishop of Elphin, according to the Book of Armagh, in Sir William Betham's translation. In the Irish Tripartite Life, we find an account of the artificers making the dishes and reliquaries, and the altar chalices, viz., Tassach, and Essa, and Bitiu.

<sup>147</sup> "Sancta Lupita, Tigrida, et Crumtheris textrices et sacrorum linteorum erant confectrices," according to the Latin Tripartite Life. In the prose list in the Book of Lecan, they are named thus : "Δ ἐπι οὔνηνεχα .i. λυπαίω, 7 ἐρε, ἰngen Δαίρη, 7 Crumtheary, i.e. Lupaid, and Erc, daughter of Dairi, and Crumtheris." The Lupaid here mentioned was Lupita, Patrick's own sister. Erc, the daughter of Dairi, was no other than Erganata, the daughter of Dairi, King of Oirther, who granted Armagh to Saint Patrick. Crumtheris was a lady of royal birth, who lived in solitude, on the hill of Kenngobha, to the east of Armagh.

<sup>148</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life mentions somewhat differently, those nuns, making the altar-cloths, viz., Cochmass, and Tigris, and Lupait, and Darerca. And, again, it states, that St. Patrick's three embroiderers were Lupait, and Erc, daughter of Daire, and Cruimthiris, in Cenn-Gobha.

<sup>149</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls him : "Sanctus Odranus de Disert-Odrain in Hifalgia, auriga," and the Irish Tripartite corresponds. These perfectly agree with the prose list, in the Book of Lecan : "Οδραν ὁ Οἰρετ Οδραν Δ ἕλλα ἀράδ." He is mentioned, in the Lives of St. Patrick, as published by Colgan.

<sup>150</sup> Dr. O'Connor prints this Rochan. The Latin Tripartite Life calls him, "Sanctus Rodanus, Armentarius." The Irish Tripartite Life corresponds. In the prose list, in the Book of Lecan, he is called "Ροδαν Δ βυαδαίλ."

<sup>151</sup> These are said to have been the five sisters of St. Patrick ; but, Dr. Lanigan has attempted to show, that St. Patrick had no real sisters in Ireland ; and, he thinks, that these were religious women, who were called his sisters, in a spiritual, and not in a carnal, sense. See his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iii., sect. xviii., pp. 125, 126.

<sup>152</sup> It is so printed, by Dr. O'Connor, who says in a note : "Omnes vitæ vetustiores eum appellat Gorniam." In the copy of Flann's poem, preserved in the Book of Lecan, the reading is : "Σορμαρ ἰν ρακαρτ ρο βαίρε, i.e. Gornias the priest who baptized him."

<sup>153</sup> All the Lives of Patrick agree, that St. Germanus was his tutor. Colgan attempts to show, that Patrick had been under his tuition so early as the year 396 ; but, the acute Dr. Lanigan clearly proves, that Patrick could not have been under the direction of St. German, before the year 418. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. x., p. 161.

<sup>154</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life calls him : "Sanctus Monachus præsbyter focaris lignorumque provisor." In the prose list, in the Book of Lecan, he is called "Crumtheary manac Δ ρεαρ βέννη connaí, i.e. Crumther Manach, his provider of wood." The Irish Tripartite Life has him, as Crumther Manach, his wood-man. His identity does not seem to be clearly established.

<sup>155</sup> In the copy of Flann's poem, in the Book of Lecan, the reading is, "Seannan Δ βραταίρ co mblaδ, i.e. Seannan was his brother" [or cousin] "of fame." Neither name has been identified with true history ; and, it is more than probable, that both owe their existence to the errors of transcribers.

<sup>156</sup> In the Tripartite Life, it is stated, that Conchessa, St. Patrick's mother, was the sister or relative of St. Martin : "Con-

Most sapient was the youth Mochonnoc,<sup>157</sup> his hospitaller.
Cribri and Lasra,<sup>158</sup> of mantles, beautiful daughters of Gleaghrrann.

Doorway of Temple-Patrick old Church, Inchagoill, County of Galway.

Macraith the wise, and Erc,<sup>159</sup>—he prophesied in his three wills.
Brogan,<sup>160</sup> the scribe of his school; the priest Logha,<sup>161</sup> his helmsman,— chessa Ecbatii filia ex Francis oriunda, et S. Martini soror, seu cognata, ejus mater fuit.”—Lib. i., cap. i., p. 117.

<sup>157</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life has noticed : “Sanctus Catanus præsbyter, et Ocanotus præsbyter duo hospitalarii, sive hospitum ministri.” The Irish Tripartite has it : Cruimther Catan, and Cruimther Ocan, his two waiters. In the prose list, in the Book of Lecan, the reading is : “Cruimther Cáoán ó Tamlaéctain arda, 7 Cruimther mbrogaín a sa forméir; i.e. Priest Cadan of Tamlaghtard, and Priest Brogan, his two waiters.” The memory of St. Cadan, or Catanus, is still held in great veneration, in the parish of Tamlaghtard, or Ardmagilligan, in the barony of Keenaght, and county of Londonderry. Colgan gives the Acts of Mochonnoc, at 11th February, and states, that he flourished, about A.D. 492; but, Dr. Lanigan shows, that he lived at a much later period. See his “Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. i., chap. viii., sect. xv., p. 425. The Brogan of the prose list, in the Book of Lecan, is evidently intended for Brocan, or Brocanus, one of the nephews of St. Patrick, mentioned in the Latin Tripartite Life. See pars. ii., cap. ii., lii., pp. 129, 136.

<sup>158</sup> These are called Crebrea and Lassera, in the Tripartite Life, where it is stated, that they were the daughters of Glerannus, son of Cumineus, and that they lived, at the church of Kill-Forclann, near Killala. See pars. ii., cap. lxxxvi., p. 141. Dr. O’Conor, with this evidence before him, translates Gleaghrrann, by “candidæ,” as if it were an epithet of the virgins, and not their father’s name.

<sup>159</sup> The text is clearly corrupt here, and the copy in the Book of Lecan affords no clue to the correction of it.

<sup>160</sup> He was the Brocanus, nephew of St. Patrick, mentioned by Jocelyn, in his Life of St. Patrick, chap. 50, and said to have been venerated, at the 8th of July, and at the 17th of September.

<sup>161</sup> In the copy of Flann’s poem, in the Book of Lecan, he is called Cruimther Lugna, which is more correct. His tombstone is still preserved near Templepatrick, or Patrick’s church, on the island of Insi-Goill, in Lough C-rrib, with the following inscription : “Ue Lugnaeson macc lmenueh, i.e. the stone of Lugna Don, son of Lemenuch.” This inscription was discovered by Dr. Petrie, who published a fac-simile of it, in his “Ecclesiastical Architecture and Round Towers of Ireland,” part ii., sect. iii., subs. i., p. 165. It is the oldest literal monument yet discovered in Ireland. It establishes the existence of Lugna, and Lemenuch, beyond dispute; but, nothing of

It is not a thing unsung—and Machui<sup>162</sup> his true fosterson.

Good the man whose great family they were, to whom God gave a crozier without sorrow;

Chiefs with whom the bells are heard, a good family was the family of Patrick.

May the Trinity,<sup>163</sup> which is powerful over all, distribute to us the boon of great love;

The king who, moved by soft Latin, redeemed by Patrick's prayer."<sup>164</sup>

A list of St. Patrick's successors,<sup>165</sup> in the See of Armagh, is extant,<sup>166</sup> among our Irish Manuscripts. These names, we have already given, in a previous note.

Besides those disciples, enumerated in the foregoing lists, the following persons are noticed, in St. Patrick's various Lives: The Senior Kienan;<sup>167</sup> Dichuo,<sup>168</sup> Ross<sup>169</sup> or Rus, Durtract<sup>170</sup> or Durthact, Niell,<sup>171</sup> Eugenius,<sup>172</sup> and Ailill,<sup>173</sup> brothers; Loarn,<sup>174</sup> Bishop of Inreattan or Brettan; Nesson,<sup>175</sup> Deacon of Mungarett; Trian,<sup>176</sup> Bishop of Croebheach; Winnoc,<sup>177</sup> Bishop of Rath-espuic; Maguil or Macaldus,<sup>178</sup> Bishop of Man; Albeus,<sup>179</sup> Bishop a similar antiquity has been discovered, to prove their relationship to the Irish Apostle. The accompanying illustration of Templepatrick was drawn on the spot, by William F. Wakeman, and transferred to the wood. It was engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>162</sup> He was St. Mochai, of Endrom, in Loch Cuan, one of St. Patrick's earliest converts, to whom he gave a copy of the Gospels, and what was called a Ministeir, or portable reliquary: "Baptizavit eum ac totondit, et dedit ei Evangelium et Ministeir."—Vita Sec. cap. 32. His feast occurs, at the 23rd of June.

<sup>163</sup> In the Book of Lecan, the poem of Flann, on St. Patrick's household, concludes thus:—

"A nimpriú rín le flann, co nua fochraic can impall,
Co mne ier plaicib nime, ac maithib na muinte." "

"These" [saints] "are implored by Flann, that he may obtain reward without doubt,

With meekness amongst the nobles of heaven through the chiefs of this family."

Dr. O'Connor says, that he does not know whence the Four Masters copied this poem, It is not contained, in either of the Dublin copies, and Dr. O'Connor's printed copy of it is corrupted, to agree with his own idea of the meaning. The copy of Flann's poem, preserved in the Book of Lecan, fol. 44, b., is much better and more copious, and it contains the names of several officers of Patrick's household, not mentioned in Evin's list, or even in the prose list, prefixed to the poem itself, in the Book of Lecan, such as Cromdumhan, his mucaróe, or swineherd; his three builders, Caemhan, Cruithnech, and Luchraidh; his three physicians, Sechnan, Ogma, and Aithemail; his librarian, Setna, the pious, son of Corcran, &c., &c. Ussher quotes this poem, in "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 895, as written in very ancient Irish verses, giving a catalogue of St. Patrick's domestics, and as authority for the existence of a Senex Patricius, ceano a rruicthi renoirach, who died, according to the Annals of Connaught, in the year 454.

<sup>164</sup> After enumerating the four-and-twenty, that were in orders with St. Patrick, the Irish Tripartite Life says, this is the number that were in the company of Joseph; and, it was the number that had been allowed, at the table of the King of Cashel, down from the time of Fedhlimidh, son of Crimthann, i.e. the King of the two provinces of Munster.

<sup>165</sup> See the Manuscript of the Royal Irish Academy, which is classed, 23. P. 16. fol. 99, b. See also the MS., classed H. 2. 16., belonging to Trinity College, Dublin.

<sup>166</sup> See the "Leabhar Breac," at fol. 110, (now 99), b. b.

<sup>167</sup> Bishop of Duleek, venerated at the 29th of November.

<sup>168</sup> Son of Trichem, and monk at Saul, venerated at the 29th of April.

<sup>169</sup> Or Ruisen. Venerated at the 7th of April.

<sup>170</sup> Said to be of Ændruim.

<sup>171</sup> Said to have been of Kill-clethe.

<sup>172</sup> Said to be of Kill-clethe.

<sup>173</sup> Said to have been Archbishop of Armagh, and venerated, on the 13th of January.

<sup>174</sup> A feast is assigned him at the 11th of September,

<sup>175</sup> Venerated the 25th of July.

<sup>176</sup> Said to have been venerated, at the 23rd of March.

<sup>177</sup> Said to have been Uindic, of Tuighnetha, venerated on the 29th of August.

<sup>178</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 25th of April.

<sup>179</sup> His feast is kept, on the 12th of September.

of Emly; Setna or Sedonius,<sup>180</sup> Bishop; Coindrius or Conderius,<sup>181</sup> and Romulus,<sup>182</sup> Bishops in Man; Dunnus or Modunius,<sup>183</sup> Abbot of Saul; Loman,<sup>184</sup> Bishop of Trim; Brochad<sup>185</sup> of Imleacheach; Mogenoc,<sup>186</sup> Bishop of Kill-dumha-gluin; Munis,<sup>187</sup> Bishop of Kill-teidil; Mel,<sup>188</sup> Bishop of Ardagh; Melchuo,<sup>189</sup> Bishop of Ardagh; Munis,<sup>190</sup> Bishop of Forgney; Rioc,<sup>191</sup> Abbot of Inis-bofinde; Nectan,<sup>192</sup> Bishop of Kill-unche, and of Kill-fionnauair; Beana or Dabonna,<sup>193</sup> Bishop of Cluain-namanach; Mogornan<sup>194</sup> or Mogerman, Bishop; Darioc,<sup>195</sup> Bishop of Inis-ualaing; Lugnat,<sup>196</sup> a priest; Carantoc or Carnech,<sup>197</sup> Bishop of Tulen, in Meath; Crumman,<sup>198</sup> Bishop of Lecan, in Meath; Maccalleus,<sup>199</sup> Bishop of Cruachan-Brigh-Ele; Migdna,<sup>200</sup> Bishop of Disert-Patruic; Diernitius,<sup>201</sup> Bishop of Drumensis; Comitius or Connetus,<sup>202</sup> Bishop of Cluain-Senmoil; Fortchern,<sup>203</sup> Bishop of Trim; Cathlaidus or Cathaldus,<sup>204</sup> Bishop of Trim; Manchen,<sup>205</sup> surnamed the Master, Bishop of Trawley; Connedus,<sup>206</sup> a Priest of Domnach-airthir; Germanus,<sup>207</sup> Bishop of Man; Lugacius,<sup>208</sup> Bishop of Kill-airthir; Columba or Columbus,<sup>209</sup> of Kill-eainain; Meldan,<sup>210</sup> Bishop of Cluain-creamha; Lugadius,<sup>211</sup> Bishop of Fordhruim; Cessan,<sup>212</sup> Bishop of Domnach-mor; Ceran or Kieran,<sup>213</sup> Bishop of Saighir; Corbmac,<sup>214</sup> Bishop of Trim; Ailveus or Ailbeus,<sup>215</sup> Priest, of Sen-Chua; Mac Erca,<sup>216</sup> Priest of Kill-roa; Dovengard

<sup>180</sup> Supposed to have had a festival, at the 16th of June.

<sup>181</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 17th of November.

<sup>182</sup> His festival was held, as supposed, on the 18th of November.

<sup>183</sup> His feast has been placed, at the 29th of May.

<sup>184</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 17th of February.

<sup>185</sup> He is venerated, at the 9th of July.

<sup>186</sup> His feast is assigned, to the 26th of December.

<sup>187</sup> His feast was held, on the 6th of February, and on the 18th of December.

<sup>188</sup> His feast is at the 6th of February.

<sup>189</sup> His feast is at the 6th of February.

<sup>190</sup> He is said to have been venerated, on the 6th of February.

<sup>191</sup> His festival is at the 6th of February.

<sup>192</sup> His feast is at the 2nd of May.

<sup>193</sup> Supposed, by Colgan, to rest at Glas-tonbury, in England.

<sup>194</sup> He is said to have been a brother to St. Sechnall.

<sup>195</sup> He was a brother to the foregoing.

<sup>196</sup> A brother to the preceding.

<sup>197</sup> Said to have had a feast, at the 16th of May. He is thought to have been a British prince, who had been selected to succeed his father in a principality. But, St. Carantoc was impelled by Divine inspiration to follow another course. He crossed over into Ireland, being attracted by the fame of St. Patrick, who was then labouring there. He became a zealous coadjutor of the great Irish Apostle, and for many years, he fulfilled all the duties of his ministry, converting innumerable souls, by his preaching and miracles, to the Faith of Christ. Therefore, he is classed, among the Irish Apostle's faithful servants.

<sup>198</sup> His festival is referred, to the 28th of June.

<sup>199</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 25th of April.

<sup>200</sup> The son of Darerca, said to have had a feast, at the 4th of August, or at the 18th of November, in the church of Killucan.

<sup>201</sup> Said to have been Darerca's son, and to have had a feast, at the 15th of January, or at the 12th of December.

<sup>202</sup> Colgan thinks, he may have been the Connatus or Condatus, venerated at the 15th of November.

<sup>203</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 17th of February.

<sup>204</sup> Colgan supposes, he may have been a Cathbath, venerated on the 1st of July, or at the 16th of September.

<sup>205</sup> Among the many saints of this name, he, who is denominated the Master, has not been ascertained.

<sup>206</sup> A doubt exists, regarding his identification, in our Calendars.

<sup>207</sup> Colgan says, he was venerated, at the 3rd of July.

<sup>208</sup> Colgan assigns his feast, to the 2nd of March, or to the 16th of June.

<sup>209</sup> He is said to have been venerated, at the 4th of June.

<sup>210</sup> His festival has been placed, at the 18th of January, or at the 26th of October.

<sup>211</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 17th of April.

<sup>212</sup> The 4th of June is said to have been his feast day.

<sup>213</sup> His feast is held, on the 5th of March.

<sup>214</sup> His festival occurs, on the 17th of February.

<sup>215</sup> He is venerated, on the 30th of January.

<sup>216</sup> Said to have been venerated, on the 18th of November.

or Domangart,<sup>217</sup> Bishop of Rath-murbuilg; Senach,<sup>218</sup> Bishop of Achadh-fouair; Lonan,<sup>219</sup> Priest, of Kill-uaillech; Colman or Colmanellus,<sup>220</sup> Bishop and Abbot of Lann-ela; Patrick Junior,<sup>221</sup> the great St. Patrick's nephew; the Leper,<sup>222</sup> with name unknown; Cathaseus,<sup>223</sup> Priest, of Domnach Patruic; Cathur or Catharr,<sup>224</sup> and Cathneus,<sup>225</sup> brothers-german to Cathaseus; Moluanus the Pilgrim or Daluan,<sup>226</sup> probably of Croebhach and of Druim-inescluinn; Lugad,<sup>227</sup> Bishop of Druim-inescluinn; Lugad,<sup>228</sup> Priest, of Tegh-Laisren; Moluan,<sup>229</sup> the Briton, of Tegh-bretan, and of Imlech-inis-chuainn; Mac-Dichuill,<sup>230</sup> Priest, of Cluain-chaoin; Domnalis or Domnaldus,<sup>231</sup> Bishop of Ailech-mor; Buadmaelus<sup>232</sup> of Kill-Buadhmoel; Maneus,<sup>233</sup> Bishop; Briteus,<sup>234</sup> Bishop of Cassel-irra; Fulartus,<sup>235</sup> Bishop of Domnach-mor; Macetus,<sup>236</sup> Priest of Sencheall; Cethenus or Cethecus;<sup>237</sup> Olcan,<sup>238</sup> Priest of Kill-mor; Carell,<sup>239</sup> Bishop; Coeman,<sup>240</sup> Deacon of Seanndomnah; Cethecus,<sup>241</sup> Bishop of Kill-garadh; Congellanus,<sup>242</sup> Abbot; Justus,<sup>243</sup> Deacon in Fidhard; Bernicius,<sup>244</sup> a Gaul; Hibernicus,<sup>245</sup> and Ernicius<sup>246</sup> brothers of Bernicius; Nine of their brothers,<sup>247</sup> who were Francks; Sacellus,<sup>248</sup> Bishop of Baisleac; Benignus,<sup>249</sup> brother of St. Cethach; Brochad;<sup>250</sup>

<sup>217</sup> His feast occurs, on the 24th of March.

<sup>218</sup> His festival has been assigned, to the 10th of September.

<sup>219</sup> His feast is held, on the 12th of November.

<sup>220</sup> His festival is at the 26th of September.

<sup>221</sup> Some of our Calendarists have his feast, at the 24th of August; but, according to the "Felire" of St. Ængus, this is the festival of Sen-Patrick, the preceptor of the great St. Patrick.

<sup>222</sup> He is mentioned, in the Latin Tripartite Life, lib. i., cap. xl., p. 123, and lib. ii., cap. xxiv., p. 132.

<sup>223</sup> Colgan has not been able, clearly to identify him.

<sup>224</sup> Colgan has not been able, clearly to identify him.

<sup>225</sup> Perhaps, says Colgan, he may be the Cota or Cotana, venerated, on the 4th of February. See the Latin Tripartite Life, lib. ii., cap. vi., p. 130, and n. 22, p. 173.

<sup>226</sup> His feast is held, on the 7th of January.

<sup>227</sup> His festival is at the 2nd of November.

<sup>228</sup> His feast-day has not been noted, although Colgan thinks it was at the 17th of April.

<sup>229</sup> Venerated at the 7th of January, and probably not distinct from the former Daluan.

<sup>230</sup> Colgan thinks, he was the same as St. Aedhan, the son of Deigill, venerated on the 1st of January.

<sup>231</sup> Colgan has a long dissertation, to discover his identity, but without any very successful result, in the Latin Tripartite Life, pars. ii., cap. xviii., cxxiv., pp. 131, 146, nn. 55, 184, pp. 175, 181.

<sup>232</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Benignus, chap. xi. His feast-day is not known.

<sup>233</sup> His feast occurs, at the 2nd of September.

<sup>234</sup> He was venerated, Colgan states, at the 22nd of July, as Biteus, i.e. Mobiu, or at the 30th of September, as Mobi. But, the latter was a nun, of Domhnach, probably Donnybrook.

<sup>235</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>236</sup> His festival has not been discovered.

<sup>237</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>238</sup> He is said, to have been venerated, on the 4th of June, but, most probably, on the 20th of February.

<sup>239</sup> Colgan says, he was venerated, on the 13th of July.

<sup>240</sup> His feast has not been fixed, except by Colgan, who erroneously assigns it to the 3rd of November.

<sup>241</sup> His festival was kept, on the 16th of June.

<sup>242</sup> Many saints, bearing this name, are found in our Calendars; but, the present holy man has not been identified.

<sup>243</sup> Colgan has not been able to determine who he was, but suspects, he may have been venerated, either at the 10th of January, or at the 29th of July, as Justan Lene.

<sup>244</sup> His identity has not been traced, in our Calendars.

<sup>245</sup> Not known, in our Calendars.

<sup>246</sup> Not known, in our Calendars.

<sup>247</sup> Colgan conjectures, these and the foregoing may have been among the Francks or Gauls, invoked by St. Ængus, in his Book of Litanies, num. 48, 49, 50.

<sup>248</sup> Unless he was a Sacellus, or Socellus, named in St. Berach's Acts, at the 15th of February, Colgan could not discover who he had been.

<sup>249</sup> Colgan distinguishes him, from the Archbishop of Armagh, and calls him, Abbot of Druimlias. It is supposed, he may be identical, with a St. Benatius, vene-

Bronach,<sup>251</sup> a Priest ; Coeman,<sup>252</sup> of Airdne Coemain ; Canna,<sup>253</sup> a Monk ; Loarn,<sup>254</sup> Priest of Achadh-mor ; Conan,<sup>255</sup> a Priest ; Senach,<sup>256</sup> a Bishop of Achadh-Fobuir ; Ængus<sup>257</sup> of Kill-mor ; Cannech,<sup>258</sup> a Priest ; Mucna or Muckinus,<sup>259</sup> a Bishop ; Teloc,<sup>260</sup> a Priest ; Domnald,<sup>261</sup> a Bishop ; Muredach,<sup>262</sup> Bishop of Killala ; Mac Rimius,<sup>263</sup> Bishop of Corca-raoidhe ; the seven sons<sup>264</sup> of Drogen ; Gemthenn<sup>265</sup> of Each-enach ; Dubduban,<sup>266</sup> of Domnach Mor ; Ængus,<sup>267</sup> Bishop of Domnach-Bile, or Magbile ; Maccarthenn,<sup>268</sup> Bishop of Domnach-mor Muige-tochuir ; Three Deacons,<sup>269</sup> nephews of St. Patrick, in Innishowen ; Ængus,<sup>270</sup> son of Ailild, of Druimberta ; Domnald,<sup>271</sup> son of Crimthann, Bishop of Ailech-mor ; Domnald,<sup>272</sup> son to Colgna, Bishop of Tulach-liag ; Domnaid,<sup>273</sup> Bishop of Cuil-chonalta ; Beoadus,<sup>274</sup> Bishop of Dun-cruithen ; Macnessius,<sup>275</sup> Bishop of Connor ; Cathbad,<sup>276</sup> Priest, of Foth-rath ; Diman,<sup>277</sup> a Monk ; Erclacius,<sup>278</sup> Priest of Kill-muadhain ; Nehemias,<sup>279</sup> Bishop of Tulach ; Enan,<sup>280</sup> of Druim-indich ; Two Cennans ;<sup>281</sup> Fiachrius,<sup>282</sup> Bishop of Cuil-echtrann ; Glassius,<sup>283</sup> of Kill-glais ; Liberius,<sup>284</sup> Priest, of Kill-glais ; Daniel,<sup>285</sup> surnamed the Angel, of Lettir-Padruic ; Molasrius,<sup>286</sup> of Glaire ; Coeman,<sup>287</sup> of Imleach-cluana ; Brugacius,<sup>288</sup> Bishop of Rath-muighe ; Coirbreus,<sup>289</sup> Bishop of Colerain ; Columban,<sup>290</sup> Priest, of Domnach Mór ; Conedus,<sup>291</sup> Priest, of Domnach rated at Kill-chuile, in the deanery of Sil-muiredhaidh, and diocese of Elphin, on the 3rd of April.

<sup>250</sup> Of Imlech-each, and brother of St. Loman. His church was in the deanery of Siol-Muiredhaigh, and diocese of Elphin. His festival is not known.

<sup>251</sup> His festival is not known.

<sup>252</sup> His feast was held, on the 12th of June.

<sup>253</sup> Said to have been a brother of St. Sacellus, and he is called faber, or artifex. His feast is not known.

<sup>254</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 30th of August.

<sup>255</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>256</sup> His feast has been referred, by Colgan, to the 10th of September.

<sup>257</sup> Said to have been a son to the former, and Colgan thinks his feast was held, on the 17th of November, where he is found, in Marianus O'Gorman's Calendar, as Ængus Aine, of Cill-mor.

<sup>258</sup> Colgan has a conjecture, that he may have been the Cainneach, venerated at the 23rd of January, or the Cainneach, son of Ua Chil, a Priest, venerated on the 31st of the same month.

<sup>259</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 4th of March.

<sup>260</sup> His feast has not been discovered.

<sup>261</sup> His festival is not known.

<sup>262</sup> His festival is kept, on the 12th of August.

<sup>263</sup> His feast does not appear to have been discovered.

<sup>264</sup> At the 15th of April, our Calendars have the feast of the sons of Draighen, of Cill-Ro.

<sup>265</sup> At the 2nd of September, there is a festival of Geinten, Priest of Tir-Guaire, but he may have been a different person.

<sup>266</sup> Colgan thinks, he was the St. Dubhán, Priest, venerated at the 11th of February.

<sup>267</sup> Colgan conjectures, he may have been Ængus, Bishop of Drum-Ratha, venerated on the 18th of February.

<sup>268</sup> Colgan thinks, this holy man's festival belongs to the 24th of March.

<sup>269</sup> Their feast is not known.

<sup>270</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 18th of February.

<sup>271</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>272</sup> His festival is not known.

<sup>273</sup> His festival has not been discovered.

<sup>274</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>275</sup> His feast is kept, on the 3rd of September.

<sup>276</sup> His festival is not known.

<sup>277</sup> Supposed, by Colgan, to have been venerated, either on the 3rd of November, or on the 27th of June.

<sup>278</sup> Venerated on the 3rd of March.

<sup>279</sup> Colgan thinks, his feast belongs to the 3rd of May.

<sup>280</sup> He is supposed to have had a festival, at the 25th of March.

<sup>281</sup> Nothing is known, with certainty, regarding them.

<sup>282</sup> Colgan assigns his feast, to the 28th of September.

<sup>283</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>284</sup> His festival is not known.

<sup>285</sup> His history is not known.

<sup>286</sup> His identity has not been ascertained.

<sup>287</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>288</sup> His festival is set down, at the 1st of November.

<sup>289</sup> His feast is on the 11th of November.

<sup>290</sup> He is said to have been venerated, on the 6th of September.

<sup>291</sup> His feast does not seem to have been discovered.

Airthir ; A Priest,<sup>292</sup> unnamed, in Tulach-maine, or Airedh Bainne ; Kille-nus,<sup>293</sup> Bishop of Tegh-Talain ; Many Disciples.<sup>294</sup> unnamed, in Tegh-Talain ; Justinus,<sup>295</sup> Priest, of Domnach Tortain ; Mochadocus or Cadocus,<sup>296</sup> of Inis-fail ; Augustin,<sup>297</sup> Priest, of Inis-beg ; Tegan,<sup>298</sup> Diermit,<sup>299</sup> Abbot ; Fedlimius,<sup>300</sup> Nanned,<sup>301</sup> a Bishop ; Paul,<sup>302</sup> a Monk ; Mochonocus or Canocus,<sup>303</sup> in Inis-fail ; Erditus,<sup>304</sup> of Inis-beg ; Curcneus,<sup>305</sup> of Kill-fiacla ; Loscanus,<sup>306</sup> Caillechus,<sup>307</sup> Beanus,<sup>308</sup> Coenchomracus,<sup>309</sup> in Hi-Cuanach ; Coeman,<sup>310</sup> of Kill-ratha ; Longa or Lomchuo,<sup>311</sup> of Kill-Teidhil ; Montan,<sup>312</sup> Deacon ; Nesson,<sup>313</sup> Deacon of Mungairit ; Hiarlath,<sup>314</sup> Archbishop of Armagh ; Aidan,<sup>315</sup> of Inis-Lothuir ; Colman,<sup>316</sup> Monk at Armagh ; Duban,<sup>317</sup> a Monk at Armagh ; Sedna,<sup>318</sup> Abbot, at Drium-mac-Ubla ; Catan,<sup>319</sup> a Priest ; Ocanotus,<sup>320</sup> a Priest ; Maccetus,<sup>321</sup> of Domnach-Leobain ; Cuanna,<sup>322</sup> a Priest ; Conall,<sup>323</sup> Bishop of Killeconnall ; Seven disciples<sup>324</sup> of St. Benignus, engaged in the conversion of Iarmonia ; Falveus,<sup>325</sup> Bishop of Kill-fobhuir ; Callin,<sup>326</sup> Bishop of Fiodhnach ; Hiarlath,<sup>327</sup> Archbishop of Tuam ; Nectan,<sup>328</sup> Curnan,<sup>329</sup> Buadan,<sup>330</sup> Mugan,<sup>331</sup> Birrin,<sup>332</sup> Modimoc,<sup>333</sup> Seven holy sons<sup>334</sup> of Damagart ; Bishop Aidus,<sup>335</sup> and his six holy brothers, viz., Diermit, Foebarchuo, Maclasrius, Manchinus, Tarchellus, Tinnius, all Bishops ; Medran or Medragius,<sup>336</sup> a Monk, at Saighir ; Brenan or Brendan,<sup>337</sup> Bishop of Birr ; Boetius,<sup>338</sup> Bishop of Monasterboice ; Colman,<sup>339</sup>

<sup>292</sup> He is not otherwise noted.

<sup>293</sup> His festival has been assigned, to the 27th of May.

<sup>294</sup> These are not otherwise distinguished.

<sup>295</sup> Colgan seems to identify him with Justan Lene, venerated at the 29th of July.

<sup>296</sup> Colgan assigns him a festival, at the 24th of February. However, the present holy man seems to have been a disciple of St. Fiech, Bishop of Sletty.

<sup>297</sup> One of St. Fiech's disciples, but his feast has not been ascertained.

<sup>298</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 9th of September.

<sup>299</sup> His festival has not been discovered.

<sup>300</sup> Supposed to have been Feidhlímídh of Cill-mór Dithruibh, venerated at the 9th of August.

<sup>301</sup> His festival is not known.

<sup>302</sup> Said to have been venerated, on the 10th of January.

<sup>303</sup> Colgan says, he was venerated, on the 12th of February ; but, most probably, he meant the 11th of that month.

<sup>304</sup> His festival is not accurately known.

<sup>305</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>306</sup> His festival is not known.

<sup>307</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>308</sup> His identity has not been traced.

<sup>309</sup> His feast is not known.

<sup>310</sup> His identity has not been established.

<sup>311</sup> Colgan thinks his feast referable, to the 9th of January.

<sup>312</sup> Said to have been venerated, at the 2nd of March.

<sup>313</sup> His feast occurs, at the 25th of July.

<sup>314</sup> His festival is at the 11th of February.

<sup>315</sup> His feast has not been found.

<sup>316</sup> His festival was on the 5th of March.

<sup>317</sup> His festival has not been clearly ascertained.

<sup>318</sup> He is said to have been venerated, on the 16th of June.

<sup>319</sup> He is said to have been identical with Cadoc, who was venerated on the 24th of January ; and, he is noted, as a master of guests for St. Patrick, in the Latin Tripartite Life.

<sup>320</sup> This is thought to be a false entry for St. Canocus, said to have been venerated, at the 11th of February, and to have been one of St. Patrick's guest-masters.

<sup>321</sup> His identity does not appear to have been established.

<sup>322</sup> Colgan thinks him to have been identical with Cuanda, the blind, venerated on the 11th of March.

<sup>323</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 18th of March. To the foregoing list may be added the name of Deacon Sannan, or Senan, the brother of St. Patrick, and whose feast has not been marked. Thirty-one nephews and nieces of the Irish Apostle are said to have been included among the saints.

<sup>324</sup> These are mentioned, in the Life of St. Benignus, chap. vii.

<sup>325</sup> In the same Life, at chap. x. This holy man and nearly all those who follow, in the list as given in the text, were not the immediate disciples of St. Patrick, although many of them may have lived contemporaneously with him. Nor are the festivals assigned, always referable to them ; in many cases, also, their identity seems doubtful.

<sup>326</sup> Mentioned in the same Life, chap. xi., and said to have been venerated, at the 13th of November.

<sup>327</sup> His feast is at the 11th of February, and also at the 6th of June. He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Benignus, at chap. xi.

Bishop of Kill-Ruaid; Senchell,<sup>340</sup> Abbot of Cluain-damh; Maccretius,<sup>341</sup> the hermit, and Bishop of Kill-Miccrech; Muadan,<sup>342</sup> Abbot of Cluain-dionnach, and Bishop of Carn-furbuidhe; Declan,<sup>343</sup> Bishop of Ardmore; Colman,<sup>344</sup> Bishop of Doire Mór; Ballin,<sup>345</sup> or Ballon, Bishop of Tegg-Saxon; Maclieg,<sup>346</sup> a Bishop; Colman,<sup>347</sup> Bishop of Dromore; Coelan,<sup>348</sup> Abbot of Ændruim; Eugene,<sup>349</sup> Bishop of Ardstraw; Tighernach,<sup>350</sup> Bishop of Clones; Duach,<sup>351</sup> Archbishop of Armagh; Patricius Senior,<sup>352</sup> Archbishop of Armagh; Dubthach I.,<sup>353</sup> Archbishop of Armagh; Ailill I.,<sup>354</sup> Archbishop of Armagh; Ailill II.,<sup>355</sup> Archbishop of Armagh; Dubthach II.,<sup>356</sup> Archbishop of Armagh; Fingar, also called Guinger, and his Companions,<sup>357</sup> Martyrs in Cornwall; Aedan,<sup>358</sup> Bishop of Kill-mór; Fintan;<sup>359</sup> Corban,<sup>360</sup> Bishop of Fertcherbain;<sup>361</sup> Lucharius;<sup>362</sup> Trenan,<sup>363</sup> Abbot of Kill-elga; Luger,<sup>364</sup> Bishop of Conaille Murthemne; Finnbar or Finnian,<sup>365</sup>

<sup>338</sup> Mentioned in the Life of St. Benignus, chap. xi. Supposed to have been venerated, on the 8th of January, and on the 22nd of April.

<sup>339</sup> Ibid. Supposed to have been venerated, on the 6th of January, or on the 22nd of December.

<sup>330</sup> Ibid.

<sup>331</sup> Ibid.

<sup>332</sup> Ibid.

<sup>333</sup> Ibid.

<sup>334</sup> Ibid.

<sup>335</sup> Said to have been venerated, at Rath-na-Nespoc, with his six holy brothers, on the 16th of February. These are noted, in the Genealogies of the Irish Saints, chap. xvi.

<sup>336</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Kieran of Saighir, chap. xxviii., and Colgan assigns his feast to the 6th of June.

<sup>337</sup> Ibid., chap. xxxiii. He is venerated, at the 29th of November.

<sup>338</sup> His feast is placed, at the 7th of December.

<sup>339</sup> He is alluded to, in the Life of St. Ailbe, chap. xviii., and his feast is at the 16th of October.

<sup>340</sup> Ibid., chap. 20. Colgan places his festival, at the 26th of March.

<sup>341</sup> Ibid., chap. xxxi. His feast has been referred, to the 11th of August, by Colgan.

<sup>342</sup> Ibid., chap. xxxiii. His feast was kept, on the 6th of March.

<sup>343</sup> His feast was kept, on the 24th of July.

<sup>344</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Declan, chap. xxii. His feast is at the 20th of May.

<sup>345</sup> Ibid., chap. xlix. Colgan places his festival, at the 3rd of September.

<sup>346</sup> Ibid. The last chapter. Colgan says he was venerated, at the 8th of February, or at the 7th of April.

<sup>347</sup> He is venerated, at the 7th of June.

<sup>348</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Finian, of Maghbile. Coelan was the first name for St. Mochai, whose feast is at the 23rd of June.

<sup>349</sup> He is venerated, at the 23rd of August.

<sup>350</sup> His feast occurs, at the 4th of April.

<sup>351</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Tighernach, chap. xi., xii. He is supposed to have been David, son of Guaire Ua Forannain, called also Legate of all Ireland, who died A.D. 550. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 188, 189, and n. (e.)

<sup>352</sup> His feast is placed, at the 24th of August. He died A.D. 457. See ibid., pp. 142, 143, and n. (e.)

<sup>353</sup> He is thought to be identical with Dubhthach of Druim-Dearbh—supposed to be Derver in the county of Louth—and who died A.D. 512. See ibid., pp. 168, 169, and n. (m.)

<sup>354</sup> He died, A.D. 525. See ibid., pp. 172, 173, and n. (a.)

<sup>355</sup> He died, A.D. 535. See ibid., pp. 178, 179, and n. (u.)

<sup>356</sup> He died, A.D. 547. See ibid., pp. 184, 185, and n. (p.)

<sup>357</sup> Their feast has been assigned, to the 23rd of February. The whole number of these Martyrs is set down at 777, including 7 bishops.

<sup>358</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Mocteus, chap. iii. His feast is at the 2nd of November.

<sup>359</sup> He is mentioned, in the same Life, chap. xii.

<sup>360</sup> Ibid., chap. xiii. He died A.D. 504. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 160, 161, and n. (n.)

<sup>361</sup> Or "the grave of Bishop Cerban," one of St. Patrick's converts. This church was at the north-east of Tara Hill, but it is now totally effaced. See Dr. Petrie's "History and Antiquities of Tara Hill," p. 200, and Plate 7, facing p. 128, where the position of this church is marked.

<sup>362</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Mocteus, chap. xvii.

<sup>363</sup> See ibid., chap. xvii. His feast occurs, at the 22nd of March.

<sup>364</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Moninne.

<sup>365</sup> Ibid., chap. ii.

Bishop; Grellan,<sup>366</sup> Abbot of Croebh-Grellain; Gildas Albanus;<sup>367</sup> Coeltan, or Conlaid,<sup>368</sup> Bishop of Kildare; Natalis,<sup>369</sup> Abbot; Maculatus,<sup>370</sup> Priest, in the territory of Corcobascind; Latus,<sup>371</sup> a Deacon; Cathbad<sup>372</sup> or Cathub, Bishop and Abbot of Achad-Kinn; Lugad,<sup>373</sup> Bishop of Connor; Berchan or Mobi,<sup>374</sup> Bishop; Columban,<sup>375</sup> son of Crimthann, Bishop and Abbot; Columba,<sup>376</sup> of Iniscaltra. Among the female relatives and disciples of St. Patrick are enumerated his sisters, Saints Lupita, Tigris or Tigridis, Darerca or Liemania, Richella or Cinnena;<sup>377</sup> Munessa,<sup>378</sup> daughter to a King of Britain; Ercnata,<sup>379</sup> daughter to Daire; the Nine Virgins,<sup>380</sup> daughters to a king of the Lombards; a daughter to a king of Britain, and supposed to have been St. Crumtheris;<sup>381</sup> the great St. Brigid,<sup>382</sup> Patroness of Ireland; the two Emerias,<sup>383</sup> Virgins, at Cluain-Bronag; Ethnea Rufa and Fethelm Alba,<sup>384</sup> daughters to King Laoghaire; Cinnia or Kinnia,<sup>385</sup> Virgin; Cethuberis Cethumbria or Eudumbria;<sup>386</sup> Treha,<sup>387</sup> Virgin of Ard-Trea; Cathnia,<sup>388</sup> Virgin, in Domnach-Patruic; Bega,<sup>389</sup> Virgin, of Tegh-Laisreann; Cipia or Copia,<sup>390</sup> widow; Matona or Mo-Chona,<sup>391</sup> Virgin; Nistria,<sup>392</sup> a French Virgin; Callecha,<sup>393</sup> Virgin; Crocha,<sup>394</sup> Virgin; Attracta,<sup>395</sup> Virgin; Crebrea, and Lassara,<sup>396</sup> Virgins, in Kill-Forchlann; Dermeria, Virgin, in Airedh-bainne, with her sisters, Ethnea and Cumania;<sup>397</sup> Cectamaria,<sup>398</sup> Virgin, in Druum-Dubhain; Mugania and Fethlimia,<sup>399</sup> Virgins, daughters of Ailhil; Briga,<sup>400</sup> Virgin; Crumtheris,<sup>401</sup> Virgin, in Kengobha; Phiala,<sup>402</sup> Virgin and Martyr; Fanchea,<sup>403</sup> Virgin, and sister to St. Endeus;<sup>404</sup> Monin-

<sup>366</sup> His feast occurs, at the 10th of November.

<sup>367</sup> His festival has been generally referred to the 29th of January.

<sup>368</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Brigid, ascribed to St. Ultan, chap. li. His feast occurs, at the 3rd of May.

<sup>369</sup> He is mentioned, in the Life of St. Senan, chap. x.

<sup>370</sup> Ibid., chap. iv.

<sup>371</sup> Ibid., chap. iv.

<sup>372</sup> His feast was on the 6th of April.

<sup>373</sup> His feast has been set down, at the 17th of April.

<sup>374</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 12th of October.

<sup>375</sup> His festival is referred, to the 13th of December.

<sup>376</sup> He died, A.D. 548. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 186, 187, and n. (a.)

<sup>377</sup> We have already alluded to these sisters, in our notes to Chapter iii. of this biography.

<sup>378</sup> Her feast has been referred to the 4th of September, where she is identified, by Colgan, with Ness, of Ernaidh.

<sup>379</sup> Venerated at the 8th of January.

<sup>380</sup> Their festival has not been marked.

<sup>381</sup> Her name is not found, in our Calendars.

<sup>382</sup> Her festival is at the 1st of February.

<sup>383</sup> Their feast has been placed, at the 11th of December.

<sup>384</sup> Their feast is not known, although Colgan has their acts, at the 11th of January.

<sup>385</sup> She has a festival, at the 1st of February.

<sup>386</sup> Her feast is not exactly known, although it has been referred to the 18th of January.

<sup>387</sup> Her feast has been assigned, to the 3rd of August.

<sup>388</sup> Her festival does not seem to have been ascertained.

<sup>389</sup> Colgan conjectures her feast to have been, at the 10th of February.

<sup>390</sup> Her feast has not been determined.

<sup>391</sup> She is said, to have been a sister to Saints Benignus and Cethech. Colgan thinks it probable, she was the St. Conna, venerated on the 3rd of March.

<sup>392</sup> Her festival is not known.

<sup>393</sup> Her feast is not known.

<sup>394</sup> Her feast is not known.

<sup>395</sup> Her festival is held, on the 9th of February, and on the 11th of August.

<sup>396</sup> These are called the daughters of Gle-rann, but their feast has not been noted.

<sup>397</sup> Their festival is said to occur, on the 6th of July.

<sup>398</sup> Thought to have been a variation of name for Cuthuberis, or Aedhmair, venerated on the 18th of January.

<sup>399</sup> Their festival is at the 9th of December.

<sup>400</sup> Colgan thinks her feast fell on the 7th of January.

<sup>401</sup> Her feast is not to the found, in our Calendars.

<sup>402</sup> Her festival is placed, at the 25th of January, by Colgan, but rather should it be at the 23rd of February.

<sup>403</sup> Her feast is held, on the 1st of January.

<sup>404</sup> His feast is on the 21st of March.

nia or Darerca,<sup>405</sup> Abbess of Kill-Slebhe; Damoda,<sup>406</sup> Virgin; Brechnata or Brignata,<sup>407</sup> Virgin; Derlasse,<sup>408</sup> Virgin; Briga,<sup>409</sup> Virgin; Lasrea or Las-sara,<sup>410</sup> Virgin; also, Derlugdacha,<sup>411</sup> Virgin.<sup>412</sup> Although classed among St. Patrick's disciples, several of the foregoing holy women are not alluded to, however, in his particular Lives.

CHAPTER XXV.

PRESUMED CONNEXION OF THE IRISH APOSTLE WITH THE MONASTERY AT GLASTONBURY EXAMINED—ST. PATRICK'S CONFESSION—THE VARIOUS PROSE TRACTS AND IRISH POEMS ATTRIBUTED TO HIM, OR HAVING REFERENCE TO HIS HISTORY.

ILL-INFORMED writers, treating on the Antiquities of Glastonbury, have confounded our St. Patrick, with another Sen-Patrick,<sup>1</sup> who lived long after the time of our Irish Apostle.<sup>2</sup> Again, Richard Stanihurst thinks,<sup>3</sup> there is no distinction between St. Patrick, Archbishop of Armagh, and the Abbot Patrick, who is related to have founded the Purgatory, on Lough Derg. It has been asserted, the British writers desired it to be understood, by calling their Patrick the Senior,<sup>4</sup> that he was the great one, among many other Irish saints, bearing such a revered name.<sup>5</sup> A Glastonian poetaster, having mentioned three Patricks,<sup>6</sup> adds, that after he who had been the Primate over

<sup>405</sup> Her feast is at the 6th of July.

<sup>406</sup> She is noticed, in the Life of St. Minnie, chap. xviii., xix.

<sup>407</sup> Ibid., chap. xiv., xvi.

<sup>408</sup> Ibid., chap. xxi.

<sup>409</sup> Her feast is at the 9th of March. She is noticed, in St. Ultan's Life of St. Brigid, chap. xxx.

<sup>410</sup> Ibid., chap. xlv. Her feast has not been determined.

<sup>411</sup> Ibid., chap. cxxxii. Her feast is at the 1st of February.

<sup>412</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. iv., pp. 224 to 231, and cap. xxiii., pp. 264 to 270. For an account of St. Patrick's disciples, the reader is referred to Father Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c. Appendix VI., pp. 370 to 396.

CHAPTER XXV.—<sup>1</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," the death of Sen-Patrick is placed, at A.D. 457. See vol. i., pp. 142, 143. Dr. Lanigan maintains, he was no other than the great Irish Apostle. The Ulster Annals have remarkable words, at the said year, relating to the rest of old Patrick. They state, that other books refer the time of St. Patrick's death to that year. Dr. Lanigan remarks, that in some books, the time was differently noted from a vulgar opinion, which prevailed in the days of the compilers, about his death occurring in the year 493. It may be, however, that an allusion was there made to A.D. 454, as found in the "Annals of Connaught," for the death of old Patrick.

<sup>2</sup> In Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 892, and following pages, the author quotes a great many passages to this purpose.

<sup>3</sup> Yet, this same writer quotes a document, referring in the following Latin lines to three distinct Patricks:—

"Sunt hujus nominis, tene certissime
Tres Sancti Præsules: primus Hiberniæ
Archiepiscopus: alter Auerniæ:
Qua natus fuerat ternus Hiberniæ.
Archiepiscopus primus Hiberniæ:
Is primus postea Abbas Glastoniæ,
Natus Britannia præclaro genere:
Vt sua vita declarat optime."

—"De Vita S. Patricii, Hiberniæ Apostoli," lib. ii., p. 71.

<sup>4</sup> One writer has: "Hibernensium peregrini prædictum locum Glastoniae, sicut et caeterae fidelium turbae magno colebant affectu; et maxime ob beati PATRICII SENIORIS honorem, qui faustus ibidem in Domino quievisse narratur."

<sup>5</sup> Fiech's Scholiast has Patrick senex, or senior, distinguished from the great Irish Apostle. This is also in accordance with an account, in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, the Culdee, at the 24th day of August, where Sen-Patrick is called "a battle chief," and "the amiable preceptor of our Patron."

<sup>6</sup> His verses are those already quoted, by Richard Stanihurst. To Fagan and Duvian are attributed the early establishment of Christianity and a foundation, in Glaston-

Ireland, afterwards he became Abbot over Glastonbury.<sup>7</sup> Notwithstanding, the commencement of the house and school at Glastonbury cannot probably be placed, before the seventh century,<sup>8</sup> when numbers of holy and learned men went over from Ireland<sup>9</sup> to Great Britain, for the purpose of founding schools there,<sup>10</sup> as also to convert and instruct those new Christian settlers, in that country.<sup>11</sup> Yet, that poet, to whom we have alluded, was angry with those, who would not allow St. Patrick's remains to have rested, at Glastonbury.<sup>12</sup> Indeed, there can be little doubt, the foundation at Glastonbury existed,<sup>13</sup> in an early part of the seventh century.<sup>14</sup> The first establishment, there, could not have been formed, so early as the times of St. Patrick. Nor could it have been prior to the general conversion of the Irish nation.<sup>15</sup> Thus, it seems now very clear, what has been said, about St. Patrick having been Abbot of Glastonbury, is quite apocryphal. It is thought, that neither he, nor any other Patrick—a contemporary with him—had been buried there; although, no doubt, the Irish residents of Glastonbury had some confused traditions, regarding their great Apostle having been a superior in the place.

We have now to treat, about the chief writings,<sup>16</sup> ascribed to St. Patrick. Among these, the best known is intitled his Confession. It is thought to have been written, when he was old,<sup>17</sup> and near his death,<sup>18</sup> as a testimony of his mission.<sup>19</sup> Excellent critics<sup>20</sup> have considered it to be genuine.

bury. Their period is set down, at A.D. clxxxvi. in Matthew of Westminster's "Flores Historiarum."

<sup>7</sup> Even a deed, ascribed to him, and there preserved, is given in William of Malmesbury's tract, "De Antiquitate Ecclesiæ Glastoniensis," as published in Gale's "Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, Anglo-Danicæ Scriptores XV.," tom. iii., pp. 296, 297. It has been published, among the "Opuscula S. Patricii" by Ware, as also in Sir William Dugdale's "Monasticon Anglicanum," tom. i., num. v., p. 25. London edition, 1817, fol.

<sup>8</sup> Although William of Malmesbury represents its church, as being the most ancient in England, in his tract, "De Antiquitate Glastoniensis Ecclesiæ," published from a Manuscript, belonging to Trinity College, Cambridge, in Thomas Gale's "Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, Anglo-Danicæ, Scriptores XV.," vol. iii., pp. 291 to 335. Notwithstanding, it will be found, on a close inquiry, that its real antiquity does not ascend higher, than about the period mentioned.

<sup>9</sup> Glastonbury seems to have been founded, if not entirely, at least chiefly, by religious men from Ireland. These were mostly maintained at the royal expense.

<sup>10</sup> See Camden's "Britannia," vol. i., col. 79. Gibson's edition.

<sup>11</sup> Hence, it was called Glastonbury of the Irish. Again, that old church, which existed before the reign of King Ina, was called the "church of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of St. Patrick." Owing to these circumstances, it was no difficult matter, to deduce—in the ninth or tenth century—that St. Patrick had been there in person. For an account of the reign of Ina, King of the West Saxons, the reader is referred to William Bernard MacCabe's "Catholic History of England," vol. i., chap. viii., pp. 471 to 574.

<sup>12</sup> "De hoc Patricio, Columbâ, Brigida, Delirat plurimum Chester in Chronica; Scribens in Duno quòd horum corpora
Sunt uno tumulo."

<sup>13</sup> A grant was made in its favour A.D. 670, by Kenelwach, or Cenwalla, a king of the West Saxons.

<sup>14</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. vi., p. 112.

<sup>15</sup> It was subsequent, at least, to a partial conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, which happened about the beginning of the seventh century. Those princes, who encouraged religious teachers at Glastonbury, belonged to that nation. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. ii., pp. 324, and nn. 17, 18, 19, pp. 328, 329.

<sup>16</sup> On this subject, the reader is recommended to consult the following works: Ware's "Opuscula S. Patricii." Also, Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Irish Writers," book ii., chap. i., pp. 307 to 310. See, likewise, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Appendix Quarta ad Acta St. Patricii," pars. ii., pp. 214, 215.

<sup>17</sup> "Quatenus modo ipse appeto in se nectute mea."—"Confessio S. Patricii," p. 4.

<sup>18</sup> He concluded it with these words: "Et hæc est Confessio mea antequam moriar."

<sup>19</sup> Ware in his "Annotations" at p. 108,

Others,<sup>21</sup> indeed, doubt, if it be the production of St. Patrick.<sup>22</sup> Various manuscript copies of St. Patrick's Confession are extant,<sup>23</sup> and it has been printed, likewise, in many well-known works.<sup>24</sup> Most certainly, it is a tract of very great antiquity; for, a copy, found in the Book of Armagh,<sup>25</sup> was transcribed, about the year 800, and it is said to have been taken from St. Patrick's own autograph, then partly illegible. It is not an easy matter to imagine, by whom, or for what purpose, it could have been forged.<sup>26</sup> The question of the real age, attributable to the Book of Armagh, is discussed in a paper, published some years ago, by the Rev. Charles Graves, then a Fellow of the University of Dublin.<sup>27</sup> The Latinity in St. Patrick's Confessio is rude;<sup>28</sup> this Tract quotes the ante-Hieronymian Vulgate; moreover, it contains nothing inconsistent with the century, in which it is said to have been written.<sup>29</sup> Besides, that oldest known copy of St. Patrick's Confession, in the Book of Armagh, there are several Manuscript versions, exhibiting undoubted age, in England. Two of these Manuscripts are to be found at Salisbury; there are two others in the Cotton Library; there is another Manuscript at Cambridge; and still another, which is a very interesting and valuable copy.<sup>30</sup> This latter was used by the Bollandists, while printing their edition of the Confession.<sup>31</sup> says, "Verba hæc innuere videntur illum, non diu ante obitum suum, eam literis mandasse."

<sup>20</sup> Among these may be named Tillemont, Rev. Dr. Lanigan, Rev. Dr. Todd, &c.

<sup>21</sup> Such as Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy.

<sup>22</sup> It has been very incorrectly assumed, that the pretended Confession of St. Patrick seems to have been borrowed from St. Augustine. Even, Ryves and Ledwich called our saint's existence in question; and, a chivalrous German, C. G. Schoell, has lately asserted, "ficta sunt quæ Patricii feruntur scripta, falsa quæ Vitis traduntur. Incertum est vel Prosperi testimonium."—"De Ecclesiasticæ Britonum Scotorumque Historiæ Fontibus" is the title of his work.

<sup>23</sup> Among these are enumerated: I. Confessio Sancti Patricii MS. Cott. Nero. E. I. ff. 167-172 b. vell. fol. xi. cent. II. MS. Bodl. Fell. I. ff. 7-13. vell. fol. xi. cent. III. MS. Bodl. Fell. 3. ff. 158-166. vell. fol. xi. cent. IV. The "Confessio" in MS. Bodl. Fell. V. Confessio S. Patricii MS. S. Vedasti apud Atrebat. 3. 16. vell. folio.

<sup>24</sup> It was published by Messingham, in his "Florilegium Insulæ Sanctorum." It is printed, with St. Patrick's Life, in the "Acta Sanctorum," tom. ii. Martii xvii., at pp. 533 to 538, with notes. There, it is followed, by St. Patrick's Epistle, "Ad Christianos Corotici tyranni subditos," pp. 538 to 540. The conclusion of "The Legends of St. Patrick" contains Aubrey De Vere's blank-verse rendering of "The Confession of St. Patrick." See pp. 215 to 235.

<sup>25</sup> This version, which is preserved, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, was a copy transcribed from one still older, in the opinion of the Rev. Charles Graves. The scribe's marginal notes show, that he found it difficult, in many places, to read that Manuscript, from which he had been transcribing his own copy. Yet, the same notes, the character of his handwriting, besides a reference to the contemporaneous Irish Primate—under whose authority the transcribed work had been undertaken—leave no manner of doubt, that this transcript was executed by a scribe, named Ferdomnach. He lived, during the primacy of Archbishop Torbach, and at a date, not later than A.D. 807.

<sup>26</sup> See Rev. Dr. Todd's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland; his Life and Mission," chap. ii., pp. 346, 347.

<sup>27</sup> Afterwards, he became Protestant Bishop of Limerick.

<sup>28</sup> For this he apologizes, and he wishes it to be understood, that his habit of speaking, and perhaps of writing in the Irish language, should account for idioms, which more practised and perfect scholars would not be very likely to use. He remarks, how he was differently circumstanced from others, "qui sermonem illorum ex infantia nunquam mutaverunt, sed magis ad perfectum semper addiderunt; nam sermo et loquela nostra translata est in linguam alienam."—"Confessio S. Patricii," p. 4. He writes, as bequeathing to his Gallic and Irish co-operators in the work of the Gospel, those many thousands of Christians then in Ireland. See ibid., p. 6.

<sup>29</sup> See Alexander G. Richey's "Lectures on the History of Ireland, down to A.D. 1534," lect. ii., pp. 33, 34.

<sup>30</sup> We are told, by Mr. John Cashel Hoey, that among the foregoing, he could not find any trace, regarding the original and missing Manuscript of St. Patrick's Confession; but, this is not surprising, after the lapse of so many centuries, and the ravages, to which Armagh had been exposed.

<sup>31</sup> It existed, until the time of the Revolu-

As this well-known Tract serves greatly to illustrate the character and acts of the illustrious Apostle of Ireland, we shall here present a brief analysis of its most salient points. St. Patrick first alludes to his origin, parentage and country, and then he proceeds to reveal, in a general way, the ignorance and errors of his early days. Therefore is he the more anxious to proclaim God's singular mercies, on behalf of himself, and regarding that people, whom he had brought to the true faith. He especially wished to justify his motives—while proclaiming with true humility his imperfections—when leaving his brethren and kindred, in order to extend the kingdom of Christ.<sup>32</sup> For these favours, he expresses his heartfelt gratitude towards the Lord. The saint had now ordained clerics, in various places,<sup>33</sup> and he had preached, in the most remote parts of Hibernia,<sup>34</sup> or Ireland.<sup>35</sup> Above all, he had succeeded in bringing over vast numbers<sup>36</sup>—if not the majority of the Irish people—from the errors of idolatry, and from the worship of unclean things, to embrace the Christian faith.<sup>37</sup> He declares, that he had escaped from twelve great dangers, that threatened him with loss of life, not to speak of many plots, intended for his injury. He acknowledges, that the Almighty had blessed his ministry with signs and wonders.<sup>38</sup> But, what he relates, regarding his supernatural works, seems most natural and unaffected; the many extraordinary miracles, related by his later biographers, appear, in a great degree, to have been the growth of exaggerated traditional credulity. In a country like Ireland, where society was based on the clan system, marriage alliances were much in vogue. However, St. Patrick alludes to the many noble daughters, who embraced a life of virginity, but not, indeed, according to the wishes of their parents; yea, rather from them, did they suffer reproaches, threats, terrors, and persecutions, unjustly; and, nevertheless, their number daily increased, so that he could hardly keep an account of those, who belonged to Christ, not to speak of those, who remained widows and unmarried. But, the Lord gave this great grace, to many of His handmaids; for, notwithstanding prohibition, they courageously imitated the example set by so many others. From the context, in which this passage occurs, it appears, St. Patrick's object was to show, that not only very many of the humble people, in Ireland, had become Christians, but likewise some persons among the ruling classes. Next, we shall advert to the pious generosity of those holy women, who presented to our saint their voluntary offerings, for his use, and who laid them upon the altar.<sup>39</sup> There, in all probability, he officiated often in the Divine service, at which he poured forth an affecting prayer tion, in St. Vedastus' famous French monastery. Fragments, belonging to the precious Manuscripts of that learned congregation, are still scattered, among the libraries of Arras, Saint Omer, Boulogne, and Douai. The present writer believes, from enquiries made, when visiting some of those cities, in the summer of 1863, that various MSS., illustrating Irish Ecclesiastical History, are yet preserved in their public libraries.

<sup>32</sup> See Sir James Ware's edition of "Confessio S. Patricii," p. 3.

<sup>33</sup> He remarks, "Ut clerici ubique illis ordinarentur." Ibid., p. 14.

<sup>34</sup> By this term he means the Irish nation. This usage accords with that well-known idiom, when naming a country for its people, such as by mentioning France for the French nation. Speaking of the great mass of the Irish nation, our saint uses the name Hiberionaces. This comes from Iliverione, his name for Ireland. In the same Confession, he seems to distinguish the Scots from the Hiberniones, according to the Bollandists, Tillemont, Innes and Rev. Dr. Lanigan.

<sup>35</sup> He says, "etiam usque ad exteras partes," Ibid., p. 19.

<sup>36</sup> He speaks of bequeathing consolation to his brethren and to his children, whom he had baptized in the Lord, and consisting of so many thousand men.

<sup>37</sup> See ibid., p. 16.

<sup>38</sup> He says: "Ego non silebo neque abscondam signa et mirabilia, quæ mihi a Domino ministrata sunt."—"Confessio S. Patricii," p. 91.

<sup>39</sup> He says, "I have endeavoured to preserve myself for my Christian brethren, and for the Christian virgins, and for those holy for the everlasting welfare of his people.<sup>40</sup> But, our holy Patrick had made it a rule, not to accept of presents, at least such as were of any considerable value. This he did, lest he might give occasion for incredulous persons to defame his ministry.<sup>41</sup> He desired rather to be poor, after the example of Christ, for whom he is anxious to suffer anything, even martyrdom itself, being assured of the glory, which was laid up for him in making such a sacrifice.<sup>42</sup>

Some other writings have been attributed to the Irish Apostle, by various authors. Their authenticity, however, has been questioned; and, in many instances, it may be held, with good reason.<sup>43</sup> From some earlier sources, no doubt, the Protestant Bishop of Ossory, John Bale,<sup>44</sup> has an account of our Apostle, Patricius, whom he distinguishes by the earlier name of Svccetvs. He also furnishes the following list of St. Patrick's writings: De Antiquitate Aualonica, lib. i.<sup>45</sup> Intinerarium Confessionis, lib. i.<sup>46</sup> Odœporicon Hiberniæ, lib. i.<sup>47</sup> Historiam Hiberniæ ex Ruano, lib. i.<sup>48</sup> De tribus habitaculis, lib. i., "Tria sunt habitacula, cœli."<sup>49</sup> De futura electorum vita, lib. i.<sup>50</sup> Abiectiona quædam 366, lib. i.<sup>51</sup> Sermones quoq. lib. i.<sup>52</sup> Ad Cereticum tyrannum, Epist. i.<sup>53</sup> Ad Aualonios incolæ, Epist. i.<sup>54</sup> Ad Hibernienses ecclesias, Epist. plures.<sup>55</sup> Ad suos Brytannos, Epist. plures.<sup>56</sup> Some additional works<sup>57</sup> are attributed to St. Patrick, by John Pitts,<sup>58</sup> who is said to have borrowed his materials from Bale, and this had been done, at the same time, without making any acknowledgment,<sup>59</sup> regarding the source, whence they were taken.

women, who gave me their voluntary offerings, and who laid down their ornaments on the altar."

<sup>40</sup> Again, he remarks, "Therefore I pray, that the Lord may never suffer me to lose these people, whom he has purchased from the extremities of the earth; and, I pray him to grant me the grace of perseverance, and to make me his faithful witness, to the hour of my death, which I will endure for my God; and, if, by intimation, I have done any good for Him whom I love, I pray Him to give me the grace to shed my blood, for these converts and captives of His."

<sup>41</sup> He challenges the people, to point out any donations he had received. See "Confessio S. Patricii," p. 19.

<sup>42</sup> See Father Joachim Laurence Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., pp. 184 to 210. Scholia follow, from p. 210 to p. 239.

<sup>43</sup> Among these may be noted, a Tract, "De Abusionibus Sæculi." In its present state, according to Dr. Lanigan and others, it has been thought a translation, from some Irish original. It is printed, in Father Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii Opuscula," &c., with notes. See pp. 236 to 278.

<sup>44</sup> See "Scriptorum Illustrium Majoris Britannię, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam vocant, Catalogus," &c., num. xliiii., cent. i., p. 43.

<sup>45</sup> Pitseus, or John Pitts, includes this work among the writings of St. Patrick. See "Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis," tomus i., pars. ii., p. 91. This is also intitled, "Charta S. Patricii," or "Epistola de Antiquitate Avalonica," from the old name of the island Avalonia, in Somersetshire. There, that monastery was situated. Ware has published that Epistle in his "Opuscula S. Patricii," but he has also ably exposed it, in his Annotationes, p. 131 et seq. The absurdities of that spurious document are shown by Ussher, who has written most learnedly on the Antiquities of Glastonbury, in his "Primordia," cap. vi., pp. 104 to 125. He observes, that it was never heard of, until after the arrival of the Normans, in England. See p. 116.

<sup>46</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>47</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>48</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>49</sup> See, also, John Pitts, and Father Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii Opuscula," &c., where it is printed, with notes, pp. 279 to 293.

<sup>50</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>51</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>52</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>53</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>54</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>55</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>56</sup> See, also, John Pitts.

<sup>57</sup> We have "Proverbia S. Patricii" printed, in Father Joachim Lorenzo Villanueva's "Sancti Patricii, Ibernorum Apostoli, Synodi, Canones, Opuscula," &c., with notes, pp. 176 to 183.

<sup>58</sup> See "Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis," tomus i., pars. ii., p. 91.

<sup>59</sup> He was born in 1560, at Aulton, in Hampshire, and he was educated at New College, Oxford, in 1578, 1579. As a Catholic priest, he afterwards resided on the

Our great saint was not insensible to the charms of poetry, nor to the merits of those compositions, in which the heathen bards of Ireland celebrated the fame of their dead heroes. He lamented the fate of so many gifted men, who had gone from earth, before the light of Christianity was vouchsafed.<sup>60</sup> We find some poems, based on bardic songs, which relate the disputes between Saint Patrick and the half-converted Oisín, or Ossian,<sup>61</sup> who, as Aubrey De Vere tells us, was really dead 200 years before Saint Patrick's epoch. Those are made, to symbolize the passage from the barbaric to the saintly period of the nation's glories.<sup>62</sup> Among those Manuscripts, preserved in the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin, copies of various poetical and prose tracts, in Latin and in Irish, said to have been written by our Apostle, are still preserved. Some of these, however, have barely a reference to him,<sup>63</sup> or to his writings.<sup>64</sup> Thus, Patrick and Oisín, a Poem by way of dialogue<sup>65</sup> between them, is found among the Betham Manuscripts.<sup>66</sup> There is a short Poem,<sup>67</sup> ascribed to St. Patrick, called his Benediction of the People of Munster, when returning from his Mission among them. There is extant a short Poem, attributed to St. Patrick, on the Rock of the Hundreds,<sup>68</sup> now known as the Rock of Cashel, in 24 verses.<sup>69</sup> There is a Poem, ascribed to St. Patrick, in Messrs. Hodges and Smith's Collection of Irish MSS., in the Royal Irish Academy.<sup>70</sup> It has been traditionally held, that St. Patrick left a Rule of Life for Religious Persons. In our ancient Irish literature, we have extant a Poem, on the Rule of Discipline of St. Patrick.<sup>71</sup> There is also an old anonymous Poem, on the Duties of a Priest, according to the Canons of St. Patrick.<sup>72</sup> One of our Irish literary relics extant is an Irish Hymn, attributed to St. Patrick.<sup>73</sup> The age of these productions has not been ascertained, nor are they to be regarded as his genuine works.

Continent, he died, and was buried, at Livedun, in Lorraine.

<sup>59</sup> See the "Encyclopedia Britannica," vol. xiv. Art. John Pitts, p. 786. Dublin Edition, 1791 et seq., 4to.

<sup>60</sup> See Patrick Kennedy's "Legendary Fictions of the Irish Celts." Baptism after Death, p. 329.

<sup>61</sup> Among Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of St. Patrick," those Poems, which the author denominates "Oisín's Vision," pp. 189 to 193, and "Oisín's Good Confession," pp. 210 to 214, are excellent compositions.

<sup>62</sup> Thus, the angels sang, says Oisín:—

"They said—"This man, for Erin's sake
Shall tarry here an age, Till Christ to Erin comes—shall sleep
In this still hermitage:

"That so, ere yet that great old time
Is wholly gone and past,
Her manlier with her saintly day
May blend in bridal fast.

"Patrick! That vision, was it truth?
Or fancy's mocking gleam?
That I should tarry till He came—
'Twas not, 'twas not a dream!

"Then said the monks, 'His brain is hurt':
But Patrick said, 'They lie!

Thou God that lov'st Thy grey-haired child,

Would I for Him might die!"

"And Patrick cried, 'Oisín! the thirst
Of God is in thy breast!
He who has dealt thy heart the wound
Ere long will give it rest.'"

—Oisín's Vision, pp. 191 to 193.

<sup>63</sup> The small 4to paper Manuscript, No. 49. 4. in the R.I.A., contains an ancient Life of St. Patrick, with an anonymous poem on St. Patrick's Rule of Discipline, and a fabulous account of the origin of St. Patrick's Purgatory at Lough Derg.

<sup>64</sup> These tracts have been described, in Professor Eugene O'Curry's Catalogue.

<sup>65</sup> Again, the folio paper MS., in the R.I.A., and classed 39. 6., contains a Dialogue between St. Patrick and the two survivors of Fian-na Eirionn, Caoilte Mac Ronain and Oisín.

<sup>66</sup> It is classed, 23 Q. 18., at p. 141.

<sup>67</sup> It only contains four quatrains. See vol. xxii., p. 325 of the O'Longan Collection, R.I.A. Small 4to.

<sup>68</sup> In Irish, cloc na cceit.

<sup>69</sup> See the O'Longan Collection, R.I.A., vol. xxii., p. 336. Small 4to.

<sup>70</sup> It is classed, No. 223, and it is in a large 4to parchment MS.

<sup>71</sup> It is classed, 23. A. 15, and it is found at p. 306. Also, in the Manuscript, classed

The following pretentious compositions are, also, extant : A Poem,<sup>74</sup> by St. Patrick, on the Hawthorn Bush of Emania, &c. A Poem,<sup>75</sup> by St. Patrick, on Cloch na Cet, now the Rock of Cashel. A Poem,<sup>76</sup> by St. Patrick, on Cloch na Ceann, now the Rock of Cashel. There is a Poem,<sup>77</sup> by St. Patrick, without title. Two stanzas, by St. Patrick, are in the Leabhar Breac, at fol. 42 (now 32) front margin. Again, we have copies of St. Patrick's Benediction to the People of Ireland.<sup>78</sup> In a 4to paper Manuscript, which contains 226 written pages, produced by Michael, son of Peter O'Longan, about the year 1760, there is a Hymnus Sancti Patricii.<sup>79</sup> Besides, there is a piece, called The Bequest or Testimony of St. Patrick.<sup>80</sup> This, however, is a vulgar forgery, in the opinion of Professor Eugene O'Curry.<sup>81</sup> Stanihurst<sup>82</sup> has published a Sermon, attributed to St. Patrick, and Messingham<sup>83</sup> has re-published this spurious production. The holy Apostle was imbued with the gift of prophecy,<sup>84</sup> and therefore it is not wonderful, that some of his attributed predictions should have come down to us.<sup>85</sup> There are some other unimportant tracts, relating to our saint, but these are hardly worth any serious notice.<sup>86</sup> The Irish reader, who is curious to discover further references to, and accounts concerning, our great Apostle, will find various entries, in the Manuscript literature of our national language.<sup>87</sup> It must be remarked, notwithstanding, 23. E. 16. at p. 400, line 13, another copy is met with.

<sup>72</sup> It contains twenty-eight verses, and it is in the third volume of O'Longan's MSS., in the R.I.A.

<sup>73</sup> It is found, in the celebrated "Liber Hymnorum," a Manuscript in Trinity College, Dublin, and classed E. 4. 2. See at num. 22.

<sup>74</sup> It is classed, as 23. G. 5., and it is found at p. 7, col. 2, in Hodges and Smith's collection, in the R.I.A.

<sup>75</sup> It is classed, 23. C. 19., and it is found, at p. 336, in the Betham Collection.

<sup>76</sup> This is classed, 23. L. 34., and it is found, at p. 309, line 5, in the Hodges and Smith Collection.

<sup>77</sup> This is classed, 23. Q., in a Manuscript, belonging to the Royal Irish Academy, at fol. 138.

<sup>78</sup> One is classed, 23 E. 26, and it is met with at p. 234. There is another copy in the Book of Ballymote, at fol. 153. There is one, also, in the Book of Lecan, at fol. 191.

<sup>79</sup> In vol. xviii., p. 90.

<sup>80</sup> It is classed, 23 Q. 18, and it is found at p. 61.

<sup>81</sup> According to a remark made, in describing the contents of the Betham Collection, where the tract in question occurs. See p. 289.

<sup>82</sup> See "Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii.

<sup>83</sup> In his "Florilegium Insula Sanctorum," pp. 437 to 441. A further account of the writings, attributed to St. Patrick, will be found in Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. i., ii., pp. 212 to 215.

<sup>84</sup> We find a MS. yet extant, intituled : "Prophetia S. Patris Patricii de Dublinia," MS. Lambeth. 523 ff. 117-117 b. vell. 8vo., xiv. cent.

<sup>85</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. ii., pp. 208, 209.

<sup>86</sup> Such as, Legenda Brevis de S. Patricio MS. Arundel. 330. f. 13 b. vell. 8vo. dble. cols. xv. cent. This is a very short tract and of no historical value. Anonymi Carmina quaedam Anepigrapha de S. Patricio, Calpurnio et Cellano. MS. Laurentianæ Mediceæ. Num. ii. 812. Cod. vi.

<sup>87</sup> Thus, among the Royal Irish Academy's Collection, we may allude to that notice of St. Patrick, in the story known as the "Ghost of Cuchulainn's Chariot." Leabhar na Huidhre, fol. 74. a. There is a reference to St. Patrick, in the Sixth Age of the World, at fol. 4. a. b., and in the History of the Origin of the name of Finnloch-Ceara, in the Book of Ballymote, at fol. 206. b. a. Also, at what is designated Agallamh, in the same Manuscript, at fol. 200, b. b., line 1. The viii. vol. of O'Longan's MSS., in the R.I.A., contains a story of Holy Patrick, at p. 117. A Poem, said to have been extracted from an old Life of St. Patrick, is in the Betham Collection. See R.I.A. classification, 23. G. 21, p. 516. There is a reference to St. Patrick, in the Book of Lecan, at fol. 105, b. a., line 40. Also, in a Poem on Mogh Ruith, at fol. 133, b. a. Likewise, in the Derivation of Sliaibh Fuaid, at fol. 257, b. a., line 22. Also, at fol. 309, a. b., line 11. A stanza on Patrick Guiric, Laisren and Beoc, in the "Leabhar Breac," fol. 48 b. (now 38.) See R.I.A. copy. There is reference to St. Patrick, in the Manuscripts, classed, 23. G. 8, at fol. 31.; 23. H. 1. e. at p. 76, in a Poem of Oisín; 23. H. 1. j.; 23. L. 22. at Agallamh na Seanoiridhe; again, in 23. L. 22, at p. 316. Hodges and Smith Collection. References are made to St. Patrick, in those that many of the foregoing pieces<sup>88</sup> are spurious, unauthenticated, and written at times, long subsequent to the period of our great Patron Saint, so that we may regard them, as having no real value, to illustrate the present record of his life.

CHAPTER XXVI.

ST. PATRICK'S PREDICTION, THAT ST. BENIGNUS SHOULD SUCCEED HIM IN THE SEE OF ARMAGH—THE IRISH APOSTLE RECEIVES A WARNING FROM HEAVEN, REGARDING HIS DEATH, AND WHERE IT SHOULD TAKE PLACE—HE DEPARTS THIS LIFE AT SAUL—HIS FUNERAL OBSEQUIES—DISPUTE CONCERNING THE POSSESSION OF HIS SACRED REMAINS DETERMINED BY A MIRACLE—HIS BURIAL AT DOWNPATRICK.

ACCORDING to several of his Acts, the Irish Apostle announced, that St. Benignus should succeed him, in the See of Armagh; and, it is said, the event corresponded with such a prediction. Thus, Tirechan,<sup>1</sup> Probus,<sup>2</sup> the Third<sup>3</sup> and the Tripartite<sup>4</sup> Lives, with Jocelyn's Life<sup>5</sup> of our holy Apostle, all aver; but, it has been thought, only was that event accomplished, after St. Patrick's death.<sup>6</sup> However, the demise of St. Benignus has been placed, so early as A.D. 467 or 468.<sup>7</sup> Owing to this annalistic statement, Colgan felt so puzzled, that he threw out a most extravagant conjecture.<sup>8</sup> The Benignus, who died in 468, he thinks, ought to be regarded, as a different person from that Benignus, who succeeded after St. Patrick's death. Consequently, according to Colgan, the Armagh Benignus must have lived, after A.D. 493.

Manuscripts, classed 23. A. 40., at p. 65.; in 23. C. 18., at p. 28.; in 23. C. 33., at p. 177, in a Poem, by Caoilte; in 23. D. 9., at pp. 65, 408, and in the Synchronisms of the Saints; in 23. D. 15., at p. 138.; in 23. E. 16., at p. 354, in a Poem on the Christian Kings of Connaught; in 23. E. 20., at p. 19, at an account of Tara; in 23. E. 26., at p. 250; again, in 23. E. 26., at p. 185, and, again, at p. 301, where allusion is made to Cashel; in 23. F. 10., at p. 2.; in 23. F. 16., at p. 147, in a Poem on Tadhg O'Brien; in 23. K. 32., at pp. 150, 164, 181, 182, 196, 200, 202; in 23. M. 45., at p. 293, in relation with Oisín; in 23. Q. at fol. 127, b. a., where there is a Poem, by Caoilte. In the "Liber Hymnorum," a Manuscript, belonging to Trinity College, Dublin, and classed E. 4. 2., has at No. 1. A Latin Hymn in praise of St. Patrick. Also, at No. 19, the Irish Hymn of St. Fiech, first Bishop of Sletty, on St. Patrick, is given in 34 stanzas. A note is prefixed, giving an account of a dialogue, between St. Patrick and Dubtach, the poet and master of St. Fiech.

<sup>88</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," for an account of the writers, who have treated about St. Patrick. Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. iii., pp. 216 to 219.

CHAPTER XXVI.—<sup>1</sup> Tirechan has these words: "Ipse est Benignus episcopus successor Patricii in Ecclesia Machiæ."—Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 875.

<sup>2</sup> He thus states: "Jam te fili meum successorem dignum esse sentio futurum." See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. i., p. 52.

<sup>3</sup> In the Third Life, the saint is introduced, as saying of him: "quia mei heres regni est." See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxxvi., p. 24.

<sup>4</sup> The Tripartite states, that he also was destined to succeed in the Primacy. "Hic heres regni mei erit, hoc est, erit post me supremus Ecclesiæ Hibernicæ moderator." See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. i., cap. xlv., p. 124.

<sup>5</sup> Where he writes: "ipsum successorum ministerii sui, sicut et fuit, fore prædixit. Idem namque Benignus in regimine Pontificatus Primatusque totius Hiberniæ successit S. Patricio," &c. See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xxxix., p. 74. In another passage, Jocelyn represents St. Patrick, as retaining the primacy until the time of his death. See ibid., cap. xcxi., p. 107.

<sup>6</sup> This is stated, in a Life of St. Benignus, as also, in the Acts of St. Mochtheus, quoted by Ussher. See "De Primordiis," cap. xvii., p. 876.

<sup>7</sup> In the Ulster Annals. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 877. In Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 146, 147, and, also, in Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh" at Benignus, p. 35, the statement accords.

<sup>8</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. iii., p. 293.

<sup>9</sup> The Irish Apostle's retirement from the busy scenes of missionary life is beautifully told, in Aubrey De Vere's poem, "The Ar-

Being in Ulidia, full of days and of good works, and now faithfully finishing the time for his appointed ministry,<sup>9</sup> Patrick saw as well by Divine revelation, as by the threatening dissolution of his earthly tabernacle, that the evening of his life was drawing near.<sup>10</sup> This foreknowledge moved him to go towards the city of Armagh, which he earnestly desired to be the place for his resurrection. According to some accounts, the saint is said to have been at Saul,<sup>11</sup> when his last illness overtook him;<sup>12</sup> and, according to another account, at Dundaethglass, or Dunlethglaisse,<sup>13</sup> now the city of Down,<sup>14</sup> near the waters of Lough Strangford. It is better known still, as Downpatrick, having been called after the ancient Dun, or fortress, united with the name of our great Apostle. It is built, on the sides of several small hills. These form a sort of amphitheatre, by their convergence into that valley, through which the main street runs.<sup>15</sup> There, an ancient abbey and a beautiful round tower<sup>16</sup> formerly stood, at the south-west of Down Cathedral, but these structures were demolished in 1789.<sup>17</sup> They were placed on a high hill,<sup>18</sup> and somewhat separated from another, on which are the ruinous circumvallations of the ancient Dun-Keltair,<sup>19</sup> around the base of which the waters of Lough Strangford once flowed. The chief, from whom the fort derived its ancient name of Dun-Celtair, or Rath-Celtair, was Celtair, the son of Duach, one of the raignment of St. Patrick." See "The Legends of St. Patrick," pp. 194 to 209.

<sup>10</sup> Thus is this incident related, in St. Fiech's Hymn:—

patrick oimbar illobra docobra oul oo mache oo luro angel ara chenn forfet imme-oon'laiche.

It is thus rendered into English:—

"Patrick, when he was in sickness, desired to go to Ardmacagh:
An angel went to meet him on the road, in the middle of the day."

—See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 290, 291. See, likewise, Vita Prima S. Patricii or Fiech's Hymn, and the Scholiast ad Stroph. 23, 24, and nn. aa, bb, cc, pp. 3, 5, 6. We are told, by Colgan, this angel was a distinct one from Victor, and that he was sent by the latter, to dissuade St. Patrick from his original purpose.

<sup>11</sup> So states, the Scholiast on St. Fiech's Hymn. St. Patrick lived here, according to his bardic testament, for thirty years.

<sup>12</sup> See the Tripartite Life, lib. iii., cap. clxvii. Also, Fiech's Scholiast ad Strophe 23, nn. (aa), p. 5. "Trias Thaumaturga."

<sup>13</sup> It is said to have been so called, from the circumstance of an Angel having set at liberty a captive, who was confined in this fort, by breaking asunder his glass or fetters.

<sup>14</sup> See Vita Tertia S. Patricii., cap. lxxviii., p. 28.

<sup>15</sup> See J. B. Doyle's "Tours in Ulster," p. 73.

<sup>16</sup> Owing to the barbarous, ruthless, tasteless, unjustifiable conduct of certain parties, then connected with the town or county, that venerable monument was pulled down, the mischievous hand of man doing more in a short time, than the lightnings and storms of heaven did, perhaps, in a thousand years.

<sup>17</sup> Incidentally, while delivering an interesting antiquarian discourse in Downpatrick, the learned lecturer, Rev. William Reeves, referred to the round towers, which he held were places of refuge in the times of invasion, for those who were attached to the services of the adjoining churches, or who lived in the adjacent monastic establishments, as well as for depositing therein the utensils used in the performance of worship. See Report in the Ulster Observer of September 29th, 1864.

<sup>18</sup> The accompanying illustration of the former Round Tower and Cathedral, at Down, has been drawn by William F. Wakeman, on the wood, and taken from an original sketch, in the possession of Very Rev. Dean Reeves. The engraving is by Mrs. Millard. The Cathedral was rebuilt in 1790.

<sup>19</sup> In his interesting and learned Lecture, during the month of September, 1864, before the Downpatrick Young Men's Christian Association, the Rev. William Reeves says, that it is "one of the finest specimens of Celtic entrenchments to be found in the West of Europe. No one can walk round the fosses and entrenchments of that enormous structure, without being forcibly struck by their extent and boldness; and if disposed to carry the imagination backwards, one may picture to the mind the stirring scenes which passed here, when that great munition was in its full strength and beauty, and filled with a dense assembly of rude but powerful occupants; when its trenches were deep and filled with water; when its ramparts were lofty and pallisaded; and when chiefs with celebrated heroes of what was called the Red Branch Order in this country, and descended from Rury Mor, in the illustrious line of the Clanna Rury. He was the son of Uitechar, son to Fachtna, son of Rury. And Conchobhar MacNessa, King of Ulster, was brother to his father Uitechar. Cumcraigh, son of this Connor MacNessa, was his first cousin, and he was King of Ulster, reigning at Emania, A.D. 53. Amidst all the fiction and hyperbole, which characterize the bardic stories of Ireland, we can, in this case, discern some vestiges of true history, and pronounce of this Dun, that about the Christian era, it was the abode of a famous chief, far and wide renowned for his military exploits. He belonged to a distinguished race, which left its impress upon many places in the vicinity, where their names are to this day preserved; while many of the principal families, belonging to the adjacent district, derived their origin from the stock of whom he descended. Several ancient roads branch from the Cathedral, and from Dun-Keltair, in various directions. The celebrated old fortress,<sup>20</sup> lying on the north-west side of the town, takes up a vast extent of ground, and it comprehends, at least, three quarters of an English mile, within the circuit of all its works. The circumference, at least, is 2,100 feet; the conical height is 60 feet; while the diameter at the top bears a just proportion, with the other parts. The their golden collars, and bards with their tuneful harps, represented the military and social excellence of their day."

Downpatrick Cathedral and Round Tower, as they stood in the Eighteenth Century.

<sup>20</sup> Dr. John O'Donovan, who visited Downpatrick, in April, 1834, thus writes regarding it: "The rath near Downpatrick is the largest barbaric fortress I have yet seen. Sir James King called it, in 1612, 'the round mount, alias Downeroskæ,' but it is unquestionably the Down Celtair and Arx Lethglasse of the old writers of the Life of St. Patrick. Downeroskæ seems a name derived from its situation, and signifying, 'the fortress in the marsh.' It was anciently, and to a late period, almost entirely surrounded with water, and that part of it to which there was access from dry land is considerably higher and more steep than where it was surrounded by the water."—"The County of Down Ordnance Survey Letters." Letter of John O'Donovan, dated from Downpatrick, April 28th, 1834, p. 98.

most considerable of the three great artificial ramparts surrounding it cannot be less than thirty feet broad.<sup>21</sup>

According to some respectable authorities, and to tradition, over the church he established, at Down, St. Patrick governed as its first bishop, the Primatial See of Armagh not having been founded for many years afterwards, as appears by all the Lives of our illustrious Apostle.<sup>22</sup> That he was the first bishop, over Down, continued to be the living tradition of the country, so late as 1680.<sup>23</sup> And, it would seem, that he used often to resort thither, even to the very close of his life. Then, while on his way southwards towards Armagh, according to the legend of his Acts,<sup>24</sup> a bush seemed to be in a blaze,<sup>25</sup> and from it the Angel Victor came. He spoke to holy Patrick these words: "It is not there thy resurrection hath been decreed; go back to the Sabhall, that place whence you came; for, it is there God hath decreed, that you shall die, and not in Ard-Macha. God has granted thee, that thy dignity and rule, thy devotion and teaching, shall be in Ard-Macha, as if thou thyself wert alive there."<sup>26</sup> Whereupon, hearing these words of the Angel, the saint was grieved; but, quickly returning to himself, he embraced that mandate of Divine Providence, with much devotion and thanksgiving, while submitting his own will to the will of God, he returned unto Ulidia.

The Angel left advice with St. Patrick, as to how he should be buried; because, a contest was anticipated, among the people of different territories, <sup>21</sup> See Walter Harris' "Ancient and Present State of the County of Down," chap. xvii., p. 220.

<sup>22</sup> During his lifetime, we have records of bishops at Raholp and Bright—writes Mr. John W. Hanna, in a learned article, contributed to the Ulster Weekly Examiner of June 8th, 1872. From this we have drawn much valuable information. After the bishops alluded to, no successors appear. It would be marvellous, and contrary to their ecclesiastical discipline, if Down and Saul should have no governing bishop.

<sup>23</sup> Then, one Downing, in his manuscript description of the county, written for Sir William Petty, and preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, expressly writes:—"This town was the first place in this kingdom that St. Patrick was bishop of, though in Armagh is the Primacy of this kingdom * * * and for proof of Down being the first Bishoprick, I have observed on the epitaph of Meilerus M'Grath, Lord Archbishop of Cashel, who was first of all Lord Bishop of Down, before he conform'd to the reformed religion, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, the verses are as followeth, these being the first two disticks thereof:—

"Venerat in Dunum primo sanctissimus olim, Patricius, nostri gloria magna soli.
Huic ego succedens, utinam tam sanctus ut ille,
Sic Duni primo tempore Præsul eram.

Which has been thus translated by Harris, in his edition of "Ware's Bishops:"—

"Patrick, the glory of our Isle and Gown,
First sat a Bishop in the See of Down.

I wish that I, succeeding him in place
As Bishop, had an equal share of grace."

—Vol. i., "Archbishops of Cashel," p. 485.

<sup>24</sup> Thus is the matter related, in the 24th and 25th stanzas of St. Fiach's Hymn:—

Do raith rader co tictor, ba he aitho palartar, Lappair in muine imbat, ar in ten do-gladartar.

Arbert orosan do mache, do cruir atlaigte buioe,
Do chum nime moirrega, po ratha uir ou gure.

These stanzas are thus rendered into English:—

"Patrick came southwards towards Victor;
he it was that went to meet him:
The bush, in which Victor rested, was in a blaze: from the flame he (the angel) spoke.

"He said: Thy dignity (shall be) at Armagh: return thanks to Christ:
To Heaven thou shalt come; thy prayer is granted thee."

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 290, 291. See, Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxviii., p. 28. Also, Probus, or Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxii., p. 60.

<sup>25</sup> This has a probable original, in our Lord speaking to Moyses, from the burning bush. See Exodus, iii.

for the possession of his sacred remains. The following directions were then given : First, that two young and strong oxen should be brought from the herds of Conall's territory, viz. : from Finnabhair, or Clocher ; and that, after death, Patrick's body should be placed in a wagon, to be drawn by them, so that what way soever those young oxen might go of their own accord, such place where they stopped must be the locality selected for his interment. Secondly, it was ordered, that his remains should be buried deeply in the earth, so that the height of a man or a cubit must mark his grave, and that the precious remains might not be taken out of it. The blessed Patrick assented to these commands of the Angel, and then he returned to Saul. There he disposed all his temporal and eternal affairs, while waiting for his final summons.

Within a few days after this, as the most holy senior, St. Patrick, sat near the city of Down, and not far from its church, he preached regarding the glory of Heaven, to a great multitude of religious and ecclesiastical men. Then, a wonderful splendour illuminated a certain place, in the eastern part of the churchyard. The pearl of Ireland, the illustrious St. Brigid, happened to be present.<sup>27</sup> The saint commanded her, to declare this mystery of, and to account for, that Divine light. She then told, in the hearing of all the assembly, how that celestial light had consecrated and designated the place, where a saint, most glorious and most dear to God, should shortly be interred. Then, a holy virgin,<sup>28</sup> named Ethembria,<sup>29</sup> who was there, asked St. Brigid, to particularize the great person, who should there be deposited. The holy Brigid thereupon declared, that it should be the place of sepulture, for the Patron and Apostle of Ireland, St. Patrick ; and, then, added further, that she would account herself most happy, if his sacred body might be wrapped in a winding-sheet, which she had spun and woven with her own hands. This she had prepared, for such a sacred purpose. Soon, the great light disappeared, but a vision of St. Patrick ascending to Heaven accompanied its vanishing. The blessed Apostle, knowing by Divine inspiration the holy virgin's desire, commanded her to go, and to bring that sheet, wherein the illustrious woman would have his body wrapt. He then went to the monastery of Saul, where falling sick, he expected the end of this life, or rather the beginning of another life that hath no end. The holy virgin Brigid was so wearied with the length and difficulty of her journey, that she could not come to him, so soon as she purposed.<sup>30</sup> The Blessed Bishop, knowing in what distress the pious virgin was, sent chariots, to meet herself, and four other pious virgins, coming to Saul, where the saint lay sick. She soon presented him with the

<sup>26</sup> Jocelyn adds the following words : "Therefore, remember thy word, where-with thou gavest hope unto thy first converts, the sons of Dichu, when instructed of heaven, thou didst foretel unto them, that in their land thou wouldst die and be buried."

<sup>27</sup> The Fourth Life has it, that the multitude there "quidam beatam Brigidam interrogant," as if she were distinct from the great Patroness of Ireland. Then, however, do we read : "Quæ respondit ; Non me sed S. Patricium interrogate. Audiens autem Patricius S. Brigidam loquentem dixit ; Æqualiter sumus : quapropter hujus rei mysterium revela presentibus. At illi illa inquit ; Angeli sui est visitatio cujusdam sancti viri ad locum sepulchri ejus, quo corpus ejus requiescet. Patricius deinde puto ait, animam fore propriori in loco, qui vestem quiescenti dabit. Brigidam dixit ; Ego si proxima essem, vestimentum dedissem. Beatus vero Patricius respondit ; expectabit egens : venias. Quedam verò sanctimonialis Virgo B. Brigidam de paupere secreto sciscitata est. Cui Brigida ait ; Sanctus Pater noster Patricius proximo huic loco sepultus jacebit ; et non post multum ad alterum transferetur, ibique sanctum ipsius et venerabile corpus requiescet."

<sup>28</sup> Nothing seems to be known with certainty, regarding this saint, who is also called Cethuberis. Some other variations of her name occur. See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, nn. 82, 181, pp. 112, 116.

<sup>29</sup> She was the first nun, in all Ireland, who had embraced virginity, and who had been consecrated by St. Patrick.

<sup>30</sup> The Fourth Life of St. Patrick states, that she journeyed to the plain of Bregia, for this purpose, with five virgins, when sheet, which he received very gratefully. Then, kissing his feet and hands, she and her virgins received his last benediction.

Spent in years, and weakness of body coming on him, as closed the gate of life on earth, the portals of Heaven began to open before Patrick's view, bringing the crown to release him from all infirmity. The Angel had admonished the holy man, to receive the last Sacraments, at the hands of his disciple St. Tassach,<sup>31</sup> the Bishop.<sup>32</sup> Elevating his eyes, Patrick saw Jesus, standing in the midst of a multitude of Angels. Then, blessing his disciples, and rendering thanks to God, he passed out of this life, resigning his spirit to Heaven. Thus was he destined to see the Lord, face to face. His blessed soul was received into the joy of life supernal, by the all-immaculate Virgin, the Mother of God, and by sacred choirs of Virgins, with the Patriarchs, Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors, and the Angels. No wonder that he was honoured by all the saints, since there shone in him the virtues of all the saints. An Angel he was, not alone by nature, but by his virtues and office; for, his lips kept science, and the law of life, which he taught to the people. He was a Prophet, for few of the Prophets were imbued with a greater foresight of future things. He may well be regarded as an Apostle, for everywhere in Ireland, and in the neighbouring Islands, it is said, he left proofs of his Apostleship. A Martyr he was, in regard of the many conflicts he had against kings, Magicians, Idolaters, and Devils, even although his life was spared, notwithstanding his many trials. Rightly was he called the Confessor of God, who continually preached the name of Christ, and who, by his words, his example, and his miracles, excited people, tribes and tongues, to the confession of God's name, against human sin, and in favour of the Divine promise. Rightly was he called a virgin, who remained a virgin in his body, in his heart, and in his faith, and by his three-fold virginity, who pleased the Spouse of virgins, and the Virgin of virgins. Rightly is he numbered among the angelic choirs, and the assemblies of all saints, who was the sharer in all holy acts, and the exemplar of all virtues. It has been stated, that for three-and-thirty years, he gave himself to the sweet rest of contemplation, either at Armagh, or at Saul monastery. During this time, he never went abroad, according to the same authority, unless it were for great affairs. It is said, he held a Council once each year, for the redress of existing abuses, or to serve the good government of those churches he had founded.<sup>33</sup> Notwithstanding the foregoing statement, we they all sat down wearied, "ad lapidem Ailbe." No attempt has hitherto been made to discover this ancient monument.

<sup>31</sup> The Third Life has "dedit ei sacrificium Episcopus Tassach."—Cap. lxxxix., p. 28, and n. 86, p. 35. So state the O'Clerys, likewise, in their Calendar, where they add, "This is related in the Quatrain, beginning: 'The royal Bishop Tasach,'" &c. His Natal Day was held, on the 14th of April, according to St. Ængus, the Martyrologies of Tallagh and of Marianus O'Gorman, at Rath-Colptha, or Kill-Chlopta, near Down.

<sup>32</sup> In St. Fiech's Hymn, this matter is thus stated:—

ANAIR TAPPACH DIAER INTAN DO BEIR COM-MAN DO,
ARBEIR MONICREO PATPAICE, BPAATHAP
TAPPACH NI BU SO.

It is thus rendered into English:—

"Tassach remained after him (in Sabhall), having given the Communion to him:

He said that Patrick would return: the word of Tassach was not false."

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 290, 291. See also Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Prima Vita S. Patricii, Strophe 27, p. 3, and n. (dd.) of the Scholiast, as, also, n. 19, p. 6. See, also, Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxv., p. 60, and n. 35, p. 64.

<sup>33</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Prima Vita S. Patricii, strophes 23, 24, 25, 26, p. 3, and nn. (aa. bb. cc.), pp. 5, 6, Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxviii., lxxxix., p. 28, and n. 82, p. 34. Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xci., xciii., xciv., pp. 46, 47, and nn. 74, 75, p. 50. Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxii., xxxv., xxxvii., p. 60. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap.

can hardly believe, that St. Patrick spent the last thirty years of his life, at Saul. Another St. Patrick is said to have died, and about the same time with the great Apostle, when both their souls went together to Heaven.<sup>34</sup> As the name of St. Patrick of Nola<sup>35</sup> could not have been known to St. Fiach, it appears, he could not have been that other Patrick, to whom he made allusion. Again, the Patrick Senior, having had his day assigned to the 24th of August, excludes him from consideration; although, the Scholiast on St. Ængus seems to have thus understood it; but, his assertion has been well corrected by Colgan. For a precisely similar reason, he could not have been a St. Patrick of Nevers.<sup>36</sup> It must be remarked, however, that Colgan, while confounding Nivernensis with Arvernensis, says, Patricius Nivernensis was revered, on the 16th of March. Now, in some old Martyrologies, a St. Patrick of Auvergne has a festival placed, at that particular date.<sup>37</sup> This might have furnished occasion for supposing him to have ascended to Heaven, and nearly on the same day with our great Apostle. But, excellent critics, who have examined this question, seem to think, that through some error of entry in the Calendars, St. Patrick of Auvergne must be deemed identical with the great Apostle of Ireland. All our authorities are agreed, that the latter departed this life, on the 17th day of March; and, according to one account, this happened just seven days, after he had returned to Saul.<sup>38</sup> We have already alluded to a supposition, that the Irish Apostle spent his last days clxxxvii., clxxxviii., clxxxix., cxc., xcxi., pp. 106, 107. The Latin Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, lib. iii., cap. ci., cii., ciii., pp. 167, 168. Also, the Irish Version of the Tripartite, as translated in Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," pp. 497, 498.

<sup>34</sup> The matter is thus stated, in the Hymn of St. Fiech:—

intan conhuatai patranc, do ella in patranc naile, ir malle connubachpat, voohum nru meicc maire.

This stanza is thus rendered into English:—

"When Patrick departed (from life), he went to visit the other Patrick;
Together they ascended to Jesus, Son of Mary."

—"Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iv., pp. 292, 293.

<sup>35</sup> He is mentioned, in Ferrarius' "Catalogus Sanctorum Italie." But, Ughelli supposes him to be the Irish St. Patrick. See "Italia Sacra," tomus vi.

<sup>36</sup> A Patricius Nivernensis is noticed, in the Usuard and in the Roman Martyrologies.

<sup>37</sup> In the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., xvi. Martii, among the Sancti Præmissi et in alios dies relati, p. 417, they thus notice: "S. Patricii Episcopi et Confessoris depositio Avernis, sive Arvernens, memoratur apud Usuardum, Bellinum, Galensinum, et in hodierno Martyrol. Rom. in cuius Notis haeret dubius Baronius cum inter episcopos Arvernenses non recenseatur, et tandem putat errore prætermisum, nisi alterius fortassis civitatis Episcopus fuerit. Joannes Savaro, vir eruditus, in Originibus Arvernensibus, censis et recensis latè hoc dubium deducit, asseritque nullum vestigium esse apud Arvernos nominis, reliquiarum, aut alicujus cultus S. Patricii Episcopi, sed hunc in prædictis Martyrologiis allegatum alium non esse quam S. Patricium Episcopum Hiberniae, sive Hiverniae, pro quò voce alibi substitutam fuisse Arverniae, sive Averniae, maximè cum primo loco apud Usuardum sequenti die legatur, Natalis S. Patricii Episcopi et Confessoris in Scotia; a quo die ob ejus Vigiliam ad ultimum hujus diei locum potuit in nonnullis fastis translatus fuisse, ac tandem loco Vigiliæ intrusum fuisse nomen depositionis, quod absque ulteriore examine potuit descriptum deinceps fuisse. Tamais Salazar in Martyrolog. Hispan. arreptò hac occasione dubitantium aut rejicientium S. Patricium Aruernensium Episcopum, statuit eum fuisse Patricium Episcopum Malacitanum in Baetica, qui interfuit Concilio Iliberitano. Verùm hunc Malacitani non agnoscunt Sanctum, ut constat ex libro Martini de Roè de Malacà urbe et ejus Sanctis. Plura de eo non occurrunt."

<sup>38</sup> Probus thus writes: "Hæc Angeli dicta post septim dies, in die scilicet xvi. Calend. Aprilis expleta sunt circa B. Patricium, peractis totius vitæ ejus cxxx. duobus annis, sicut in omnibus Hiberniæ finibus celebratur."—Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxiii., p. 60. Colgan, however, fancies, that the error of a copyist must have put cxxx, for cxx, as the latter number best accords with the general statement of his biographers, while it is more probable. See n. 33, p. 64, ibid.

at Glastonbury, and that there he had been interred.<sup>39</sup> Some accounts have it, indeed, that St. Patrick had been buried, in the old church of Glastonbury, on the right side of the altar—an Angel having revealed God's will to this effect, and a great light or flame breaking out of the same place. Here, the holy body was placed, in a pyramidal tomb, richly covered with silver and gold.<sup>40</sup> However, the foregoing tradition must have reference to a St. Patrick, quite distinct from the Irish Apostle.

A number of monks stood around the bed of their holy founder, while the dying Apostle commended his soul to the Almighty; and, they wrapped around him that shroud, prepared by the hands of St. Brigid. A very great multitude of clergy and laity flocked to the place;<sup>41</sup> where, with tears and sighs, they mourned for the desolation occasioned to the Irish Church. Yet, they were consoled, as on the very first night, after his departure, the Angels of the Lord of Elements watched Patrick's body, a miraculous light having spread all over the place,<sup>42</sup> and a wonderful melody chiming with their spiritual chants.<sup>43</sup> The mortals who were present seemed ravished with the sights and sounds, until sleep stole over them;<sup>44</sup> but, on the following morning, those Angels disappeared, when they awoke, and fragrant odours of Divine Grace were typified by those, which issued from the sacred body;<sup>45</sup> while the angelic music<sup>46</sup> gave tranquillity and joy to the chief clerics of the men of Erin, who watched<sup>47</sup> the body for twelve days and nights, following his death.<sup>48</sup> During this period, a great controversy had arisen, among the clergy and people, regarding the place where he should be interred. This, like many

<sup>39</sup> See also, Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," pp. 22, 23.

<sup>40</sup> His memory is said to have been so amous there, that the church was called St. Mary's and St. Patrick's; while his relics were kept, until the old structure was burned. About A.D. 1186, they were taken up, with those of St. Gildas, and of others, when they were put into shrines, and translated into the new church. See Father Peter Ribadeneira's "Lives of the Saints," &c., translated by W. P., Esq., part i., p. 159.

<sup>41</sup> According to St. Fiach's Hymn, 31st stanza:—

Clerich hérenn bollotar, dárú patracco ar cech rē, son in cetaíl fórrólach, contuíl cach uáioib for rē.

It is thus rendered into English:—

"The clergy of Erin went from every part to watch around Patrick,
The sound of harmony fell upon them, so that they slept, enchanted on the way."

<sup>42</sup> This report may have arisen, from the use of lights, during the time of Divine service, and while the sacred body was waked. Those were more or less numerous, according to the rank of deceased persons. They were used, likewise, in funeral processions. See Bingham's "Origines Ecclesiasticæ," book xxiii., chap. 2.

<sup>43</sup> The Hymn of St. Fiach states, at the 32nd stanza:—

ainm patracco fua choip, ir iar rētaib porcapao, aingil dé icet aroche, aropetir cen anao.

It is thus rendered into English:—

"Patrick's body from his soul was severed after pains;
The angels of God, on the first night, kept choir around it unceasingly."

<sup>44</sup> Probus relates, that on the first night, the obsequies being celebrated by Angels, the clergy and people suddenly fell asleep. See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxvi., p. 60.

<sup>45</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life, in allusion to this miracle, remarks, that the blessing of Jacob to his son was kept regarding him, i.e. "Ecce odor filii mei sicut odor agri pleni, quem benedixit dicens," &c.

<sup>46</sup> Whether the concentus superni of St. Fiach's Hymn refer to Angels, or to clerics, does not seem to be very clear. See Prima Vita S. Patricii, stanzas 31, 32, p. 3.

<sup>47</sup> This custom of holding wakes is still prevalent, in all Catholic countries. It was considered an act of respect, to keep lights around a corpse in the place—regularly a church or a chapel—where it was deposited, and watched until the time of burial. Constantine's body was surrounded with lights, and watched for several days and nights. See Eusebius' "Vita Constantini," lib. iv., cap. lxvi. Hence came what are called wakes.

<sup>48</sup> St. Gregory of Nyssa says, that the

another event in the Apostle's Acts, was determined by Divine interposition. It would seem, that services of more than usual magnificence and solemnity were employed, in the waking and interment of this great founder of the Irish Church. For twelve days,<sup>49</sup> and as many nights, the solemnities for waking the holy Apostle of Ireland were continued.<sup>50</sup> The monks and the divines sang requiem hymns, and psalms, with canticles, appropriate for the occasion.<sup>51</sup> An extraordinary portent betokened his happiness. There was no night, for the people of Magh-Inis, during that whole interval;<sup>52</sup> while, an angelic illumination seemed diffused over the entire firmament. Some even stated, persons watching the body of his sister Macrina sang psalms during the whole night. See Vita Macrinæ. To this singing by night, during the obsequies of St. Patrick, is probably to be referred what we find in Fiech's Hymn, at stroph. 31, in Colgan's Latin translation: "Sonus concentus superni reddebat ipsos sopore irruente ubi humi decumbentes." By concentus superni, we may understand, "singing psalms and hymns," this being a sort of celestial music. In Lynch's translation, we have, instead of concentus superni, the "musical instrument." Could it be that instrumental music was allowed, at the obsequies of our saint? This should form a singular exception to the Church's practice in those days. Although the Jews, in their watchings or wakes of the dead, had that custom (Matt. ix. 23.); yet, among Christians, no other than vocal music seems to have been allowed in their religious ceremonies, at least until a period, much later than that of St. Patrick's death. Dr. Lanigan tells us, that he knew too little of the Irish language, to be able to unravel that obscure passage; but, if anything like a musical instrument were mentioned in it, he should be inclined to think, that it was either a bell—for the use of bells was very ancient in Ireland—or some sonorous instrument, such as the trumpets of those ancient Egyptian monks, by which the time for attending service was announced. The effect of this instrumental sound or noise should be, to rouse people from their sleep, not to bury them in sleep, as Lynch's translation runs.

<sup>49</sup> Jocelyn, at cap. xciii., p. 108, and Probus (lib. ii., cap. xxxiv.), p. 60, have this statement. The Tripartite Life—both the Latin and Irish version—is also of accord. See lib. iii., cap. cv., p. 168.

<sup>50</sup> In St. Fiach's Hymn, stanzas 28, 29, 30, the matter is thus related:—

Samaigeir cñich fñi arochí, ar na caite leí occaí,
Co cenn bliadna baí foillíre, ba he ríth laíthe foíraí.

In each fechtá imbethron, fñi tuaithe
Canan la mac nua,
Aroich in gñuan fñi Sabon írreo aroíet líteíu sun.

huair aroich la héru ingrian, fñi baí inna clóen,
Cíarú eínebeich ba huíre, foillíu fñi eíreche na noeb.

They are thus rendered into English:—

"He (St. Patrick) put an end to night; light ceased not with him;
To a year's end there was radiance; it was a long day of peace.

"At the battle fought around Beth-horon against the Canaanites by the son of Nun
The sun stood still at Gabaon: this it is that the Scripture tells us.

"The sun lasted with Josue, unto the death of the wicked: this indeed was befitting;
It was more befitting that there should be radiance, at the death of the saints."

<sup>51</sup> This mode of celebrating funeral obsequies seems to have been an ancient practice, in the Christian Church. Thus, St. Jerome, in Epitaph. Fabiolæ, cap. iv., thus describes her funeral service: "Sonabant Psalmi, et aurata templorum tecta reboans in sublime quatiebat Alleluia."

<sup>52</sup> In the Hymn of St. Fiech, it is compared to the long day caused by the standing of the sun for Joshua against Gabaon. See Prima Vita S. Patricii, stanzas 29, 30, p. 3.

<sup>53</sup> According to the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, some said, that this preternatural light lasted for a whole year. See Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. cvi., p. 168. This account seems to have been borrowed from the words of Fiech's Hymn: "Spatio unius anni continuata lux erat." See Prima Vita S. Patricii, stanza 28, p. 3. Lynch's translation has: "Till the year's end," viz. —from the 17th March—"continued the lights." The meaning of the author is very clear, from the sequel. He attributes this continuation of light or lights, to the celebration of St. Patrick's obsequies, and to the conflux of clergymen. As to his making it last for a year, or great part of a year, it can be explained by supposing, that various commemorations were held, from time to time, which might have been repeated, until that there was light in Magh-Inis, for the duration of a year,<sup>53</sup> after St. Patrick's death.<sup>54</sup>

When due honour had been shown to the precious remains of this ever-glorious Apostle, and when the strains of sacred music had ceased, as also the clerical and lay watching over his body, preparations were made for the interment. That enthusiastic love for their great departed benefactors—so inherent in the Celtic character—caused a passionate eagerness, among the people, to possess St. Patrick's remains, and to have these interred in their particular locality. Thus, the Ulidians, against the Ui-Neill and Airghialla,<sup>55</sup> contended for their right to preserve, in Ulidia, the venerated relics of the holy man. The Airghialla and Ui-Neill tried to take the body to Ard-Macha, because he had there founded his Archiepiscopal See. Thus arose a great conflict, between those provinces of Erin, already named; while, the opposing parties met in battle array, and with arms, to enforce their hostile purposes. Yet, even in this emergency, from the Heavens was heard a voice, which the disputants believed to be that of St. Patrick.<sup>56</sup> In accordance with an advice, given by the Angel, before the Apostle's death, and following an account, which is found in the Book of Armagh,<sup>57</sup> in the place which is called Clogher,<sup>58</sup> at the east of Findubrec, the people selected oxen, from among the cattle of Conail, and they departed, the Son of God guiding them to Dun-leth-glaise, or Down. For, when the Angel came to St. Patrick, he gave this advice, regarding his burial: "Let the untamed oxen be allowed they closed with the anniversary. That St. Fiech, or the author of the Hymn, did not mean day-light, during that whole time, is evident from his saying, that Angels attended on the first night of the obsequies. See ibid., stanza 32. Probus, also, mentions nights, during this celebration. See Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxvi., p. 60. Hence, Dr. Lanigan suspects, that what occurs, about the miraculous long day, is an interpolation, and more especially, as it is rather misplaced. See ibid., cap. xxxiv., and also Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. xiii., nn. 138, 139, 140, 141, 145, pp. 365, 366.

<sup>54</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life, relating this wonderful portent, adds, "Quia nulli adanti viri meritum declarandum accidisse dubium est, et ita non visa nox in tota illa regione in tempore luctus Patricii, qualiter Ezechiae langenti in horologio Achaz demonstrato sanitatis indicio, sol per xv. lineas reversus est, et sic sol contra Gabon, et luna contra vallem Achilon stetit." In some particulars, this differs from the Latin version of the Life.

<sup>55</sup> In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, the Ardmachians are distinguished, as the Hua-Kellii and the Origillii. Probus distinguishes the contending factions, as the Ultonians, on the one side; and the Oriental people of Ireland, on the other. This statement serves to show his ignorance of Irish topography. The Ultu and the Harthirii are named as disputants, in the Third Life.

<sup>56</sup> So state the Sixth and Seventh Lives of St. Patrick, when giving the traditional story, regarding this miraculous occurrence.

<sup>57</sup> Although the "Tripartite" and the "Book of Armagh" are evidently compiled from the same materials, which are now lost; yet, the latter is much fuller in details, regarding St. Patrick's interment. That translation, by the late Sir William Betham, as published in his "Irish Antiquarian Researches," in 1827, though somewhat faulty and incorrect, is the version here referred to.

<sup>58</sup> According to W. J. Hanna, in the "Trias Thaumaturga," at p. 168, Colgan incorrectly denominates this as Clocher, in the country of Finnaur, in the region of Conall—that is, Maghera Connal, the present County Louth; and, in his notes, he absurdly makes it the church of Kill-clochar, now the parish of Clogher, in the barony of Ferrard, in that county. Thus, he makes them travel upwards of forty miles for the oxen, whereas it is obviously the present Finabrogue, in the parish of Inch, on the west margin of the River Quoile or Coyle, in the eastern part of which lies Cloghagh Wood. This exactly corresponds with the narrative, in the "Book of Armagh," and it is marked, on the Ordinance Sheet of County Down, No. 37, as lying not more than a mile distant from Saul, the place of the saint's death. The Conail, whose property the oxen were, was, probably, Conal, son of Coelbadh, King of Ulidia, so frequently mentioned in the Lives of the saint. He was ancestor of the family of Magenis, lords of Iveagh, his brother Saran being ancestor of the Macartans, lords of Kinalarty.

<sup>59</sup> The Book of Armagh has it, that a dire

to proceed wherever they wish, and where they shall rest, let a church be founded there, in honour of your body." Wherefore, as the Angel said, those unsteady steers were chosen, and a cart of steady weight was placed upon their shoulders, on which they carried the sacred body. However, the Ulidians and Ui-Neills,<sup>59</sup> who formerly were friends and neighbours, soon became the direst enemies. Even to the strait,<sup>60</sup> which is called Collum Bovis, or Drumbo,<sup>61</sup> blood was shed, on account of St. Patrick. However, the mercy of God interposed, the sea<sup>62</sup> shaking and swelling with waves, and the hollow summits of the billows breaking, sometimes against the coast and promontories, and sometimes, with curled surge, rushing through the yellow valleys to the place of contest, as if to restrain the fury of the enraged natives.<sup>63</sup> To end that bloody strife, as Jocelyn states, Divine Providence had substituted before the Ardmachians' eyes a phantasmal wain, which resembled so fully the true one, that being persuaded it was the same, which carried the rich treasure of the saint's sacred body, the people followed it, so far as the River Caucune,<sup>64</sup> on the confines of Armagh province.<sup>65</sup> There, that imaginary contention and war arose, between the descendants of Neill, and those of the eastern parts, the people of Orior.

<sup>60</sup> According to the Irish Tripartite Life, the Ui-Neill went to a certain water [river] there, when the river rose against them, through the power of God. When the flood left the river, the hosts—the Ui-Neill and the Ulidians—proceeded to quarrel.

<sup>61</sup> On the identification of this place, a learned paper, by W. J. Hanna of Downpatrick, obtained insertion in the Belfast Examiner, of 5th of January, 1871. In No. XXI. of the "Papers on Down and Connor" the Rev. James O'Lavery, P.P. of Holywood, brought forward arguments, to identify Drumbo, the scene of the contention, between the Ulidians and the Hy-Nialls, for the honour of the sepulture of St. Patrick, as Lismoghagh, near the Blackstaff Bridge, on the inner bay of Dundrum. This, too, is the Rev. Dr. Reeves' suggestion.

<sup>62</sup> Jocelyn also alludes to this swelling of the sea. From such an allusion, and from other passages in St. Patrick's Acts, of a like import, Mr. W. J. Hanna concludes, that Drumboe, or "Collum Bovis," adjoined the sea, not far from Saul, that it lay in the north of Lecale, and could not by any possibility be a Drumbo, near Lisburn, which is completely inland.

<sup>63</sup> In a note, to his "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," the Rev. Dr. Todd writes, this was "probably a ford on the narrow inlet of Strangford Lough, called Quoile, which separates Inch parish from Saul."—Chap. iii., n. 2, p. 492. Mr. W. J. Hanna also argues, with much critical acumen, that this unquestionably was the place, where the present Quoile Bridge stands, as it answers all the requirements of the biographers, and it led directly to the county of Armagh. On Quoile hill, above the old castle, which margins the river, were some time past the remains of a small ecclesiastical edifice, near a spot called Ballyhassan—probably deriving its name from one of the many saints Oissen—overlooking the river, and also the adjoining townland of Lisbane, to the north. In Lisbane, where it abuts on Quoile, there is a portion of low-lying land, called the Salt Lough, immediately adjoining the present Steamboat Quay, and over which the tide should flow, were it not for an artificial rampart, raised for the express purpose of restraining the sea; and, this, there can hardly be a doubt, was the Salt Marsh, alluded to in the Lives of the saint. In the same townland, a little further north, is a half-finished forth, or rath, which may be seen marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 33. The name Drumboe has now become obsolete; but, it is very possible, that the name Quoile or Coyle, although signifying in Irish "a wood," may preserve, in some corrupted fashion, the Latin form "collis," a hill—the suffix "bo," a cow, being dropped. The place, where the oxen were caught, which conveyed his body to Down, is called, in the "Book of Armagh," Clogher, to the east of Findubrec.

<sup>64</sup> So this river is called, in Jocelyn's Life. The Third Life of St. Patrick, published by Colgan in his "Trias Thaumaturga," states, that the Ulidians followed their waggon to Down, and the Oriors theirs to Armagh, both believing themselves to be in possession of the body of our saint. The Fourth Life of Colgan says, that the waggon of the Oriors disappeared, but that the Ultonians had the real waggon, and buried the remains at Down. Probus agrees with the "Book of Armagh," and he writes, that the waggon of the Oriors vanished, at the River Caubene, called, as before-mentioned, Cabenna, in the "Book of Armagh." All the writers, who mention this river, place it near the city of Armagh. With this location, Dr. Todd, in his "Memoir of Saint Patrick," agrees, but he writes, that the name is no longer remembered, in the district. It could not have been the River Callan, which runs west of Armagh, on the wain disappeared from their sight.<sup>66</sup> In the meantime, the people of Ulidia, or Ullagh,<sup>67</sup> entered the city of Down, and after a great solemnization of Masses, they interred the holy body, in a place miraculously shown. It appeared then, to each of the contending parties, that they were bringing St. Patrick's body into their own country. Thus, God separated them, in this miraculous manner, through his grace, and owing to the great merits of his blessed Apostle. According to the Tripartite Lives of our saint, the oxen carried him to that place, where Dun-da-leth-glas was, in the time of their writers. His remains were buried there,<sup>68</sup> with all honour and respect.<sup>69</sup> In addition to this statement, the authority of nearly all his ancient Acts may be cited, to show that Down was the real place of St. Patrick's interment;<sup>70</sup> and there, too, at the present time, have several interesting religious memorials been erected, to consecrate, as it were, the popular tradition.<sup>71</sup> However, some old opposite side of the city, approaching from the neighbourhood of Downpatrick; and, it is most likely, in the opinion of Mr. Hanna, to have been the stream or river, which flows by Cavanacaw, about two miles south of that city, and which discharges itself into the Callan, about two miles to the east, giving to or taking its name from that townland. There—it has been supposed—was fought a celebrated battle, A.D. 1188, between the English of Moy-Cova—between Newry and Banbridge—and Donnell O'Loughlin, of Ailech. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., pp. 80 to 83, and nn. (q, r, s, t, u.)

<sup>65</sup> According to the "Book of Armagh," these signs of the times were shown, so that an innumerable host of souls should be turned from destruction and death unto salvation, by a happy deception, as the blinded Assyrians of old should have perished, but for the holy prophet Elisha, by whom, under Divine Providence, they were led into Samaria; and this deception, also, was made the means, for producing concord among the people.

<sup>66</sup> See Probus or Quinta Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xxxix., xl., p. 61. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. cvii., cviii., pp. 168, 169. Also, Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. xci., p. 29. In the foregoing authorities, the circumstances of this contest are differently related.

<sup>67</sup> Ulidia, or Ullagh, whence the modern name Ulster, comprehended only a part of this province. It consisted chiefly, at least, of a great part of the present Down County.

<sup>68</sup> The Latin Tripartite Life of our saint, however, mentions Saul inadvertently, as the place, where St. Patrick was to be interred. A subsequent passage contains the correction.

<sup>69</sup> Ussher's Tripartite, as may be seen in the "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 873, has Down as the place of St. Patrick's deposition. More authorities will be found in Ussher, Ibid., p. 888, and following pages, as also in Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxi., pp. 259 to 263.

<sup>70</sup> See Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxxxviii., p. 28. Quarta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xcvi., p. 47. Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxvi., p. 108. Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. cviii., p. 169.

<sup>71</sup> From the times of Henry VIII. and of Queen Elizabeth, the Catholic institutes of Down were profaned, and the Catholic inhabitants suffered a variety of persecutions. The more ancient Church and its renowned monuments are said to have been destroyed, by the Lord Deputy, Leonard de Grey, A.D. 1538. See Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Ireland, its Scenery, Character," &c., vol. iii., pp. 8, 9, 10. A representation of the more modern Cathedral is there given, as an illustration. However, we find, by the Itinerary of Father M'Cann, who had conversed with people, on the spot, that the foul deed was perpetrated, towards the latter end of Elizabeth's reign, by Edward, Lord Cromwell, of Okeham, Governor of Lecale, and grandson of the infamous Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, the Mephistopheles of Henry VIII., and who subsequently obtained a reversionary grant of the monastic lands of Down, Saul, and portions of Grey Abbey. Father M'Cann thus writes: "This son of earth and foul spot on the human race, having been sent to Ireland by Queen Elizabeth in command, came with an army to the city of Down, and set fire to the noble church and monastery of St. Patrick, where even the reliques of Saints Patrick, Columba, and Bridgid were exposed to the fury of the flames. And there cannot be a doubt that many other sacred monuments and very ancient writings, as he was told by old men who were alive at that time, perished in that conflagration. And not content with this wickedness, the impious infidel burned all the other churches of Ultonia, especially in the regions of Down and Antrim, very few of which have been since then restored." It is likely, the reliques alluded to were the statues of the saints, which occupied the three vacant niches over the east window. He also writes, that the natives gave him the name of "Maol-na-teampull," literally signifying Calendars<sup>72</sup> have stated, that the Lipsana, or relics, of St. Patrick Senior—thought to have been no other person than the great Irish Apostle—reposed in the city of Armagh.<sup>73</sup> Tirechan and Nennius say, indeed, that the place, in which St. Patrick's remains lie, is unknown. Whatever truth there may be in this assertion, it need not be understood, with regard to the place in general; such as, that his body was somewhere, in Down; but, it ought to the “flail” or “scourge of the churches.” His descendants, subsequently created Viscounts Lecale and Earls of Ardglass, erected their mansion-house and pleasure-grounds on the tenements, stretching westward to the circular road and Prior’s Island. In 1578, the Franciscan house, founded by Hugh de Lacy, where the Protestant church now stands, was destroyed by Andrew Brereton, an officer who farmed Lecale from the crown. Baffled in plundering the sacred vessels previously concealed, he subjected to torture, and strangled, from an adjacent oak tree, three of the brethren, named O’Lochran, Fitzsimons, and O’Rorke, whom he considered to have prevented his sacrilege. Henceforward, writes Mr. John W. Hanna, in the Ulster Weekly Examiner, of June 8th, 1872, we have but scanty record of a Catholic place of worship in Down. In the reigns of Charles II. and James II., some slight stay was given to the persecution code. A few monks and secular clergy may have been tolerated in Down, and in other parts of Lecale, which has been always eminently Catholic: but, during the existence of the infamous and terrible penal laws, no Catholic church was permitted in the town. The people worshipped, in the old ruined chapel at Struel, till about 1751; when that house, then about being re-edified, was partially destroyed and unroofed, by the Rev. Thomas Brereton, Protestant curate of the parish. Then, a rude barn, at the Flying Horse, in Ballymote, at the corner of the roads leading to the racecourse and Killough, began to be used as a temporary church. On the opposite side of Killough Road lay the site of the Presbyterian meeting-house, that denomination also not being permitted to have a place of worship in the town, till about 1724. After the appointment of the Most Rev. Hugh M’Mullan, to be Bishop of Down and Connor, and after his removal to the Stone Park in Erynagh, he sought for a church site within the town, and, at one time, he purposed building in Scotch-street, beside the Blackamoor’s Head. Ultimately, he procured a more eligible place on the Stream Brae, from Mr. William Trotter, on which a church was begun in 1784, and opened in 1787, a lease in perpetuity being granted on the 2nd of May, 1789, to the bishop, and Messrs. William Sawey and John Dogherty, in trust for the congregation. It was frequently altered, and subsequently, a gallery was erected, to meet the wants of the people.

New Catholic Church, Convent, Schools and Presbytery of St. Patrick, in Downpatrick.

be considered, relatively to the particular spot,<sup>74</sup> selected for deposition. The illustrious St. Columba, or Columcille, had received part of his ecclesiastical education, at the Monastery of Moville, near Newtownards; and, we may naturally presume, that he had frequently visited the grave of our Irish Apostle. He had founded the church of Derry, besides many monasteries, and had acquired great celebrity and paramount influence throughout Ireland. According to the Annals of Ulster, in the year 552, he was called to Down, where he exhumed the relics of our Apostle, then sixty years dead. In the tomb, he found three precious reliquaries, namely, a Vial, or Coagh, the Angel's Gospel, and the Bell of the Testament. Directed by angelic revelation to divide these, he gave the Coagh<sup>75</sup> to the church of Down; the Angel's Gospel, otherwise called the Gospel of St. Martin, Bishop of Tours, who had presented it to his relative St. Patrick, fell to Columcille himself, who conferred it on Derry, where it subsequently formed the chief reliquary; while, the Bell of the Testament he assigned to Armagh.<sup>76</sup> In the Book of Armagh, it is stated, that according to the command of God, a cubit of earth was placed over St. Patrick's body,<sup>77</sup> and that the fulfilment of his prophecy was manifested in after times, when the church was building over his remains. Then, those men, who were digging the foundation, perceived fire to break out from the grave, and they fled with fear from that flame. The site of the

But, at any time, it was a very indifferent building, unworthy of the purpose to which it was devoted, and the great St. Patrick, to whom it was dedicated. In the latter end of 1863, the Very Rev. Patrick O'Kane, V.F., on the death of the Very Rev. Bernard M'Auley, was promoted from the curacy to be parish priest, when with great zeal and labour, he collected funds to build, as a memorial to Ireland's patron saint, a fine Gothic church, with its spacious nave, its beautiful traceries, its lofty tower, as also dedicating a chapel to the Virgin, with its splendid marble altar. The church was dedicated on the 30th of June, 1872, when the Most Rev. George Conroy, Bishop of Ardagh, preached the opening sermon. Soon, afterwards, the Mercy Convent, Schools, and Presbytery of St. Patrick were added; and, the grouping of all—on a charming elevated site—will be understood from the accompanying illustration, taken from a photograph—kindly furnished to the writer by Rev. Bernard M'Cann, C.C., Saul—and drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman. The engraving is by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>72</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxi., pp. 258 to 263.

<sup>73</sup> This will help us to explain the expression of St. Bernard, alluding as he does to Armagh: "in qua et vivus præfuit et mortuus requiescit." See "Vita S. Malachie," cap. vii. Ussher in his "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 888, quotes, to the same purpose, an unpublished Life of St. Patrick.

<sup>74</sup> Nor does the supposed conformity, as in the case of Moses, require anything more; for, although the few feet of ground that contained his body were not particularly known, yet the place in general was, it being a valley of the land of Moab, over against Phogor. The sacred text adds: "and no man hath known of his sepulchre until this present day." Deuteronomy, xxxiv. 6.

<sup>75</sup> No description of the Coagh, nor its purpose for use, has reached us, nor what became of it after the suppression in the reign of Henry VIII.; though, it is highly probable, it escaped profanation from sacrilegious hands, as was the case with the sacred vessels in the Franciscan monastery of the same town.

<sup>76</sup> This remained under the guardianship of the O'Mellans and O'Mulhollans. By one of this latter sept, it was given to Adam M'Clean, Esq., of Belfast, and afterwards it passed to the late Very Rev. Dr. Todd. A valuable account of it was written, by Rev. Dr. Reeves, and it was published, with chromo-lithographic drawings of the jewelled shrine, by Marcus Ward, in 1850.

<sup>77</sup> St. Patrick's body is stated to have been laid, in a very deep pit, to prevent its being stolen. See Jocelyn's or Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxcvi., p. 108, and Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. cviii., p. 169. To guard against the commission of such a theft, at any time, it might have been thought proper to conceal the spot, as much as possible. We may also suppose, that the accumulation of graves, around that of the saint, after a long lapse of time, may have given occasion to doubt, which was the peculiar resting spot for our holy Apostle's body. Similar doubts have been started, concerning the burying places of several eminent saints, and of various illustrious individuals, who flourished in past ages.

<sup>78</sup> "The tomb of St. Patrick is still

Irish Apostle's grave is yet pointed out,<sup>78</sup> in the cemetery, attached to the Protestant Cathedral; and, people, coming from the most distant places, take away the earth, so that a large and deep hole had been formed there, when that spot was seen by the present writer. The Protestant Cathedral of Downpatrick is said to occupy the site of St. Patrick's more ancient church. Here were formerly preserved the tombs of St. Patrick, St. Brigid and St. Columkille; because, during the period of the Northmen invasions, the city of Down was deemed to possess advantages of security, greater than most places in Ireland. When St. Brigid's relics<sup>79</sup> were transferred to Down is not known exactly; but, Colgan conjectured, this act was done by Kellach, sometime Abbot of Kildare, and Abbot of Iona, from 852 to 865. During the same century, in the year 878, the body of St. Columba<sup>80</sup> was also transferred to Down; and, as stated in the "Martyrology of Donegal," it was buried in one tomb with Patrick and Brigid. It seems, that the bodies had been taken from the shrines, as there is no mention made of the latter, when the relics were found. However, the Norsemen extended their ravages to this quarter, and they frequently returned, during the tenth century, seeking for spoil, and destroying the city of Down, with its churches, so late as the year 988. In 1103, Magnus, King of Norway, with a vast army, proceeded to the coast of Down, and having incautiously landed, was himself slain. According to the "Annals of Ulster," he was interred near the church of St. Patrick,<sup>81</sup> though tradition points out an insulated spot, adjacent to Horse Island, as the place for his sepulture. Under these circumstances, it was not surprising, that the saints' bodies were deposited for security, in some secret spot, when, in the course of time, the exact place became unknown, and that, when more peaceful times returned, and the Norseman's power was overthrown, a Christian people should anxiously desire to recover their precious deposit. During the early and middle ages, Down was a resort for numberless pious pilgrims. In 1176, Malachy, the third Bishop of Down bearing that name, succeeded Gelasius Mac Cormac. According to Ware, he had been taken prisoner, by John de Courci,<sup>82</sup> the succeeding year; but, at the urgent request of Cardinal Vivian, then in Ireland, he was immediately restored to his liberty, and to his former honours—a fact unnoticed by the Four Masters, in recording the battle of Dun-da-lethglas, although minutely given, in the Dublin copy of the "Annals of Innisfallen." Being a pious and a holy man, deeply solicitous for the honour of his Church and of its Great Founder, Bishop Malachy spent, we are told, long and weary nights before the altar, praying and begging of pointed out, with a cross on it, but the better informed class do not believe, that this is the place, where he was interred, but under the altar in the Cathedral." County of Down Ordnance Survey Letters. Mr. O'Donovan's Letter, dated Downpatrick, April 28th, 1834, pp. 103, 104.

<sup>79</sup> St. Bridget or Bright, Abbess of Kildare, affectionately called "the Mary of Erin," died 1st February, about the year 523, and was interred in her own church, her relics and those of Bishop Conlaeth being afterwards enshrined, and adorned with gems and precious stones, as also, with crowns of gold and silver.

<sup>80</sup> While kneeling at the altar, on the 9th of June, A.D. 597, without ache or struggle, the spirit of St. Columba gently took its flight, and after three days' obsequies—that of St. Patrick having lasted twelve—he was interred in a Reilig, near his own church. The body was placed in a shrine, adorned with precious metals, in the eighth century; and, it appears to have remained in peace until the ninth, when Iona, like all the other British isles, fell a prey to the Danish ravages. It was several times sent to Ireland for safety, by the abbots, and finally it was deposited in Down A.D. 878, thus realizing his own prophetic Irish verses, as given by Montalembert, in a French translation. See "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iii., liv. xi., chap. vii., p. 283, and chap. viii., pp. 291 to 294.

<sup>81</sup> See the Rev. James Johnstone's "Antiquitates Celto-Normannicæ," p. 84.

<sup>82</sup> Inside the walls of the city, there was a castle erected by De Courci, in the angle of the present Church-street and Church-lane. It was prostrated, within the last forty years; and,

God to make known to him, that precise spot where the sacred bodies lay interred.

One night, in 1185, when solemn silence reigned all around, the holy man, engaged as usual in fervent prayer, saw a bright sunbeam traversing the church. Thereupon, he prayed, yet the more intensely, that it might stop, where the sacred bodies were interred. Eventually, it became fixed on a particular spot of the church floor. This induced him to believe, that his desired wishes had been realized. Procuring assistance, and digging beneath the place, to his unbounded joy, he found the coffin of St. Patrick, lying between those of the two other saints. This was the year in which the lord, Earl John, afterwards England's King, first came into Ireland.<sup>83</sup> The glad discovery was communicated to De Courci. He, the bishop, and the Primate Tomaltach, otherwise Thomas O'Connor, son of Hugh, and brother to Rory, Kings of Connaught, sent ambassadors to Pope Urban the Third, in Rome. He sent Cardinal Vivian back to Ireland, to oversee and to assist, at the translation of those relics. On Monday, the 9th of June, 1186, on the festival of St. Columba, the Benedictine Monastery and Cathedral of Down witnessed a noble gathering, for a sacred and national object.<sup>84</sup> Cardinal Vivian, in his magnificent robes, the Primate, Thomas O'Connor, Bishop Malachy, besides thirteen other bishops, with abbots, and provosts, deans, archdeacons, priors, and many other dignitaries of the Church, the imposing figure of the stalwart De Courci, his barons and knights, mailed retainers and English settlers, a multitudinous assemblage of Irish chiefs and people, from all parts of the country,—for so we are told, in the office of the Translation, and by contemporary writers,—were that day congregated, at the great church of Down.<sup>85</sup> This gorgeous procession has been minutely described. The shadows of the high ecclesiastical and military dignitaries were flashing in the surrounding waters, beneath the glorious sky of June; the air was redolent with rich perfume and with the voice of Psalmody; and, when the attendants reached the interior, that ceremonial prescribed by the ritual having been celebrated, the bodies were solemnly removed and placed in that more distinguished part of the church, which had been prepared and dedicated for their reception. It was then resolved, that the anniversary of that glorious event should thereafter be celebrated, in Ireland, as a high festival, while the Feast of St. Columba was transferred to the morrow of his Octave.<sup>86</sup> It is certain, that on this occasion, some of the relics of St. Patrick were removed by Cardinal Vivian to Rome, where they still remain.<sup>87</sup> It is likewise traditionally reported, that, at this time, the hand of St. Patrick<sup>88</sup> was enshrined and placed over the high altar, where it rested, in a conspicuous position, until the destruction of the abbey caused its removal. That religious object, however, has not been lost.

further up in the Irish Quarter stood another, called M'Rory's Castle, on the west side of Irish-street, nearly opposite to the Shambles.

<sup>83</sup> According to Giraldu Cambrensis. See "Opera," edited by James F. Dimock, M.A., vol. v. Topographia Hibernica, Dist. iii., cap. xviii., pp. 163, 164.

<sup>84</sup> See the Rev. Sylvester Malone's "Church History of Ireland," chap. iiii., pp. 95 to 97.

<sup>85</sup> Ussher mentions several authorities—Henry of Marleburg, John Brampton, and Ralph of Chester—as narrating the translation, besides Giraldu, who, as previously mentioned, states it to have occurred in his own time, and he gives the well-known verses written on the occasion:—

"In burgo Duno, tumulo tumulantur in uno, Brigida, Patritius, atque Columba pius."

These Latin lines are thus rendered, in Wright's edition or version of the record:—

"Patrick, Columba, Brigit, rest in glorious Down: Lie in one tomb, and consecrate the town."

<sup>86</sup> A Solemn Office, with nine lessons, commemorative of the translation, was prepared by the proper ecclesiastical authority. This has been printed at Paris, in 1620. Colgan and Messingham have published it.

<sup>87</sup> Portions of these were given, by direc-

We are inclined to believe, that at this period, a portion of the relics of our saint were enshrined for the church of Armagh,<sup>89</sup> as well as for the church of Down, and another portion for Saul. This affords a simple explanation of the facts, recorded by our writers, that various shrines of our saint, belonging to these churches, had been violated, or carried away for safety. The Cathedral of Down had been frequently restored and embellished, and among others, by St. Malachy O'Morgair. On the site of old Downpatrick gaol,<sup>90</sup> stood a house of Irish Canons, founded by that great prelate, when bishop there, in 1138.<sup>91</sup> In 1316, Edward Bruce, with his Scottish troops, destroyed the Abbey.<sup>92</sup> Again, Bishop Tiberius, who died in 1526, repaired the Cathedral. From the twelfth, until some time in the seventeenth, century, the entire plains, north and west of the cathedral and city of Down, were covered by the tidal waters of Lough Cuan, from which sprung up several islands, clothed with wood and beauty, among which was that of Inishcouscry, with its old Irish monastery.<sup>93</sup> The Cathedral stood on the apex of the great hill, to the west of the city, which, half-way down, was encircled by a deep fosse, portions of which are still slightly discernible. Some forty feet distant from the western door was the noble round tower, sixty-six feet in height.<sup>94</sup> The Benedictine monastery lay a little further west, on the slope of the hill, now partially occupied by the new cemetery. To the north, lay the great Dun of Ros-catha,<sup>95</sup> "the fort of the peninsula of the battles."<sup>96</sup> Dun-leth-glas, or Drom-leth-glas, as it is frequently called—the prefix Drom proving decisively that it could not have been an insulated promontory—stood close to the intersection of John and the modern Mary-street.<sup>97</sup> In the year 1441, the See of Down was united to that of Connor, by Pope Eugene the Fourth. From that period to the present, its bishops<sup>98</sup> are noticed, by several eminent Irish tions of his Holiness, Pope Pius IX., to the late Bishop Denvir, when on his visit to the tomb of the Apostles SS. Peter and Paul, in the Eternal City.

<sup>88</sup> Now, this greatly-prized object is happily placed under the guardianship of the Most Rev. Dr. Dorian.

<sup>89</sup> This conjectured fact—if correct—probably to the misconception of St. Bernard, that St. Patrick's remains had been deposited in Armagh.

<sup>90</sup> Close behind the Cathedral, or "hard by," as the Terrier expresses it, in 1615.

<sup>91</sup> On the adjoining Windmill Hill, where the new county gaol stands, according to tradition, was placed the church of St. Bride, described in the Annals of Ulster, at 1005, as in the midst of the town, and as profaned in that year, by the murder of Madagan, son of Domhnall, King of Ulster, by Dubhthinne, surnamed the Torc, in violation of the guarantees of the saints of Ireland. This violation was speedily avenged, by the death of the murderer, at the hands of Muireadhach, the victim's son.

<sup>92</sup> See Rev. Thomas Walsh's "History of the Irish Church, with the Monasteries of each County," &c., chap. xliii., p. 413.

<sup>93</sup> This was afterwards converted, by De Courci, into a Cistercian Abbey, whose grey and ivy-covered ruins, on the banks of the Coyle, still attest its former grandeur.

<sup>94</sup> Outside the walls, lay the Priory of St. Thomas the Martyr, otherwise called Tober-glory, seated near St. Dallan's Well. It is described in its original charter, as lying at the angle, between the roads leading to Crevisse, and it is returned in a survey of James I.'s time as an aliter, for the present Killyvees, and the Grange of Saul, now Saul Quarter.

<sup>95</sup> This actually stood, as stated by Father M'Caná, in his Itinerary of 1645, "outside the city on the north-east," correctly south-west, and also, by Downing, in 1680.

<sup>96</sup> It is called corruptly in Inquisitions, Dones coscue, or the Round Mount, which some modern writers have erroneously described as the Dun-leth-glas of history.

<sup>97</sup> It lay alongside where the Convent School now stands, and is so marked, in a map of the town, dated, A.D. 1729. Near it stood the Monastery or Priory of St. John the Baptist, belonging to the Cross-bearers, marked on the same map and accompanying survey, "St. John's Close," and "Chappel yard." Now, it forms part of the present convent grounds, the gardens of the prior of the Cross-bearers stretching past the site of the new Catholic Church, back to the Gas House Hill, still known as the Prior's Island, from having been that official's property, until the suppression of the religious houses.

<sup>98</sup> Their names and acts will be found, in the works of Ware, Lanigan, Theiner, Reeves, Rev. Sylvester Malone, Rev. James O'Laverty, and Father Walsh. For a de-ecclesiastical historians. For several centuries after the Anglo-Norman invasion, there existed a very bad feeling, between the Anglican and Irish clergy and people. This was considerably fomented, by the Colonial Government, who passed a statute, prohibiting the appointment of Irish clerics to appointments in monastic houses. This decree necessarily produced intense bitterness of feeling against the Anglican monks, and it caused the repeated destruction of their houses. De Courci had turned the secular canons out of the Cathedral of Down, and he presented it to Benedictines from Chester, who, therefore, became custodians of the relics of its three great saints, to the infinite displeasure of the Irish, who burned the church and monastery, then in process of being rebuilt. The Benedictines prayed King Henry III., in the most fulsome language, for some resting-place in England. They stated, that they had sent to his Excellency one of their monks, with the feretrum or bier of the patron saints of Ireland, Patrick, Columb, and Brigid, containing their remains, and that, if in their distress they were not sent speedy aid, they should abandon their desolated and ruined monasteries, leave the entire diocese under an interdict, and proceed to the Court of Rome, to procure the desired aid.<sup>99</sup> Whether the feretrum was actually carried to England or not, or captured by the Irish, and deposited in some secret place of safety, is unrecorded; but, the latter is most probably the case, and where more likely than at Saul, which St. Patrick tells us he so dearly loved. At the year 1293, the Four Masters write, that it had been then revealed to Nicholas MacMaelisa, Primate from 1272 to 1303, and to which he had been elevated from Raphoe See, that the relics were at Saul, and that they were taken up by him, great miracles having been wrought through their means. The relics were honourably covered, and deposited in a saving shrine.<sup>100</sup> Occasionally, we find the relics, or mionna, afterwards mentioned, but nothing has been recorded, clearly revealing their ultimate destination.<sup>101</sup>

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE YEAR OF ST. PATRICK'S DEATH—HIS AGE—CHURCHES, CHAPELS AND RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS, DEDICATED TO ST. PATRICK, IN IRELAND, AND IN DISTANT COUNTRIES—VENERATION ACCORDED HIM IN CALENDARS, MARTYROLOGIES, AND CHURCH OFFICES—RELICS AND MEMORIALS OF IRELAND'S APOSTLE—CONCLUSION.

A CORRECT analysis of evidence, bearing on the year of St. Patrick's decease, as found in ancient and modern works, assigns it generally, to some date, after the middle of the fifth century. His death probably took place, nearer to the middle, than to the close, of that age. Thus, we have noted, the re-scription and history of Downpatrick, the reader is referred to Walter Harris' "Ancient and Present State of Down," chap. iii., sect. i., pp. 25 to 36.

<sup>99</sup> These facts we learn, from a document published in Prynne's Records and Rymer's foedera, and addressed in 1220, by the Prior and Chapter of the Church of St. Patrick of Down, to King Henry III. of England.

<sup>100</sup> There is nothing inconsistent in the narrative, when taken in chronological sequence, and nothing to justify those sceptical objections, urged by the late Dr. O'Donovan and Dr. Reeves, according to John W. Hanna, from whose article in the Ulster Weekly Examiner of June 8th, 1872, most of the foregoing statements are extracted.

<sup>101</sup> See that very complete narrative, regarding the parish of Down, in Rev. James O'Laverty's "Historical Account of the Diocese of Down and Connor, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., pp. 248 to 320.

CHAPTER XXVII.—<sup>1</sup> The "Annals of Connaught," refer the death of Sean or Old Patrick, to this year; while those of Boyle

spective dates of A.D. 453,<sup>1</sup> 457,<sup>2</sup> 458,<sup>3</sup> 460,<sup>4</sup> 464,<sup>5</sup> 465,<sup>6</sup> 472,<sup>7</sup> 481,<sup>8</sup> 487,<sup>9</sup> 488,<sup>10</sup> 490,<sup>11</sup> 491,<sup>12</sup> 492,<sup>13</sup> and 493.<sup>14</sup> By many writers,<sup>15</sup> this latter is thought have the death of Patrick, surnamed Senis, at A.D. 464. See John D'Alton's "History of Ireland and Annals of Boyle," vol. ii., p. 67. But, he is said to have been the saint of Glastonbury, and not the Apostle of Ireland. See ibid., n. (b.) Some hold, that Sean Patrick is not a distinct person from the Irish Apostle.

<sup>2</sup> Thus, in "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tom. iv., the "Annales Ultonienses" have, at A.D. 457, the death of Old Patrick, as some books say. See p. 3. Yet, it is probable, that such a date was intended, for Sen-Patrick's and not for the Irish Apostle's demise. The oldest known Chronicle of Wales seems to agree with this account. See "Annales Cambriæ," edited by Rev. John Williams ab Ithel, p. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Giraldus Cambrensis, at this year, relates, that St. Patrick passed to the Lord, in the 120th year of his age. See "Topographia Hibernica," Dist. iii., cap. xvii. And, according to Nennius' calculation, he seems to agree in this account, as Ussher endeavours to show, in "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 883. Also see "Circle of the Seasons," p. 77, and "Lives of the Saints ; enriched with Fifty-one full-page Miniatures, in Gold and Colours, the Text within engraved Borders, from ancient Books of Devotion," p. 81. London, Roy. 4to, 1869.

<sup>4</sup> Having concluded with Baronius and Petavius, that our saint was eighty-two years old when he died, the Bollandists perceived, it should be absurd to follow them in their other supposition, that he lived until A.D. 491. Accordingly, they looked for an earlier period, and they guessed this to have been at A.D. 460. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo, &c. Commentarius Prævius, sect. v., p. 523. Adrian Baillet has "vers l'an 460."—"Les Vies des Saints," tome iii., xvii. Mars. S. Patrice, sect. i., p. 439. Abbé Fleury, in his "Histoire Ecclesiastique," has a like statement. See tome vi., liv. xxvi., sect. xiii., p. 152. A reference is made to this date, likewise, in "L'Art de vérifier les Dates," tome i., p. 96, at St. Patrice. See, also, Rohrbacher's "Histoire Universelle de l'Eglise Catholique," tome viii., liv. xxxix., p. 20. The Rev. Joseph Milner says of St. Patrick : "He died about the year 460, in an advanced age."—"The History of the Church of Christ," vol. ii., cent. v., chap. xi., p. 271. The edition, with additions and corrections, by the late Rev. Isaac Milner, D.D., F.R.S., Dean of Carlisle and President of Queen's College, Cambridge. Revised and corrected throughout, by the Rev. Thomas Grantham, B.D., Rector of Bramber with Botolph, in the county of Sussex, &c. London, 1847, 8vo.

<sup>5</sup> The Rev. Alban Butler, in his "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other Principal Saints," vol. iii., March xvii., seems to refer his death to this year.

<sup>6</sup> According to Nennius, St. Patrick must have died, about A.D. 465, when 120 years old. Without admitting such an extreme age for our saint, the Rev. Dr. Lanigan argues for this year, as the one to which the Irish Apostle's death should most probably be assigned. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. ii., and nn. pp. 323 to 331. A copy of the Annals of Innisfallen, among Harris' Manuscripts, in the Library of the Royal Dublin Society, places it on the 432nd year, after our Lord's passion. "Quies Patricii 16 Cal. Aprilis anno 432." a passione Domini." Following the computation of Bede and of other writers, who have affixed the passion to A.D. 33, this must bring the year of St. Patrick's death to A.D. 465. See Thomas Moore's "History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. x., p. 226. The Rev. M. J. Brennan, O.S.F., adopts this date—St. Patrick's age being 78—in his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," chap. i., p. 22. Also, the same year has been recorded, in the Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., p. 304 ; and, it is thought to be most probable, by Rev. Michael J. O'Farrell, in his "Popular Life of St. Patrick," chap. xxii., p. 294.

<sup>7</sup> According to Father Peter Ribadeneira, in his "Lives of the Saints," &c., part i., p. 159. Dublin edition. A Glastonian tablet, cited by Ussher, has placed the Irish Apostle's demise, at A.D. 472. See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 879. In their Lives of St. Patrick, John of Teignmouth, and John Capgrave follow this record as an authority.

<sup>8</sup> At the 17th of March, the "Martyrologium Anglicanum" says of our saint, "obiit quadringentesimo octuagesimo primo."

<sup>9</sup> Under this year, in John D'Alton's "History of Ireland and Annals of Boyle," vol. ii., we read : "From the beginning of the world, according to Dionysius, to the death of St. Patrick, the Bishop, 5,660 years, and from the incarnation of our Lord 448. Patrick, Archbishop of the Irish, died, in the 120th year of his age, on the 15th of the Calends of April." See p. 72. In a note (a), the editor observes, "the lapse of years assigned in these Annals, as from the Incarnation to the death of St. Patrick, is evidently erroneous." In the Latin "Annales Buelliani," at this same year, we read : "Patricius Archiepiscopus Hiberniensium anno etatis sue cxx. die xvito Kal. April. quievit."—Dr. O'Connor's "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," vol. ii., p. 3.

<sup>10</sup> At this year, in the "Annales Inisfalenses," we have noted, "Quies Patricii 17 to be most probably correct.<sup>16</sup> Marianus Scotus—or, perhaps, some transcriber of his Chronicle less skilled in dates—makes St. Patrick live to A.D. 513,<sup>17</sup> when he is said to have died, at the extraordinary age of 132.<sup>18</sup>

(in) xvi. Kl. April. anno ccccxix. a passione Dni.”—Ibid., p. 4.

<sup>16</sup> The English writer, Pitseus, or John Pitts, tells us, St. Patrick died A.D. 490, in the 122 year of his age, Aurelius Ambrosius reigning in Britain. See “Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis,” tomus i., pars. ii., p. 91.

<sup>17</sup> The “Annals of Ulster,” at this year, state, “Dicunt Scotii hic Patricium archiepiscopum defunctum.” Marianus Scotus, in one edition of his work, or his interpolator, has St. Patrick’s death, at A.D. 491, “S. Patricius obiit.” Yet, in the same Chronicle, at A.D. 432, the Irish Apostle is said to have preached only forty years. “XL. annis in Hibernia prædicavit.” Ussher has endeavoured, but unsatisfactorily, to amend Marianus’ text, in one way, (See “Primordia,” cap. xvii., p. 880 et seq.), while Colgan arranges it in another. See “Trias Thaumaturga,” Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. vi., pp. 232, 233. Also, cap. xviii., p. 255. Probably, Marianus allowed no more than those forty years, the number marked by a Scholiast to Nennius. Afterwards, Dr. Lanigan thinks, that some dabbler in Chronicle-making, in another part of the text, put sixty years, the number mentioned in other documents. He affixed them, most probably, to the year 491, in consequence of his supposing that this was the year of St. Patrick’s death; while, according to what Marianus has stated, at A.D. 432, the saint should have died A.D. 472. Florence of Worcester, Siegbert, Ranulphus, in “Polychronicon,” lib. v., cap. iv., with others, place his death in 491. They allow sixty years for his preaching. These annalists thought the saint arrived in Ireland in 431. They followed Bede, in his “Epitome,” as also other writers, who assigned the arrival of Palladius to A.D. 430. See, Ussher’s “Primordia,” cap. xvii., p. 899. Petavius, in “De Doctrina Temp.” tomus ii., ad An. per. Jul. 5204, and Baronius, in his edition of the “Martyrologium Romanum,” at March 17th, n. (e), p. 128, Rome, 1686, fol., as also in his “Annales Ecclesiastici,” tomus vi., sect. xx., p. 399, ad A.D. 491, affix St. Patrick’s death to A.D. 491. At the same time, they state, that he died at the age of eighty-two years. Matthew of Westminster—treating of St. Patrick’s Life—places his death at the year 491. See Mattheus Westmonasteriensis, “Florilegus dictus, præcipue De Rebus Britannicis ab Exordio Mundi usque ad Annum Domini 1307,” p. 176. The Centuriators of Magdeburg follow this account, in tomus ii., “Quinta Centuria Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ,” cap. x., col. 1429. They did not reflect, according to Rev. Dr. Lanigan, that such statements are irreconcilable, unless it be improperly supposed, St. Patrick had not been born until A.D. 409. Hence, in the year 432, when his mission is supposed to have begun in Ireland, he could only have been twenty-three years old, and consequently he was under the canonical age to become a bishop. Those writers should have recorded his death, much earlier than 491, or they should have given him a longer term of life.

<sup>18</sup> At this year, the “Annales Ultionienses” state: “Patricius Ar. Eps. Scotor. quievit.” They add, to square this with the Roman mission, “cxx. anno ætatis sue. lx., xvi. Kal. April. vero a quo venit ad Hiberniam anno ad baptisandos Scotos.” See Dr. O’Conor’s “Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores,” tomus iv., p. 8. Sir James Ware also adopts this date. See “De Præsulibus Hiberniæ Commentarius,” p. 2. The Rev. Dr. Todd remarks, that the Scottish or Irish traditions seem to fluctuate, between the years 491 and 492 for St. Patrick’s death—corresponding with the common era 492 and 493. This appears, from the sundry letters, given in the “Annals of Ulster,” viz., 491, Kal. Jan. feria 4; and 492, Kal. Jan. feria 6. That is to say, the 1st of January 491 (A.D. 492) was on Wednesday, and the 1st of January 492 (A.D. 493) on Friday; the former year being bissextile. The dates in those Annals are counted from our Lord’s Incarnation, a year before the common era of our Lord’s Nativity. See “St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland,” chap. iii., pp. 496, 497, and nn. 1, 2, 3. Wordsworth has his death, at this year; and, in his “Occasional Sermons,” he has some other observations on the age of St. Patrick, St. Columba, &c. These were published in London, 1852.

<sup>19</sup> The Annals of Tigernach—as also in the Hiatus Suppletus—and the Four Masters, as also Ussher, Colgan, Abbatte D. Giacomo Certani, &c., place the death of St. Patrick under this year. See Dr. O’Donovan’s “Annals of the Four Masters,” vol. i., pp. 154 to 159, with notes (r, s, t, u, w, x, y, z, a, b, c, d, e, f). Ibid. Also the Latin version in Dr. O’Conor’s collection, vol. iii., pp. 130 to 133, with notes. See, also, Dr. O’Conor’s “Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores,” vol. ii., Annales Tigernachi, pp. 119, 124. Certani has “del quattroceto nouantatrè di nostra Redenzione.”—“Il Mose dell’ Ibernìa,” lib. xiv., p. 515. Archbishop Ussher has laboriously treated on this matter, in his “Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates,” cap. xvii., pp. 457 to 460. See, likewise, Harris’ Ware, vol. i., “Archbishops of Armagh,” p. 22. Roderick O’Flaherty makes the following calculation, Owing to the variations of statement, several writers, treating about St. Patrick, decline to give any particular date for his death.<sup>19</sup> Scotland is said to have had the following holy men, who were contemporaneous with St. Patrick, viz.: Sernan, Apostle of the Orkneys; Ternan, the successor of St. Ninian; Queran, Abbot of Benchor; Kentigern, who was over the monastery of Culross.<sup>20</sup> Yet, the foregoing statement is extremely doubtful, and it has not been calculated with very great accuracy.

The time spent on his Irish missionary career varies, according to the statement of various writers; and, as a consequence, these have calculated it, in assigning the date for his death. The Glastonians reduced it to eight,<sup>21</sup> while Jocelyn allowed for it thirty-five, years. Again, the distinction between the Irish Apostle and San-Patrick, with a confusion of the years for their respective deaths, and the differences of date, may serve to account for the divergencies of calculation. Relative periods and persons, with their eras, have been introduced, likewise, to increase the difficulty. Thus, Nennius has stated, that sixty years elapsed, between the death of St. Patrick and that of St. Brigid,<sup>22</sup> and he allows four years only to intervene, between the death of St. Brigid and the date for St.

"ab adventu ad mortem S. Patricii pro 58 annis in poemate anni Sexaginta cum aliquot mensibus ab Anno 432 ad 17 Martii Anno 493, statuuntur."—"Ogygia," pars. iii., cap. xci., p. 424. Likewise, the Calendar of the O'Clerys has it, that our saint resigned his spirit, in the year 493. See, also, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. vii., p. 234. In James Stuart's "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh," chap. i., it is said, he died on the 17th of March, A.D. 493. See p. 85. Also, P. Pius Bonifacius Gams, in his "Series Episcoporum Ecclesiæ Catholicæ quotquot innotuerunt a beato Petro Apostolo," at p. 206.

<sup>15</sup> Among these may be classed, the learned Dr. Todd, in his "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. iii., p. 497; Rev. Robert King, in his "Primer of the History of the Holy Catholic Church in Ireland," vol. i., book i., chap. v., p. 493; the Rev. Canon James Craigie Robertson's "History of the Christian Church," vol. i., book ii., chap. xi., sect. 4, p. 508; Archdeacon Cotton's "Fasti Ecclesiæ Hibernicæ," vol. iii., p. 4; Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 431, 433. Citing Cave and O'Flaherty, we find, in Bishop Tanner's "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica" these words: "Dierum, laborum, ac gloria saturi, tandem obiit A. ccccxciii. die 17 Martii, ætatis suæ 122." See, p. 579, and n. (m.)

<sup>16</sup> According to a summary of dates and facts, preserved in the "Leabhar Breac," St. Patrick died in the one hundred and twentieth year of his age, i.e., the 27th—recte 26th—of the solar cycle, the Calends of January being on Friday, the first day after the bissextile, on the 16th of the Calends of April, which, in that year, fell on Wednesday, the 13th of the Moon. Fol. 99, b. i.

<sup>17</sup> The chronology of his life was 16 years of age, we are told, when he was sold as a slave, 6 years in captivity, 40 in the Roman provinces, and 70 years engaged on his Irish mission.

<sup>18</sup> See "Chronicon." Edition in Pertz's "Monumenta Germaniæ Historica," tomus v., p. 536.

<sup>19</sup> As for instance, Peter Lombard, in "De Regno Hiberniæ, Sanctorum Insula, Commentarius," &c., cap. xiv., pp. 76, 77. Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's edition. Also, Bishop Challoner, in "Britannia Sancta," part. i., pp. 180, 181; Le Comte de Montalembert, in "Les Moines d'Occident," tome ii., liv. ix.; Le Vicomte Hersart de la Villemarqué, in "La Légende Celtique et la Poesie des Cloîtres en Irlande, en Cambrie et en Bretagne," sect. xix., p. 121. The Roman Breviary only states, in St. Patrick's Office: "Assiduis tandem curis pro Ecclesia consumptus, verbo et opere clarus, in extrema senectute divinis Mysteriis refectus, obdormivit in Domino," &c., noct. ii., sect. vi. Officium S. Patricii.

<sup>20</sup> See Camerarius, "De Statu Hominis Veteris simul ac novæ Ecclesiæ, et Infidelium Conversione," lib. i., cap. iii., sect. 2, p. 167.

<sup>21</sup> The Glastonians state, that St. Patrick spent thirty-nine years, at Glastonbury. See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xii., p. 371, and cap. xvii., p. 879.

<sup>22</sup> Nennius writes, in his "Historia Britonum," cap. xi.: "A morte Patricii usque ad obitum Sanctæ Brigidæ 60 anni sunt." In the Ulster Annals, it has been assigned to A.D. 524, while in some other documents it is placed in 525. Ussher observes, in his "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 883, that, following Sigebert's chronology, who assigns St. Brigid's death to A.D. 518, such computation should give A.D. 458, for the departure of St. Patrick.

<sup>23</sup> Nennius says, "nativitate Columkillæ

Columba's birth.<sup>23</sup> This computation will bring us, towards the year 465.<sup>24</sup> Discrepancies exist, likewise, in all early chronology, and these affect every department of Irish historical study. The dates are subject, at present, to much doubt, and a strong disposition to disbelieve in them prevails, except in so far as these can be supported by collateral authorities.<sup>25</sup> Again, some of our annalists have followed one ecclesiastical guide, and some another. Thus, Tigernach places the birth of Christ, in the year of the world 3952, Keating in 4035, and the Four Masters in the year 5201. The years of the several events, so chronicled, must be deducted from these numbers respectively, before we can compare them with—say the foundation of Rome—or with one another. That being done, however, it will be found, that the discrepancies are greatest, in the earliest events, and those differences tend to disappear, as we approach the common terminus.<sup>26</sup>

Tradition has generally assigned the death of St. Patrick to a Wednesday, on the 17th of March. Accepting such data as possible, the date A.D. 465, Dr. Lanigan<sup>27</sup>—who discusses the matter with great critical ability—assigns for the death of St. Patrick. It so happens, that Wednesday, March 17th, fell out in 471. But, this advanced period seems inconsistent, with the chronology assigned for St. Patrick's successors, in the See of Armagh. By adopting the year preferred by Dr. Lanigan, we have ten years<sup>28</sup> for the Apostle's administration of that See, and about thirty-three for the whole period of his Irish mission.<sup>29</sup> Again, March 17th fell on a Wednesday, in 482,<sup>30</sup> as also in 493.<sup>31</sup> Thus, there were four years, in a course of less than thirty, to which that criterion applied. As A.D. 490, 491, or 492, should not serve to coincide, very justly has Ussher argued for 493, on this score.<sup>32</sup> Again, Jocelyn<sup>33</sup> makes the year, 493, that of St. Patrick's death, and the first year of the Emperor Anastasius,<sup>34</sup> whose reign began, however, in 491. There, Jocelyn places it, in the pontificate of Pope Felix II., alias III.<sup>35</sup> Yet, Dr. Lanigan usque ad obitum Sanctæ Brigidæ 4 sunt anni." St. Columkille was not born before the year 520.

<sup>24</sup> The year, that has the best claim to the birth of Columba, seems to be 521. If we admit, that this was known to Nennius—and he might have collected it from Adamnan and Bede—it will follow, that he placed St. Brigid's death in 525. Deducting from this date the sixty years back to St. Patrick, we have, according to him, our Apostle's exit occurring, in the year 465.

<sup>25</sup> The Christian world computes by the vulgar era, and calls the existing year that of our Lord, making, in the corrected computation of Petavius and of Ussher, four years in advance of the present date. In the most venerable records of past events, antecedent to our era, the dates vary to a very much larger extent, according to the various manuscripts and the systems of their interpreters. We need not, therefore, be surprised to find equal discrepancies of date, in the pre-Christian period of our own annals; but, we may observe, that the disagreement arises, in a great measure, from the employment of different Anno Mundi epochs, for events before the birth of our Lord.

<sup>26</sup> Beginning, say, with Bede and the Saxon Chronicle. See Sir Samuel Fergu-son's "Inaugural Lecture of the Meath Antiquarian Society," pp. 5, 6. Trim, 1879, 8vo.

<sup>27</sup> He shows, that the 17th of March fell on Monday, in A.D. 458, and on a Thursday, in A.D. 460.

<sup>28</sup> This very general opinion prevailed, and, he assumes, that the See of Armagh had not been founded, before A.D. 454.

<sup>29</sup> This comes very near to the thirty-five years, assigned for it, in Jocelyn's Life of our saint. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vii., sect. xii., and nn. 129, 131, 134, 135, pp. 361 to 364.

<sup>30</sup> This was the year, in which Iarlath died; and, as Dr. Lanigan thinks, therefore it is inadmissible.

<sup>31</sup> Four years are marked with the Dominical letter C, viz., A.D. 465, 471, 482 and 493.

<sup>32</sup> See "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 882.

<sup>33</sup> See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. cxvii., p. 108.

<sup>34</sup> Jocelyn also states, that Aurelius Ambrosius was then Governor in Britain, and that Forchernus reigned in Ireland.

<sup>35</sup> This Pontiff, however, died the 25th of February, A.D. 492. See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome vii., liv. xxx., sect. xxiv., p. 46.

contends, that St. Patrick could not have lived on to this late period; because his reputed biographers St. Mel<sup>36</sup> and St. Kienan<sup>37</sup> had died before it, as also some of our saint's predecessors, in the See of Armagh.<sup>38</sup> The age of St. Patrick, when he departed this life, has been as variedly estimated, as the year for his death. While some writers assert, moreover, that as many as eighty years<sup>39</sup> are to be allowed for his Irish missionary career, others restrict it to only a very few years. Thus, eighty-two,<sup>40</sup> eighty-three,<sup>41</sup> ninety-two,<sup>42</sup> ninety-seven,<sup>43</sup> and ninety-nine years,<sup>44</sup> are stated. One hundred and eleven<sup>45</sup> or twelve years,<sup>46</sup> as also, one hundred and twenty<sup>47</sup> years, are given.

<sup>36</sup> If St. Mel, as asserted, wrote St. Patrick's Life, he must have survived the subject of his biography, and consequently, the most Blessed Primate died, prior to A.D. 488—the year assigned for St. Mel's death. Ussher saw into this difficulty, and accordingly added from himself to "S. Patricii" the words, "ad huc superstitis." See "Index Chronologicus," ad A.D. cccclxxxviii. Ware, in "Writers of Ireland," acted in like manner. In such tracts, it is always pre-supposed, that the person, whose Acts are given, after persevering unto the end, had been removed to heaven. Even, if Mel had not written such Memoirs, the very report of his having done so shows, that he was considered as a survivor of St. Patrick.

<sup>37</sup> St. Kienan of Duleek, who died in 487, must have survived St. Patrick, if it be true, as stated, that a Life of the latter glorious Apostle had been composed, by the former saint. Colgan's evasion, that Kienan might have written that work before St. Patrick's death, will not answer the description of what is called the Life of a Saint. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. iii., p. 217.

<sup>38</sup> Thus, our Annalists place the death of St. Benignus in 468, but his successor, St. Jarlath, died in 482. He was again succeeded by Cormac, in the See of Armagh, and his death is announced, to have taken place, in 497. Computations founded on St. Patrick's prophecies regarding St. Brendan, and those of Nennius, referring to St. Patrick, St. Columkille and St. Brigid, seem worthy of some consideration, on this subject of enquiry.

<sup>39</sup> Thus, "Vincentius octoginta annos numerat: nec inveniri ejus sepulchrum, addit."—"Quinta Centuria Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ," tomus ii., cap. x., col. 1429.

<sup>40</sup> The Bollandists make our saint eighty-two years old, at the time of his death, viz., A.D. 460. See Commentarius Prævius ad Vitam S. Patricii, sect. v. Porter has adopted the Bollandist doubts, concerning the great number of years, commonly allowed for St. Patrick's life. See "Compendium Annalium Ecclesiæ Regni Hiberniæ," p. 126. Baronius, in "Annales Ecclesiastici," tomus vi., sect. xx., p. 399, ad A.D. 491, and Petavius, have a conjecture, that the number of St. Patrick's years, as found in Probus, to have been written cxixii., must have been originally lxxxii.—a c having been substituted for l, owing to the mistake of a copyist. The Bollandists calculate the sixty years of Apostolic life, commonly assigned for St. Patrick's mission in Ireland, from the time he was about twenty-two years of age, and not long released from bondage. Their calculations, in trying to determine precisely the date for journeys, said to have been made to Rome by St. Patrick, after the commencement of his Irish Apostolate, are based on relations, the accuracy of which may well be questioned. See, Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. iv., sect. ii., and nn. 11, 12, 13, 14, pp. 133 to 135.

<sup>41</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. De S. Patricio Episcopo, &c., sect. v., p. 523. There they state, that having completed his eighty-second year, he died in his eighty-third. See Adrian Baillet's "Les Vies des Saints," &c., tome iii., xvii. Mars. S. Patrice, sect. i., p. 439. Ed. Paris, 1701, 8vo. Also, Abbé Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome vi., liv. xxvi., sect. xiii., p. 152, and Rohrbacher's "Histoire Universelle de l'Eglise Catholique," tome viii., liv. xxxix., p. 20.

<sup>42</sup> According to a copy of Marianus Scotus' Chronicon, at A.D. 491; but, here the text of Marianus seems to have been vitiated. Colgan enters upon an analysis of other passages, to show, that Marianus wished to present St. Patrick, in various computations, as having lived one hundred and twenty years.

<sup>43</sup> According to Richard Stanihurst, in his "Vita S. Patricii," lib. ii., p. 74.

<sup>44</sup> According to a copy of the Annals of Boyle, as quoted by Ussher.

<sup>45</sup> According to the Glastonian Tablet. John of Teignmouth and John Capgrave follow this account, in their Legends of the British Saints, when treating about St. Patrick.

<sup>46</sup> See Father Peter Ribadeneira's "Lives of the Saints," &c., part i., p. 159. Dublin edition.

<sup>47</sup> The Irish Tripartite Life gives our Apostle this number of years—thus differing from the Latin Tripartite, in one passage, but agreeing with it in another. See Miss Cusack's "St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 500. The Breviary of Aberdeen states, that he lived to be 120 years. See, also,

But, Rev. Dr. Lanigan argues, that the latter computation was chiefly owing to the theories of earlier authors, when dividing the missionary acts of St. Patrick,<sup>48</sup> into cycles of years, so as to give him altogether 120 years,<sup>49</sup> as the term of his mortal pilgrimage.<sup>50</sup> A spurious Irish Poem<sup>51</sup>—called St. Patrick's Testament<sup>52</sup>—endeavours to distribute the presumed 120 years of his life into even cycles. But, this tract was evidently written, long after the saint's death.<sup>53</sup> Two years and six score was his age, or one hundred and twenty-two years, according to the Rev. Jeffry Keating,<sup>54</sup> the O'Clerys' Calendar, and various other authorities.<sup>55</sup> Our glorious saint died, at the age of a hundred and twenty-three years, according to the account of Jocelyn.<sup>56</sup> Again, one hundred and thirty-one,<sup>57</sup> as also, one hundred and thirty-two<sup>58</sup>—

James Stuart's "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh," chap. i., p. 85, and Archdeacon Cotton's "Fasti Ecclesiæ Hibernicæ," vol. iii., p. 4.

<sup>48</sup> Thus, the Abbate Certani has it: "Cosè nell' anno cento e venti di sua età, e'l sessagessimo del suo Apostolato," &c.—"Il Mose dell' Ibernica," lib. xiv., p. 515.

<sup>49</sup> This is the number assigned, in the old Roman Breviary, printed at Venice, A.D. 1522, lect. ii.; in the Breviary of the Lateran Canons, lect. vi.; in the Breviary of the Canons Regular, printed at Bruxelles, A.D. 1622, lect. vi.; in the Office of St. Patrick, printed at Paris, A.D. 1622, lect. vi. The Second, Fourth, and Seventh Lives seem to accord; Tirechan, Nennius, Matthew of Westminster, in his Annals at A.D. 491, Giraldus Cambrensis, in "Topographia Hibernica," Dist. iii., cap. xvii.; St. Antoninus, in Chronico, Tit. II, cap. 18, sect. 2.; Vincentius Beluacen, in Speculo Histor., lib. 20, cap. 230; the Annals of Ulster, of Dublin, the Codex Chromellienses, Ussher, Ware and Colgan, also favour this statement. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. vi., pp. 233, 234.

<sup>50</sup> An ancient Latin Poem is cited, by Ussher, in confirmation of this opinion:—

"Ter denis annis versatus in æde Sabelli
Ter denis aliis peragravi lætus Iernam,
Centum et videnos annos vivendo peregi, Præsentem ad noctem sæculum producitur istud."

<sup>51</sup> According to Sir James Ware, this tract is "fidei incertæ." See "Opuscula S. Patricii," Annotationes, p. 109.

<sup>52</sup> When expressly treating of the writings ascribed to St. Patrick, Colgan says nothing about it. See Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. ii., pp. 214, 215.

<sup>53</sup> See Ussher's "Primordia," cap. xvii., p. 887.

<sup>54</sup> See his "General History of Ireland," part ii., and in the fourteenth year of King Lugaidh's reign, which according to his calculation should be A.D. 480 or 481. John Bale, in "Scriptorum Illustrium Majoris Brytanniæ," states 122 to have been St.

Patrick's age. See cent. i., sect. xliiii., p. 43.

<sup>55</sup> Such as Sigebert, in his Chronicle, at A.D. 491, Florence of Worcester, Matthew of Westminster, a copy of Marianus Scotus, Raynulfus, Roger of Wendover, and the Annales Waurlienses, as cited by Ussher; likewise, the Annals of Ulster and of the Four Masters, at A.D. 493. In Baronius' n. (e), to his edition of the "Martyrologium Romanum," at the 17th of March, he has "annos natum 122." Romæ Ed., 1686. The Centuriators of Magdeburg follow this computation of Sigebert, in toms ii., "Quinta Centuria Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ," cap. x., col. 1429.

<sup>56</sup> St. Patrick was sixteen years old, when he was carried away by the pirates. Six years did he serve in captivity: eighteen years did he live with St. German, in France: he was five-and-fifty when he came into Ireland, to preach the Gospel: five-and-thirty years did he employ in the conversion of Ireland, and the adjoining Isles. Such is the computation of Jocelyn. See Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xcxi., p. 107. The Latin Tripartite states: "annoque sui inter Hibernos Apostolatus lxii., ætatis xxii., xvi. Kalendas Aprilis purissimum cælo reddidit Spiritum."—Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. iii., cap. ciil., p. 168.

<sup>57</sup> According to a "Martyrologium Anglo-Saxonum Ecclesiæ Exoniensis," as cited by Ussher.

<sup>58</sup> According to the author of the Third Life, "Peractis annis ætatis suæ centum triginta duobus 16. Kal. April. ad cælum profectus est."—Cap. lxxxix., pp. 28, 29. Probus thus writes: "in die scilicet xvi. Calend. April. expleta sunt circa B. Patricium, peractis totius vitæ ejus cxxx. duobus annis."—Lib. ii., cap. xxxiv. And, afterwards, "post ætatem annorum (ut antea dictum est) cxxxii.; peractis omnibus quæ in Deum sunt, * * * * * ad beatæ et æternæ regnæ felicissimæ profectus est."—Cap. xxxv., p. 60. This is repeated, in the old "Breviarium Remense," "Cum verò anni ætatis 132. attigisset, magnis defunctus laboribus, obdormivit in Domino."—Officium S. Patricii, lect. vi.

<sup>59</sup> See Tillemont's "Mémoires pour servir

by some thought to have been an error of transcription<sup>59</sup>—and, even, one hundred and fifty-three years,<sup>60</sup> have been assigned as St. Patrick's age, at the time of his departure.

The great number of churches, chapels and religious institutions, dedicated to St. Patrick, both at home and abroad, are evidence of the fervour, duration, and universality, of that reverence his devout clients have paid to his memory. In the first place, Colgan<sup>61</sup> has given us a list of churches<sup>62</sup>—the foundation of which has been attributed to the Irish Apostle—together with the names of their patrons. It seems very doubtful, however, if all the churches named after him had been founded, during St. Patrick's lifetime. The following is the list, as we find it: Kill-Chienain,<sup>63</sup> a monastery in the county of Louth, near the River Boyne, in Ultonia. Kill-Cholpa, an old See, near Down, in Ultonia.<sup>64</sup> Bretton, an old See, in the present diocese of Down.<sup>65</sup> Dun-leth-glaise, or Down, an episcopal See in Ultonia.<sup>66</sup> St. Patrick's Island, in the diocese of Dublin.<sup>67</sup> Kill-Clethe, a church near Down.<sup>68</sup> Magbile, a monastery in the diocese of Down.<sup>69</sup> Slane, an old episcopal See in Meath.<sup>70</sup> Trim, formerly an episcopal seat, in Meath.<sup>71</sup> Donough Patrick, a church, in Meath.<sup>72</sup> Drum-Duchan, a monastery, in the diocese of Clogher.<sup>73</sup> Cluain-fiacul, in the diocese of Armagh.<sup>74</sup> Domnach-airthir, in Ultonia.<sup>75</sup> The Cathedral church of Man.<sup>76</sup> Elphin, an episcopal See, in the province of Connaught.<sup>77</sup> Cluain-chaoín, otherwise, Louth, formerly a noble monastery and an episcopal seat, in Ultonia.<sup>78</sup> Ard-Patrick, near Louth, in the diocese of Armagh.<sup>79</sup> Domnach-comuir, in the diocese of Connor. Cloghar, an episcopal See in Ultonia.<sup>80</sup> Drumbo, in Ultonia. Domnach-Sechluinn, in Meath.<sup>81</sup> Granard, formerly an episcopal See, in Angalia.<sup>82</sup> Saul, a monastery, in the diocese of Down.<sup>83</sup> Ándruim, an old episcopal See.<sup>84</sup> Forgney, an episcopal See, in Meath.<sup>85</sup> Kill-duma, formerly an episcopal See, in the country of the Bregii.<sup>86</sup> Drum Chorothri, a church, in Meath. Kill-etnain, otherwise, Cluain-etnain, in Meath.<sup>87</sup> Kill-airthir.<sup>88</sup> Cluain Chremha.<sup>89</sup> Forrdhruim.<sup>90</sup> Domnacha l'Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome xvi., p. 783. Colgan thought, that for cxxxii. the original reading was cxvii. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. vi., pp. 232, 233.

<sup>60</sup> So states an anonymous writer, in "De Ecclesiasticorum Officiorum Origine," preserved in a Manuscript of the Cottonian Collection.

<sup>61</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiv., pp. 270 to 272.

<sup>62</sup> These are classed, nearly after that order, in which they have been enumerated, in the Acts of St. Patrick, and more especially, in the Tripartite Life. The very wonderful number of 196 is specified, in distinct names; besides 66 churches, that he is said to have built, in a certain part of Leinster, with innumerable other churches, it is said, he founded in Munster. Colgan thinks it possible to conceive, that St. Patrick founded not less than 700 churches; especially, if we consider, that during his lifetime, no sacred building was raised or consecrated, even by his disciples, without their great master's sanction.

<sup>63</sup> St. Kienan, Senior, was its patron, according to St. Fiach's Scholiast, num. 19.

<sup>64</sup> St. Tassach, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>65</sup> St. Loarn, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>66</sup> Of this, St. Patrick himself is the special patron.

<sup>67</sup> Of this, St. Patrick himself was patron.

<sup>68</sup> St. Eugene and St. Niell are regarded as the patrons.

<sup>69</sup> St. Alild, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>70</sup> St. Ere, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>71</sup> Saints Loman, Fortchern and Cathald, bishops, were the patrons.

<sup>72</sup> St. Patrick himself is regarded as the patron.

<sup>73</sup> Saints Cethuberis and Cinnia were the patrons.

<sup>74</sup> St. Patrick himself was the patron.

<sup>75</sup> St. Conned was the patron.

<sup>76</sup> Saints Romulus, Connidrius, Germanus and Machaldus, bishops, were the patrons.

<sup>77</sup> St. Assicus, bishop, is the patron.

<sup>78</sup> St. Mochteus, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>79</sup> St. Patrick himself was the patron.

<sup>80</sup> St. Maccarthann, bishop, is patron.

<sup>81</sup> St. Secundinus was the patron.

<sup>82</sup> St. Guasacht was the patron.

<sup>83</sup> St. Patrick himself was the patron.

<sup>84</sup> St. Mochai was the patron.

<sup>85</sup> St. Munis, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>86</sup> St. Mogoroc, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>87</sup> St. Columba, a priest, was the patron.

<sup>88</sup> St. Lugacius, priest, was patron.

<sup>89</sup> St. Mellan was patron.

mor.<sup>91</sup> Kill-huailleach. Kill-Cloghuir, in the country of the Bregii. Cluain-aladh-deirg, in the same country. Druim-Inis-Cluain.<sup>92</sup> Craoibech.<sup>93</sup> Teg-Laisreann.<sup>94</sup> Imleach-Seascuinn, a monastery.<sup>95</sup> Ailech-mor, in the country of Airtech, Connaught.<sup>96</sup> Cluain-Seanmoil<sup>97</sup> and Cluain-na-manach,<sup>98</sup> in the same province. Leaccain, in Meath.<sup>99</sup> Ardagh, in Teffia.<sup>100</sup> Inis-bofinde, on Lough Ree. Kill-glais, in Teffia.<sup>101</sup> Senlios, in Connaught.<sup>102</sup> Druim-cheo, a monastery, in Teffia.<sup>103</sup> Cluain-Bronaigh, a monastery, in Teffia.<sup>104</sup> Domnach-mor of Mag-slecht.<sup>105</sup> Kill-Buadhmaoil, in Connaught.<sup>106</sup> Senchua, in Tir-olill, a country of Connaught.<sup>107</sup> Cassel-Irra, in Connaught.<sup>108</sup> Kill-mor, in the country of Magglas, in Connaught. Domnach-mor, in the plain of Scola, in Connaught, and formerly an episcopal See.<sup>109</sup> Sencheall, in Tir-oilella.<sup>110</sup> Tamnacha, formerly an episcopal See, in Connaught.<sup>111</sup> Mag-nennense, a monastery, in Connaught. Sean-Domnach, in Turcharedha, in Connaught.<sup>112</sup> Sean-Domnach, in the plain of Mayo, in Connaught.<sup>113</sup> Domnach-Sarige, a monastery of Kiennacht, in the country of the Bregarii.<sup>114</sup> Ath-dalaarg, a monastery, and formerly an episcopal See, in Connaught.<sup>115</sup> Fidhardh, in Hy-Many.<sup>116</sup> Kill-garadh, in Connaught.<sup>117</sup> Basleac, formerly an episcopal See, in Connaught.<sup>118</sup> Cuilchon-maíne, a monastery, in Connaught.<sup>119</sup> Dominica Magna, of Mag-selga, in Connaught. Druimnea, a monastery, in Gregaire, a country of Connaught. Kill-Atrachta, a monastery of Connaught.<sup>120</sup> Airdne Choëmain, a monastery, in Connaught.<sup>121</sup> Kierrage of Airtech, a church, in Connaught.<sup>122</sup> Kierragia Arnensis, a church, in Connaught.<sup>123</sup> Sencheall, in Kierragia Arnensis.<sup>124</sup> Ard-uiscen, and many other churches, in Connaught. Cuil-chorra, in the territory of Cera, Connaught. Mag-Foëmsensis, a church, in the territory of Cera, in Connaught. Achadh-fobhair, an episcopal See, in Connaught.<sup>125</sup> Cruachan, a church, at Croughan Aigle Mountain, in Connaught. Three churches, called Teora-tuaga, in Connaught. Keall-tog, in Connaught.<sup>126</sup> Kill-forchlann, in Tyrawley, Connaught.<sup>127</sup> Rath-Roain, in Connaught. Desert-Patruic, in Connaught.<sup>128</sup> Domnach-mor, in Tyrawley.<sup>129</sup> The church of St. Teloc and of St. Domnald. Kill-aladh, an episcopal See, in Tyrawley.<sup>130</sup> Lia-namanach, a monastery, in Tyrawley. Kill-mor, of Huachter Muaidhe.<sup>131</sup> Buaille-Padruic, in Tir-Fiachra. Corcaraoídh. Kill-roa, in Tir-Fiachra.<sup>132</sup> Kill-Rodain, in the

<sup>90</sup> St. Lugad, son of Erc, was the patron.

<sup>91</sup> St. Cassan, priest, was the patron.

<sup>92</sup> St. Lugad and St. Daluan were the patrons.

<sup>93</sup> St. Daluan was the patron.

<sup>94</sup> St. Lugad and St. Begga were the patrons.

<sup>95</sup> St. Moluan was the patron.

<sup>96</sup> St. Domalis, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>97</sup> St. Connetus was the patron.

<sup>98</sup> St. Dabonna, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>99</sup> St. Crumman.

<sup>100</sup> Saints Mel and Melchuo, bishops, are called patrons.

<sup>101</sup> St. Echea was the patron.

<sup>102</sup> St. Laloca was the patron.

<sup>103</sup> St. Lupita, virgin, was the patron.

<sup>104</sup> The two Saints Emeria, virgins, were the patrons.

<sup>105</sup> St. Mauran, or Barban, was the patron.

<sup>106</sup> St. Buadhmael was the patron.

<sup>107</sup> St. Ailbeus was the patron.

<sup>108</sup> St. Bron, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>109</sup> St. Filart was the patron.

<sup>110</sup> Saints Maccetus, Cethenus, Rodanus and Matona were the patrons.

<sup>111</sup> St. Carell, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>112</sup> St. Coëman was the patron.

<sup>113</sup> Saints Ethnea and Fethelmia, virgins, were the patrons.

<sup>114</sup> St. Cethech, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>115</sup> St. Cethech, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>116</sup> St. Justus was the patron.

<sup>117</sup> St. Cethech was the patron.

<sup>118</sup> St. Sacellus, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>119</sup> St. Crocha, virgin, was the patron.

<sup>120</sup> St. Attracta was the patron.

<sup>121</sup> St. Coëman was the patron.

<sup>122</sup> St. Cona was the patron.

<sup>123</sup> St. Loarn was the patron.

<sup>124</sup> St. Conan was the patron.

<sup>125</sup> St. Senach, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>126</sup> St. Cannech, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>127</sup> Saints Crebrea and Lassara, virgins, were the patrons.

<sup>128</sup> St. Donnmalus, of Cros-Patruic, was the patron.

<sup>129</sup> St. Muena, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>130</sup> St. Muredach, bishop, was the patron.

country of Muireasc.<sup>133</sup> Drum-lias, in the country of Calry, Connaught. Srath-Patruic, in the country of the Glens, Connaught.<sup>134</sup> Domnach-mor, in the country of Mag-ene, in Tir-Connall. Disert-Patruic, in Mag-ene. Raith-Cunga, in Tir-Connall, where the seven holy bishops were buried, and among these, St. Biteus, and St. Assic. Domnach-mor of Mag-ithe, in Tir-Connall. Domnach-Senchua, of Derry diocese, Ultonia. Domnach-Daire of the same diocese, and probably identical with the city of Derry. Domnach Seinlis, Domnach-Mionchluana, Domnach—perchance Cluain-catha—Both-Domnaich, in the valley of Gleann-Aichle, Domnach-mor of Maghtochuir<sup>135</sup>—formerly an episcopal See of Inis-Eogain—Domnach-bile, or Moville : all of these are in the diocese of Derry. Inbhear, in Connaught.<sup>136</sup> Ailech-Airtich, formerly an episcopal See, in Connaught.<sup>137</sup> Cuil-Chonalta, an episcopal See, in Connaught.<sup>138</sup> Domnach-airthir-Arda, in the country of Kiennacht, Ultonia ; and, Domnach-Breghmuighe, in the same region, with other churches. Dun-Cruthen, of Derry diocese, Ultonia.<sup>139</sup> Damliag, an episcopal See, of Bregia.<sup>140</sup> Rath-mugia, or Arthermugia, an episcopal See, in Dalriedia.<sup>141</sup> Condoria, or Connor, an episcopal See of Dalriedia. Foth-Rath, in Dalriedia.<sup>142</sup> Rath-Mudain, in Dalriedia.<sup>143</sup> Tulach,<sup>144</sup> Domnach-Coinre,<sup>145</sup> Druim-Indich,<sup>146</sup> Cuill-echtrann,<sup>147</sup> Kill-glais,<sup>148</sup> Lettir-Phadruic,<sup>149</sup> Commorensse Monasterium, Domnach-mor of Mag-damorna, Rath-Sidhe, Kill-Chonadhain and Tulach : all of these were in Dalaradia. Gluaire,<sup>150</sup> in the region of Latharna. Glean-indecht. Imleach-cluain,<sup>151</sup> in the field of Semna. Rath Easpuic,<sup>152</sup> an episcopal See. Rath-muge-Aoenaich<sup>153</sup> and Cuil-rathain,<sup>154</sup> episcopal Sees, in Dalriedia. Domnach-Fainre, Domnach-riascach, Domnach-righ-dhuin, Domnach-Brain, Domnach-Molain, Domnach-Libeir and Domnach-Foth-airbe, in the territory of Hi-Tuirtre, in Ultonia. Imchlar or Domnach-Imch-lair,<sup>155</sup> afterwards Donoughmore, and Domnach-Airthir,<sup>156</sup> in the diocese of Armagh. Clogher,<sup>157</sup> an episcopal See, in Ultonia. Druim Dubhain nunnery,<sup>158</sup> in the diocese of Clogher. Teg-Talain,<sup>159</sup> in Ui-Meith. Domnach Tortan<sup>160</sup> and Domnach-Urchaile, in Meath. Kill-naningen,<sup>161</sup> Kill-chuilinn,<sup>162</sup> an episcopal See, with divers other churches, in the plain of the Liffey. Kill-uasaille,<sup>163</sup> formerly an episcopal See, in Lagenia. Forrach-Patruic, in the territory of Erchon. Domnach-Mor of Mag-criathar, Inis-fail,<sup>164</sup> Inis-beg,<sup>165</sup> Slechte,<sup>166</sup> an episcopal See, Domnach-Mor of Mag-Reda, in Lagenia, with sixty-six or seventy other churches, founded there, by St. Patrick and by King

<sup>131</sup> St. Olcan was the patron.

<sup>132</sup> St. Macerca was the patron.

<sup>133</sup> St. Rodan was the patron.

<sup>134</sup> Colgan has improperly placed it, in Ultonia.

<sup>135</sup> St. Maccarthenn, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>136</sup> Eochan, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>137</sup> Domnald, son of Colgne, bishop, was patron.

<sup>138</sup> Domnald, bishop, was patron.

<sup>139</sup> St. Beatus, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>140</sup> St. Kienan, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>141</sup> St. Olcan, or Bolcan, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>142</sup> Saints Cathbad and Diman were patrons.

<sup>143</sup> St. Erelacius, priest, was patron.

<sup>144</sup> St. Nehemias, bishop, was patron.

<sup>145</sup> The two Saints Connan were patrons.

<sup>146</sup> St. Ernan was the patron.

<sup>147</sup> St. Fiachrius, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>148</sup> Saints Glassicus and Liberius were the patrons.

<sup>149</sup> St. Daniel was the patron.

<sup>150</sup> St. Macclarius was the patron.

<sup>151</sup> St. Ceeman was the patron.

<sup>152</sup> St. Winoc, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>153</sup> St. Brugacius, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>154</sup> St. Carbre, bishop, was the patron.

<sup>155</sup> St. Columbus, priest, was the patron.

<sup>156</sup> St. Coned was the patron.

<sup>157</sup> St. Maccarthenn was the patron.

<sup>158</sup> Saints Cectamaria and Cinnia were patrons.

<sup>159</sup> St. Killian was the patron.

<sup>160</sup> St. Justin was the patron.

<sup>161</sup> Saints Mugania and Fethlimia, virgins, were patrons.

<sup>162</sup> Saints Isserninus and Mactail were patrons.

<sup>163</sup> St. Auxilius was the patron.

<sup>164</sup> St. Mochatoc was the patron.

<sup>165</sup> St. Augustine was the patron.

Crimthann. Martar-tech, in Ossory. In Munster, he founded the following churches, viz.: Disert-Phadruic, Kill-fiacla,<sup>167</sup> Kill-malaca,<sup>168</sup> Kill-ratha,<sup>169</sup> Kill-teidil,<sup>170</sup> Mun-gairit,<sup>171</sup> Domnach-Mor, Ard-Patruic, with many others. In Ultonia, he erected Druim-Mor, Ard-Patruic, in the diocese of Armagh, Ferta, or Deferta, near Armagh, Tamlact, or Tamlact-bo,<sup>172</sup> Coll-na-Naingean, near Armagh, Inis Cobhuir,<sup>173</sup> Armagh,<sup>174</sup> and Druim-mac-Ubhla.<sup>175</sup> Domnach-Sechnaill,<sup>176</sup> in Meath, Kill-monach, Ferna-martuir, the monastery of Ernath, in Ultonia, Kill-dare,<sup>177</sup> Domnaic-Dala,<sup>178</sup> Domnach-Læbain,<sup>179</sup> Sen-domnach of Rath-each, Sean-nDomnach, near Dun-Sobairche, in Dalrieda, Domnach-Aite, and Finnauar, or Cloghar, in Conaille Murthemne, are said to have been Patrician churches.<sup>180</sup>

The following parishes, townlands and places, in Ireland, appear to have been named, after our Irish Apostle. This information has been gleaned from printed records, maps, epistolary and oral communication; yet, it must be regarded, as still incomplete. There is a St. Patrick's parish, within the Liberties of St. Patrick, Dublin City.<sup>181</sup> There is a Templepatrick Parish, in the baronies of Upper and Lower Belfast, county of Antrim.<sup>182</sup> There is a Kilpatrick Parish, in the county of Cork;<sup>183</sup> there is another, so called, in the county of Kildare;<sup>184</sup> there is one, in Tipperary County;<sup>185</sup> one, in Westmeath;<sup>186</sup> and one, in Wexford County.<sup>187</sup> There is a St. Patrick's Island, in the parish of Holmpatrick, county of Dublin.<sup>188</sup> There is a St. Patrick's-rock, a townland and parish, in the county of Tipperary.<sup>189</sup> There is a St. Patrickswell Town, in the parishes of Kilkeedy, Killonahan and Munget, county of Limerick.<sup>190</sup> There is a townland, named Toberpatrick, or "Patrick's Well," in the parish of Kiltristan, and county of Roscommon;<sup>191</sup> also, in the parish of Skreen, county of Sligo;<sup>192</sup> also, in the parish of Kil-

<sup>166</sup> St. Fiach was the patron.

<sup>167</sup> Its patrons were Saints Curcneus, Loscanus, Calechus, Beoanus.

<sup>168</sup> St. Malachus Britto was the patron.

<sup>169</sup> St. Coëmanus was the patron.

<sup>170</sup> Saints Munis and Lomchuo were the patrons.

<sup>171</sup> St. Nesson was the patron.

<sup>172</sup> St. Ercnata is regarded as the patron.

<sup>173</sup> St. Aidan was the patron.

<sup>174</sup> St. Patrick himself has always been the adopted patron.

<sup>175</sup> St. Sedna was the patron.

<sup>176</sup> St. Sechnall, or Secundin, was the patron.

<sup>177</sup> St. Senell was the patron.

<sup>178</sup> St. Besena was the patron.

<sup>179</sup> St. Maccetus was the patron.

<sup>180</sup> The following list of Protestant episcopal churches, dedicated to St. Patrick, has been kindly furnished, by the Rev. Christopher McCready, Rector of St. Audoen's, Dublin, from the names of the 1,628 Irish churches, vested by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in the Representative Body, viz.: 1. Dioceses of Armagh and Clogher: Armagh Cathedral, Upper Donaghmore, Aghnamullen, Ard-ragh, Donagh (Glaslough), Donaghmoynne, and Tullycorbet. 2. Diocese of Meath: Donaghpatrick and Trim. 3. Dioceses of Derry and Raphoe: Upper Badoney, Lower Badoney, Donaghmore, Kilrea, and Leckpatrick. 4. Dioceses of Down, Connor and Dromore: Downpatrick, Coleraine, Jordanstown, Kirkinriola, Racavan (Broughshane), Templepatrick, Tickmacrean, (Glenarm) and Newry. 5. Diocese of Ardagh: Ardagh Cathedral. 6. Dioceses of Tuam, Killala and Achonry: Ayle, and Killala. 7. Dioceses of Dublin, Glandalagh and Kildare: St. Patrick's Cathedral (Dublin), Holmpatrick (Skerries), Dalkey, Powerscourt (Enniskerry). 8. Diocese of Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin: Crosspatrick and Stradbally. 9. Dioceses of Cashel, Emly, Waterford and Lismore: Waterford and Clashmore. 10. Diocese of Limerick: City of Limerick, parish of St. Patrick.

<sup>181</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheet 18.

<sup>182</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 50, 51, 55, 56, 60.

<sup>183</sup> See County Sheet, 99.

<sup>184</sup> See County Sheets, 8, 12.

<sup>185</sup> See County Sheets, 51, 59.

<sup>186</sup> See County Sheets, 7, 8, 12, 13.

<sup>187</sup> See County Sheets, 32, 37.

<sup>188</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheet 5.

<sup>189</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 52, 53, 60, 61, 68, 69.

<sup>190</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheet 12.

pipe, county of Wicklow.<sup>193</sup> There is a Patrickswell, in Rathvilly Parish, county of Carlow;<sup>194</sup> also, in Knockainy, county of Limerick; also, in the parish of Burgesbeg,<sup>195</sup> and in the parish of Inishlonnaght,<sup>196</sup> county of Tipperary. There is a Patrickstown, in the parish of Diamor, county of Meath.<sup>197</sup> There is a Patrick's Island, in the parish of Cloonclare, in the county of Leitrim.<sup>198</sup> The following townlands, called Templepatrick, are known, viz.: one in Antrim,<sup>199</sup> one in the county of Down,<sup>200</sup> and one, in the county of Westmeath.<sup>201</sup> There are no less than twenty-two townlands, denominated Kilpatrick, noted on the Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the following Irish counties, viz.: one, in Antrim;<sup>202</sup> six, in Cork;<sup>203</sup> one, in Kerry;<sup>204</sup> two, in Kildare;<sup>205</sup> one, in King's County;<sup>206</sup> one, in Louth;<sup>207</sup> two, in Tipperary;<sup>208</sup> five, in Westmeath;<sup>209</sup> two, in Wexford;<sup>210</sup> and one, in Wicklow.<sup>211</sup> But, besides these, other places in Ireland are called traditionally, by this name, although these are not so noted as denominations, on the Irish Ordnance Survey Maps.

Besides the fine Catholic Cathedral of the Archdiocese in Armagh—to which allusion has been already made—the Vincentian College there is dedicated to St. Patrick. Also, in this diocese, an old church, at Clonfeacle, overhanging the River Blackwater, opposite Blackwatertown, county of Armagh, was probably dedicated to St. Patrick, as the more recently erected church beside it is dedicated to him.<sup>212</sup> St. Patrick's cross is shown, at the place.<sup>213</sup> The Christian Brothers' Schools, at Armagh, are dedicated to St. Patrick. The following churches are dedicated to Ireland's Patron, in the diocese of Down and Connor: St. Patrick's Church, Donegal-street, Belfast, and St. Patrick's, Mount St. Patrick, Downpatrick, Loughgiel, Braid, Skerry. St. Mary's and St. Patrick's, Ballymoney, as also SS. Patrick and Bridgid, Ballycastle, county of Antrim. St. Patrick's Church, in Newtownards, Portaferry, Saul, Ballygalget, Leggamaddy, Bright and Ballykinler, county of Down. Besides the above churches, the following Institutions are under the invocation of St. Patrick: the Convent of Mercy, Mount St. Patrick, Downpatrick, the Female Orphanage, Crumlin Road, Belfast, the Male Orphanage and Industrial School, Milltown, Falls' Road, Belfast.<sup>214</sup> This, probably, is not a complete list. In the diocese of Derry, the parish of Donaghmore is a

<sup>193</sup> It is noticed, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheet 23.

<sup>194</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Sligo," Sheet 13.

<sup>195</sup> See the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheets 39, 44.

<sup>196</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Carlow," Sheet 4.

<sup>197</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheet 20.

<sup>198</sup> See ibid., Sheets 82, 83.

<sup>199</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 9, 15.

<sup>200</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Leitrim," Sheet 9.

<sup>201</sup> See County Sheets 50, 51, for Templepatrick town and townland.

<sup>202</sup> See County Sheet, 7.

<sup>203</sup> See County Sheet, 17.

<sup>204</sup> See County Sheet, 1.

<sup>205</sup> See County Sheets, 24, 32, 59, 60, 96, 97, 99, 148.

<sup>206</sup> See County Sheet, 93.

<sup>207</sup> See County Sheets, 8, 12, 26.

<sup>208</sup> See County Sheets, 7, 8, 15, 16.

<sup>209</sup> See County Sheet, 17.

<sup>210</sup> See County Sheets, 51, 59, 66.

<sup>211</sup> See County Sheets, 8, 11, 13, 18, 19, 25, 26, 31.

<sup>212</sup> See County Sheets, 3, 7, 21.

<sup>213</sup> See County Sheets, 35, 36, 40.

<sup>214</sup> This was erected, as an inscription testifies, by the Rev. Bernard Quinn, who was the Parish Priest, in 1780. It was re-erected, by the Rev. Michael Coyne, P.P., in the year 1848.

<sup>215</sup> The cemetery there is elevated, high over the bordering road and fields, and, it lies close by Blackwater Town.

<sup>216</sup> For the foregoing information, the writer is indebted to Rev. John Conway, of St. Malachy's College, Belfast, in a communication, dated 8th September, 1879.

<sup>217</sup> The foundation stone was laid, by Most very extensive one, extending from near Clandy to nearly Barnis Gap. Here, a new church, dedicated to St. Patrick, has been erected, by the Very Rev. Edward Boyle, P.P. and V.F.<sup>215</sup> The site is at Cross Roads, and immediately adjoining the graveyard, attached to the old church, which was built over one hundred years ago, on the relaxing of the severity of the penal laws. At first, like most of the Roman Catholic churches of the period, it was only a little thatched building, but, it was afterwards slated. The designs for the new church were prepared, by Messrs. O'Neill and Byrne, Architects, Belfast; and, it is in the Gothic style, with nave and aisle, one hundred and ten feet in length, with fifty-eight feet of over walls.<sup>216</sup> The following is an account, with a list of churches,<sup>217</sup> in the diocese of Clogher, dedicated to Ireland's great Patron: St. Patrick's Church,<sup>218</sup> Ballibay, parish of Tullycorbet, St. Patrick's,<sup>219</sup> parish of Magheraclone, and St. Patrick's,<sup>220</sup> (Bawn), parish of Aughamullen West—all in the county of Monaghan. Again, St. Patrick's,<sup>221</sup> (Holywell), parish of Cleenish, and St. Patrick's,<sup>222</sup> parish of Derrygonnelly; both in the county of Fermanagh. Also, St. Patrick's,<sup>223</sup> in the parish of Aghentine, county of Tyrone, and St. Patrick's,<sup>224</sup> Lough Derg, county of Donegal. In the diocese of Dromore, the Christian Brothers' Schools, in Newry, are dedicated to St. Patrick. In the diocese of Kilmore, the fine College, at Cullies, Cavan, is under the patronage of St. Patrick. At Ardagh, in the present deanery of Kells, diocese and county of Meath, a church is said to have been erected, by St. Patrick. A more imposing site it would not have been possible to select. It commands a magnificent view of the adjoining counties of Cavan, Monaghan, Louth, Armagh and Down. The old church has been uprooted, however, and a Protestant temple has been erected there, but the parish is still dedicated to St. Patrick.<sup>225</sup> Also, at Castlecorr, in the deanery of Kells, there was an old church, which stood on a hill, and a portion of its grey walls still remains. The cemetery was dug up, and the tombstones removed. St. Patrick's well lies a short distance from the ruins.<sup>226</sup> The old stone-roofed church of Kilpatrick, in the deanery of Mullingar, seems to have been dedicated to him.<sup>227</sup> On the townland of Rathconrath, in the parish and barony of the same name, county of Westmeath, there is a holy well, dedicated to St. Patrick. Again, in the parish of Templepatrick, barony of Rathconrath, there is an old church, measuring forty, by twenty-one, feet. On a rock, near the churchyard, St. Patrick's footprints are shown: A cross stood convenient. On the vigil of St. Patrick's feast, stations were here celebrated.<sup>228</sup> There was a Tubber-Patrick, near Kilmalish, in the deanery of Mullingar.<sup>229</sup> This spring was dedicated, no doubt, to the great Rev. Dr. Kelly, Catholic Bishop of Derry, on Sunday, May 12th, 1872, and a sermon was preached, by Rev. Edward Loughrey, on the occasion.

<sup>216</sup> The Northern Star and Ulster Observer of Tuesday, May 14th, 1872, contains the preceding statements.

<sup>217</sup> Furnished by Rev. Daniel O'Connor, C.C., in a communication dated Corcahan, Monaghan, August 26th, 1879.

<sup>218</sup> This was erected, about the year 1860, by Rev. Andrew Carney, P.P., at the cost of £3,000, and completed, in the year 1878, by the present P.P., Rev. Laurence J. O'Neill, at the additional cost of about £3,000.

<sup>219</sup> Erected in the years 1858-59, by Rev. Patrick Carolan, P.P., and completed, by the present pastor, Very Rev. John Canon

Hoey, at the total expenditure of £2,000.

<sup>220</sup> It was erected, about forty years ago.

<sup>221</sup> It was built, in the year 1828, by Rev. James Rooney, P.P.

<sup>222</sup> It was built, by Rev. Ross M'Mahon, P.P., about the year 1836.

<sup>223</sup> Opened for its sacred purpose, on St. Patrick's Day, 1870.

<sup>224</sup> Erected, A.D. 1763, by Rev. Anthony O'Doherty of the Order of St. Francis. This church underwent considerable repairs and renovations, in 1860 and 1878.

<sup>225</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xvi., pp. 294, 295.

<sup>226</sup> See ibid., vol. ii., chap. xvi., p. 313.

<sup>227</sup> See ibid., chap. xviii., p. 430.

<sup>228</sup> See ibid., vol. ii., chap. xviii., pp. 444, 449.

St. Patrick. St. Patrick's Christian Schools are at Tullamore, King's County. The Catholic Church of Moate, county of Westmeath, is believed to be the only church, chapel or religious institution, dedicated to St. Patrick, in the united dioceses of Ardagh and Clonmacnoise.<sup>229</sup>

Besides some old churches, in the city and archdiocese of Dublin, at present we may mention St. Patrick's Church, at Ringsend, near the city boundary. The Ecclesiastical College of Maynooth is dedicated to St. Patrick. This Institution was endowed, by the Irish and Imperial Parlia-

St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, County of Kildare.

ments, having been called into existence, towards the close of the last century, and, with some changes of rule, having received various accessions of building, since that time. It has lately been disestablished ; but, its efficiency has not been diminished, in preparing young men, from all the Irish dioceses, to pursue their course of studies for the priesthood.<sup>231</sup> In Dublin Archdiocese, the following institutions are also under the patronage of our Apostle : St. Patrick's Training School for Catholic Schoolmasters, at Drumcondra ; the Convent of the Order of St. John of God, Sandymount Avenue, near Dublin ; St. Patrick's Convent, Sisters of Mercy, Glasthule. In the diocese of Ossory, we find St. Patrick's Church and Parish, in the barony of the city of Kilkenny, and in the barony of Shillelogher.<sup>232</sup> In Ballyragget parish, St. Patrick is said to be the patron ; as also, at Rathpatrick, in Slieverue parish, and again, at Tubrid-Britain, alias Greane, in Urlingford parish.<sup>233</sup> In the diocese of Ferns and county of Wexford, the following places are known to

<sup>229</sup> See ibid., vol. ii., chap. xviii., and note at p. 490.

<sup>230</sup> Letter from Rev. J. O'Farrell, C.C., dated Banagher, King's County, 29th December, 1879.

<sup>231</sup> The accompanying illustration, from a photograph, kindly furnished by the President, Very Rev. William J. Walsh, D.D.,

was drawn on the wood, and engraved, by William Oldham of Dublin.

<sup>232</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheets 19, 20.

<sup>233</sup> See "Statuta Diocesis Ossoriensis edita Kilkenniae, in Synodo Diocesana die 3 Junii, 1873," sect. 8, pp. 24, 28, 29.

have had a special connexion, with that veneration, due to Ireland's great Apostle: In the town of Wexford, there was an old church, dedicated to St. Patrick; and latterly, a new Catholic Church there erected, by the Very Rev. James Canon Roche, P.P., has our Apostle for its patron. Crosspatrick Prebend derived its title from him. There is a parish of St. Patrick's, in the barony of Forth.<sup>234</sup> In Kilpatrick Parish, there is a St. Patrick's well. There is another St. Patrick's well, in Kilmore Parish. In Templeludigan Parish, there is a St. Patrick's well, where a patron used to be held, on the 17th of March. There is a list extant of the "Ecclesiæ Parochiales et Capellæ," in the diocese of Kildare, drawn up by Ross M'Geoghegan, Bishop of Kildare, for Father Colgan. In it, we find the following mentioned, as having been dedicated to St. Patrick: 1. "Capella Sti. Patritii de Tullymore." This is Lullimore, north of Rathangan.<sup>235</sup> 2. "Capella Sti. Patritii in alonia de Carrick." This ancient parish of Carrick is now a portion of Ballyna Parish, barony of Carberry, county of Kildare. 3. "Ecclesia Parochialis Sti. Patricii de Cruoghgan," which is now Croghan, in the King's County. 4. In "Decanatu Clao-nensi," which is now the deanery of Clane, was his church. The blessing and laying of the foundation-stone of a new church, dedicated to Ireland's Patron Saints, Patrick and Brigid, took place on Sunday, September the 11th, 1876, at Clane, in the county of Kildare. 5. "Parochialis Sti. Patritii de Killughterhyey quæ vocatur Teampull Domnoill agus Suada." This has not been identified. In the parish of Allen, in the county of Kildare, there are ruins of an ancient church, and a burial-ground, called Cross Patrick. In the barony of Offaly, parish of Carberry, there is a Killpatrick, where, according to Father Shearman, St. Patrick erected a church, on his return from Munster. The old church of Naas is said to have been dedicated to St. Patrick.<sup>236</sup> St. Patrick's Christian Schools are here. At Rathvilly, county of Carlow, there is an old church and a well, dedicated to St. Patrick. There is a new church of St. Patrick, at Timahoe, dedicated about 1832, and built by Rev. Cornelius Dowling, P.P. of Stradbally, Queen's County. St. Patrick is said to have erected a church, at Magh Reda, now Morett. This was called Donaghmore, according to the Tripartite Life of the saint; yet, it cannot now be identified. At Kellistown, parish of Ballon, county of Carlow, there was a large ruined church, in 1788, said to have been built by St. Patrick, and dedicated to him. Near it was a well of St. Patrick, surrounded by a stone wall, and shaded by large trees.<sup>237</sup> The Ecclesiastical and Lay College of Carlow is dedicated to Ireland's great Apostle.<sup>238</sup> It was founded, in the last century, and it has served its educational purposes during the present, as

<sup>234</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wexford," Sheet 37.

<sup>235</sup> There is a rock, at Lullimore, marked with a footprint, and this is called St. Patrick's Step. For much of the present and succeeding information, the writer is indebted to the Rev. Michael Comerford, P.P. of Monasterevan, in a communication, dated January 30th, 1880.

<sup>236</sup> See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana." Also, Dr. Joyce's "Origin and History of Irish Names of Places," Second Series, p. 53.

<sup>237</sup> The following legend of this spot is thus recorded: "A profane wretch who wanted wood for firing, repaired to this well to cut down one of those sacred trees. The first stroke he gave, he imagined he saw his cabin in flames and ran with the utmost speed to quench the fire; but when he came there, he found everything as he left them. He returned to his work again, and giving another stroke, saw the flames rise higher than before, which obliged him to repair home a second time, when, finding all things safe as at first, he returned to the tree and by his repeated strokes brought it down to the ground, but before he could drag it home, he found his cabin and furniture entirely consumed to ashes. We were shown the very spot, where the cabin stood, and no one will venture to erect another in the same place nor contradict the truth of this tradition."—"The Compleat Traveller." London, 1788.

<sup>238</sup> The accompanying illustration, from a photograph, furnished by the President, Very well for the home as for foreign missions.<sup>239</sup> Again, the Monasteries and Schools of the Monks of St. Patrick—a classical and mathematical teaching body of religious—at Tullow, county of Carlow, and at Mountrath, Queen's County, are dedicated to the Irish Apostle. In the Archdiocese of Cashel, St. Patrick's College, Ecclesiastical and Lay, is dedicated to Ireland's Patron.

St. Patrick's College, Carlow.

The Knocklong Chapel of 1752 was dedicated to St. Patrick, as we learn from the Visitation Book<sup>240</sup> of the Most Rev. James Butler, Archbishop of Cashel. In the diocese and city of Cork, there is a church and parish, dedicated to St. Patrick. Among the local institutions are St. Patrick's Reformatory, at Upton, and St. Patrick's Hospital for Incurables, under care of the Mercy Nuns. In the diocese and city of Limerick, there is a church and parish, dedicated to St. Patrick,<sup>241</sup> as also the parish of Patrick's Well. Among the religious institutions, St. Patrick's Christian Schools are at Bruff, county of Limerick. In the dioceses of Waterford and Lismore, there is a St. Patrick's Parish, in the city of Waterford.<sup>242</sup> St. Patrick's Christian Schools are, also, in the city of Waterford. The only trace of St. Patrick's Rev. James Kavanagh, D.D., has been drawn on the wood, and engraved by William Oldham.

<sup>239</sup> The author's former student life, in this college, enables him to pronounce with some degree of authority, on the excellent system of discipline and course of studies adopted; nor have these declined, in any single particular, under existing arrangements and academic government.

<sup>240</sup> See Limerick Reporter of February 14th, 1873.

<sup>241</sup> It is partly, in the barony of Lower Bunratty, and this portion is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheets 53, 63; and partly in the baronies of Clanwilliam and of Limerick City. The latter part is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheet 5.

<sup>242</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Waterford," Sheet 9.

<sup>243</sup> So has the writer been informed, in a communication from Rev. Jeremiah Molony, P.E., Ross, V.F., and dated Roscarbury, County Cork, December 12th, 1879.

existence, in the diocese of Ross, is the Church of Domnach-mor (monastic), in the parish of Lislee, and to the south-west of Timoleague.<sup>243</sup> In the Archdiocese and town of Tuam, county of Galway, the Christian Brothers have Schools, dedicated to St. Patrick.

Among the local memorials of Ireland, St. Patrick's well,<sup>244</sup> in the parish of Knockainy,<sup>245</sup> and barony of Smallcountry, county of Limerick, is yet much frequented by pilgrims on St. Patrick's Day, because the popular tradition holds, that the Irish Apostle visited that place, and blessed the well.<sup>246</sup> At Stradbally, in the Queen's County, was St. Patrick's well, near the present Protestant church and cemetery—said formerly to have been dedicated to our saint. It was once tastefully arched over with dressed stones, and it sprung from beneath a wall, on Church-lane; but, the devotions of the people there caused offence to a former Protestant rector, so that it was covered over,<sup>247</sup> while the stream flowing from it was conducted, by a subterranean culvert, into the opposite paddock, and thence into the small river, passing through Stradbally. A holy well, overshadowed by a venerable tree and called "Tober Patrick,"<sup>248</sup> is at Kilcoo,<sup>249</sup> in the extreme north-west of the County Fermanagh. There is a Srúpatrick, or "Patrick's Stream," in the parish of Kilkeel, and county of Down, while, it is said to have been so called, because the Irish Apostle travelled no further, into the mountainous district of Mourne.<sup>250</sup> A great number of additional places, in Ireland, bears the composition of Patrick, with some other term; thus, Derrypatrick, "Patrick's oak-wood," &c. Thus, likewise, tradition has it, one of these was Derrypatrick, in the barony of Lower Deece, county of Meath. It was formerly known as Doire-Padraig. All of the ruins, now remaining there, is the east end of an old church. A nunnery was formerly, at this spot, according to the popular tradition, but no trace of it now remains.<sup>251</sup>

It seems probable, in former times, that Patrington, a parish and market town, in the East Riding of Yorkshire, takes its name from our saint, since its spacious and handsome Protestant church, in cruciform style, is dedicated to St. Patrick. It has a tower, surmounted by a fine, lofty spire, while the whole building combines the decorated and later English styles. Perhaps, Patrickroft, in the parish of Eccles, in South Lancashire, may have derived its name, likewise, from the Patron Saint of Ireland.<sup>252</sup> Regarding the Principality of Wales, there are two persons, bearing the name of Padrig, mentioned in Bonedd y Saint. One of these, Padrig Maenwyn,<sup>253</sup> son of Mawon, and who was Apostle to the Irish, is said to have been a native of Cwrt-y-Carn, in the south-western extremity of the parish of Llandeilo-Taly-

<sup>244</sup> This townland is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheet 32.

<sup>245</sup> See it shown, on Sheets 32, 40. Ibid.

<sup>246</sup> Information given, by Rev. John Madden, C.C., Knockainy.

<sup>247</sup> The writer often saw it, previously, and with persons occasionally praying beside it, "in the days of childhood."

<sup>248</sup> Here a "pattern," used to be held, on the 17th of March.

<sup>249</sup> Here was a very ancient church, and some curious monuments near it are pictured and described, by W. F. Wakeman, in an article, headed "Kilcoo," in "The Journal of the Royal Historical and Archæological Association of Ireland," vol. v. Fourth Series, January, 1879, No. 37, pp. 24 to 34.

<sup>250</sup> Note of John O'Donovan, in the Sheet Name Books for the county of Down, now kept at the Ordnance Survey Office, Phoenix Park, Dublin.

<sup>251</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xvii., p. 371.

<sup>252</sup> See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. iii., p. 538.

<sup>253</sup> The legends, relating to Padrig Maenwyn, are narrated by Professor Rees, in his "Essay on the Welsh Saints," pp. 128, 129. The epithet Maenwyn, or "maen fins," has the signification of a boundary stone. Maen is pronounced man. "Wyn" means also a lamb. In Wales ff has nearly the pronunciation of w; and, in Ireland, we have such names as Whelan so rendered, in bont, Glamorganshire.<sup>254</sup> There is a sand-bank near Llanilli, in the same neighbourhood, and, it is called, at this day, Cefn Padrig. The other person was Padrig,<sup>255</sup> son of Aelfryd, son of Goronwy, of Gwareddog. He is said to have had the parish of Llanbadrig, in Anglesey, dedicated to him; while, a small island, about a mile from the mainland, is called after him, Ynys Badrig.<sup>256</sup> The following are the modern Catholic churches, chapels and religious institutions of England and Wales: In the Archdiocese of Westminster, St. Patrick's Church, Soho, W.; St. Patrick's in the East, Wapping, E.; and, St. Patrick's Cemetery, Leytonstone, E. In the diocese of Middlesborough, and in this town, St. Patrick's Church; also, St. Patrick's, Hull. In the diocese of Leeds, St. Patrick's, Bradford; St. Patrick's, Halifax; St. Patrick's, Huddersfield; and, St. Patrick's, Leeds. In the diocese and town of Birmingham, St. Patrick's Church; Our Blessed Lady and St. Patrick, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent; St. Patrick's, Walsall; St. Patrick's, Wednesbury; and, St. Patrick's, Wolverhampton. In the diocese of Hexham and Newcastle, St. Patrick's, Maryport; SS. Joseph, Cuthbert and Patrick, Cornforth; Our Lady and St. Patrick, Coxhoe; St. Patrick's, Felling; St. Patrick, Sunderland; and St. Patrick, Newcastle-on-Tyne. In the diocese of Liverpool, St. Patrick, Liverpool; St. Patrick, Barrow-in-Furness; St. Patrick, Wigan; and, St. Patrick, Peel, Isle of Man. In the diocese of Newport and Menevia, St. Patrick, Cardiff; with St. David and St. Patrick, Haverfordwest. In the diocese of Northampton, the Oratory of St. Patrick, Wisbech High Fen. In the diocese of Plymouth, Our Blessed Lady and St. Patrick, Teignmouth. In the diocese of Southwark, Woolstone. In the diocese of Nottingham, St. Patrick, Nottingham; St. Patrick and St. Bridget, Clay Cross; and, St. Patrick, Leicester. In the diocese of Salford, St. Patrick, Bolton; St. Patrick, Manchester; Our Lady of Mount Carmel and St. Patrick, Oldham; St. Patrick, Rochdale; and, St. Patrick, Walton-le-Dale. The Christian Brothers' Schools in Manchester, England, are also dedicated to St. Patrick. In the diocese of Shrewsbury, we find St. Patrick, Wellington.

The churches, formerly dedicated to St. Patrick, in Scotland, were Strogeith,<sup>257</sup> Kilpatrick, in Arran,<sup>258</sup> Dalpatrick, in Lanarkshire,<sup>259</sup> Temple-Patrick, in Tiree,<sup>260</sup> Kirkpatrick, in Closeburn,<sup>261</sup> St. Patrick's Well, in Muthill,<sup>262</sup> St. Patrick's Well, parish of Dalziel, Lanarkshire,<sup>263</sup> Ard-Patrick,<sup>264</sup> one case, and set down as Phelan, or Faolan, in another.

<sup>254</sup> An ingenious conjecture of Canon Laurence Toole, St. Wilfrid's, Hulme, suggests, that when the Ancient Britons were driven by the Saxons, from the north of Britain—where St. Patrick was born—towards the south and west; those fugitives still preserved the original tradition of his birth occurring within their territories, but transferred the exact place to that spot, named in the text, owing to some local association, now unknown. Letter to the writer, dated October 7th, 1877.

<sup>255</sup> He was a member of the Bangor of Cybi, founded at Holyhead.

<sup>256</sup> Both of these Patricks seem to have been confounded, by Mr. Williams, in his "Tourist's Guide," pp. 100, 101, and in Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Wales." See the Cambrian News of October 3rd, 1877. Notes and Queries.

<sup>257</sup> According to the Lib. Cart. Isl. Miss, p. viii., 4, 6.

<sup>258</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," vol. ii., p. 254.

<sup>259</sup> See "Old Statistical Survey of Scotland," vol. ii., p. 382.

<sup>260</sup> According to Rev. Dr. Reeves, in the "Ulster Journal of Archaeology," vol. ii., p. 242, and vol. x., p. 402.

<sup>261</sup> See "New Statistical Survey of Scotland," Dumfries, p. 83.

<sup>262</sup> "It is certain that the inhabitants, until very lately, held his name in so high veneration, that on his day neither the clap of the mill was heard, nor the plough seen to move in the furrow."—"New Statistical Survey of Scotland," Perth, p. 313.

<sup>263</sup> See "Old Statistical Survey of Scotland," vol. iii., p. 457, and "New Statistical Survey of Scotland," Lanark, p. 445.

<sup>264</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars. ii., p. 36.

Kilpatrick on the Clyde,<sup>265</sup> Dumbarton,<sup>266</sup> Dalziel,<sup>267</sup> Kilpatrick, in Kilvicken,<sup>268</sup> Kilpatrick, in Torosay,<sup>269</sup> Kilpatrick, or Kilpeter, in Uist.<sup>270</sup> Kirkcaldy is said to be dedicated to St. Patrick, and Blackford, in Perthshire.<sup>271</sup> The following Catholic churches, chapels and religious institutions of Scotland, at present, are dedicated to St. Patrick: In the Archdiocese of St. Andrew's and Edinburgh, St. Patrick, Edinburgh; St. Patrick, Lochgelly; St. Patrick, Kilsyth. In the Archdiocese of Glasgow, St. Patrick, Glasgow; St. Patrick, Coatbridge; St. Patrick, Shieldmuir; St. Patrick, Shotts; St. Patrick, Strathaven; St. Patrick, Overton; St. Patrick, Inverkip; and, Dumbarton, St. Patrick. In the diocese of Galloway, St. Patrick, Old Cumnock.<sup>272</sup>

In France, there is a beautiful old church, in the city of Rouen, dedicated to St. Patrick.<sup>273</sup> His history is given, in its stained glass windows.<sup>274</sup> Besides this, the Irish College, Paris, under the direction of priests of the Congregation of the Mission, is dedicated to St. Patrick. We have every reason to believe, there are many other memorials to our Apostle, erected in France. Thus, in the beginning of the year 1859, a statue<sup>275</sup> of St. Patrick had been prepared, for the parish church of Moulins-Lille, France. The church itself is dedicated to St. Vincent De Paul; and, both of those great saints are deservedly endeared, to the sympathies of the French people. The statue represents the saint, as standing on the shamrock sod, with serpents and reptiles at his feet. He holds the crozier in his left hand, and in his right is a scroll, on which is printed in gilt letters—"The voice of the Irish." At Onreto, in Italy, there is a church, dedicated to San. Patrizio, as also a well. There can hardly be a doubt, but in Germany, and in other countries of Europe, various religious foundations had been erected, in honour of Ireland's Patron saint, although we have not been able, to ascertain their exact localities.

In the United States of America, the following cathedrals, churches, chapels and religious institutions, have been dedicated to the great St. Patrick: In the Archdiocese and city of Baltimore, we find St. Patrick's Church; in Cumberland, Mount Savage, Havre de Grâce, Little Orleans, and in the city of Washington, there are churches, dedicated to him, as also, male and female schools. In the diocese and city of Charleston, South Carolina, is St. Patrick's church. In the diocese and city of Richmond, there is a St. Patrick's church, with schools; at Lexington, there is a church to St. Patrick. In the diocese and city of Savannah, there is St. Patrick's Church; also, at Augusta. In the diocese of Wheeling, there is a church to St. Patrick, at Rodemer's Tunnel; also, one, at Weston. In the diocese of Wilmington, there is a church to St. Patrick, at Newark; also, we find one, at Conowingo.

<sup>265</sup> See ibid., pars. i., pp. 20, 501; v. 229.

<sup>266</sup> See ibid., pars. i., p. 24.

<sup>267</sup> See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars. i., p. 58.

<sup>268</sup> See ibid., pars. ii., p. 304.

<sup>269</sup> See ibid., pars. ii., p. 307.

<sup>270</sup> See ibid., pars. ii., p. 365.

<sup>271</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 433, 434.

<sup>272</sup> The foregoing enumeration is drawn up, from the "Catholic Directory, Ecclesiastical Register, and Almanack, for the Year of Our Lord 1880," published in London.

<sup>273</sup> It is noticed, in Le Vicomte Walsh's "Explorations en Normandie," pp. 81, 82. Rouen, 1835, 8vo.

<sup>274</sup> So has the writer been informed, in a letter of Mark S. O'Shaughnessy, who had inspected it. Dated Dublin, 19 Gardiner's-place, June 4th, 1876.

<sup>275</sup> This was duly inaugurated with grand religious ceremonies, and with an ecclesiastical and civic procession, in which was borne a green banner, with gold embroidery and shamrocks, on the 17th of March, 1859. Then, the statue was blessed, and afterwards set up in the church. The day previous, the confessionals were attended by the Irish residents, who, on the next morning, Sunday, attended an early Mass for a general Communion, as stated in a letter, signed Peregrius, and dated Lille, March 22nd, 1859. It appeared, in a subsequent number of the Catholic Telegraph, Dublin.

In the Archdiocese and city of New York, the magnificent Cathedral of St. Patrick, built on a space, isolated from the surrounding streets, and projecting on Fifth Avenue, was initiated by Archbishop John Hughes, who laid the foundation-stone, on the 15th of August, 1858, with an imposing religious and civic ceremonial.<sup>276</sup> His successor, Cardinal M'Closkey, has unremittingly prosecuted this glorious work, to its present advanced stage of progress. The architect of this great structure is Mr. Renwick. The style adopted is known as the decorated Gothic, which prevailed in Europe, from A.D. 1250 to 1400. The extreme length of this edifice — the exterior being of pure white marble — is 334 feet; the interior dimensions are 306 feet; the length of the transept is 140 feet; the width of the nave is 96 feet—including the aisles—or, from pillar to pillar, 48 feet, giving to each aisle a width of 24 feet. The height of the nave is 110 feet, and that of the aisles, 54 feet. The clustered and fluted columns of the nave, choir, and transepts, are all of white marble, to the spring of the arches. These are imitation sandstone, capped with marble. The roofs are all coved and interlaced, most richly, with cusps and ribs. The Cathedral is cruciform. Its numerous are mullioned, in varied shapes, and deeply recessed. The most effective of all are those lights, containing the representation of St. Patrick, in the northern transept great window, and that of the Immaculate Conception, in the southern great transept window. Clerestory windows light the upper lines, and these too are ornate and large. The white marble high altar, reredos, with tabernacle, and niches, are of highly artistic design, while statues, Catholic Cathedral of St. Patrick, New York, U.S.A.

stained-glass windows

<sup>276</sup> The present details are taken from Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of November 2nd, 1878. New York. Accompanying this No., there is a large sheet illustration of the interior view, on the occasion of a grand fair opening of the New York forty-five Catholic churches, His Honour Mayor

Ely delivering the inaugural address, October 22nd, 1878. The exterior view, as now erected, is also given, and from the latter, Frederick W. Wakeman has drawn our accompanying illustration, on wood. It was engraved, by William Oldham.

<sup>277</sup> Although this superb structure is said and mosaics, gleam out on the view. The various chapels, and their accessories, are intended to harmonize with the general plan; but, several of the details, interiorly and exteriorly, await completion.<sup>277</sup> Symmetry, vastness, lightness, and solidity, seem happily combined, in the tout ensemble. The front has three doorways, the centre one having a total width of 31 feet, with a height, including the gables, of 51 feet. Above the recessed door, there is a transom of pure white marble, sculptured with leaf-forms and tendrils of grape-vines, interwoven with wheat, symbolic of the Holy Sacrament; there are three doves, the centre one representing the descent of the Holy Ghost; the right, the dove from the ark, with an olive branch in its mouth; and the left, signifies the ascent of the Holy Spirit. The door itself is square-headed, and it has a total width of 11 feet. Above this beautiful piece of sculpture is the small rose window of the portal. Rich clustering columns support the jambs, whose capitals are exquisitely carved. On either side of the portal rise the buttresses, constituting the main part of the facade. These extend to the middle of the main gable, and they are surmounted by delicate pinnacles. This gable is most richly panelled, each panel being filled with exquisite tracery, and its apex is surmounted, by a grand floral finial. Below the moulding of the main gable is the great rose window, with flowing tracery. The lower arc of its circumference touches the arched heads of the mullions, which are in the varied forms of foils. Directly below is the gable of the main portal, bearing in its centre panel the arms and motto of the Cardinal, with a hat, from which tassels stream on both sides, and a mitre. The pediments of the gables are highly adorned with floriated crockets. The side portals are adorned, in like manner, although less richly. Over these arise two grand towers. These are to terminate with spires, elevated 334 feet, from the ground. In the central panel of each gable are shields, the right shield having the arms of New York, the left bearing those of the United States. The towers are 32 feet square, at the base, exclusive of the buttresses, diminishing in stages, as they rise; but, the walls, especially below, are of immense thickness and solidity. At the height of 136 feet, they change to an octagonal form, maintained for 54 feet more. Thence, the tall spires will gracefully ascend into the blue sky. In design, these are richly charged at their edges, with crockets of floral forms, while their faces are covered with beautifully-traced panels. In the second stories are the large windows, with finely-moulded jambs. The bells will be hung, in the upper lofts. The flanking buttresses of the towers terminate, in graceful pinnacles, and richly-sculptured niches, intended to receive statues, adorning the middle heights and flanks of the grand façade.<sup>278</sup> Altogether, this noble Cathedral of St. Patrick is immeasurably the most costly and magnificent church, in the United States, and, as a memorial of our illustrious Apostle, the grandest on earth. Besides this grand structure, there is another St. Patrick's Church, on the corner of Prince and Mott-streets, in the city of New York. Also, there is a St. Patrick's Church, at Millerton, Dutchess County; one, at Newburgh, Orange County; one, at Nobody, Sullivan County; one, at Quarryville, Ulster County; one, at Verplanck's Point, Westchester County; besides, Male and Female Schools, with Male and Female Orphan Asylums, dedicated to the

to have cost two millions of dollars, or about £400,000 sterling; yet, in October, 1878, it was comparatively free from debt, the progress of construction being mainly limited to the funds secured.

<sup>278</sup> In the summer of 1879, this grand Cathedral was solemnly dedicated to God and to St. Patrick, with a magnificent ceremonial service, attended by the prelates, clergy and laity, from all parts of the United States and from Canada. The sermon, on this occasion, was preached, by Rt. Rev. Patrick J. Ryan, D.D., Coadjutor-Bishop of St. Louis.

Patron of Ireland. In the diocese and city of Albany, State of New York, there is a church of St. Patrick ; also, one, at Binghampton, Broome County ; one, at Cambridge, Washington County ; one, at Catskill, Greene County ; one, at Chatham Village, Columbia County ; one, at Clayville, Oneida County ; one, at Cleveland, Oswego County ; one, at Geddes, Onondaga County ; one, at Johnstown, Fulton County ; one, at Norwich, Chenango County ; one, at Oneida, Madison County ; one, at Taberg, Oneida County ; one, at Troy, Rensselaer County ; one, at West Troy, Albany County ; one, at Utica, Oneida County ; one, at Athens, Greene County ; one, at Chittenango, Madison County ; one, at Coeymans, Albany County ; one, at Forest Port, Oneida County ; one, at Jordan, Onondaga County ; one, at North Granville, Washington County ; one, at Otisco, Onondaga County ; one, at Truxton, Onondaga County ; and, one, at Whitney Point, Broome County. Besides, there is a Mercy Convent, at West Troy, with other Male and Female Schools, dedicated to St. Patrick. In the diocese and city of Brooklyn, State of New York, there is a church, dedicated to Ireland's Apostle ; as also, one, at Fort Hamilton ; one, at Glen Cove, Queen's County ; one, at Huntington, Suffolk County ; one, at Islip, Suffolk County ; one, at Southold, Suffolk County ; Male and Female Schools are also under his invocation. In the diocese and city of Buffalo, State of New York, there is a church of St. Patrick ; also, one, at Elmira, Chemung County ; one, at Lockport, Niagara County ; one, at Owego, Tioga County ; and, one, at Java, Wyoming County. The Cemetery, at Limestone Hill, and Parochial schools, are also under his invocation. In the diocese and city of Newark, State of New Jersey, the Cathedral Church is dedicated to St. Patrick ; also, a church, at Chatham, Morris County ; one, at Elizabeth, Union County ; one, at Hibernia, Morris County ; one, at Jersey City, Hudson County ; one, at Woodbury, Gloucester County ; as also, a church, dedicated jointly to our Saint and to the Blessed Virgin, at Moorestown, Burlington County. There are schools, likewise, under St. Patrick's patronage. In the diocese of Ogdensburg, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Brasher Falls, St. Laurence County ; one, at Chateaugay, Franklin County ; one, at Hogansburg, Franklin County ; one, at Port Henry, Essex County ; one, at Rossie, St. Laurence County ; one, at Rouse's Point, Clinton County ; one, at Watertown, Jefferson County ; one, at Colton, St. Laurence County ; one, at Maple Ridge, Lewis County ; one, at Patent, Clinton County ; and, one, at Sterling Bush, Jefferson County. In the diocese and city of Rochester, the Cathedral Church is dedicated to St. Patrick ; and there is also a church, under his invocation, at Mumfordsville ; one, at Dansville, and one, at Mt. Morris, Livingston County ; one, at Victor, Ontario County ; one, at Macedon, Wayne County ; one, at Seneca Falls, Seneca County ; one, at Aurora, Cayuga County ; and one, at Mt. Lean, Tompkins County. Besides, there is a St. Patrick's Girls' Orphan Asylum, in Rochester. In the archdiocese and city of Boston, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ; as also, one at Brockton ; one, at Groveland ; one, at Laurence, South ; one, at Lowell ; one, at Natick ; and, one, at Watertown. An Academy, at Lowell, with a Parochial School, is under his invocation. In the diocese of Burlington, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Fairfield, Franklin County ; one, at Moretown, Washington County ; one, at Wallingford, Rutland County ; and there is a St. Patrick's Convent, for Sisters of Mercy. In the diocese and city of Hartford, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ; one, also, at Collinsville ; one, at East Hampton ; one, at Falls' Village ; one, at Farmington ; one, at Mystic ; one, at New London ; one, at New Haven ; one, at Norwich ; one, at Thompsonville ; and, likewise, Parochial Schools are under his protection. In the diocese of Portland, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Trescott, and one, at Newmarket. In the diocese and city of Providence, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ; one, at Harrisville ; one, at Valley Falls ; one, at Fall River ; one, at Somerset ; one, at Wareham ; Parochial Schools are likewise dedicated to our saint. In the diocese of Springfield, and in the State of Massachusetts, there is a church of St. Patrick, at Amherst, at Chicopee Falls, at Douglass East, at Hadley South, at Hinsdale, at Monson, at Stockbridge West, and at Whittinsville. In the archdiocese and city of Philadelphia, there is a church dedicated to St. Patrick ; there is one, also, at Nesquehoning and at Audenried, Carbon County ; one, at Kennett, Chester County ; one, at Ironton, Lehigh County ; one, at Norristown, Montgomery County ; and, one, at Pottsville, Schuylkill County. Academies and Schools are, likewise, under our saint's patronage. In the diocese and city of Erie, St. Patrick's Cathedral is dedicated to the Patron of Ireland ; while, there is a church to him, at Franklin, Venango County. In the diocese and city of Harrisburg, the Pro-Cathedral is dedicated to St. Patrick ; while, there are churches to him, at York, York County ; at Carlisle, Cumberland County ; at Trevorton, Northumberland County ; as, also, Parochial Schools, under his invocation. In the dioceses of Pittsburgh and Allegheny, there is a church of St. Patrick, in the city of Pittsburgh ; as also, one to him, in Alpsville, and in Noblestown, Allegheny County ; one, at Brady's Bend, Armstrong County ; one, at Newry, Blair County ; one, at Gallitzin, Cambria County ; and, one, at Cameron's Bottoms, Indiana County ; as also, St. Patrick's Convent, for Mercy Nuns, at Pittsburgh, and Parochial Schools. In the diocese of Scranton, there are churches of St. Patrick, at Hyde Park and Oliphant, Lackawanna County ; at Whitehaven, Luzerne County ; at Canaan, Wayne County ; at Milford, Pike County ; at Barkley Mines, and at Overton, Bradford County ; at Middleton, Susquehanna County ; and, at Nicholson Wyoming County ; there is, also, a St. Patrick's Orphan Asylum, at Hyde Park. In the archdiocese and city of Cincinnati, there is a Church of St. Patrick ; as likewise, at Bellefontaine, Logan County ; at Eaton, Preble County ; at Fayetteville, Brown County ; at London, Madison County ; at Shelly, at Troy, Miami County ; Parochial Schools are also under his patronage. In the diocese and city of Cleveland, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ; as also, one, at Bryan, Williams County ; one, at Elmore, Ottawa County ; one, at Gallion, Crawford County ; one, at Hubbard, Trumbull County ; one, at Kent, Portage County ; one, at Rockport, Cuyahoga County ; one, at St. Patrick's Settlement, Seneca County ; one, at Salineville, Columbiana County ; one, at South Thompson, Geauga County ; one, at Spencerville, Allen County ; one, at Toledo, Lucas County ; as likewise Parochial Schools, dedicated to him. In the diocese and city of Columbus, there is a church erected to St. Patrick, as also, one, at Fox's Settlement, Washington County ; one, at Junction City ; one, at St. Patrick's, Guernsey County ; as also, Parochial Schools, under his invocation. In the diocese and city of Covington, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ; there is also a church to him, at Maysville, Mason County ; one, at St. Patrick's Settlement, Pendleton County ; besides, there is a Day-school for boys, at Maysville, and under his invocation. In the diocese and city of Detroit, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ; also, there is one, at Brighton, Livingston County ; one, at Grattan, Kent County ; and, one, at Stony Creek, Monroe County ; one, at Bowne, Kent County ; another, at Grand Haven, Ottawa County ; one, at Minden, Sanilac County ; and, one, at Talmadge, in the same County ; there is also one, at Woodhull, Shiawassee County ; besides, there are Parochial Schools, dedicated to our patron saint, at Big Rapids and at Stony Creek. In the diocese of Fort Wayne, there is a church erected to our patron saint, at Arcola, Allen County ; one, at Chesterton, Porter County ; another, at Kokomo, Howard County ; one, at Ladoga, Montgomery County ; there is also one, at Lagro, Wabash County ; one, at Ligonier, Noble County ; another church in his honour is erected at Oxford, Benton County ; and also, one, at South Bend, St. Joseph's County. In the diocese and city of Louisville, several churches are erected to St. Patrick ; there is one, at Columbus, Hickman County ; one, at Stithton, Hardin County ; besides, there are Parochial Schools for Boys and Girls, at Louisville, in his name. In the diocese of Vincennes, there are erected churches in honour of St. Patrick ; one, at Bainbridge ; one, at Indianapolis ; one, at Knightsville ; another, at Madison ; one, also, at Scipio, Jennings County ; another, at Montgomery, Daviess County ; there is also a flourishing Day-school, at Indianapolis. In the archdiocese and city of Milwaukee, there is a church to our patron saint ; besides, there is one, at Abbottown, Sheboygon County ; also, one, at Beaver Dam, Dodge County ; one, at Benton, Lafayette County ; one, at Brighton, Kenosha County ; another, at Erin, Washington County ; also, one, at Janesville, Rock County ; another is dedicated in his name, at Racine, Racine County ; also, one, at Ripon, Fond du Lac County ; one, at Walwick, Iowa County ; and, another, at Whitewater, Walworth County ; besides, there are many schools under his invocation, one, in the city of Milwaukee, one, at Benton, one, at Brighton, one, at Fond du Lac, one, at Janesville, and, another, at Whitewater. In the diocese of Green Bay, there are churches, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Fort Howard, Brown County ; at Hollandtown, East Brown County ; one, at Lebanon, Waupacca County ; one, also, at Maple Grove, Manitowoc County ; and, one, at Stevensville, Outagamie County. In the diocese of La Crosse, there are several churches, dedicated to him ; one, at Bad Axe, Vernon County ; one, at Eau Claire, Eau Claire County ; another, also, at Erin Prairie, St. Croix County ; another, at Greenwood, Vernon County ; one, at Hudson, St. Croix County ; also, one, at the Irish Settlement, Marathon County ; another, at Manston, Juneau County ; one, at Seneca, Crawford County ; and, another, at Westfield, Sauk County ; besides there are, at Eau Claire, schools, erected under his invocation. In the diocese of Marquette and Saut-Sainte-Marie, there is established a church in honour of him, at Ontanagon, Ontanagon County. In the diocese of St. Paul, Minnesota, there are churches, dedicated to St. Patrick ; one, at Cedar Creek, Anoka County ; another, at Innergrove, Dakota County ; another, at Lanesboro', Fillmore County ; one, at Brownsville, Houston County ; also, one, at Kandiyohi, Kandiyohi County ; one, at Marysburgh, Le Seur County ; one, at Birch Coolie, Reuville County ; one, at Sheildsville, Rice County ; another, at Cedar Lake, Scott County ; and, another, at West Albany, Wabasha County. In the Vicariate-Apostolic of Northern Minnesota, there are churches, dedicated to St. Patrick ; one, at Melrose, Stearns County, and another, at Hinkley, Pine County. In the Vicariate-Apostolic of Dakota, there is no church erected, as yet, to our illustrious saint. In the archdiocese and city of New Orleans, there are churches, dedicated to our illustrious patron ; and, there is also a Day-school, which bears his name. In the diocese and city of Galveston, there is a church, which bears his name. The town of San Patricio, in the state of Texas, is named after our Irish Apostle, by the original Spanish settlers of Mexico, when the place belonged to this latter state. In the diocese of Little Rock, there are no churches, as yet, to St. Patrick. In the diocese and city of Mobile, there are churches, dedicated to our patron saint ; one, at Apalachicola, W. Florida ; there are also convents and schools, dedicated to him. In the diocese of Natchez, we have several churches, dedicated to this illustrious saint : one is situated, at Handsborough, Harrison County, and another, at Meridian, Lauderdale County. In the diocese of Natchitoches, there are also churches, erected in his honour ; one, at Bayou Cie, and one, at Lake Providence, Carroll Parish. In the diocese of San Antonio, there are no churches or institutions dedicated, in honour of St. Patrick. Also, in the Vicariate-Apostolic of Brownsville, there are erected churches in honour of our patron saint, at Corpus Christi, Nueces County, and also one at San Patricio. In the Prefecture-Apostolic of the Indian Territory, there are no churches dedicated to him. In the archdiocese of Oregon, there is a church, erected to our illustrious saint, at Althouse Mines, Josephine County. In the diocese of Nesqually, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Walla Walla ; and also, a college, at the same place, under his invocation. In the diocese of Vancouver, there are no churches to St. Patrick, within the United States possessions ; nor are there, within the British possessions, in the same diocese, any erected to him. In the Vicariate-Apostolic of Idaho, we have no churches erected, in honour of the illustrious saint. In the archdiocese and city of St. Louis, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ;<sup>279</sup> likewise, there is one situated at Armagh, in Franklin County ; there is a church, which bears his name, at Bond's Mines, Morgan County ; also, one, at Holden, Johnson County ; one, at Kansas City, Jackson County ; one, at Jonesburg, Montgomery County ; one, at Rolla, Phelps County ; one, at St. Marysville, Clark County ; and one, at Warrentown, Warren County. There is an Academy, in the city of St. Louis, and there are two flourishing schools, which are under his invocation ; there is also a flourishing school, bearing his name, in Kansas City. In the diocese of Alton, there are several churches—the principal of which are—in his name ; one, at Bluff City, Scott County ; one, at Big Spring, Shelby County ; another, at Cairo, Alexander County ; one, at Decatur, Macon County ; another, also, at East St. Louis, Clair County ; one, at Enfield, White County ; one, at Grafton,

St. Patrick's Church, St. Louis.

<sup>279</sup> The accompanying illustration is from a photograph, kindly forwarded by Rt. Rev. P. J. Ryan, Coadjutor Bishop of St. Louis. It was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard. In 1847, the author commenced his missionary career, as a priest, in this church.

Jersey County; also, one, at Pana, Christian County; another, at Pond, Gallatin County; one, at Ruma, Randolph County; and one at Tiptown, Monroe County. There are Parochial Schools at Decatur, and at East St. Louis. In the diocese and city of Chicago, there are several churches in honour of St. Patrick; one is in the city; one is situated at Amboy, Lee County; one, at Dixon, same County; one, at Joliet, Wells County; one, at Lake Forest, Lake County; another, at La Salle, La Salle County; one, also, at McHenry, McHenry County; one, at Rochelle, Ogle County; one, at Rosencrans, Lake County; one, at Seneca, La Salle County; another is situated in Sheffield, Beaureau County; and one at Stirling, Whiteside County. There are also several missions and churches, without resident pastors, yet under the invocation of St. Patrick; among those are: one, at Ashton, Lee County; one, at Cass, Du Page County; one, at Hartland, McHenry County; one, at Irish Grove, Stephen County; one, at Marengo, McHenry County; one, at Momence, Kanakee County; one, at South Chicago, Cook County; and one, also, at St. Charles, Kane County. In the city of Chicago, there are St. Patrick's Schools for Boys and Girls, and there are also his Schools for both sexes, at Dixon, Joliet, and La Salle. In the diocese and city of Dubuque, there are many churches, dedicated to St. Patrick, our illustrious patron. One of these is in the City proper; while one is situated in Boonsboro, Boone County; one is, also, at Brooklin, Poweshiek County; another is at Cedar Falls, Black Hawk County; another, at Garryowen, Jackson County; one, at Georgetown, Monroe County; another, at Iowa City, Johnson County; another is at Waupsie, Howard County; and one, at Waukon, Aiamakee County. There is erected, at Dubuque, a school, under his invocation; also, at Garryowen, Iowa, and at Centre Grove, there are schools bearing his name. In the diocese of Leavenworth, there are churches, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Jewell City; at St. Patrick's, Wyandotte County; at Springdale; at Osage City; at Osaga; at Parsons; at Scranton; at St. Patrick's Settlement; and, again, at St. Patrick's Settlement, Atchison County. There are no other religious institutions in this diocese, under the invocation of St. Patrick. In the diocese of Nashville, the following churches are dedicated to our patron saint: one, at Memphis; one, at State Line; another, at M'Ewen, Humphrey's County; another, at Edgefield Junction; and one, at Greenville, Green County. There are also Select and Parish Schools, under his invocation, at Memphis. In the city and diocese of Peoria, there is a church, which bears his name; one is also at Danville, Vermillion County; another, at Galesburg, Knox County; one, at Havanna, Mason County; one, at Kickapoo, Peoria County; and one, at Lincoln, Logan County; there is also one, at Minonk; at Peoria City, there are Parochial Schools, under his invocation, as also, at Lincoln. In the diocese and city of St. Joseph, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick; there is one, at Nodaway Island, Andrew County; and one, at Gentry County; there are Parochial Schools, likewise, in this diocese for boys and girls, placed under his invocation. In the Vicariate-Apostolic of Nebraska, there are several churches, dedicated to him, viz.: one, at Fremont, Dodge County; one, at Forest City, Sarpy County; one, at Gleason, Platte County; one, at Jackson, Dakota County; another, at Newcastle, Dixon County; one, at North Platte, Lincoln County; and one, at O'Neill City, Holt County. In the archdiocese and city of San Francisco, California State, there are numerous churches, under the patronage of St. Patrick; one, at Jackson, Amador County; one, at Atlanta, San Joaquin County; another, at Merced City, Merced County; one, at Murphy, Calaveras County; another, at West Oakland; also, one, at Placerville, El Dorado County; one, at San José Pueblo, Santa Clara County; one, at Sommersville, Contra Costa County ; and one, at Sonoma, Tuolumne County. There is a college at Sacramento, under his invocation. In the diocese of Grass Valley, there are churches erected, in honour of our patron saint ; one, at Cherokee, Nevada County ; one, at French Gulch, Shasta County ; one, at Grass Valley, Nevada County ; another, at Oregon Gulch, Trinity County ; one, at Table Bluff, Humboldt County ; one, at Weaverville, Trinity County ; and, one, at Gold Hill, Nevada State. There is also a Male Orphan Asylum of St. Patrick. In the diocese of Monterey and Los Angeles, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Watsonville, Santa Cruz County. Under the archdiocese of Sante Fe, and in the Vicariate-Apostolic of Colorado, there is one of his churches, which is situated at Central City, Gilpin County.

In the British American possessions, in the archdiocese and city of Quebec, there is a church dedicated to St. Patrick, and one at Beauvoir, Lotbinière County. In the city and diocese of Montreal, there is a church, dedicated to the illustrious saint ; there is also one, at Rawdon. There is an Asylum for Irish orphan boys and girls, and, also, a Home for Destitute Women, under his invocation, in the city of Montreal. In the diocese and city of Ottawa, there is a church, dedicated to him ; and also, one, at Mount St. Patrick, Ontario ; there is, also, an Orphan Asylum, under his invocation, in the city of Ottawa. In the diocese of Rimouski, there is a church, erected in honour of our saint, at Douglastown, Gaspé County. In the diocese of Sherbrooke, there is a church, at Magog. In the diocese of Three Rivers, District of Arthabaska, there is a church, dedicated to our patron saint. In the archdiocese and city of Halifax, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ; and also one, at New Ross ; there is a School and Convent, under his invocation, at Halifax. In the diocese of Arichat, there are churches to St. Patrick ; one, at Sydney, Island of Cape Breton ; and, one, at Picton, Nova Scotia. In the diocese of Charlottetown, there is a church, dedicated to St. Patrick ; and this is situated, at Grand River, Lot 14. In the diocese of Chatham, there is a Church of St. Patrick, at Nelson. In the diocese of St. John, New Brunswick, there are churches dedicated to St. Patrick ; one, at Golding Grove ; one, at Stanley ; one, at Dutch Valley ; and one, at Dumbarton. In the diocese of Harbor Grace, we find no churches, as yet, under his patronage ; but, we have some fine schools, under the direction of the Roman Catholic Boards of Education ; one is at Harbor Grace, and one at Carbonear. In the diocese and city of St. John's, Newfoundland, we have a church, erected in honour of our glorious saint. In the Prefecture-Apostolic of St. George, West Newfoundland, we find a church, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Bonne Bay, District of Bay Islands. In the archdiocese and city of Toronto, Province of Ontario, we find a church to his name ; one, also, at Dixie ; one, at Flos ; one, at Stayner ; and one, at Toronto Gore ; there are also Missions, in this diocese, which are dedicated to St. Patrick ; one, at Church Falls ; and one, at Whitby. There is also a school, erected in the city, and which is under his invocation. In the diocese and city of Hamilton, there is a church, erected to St. Patrick ; one, at Caledonia ; one, at Galt ; and one, at North and South Proton. In the diocese of Kingston, there are churches to St. Patrick ; one, at Ferguson's Falls, and one at Loberough. In the diocese of London, there is a church, in honour of St. Patrick, and in a place called after him. In the Vicariate-Apostolic of Northern Canada, there is a church to St. Patrick, at Kearney, attended from Parry Sound. In the archdiocese of St. Boniface, there are no churches dedicated to St. Patrick. In the Vicariate-Apostolic of British Columbia, there is a church at Cariboo, District of Williams Lake, and one at Natle, District of Stuarts Lake, called after the Irish Apostle.

In the diocese of the Port of Spain, there is a church, dedicated to St.

Patrick, at the Island of Grenada. In the Vicariate-Apostolic of British Guiana and Barbadoes, there is a church, at Barbadoes, which has been placed under his patronage.<sup>280</sup>

In Australia, and in the archdiocese of Sydney, New South Wales, we find the following churches dedicated to St. Patrick, viz. : one, in the city of Sydney, and one, in Paramatta. In the diocese of Bathurst, a church, at Rockley, and one, at Wellington, are dedicated to St. Patrick. In the diocese of Goulbourn, there is a College, under his invocation. In the archdiocese and city of Melbourne is St. Patrick's Cathedral, while there is a College, also, under his invocation. In the diocese of Perth, Western Australia, there are two churches, erected in honour of our patron saint ; one, at Freemantle, and, the other, at York. In the diocese of Sandhurst, Province of Melbourne, there are churches dedicated to him, viz. : one, at Morong ; one, at Woodstock ; one, at Beechworth ; one, at Shepparton, Benalla District ; one, at Wodonga, Chiltern District ; one, at Mount Pyramid, Echuca District ; one, at Mount Pleasant, Heathcote District ; also, one, at Undera, Nagambie District ; another, at Wangarratta ; and, one, at Yackandanah, Myrtleford District. In the diocese of Auckland, New Zealand, we find the Cathedral, there, dedicated to St. Patrick. In Africa, and in the Eastern Province, Cape of Good Hope, we find the Cathedral Church, dedicated to St. Patrick, at Grahamstown.<sup>281</sup> We are inclined to believe, that some churches, chapels, convents or schools, in the East Indies, and, perhaps, in other parts of Asia, are under our holy patron's invocation ; but, it is very certain, at any rate, that we have not been enabled to present a full and more complete list, so far as our Irish dioceses are concerned.

From the earliest times, and in the earliest Martyrologies, Records, and Calendars, the festival of Ireland's great Apostle seems to have been almost invariably set down, at the 17th of March. The loss of an ancient Martyrology, referred to in the writings of St. Gregory the Great, as having been generally circulated throughout Christendom, has been regretted by Cardinal Baronius. But, the ingenious and erudite Rosweyde has maintained, that he discovered it, at the commencement, in a copy of Ado's Martyrology, which was found in a monastery at Cologne.<sup>282</sup> That Martyrology appears to have been read in the Church, within one hundred years after St. Patrick's death, and of this fact, the learned are now almost sufficiently satisfied. The Venerable Bede, in the original and genuine copy of his Martyrology, has recorded St. Patrick, as one of those saints, existing before his own time.<sup>283</sup> Florus, and other writers, subsequently added later saints, to this compilation of Bede.<sup>284</sup> Our Apostle is particularly mentioned, in the Martyrologies of the eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh, centuries. In the Martyrology of Raban—the scholar of Alcuin—St. Patrick is commemorated. Being first Abbot of Fulda, his native place, that learned man was afterwards elected Archbishop of Mentz, and he died in 856. St. Patrick is noted, likewise, in the Martyrology of Usuard, the Benedictine Monk of St. Germain le Pre, who died in 860. About the middle of the

<sup>280</sup> The foregoing list has been compiled, from "Sadler's Catholic Directory, Almanac, and Ordo, for the year of our Lord, 1880," published in New York, U.S.A.

<sup>281</sup> The foregoing enumeration is extracted from "The Irish Catholic Directory, Almanack, and Registry," for 1880, published in Dublin.

<sup>282</sup> At the 17th of March, this entry occurs in it : "xvi. Calend. April. S. Patricii epis. qui primus, apud Scotos prædicavit."

<sup>283</sup> At Martius 17, or xvi, Kal, Ven, Bede

writes : "In Scotia S. Patricii Confessoris." — "Martyrologium De Natalitiis Sanctorum cum Auctario Flori et Aliorum," vol. iv., p. 45, of Rev. J. A. Giles' edition of "The Complete Works of the Venerable Bede, in the Original Latin, with a translation in English."

<sup>284</sup> In his notes on Ado's Martyrology, such additions have been pointed out, by the learned Georgi, who was chaplain to Benedict XIV.

ninth century, when he wrote,<sup>285</sup> Eric of Auxerre presents a most honourable account, relative to St. Patrick's existence, mission, apostolical labours, and sanctity. Thus, again, we find him recorded, in a notice of Notker Le Begue, the learned monk of St. Gall, who died in 912. In the old Martyrology of Rheinau,<sup>286</sup> in the Martyrologium Augustanum Monasterii S. Udabrics,<sup>287</sup> in the Martyrologium Labbeanum,<sup>288</sup> in the Martyrologium Corbeienae,<sup>289</sup> and in the Martyrologium Reginæ Sueciæ, olim Senonense S. Columbæ<sup>290</sup>—all of uncertain date—the festival of St. Patrick is to be found, at the 17th of March.<sup>291</sup> It is specially marked, in the "Feilire"<sup>292</sup> of St. Ængus the Culdee. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>293</sup> we find simply, Patricius Eps, or Patrick, Bishop, at the 17th of March.<sup>294</sup> In the Martyrology of Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>295</sup> his feast occurs. Likewise, in the Roman Martyrology,<sup>296</sup> the glorious saint obtains a marked prominence. In Father Henry Fitzsimons' Catalogue, as also in the anonymous list of Irish Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare,<sup>297</sup> at the 17th of March, St. Patrick is distinguished as the Apostle of Ireland. The Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>298</sup> on this day, commemorates Patrick, the noble Apostle of Erin's island, and head of the religion of the Gaedhil, the first primate, and the first legate, who was appointed in Erin. In the Kalendars of the Saints of Scotland, St. Patrick is invariably commemorated, at the 17th of March.<sup>299</sup> Thus, in the Kalendar of Drummond,<sup>300</sup> in the Kalendar of Hyrdmanstoun,<sup>301</sup> in the Kalendar of Culenros,<sup>302</sup> in the Kalendar De Nova Farina,<sup>303</sup> in the Kalendarium Celticum,<sup>304</sup> in the Kalendar of Arbuthnott,<sup>305</sup> in the Kalendar of the Breviary of

<sup>285</sup> In the Life and Miracles of S. Germanus, Bishop of Tours.

<sup>286</sup> At xvi. Kal. Apr. "Et Hibernia Scotiæ, depositio Sancti Patricii Episcopi."

<sup>287</sup> At xvi. Kal. Apr. "Patricii Episcopi et Confessoris."

<sup>288</sup> At xvi. Kal. Apr. "In Scotia, Patricii Confessoris."

<sup>289</sup> At xvi. Kal. Apr. "Et depositio Patricii Episcopi."

<sup>290</sup> At the xvi. Kal. Apr. "In Scotia, natalis Sancti Patricii."

<sup>291</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus vi., Junii, Supplementum, pp. 7, 17, 24, 32, 40.

<sup>292</sup> The following, from the "Leabhar Breac" copy, with English translation, has been obligingly furnished by Professor Bryan O'Looney:—

f xiii. kl.    Larran grem aine arpat epeann oige pacraic comet mile
                   Rop oiciu oiar troige.

Blaze of a delightful sun,
 The Apostle of virgin Erin,
 Patrick, with many thousands,
 May he abolish our miseries,
 (ins.)

The festival of St. Patrick is noted, also, in the "Leabhar Breac," a Manuscript belonging to the Royal Irish Academy, at fol. 38.

<sup>293</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii.

<sup>294</sup> In the copy, belonging to the Franciscan Library, Dublin, the same is noted.

<sup>295</sup> At die 17. Martii, he notices, "Patricius Apostolus Hiberniæ."

<sup>296</sup> "In Hibernia natalis Sancti Patricii episcopi et Confessoris, qui primus ibidem Christum evangelizavit et maximis miraculis et virtutibus claruit." — "Martyrologium Romanum," at Sextodecimo Kal. April. Luna. Martii 17. p. 127. Baronius' edition, Romæ, 1686, fol.

<sup>297</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. x., p. 47, cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 56.

<sup>298</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 78, 79.

<sup>299</sup> At the xvj. Kl. Aprilis, or 17th March, we find this notice, in the Martyrology for the use of the church of Aberdeen. "In Scotia natalis Sancti Patricij episcopi et confessoris qui primus ibidem Christum eunangelizavit." — "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii., p. 263.

<sup>300</sup> Thus, at March 17th, or xvi. Kal. Aprilis, "Apud Hiberniam Occiani Insulam Natale Sancti Patricii Archiepiscopi Scottorum." — Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 7.

<sup>301</sup> There we read, at March 17th, or xvi. Kal. Aprilis, St. Patrick, Bishop, ix. lect. See ibid., p. 38.

<sup>302</sup> Here we find, at March 17th, or xvi. Kal. Aprilis, Patrick, Apostle of Ireland. See ibid., p. 55.

<sup>303</sup> There we find, at Aprilis xvi. Kal., St. Patrick, Bishop. See ibid., p. 69.

<sup>304</sup> We find at March 17th, or xvi. Kal. Aprilis, F. Padruig, or the Feast of Patrick. See ibid., p. 83.

Aberdeen,<sup>306</sup> in Adam King's Kalendar,<sup>307</sup> in Dempster's "Menologium Scoticum,"<sup>308</sup> in the Kalendar of David Camerarius,<sup>309</sup> and in the modern Scottish Kalendar,<sup>310</sup> his name will be found. In various French Breviaries and Diurnals, the Festival of St. Patrick is usually set down for the 17th of March. However, S. Patrice is entered, at the 16th of March, in a succinct Calendar, prefixed to the "Heures de Nostre-Dame a l'usage du Mans," and there may be other notices of a similar kind. The German and general European Martyrologists have his great feast, specially assigned to the 17th of that month. This agrees, likewise, with all the Irish mediæval records, we have been able to examine. So is it marked, in the Dublin Trinity College Antiphonariums, having notices of saints' festivals, and among them, references to St. Patrick's feasts, in their respective Calendars, at the 17th of March, more especially, in those classed, B. 1. 1.,<sup>311</sup> B. 1. 2.,<sup>312</sup> B. 1. 3.,<sup>313</sup> B. 1. 4.,<sup>314</sup> B. 3. 1.,<sup>315</sup> B. 3. 5.,<sup>316</sup> B. 3. 8.,<sup>317</sup> B. 3. 10.,<sup>318</sup> B. 3. 12.,<sup>319</sup> B. 3. 13.,<sup>320</sup> and B. 3. 15.<sup>321</sup> Nor was this Office of Nine Lessons restricted to Ireland alone; but, it was sanctioned, moreover, on the Continent of Europe.<sup>322</sup> The feast of St. Patrick was a movable one, in the diocese of <sup>306</sup> Here, at March 17th, or xvi. Kal. Aprilis, we have St. Patrick, Bishop and Confessor. Semi-duplex, ix. lect. See ibid., p. 114.

<sup>305</sup> There we meet, at xiv. Kal. Aprilis—which is the 19th of March—St. Patrick, Bishop and Confessor, ix. lect. Duplex fin. See ibid., p. 98.

<sup>307</sup> There we find, at March 17th, "Patrikmes S. Patrik bischope cõfess. and apostile of Irland send be pape celestinus ye I. vnder King Eugenius 2." See ibid., p. 147.

<sup>308</sup> At the 17th of March, in Ireland, he records Patrick, Apostle of the nation, who laboured for lx. whole years, in converting an obstinate people. See ibid., pp. 194, 195.

<sup>309</sup> At the 17 Die. (Martii) he has St. Patrick, Confessor, Bishop and Apostle of the Irish. See ibid., p. 236.

<sup>310</sup> There, at the 17th of March, or xvi. Kl. Aprilis, is noted Patrick. See ibid., p. 249.

<sup>311</sup> This Manuscript contains, in its Calendar list, at March 17th, or Kal. xvi. Aprilis, Sancti Patricii Hybernix Apostoli, Duplex fin, ix. lect. This was an Antiphonarium, belonging to the Culdees of the Metropolitan church, at Armagh.

<sup>312</sup> This MS. contains the Antiphons, and musical notation, for the feast of St. Patrick, Bishop and Confessor. There is nothing else included within it, specially referring to an Irish saint.

<sup>313</sup> It contains this notice, at March 17th, or, as expressed, at Kal. xvi. Apr., Sancti Patricii Epis. et Conf. Duplex fin. ix. lect. At the foot of the page, I find noted, in red letters, St. Kieran's and St. Patrick's feasts, according to the plan of this Calendar, as being among the festivals, on which abstinence from servile works was enjoined.

<sup>314</sup> It contains, at Kal. xvi. Aprilis, Sancti Patricii Hybernix, Apostoli, ix. lect.

<sup>315</sup> It contains, at March the 17th, Kal.

xvi. Aprilis, Patricii Archiepiscopi et Conf. Duplex ix. lect.

<sup>316</sup> It notes, at Kal. xvi. Aprilis, Sancti Patricii Epis. et Conf., ix. lect.

<sup>317</sup> This has in its Calendar, at March 17th, or Kal. xvi. Aprilis, Sancti Patricii Episcopi (a post insertion).

<sup>318</sup> This Calendar records, at March 17th, or Kal. xvi. Aprilis, Sancti Patricii Epis. et Conf. Hybernix Apostoli, Duplex fin. This MS. contains an Office of St. Patrick, having ix. Lessons, with a Prayer.

<sup>319</sup> This contains, at March 17th, or Kal. xvi. Aprilis, Patricii Hiberniensium Apostoli, Duplex fin.

<sup>320</sup> This contains, at March 17th, or Kal. xvi. Aprilis, Sancti Patricii, Epis. et Conf. in Hybernia Apost., fin Duplex.

<sup>321</sup> Here, in its Calendar, we have S. Patris, at the 17th of March.

<sup>322</sup> This we glean, from the following account, contained in the "Annales Minorum," auctore A.R.P. Luca Waddingo Hiberno. Editio Secunda. Tomus ix., par. xvi., p. 96 :—"In Comitibus Generalibus Mantuæ celebratis anno 1390 die 26 mensis Maii, decretum est, ut in universo Ordine die xvii. Martii recitaretur officium divinum de Sancto Patritio Hibernix Apostolo, ritu festorum novem lectionum. Alias monui, me reperisse in Kalendaris, et libris choralibus nostræ sodalitatis nomen, et memoriam, hujus sancti Confessoris, quod ab his Comitibus, ut reor, sumpsit originem. Quid autem moverit Patres, ut huic sancto Antistiti peculiarem cultum indicerent, omissis aliis multis sanctis Confessoribus, variarum gentium Apostolis, et Provinciarum Patronis, plane nescierim, nisi fortassis Hiberni Patres in Comitibus ita urgerent, ampliori honori suæ gentis Magistri hoc ratione consultari. Ego quidem sancti viri prodigiis, et portentis, miraculorum gloria, et fidei Christianæ longe lateque propagatæ meritis exitus, humiliter rogavi Sanctissi-

Paris, A.D. 1806, it having been fixed, by ecclesiastical ordinance, on the Wednesday of the week known as Quasimodo.<sup>323</sup>

Throughout the kingdom and city of Murcia, in Spain, the 17th of March was kept, with an extraordinary pomp and solemnity,<sup>324</sup> and, St. Patrick's festival was celebrated with an Octave, although it came in Lent; because, on his day, and, doubtless, through his most powerful intercession, the Moors were driven out of Murcia.<sup>325</sup> In 1854, the Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland besought his Holiness, Pope Pius IX., that the Feast of St. Patrick, from being observed as a Semi-Double, throughout the universal Church, should thenceforward be held as a Double. This petition was affirmatively received, and a Decree to that effect was issued, on the 12th of May, 1859.<sup>326</sup> There is a Manuscript,<sup>327</sup> in the University Library, at Cambridge, which formerly belonged to Rev. James Henthorn Todd, and it contains a Latin Hymn on St. Patrick.<sup>328</sup> It was copied, from a "Proparium ad usum Ecclesiæ Cathedralis Sancti Patricii, Dublin." It occurs, at the end of the "Commune," the "Leta lux est hodierna" being that, in the ordinary place.

mum Dominum Urbauum viii. qui nunc feliciter sedet, ut in nova recognitione Breviarii ab ipso præscripta, cui me dignanter jussit interesse, hic honor Patrio accederet, ut qui pro Romana Ecclesia egregie et cum laude decertavit, Romanis tabulis tot titulis illustrem juberet adscribi. Placuit suæ Sanctitati summa in me benignitate, et in gentem Hibernicam benevolentia ita concedere, et peculiari chirographo decernere, ut in sacris Ecclesiæ dypticis reponeretur. Id itaque debet Hibernia Sodalitio Minorum, ut præ omnibus Ordinibus Hibernorum celebravit Apostolum; atque profecto vicissim illa peculiararia huic Instituto frequenter amoris indicia, et summam benevolentiam."

<sup>323</sup> See "Panegyrique de St. Patrice, Apôtre de l'Irlande, prononcé, le Jour de sa Fête 16 Avril 1806, dans l'Eglise du Collège Irlandais, etc., a Paris." Par M. Siret, Vicaire de Saint Méry. A Paris, 1806, 8vo. This was preached, in presence of S. E. Monseigneur le Cardinal Archevêque de Paris, du Belloy, and a numerous auditory. The sermon is dedicated to Napoleon the Great, Emperor of the French, and King of Italy. It consists of fifty-two pages, including appended historical notes.

<sup>324</sup> According to Convæus.

<sup>325</sup> See the English translation, by W. P., Esq., of Father Ribadeneira's "Lives of Saints," &c., part i., p. 160.

<sup>326</sup> The following is the text of that Decree:—

DECRETUM URBIS ET ORBIS.

Quum Archiepiscopi atque Episcopi omnes Hiberniæ Anno MDCCCLIV. Dublini congregati a Sanctissimo Domino Nostro Pio Papa IX. humillime postulaverint ut Festum Sancti Patritii Episcopi, Confessoris, atque Hiberniæ Patroni, quod in Breviario Romano ritu semiduplici notatur die XVII. Martii, ad ritum duplicem pro universa Ecclesia Catholica elevare dignaretur; Emi.

ac Rmi. Patres Sacri. Consilii Christiano Nomini Propagando in generalibus Comitibus eodem Anno habitis die XXI. Julii censuerunt supplicandum Sanctissimo pro gratia.

Hanc vero Sacri Consilii sententiam quum, instante nuper novis percibus Archiepiscopo Dublinensi, Sanctitas sua benigne exceperit jussit ut Festum Sancti Patritii Episcopi Confessoris die XVII. Martii amodo recolatur in universa Ecclesia ritu duplici minori, præsensque a Sacra Rituum Congregatione edi Decretum, ac promulgari mandavit. Contrariis non obstantibus quibuscumque. Die XII. Maii MDCCCLIX.

C. EPISC. ALBANEN. CARD. PATRIZI,
S.R.C., Præf.

H. CAPALTI, S.R.C., Secretarius.

Concordat cum originali.

+ PAULUS CULLEN, Archiep. Dublin.

<sup>327</sup> It is classed Add. 710.

<sup>328</sup> The following is a copy:—

DE SANCTO PATRICIO. SEQUENTIA.

Letabundus decantet
Hybernicorum
Cetus eya.
Totus mundus collaudet
Regem celorum
Mente pia.

Qui salutis nuncium
Hybernis patricium Destinauit.
Docet evangelium
Errores gentilium Confutavit.

Canamus miraculis
Plenum a cunabulis
Christi uatem.
Aquam in mel transtulit
Quo nutrici contulit Sanitatem.

As is intimated, by the first word, its music corresponds with the famous "Lætabundus" of St. Bernard.<sup>329</sup>

Everything, connected with the memory of St. Patrick, must possess great interest, and, especially, for Irish Catholics. Therefore, we have deemed it right, to make some brief notes, regarding those authenticated relics of our Apostle, some of which have disappeared, while some still exist. Among the remains of St. Patrick, yet preserved, there are fragments of the Codex,<sup>330</sup> with its richly chased and elaborate cumdach,<sup>331</sup> or silver shrine for a book, it being known as the Domhnach Airgid. The Codex contains, perhaps, the oldest copy of the Gospels, to be found in the world. It is traditionally believed, to have been the private book of devotion, used by St. Patrick himself, and to have been given by him to St. Carthainn, when he consecrated the latter saint, Bishop of Clogher.<sup>332</sup> That Manuscript is thought to be of the fifth century; but, it is unfortunately so injured, by age and damp, as to make inspection of its contents impossible, the leaves being all discoloured and stuck together. Others state, however, that the Book of the Scriptures, containing the New Testament, transcribed by St. Patrick himself, and long preserved in his Metropolitan Church of Armagh, has perished. Fortunately, however, the beautiful copy of that sacred volume, known as the Canoin Phadraig, or "the Scripture of Patrick," made in 807, —three centuries after St. Patrick's decease,—has survived all the accidents of time, and, it is now deposited, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. As one of the peculiarities, characterising this venerable volume, we may state, that instead of terminating with the Apocalypse, it closes with the Acts of the Apostles.<sup>333</sup> For a detailed history of the vicissitudes of this most

Glacierum fragmina
Per eius spiramina
Mox flammeſcunt.
In ventre latrunculi
Balat hircus populi Obstupeſcunt.

Moysi veſtigia
Secutus incendia
Extinguit carnalia.
Et diſſoluit.
Scandit ſupercilium
Montis et ieiunium
Sic quadragenarium
Deo ſoluit.

Viroſa noxia
Prece reptilia
Sua fugat ab hibernia.
Huius ergo pia
Ducant ſuffragia
Ad ſempiterna nos gaudia.

<sup>329</sup> For the foregoing information, and for a transcript of the Hymn, the writer is indebted to Henry Bradshaw, Esq., of the University Library, Cambridge, in a communication, dated August 13th, 1874.

<sup>330</sup> Specimens of it may be almost realized, in the first part of the "Fac-similes of National Manuscripts of Ireland," photozincographed by Major-General Sir H. James, R.E., Director of the Ordnance Survey, and edited by John T. Gilbert, Esq.

<sup>331</sup> For a particular account of the various cumdachs or Irish Book-shrines, the reader is referred to Miss Margaret Stokes' valuable work, "Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language," vol. ii., pp. 158, 159.

<sup>332</sup> It was once the property of the monastery at Clones; the maer, or keeper, during the middle ages, was Mac-Moyre, rendered Keeperson; it passed away from that family, within the last two hundred years, and, in recent times, it was purchased for £300, from a private gentleman, by Lord Rossmore, who presented it to the Royal Irish Academy, where it remains at present.

<sup>333</sup> Neither should we omit mentioning, that in one of its folios occurs an entry, in the handwriting of the confessor of King Brian Boru. Visiting Armagh, in 1004, this monarch ratified all the privileges of the Primatial See, after presenting a gold ring of twenty ounces, as an offering, at the grand altar of Armagh Cathedral. The following is a translation of that entry, for which we are indebted to the Very Rev. Dr. Reeves, one of the most eminent of our Irish archeologists:—"St. Patrick, when going to Heaven, ordained that the entire produce of his labour, as well as of baptism and decisions, as of alms, was to be delivered to the apostolic city, which in the Scotie tongue is called Ardmacha. Thus I have found it stated, in the records of the Scots. This is my writing, namely, Calvus Perennis (Mulsoohan), in the presence of Brien, Sovereign of the Scots; and what I have written, he decreed for all the kings of venerable volume, our readers must consult the "Memoir of the Book of Armagh," which has been published, by the learned Dean Reeves.<sup>334</sup>

In Miss Cusack's work,<sup>335</sup> we have a beautiful illustration, which pictures to the view, a venerable relic of Irish art. This is known, as the Shrine of St. Patrick's Hand. It is now in custody of the Most Rev. Dr. Dorian, Bishop of Down and Connor; but, a most faithful representation of it, and an elaborately-finished one, may be seen, in the valuable book already quoted. That reliquary is made of massive silver, and it represents the hand and arm of a bishop, in the act of blessing. It measures over one foot, three and a-half inches, in length. Within it is contained, as has been believed for ages, the arm and hand of the saint. These were enshrined, in the twelfth century, by order of Cardinal Vivian, when he caused the bodies of Saints Patrick, Brigid, and Columkille, to be translated, into the interior of Down Cathedral. It would appear, that this reliquary was carried off by Edward Bruce, when he invaded the north of Ireland, and that it was given, after his defeat at Dundalk, A.D. 1318, to the head of the house of Maginnis, of Castlewellsan. In the possession of his successors it remained, until late in the last century, when it passed into the Russell family. Afterwards, it went to the family of the M'Henrys, from whom it was obtained for the late Bishop of Down and Connor, the Most Rev. Dr. Denvir.<sup>336</sup> The Clog-Phadruig, or Bell of St. Patrick, with its beautiful metallic-chased cover,<sup>337</sup> is an object of great interest to the antiquary;<sup>338</sup> and, it is now preserved, in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin.<sup>339</sup> With every appearance of truth, this is the identical relic of the Irish Apostle, to which allusion is made in Irish Annals and Records, as the Clog-an-udhacta, or the Bell of St. Patrick's Will.<sup>340</sup> So it is said to have been called, because it had been reserved for his own special use, and because it had been bequeathed, by him, to the church of Armagh. However, it was deposited, according to some accounts, in the tomb, at Saul, for a period of sixty or seventy years, after his death, when it was recovered by St. Columkille, and restored to the church of Armagh.<sup>341</sup> A poem, ascribed to him, is addressed to this bell.<sup>342</sup> In early times, the relic was religiously preserved, and, owing to the jealous care of its hereditary keepers, variously called the Mulhollands, O'Maelcallains, O'Mulhallanns, Maceria (Cashel)." King Brian was killed at Clontarf, in 1014, and his confessor's death is recorded by the Four Masters, in 1031, thus, "Mulsoohan, confessor—or 'soul-friend'—of Brian, son of Cinnedy, departed this life."

<sup>334</sup> See Brennan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland." Edited by Rev. C. P. Meehan, M.R.I.A. The foregoing account has been written by the editor.

<sup>335</sup> See the "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," at page 408.

<sup>336</sup> See Brennan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland." Edited by Rev. C. P. Meehan. The foregoing notice is from the learned editor's pen.

<sup>337</sup> Dean Reeves refers the date of its workmanship to the period between 1091 to 1105, as may be historically inferred from the Irish inscription on it.

<sup>338</sup> There is an account of this remarkable bell, in Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dro-more," Appendix K.K., pp. 369 to 375, with illustrative notes.

<sup>339</sup> Five beautifully-executed chromo-lithographic drawings of this Irish bell, by Marcus Ward and Co., Belfast, appeared in 1850, and represent four sides of the shrine. An Introduction, by Dean Reeves, is prefixed.

<sup>340</sup> The fullest account of this precious relic is that given by the Ven. Dean of Armagh, Dr. William Reeves, in "A Historical and Descriptive Memoir of the Clog an Edachta, commonly known as St. Patrick's Bell, or the Bell of Armagh." Introduction, p. iv., and pp. 1 to 30. Dublin, 1877, 4to.

<sup>341</sup> The mediæval compiler of the Annals of Ulster professes to draw this tradition, from the Book of Cuana, which was an ancient one, in his time.

<sup>342</sup> The original Irish, with an English translation, will be found in Dean Reeves' Memoir already mentioned, and which was read November 9th, 1863, before the Royal Irish Academy. It is printed in "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy," Polite Literature and Antiquities, vol. xxvii.

O'Mulchallynds, or Omolkallan, and O'Mellan, or Omellan,<sup>343</sup> St. Patrick's Bell has escaped all the accidents of time, and that barbarous fanaticism, which dealt so ruthlessly, with everything venerated, by our Catholic forefathers. In consideration of their high office, during the ages of faith, its custodians had allotted to them many townlands for their maintenance, together with many special immunities.<sup>344</sup> Regarding the authenticity and identity of this valuable relic, there cannot be the faintest doubt, established, as both have been, by the clearest historical evidence. The case, in which the bell is enshrined, exhibits the most elaborate workmanship, and it bears an inscription, begging a prayer for Donnal O'Lachlin. By him the shrine was made, in the eleventh or twelfth century. When dying, the last representative of the Mulhollands—named Henry—bequeathed it to a gentleman of Belfast, Adam M'Clean,<sup>345</sup> after whose death in 1849, it passed into the possession of the reverend and learned Dr. Todd, S.F.T.C.D.<sup>346</sup> In 1871, the Royal Irish Academy purchased it from his executor, with the case, for a sum of £500. Another reliquary, enshrining the maxillary bone of St. Patrick, has been long and religiously preserved, by a family named Cullin, residing in the parish of Derriaghy, county of Antrim. The shrine is of silver, but comparatively of modern date. The bone is in a perfect state, though having only one double tooth; it formerly had five, three of which were taken away, by members of the family, when going to America; while, the fourth tooth was deposited, under the altar-stone of the Catholic church of Derriaghy, by the parish priest, when the said church was rebuilt, in 1797.

We may find, in many legends of the Irish saints, that their pastoral staves or "baculs,"—as they came to be termed—were believed to have had important agencies, in miracles attributed to their efficacy. Thus, in the twelfth century, the possessor of St. Patrick's staff—called "baculum Jesu"—at Armagh was enabled, for a time, to maintain himself as primate, in opposition to the rightful bishop. This was in consequence of a reverence entertained for the staff, and for other relics of our great saint, by the Irish tribes; so that, whomsoever they found to be in possession of them, the foolish and senseless people among them were wont to receive as their bishop.<sup>347</sup> This staff, or crozier, as already stated, was impiously destroyed by Browne, the apostate Archbishop of Dublin. In the reign of Henry VIII., he burnt this relic, after having first stripped it of all the precious stones, with which the staff was richly ornamented. In Ballyboghil,<sup>348</sup> county of Dublin, the staff or crozier of St. Patrick<sup>349</sup> was long devoutly exhibited, in that old church, the ruins of which are there to be seen. These ruins measure eighteen yards by six; the windows and doors exhibit groined arches; while the belfry

<sup>343</sup> The O'Mulhallanns and O'Mellans were distinct families, as can be proved from our Annals.

<sup>344</sup> Distinct reference to St. Patrick's bell is made, in the Registry of Primate Milo Sweetman, 1365, in Primate Prene's "Registrum," about the year 1441, as also in subsequent Registers.

<sup>345</sup> This bell was in his possession in 1819, and James Stuart, in his "Historical Memoirs of the City of Armagh," devotes four pages, intitled "Curious Relic of Antiquity," to the subject, immediately after his preface to the work in question.

<sup>346</sup> See Brennan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland." Edited by Rev. C. P. Meehan, M.R.I.A. The foregoing account has been written by the editor.

<sup>347</sup> Such is the account given, by St. Bernard, in his Life of St. Malachy. The Bachall-Iosa was kept by the plebilis progenies, or by the Clann-Sionaich, from whom a long succession of the Coarbs was derived. See Rev. Dr. William Reeves' "Historical and Descriptive Memoir of the Clog an Edachta, commonly known as St. Patrick's Bell, or the Bell of Armagh," p. 2.

<sup>348</sup> Anglicised, "the town of the staff." This seems an evidence, for the high antiquity of the tradition. The church was probably dedicated to St. Patrick.

<sup>349</sup> So recently as 1529, examinations were taken upon "the Holy Mass-Book, and the great relic of Ireland, called 'baculum was triple-arched, like so many others, in the country of Fingal.<sup>350</sup> Another very remarkable reliquary of the Irish Apostle is the Fiacal Phadraig, or the Shrine of St. Patrick's Tooth, with which is connected some curious historical and traditional particulars.<sup>351</sup> In later life, as it is related, St. Patrick began to lose his teeth; and some of these were preserved, by his friends and disciples, whenever they fell from his mouth.<sup>352</sup> During the Irish Apostle's visitation to northern Connaught, he proceeded along the coasts of Sligo and Mayo. Crossing the River Moy, at Bartragh, he raised a cross there, and, afterwards, he erected the church of Cassel-Irra,<sup>353</sup> in Hy-Fiachrach—probably, in the present parish of Killaspugbrone. While there sojourning, Bishops Bronius and Macrinee came to him, when he wrote out the alphabet for them; and, then, he gave a tooth from his mouth to Bishop Bronius, because he was dear to Patrick.<sup>354</sup> This was afterwards placed in a shrine, and religiously preserved;<sup>355</sup> but, it was subsequently devoted to undesirable purposes, having fallen into the hands of a vagrant, named Reilly. He is said to have been a native of Sligo, and he made a living by going about this part of the country, with it, “performing cures upon man and beast.” The tradition was rife, that the shrine once belonged to the Canons of Cong.<sup>356</sup> The last of these Augustinians, Father Prendergast, got possession of it, about 1830, and, afterwards, he lent it to a Mrs. Blake, who preserved it at Blake Hill, near Cong. Thence, it was removed to Menlough, on the occasion of a serious illness occurring to one of the family, who afterwards presented it to Dr. William Stokes of Dublin. The Fiacal Padraig, or Shrine of St. Patrick's Tooth, is at present preserved, in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy, it having been deposited there, by Dr. Stokes. The ornamental work is in brass, and it is of the fourteenth century. The case is shaped like a mitre, and covered with saints' figures, a crucifix is represented, with precious stones and interlacings.<sup>357</sup> We are told, that St. Patrick ordered seven persons of Christi,' in presence of the king's Deputy, the Chancellor, Treasurer, and Justice.”—“State Papers,” part iii., p. 146.

<sup>350</sup> See John D'Alton's “History of the County of Dublin,” p. 506.

<sup>351</sup> See Miss Stokes' “Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language,” vol. ii., pp. 130 to 132.

<sup>352</sup> These teeth are said to have given names to churches, commemorative of the circumstance, as in that of Kilfeacle, or “the church of the tooth,” near the town of Tipperary. Another was Clonfeacle, not far distant from Armagh.

<sup>353</sup> In its court was the stone, upon which St. Patrick's tooth fell. An account of the shrine, now known as the Fiacal Phadraig, will be found in Dr. William Stokes' “Life and Labours in Art and Archaeology of George Petrie, LL.D., and M.R.I.A., &c.,” p. 288.

<sup>354</sup> See the Annotations of Tirechan, in the Book of Armagh, and Dr. O'Donovan's notes to the “Annals of the Four Masters,” under A.D. 511. In this year, “Saint Bronn, Bishop of Cuil-Irra, in Connaught, died.” See, also, the “Genealogies, Tribes, and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach,” published by the Irish Archaeological Society.

<sup>355</sup> Probably, this shrine remained in the hands of the Berminghams, who had large possessions all around the district near Cong.

<sup>356</sup> According to a tradition, in the parish, this shrine came from the county of Sligo, where there are still some recollections, relating to St. Patrick's tooth.

<sup>357</sup> It is 1½ inch thick at bottom, and it fines off to a thin metal plate, at the narrow top, in continuation of the highly-decorated rim, which originally surrounded it, but which, like other portions of the brass, silver, and gilt materials, has been much injured. It bears the marks of “tinkers' hands,” in the rude mode of soldering. On the chief or front side, there is a crucifixion, in metal work, with two figures, on each side; and, below it, there is an arcade of trefoil arches. Beneath, there is a row of four—there were five originally—raised gilt figures, holding books, shrines, and croziers; and, from an inscription underneath, we learn, that they represented Saints “Benon, Brigida, Patric, Columille, Brendan.” Between these and the silver plate—to which they are attached—is inserted, either as a relique or for artistic purposes, a portion of fine linen. On the front, there is an imperfect inscription, the upper line of which is in embossed—the lower is in the raised character of the twelfth or fourteenth century: “Thomas de Bramichem : Dns : de Athen—ne fecit ornari piscia his people, in his lifetime, to guard the men of Ireland, to wit: a man at Cruachan Aigle, or Crough Patrick, a man at Benn Gulbain, or Binbulbin, in the county of Sligo, a man in Sliabh Bethad, or Slieve Beagh, a man in Sliabh Cua, of Slieve Gua, in the county of Waterford, the married pair at Cluain Iraird, or Clonard, and Domangort, of Sliabh Slangai, or Slieve Donard.<sup>358</sup> This account, however, seems to bear no very ancient stamp. The custom is almost universal in Ireland,—and even in more distant countries among Irish residents—to wear the shamrock, on St. Patrick's Day; while, both men and women display it on their head-gear, or before their breasts.<sup>359</sup> The girls are accustomed, moreover, to wear Patrick's Crosses, which are gay pieces of coloured silk, tastefully arranged transversely, on a white disk of satin, or, sometimes, on white paper. These are worn on the shoulder, or on the breast; and, as badges, they look very pretty. The high festival of St. Patrick usually brings with it a certain amount of family and public festivity; but, it were much to be desired, that it should be more soberly and religiously observed. In this latter respect, however, a considerable improvement has taken place of late years. A curious tradition, regarding the weather—and yet not very intelligible—prevails in the south of Ireland, in reference to the season after St. Patrick's Day.<sup>360</sup> It may be remarked, that in the midland counties of Leinster, where eels abound in the bogs and rivers, it was customary to prepare eel-paties or small eel-pies, as a treat for children, on the saint's festival. These pastries were sold, also, in the bakers' and confectioners' shops, and were largely dealt in, especially by the younger members of the community.<sup>361</sup> With the foregoing details, however, we do not pretend to have exhausted the folk-lore of Ireland, in reference to her venerable Patron.

It may be true, that the biographer has dwelt with too fond a prolixity, over the life-records and traditions, relating to St. Patrick; yet, it seems difficult to abbreviate, when so tempting a subject engages attention. In the words of an ancient writer of his Acts, we must now hasten to a close.<sup>362</sup> A just man, indeed, was this man, writes the chronicler, with purity of nature like the patriarchs; a true pilgrim, like Abraham; gentle and forgiving of heart, like Moses; a praiseworthy psalmist, like David; an emulator of wisdom, like Solomon; a chosen vessel for proclaiming truth, like the Apostle Paul. A man full of grace and of the knowledge of the Holy Ghost he was, like the beloved John. A fair flower-garden he appeared to children of grace; a fruitful parte." This Thomas de Bermingham was probably Lord of Athenry, in the thirteenth or fourteenth century; but, certainly the original shrine is older than his time. On the back or reverse side, there is a raised, but unfigured, cross, on each side of which are a series of figures—two raised, and two engraved, on the silver plate. Two of these are ecclesiastics, holding croziers; and one is that of a female, holding a harp, which is well worthy of inspection; for, it is probably one of the oldest representations of that instrument, which we now possess. The shrine is also highly decorated, with crystals, stones, and amber, placed in collated studs, like those in the shrine of St. Monchan, at Leigh. Upon it, there are also several pieces of gold and silver filigree work, similar to those around the central crystal in the Cross of Cong. It is to be hoped, that accurate illustrations of this relique, so interesting for its artistic details, will ere long be published. See Sir William R. Wilde's "Lough Corrib; its Shores and Islands, with Notices of Lough Mask," chap. vii.

<sup>358</sup> See Whitley Stokes' "Three Middle-Irish Homilies, on the Lives of Saints Patrick, Brigit and Columba," pp. 38, 39.

<sup>359</sup> In distant countries, where the real shamrocks cannot be found, artificial ones are made and worn, by the Irish emigrants.

<sup>360</sup> Thus it runs in the Irish language:—"Gac m'le lá go mar. o lá le b'p'g'oe go lá le pa'p'uig. 'Asur go mo lá h-fém o lá r' amac,' ar pa'p'uig." Thus Englished: "Every second day will be good (fine) from St. Brigit's Day to St. Patrick's Day. 'And every day from my day will be fine,' said St. Patrick."

<sup>361</sup> We have a vivid recollection of this custom prevailing, in our earlier days.

<sup>362</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," p. 499.

vine-branch, he is called, as also a sparkling fire, with force of warmth and heat to the sons of life, for instituting and illustrating charity. A lion, he is said to have been, in strength and power; a dove in gentleness and humility. A serpent in wisdom, the old Irish writer declares him to have been, and wise, in knowing how to do good. Gentle, humble, and merciful he was, towards the sons of life; dark and ungentle he proved, towards sons of death, as also a servant of labour, and in the service of Christ. A king he was, in dignity and power, for binding and loosing, for liberating and convicting, for killing and giving life. We have now followed the career of this extraordinary man, from youth to manhood, and from manhood to old age. Having traversed the length and breadth of the land, every province was illuminated by his presence; almost every Irish region and district had been sanctified by his footsteps; countless families were redeemed from the slavery of Satan, idolatry, and sin; souls were rescued from the peril of eternal condemnation. In a word, almost the whole Irish people became Christianized, and placed under the benign influence of Gospel truth. In the conversion of this nation, we cannot but admire the omnipotence of God, and the power of His Divine graces. To St. Patrick, as an humble instrument of the Almighty, this glorious conversion was mainly due; while God alone has power for softening the most hardened hearts, and for reclaiming the most abandoned sinners. No other nation ever before or since received the Gospel, with such alacrity and joy as Ireland did; kings, princes, chiefs, and people, vied with each other, in spreading this new light of Faith, by erecting churches and cells, and by devoting themselves to the practice of a religion, pure and undefiled. It may be added, also, as their crowning glory, that no other people have, since it had been received universally, so firmly adhered to the Gospel, and with such unrivalled fidelity. Successive phases of seduction, cruelties, spoliation, banishment and death, could not eradicate from true Irish and Catholic minds those doctrines taught, and those morals inculcated, by their glorious Apostle. His work was well and nobly done, in his day; and, to the end of time, our people shall not fail to venerate his memory, and to implore his constant intercession.

ARTICLE II.—ST. BECAN, EREMIT. [Seventh Century.] St. Becan flourished, it has been thought, about the year of grace, 630.<sup>1</sup> Some account of him will be found, in the Bollandists' collection,<sup>2</sup> and in Bishop Forbes' work.<sup>3</sup> According to Colgan, this saint was son to Ernan, and he sprung from the noble race of Conall Gulban.<sup>4</sup> He was kinsman to St. Columkille, and he is said to have been a brother to St. Cumineus Albus, or the White,<sup>5</sup> who presided over the monastery of Hy, in Scotland, from A.D. 657 to 696. The latter statement, however, is rather doubtful. He was related to several Abbots, who ruled over Iona, if we follow Colgan's statement. He became ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> This inference is drawn from St. Cummin's Epistle—referred to St. Cummineus Albus, Abbot of Iona, as the author, in Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvii. Martii. Vita S. Becani, n. i., p. 630. The festival of St. Cummin the Fair, is kept, on the 24th of February; but, there, it is shown, that some other Cummin was author of the celebrated Paschal Epistle.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tom. ii., Martii xvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 506.

<sup>3</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p.

277.

<sup>4</sup> "Hoc colligitur ex dictis de S. Cumeano ejus fratre ad 24. Feb. & Sanctilogio Genealogico cap. i. ubi ipsius & Sancti Cuminei Genealogia per Ernanum utriusque patrem, Fiachnam avum Feradachum, Ninnedium, & Fergussum, refertur ad Conallum Gulbanium, ejusdem Fergusii patrem."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvii. Martii. Vita S. Becani, n. 2, p. 630.

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 482.

a monk,<sup>6</sup> and he received the surname Ruim, or Ruiminn, meaning Hermit, according to others.<sup>7</sup> He is called solitarius, in Latin. Following the example of many holy men, belonging to his race and family, he self-imposed a volutary exile from Ireland, his native country, and sailed for Iona. There, he led a solitary life, whilst his kinsman, Segenius,<sup>8</sup> ruled over Hy monastery,<sup>9</sup> as would appear from the mention of our saint's name, by his brother Cumian, who wrote a Paschal epistle, to the fathers of Iona,<sup>10</sup> about A.D. 634.<sup>11</sup> In this epistle, Cumian calls our saint, "Becan, the solitary—a dear brother, both in the flesh and in the spirit." It would appear, however, he was considered as one of the community, although leading this eremitical life. The Annals of the Four Masters state, that Becan, surnamed Ruiminn, died in Britain, on the 17th day of March, 675.<sup>12</sup> His name is entered, likewise, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>13</sup> at the 17th of March. Again, Marianus O'Gorman has eulogistic notice of him.<sup>14</sup> On this day, also, we find Bechán Ruim, as having a festival, celebrated in his honour, according to the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>15</sup> Without assigning any satisfactory reason, Dr. Lanigan says, that our saint might have settled in Ireland, after his having been in Iona; and that, we are not bound to believe, he was the saint, bearing a similar name, to which the epithet Ruiminn was added, and who died in Britain, as stated by the Four Masters.<sup>16</sup>

ARTICLE III.—ST. NESSAN OF CORK. [Probably in the Fifth Century.] In Colgan's work,<sup>1</sup> we find some notices of the present holy man; although, indeed, with doubts enough obtruding. A certain Deacon Nessian is introduced, in the Acts of St. Patrick,<sup>2</sup> when the holy Apostle was travelling through Munster.<sup>3</sup> Colgan seems to think, he may have been venerated on this day.<sup>4</sup> Elsewhere, he is called, by Colgan, Nessian, Deacon of Mungaret, and he is classed among St. Patrick's disciples.<sup>5</sup> The Bollandists allude to St. Nessianus, Presbyter, as a Patron of Cork; but, on account of several homonymous saints, they could not pronounce with any degree of certainty

<sup>6</sup> See ibid., cap. x., pp. 488, 501.

<sup>7</sup> "Ruminn ab Annalibus Ruini a Martyrologiis mox citandis, appellatur."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvii. Martii, n. 3, p. 630.

<sup>8</sup> His feast has been assigned to the 12th of August.

<sup>9</sup> From A.D. 623 to 652. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Appendix O, pp. 373 to 375.

<sup>10</sup> This Paschal Epistle of Cumian's is to be found, in Ussher's "Veterum Epistolarum Hibernicarum Sylloge." Epistola xi., pp. 24 to 35. It is thus directed: "Cumiani Hiberni, ad Segienum Huensem, abbatem, de Controversia Paschali. In nomine Divino Dei summi confido. Dominis sanctis & in Christo venerandis, Segieno abbati Columbæ sancti, & cæterorum sanctorum successorum, Becanoque solitario (charo carne & spiritu fratri) cum suis sapientibus; Cumianus supplex peccator, magnis minimus, apologeticam in Christo salutem."

<sup>11</sup> According to Ussher, who, at the year 634, says: "Quintus Cycclus Paschalis 84. annorum incipit: sub cujus initium, Cumianus ad Segienum Hyensem abbatem, de controversia Paschali, scripsit epistolam."

"Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates." Index Chronologicus, p. 538.

<sup>12</sup> "The Age of Christ, 675. The second year of Finnachta. Becan Ruiminni died in Britain, on the 17th of March."—Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 284, 285. The Annals of Ulster place his death, at the following year: "A.D. 676. Beccan Rumin quievit," while the Annals of Clonmacnoise state, at "A.D. 673. Beagan Rumyn died in the island of Wales [recte Britain]."

<sup>13</sup> He is called "Becanus Ruiminn candidus et benignus."

<sup>14</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. The Franciscan copy has Becanus Ruim.

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

<sup>16</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xv., sect. vii., n. 38, p. 396.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvii. Martii, p. 629.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, already set down for this day, at chap. xix.

<sup>3</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Vita S. Patricii, cap. lxi., p. 26.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., nn. 58, 59, p. 32.

regarding him.<sup>6</sup> They conjecture, however, that he was the disciple of St. Finnbar,<sup>7</sup> and that he afterwards governed the church of his master. He seems to have been buried there.<sup>8</sup> Veneration was given, at the 17th of March, to Nesson of Cork, as we read in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>9</sup> and, also, in that of Marianus O'Gorman.<sup>10</sup> Another festival has been assigned to him, at the 1st of December, and to which day the reader is referred.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. CONCHEND. This entry, in our lists of holy persons, would seem to have been intended for the name of a female saint. Whether it has been rightly inserted here, notwithstanding, may admit of some doubt. However, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> registers Conchend, or Conchennia, as having a festival, at the 17th of March. In the Bollandists' notice of this account, they hesitatingly state, that she was a sister of St. Munna, or Mundus.<sup>2</sup>

ARTICLE V.—ST. GOBBAN, SON OF NASCAIN, AND BISHOP. On the 17th of March, his name is set down in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> as Gobban mac Nasair; this latter word, however, has been erroneously written for Nascaín. Colgan enters a few particulars, regarding the present saint, at this date,<sup>2</sup> when alluding to three brothers, greatly distinguished, for their renowned virtues, viz.: Gobbanus, a bishop, Straphanus,<sup>3</sup> or Stephanus, a presbyter, and Lasren,<sup>4</sup> whose father is called Nasca, or Nassan. These brothers are enumerated, among the twelve disciples of St. Mochudda, or Carthage,<sup>5</sup> Patron of Lismore. For their wonderful obedience to rule, they are praised; and, in Muscraige of Munster did their master erect a monastery, in an island called Inis-pict, or Inis-puinc, where they were placed with Bishop Damangen,<sup>6</sup> and other holy men.<sup>7</sup> Their period is referred to the end of the sixth century. Marianus O'Gorman has a notice of this saint.<sup>8</sup> We have recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>9</sup> that on this day, Gobban, son of Nasc, had veneration paid him. He is styled, a bishop, by other authorities.

<sup>5</sup> See ibid. Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 265.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tom. ii., Martii xvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 506.

<sup>7</sup> His feast occurs, on the 25th of September.

<sup>8</sup> In the book of Litanies, attributed to St. Ængus, we have invoked seventeen holy bishops and seven hundred favoured servants of God, who lie with Barri and Nesson, whose names are written in the heavens. See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii. May, 1867, pp. 390, 391.

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. The Franciscan copy has neppanur Copca-ſienp.

<sup>10</sup> He is called "Nessanus Corcagiensis," by this Martyrologist.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. The Franciscan copy has Conchennia tūpgo.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tom. ii., Martii xvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 506.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly,

p. xviii. However, in the Franciscan copy, we find, Gobbanur fil. naren.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvii. Martii. Vita S. Gobbani, p. 631, and nn. 1 to 10.

<sup>3</sup> His feast is said to have been at Cluainmor, on the 23rd of May, on which day Sraffan is commemorated.

<sup>4</sup> The 25th of October, he is said to have been venerated at Ard-mac-Nasca, on the brink of Lough Laoigh, now Belfast Lough, in Uladh.

<sup>5</sup> His festival is kept, on the 14th of May.

<sup>6</sup> He is thought to have been identical with Domaingen, Bishop of Tuaim Muscraige, venerated on the 29th of April.

<sup>7</sup> Colgan conjectures, that these and other disciples of St. Carthage here were the pilgrims of Innis Puine, invoked in the Litany attributed to St. Ængus the Culdee. See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii. May, 1867, pp. 396, 397.

<sup>8</sup> He is called "Gobanus fil Naski," by this Martyrologist.

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. FAILTIGERN OR FAOILTIGERN, VIRGIN. An entry is found, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 17th of March, regarding St. Faltigern, a holy woman, whose personal history is involved in great obscurity. The Bollandists have a mere notice.<sup>2</sup> Faoiltighern, Virgin, is registered, also, in the Martyrology of Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>3</sup> and in that of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> as having had veneration paid her, on this day.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. TIGERNACH. A record is found, in the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> at the 17th of March, and there this holy man is called a bishop. His age has not been ascertained. The Bollandists confess their ignorance of any particulars referring to him.<sup>2</sup> The Martyrology of Marianus O'Gorman<sup>3</sup> and that of Donegal<sup>4</sup> state, that on this day was venerated Tigernach, a Priest.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF COLONATUS, PRESBYTER, AND TOTUANUS DIANUS, AT WURTZBURGH. Under such a heading, Canisius, Galesinius, Wion, Bucelin, and Dempster,<sup>1</sup> have entered a festival, for the 17th of March; and, the Bollandists state, they have little doubt, but that it refers to Colmanus and Toknanus, the companions of St. Kilian,<sup>2</sup> whose Acts are to be found at the 8th of July. To that date, we refer the reader, for an account of their glorious martyrdom. There is a notice of St. Colonatus, in Bishop Forbes' work.<sup>3</sup>

Eighteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. COMMAN, OR CAIMAN, CONFESSOR.

[POSSIBLY OF THE SEVENTH CENTURY.]

EXAMPLES of holiness cheer men, in the prosecution of their good works, encourage them in adversity, as in prosperity, give activity and energy to religious organizations, and increase the number of our Lord's servants. Sanctity seems to have descended, as a family inheritance, in our island. St. Comman was of illustrious descent, belonging to the race of Conall Gulban, and being son to Ernan.<sup>1</sup> An account of this holy man is

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, we have, Faileteigerna tingo.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tom. ii., Martii xvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 506.

<sup>3</sup> She is called "Faileteigerna Virgo," by him.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xviii. In the Franciscan copy, this entry is thus given Tigernachur ep.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tom. ii., Martii xvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 506.

<sup>3</sup> "Tigernachus Praesbi" is found entered, in the work of this writer.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> In his "Menologium Scoticum," he notes, at this day: At Herbipolis, Colonatus, monk and martyr, Apostle of Franconia, together with his companion Totnan. See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tom. ii., Martii xvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 507.

<sup>3</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 305. Three festivals are set down at the 17th of March, 20th of May, and 9th of July.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> The Sacred Genealogies thus trace his descent in the First Chapter: "S. Commanus filius Ernani, filii Fiachne, in the Bollandists',<sup>2</sup> and in Bishop Forbes' work.<sup>3</sup> He was a brother to St. Cumman—incorrectly supposed to have been St. Cummineus Albus<sup>4</sup>—and to St. Becan, according to Colgan, who has a vague account of him. While St. Fergnai, uncle to our saint,—as Colgan thinks,—ruled over Iona monastery, Comman became a monk in his Order, and was subject to his rule. Our saint lived, afterwards, it is said, to the time of Adamnan.<sup>5</sup> He related to this latter a miracle, regarding St. Columkille, which he had heard from the lips of Abbot Fergnai,<sup>6</sup> and which miracle is recorded by Adamnan, in his Life of the great Pictish Apostle.<sup>7</sup> As Adamnan flourished, about A.D. 670, Colgan is of opinion, that our saint must be identical with the Comman,<sup>8</sup> who is called bishop, by our Annalists, and who died in the year 676.<sup>9</sup> This date, also—as he assumes—nearly coincides with that, determining the death of his brothers—Saints Commineus and Becan. These died respectively, according to Colgan's calculation, in the years, 668, and 675.<sup>10</sup> Regarding Comman's probable or conjectured episcopal rank, Colgan observes, that it matters not, because he was called Honorabilis Presbyter, or respectable Presbyter,<sup>11</sup> by Adamnan; for, he might have been ordained a bishop, after relating the miracle of St. Columkille to his biographer. A more shrewd remark might have been inserted, viz., shortly before Adamnan had written this narrative. Besides, we are informed, that old writers oftentimes understood a bishop, by the foregoing appellation. Colgan adds, that our different filií Feradachii, filii Nenmidii, filii Fergusii, filii Conalli Gulbanii, &c." — Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xviii. Martii. Vita S. Commani, n. i., p. 651. Also, "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. 3, p. 480, and cap. x., p. 489.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 613.

<sup>3</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 307.

<sup>4</sup> His feast occurs, at the 24th of February. He is also called St. Cuimne Fionn. See Dr. Elrington's edition of Ussher's Works, vol. vi., "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 540.

<sup>5</sup> His Life is given, at the 23rd of September.

<sup>6</sup> Otherwise called St. Fergna Britt, whose feast is assigned to the 2nd of March.

<sup>7</sup> See, "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Vita, or Adamnan's Vita S. Columbæ, lib. ii., cap. xix., p. 368.

<sup>8</sup> Searching for Coman of the Third Class, Ussher says in his "Primordia," at p. 968, that Coman of Ferns was perhaps the Comman called by Adamnan (l. 3, c. 19), honorabilis presbyter, whom Ussher seems to have supposed the same as Coman of the Third Class. But, Dr. Lanigan asks, as Coman of Ferns did not die until 678, how could he have belonged to said class, which lasted until only 665? "Supposing the Comman of Adamnan to have been different from Coman of Ferns, which is very probable, he might have been the priest Coman of the list. It is true, that Adamnan speaks of him as having conversed with him. This conversation might have occurred, when Adamnan was young, and some years before 665. Adamnan was born about the year 625, and must have been younger than Comman, who, as he tells us, was maternal nephew of Virgnow, who, after governing Hy for 25 years, died in 623."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. iii., n. 36, p. 12.

<sup>9</sup> See, O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 284, 285, where the death of a "Coman, bishop," is noted at the year 676, with Dairchell, Bishop of Glendalough. At note (m) on Dairchell, Mr. O'Donovan remarks: "The death of this bishop, and of Coman is noticed in the Annals of Ulster under the year 677, and in the Annals of Clonmacnoise at 674: "A.D. 677. Daircill mac Curetai Episcopus Glinne-da-locha, et Coman Episcopus Fernan pansant,"—Ann. Ult. "A.D. 674. Dairchill mac Cuyletty, Bushop of Glendalougha, died. Coman, Bishop, and Moyledoyer, Bushop, died."—Ann. Clon. Ibid. I feel inclined to think, the Annals of Ulster improperly call Coman, Bishop of Fernan. According to the Four Masters, an entry regarding the death of Maeldoghar, Bishop of Fearn, immediately follows the account of Coman's death. He is the Moyledoyer, of the Annals of Clonmacnoise.

<sup>10</sup> See the Acts of both these saints, as Colgan supposes, he has published, at the 24th of February, and the 17th of March.

<sup>11</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," lib. iii., cap. 19, pp. 223 to 225.

<sup>12</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix.,

Martyrologists—viz., the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>12</sup> that of Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>13</sup> of Maguire, and of the O'Clerys<sup>14</sup>—call this St. Comman,<sup>15</sup> a Bishop; although, the See which he governed, and the place where he was specially honoured, are unknown.<sup>16</sup> His feast was held, on the 18th day of March.

ARTICLE II.—ST. ERCRECT, OR EGBERT, A SAXON. [Probably in the Eighth Century.] On this day, Colgan publishes some accounts, regarding St. Ercrect, or Ecbert, an Anglo-Saxon saint.<sup>1</sup> He is thought,<sup>2</sup> to have been no other than Ecbert,<sup>3</sup> otherwise called Eatbert, the King of Northumbria, who, after a twenty years' reign,<sup>4</sup> desirous of obtaining an eternal crown,<sup>5</sup> relinquished the temporal one, to his son, Osulph. Eadbert assumed the monastic tonsure and habit. He led a most praiseworthy life, from about the year 757,<sup>6</sup> or 758,<sup>7</sup> in the Monastery of Lindisfarne, perfect in every practice of humility and obedience. He is said to have enriched the See of York, by founding there a remarkable library, and which he stored, with all the best books, that could be procured. It is said, he died, about the year 768,<sup>8</sup> and that his Natalis is generally assigned to the 20th of August.<sup>9</sup> This, indeed, seems to preclude the idea of his having been the saint, marked in our Irish Calendars, at the 18th of March. Whoever the latter was, Colgan is of opinion, that he must have lived for some time in Ireland, or that his existence closed in our island, to account for the national honour paid him, by our early writers. According to the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>10</sup> Ericbrit, the Saxon, had veneration paid him, at the 18th of March. Marianus O'Gorman<sup>11</sup> has a record of this holy man, yet nothing to indicate his personal identity.

where he is called Coeman, a bishop. In the Franciscan copy, the entry is Caímanur Ep.

<sup>13</sup> He has the notice, Caímanur, in one place, and Comanur Ep. in another, as if separate persons are to be understood.

<sup>14</sup> See Drs. Todd's and Reeves' edition, pp. 80, 81.

<sup>15</sup> Although he had spoken of Coman of Ferns, as a priest, and as having always remained so, which appears from his having thought this Comman might have been the Comman of Adamnan; yet, in his "Index Chronologicus," at A.D. 678, Ussher calls him the bishop of Ferns. Ware also reckons him among the bishops of Ferns, but places his death, at 675, merely, perhaps, on conjecture, and because he knew, that in the year 678 the See of Ferns was occupied by Dirath, who succeeded Maldogar, in 677. It is more than probable, that those writers were mistaken in making him a bishop, owing to their having met with a bishop of that name—the one of Colgan—and thence confounding him with Coman of Ferns. In a list of the bishops of that See, for the seventh century, as found in Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Vita S. Brigidæ, lib. ii., n. 2, p. 564, no Coman appears, nor according to the succession there marked could there have been any room for him. See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. iii., n. 36, p. 12.

<sup>16</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xviii. Martii, n. 3, p. 651.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xviii. Martii. Vita S. Ercrecti, p. 652.

<sup>2</sup> By Colgan.

<sup>3</sup> Said, by Arnold Wion, to have been the eighteenth king of Northumbria.

<sup>4</sup> According to Arnold Wion's "Lignum Vitæ," lib. iv., cap. 7.

<sup>5</sup> This happened, in the third year of King Kinulph's reign, according to Henry of Huntingdon. See "Historia Anglicana," lib. iv.

<sup>6</sup> According to the Chronicle of Florence of Worcester. See, also Matthew of Westminster, in "Flores Historiarum," A.D. dclvii., pp. 274, 275.

<sup>7</sup> According to the Continuator of Ven. Bede's History, as mentioned in the Roman Breviary, Colgan observes, and Arnold Wion has the same account, "Lignum Vitæ," lib. iv., cap. 7.

<sup>8</sup> According to the English Martyrology, and Hugh Menard, at the 23rd of March.

<sup>9</sup> According to Hugo Menard's "Martyrologium Benedictinum," lib. i., obs.

<sup>10</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find, Ercrebrectur Saxo.

<sup>11</sup> He enters, Ercrebrectur puer Ecbertur, immediately after the insertion of three

ARTICLE III.—ST. CONNALL, BISHOP OF KILLCONNAL, AND OF AUGHIRM, COUNTY OF GALWAY. [Supposed to be of the Fifth Century.] Whether we may regard them, as possessing intrinsic value or not, the Acts of a St. Connall have been published, by Colgan, at the present date,<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists insert some notices, expressed with caution and doubt, regarding him.<sup>2</sup> These seem to be justifiable enough, since the only document adduced is a Manuscript copy of the Acts of St. Patrick's Synod,<sup>3</sup> which states, that Ethianus and Conallus ordained unworthy bishops, in the spacious plain of Hai,<sup>4</sup> and that they were reprov'd, in consequence, by the Irish Apostle, because they acted, without taking his advice. It is stated, that he predicted their churches should be insignificant, although the ordained did penance for their offences. This ecclesiastic flourished, at an early period—towards the close of the fifth century—in the territory of Hy-Many, in the southern part of Connaught, if we can connect him, with the account previously given. However, as we have already seen, when treating about St. Etchanius, or Etchen,<sup>5</sup> that it is irreconcilable with chronology to suppose him a bishop, in the days of St. Patrick, or to connect him with the Ethianus, mentioned in the Canons; so must we have little credence in the statement, that his companion, Connall, could have been a saint, cotemporaneous with the great Irish Apostle, and said to have been his disciple.<sup>6</sup> According to Colgan, St. Connall had been appointed bishop over a church, erected at a place, named after him, Kilconnell,<sup>7</sup> or Connall's church, in the county of Galway, near a site, where the Franciscans afterwards founded an establishment.<sup>8</sup> This latter seems to have been erected,<sup>9</sup> in the year 1353, by William M'Donnough Moynagh O'Kelly, Chieftain of Hy-many, and its remains are still to be seen.<sup>10</sup> He is also said to have governed a church, at Eachdhuim, near Ballinasloe, and not far removed from the former place,<sup>11</sup> if, indeed, it is to be considered at all distinguishable, according to Colgan's account. This Connall<sup>12</sup>—also called Blessed Connall Droma<sup>13</sup>—is thought to have been the foreign saints, in his Calendar, viz., Αλεξανου, Εουαγου, Σερπουρι. The first of these was Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem, Bishop and Martyr, at Cæsarea, in Palestine; the second, St. Edward, King of England, and Martyr; and the third, was St. Gertrude, Virgin, of Nivelles. The festival of this latter holy woman is usually set down, at the 17th of March.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xviii. Martii. Vita S. Connalli, p. 632.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii. Martii xviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 613.

<sup>3</sup> Found in the Cottonian Library, according to Archbishop Ussher, in "Primordia Britannicarum Ecclesiarum," p. 1049.

<sup>4</sup> Said to have been in the present county of Roscommon.

<sup>5</sup> He was Bishop and Patron of Clonfad, in the parish of Killucan, county of Westmeath, and his feast has been assigned to the 11th of February.

<sup>6</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxxiii., p. 268.

<sup>7</sup> The town and townland of Kilconnell are situated in a parish and barony, bearing the same name. They are shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Galway," Sheet 86.

<sup>8</sup> Its ruins were drawn by Bigari, and they are represented as engraved, in Grose's "Antiquities of Ireland," vol. i., p. 65.

<sup>9</sup> The accompanying engraving of this ruined conventual house was sketched on the spot, and afterwards transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman. The engraving is by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>10</sup> For an interesting description and account of Kilconnell Abbey, from its foundation to its dissolution, the reader is referred to the admirable work of Rev. C. P. Meehan, M.R.I.A., "The Rise and Fall of the Irish Franciscan Monasteries," &c., chap. vi., pp. 69 to 73.

<sup>11</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Tribes and Customs of Hy-Many." Additional Notes, A. p. 105, and B. n. (d), p. 130.

<sup>12</sup> The Bollandists intimate, that there may have been two distinct Connalls alluded to, in Colgan's Acts of St. Connall.

<sup>13</sup> Or as Colgan observes, "Conallus Droma, sive de Druim," which denotes a more elevated spot, on a hill or mountain.

<sup>14</sup> This holy virgin is Patrons of Killaraght, county of Sligo. Her feast was kept uterine brother of St. Attracta,<sup>14</sup> and to have incurred her displeasure, because he refused permission to herself and her nuns to settle near that place, he had chosen, for a contemplative life. Little is known, regarding the Conall alluded to, and nothing can safely be stated, in reference to his identity with him, whose feast has been entered, in our Irish Calendars, at the 18th of March. Whether Killchonill, or Each-Druim<sup>15</sup>—now Aughrim,<sup>16</sup> about two miles distant—be understood as his place of residence, Colgan leaves to the investigators of his day an inference, that Conall's church had experienced the fate of St. Patrick's and of St. Attracta's denunciations. The Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>17</sup> at the 18th of March, enters the name of Conall, Bishop. In like manner does Marianus O'Gorman note his feast.<sup>18</sup> Conall, Bishop, is again registered, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>19</sup> as having been venerated, on this day.

Kilconnell Abbey, County Galway.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. MOEDOC, OR MAEDHOG, OF CLUAIN-ESGRACH. We find the name and his locality given, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at this date. Both are precisely similar, in the Martyrology of Marianus O'Gorman, who records Maidocus, of Cluain Escrach.<sup>2</sup> In the Appendix to the Acts of on the 9th of February, and on the 11th of August. At the latter day, her Acts may be found.

<sup>15</sup> Anglicised, "the horse's ridge," or "hill."

<sup>16</sup> The parish of Aughrim, situated in the baronies of Clonmacnowen and of Kilconnell, is shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Galway," Sheets 86, 87, 98, 99. The town of Aughrim, where the celebrated battle, fought on the 12th of July, 1691, took place, is shown on Sheet 87.

<sup>17</sup> Edited by the Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find, Conallur ep.

<sup>18</sup> Thus, Conallur ep.

<sup>19</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we read, maedocur oe cluain esrach.

St. Moedoc, Bishop of Ferns,<sup>3</sup> Colgan has a notice of Moedocus de Cluain Escrach, whose feast is set down for the 14th of March;<sup>4</sup> but neither at such date, nor at this day, is there further note regarding him.<sup>5</sup> It is not an easy matter to discover the present name of his place. Again, the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>6</sup> mentions, as having a festival on this day, a St. Maedhog, of Cluain-esgrach.

ARTICLE V.—ST. TOMAN, OR THOMAN, BISHOP. This name Thomanus, a bishop, appears, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 18th of March. It is entered, in a similar manner, in the Calendar of Marianus O'Gorman.<sup>2</sup> In reference to this saint, the Bollandists remark,<sup>3</sup> that he was unknown to Colgan, and to themselves; unless, indeed, he could be identified with the St. Tomienus, or Tomianus, Archbishop of Armagh, and whose Acts have been already given, at the 10th of January. The festival of St. Tomás, Bishop, is entered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> at this date.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. CHRISTIANUS, OR GIOLLA CRIOST O'CONARCHY, FIRST ABBOT OF MELLIFONT, COUNTY OF LOUTH. [Twelfth Century.] The last of the Fathers, as St. Bernard<sup>1</sup> is affectionately termed by the Church, infused new vitality into the decaying monastic spirit of Western Europe; and, at a time when, but for a mighty spiritual influence, the fervour of religious observance might have languished. From France, his institute extended to these islands. So early as 1128, Giffard, Bishop of Winchester, had introduced the Cistercian Order into Great Britain. It was originally instituted, by Stephen Harding, an Englishman of remarkable energy and holiness, and, it had one of the most illustrious of the mediæval saints for its true patron. The founder of Waverley Abbey had noble imitators. Soon, Furness Abbey, in Lancashire, Fountains Abbey,<sup>2</sup> in Yorkshire, New-Minster, Kirksted, and Roche, followed. The Order went on spreading, until the work of monasticism was finished in England. Then, it was found, that there were seventy-five Cistercian houses of men, in England, and twenty-six nunneries, belonging to the same Order. Notwithstanding, however, their great influence, the English branch is singularly barren, in historical memorials. At a somewhat later period, the Cistercian Order was introduced to Ireland, and the present holy abbot presided over the first house there established. The Life of this holy man, Christianus, or Christian,—sometimes called Christianus Ua Condoirche, <sup>2</sup> Thus, marocur de cluain escrach.

<sup>3</sup> His Life is given, at the 31st of January.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Januarii. Appendix ad Acta S. Maidoci, cap. 1, p. 221.

<sup>5</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 613.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, it is thomanur ep.

<sup>2</sup> Thus, thomanur ep.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xviii. Among the pretermitted saints," p. 613.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> This great saint was born, A.D. 1091, and he died, A.D. 1153, on the 20th of August, the date for his festival.

<sup>2</sup> For an account of this magnificent erection, the reader is referred to "Memorials of the Abbey of St. Mary of Fountains. Collected and Edited by John Richard Walbran, F.S.A., for the Surtees Society." 1863. This great house was founded, on the 26th of December, 1132. At the request of Sigward, Bishop of Bergen, in Norway, a colony of monks went forth from Fountains, A.D. 1146, to carry their Order into his diocese. They founded an abbey, a little to the south of Bergen, which received the name of Lysa. The ruins of Lyse-kloster, or Klaust'r a Lysa, show, that, like its English parent, the House of the Valley of Light was a noble structure. See pp. xvi., 89.

<sup>3</sup> See Dr. Jeffry Keating's enumeration

or Giolla Criost O'Conarchy,<sup>3</sup>—had been frequently promised to Colgan ; yet, he was not able to procure it, when he published from various sources those Acts, which are to be found in his work.<sup>4</sup> The Bollandists, at this day, only have a few brief notices regarding him, and they preferred waiting to see, if his life should turn up, and reveal to them evidence, that any ancient writer had called him Sanctus or Beatus.<sup>5</sup> The English Martyrology,<sup>6</sup> Arnold Wion,<sup>7</sup> Ferrarius,<sup>8</sup> Vincentius,<sup>9</sup> and Hugh Menard, insert his name, in their several Calendars. According to some accounts, he was born or educated, at Bangor, in Ulster ;<sup>10</sup> and, if we credit Colgan, this holy man was a disciple, and also the Archdeacon, of St. Malachy O'Morgair,<sup>11</sup> Archbishop of Armagh ; and, afterwards, he most probably travelled with the venerable prelate, when first leaving Ireland for Rome, about the year 1138, and when he visited Clairvaux, the great house of St. Bernard, on his way. Returning by the same route, it seems probable, that Christian was one of the four disciples, who remained as postulants, under the charge of St. Bernard, and who were admitted as monks of the Cistercian Order. When St. Malachy reached Ireland, he felt a great desire to found a house, and to procure a superior and monks from that Order to inhabit it ; so that soon the Abbey of Mellifont, a few miles from Drogheda, in the present county of Louth, was founded by Donough O'Carroll, and, in the year 1141, St. Bernard sent over Christian, when duly trained, as the superior of some French brothers, to plant the good seed. About the year 1142, Mellifont seems to have been occupied, and here Christian lived for some time,<sup>12</sup> with his monks. It has been asserted,<sup>13</sup> that Christian was subsequently elevated to the See of Lismore, and that he was the identical Papal Legate, who was present at the Council of Kells, assembled in the springtime of the year 1152,<sup>14</sup> and over which Cardinal John Paparo, Priest of St. Laurence in Damaso, presided, at the instance of Pope Eugene III. Besides, the distinction given to Christianus O'Conairche, as Bishop of Lismore, and Legate of the Sovereign Pontiff for Ireland, he is called head of the Irish monks ; but, in the latter case, we must understand, probably, only those of the Cistercian Order, in Ireland. It is untrue, as has been advanced by some, that he was bishop over Down,<sup>15</sup> succeeding St. Malachy O'Morgair there, or that he presided as Archbishop over Armagh.<sup>16</sup> Equally false is the account, that he departed this life, so early as A.D. 1148.<sup>17</sup> It has been supposed, that Christianus presided over one or two other Synods held in Ireland, and in the capacity of Apostolic Legate. Mellifont Abbey having been completed, about the year 1157, it was consecrated, with a magnificent rite and solemnity. Then and there, a numerous of the bishops, assembled at Kells, in his "General History of Ireland," translated by Dermot O'Connor, part ii., p. 518. Duffy's edition.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xviii. Martii. De B. Christiano Abbate Mellifontensi Episcopo et Legato Apostolico, pp. 652 to 655.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 613.

<sup>6</sup> At the 18th of March.

<sup>7</sup> This writer states, in the Benedictine Martyrology, that a German Calendar mentions him, at this date.

<sup>8</sup> In Catalogo Generali, at the 18th of March.

<sup>9</sup> In Speculo, lib. xxix., cap. 11, 12.

<sup>10</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Lismore," p. 550.

<sup>11</sup> His Life is given, at the 3rd of November.

<sup>12</sup> According to Arnold Wion's Benedictine Martyrology, "factus est Abbas Cænobii Surenensis et Millifontensis."

<sup>13</sup> Speaking of the Millifont monks, at 1142, Sir James Ware states : "Abbate illis præposito Christiano O'Conarchy (postea Lismorensi Episcopo)."—"Coenobia Cisterciensia Hiberniæ," p. 62.

<sup>14</sup> See an account of this remarkable Synod, in the notices of St. Gille, or Gillibert, at the 4th of February.

<sup>15</sup> According to Hugh Menard.

<sup>16</sup> According to Ferrarius.

<sup>17</sup> According to Arnold Wion, the English Martyrology, and Philip Ferrarius.

<sup>18</sup> Seventeen is the number given, besides

Synod of bishops<sup>18</sup>—the Archbishop of Armagh included, with kings, chiefs and princes attending—was assembled.<sup>19</sup> Large gifts were bestowed on the Abbey, by these magnates.<sup>20</sup> Again, in the year 1158, it is stated, that a Synod of the clergy of Ireland was convened, at Bri-mic-Taidhg,<sup>21</sup> in Lae-ghaire, at which twenty-five bishops assisted,<sup>22</sup> with the Legate of St. Peter's successor. Their object was to ordain rules and good morals. The Comorban of St. Patrick was present, and the assembled clergy ordered a chair, like every other bishop's in Ireland, for Flaithbheartach Ua Brochain, the successor of St. Colum-Cille, and also they decreed the arch-abbacy of the Irish churches in general, as his due.<sup>23</sup> The present holy abbot must not be confounded with Christian O'Morgair, the brother of St. Malachy, and who presided over the See of Clogher.<sup>24</sup> Citing the authority of Petrus de Natalibus, and of the English Martyrology, in the list of Henry Fitzsimon, we have Christianus, Bishop, entered, at the 18th of March. In the anonymous Catalogue of National Saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare,<sup>25</sup> at the same date, he is simply called Christianus. The Bishop of Lismore, Christian O'Conarchy, must either have resigned his See, or died before 1159, for even at this date, we find recorded the death of his successor, Maelmaire Ua Loingseach, Bishop of Lismore.<sup>26</sup> In Harris' Ware,<sup>27</sup> it is stated, that Christian O'Conarchy resigned his See, about the year 1175, and that having grown tired of all worldly pomp, this resignation happened a long time before his death. He is said to have lived to an advanced age, and to have died, in the year 1186. Again, it is related, that he was buried at Odorney,<sup>28</sup> alias Kyrieleyson,—a monastery of his own Order,—in the county of Kerry.<sup>29</sup> However, regarding the foregoing statements, and the present holy man's identification, in reference to them, much uncertainty remains.

the Legate of the Pope, and the Archbishop of Armagh.

<sup>19</sup> At this Synod, the successor of St. Patrick consecrated the church, and Donnchadh Ua Maeleachlainn was excommunicated by the clergy of Ireland, and, afterwards, he was banished by the kings from the kingdom of Meath. Then, likewise, his brother Diarmaid was made king in his place.

<sup>20</sup> Thus Muirheartach Ua Lochlainn, otherwise called Murtoigh O'Lochlin, King of Ireland, gave as a pious offering, for his soul, to God and to the monks of Mellifont, 140 oxen or cows, 60 ounces of gold, and a townland, near Drogheda, called Finn timer of the Daughters. Sixty ounces of gold were presented by O'Carroll, prince of Oriel; while, as many more were given, by Dervorgilla, the celebrated wife of O'Rourke, prince of Breffny, together with a golden chalice for the Virgin's altar, together with sacred vestments and ornaments, for each of the other nine altars, that were in the church. See Moore's "History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xxvi., pp. 196, 197.

<sup>21</sup> Or the "Hill of the son of Taidhg," which was near Trim, in the county of Meath.

<sup>22</sup> While the Bishops of Connaught were on their way to this Synod, after they had left Clonmacnoise, at a place near it, called Cuir-Cluana, on the Shannon, and in the King's County, they were set upon, plundered and beaten, by the soldiers of Diarmaid Ua Maeleachlainn, King of Meath. Two of their people were killed, and the bishops returned to their houses.

<sup>23</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1128, 1129, and nn. (t, u.) Ibid.

<sup>24</sup> His death took place, on the 12th of June, A.D. 1138.

<sup>25</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernice Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 53.

<sup>26</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1132, 1133.

<sup>27</sup> See vol. i., "Bishops of Lismore," pp. 550, 551.

<sup>28</sup> The parish of O'Dorney, in the barony of Clanmaurice, is noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kerry," Sheets 15, 21.

<sup>29</sup> For this statement, Sir James Ware quotes these words of a certain anonymous author of Irish Annals, in reference to the year 1186: "Christianus, illustris ille Præsul Lismorensis, quondam legatus Hiberniæ, æmulator virtutum (inquit Author anonymus annalium nostrorum) quas viderat, et audierat à Sancto Patre suo Bernardo, summoque Pontifice viro venerabili Eugenio, cum quò fuit in probatorio, apud Clarevallem."—"Coenobia Cisterciensia Hiberniæ," p. 67.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. CAEMHAN, THE HOLY. Caemhán, denominated the Holy, is set down in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> as having a festival, at this date. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> notice a St. Caimanus, a Bishop, occurring at the 18th of March, in two distinct Irish Martyrologies. Colgan thinks a disciple of St. Patrick, known as Coeman of Kill-rath, may be identified with the present saint. The same writer identifies the latter with a Coeman, Deacon, mentioned in St. Patrick's Acts.<sup>3</sup> There appears to be much confusion, in the short notes of writers, as relating to the present saint's identity.

ARTICLE VIII.—NATALIS OF ST. FRIDIAN, OR FRIGIDIAN, BISHOP, AND PATRON OF LUCCA, ITALY. [Sixth Century.] St. Frigidian's festival is commemorated on this day—said to have been his Natalis—in the Roman Martyrology, as in many of the more ancient Calendars. However, as the Bollandists observe,<sup>1</sup> his chief festival is kept, in the city of Lucca, which honours him as patron, on the 18th of November, the day on which his relics were transferred; and, at this date, more extended notices of him will be found elsewhere. In Stephen White,<sup>2</sup> in Colgan,<sup>3</sup> in the Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>4</sup> and in various other works,<sup>5</sup> there are accounts of him, at this date.

ARTICLE IX.—ST. COMMANETH, OF KILCOMENTY PARISH, COUNTY OF TIPPERARY. This almost unknown saint has a traditional fame among the people of Kilcomenty parish,<sup>1</sup> county of Tipperary. Within two and a-half miles of Birdhill<sup>2</sup> railway station, and two and a-half of the town of Newport<sup>3</sup>—formerly called Tullagh—there is to be seen an old graveyard, containing several tombs and graves, the most curious of holy wells, and places of pilgrimage, with the remains of an ancient church. They well reward a visit from the tourist or antiquary.<sup>4</sup> Old men remember the walls of the ancient church standing. A curiously-cut holy water font was taken at a former time, out of the ruins, and brought to Birdhill. In and about the churchyard, there are remains of well-carved mullions, and other work, which show how beautiful was the tracery, and mouldings, in the windows of the old church. It is said to have been dedicated to St. Cummaneth, whose festival is observed, in the parish of Kilcomenty, on the 18th of March. The district is called Kilcommenethy, or the country about the church of St. Commenath. The well is shaded over by an enormous ash tree, which near the base of the trunk divides itself into two great shafts. From these, a quantity of branches project, all covered with leaves in summer, and these shelter numerous

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 613.

<sup>3</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xlvii., p. 136, and n. 88, p. 177. Also lib. iii., cap. xxxvii., p. 157, and n. 68, p. 186.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 614.

<sup>2</sup> See "Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. ii., p. 15, cap. iv., pp. 36, 37.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xviii. Martii. Vita S. Fridiani sive Findiani Epis., pp. 633 to 651.

<sup>4</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints," March xviii.

<sup>5</sup> See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 78.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> It is situated, in the baronies of Owney and Arra, and it is described on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 25, 31, 37.

<sup>2</sup> See a description of this place, on Sheets 25, 31. Ibid. Also, in the "Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. i., p. 253.

<sup>3</sup> In the parish of Kilvellane, in the same baronies, and it is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tipperary," Sheets 31, 37.

<sup>4</sup> These and the succeeding particulars, we glean, from a series of papers, published by the proprietor and editor, Maurice Lenihan, in the "Limerick Vindicator." See "Cashel of the Kings," in the No. for June 3rd, 1873.

pilgrims, who make their "rounds"<sup>5</sup> of the well, and who pray for the intercession of the local saint, in order to be relieved from bodily and mental ailments. In this well are two of the mysterious trout, said to frequent nearly every holy well in Ireland.<sup>6</sup> The water,<sup>7</sup> by which the well is supplied, comes in a rivulet or stream, from Ballinahinch, some two miles off. Various traditional stories are current, among the people about Birdhill.<sup>8</sup> About two hundred yards north-east of the well, in the midst of hawthorn and alder trees, there is a great Druidic rock basin, of brown sandstone, quite unlike stone of the immediate place, which is limestone. The stone is about two and a-half feet in height from the ground, in breath at the top, it is two and a-half feet, and rounding off in form, it becomes broader, until at the extremity, it is about four and a-half feet in breadth. Within a few yards from the stone, the well runs under the ground, for about two hundred yards, and then it emerges from under the great shady ash tree, within a few yards of the churchyard. The stream thence continues to run a considerable distance, until it empties into the bog of Shower.<sup>9</sup> On the top of the stone are two circular basins, about a foot in diameter, always full or half full of water; and, on the top of the stone, there are two perpendicular cuttings, like Ogam characters—the top one, containing six strokes, the lower one, or one about the middle of the stone, eight. This curious stone, according to a popular tradition, had been the bed of St. Cummaneth, and the perpendicular strokes, are regarded, as the marks of his hands, and of his ribs.<sup>10</sup> The period of this saint is not discoverable to us.

ARTICLE X.—ST. FINAN. The festival of St. Finianus, or Finan, in the Martyrology for the use of the Church of Aberdeen, is entered for the 18th of March,<sup>1</sup> or the xv. Kalends of April, which corresponds.<sup>2</sup> In the Breviary of Aberdeen, his office is in nine Lessons. In Adam King's Calendar, we <sup>5</sup> The "rounds" are seven in number. Each time they are made by the individual pilgrim, who, in the first instance, takes up seven bright pebbles from the brook which runs out of the well, and having seven times repeated the Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary, the Creed, and the Gloria, &c., he throws a pebble into the brook or well. Then he proceeds to walk around the ground, about the well, through the churchyard, and from the churchyard to the front of the well, where the pilgrim kneels and prays. So on he continues, until the rounds are concluded, and until the seven pebbles are returned to the brook.

<sup>6</sup> The following is a local legend. A person of the neighbourhood, at one time, scorning to respect the well, took one of these trout home, and made an effort to roast it; nothing but blood appeared, and the rascal had to bring the trout back to the well; but from that day forward, the family have not had good luck.

<sup>7</sup> It rises in the lands of Mr. Patrick Coffee, of that place, and increasing by small tributary streams, it comes through pleasant fields, daisy and butter-cup covered, in the summer season.

<sup>8</sup> One of these runs, that Ossian's bronze trumpet is buried beneath a rock, on Carriegen. Again, it is stated, Bran, one of Ossian's famous hounds, killed on Moon a Lua, "the bog of the Black Bird," and on which the railway station has been built, a celebrated prehistoric Black Bird, from which the Tipperary hill and parish derive their name. In a History of the Dalcassians, published in the Limerick Vindicator, Mr. Lenihan furnishes interesting notes of these traditions.

<sup>9</sup> There is a curious story told about the well. It is said, that at some distant period, it was situated near the stone, just described, but that the shepherds and herds of the place allowed sheep and cattle to sully the water, and, in one night, the well moved down to its existing site.

<sup>10</sup> There is no doubt, that the stone lay, in its present position, long before the period of the patron saint. On the conversion of the Druids, he may have used the basins for baptizing the early Christians of the place, and may have rested on it occasionally. There is nothing impossible or improbable in this presumption, and tradition may be perfectly correct.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 347.

<sup>2</sup> Thus do we find him noticed: "xv. Kl. Aprilis. In Scotia Sancti Finiani episcopi et confessoris qui abiectis calcatisque vicis orationi et ieiuniis vacare studuit gloriosum—

read of "S. Finnane bischope confess. in scotland vnder king ferquhard 2,"<sup>3</sup> at the 18th of March.<sup>4</sup> The Bollandists,<sup>5</sup> who notice this holy man, state, that they consider him to be hardly different from the St. Finnan, who came from Iona, as a monk, and who was afterwards known as Bishop over Lindisfarne, in Northumbria, of which province he became the Apostle, according to Dempster.<sup>6</sup> Ferrarius has followed this account. We have only to refer the reader to his life, given at the 9th of January, and to some notices, regarding him, at the 16th and 17th of February.

ARTICLE XI.—FESTIVAL OF ST. TIMOTHY, AND OF HIS COMPANIONS, MARTYRS. In the Festilogy of St. Ængus, the Culdee, we find entered, at the 18th of March, the festival of St. Timothy, and of his companions,<sup>1</sup> who were martyrs.

g. xu. kl. Co moir buroin marpa nartar hile lochta na ciarda no nimo
 xx. mileo mochta.

With the great troops of March,
 Who were not all faulty,
 With Timothy are reckoned
 Twenty champions who perished.<sup>2</sup>

Nineteenth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. LACTEAN, OR LACTINUS, ABBOT OF FRESHFORD, COUNTY OF KILKENNY.

[SIXTH AND SEVENTH CENTURIES.]

NEAR some of our large modern towns and cities, the thought of death seems to be concealed, even in their cemeteries, under the garniture of shrubs and flowers, or under those refined sentiments, produced by the sculptor's chisel, and over partial epitaph. Not so, however, do holy persons seek to disguise from themselves, realities of life and death, in a religious course. This saint, called also Lactenus, Lactinius, and Lactanus,<sup>1</sup> is com-que sanctitatis nomen promeruit et miraculis claruit."—"Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii., p. 263.

<sup>3</sup> Ferchardus II. is said to have flourished, about A.D. 660.

<sup>4</sup> See Bishop Forbes' work, at p. 147.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 613.

<sup>6</sup> In his "Menologium Scoticum," at p. 195 of Bishop Forbes' work.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> These appear to be the martyrs in Mauritania, Saints Curentus, Timotheus, Saldia, Felicianus, and Jocundus, who are noticed in some ancient Martyrologies, as may be seen, by consulting the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Martii xviii. De Sanctis Martyribus Curento, Timotheo, Saldia, Feliciano, Jocundo in Mauritania, pp. 619, 620. However, the exact number does not appear, and the testimony of the "Feilire" of St. Ængus alone determines it.

<sup>2</sup> The Irish stanza was copied from the Leabhar Breac, by Professor O'Looney, who also furnished the English translation.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> "Lactinus vulgo, Lactenus & Lactanus ab authoribus supra in vita citatis. Lactocus a Calend. Casselensi, & Molactocus a S. Ængussio appellatur juxta dicenda num. ultimo."—Colgan's "Acta

memorated in Colgan's work, and in the Bollandists' great collection.<sup>2</sup> He was a member of Corpre Musc's<sup>3</sup> illustrious family, belonging to Muskerry, in the county of Cork. An imperfect Life, in which our saint is constantly called Laccinus, was obtained by the Bollandists, from a Dublin Manuscript, and that memoir appears to have been originally of some length, since only the early period of his career is preserved, and written with some degree of prolixity. It states, that while St. Molua<sup>4</sup> lived under the discipline of St. Comgall, at Bangor, an angel appeared to him, and predicted the birth of Lactinus—after an interval of fifteen years—who was to be his future friend and companion. Afterwards, it was related, that Molua never smiled, until he heard of the infant's birth. He was lineally descended, from Connor the Second, King of Ireland.<sup>5</sup> The father of our saint is called Torphurus,<sup>6</sup> and Torben, by some, according to a mode of speaking, not uncommon among our ancient writers; however, Colgan supposes, that this had been the name of an ancestor of Lactinus, omitted in the genealogy.<sup>7</sup> Elsewhere, this pedigree deduces his origin, from Connor, Monarch of Ireland. According to other accounts, he is called son to Corpre, son of Nuachar, son to Carthinn, son of Cannach, son to Corpre Musc, son of King Connor, who was the son of Moglam.<sup>8</sup> Our saint was born some time in the sixth century, and his mother is called Senecha.<sup>9</sup> The Rev. S. Baring-Gould has some account of this saint.<sup>10</sup>

Before the birth of the infant, and while he was borne in his mother's womb, a miracle is recorded, as foreshadowing his great sanctity; for a blind old man, called Mohemeth,<sup>11</sup> received light, which gave him a miraculous vision of Rome, and of distant places, on land and on sea. Thus might the child be compared to Jacob, Jeremias and St. John the Baptist, sanctified in advance of their natiivities. At the time of his birth, no river, spring, or water, was to be found near; but, the venerable Mohemeth, taking the child's hand, made with it a sign of the cross on the dry earth, and immediately a living fountain sprung up from the soil. Then Mohemeth, giving thanks to God, baptized the infant in the water, delivered him to his parent, and then departed with great joy, towards his own part of the country. Either forgetting or ignorant of the fact, that the infant had been duly baptized, some of his friends brought him to Blessed Elpheus<sup>12</sup> for baptism. But, the latter

Sanctorum Hiberniæ, xix. Martii. Vita S. Lactini, n. i., p. 657.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms iii., Martii xix. De S. Lactino Abbate in Hibernia, pp. 31 to 33.

<sup>3</sup> For an account of Corpre Musc and his brothers, Colgan refers the reader of his work, to the Appendix for his Life of St. Senan (chap. ii. and iii.), at the 8th of March. There he treats, regarding these brothers, their posterity, and saints deriving descent from them. He promised to say more regarding them, in his Appendix to St. Finan's Life, at the 7th of April. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xix. Martii, n. 3, p. 657.

<sup>4</sup> His feast occurs, at the 4th of August.

<sup>5</sup> According to the Annals of the Four Masters, since the aforesaid Conaire, King of Ireland, had been slain in the year of Christ, 165, and in the eighth year of his reign, and, as according to the same authority, St. Lactinus died in the year 622—it would seem probable, that more than six generations intervened, between both of these personages.

<sup>6</sup> According to the old Life, given by the Bollandists.

<sup>7</sup> What renders this supposition still more probable, is the circumstance, that St. Finan of Kinnety was descended from the same Conaire, through ten generations, and he nevertheless flourished in the sixth century, with St. Lactinus. This Colgan promised to show, in his Acts, which were intended for publication, at the 7th of April.

<sup>8</sup> The "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," at cap. 19, thus gives the genealogy of our saint. Two other old MSS., in which genealogies of the principal saints of Ireland are to be found, agree with the foregoing account, as to the name of this saint's father, and as to his being of Corpre Musc's race.

<sup>9</sup> According to the fragmentary Life, published by the Bollandists.

<sup>10</sup> See his "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 19, pp. 331 to 333.

<sup>11</sup> By this name, he is not discoverable, in our Calendars.

<sup>12</sup> He has not been identified, under an corresponding name in our Martyrologies.

<sup>13</sup> The old Life states; "Hoc itaque viro

had a revelation, that this Sacrament had been already received, and he properly refused to reiterate it; while filled with a prophetic spirit, he predicted the future sanctity and merits of the child, who was brought back to his parents. During infancy, Lactinus was miraculously preserved from suffering, although he had taken very unwholesome food; he also healed his mother from a dangerous tumour; nor were his miracles confined to human beings, for he was instrumental in removing a cattle plague, which prevailed in his neighbourhood.

In the fifteenth year of St. Lactinus' age, his Angel Guardian, called Uriel, gave an admonition, that he should proceed to Bangor, where the great abbot, St. Comgall, had just commenced his religious foundation. The fame of this holy man, as an instructor, had spread to distant parts of Ireland, and St. Lactinus was brought by Uriel, who moulded his pious dispositions, to become a disciple. St. Comgall received him, and appointed St. Molua to become his teacher. Under such a guide, the scholar was indefatigable in study,<sup>13</sup> and he became a thorough proficient in a knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures, when he had spent diligently the time, until he attained the thirtieth year of his age.<sup>14</sup> An old Life of St. Molua indicates, that according to a prediction of St. Dagan,<sup>15</sup> the latter prophesied, St. Lactinus was destined to succeed the former, in his well-known seat, at Clonfert Molua.

Lactean thus received his early education, at the School of Bangor, founded by the illustrious St. Comgall;<sup>16</sup> and under the rule of this abbot, he made great proficiency, in virtue and learning.<sup>17</sup> Especially, in a knowledge of Holy Scriptures was he distinguished; so that, at length, it pleased St. Comgall to send him forth with other disciples, to found religious houses, in different parts of Ireland. Among other houses, which he established, our saint founded one, at a place, called Achadh-ur,<sup>18</sup> which lay on the confines of Ossory, and it is supposed to have been identical, with the present Freshford,<sup>19</sup> in Kilkenny County.<sup>20</sup> At this place, a prebend, called Aghour, is docente cœpit psalmos dicere: in psalmis autem legendis talem observabat modum: de primâ quinquagena tres psalmos in nomine Trinitatis unoquoque die legebat. Secundum in tribus diebus finierat, et tertium similiter in tribus diebus consummaverat."

<sup>14</sup> A curious legend is related in his old Life, that when Lactinus arrived at Bangor, St. Comgall had engaged his monks to build a boundary wall around his monastery; but, whatever work they put up during the day was destroyed by troops of infernal spirits at night, and these were seen flying about, as if anxious to secure their former ownership of the place, and to exclude the servants of God from taking possession of it. However, the holy Comgall selected thirty of his monks to keep watch each night, and to sing psalms and spiritual canticles, to repel those evil spirits. One night, with four other holy companions, our saint was placed on watch. All these were united in bonds of the most perfect charity, so that their mutual love and friendship were admired by the other monks. Lactinus was the youngest of the watchers, and he proposed to guard the wall singly, while the others slept. Then, placing his gold cross on the wall, and covering it with a collobium, Lactinus induced his companions to go home with him. The next morning, on making a visit to the wall, it was found upright, and in no manner injured. After the foregoing narrative, the Bollandists add, "Cætera disiderantur," so far as the Manuscript was concerned.

<sup>15</sup> Most probably, St. Dagan of Inbherdaoile, who is venerated, on the 13th of September.

<sup>16</sup> See his Acts, at the 10th of May.

<sup>17</sup> Such is a statement made in the Life of St. Mochaemhog, chap. viii., according to the Martyrology of Donegal.

<sup>18</sup> "He founded a great monastery at Achad-ur, i.e., Green field (not Greenford, as Archdall says), near or at the place where Freshford now stands in the county of Kilkenny."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. v., n. 69, pp. 26, 27.

<sup>19</sup> Harris incorrectly places the monastery of Achad Ur, in the Queen's County. See, Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 264.

<sup>20</sup> The town, townland and parish of Freshford, in the barony of Crannagh, is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kilkenny," Sheets 9, 13.

yet known;<sup>21</sup> and this has probably become a corruption of Achadh-ur, Fresh Field,<sup>22</sup> or Green field,<sup>23</sup> as rendered in St. Mochoemoc's ancient Life. It was so designated, on account of the number of rivulets, which intersected this part of the country. Some curious remains of an old church are to be seen, at this place.<sup>24</sup> A very beautiful and an ancient Irish Romanesque<sup>25</sup> doorway is especially remarkable, for its elaborate mouldings in stone.<sup>26</sup> An Irish inscription on it reveals the name of the founder of this church, but not the period when he flourished. A projecting porch surrounds the doorway, and the west gable has pilasters at the angles. Near the ruins is Tobar Lachtin,<sup>27</sup> or "Lachtain's Well," once regarded as sacred to the saint's memory, but now deserted.<sup>28</sup>

Doorway of Freshford Church, County of Kilkenny.

<sup>21</sup> At Freshford, Archdall says, "This is now a parish church in the diocese of Ossory, and called the prebend of Aghour." See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 351.

<sup>22</sup> "Achadh-Ur, i.e., the Fresh Field, now corruptly called in English Freshford, a small town near Kilkenny, in the county of Kilkenny. — See Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii. p. 26.

<sup>23</sup> The name is explained as follows, in the Life of St. Mochoemoc, or Pulcherius, published by Colgan at 11th of March: "Achadh-ur. i. ager viridis seu mollis propter humiditatem rivulorum qui transcut ibi."

<sup>24</sup> For illustrations of details, and for a more minute architectural and historical notice, the reader is referred to Dr. Petrie's

"Ecclesiastical Architecture, and Round Towers of Ireland," part ii., sect. iii., sub. 2, pp. 285 to 288.

<sup>25</sup> See Miss Stokes' "Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language," vol. ii., pp. 87 to 89.

<sup>26</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, was engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>27</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (g), p. 244.

<sup>28</sup> In the first vol. of Kilkenny Letters, among the Ordnance Survey Office collection of MSS., the following account is taken from a letter written by Mr. O'Donovan, and dated Freshford, September 1st, 1839: "About one quarter of a mile to the south

In the old Life of St. Mochoemoc,<sup>29</sup> we are told, that whilst he lived at Rathen, compassionating the distressed state of his community, our saint brought with him to this place a present, consisting of thirty cows, one bull, two herdsmen and some utensils.<sup>30</sup> Leaving these a short distance from the monastery, which he entered alone; he there asked for some milk to assuage a pretended necessity. The servant told St. Mochoemoc, that St. Lactinus who was infirm, requested some milk. The Abbot Mochoemoc ordered a measure to be brought, which being filled with water, on blessing it, this water immediately became changed into new milk. Having had a manifestation, regarding what had taken place, St. Lactinus received the measure, which again blessing, he converted its contents into the original element, saying to the servant who brought it, "I asked for milk, and not for water." Our saint was hospitably received by the Abbot Mochudda; but he only partook of food, when this latter holy person consented to receive the present, which he brought. When the cattle were driven to the monastery, St. Mochoemoc said, "I did not wish to receive cattle from any person whilst in this place, however through reverence and honour for you, I will receive your gift." St. Lactinus replied, "From this day, there shall always be an abundance of temporal possessions with thy brethren, and a number of religious men in thy city; whence, thou shalt pass away to Christ, but whence thou shalt also be expelled." On departure, these holy men embraced each other, with most tender demonstrations of friendship. Colgan tells us, that Cumineus of Connor,<sup>31</sup> in his work on the special prerogatives and virtues of some amongst the principal Irish saints, indicates St. Lactinus to have been a strenuous defender of the Munster people, during some contests that took place between them and certain princes of Ireland.<sup>32</sup> The same Cumineus says, our saint was a man, who practised frequent vigils, and who mortified his flesh, in a very remarkable degree.<sup>33</sup>

Our saint is related, to have wrought many miracles, and even to have raised the dead to life.<sup>34</sup> Besides, its being said, that he ruled over or erected many monasteries, he is likewise called bishop, in different Martyrologies. Thus, the Carthusian Martyrology,<sup>35</sup> that of Ferrarius,<sup>36</sup> of Canisius,<sup>37</sup> and of of Freshford, on the road-side, to the left as you go to Kilkenny, is a large spring bubbling from the earth with considerable strength and rendered remarkable by a large aged ash tree which grows over it.

* * * * *

About fifty years ago old people were in the habit of performing stations at it on every Saturday, but Dr. Marum, Roman Catholic Bishop of Ossory, abolished all these customs throughout the diocese," p. 188.

<sup>29</sup> Or Carthage, the Patron of Lismore, venerated at the 14th of May.

<sup>30</sup> "Cum triginta vaccis et tauro, et duobus armentariis, et duobus lustiscis et vasis," &c.

<sup>31</sup> See a notice of St. Cumin of Connor, in the Preface. "He flourished about the year 656."—Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., p. 56.

<sup>32</sup> Thus is the matter recorded :—

Canar Lactín leasartaó umaloio, iri iodon, na fearaín tpe bte fíon
no bíod ag uion feara muman,

"Lachtain, the Champion, loved
Humility, perfect and pure,
Stand through perpetual time
Did he in defence of the men of Munster."

—See Rev. Dr. Matthew Kelly's "Calendar of Irish Saints," St. Cuimin of Connor's Characteristic Virtues of the Irish Saints, pp. 168, 169.

<sup>33</sup> "In more, inquit, habuit S. Lactinus strenuus pugil; (quod non fuit exigua carnis castigatio) sine intermissione in vigiliis stare, pro Momoniorum defensione." Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xix. Martii. Vita S. Lactini, cap. viii., p. 657.

<sup>34</sup> See Rev. John Francis Shearman's "Loca Patriciana," No. xii., p. 376. Also, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xix. Martii. Vita S. Lactini, cap. vi., p. 656, and the Acts of St. Senan, at the 8th of March.

<sup>35</sup> It states, at the 19th of March: "In Iiibernia S. Lactini Episcopi & Confessoris."

<sup>36</sup> Ferrarius enters: "In Hibernia S. Lactini Episcopi."

<sup>37</sup> Canisius writes: "S. Lactini Episcopi & Confessoris in Hibernia."

Joannes Kerkested,<sup>38</sup> have distinguished him, by such a dignity; but, whether he held it, at Freshford, or in some other place, is not easily ascertainable. If he were a bishop, Dr. Lanigan believes, that Achadh-ur must have been his See; for, he is always called Lactinus of Achadh-ur.<sup>39</sup> Besides, the monastery of Achadh-ur, another church denominated Belach-abrat,<sup>40</sup> or Belach-Febhrat, seems to have been connected, in some measure, with our saint, as Colgan remarks.

The ruins of Lisloughtin<sup>41</sup> priory are to be seen in northern Kerry. This was founded for Franciscans, or Brothers Minor of the Strict Observance, in 1464, by O'Connor Kerry, according to some writers, or in 1478, as others have stated. The steeple, choir and other parts of this priory stood, in the last century. The parish church, at this place, is said to have been dedicated to an Irish saint, named Laghtin, who died in 622.<sup>42</sup> He must therefore be identical with St. Lactean of Achad Ur, according to Colgan. But, it is urged, that he incorrectly confounded our saint, with the Abbot Lactean, who was a neighbour to St. Senan of Iniscathy, and with a Lacten, who succeeded St. Molua, at Clonfert Molua.<sup>43</sup>

St. Lactinus departed this life, on the 19th day of March,<sup>44</sup> and in the

<sup>38</sup> "Joannes etiam Kerkested in sua compilatione extante in Bibliotheca Vaticana, agens de præcipuis Hiberniæ Episcopis & Abbatibus, non solum Episcopum, sed mortuorum suscitatore facit: S. Lactenus Monachus & Episcopus Hiberniæ mortuum resuscitavit."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xix. Martii. Vita S. Lactini, cap. vii., pp. 656, 657.

<sup>39</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. v., n. 69, p. 27.

<sup>40</sup> The church, here called Belach-abrat, by Colgan, in his Acts of our saint (cap. ix., p. 657), is named Belach-febhrat, in our Martyrologies. Speaking of this Bealach-Feabhradh church, Mr. O'Donovan remarks, that "it is probably the place now called Ballagharay, or Ballaghawry, a townland situated in the west of the parish of Kilbolane, barony of Orbhraighe, or Orrery, and county of Cork."—"Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (g), p. 245.

<sup>41</sup> This townland, situated in the parish of Aghavallen, and barony of Iraghticonnor, is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kerry," Sheets 2, 3, 6.

<sup>42</sup> See Smith's "Natural and Civil History of Kerry," chap. viii., p. 227.

<sup>43</sup> "But this Lactean cannot be supposed to have lived down to 623. He was a different person, and was, I am sure, the Lactean or Lactin, from whom the church of Lis-lachtin in Kerry, not far from Iniscathy, got its name. Colgan has also confounded him with Lacten, who succeeded St. Molua at Clonfert Molua. For this he had no authority, except the mere similarity of name. There were Lactens or Lactans enough to succeed Molua without removing the one of Achadh-ur to Clonfert Molua, of which no mention occurs in the Calendars, where treating of him,"—Dr. Lanigan's "Eccle- siastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. v., n. 69, p. 27. Although Dr. Lanigan's opinion is very probable, that our saint was a different person from the Lactean, mentioned in St. Senan's Life; yet, as the latter saint lived to at least the year 580, according to Colgan, and to about the year 560, according to Dr. Lanigan himself, we might well suppose it possible, that Lactean could have survived his friend St. Senan, for a term of forty-two or even for a term of sixty-two years. The circumstance of Lactean being called abbot in St. Senan's Acts could not furnish a solid objection; for, such title may be supposed, as having reference to some future period of his life—this mode of speaking about a certain person being common enough, amongst our writers of the Lives of Irish saints. It might be even possible, that a Lactean, who survived to 622, could have been an abbot during St. Senan's lifetime; although, in this case, such a person must have attained a very advanced age. However, I entirely agree in opinion with Dr. Lanigan, that our saint was altogether different from the St. Lactean, mentioned in St. Senan's Acts; and that this latter Lactean was the saint after whom Lis-lachtin church, in the diocese of Ardfer, had been named. For further particulars, see the Life of St. Senan, at the 8th of March.

<sup>44</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal, as edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, on this day records the name of Lachtain, of Achadh-ur in Osraighe, and of Bealach Feabhrat. He descended from the race of Conaire, son to Moghlamba, Monarch of Erin, who belonged to the seed of Heremon. His name is Latinized, Lactantius, and he is called the successor of Molua, in the table appended to the Donegal Martyrology. See at pp. 80, 81, and, likewise, pp. 430, 431.

<sup>45</sup> At this year, we read in O'Donovan's year 622,<sup>45</sup> according to our Irish Annalists, and Martyrologists. Thus, St. Ængus the Culdee,<sup>46</sup> the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>47</sup> the Calendar of Cashel,<sup>48</sup> the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman<sup>49</sup> and of Maguire,<sup>50</sup> as also that of the O'Clerys,<sup>51</sup> refer his feast to this date; while, the Martyrologies of the Carthusians, of Canisius, of Ferrarius, of Florarius, of Father Henry Fitzsimon,<sup>52</sup> and of Herman Greuen,<sup>53</sup> accord. A notice of this saint is in Bishop Forbes' work.<sup>54</sup> Not only during his life, but even after the death of St. Lactean, miracles were wrought through his intercession. Especially, at a place, called Liosnascaith—now identical with Lisnaskea—in the diocese of Cashel, this was noticeable. Here, many infirm persons were cured from various diseases, at a well, which had been consecrated to his memory. Colgan tells us, he had accounts of these miracles, and of other supernatural incidents, from the lips of persons, who had experienced the efficacy of our saint's intercession. As the special patron of this place, St. Lactinus was often invoked on behalf of paralytics, and of possessed persons, while his merits were found effectual, against incantations and diabolical agency.<sup>55</sup>

ARTICLE II.—THE FEAST OF ST. JOSEPH, CONFESSOR, THE FOSTERER OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST. Such is the title given to the chaste spouse of the Blessed Virgin Mary, in the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, at this date, which it seems was his festival day in the early Irish Church, as it is yet throughout Christendom. The Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> various other hagiologists, and the ancient Fathers, treat largely and learnedly, regarding his race, vocation, and religious culture.

ARTICLE III.—THE FEAST OF ST. GREGORY. The "Feilire" of St. Ængus has this festival entered, at the 19th of March; and, the Bollandists

"Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., and n. (g), pp. 244, 245: "St. Lachtnain, son of Torben, Abbot of Achadh-Ur, died on the 10th [recte 19th] of March." It would appear, that Colgan's copy of the Four Masters had the 19th of March, the correct day. Thus he writes, "S. Lactanius Iliu's Torbeni, Abbas de Achadh ur obiit die 19. Martii."

<sup>46</sup> The following stanza, for this day, from the "Feilire," in the "Leabhar Breac" copy, with the English translation, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

A. xiiii. kl. molachtoc la gregur in gnao gneit ar vixu toipet ainn ip uairleu aioiu alaino i pu.

"Molachtoc, with Gregory
The beloved hero who is most illustrious,
Joseph a name yet more noble
The beautiful fosterer of Jesus."

The Molachtoc alluded to has been identified, in an accompanying comment, as St. Lactin of Achadh ur.

<sup>47</sup> The Martyrology of Tallagh, edited by Dr. Kelly, p. xix., enters "Lactain Achaidh Uir." The Franciscan copy has lactanur de achadh-uir.

<sup>48</sup> The Calendar of Cashel writes, "Lactocus, alias Lactinus de Achadh ur."

<sup>49</sup> Marianus O'Gorman has "S. Lactanus de in Achadur in Ossoria, et de Belach-febhrat."

<sup>50</sup> Maguire notices him as Lactanus de Achadhur in Ossoria.

<sup>51</sup> The following notice of him is given in O'Clery's Calendar: "Lactain, mac Toirbén, abb achadh úir, in-Orraighib, agus ó dheolach feabhrae anno Domini, 622." "Lactain, son of Torben, abbot of Achadh Ur, in Ossory, and of Bealach Feabhraeth, A.D. 622."

<sup>52</sup> In his list of Irish saints. See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," toms i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 55.

<sup>53</sup> In his Manuscript Martyrology.
<sup>54</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 377, and we find, in the Calendar of Drummond, at the 19th of March, or xiv. Kal.: In Hibernia, the Holy Confessors Lactin and Auxille, Disciples of St. Patrick, Apostle and Bishop of the Scots, went to Christ the same day. See pp. 7, 8, ibid.

<sup>55</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xix. Martii. Vita S. Lactini, cap. ix., and n. 9, p. 657.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms iii., Martii xix. De Sancto Josepho

notice the Ordination of St. Gregory, as occurring in the Martyrology of Tallagh, at the same date.<sup>1</sup> They are in doubt, however, respecting the particular saint of the name, to whom reference is made. The Ordination of Gregory the Great is inscribed, in the Roman Martyrology, at the 3rd of September, and his chief feast occurs on the 12th of March.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. MELLA, CLUANA HI, OR OF CLUAIN-HI. On the 19th of March, we find on record, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> Mella Cluana hi. The Bollandists observe,<sup>2</sup> in noting this record, that Colgan, in the Acts of St. Meldan, or Mellan, has mentioned a place called Cluain-aoi, about which they are ignorant. The name Meallai, of Cluain-hi, likewise occurs, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> as having a festival at this date. This place is probably identical with a townland, called Clooney,<sup>4</sup> in the parish of Clondermot,<sup>5</sup> and not far from the city of Londonderry. Here, likewise, are the ruins of an old church. Several similar denominations are to be found in Ireland. There is also Clonee,<sup>6</sup> a post-town in the parish and barony of Dunboyne, about seven miles from Dublin, but in the county of Meath, as also one in the parish of Trim, and in the barony of Lower Moyferath.<sup>7</sup> There is an old church at Clone,<sup>8</sup> near Ferns, in the barony of Scarawalsh,<sup>9</sup> in the county of Wexford. Various other places have denominations corresponding with the preceding, in the different counties of Ireland.

ARTICLE V.—ST. MOCHUA, OF ARASNAI, OR AIRISNA. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> enters Mochua Arasnai, at the 19th day of March. The Bollandists merely note his name, place and festival, thus, Mochua de Airis-nai. The time when he lived does not appear to have been discovered. The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>3</sup> mentions Mochua, of Airisna, as having been venerated, on this day. Under the denomination, it will be found difficult to identify his locality.

ARTICLE VI.—FEAST OF ST. AUXILIUS, BISHOP OF KILOSSEY, COUNTY OF KILDARE. [Fifth Century.] There are memoirs of this holy bishop, in Colgan's work,<sup>1</sup> at this day. It was dedicated to the memory of St. Auxilius, Bishop of Kilossey, as we are informed. His Life will be found, at the 27th sponso Deiparæ Virginis, sect. i. to xiii., pp. 4 to 25.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xix. Prætermissi et in alios dies reiecti, p. 2.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has mella de Cluain hi.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81. An inaccurate statement occurs in the table, appended to this Martyrology, viz.: that this saint has not been noticed at the 19th of March, in the body of the work. See ibid., pp. 444, 445.

<sup>4</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Londonderry," Sheet 20.

<sup>5</sup> In the barony of Tirkeeran. It is described on Sheets 13, 14, 20, 21, 22. Ibid.

<sup>6</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 50, 51, 53.

<sup>7</sup> See ibid., Sheet 41.

<sup>8</sup> Of this church and its details, there are drawings in George V. Du Noyer's Sketches, preserved in the Royal Irish Academy. See vol. vii., Nos. 48, 49, 50, 51.

<sup>9</sup> It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wexford," Sheets 15, 20.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy enters mochua de arisnai.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 3.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xix. Martii. Vita S. Auxilii, cap. vii., and n. 6, 7, pp. 657, 658, 659.

of August, and, he is classed, among the disciples of St. Patrick.<sup>2</sup> The present holy man is said to have been stationed, near the River Liffey, and at the place now known as Killashee, near the town of Naas,<sup>3</sup> in the county of Kildare. In the cemetery, at this place, may be seen the Protestant church, which has been formed from a mediæval erection, having a curious square tower, at one end, and this is surmounted by a stunted Round Tower. The arrangement of the building is in a debased style of masonry; yet, there are interesting features there, for the antiquary's study.<sup>4</sup> Our saint lived, in the early Apostolic times of our Irish Church, and the Bollandists notice him, as an assistant, at some one of St. Patrick's Synods.<sup>5</sup> The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>6</sup> enters Auxilinus, at the 19th of March.

Killashee Church and Round Tower, County of Kildare.

ARTICLE VII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. GERO, COLOGNE, GERMANY. [Tenth Century.] According to Dempster,<sup>1</sup> St. Gero—if not a Scot—was abbot over the Scottish Monastery of St. Pantaleon,<sup>2</sup> at Cologne. But, it

<sup>2</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Particii, cap. xxiii., p. 265.

<sup>3</sup> "Within a mile of Naas, in 454, Saint Patrick founded an abbey for his nephew St. Auxil, who gave it his name, Kill auxaile; it is now called Killishee, a parish church in the diocese of Kildare."—Rawson's "Statistical Survey of the County of Kildare." Introduction, p. vi.

<sup>4</sup> The accompanying illustration is from an original sketch of the late George Petrie, LL.D., copied on the wood, by his pupil, William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 3.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by the Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has auxilius.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tom. i., lib. vii., num. 581, p. 312.

<sup>2</sup> Dempster pretends, that this was a foundation, made in favour of his nation, by Wilhelmus, brother to Achaius, King of Scotwas altogether an Irish foundation. This holy man is said to have flourished, A.D. 990, while his prudence and continence were greatly esteemed. He is said to have repaired the monastery, and to have adorned the church there, as also, to have elegantly ornamented the claustrum.<sup>3</sup> He was venerated on the 19th of March. At this date, the Bollandists take no notice of his festival. The writings of this holy man have perished, if we are to credit Dempster; although, it is not to be assumed, that all his distinguished men have been writers, as he so readily supposes.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FEAST OF ST. MANSUET, A BISHOP OF THE BRITONS. [Fifth Century.] Great uncertainty prevails, regarding this holy man, who is inscribed in the Scottish Menology of Thomas Dempster,<sup>1</sup> although omitted from his Ecclesiastical History of the Nation of the Scots. Afterwards, he is entered in the Catalogue of Ferrarius. If we are to believe the former writer, he was a Scotchman, and a bishop in Argadia.<sup>2</sup> This is noticed by the Bollandists, at the 19th of March,<sup>3</sup> although they are unable to fix his feast, at this date. There is an account of “Mansuetus Episcopus Britannorum,” who subscribed to the Council of Tours, held A.D. 461. To this, he seems to have been invited, while an exile in France, from the See and country to which he originally belonged, and while the Anglo-Saxons were engaged in devastating, especially the maritime parts of Britain. Adson, or Ason,<sup>4</sup> Abbot of Montier-en-Der, undertook to write<sup>5</sup> the Life of St. Mansuetus, first Bishop of Toul, who was then thought to have been a disciple of the Apostle St. Peter, but who, in reality, only flourished in the fourth century. This work was in two parts: the first part contained the traditional Life of St. Mansui, and the second was a relation of his miracles. But, the foregoing part is not reconcilable with the facts of history; while many of the subsequent miracles seem to be well authenticated. The 3rd of September seems to be the day assigned for his festival. We have merely recorded his name, at the 20th of March, as there may be a possibility of Mansuetus, or Maunsy, having been of Irish birth.

Twentieth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. CUTHBERT, BISHOP OF LINDISFARNE.

[SEVENTH CENTURY.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—VENERABLE BEDE'S LIFE OF ST. CUTHBERT—OTHER AUTHORITIES AND ACTS RELATING TO THIS HOLY MAN—QUESTION ABOUT THE COUNTRY OF HIS BIRTH—TRADITIONS REGARDING THE IRISH LOCALITY FOR HIS NATIVITY, ORIGIN AND FAMILY.

ENGLAND, Scotland, and Ireland contend, and with some appearance of reason, in certain deductions drawn by various writers, for the land, after a successful expedition against the Lombards, which Charlemagne conducted.

<sup>3</sup> For the statement, in the text, Dempster quotes the Acts of Cologne.

ARTICLE VIII.—He states: “In Argadia Mansueti episcopi, qui rem Christianam, Concilio I. Turonensi in Gallia promovit, socius sanctorum Perpetui Turonensis, Guy-axi Rhotomagensis, Thalassii Andegauensis, Victirii Cenomanensis, B. Theodori Archiepiscopi.” — “Menologium Scoticum.” Bishop Forbes’ “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 195.

<sup>2</sup> Now Argyle, in Scotland.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii.,

honour of St. Cuthbert's nativity; but, the weight of evidence tends to establish the probable conclusion, that he was born in our own island. Many modern writers have expended much learning and ingenuity, on developing or in elucidating the incidents of this illustrious man's career. According to a statement of the Comte de Montalembert, nothing is known with certainty, regarding the place of his birth, or the rank of his family.<sup>1</sup> As the great and learned Father of English Ecclesiastical History was the first known authority, in relating the incidents of St. Cuthbert's life, and as Venerable Bede does not tell us the country of his nativity, so many writers of his Acts are silent on this subject. Among these authors, we find Bishop Challenor,<sup>2</sup> who has a notice of this holy man.

Several Manuscript copies of St. Cuthbert's Life, by the Venerable Bede, have been preserved, in various public libraries. Some of these refer to the Prose<sup>3</sup> and others to a Metrical Life,<sup>4</sup> by the same author. The last-mentioned, however, is thought to have been the first composed; indeed, this is almost certain, from the reference which is made by him to a panegyric, in metre, of the holy Cuthbert. The preface, and the Life of our saint, by Bede, are dedicated to the most holy Father Edfrid, Bishop of Lindisfarne, who died about A.D. 724, according to William of Malmesbury, and Hapsfeld, as also, to the whole congregation of brethren, who served God in that island. It appears to have been written, at their request; and materials for this Life were obtained, from most reliable authorities, and through careful inquiries, diligently prosecuted. Having digested his work, the venerable author declares, he frequently submitted what had been written, to his most Martii xix. Among the pretermitted saints, pp. 2, 3.

<sup>4</sup> He was born, about the beginning of the tenth century, and he died A.D. 992, at sea, on his way to the Holy Land. See an account of him and of his writings, in the "Histoire Littéraire de la France," tome vi., pp. 471 to 492.

<sup>5</sup> This was done, at the request of St. Gerard, Bishop of Toul, from A.D. 963 to 994.

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>1</sup> See "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., p. 392.

<sup>2</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 183.

<sup>3</sup> The following are classifications of Manuscript copies of Ven. Bede's Life of St. Cuthbert, with an account of the Libraries, where they are to be found: MS. Bodl. 596 (2376) ff. 175 b.-206 b., vell., small folio, xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Laud. 491 (1093) ff. 1-66., vell. 4to., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Digby. 175. ff. 1-23., vell., small folio., xi. cent. MS. Bodl. Digby. 20. ff. 190-223 b., vell. 8vo., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Digby. 59. ff. 1-86 b., vell. 8vo., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Fell. i. ff. 57-76 b., vell. folio., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Fairfax. 6 (3886) ff. 13 b.-29 b., vell. folio, dble. cols. xiv. cent. MS. Bodl. 109 (1962) ff. 27 b.-77., vell. 8vo., xi. cent. MS. Coll. Univers. Oxon. 165. ff. 1-170., vell. small 4to., xii. cent. MS. Trin. Coll. Cant. Gale. O. I. 64. MS. Trin. Coll. Cant. Gale. O. 3. 55. f. 4. vell., large 8vo., xii. or xiii. cent. MS. C.C.C. Cant. 183., vell. 4to. MS. Cott. Claud. A.

i. ff. 123 b.-153., vell. 4to., xi. cent. MS. Cott. Vitell. A. xix. ff. 1-84., vell., small 4to., x. cent. MS. Cott. Otho. D. viii. ff. 148-168 b., vell., small folio., xii. cent. MS. Arundel. Brit. Mus. 222 ff. 1-34 b., vell. 4to., xii. cent. MS. Arundel. Brit. Mus. 332. ff. 74-101 b., vell., long 8vo., xiii. cent. MS. Harl. 1924. ff. 1-48., vell., small 4to., xii. cent. MS. Harl. 1117. ff. 2-40 b., vell., 4to., x. cent. MS. Bibl. du Roi. 5362. I. olim Bigot., vell., xii. cent. MS. Bibl. du Roi. 2475. 7. olim Colbert., vell., xiii. cent. MS. Bibl. du Roi. 5348. 5. olim Colbert., vell., xiii. cent. MS. Vatican. de la Reine de Suède. 1285. MS. Bern. MS. Gale. See App. Fædera. p. 45. MS. Bibl. Ducat. Guelf., vell., 8vo., xi. cent.

<sup>4</sup> The following are copies of his Metrical Life: MS. Harl. 526. ff. 1-27., vell., small 4to., ix. cent. MS. Harl. 1117. ff. 45-62 b., vell., 4to., x. cent. MS. Harl. 4843. ff. 7-13 b. paper, folio., xvi. cent. MS. Bodl. 596 (2376) ff. 201-202 b., vell., small folio., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. 109 (1962) ff. 1-27., vell., 8vo., xi. cent. MS. Bodl. Digby. 175. ff. 25-39 b., vell., small folio., xi. cent. MS. Bodl. Laud. 55. MS. Cott. Vitell. A. xix. ff. 88 b.-114., vell., small 4to., x. cent. MS. Bodl. Fairfax. b (3886) ff. 8-12 b., vell., folio, dble. cols. xiv. cent. MS. Trin. Coll. Cant. Gale. O. iii. 55. f. 3., vell., 8vo., xii. or xiii. cent. MS. Bibl. du Roi. 2825. 3. olim Colbert. vell. MS. Regin. Christin. Vatican., 1531. MS. St. Gall. 263., vell., x. cent.

<sup>5</sup> Sharon Turner says: "Our Venerable

reverend brother Herefrid, a priest, and to others, who lived for a long time with St. Cuthbert, and who had a perfect knowledge of his actions. Many things were emended, and so truthful was this narrative considered, that when, afterwards, it had been read on two different days, before seniors and doctors of the Lindisfarne community, it was not thought necessary to make further alterations. After a matured revision, this Life, as it stood, was declared fit for promulgation, and for the use of those, who through a religious motive chose to transcribe it. For his labours in composing this life, having in view the edification of his monastic brethren, Bede commends himself to their prayers, whilst living. At the same time, he besought them, when he was dead, to offer up the Holy Sacrifice of Mass, to obtain repose for his soul. Towards the close of its preface, he says, that at the request of some religious brethren, he had already celebrated our saint's memory, in heroic verse, with greater brevity,<sup>5</sup> yet, according to the order of narrative followed, in his prose Life. In that work, he had promised, also, to enlarge on the life and miracles of Cuthbert. This promise he fully redeemed, in the prose Life, which contains no less than forty-six chapters.

A Tract intitled, Deposito S. Cuthberhti Episcopi,<sup>6</sup> follows very closely Bede's narrative, compressing and generalizing the details. It is written, in the Saxon tongue; while, it exhibits undoubted evidence of having been originally a metrical production, and, it might, for the most part, be restored to its former alliteration. Many copies of a Tract, "De S. Cuthberto," are to be found,<sup>7</sup> but these are merely excerpts, from Ven. Bede's Ecclesiastical History. We have preserved, Brevis Relatio de Sancto Cuthberto, et quomodo corpus ejus Dunelmum venerat, et excerpta de Vita et Miraculis ejusdem Sancti.<sup>8</sup> There are two prayers to St. Cuthbert, in this Tract. A Saxon Life of St. Cuthbert has been written:<sup>9</sup> it is a very brief one, and it appears to have been taken, chiefly from Ven. Bede's Life.<sup>10</sup> A "Complementum Vita Sancti Cuthberti Lindisfarnensis Episcopi,"<sup>11</sup> has been printed, in the Bollandist Collection.<sup>12</sup> There are extant metrical Lives of St. Cuthbert, in Bede attempted Latin poetry, but the Muses did not smile upon his efforts. His compositions consist of some hymns, some elegiac poetry, and the Life of St. Cuthbert in hexameter verse."—"History of the Anglo-Saxons," vol. ii., book xii., chap. iii., p. 347.

<sup>6</sup> The copies of it extant are classed MS. Bodl. 340 (2404) ff. 58 b.-66 b.; MS. C.C.C. Cant. 198 (olim S. 8.) ff. 81-90. vell., small folio; MS. Bib. Pub. Cant., vell., folio, xi. cent. This formerly belonged to the Library of Salisbury, and it was given, by Bishop Jewel, to Archbishop Parker, in 1568.

<sup>7</sup> The following copies of this Tract are to be met with: MS. Bibl. Digby. 175. ff. 23-24 b., vell., small folio, xi. cent. MS. Bodl. Laud. 491 (1093), vell. 4to., xii. cent. MS. Harl. 1117. ff. 40 b.-42., vell. 4to., x. cent. MS. Cott. Vitell. A. xix. ff. 85-88., vell., small 4to., x. cent. MS. Bodl. Fairfax. 6 (3886), f. 29 b., vell. f., dble. cols., xiv. cent. MS. Coll. Univers. Oxon. 165., vell., small 4to., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Fell. I. f. 76 b., vell., folio, xi. cent. MS. Bodl. Digby. 59. f. 45 b., vell. 8vo., xii. cent. MS. Cott. Claud. A. i. ff. 153 b.-154., vell. 4to., x. cent.

MS. Cott. Nero. A. ii. f. 45., vell., 12mo., xii. cent. MS. Arundel. Brit. Mus. 332. ff. 101 b.-102 b., vell., large 8vo., xii. cent. MS. Arundel. Brit. Mus. 222. ff. 34 b.-35 b., vell. 4to., xii. cent.

<sup>8</sup> The following copies of this Tract are extant: MS. Cott. Nero. A. ii. ff. 85-107 b., vell., 12mo., xii. cent. MS. Cott. Titus. A. ii. f. 158., vell. 4to., xv. cent. MS. Trin. Coll. Gale. O. iii. 55. MS. Bodl. Laud. Misc. 491 (1093) ff. 117 b.-144., vell. 4to., xii. cent. MS. Sloane. 1772. f. i., vell. 4to., xii. cent.

<sup>9</sup> The following are Manuscript copies: MS. C.C.C. Cant. 196 (formerly D. 5.), vell. 8vo., xi. cent. MS. Cott. Julius. A. x. 2., vell. 8vo., xi. cent.

<sup>10</sup> Especially that portion of it, where St. Cuthbert turns water into wine, at chap. xxxv.

<sup>11</sup> There is a copy in MS., in the National Library at Paris, and classed, 3088. 13. (olim Colbert. 3019.)

<sup>12</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xx., p. 129, sect. 7. This was derived from a MS. Longp., sent by Nicholas Belfort, a Canon Regular of St. John of Soissons, to supply a hiatus in the Antwerp

English,<sup>13</sup> and in Latin.<sup>14</sup> There is a Vita S. Cuthberti, Lindisfarnensis Episcopi.<sup>15</sup> There is a Historia de Sancto Cuthberto,<sup>16</sup> and it contains, also, an account of the possessions of Durham, from the earliest times.<sup>17</sup> This is printed, by Sir Roger Twysden.<sup>18</sup> The last paragraph is in Anglo-Saxon. A monk of Durham, who flourished, towards the close of the eleventh century, but whose name is not known, has left us a Treatise, having special reference to the various removals of the saint's relics, until their translation into the new church at Durham, A.D. 1104, and bearing the title: Liber de Translationibus et Miraculis S. Cuthberti, Episcopi Lindisfarnensis.<sup>19</sup> This is printed, in Mabillon's work, "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis St. Benedicti,"<sup>20</sup> and also by the Bollandists.<sup>21</sup> Again, Reginald, a monk of Durham, has left a Tract,<sup>22</sup> written after 1172, at the request of St. Ælred, Abbot of Rivaux. It is sometimes intitled: "Libellus de admirandis Beati Cuthberti virtutibus quæ novellis patratae sunt temporibus."<sup>23</sup> Again, we find its title to be sometimes, "De Virtutibus et Miraculis gloriosi Pontificis Cuthberti Liber,"<sup>24</sup> and, it is said, many things in it are taken from Roger Hoveden, from Simeon of Durham, from the Lives and Miracles of St. Cuthbert, and from William of Malmsbury.<sup>25</sup> Again, we find it called, "De Virtutibus S. Cuthberti, ad Priorem et Conventum Dunelm,"<sup>26</sup> as, also, "Libellus de Miraculis S. Cuthberti Secundum Reginaldum de Coldingham."<sup>27</sup> The latter copy of the History of the Translation of St. Cuthbert's Relics.

<sup>13</sup> The following copies are extant, and classed, MS. Cott. Jul. D. ix. ff. 45-46 b., vell. 8vo., xv. cent. MS. Addit. 10301. ff. 96-99., vell., small folio., xiv. cent. MS. Bodl. 779. f. 134., paper, small folio., xiv. cent. MS. Bodl. Tanner. 17. ff. 42 b.-43., vell., small folio., xv. cent. In this MS., there is a well-executed figure of St. Cuthbert, in his episcopal robes, with the head of St. Oswald in the right hand, and his crown in the left. MS. C.C.C. Cant. 145., vell., small folio., xiv. cent. MS. Coll. Trin. Oxon. 57. 2., vell. folio., xiv. cent. MS. Bodl. Laud. Misc. 108 (1486) ff. 154 b.-155 b., vell. folio., xiv. cent. MS. Bodl. Laud. Misc. 463 (1596) ff. 23-23 b., vell. folio., xv. cent. These copies state, that St. Cuthbert was born in Ingelond.

<sup>14</sup> There is a Vita S. Cuthberti, versibus rhythmicis, in a MS. of Lincoln's Inn Library, classed 104. ff. 134-151., vell. 4to., xv. cent. There is Vita S. Cuthberti, metrically written, and a copy of it is classed, MS. Coll. Univers. Oxon. 165., vell., small 4to. It appears to belong to the end of the twelfth, or to the beginning of the thirteenth century. This follows Bede's account very closely, and it is printed, in the "Miscellanea Biographica" of the Surtees Society, at p. 91.

<sup>15</sup> Copies are MS. Bibl. de l'Ecole de Médecine de Montpellier, I., vell. folio., xii. cent. Also, a MS. Cenob. Cambronensis in Hannonia.

<sup>16</sup> The following copies of it are preserved: they are classed, MS. Bibl. Pub. Cant. Ff. I. 27. pp. 195-202., vell. folio., xii. cent.; also, MS. Lincoln's Inn. 114. 4. f. 163., paper, xv. cent.

<sup>17</sup> It closely resembles the text of Simeon of Durham, and the Translationes Beati Cuthberti, in Mabillon's "Acta Sanctorum Ord. S. Benedicti," tomus vi., p. 310.

<sup>18</sup> See "Decem Scriptores," vol. i. pp. 67 to 76.

<sup>19</sup> The following Manuscript copies of this Tract are extant: MS. Bodl. 514 (2184.) Ff. 88-89., vell. 4to., dble. cols., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Laud. 491 (1093.) Ff. 66-117., vell. 4to., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Digby. 59. Ff. 69 b.-86 b., vell. 8vo., xii. cent. MS. Bodl. Fairfax. 6 (3886), vell. folio., dble. cols., xiv. cent. MS. Harl. 1924. ff. 49-70., vell., small 4to., xii. cent. MS. Trin. Coll. Cant. Gale. O. 3. 55. MS. Cott. Titus A. ii. f. 127., vell. 4to., xv. cent. MS. Cott. Nero. A. ii. ff. 46-58., vell., 12mo., xii. cent. MS. Arundel. Brit. Mus. 332. ff. 102 b.-118., vell., long 8vo., xiii. cent.

<sup>20</sup> See Sec. iv., pars. 2, p. 291.

<sup>21</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xx., p. 127. Stevenson has printed the latter text, as an Appendix to Ven. Bede's Minor Works, at p. 285.

<sup>22</sup> In 1835, it was first published, by the Surtees Society, in 8vo.

<sup>23</sup> There is a MS. copy of it classed, in the Harleian Collection, as 4843. ff. 66-153 b., paper folio., xvi. cent.

<sup>24</sup> A MS. copy is in the Cottonian Library, and it is classed, Claud. D. iv. ff. 88-113., vell. folio., xv. cent. It is preceded, by Reginald's Preface to St. Cuthbert's miracles.

<sup>25</sup> These authorities are regularly quoted, as also Reginald of Durham. This copy seems to have been compiled, about A.D. 1400.

<sup>26</sup> There is a MS. copy, at Durham—Dec. et Cap. Dunelm., xii. cent. This is tract seems to have been addressed to the Prior and Convent at Durham;<sup>28</sup> while, it contains very curious anecdotes, setting forth the religious and social state of England, during the twelfth century.<sup>29</sup> There is a Manuscript Vita S. Cuthberti,<sup>30</sup> supposed to be the production of the Durham Scriptorium. It is attributed to the Monk Reginald of the same place. Nor have we any reason for believing, that the foregoing enumeration exhausts the Manuscript Memoirs, relative to our saint.

The great celebrity of Blessed Cuthbert is evidenced, from the various accounts of his life and actions, contained in the chief hagiographical collections. Thus, we have ninety-five chapters, in the Life, written by John Capgrave.<sup>31</sup> All of these are remarkably brief, however, and several are abridged, from Bede's work. But Capgrave inserts many of our saint's acts, which are altogether omitted, by the venerable father of English ecclesiastical history. Again, the Acts of our saint will be found, in Lippeloo's early collection.<sup>32</sup> The Bollandists have published Acts of St. Cuthbert, with a previous commentary, in three sections and fifteen paragraphs. Various other documents follow, chiefly from the writings of Venerable Bede, with a history of the translation of St. Cuthbert's relics.<sup>33</sup> The Acts of St. Cuthbert have been published, by Surius, in forty-six paragraphs, at the 20th of March.<sup>34</sup> In the Cistercian Acts,<sup>35</sup> in Bishop Tanner,<sup>36</sup> who makes him the son of an Irish king, in the Benedictine Lives of the Saints;<sup>37</sup> by the Bene-thought to have been the author's autograph. This Tract is divided into chapters, each containing a separate miracle.

<sup>27</sup> This was a cell to Durham, and there probably the writer lived, although nothing is known of his personal history. The present MS. copy belongs to the earlier part of the thirteenth century, and it is preserved at York, classed, Decan et Capet. Ebor. xvi. I. 2., fol. 16., xiii. cent.

<sup>28</sup> The text, though in general correct, is deficient at the beginning and at the end. It omits the Epistle of the author to Ailred, and it commences with the Preface "Sæpius multo," &c. It concludes with cap. xcv. "Possibly," says Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy, "it may represent the text in an earlier state than that which occurs in the other MSS."

<sup>29</sup> Of it, the Comte de Montalembert writes: "Au milieu d'un déluge de légendes plus ou moins fabuleuses, on trouve une foule de détails aussi originaux qu'authentiques sur les mœurs et les institutions du temps. A côté de grands exemples de sainteté et surtout d'une étude très-habituelle de l'Ecriture Sainte, on y voit, dans la société religieuse et laïque, des scandales et des excès de tyrannie que nul ne supporterait aujourd'hui dans l'Europe occidentale, et qui ne se retrouvent que sous l'empire des czars."—"Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., n. 1, p. 439.

<sup>30</sup> This is classed in the Bodleian Library as Fairfax. 6 (3886) ff. 43 b.-135., vell. folio, dble. cols., xiv. cent. The beginning has rubricated "Incipit Epistola Reginaldi, Dunelmensis Monachi, ad Dominum Ethel-redum Abbatem Ecclesiæ Rievallensis, directa." This MS. differs from the York MS., in the numeration of its chapters.

<sup>31</sup> Capgrave's "Nova Legenda Angliæ" records St. Cuthbert, Bishop and Confessor, at fol. lxi., lxx., lxxi., lxxii., lxxiii., lxxiv., lxxv., lxxvi., lxxvii., lxxviii., lxxix., Tertio-decimo Kal. Aprilis.

<sup>32</sup> In Lippeloo's "Vitæ Sanctorum," vol. i., we find St. Cuthbert, Bishop, at the 20th of March, pp. 1007 to 1023.

<sup>33</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," xx. Martii, toms iii., pp. 93 to 143.

<sup>34</sup> See "De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis," vol. ii., xx. Martii, pp. 214 to 228.

<sup>35</sup> At March the 20th, the name of St. Cuthbert, Confessor, Bishop of Lindisfarne, is found entered, in the Irish Lives of the Saints, by the Cistercian Monk, pp. 371, 373.

<sup>36</sup> See "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica," p. 214.

<sup>37</sup> The second volume of the "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti" contains the Life of St. Cuthbert, Bishop of Lindisfarne, with previous observations, in five paragraphs, and a preface in two paragraphs; the prose Life by the Venerable Bede, in forty-six chapters, and sixty-seven paragraphs, and a metrical Life, by the same author, in forty-six divisions. Sæc. ii., pp. 887 to 937. In the sixth volume of the "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," from the year of Christ 800 to 900 (Saculum iv. Pars Secunda) I find Acts, referring to St. Cuthbert, and to other Irish saints, in the Book of the translations and miracles of St. Cuthbert, by an anonymous author, and in the Carmen Ethelwoldi Modictine Father Serenus Cressy,<sup>38</sup> by Bishop Challenor,<sup>39</sup> by Adrien Baillet,<sup>40</sup> by the Rev. Alban Butler;<sup>41</sup> our saint is especially commemorated. A Life of St. Cuthbert, in black letter, and taken from an ancient Manuscript, in the possession of G. Allan, was published in 1816,<sup>42</sup> at Durham, by Sir Cuthbert Sharpe.<sup>43</sup> A small 4to volume, intituled, "Legend of St. Cuthbert, with the Antiquities of the Church of Durham," appeared at Sutherland, A.D. 1816. Among other valuable accounts must be especially noticed a work, long since published, by the learned Catholic Archbishop of Glasgow. It is known as Monseignor Eyre's "History of St. Cuthbert, with an account of the Wanderings with his Body during 124 years, of the State of his Body until 1542, and of the various Monuments erected to his Memory." This learned and valuable Memoir was published in London, 1849. It contains Maps and Plans of a very useful character; it also gives an interesting History of Lindisfarne and of Durham Cathedral. The Comte de Montalembert,<sup>44</sup> the Rev. S. Baring-Gould,<sup>45</sup> and Bishop Forbes, in his work,<sup>46</sup> have their several accounts of the illustrious Northumbrian Bishop and Abbot.

Besides these writers, whom we have previously recapitulated, St. Ængus the Culdee, or a writer in the Martyrology of Tallagh, mentions the subject of this biography, at the 20th of March, as the Saxon Cuthbert of Inis-menoc, by which name Lindisfarne Island is designated. By the Britons, it was called Inis medicante, according to Camden.<sup>47</sup> Now, Ængus is known, chiefly to have inserted amongst those holy men belonging to his country, the name of a saint, connected with it by birth, or in some manner, by educational relations or by death. It is evident, from the very extended Life of our saint, written by Venerable Bede, that the country or district of his nativity had been for a probable good reason apparently concealed, and as from youth to the period of his death, Cuthbert had not been in Ireland, we may therefore naturally infer, that by birth and race, he may be claimed, as belonging to our island. Nor does this matter depend only on negative inferences, for many of our Martyrologists and historic writers positively refer the honour of Cuthbert's birth, to Ireland. Thus, Marianus O'Gorman, Maguire, and other Martyrologists, place him amongst our domestic saints. Moreover, Eugene, who was Bishop of Ardmore, in the year 1174, wrote a Life of Saint Cuthbert,<sup>48</sup> in which he is claimed as being an Irishman by birth. From this life, another anonymous English writer composed Acts of our saint.<sup>49</sup> These Acts, which are contained in two books, and which have nachi, the first, in twenty-eight chapters, with previous observations, in two paragraphs; the second, in twenty-three metrical chapters, with previous observations, in four paragraphs. Also, an Appendix, in three paragraphs, pp. 275 to 332.

<sup>38</sup> See his "Church History of Brittany, from the beginning of Christianity to the Norman Conquest," book xv., chap. xvi., book xix., chap. i., ii., viii., ix., x., xxviii., chap. viii., xix., xx., xxi., book xxxiii., chap. xii.

<sup>39</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., pp. 185 to 197.

<sup>40</sup> At the 20th of March, Baillet's "Les Vies des Saints," tome i., records St. Cuthbert, Bishop of Lindisfarne, in England, pp. 258 to 262.

<sup>41</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xx.

<sup>42</sup> In an 8vo volume, for private circulation only.

<sup>43</sup> See the "History of Hartlepool," with a folding Map and numerous plates of Views, Monumental Brasses and Costumes. Some of these are in colours, with Coats of Arms, Seals and Pedigrees of families. Many of the wood-cuts are by Thomas Bewick.

<sup>44</sup> See "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., pp. 388 to 451.

<sup>45</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 20, pp. 337 to 360.

<sup>46</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 316.

<sup>47</sup> See Gough's Camden's "Britannia," vol. iii. On the Lesser Islands in the British Ocean, p. 744.

<sup>48</sup> See, Rev. Samuel Hayman's "New Hand-Book for Youghal," p. xi.

been extracted from Irish records, were compiled about the year 1160.<sup>50</sup> They are supposed to have been written by Laurence of Dunelm, who flourished about this time, if we follow Colgan's opinion; and according to authorities from which these Acts were derived, Cuthbert is called a native of Ireland. Other English writers, such as John of Tinmouth, John Capgrave and John Bale,<sup>51</sup> expressly state, that Cuthbert was born in Ireland.<sup>52</sup> Among the Scottish writers, who agree on this point, may be mentioned John Major,<sup>53</sup> Fordun,<sup>54</sup> and Bishop Forbes.<sup>55</sup> Matthew O'Heney, Archbishop of Cashel, wrote a Life of this saint, about the year 1200, in which Cuthbert is spoken of as an Irishman by birth. More recently, Hugh M'Cogwell, or Cavell, Archbishop of Armagh, Magennis, Bishop of Down, David Roth, Bishop of Ossory, Stephen White,<sup>56</sup> Henry Fitzsimon,<sup>57</sup> with a host of minor authorities, claim for Ireland the honour of this saint's birth. Ussher,<sup>58</sup> Ware,<sup>59</sup> Colgan, Harris,<sup>60</sup> Dr. Petrie,<sup>61</sup> Rt. Rev. Dr. Moran,<sup>62</sup> maintain the opinion, that St. Cuthbert was an Irishman by birth. This, too, seems to have been a constant tradition in the church, at Durham. One account has it, that he was born at Kenlis, or Kells,<sup>63</sup> in the county of Meath,<sup>64</sup> and this is said to rest on Irish authorities;<sup>65</sup> yet, as we shall find further on, other local traditions seem to challenge the correctness of this statement. However, most of our Irish writers, adopting an apparently ancient local tradition, assert, that the old Meathian city of Kells has most claim to such a distinction, that he was born there, about A.D. 625, and that he was brought to Ardraccan to be regenerated, in the saving waters of baptism.<sup>66</sup>

Besides the authors already mentioned, who wrote biographies of this saint, many other allusions are made to his acts and virtues, by various writers. At the 20th of March, Colgan publishes Venerable Bede's Life of

<sup>49</sup> See, Ussher's "Primordia Ecclesiarum Britannicarum," p. 945.

<sup>50</sup> Such is the statement of Colgan, but they were probably composed at a later period.

<sup>51</sup> In this statement, Bale very gratuitously, and coarsely asserts, that he was "ex Hiberniensium stupro et in Hibernia natus, a matre Romam peregrinante, meretricante potius," &c.—"Scriptorum Illustrium Majoris Britanniae," Cent. Prima, sect. LXXXI., p. 82.

<sup>52</sup> An inscription, placed by Prior Wessington under an image of St. Cuthbert, in Durham Cathedral, described him as "Natione Hibernicus regis parentibus ortus."

<sup>53</sup> See "Historia Majoris Britanniae, tam Angliae quam Scotiae," lib. ii., cap. xii., p. 77.

<sup>54</sup> See "Scotichronicon," vol. i., lib. iii., cap. 51, p. 158, Goodall's edition.

<sup>55</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 317.

<sup>56</sup> Father Stephen White states "fuit Cuthbertus filius regis Iberniae, ut vel haereticus Baleus, in suis Centuriis, cum indignatione et convitiis conqueritur."—"Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. iv., p. 37.

<sup>57</sup> "S. Cuthbertus filius regis Iberniae major." See "Catalogus aliquorum sanctorum Iberniae."—O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiae Catholicae Iberniae Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xii., p. 53.

<sup>58</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 489.

<sup>59</sup> See "De Scriptoribus Hiberniae," at St. Cuthbert, lib. i., cap. iii., p. 30.

<sup>60</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Meath," p. 138.

<sup>61</sup> See the "Ecclesiastical Architecture and Round Towers of Ireland," part ii., sect. ii., p. 128.

<sup>62</sup> See "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi., pp. 270, 271.

<sup>63</sup> See Sir James Ware, "De Hibernia, et Antiquitatibus ejus," cap. xxix., pp. 293, 294. Londini, 1658, 8vo.

<sup>64</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Meath," p. 138.

<sup>65</sup> Chiefly based on a Tract in the Cottonian library, under the head Vitellius, D. xiv. 8. We find it in Mr. Planta's Catalogue under Titus, A. ii. 134, entitled, "De ortu et vita B. patris Cuthberti libellus de Scottis, i.e. Hibernicis auctoribus collectus." It is the same as that, which Ussher calls the Acts of our Cuthbert extracted from Irish Histories, observing, that it appeared about the year 1160. See "De Primordiis," p. 945.

<sup>66</sup> See Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi., p. 274.

<sup>67</sup> He dwells on these particulars, and

Cuthbert, with that written by John Capgrave. To both of these, he has subjoined notes, and an Appendix, containing five dissertations; the first disquisition referring to different feasts and testimonies of Martyrologies regarding him—the second, to writers who had treated on him—the third, to the year of his death—the fourth, to his writings—and the fifth, to the country of his birth. It appears rather unaccountable, why Venerable Bede does not relate particulars, regarding Cuthbert's birth, either in his prose or metrical notices of our saint; but, Colgan endeavours to find a sufficient reason for this silence, in the very incidents recorded by John Capgrave.<sup>67</sup> In the opinion of our Irish Hagiologist, some of these were regarded, by Bede, as derogatory to that honour and veneration, justly due to the subject of his biography. In fact, this venerable writer, in the preface to Cuthbert's life, expressly says, that many things, not less worthy of record than those he had given, were purposely omitted; and, such a course was adopted, lest he might appear to insert, what appeared to him unsuitable or indecorous.<sup>68</sup> It has even been suggested, that in his original copy, Bede may have treated, concerning the origin, parentage and native country of Cuthbert; and, that his copyists have pretermitted such particulars of his early life, as seemed to them ineligible, for the reasons already assigned, or perchance to claim him for a Northumbrian by birth.<sup>69</sup>

The Bollandists do not decide on the country of his birth, at the 20th of March, when treating about St. Cuthbert;<sup>70</sup> but, they seem to acknowledge, at the 8th of May, in the Acts of St. Wiro, that Cuthbert was a native of our island.<sup>71</sup> Owing to a diversity of opinion, on this point, many writers pass the question over in silence, or without determining it; among these are Le Comte de Montalembert,<sup>72</sup> John Gorton,<sup>73</sup> Haydn,<sup>74</sup> Rev. James Raine,<sup>75</sup> and the writers, in Chambers' Encyclopædia,<sup>76</sup> as, also, in the "Monasticon Anglicanum."<sup>77</sup> There are many Manuscripts extant, which make St. Cuthbert an Irishman by birth.<sup>78</sup> The monks of Durham seem to have believed acknowledges, that he derived the first portion of his Life of Cuthbert, from the narrative of Venerable Bede: "Usque hunc locum scripsit Beda venerabilis presbyter vitam S. Cuthberti: quæ vero inferius sunt collecta, per succedentia tempora erant conscripta."—Capgrave's "Vita S. Cuthberti," cap. lii.

<sup>68</sup> Colgan observes, that Capgrave indicates, his account of St. Cuthbert was taken from Ven. Bede's Life of the holy man, but, he adds, "cum tamen ex opere Bedæ edito nihil habeatur ex eis, quæ ipse habet octo prioribus capitibus, vel. cap. 24, 25, 35, 36, & 37."—"Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 21, p. 691. This statement of Colgan cannot be admitted, so far as the xxxvii. chapter of Capgrave is concerned; it being manifestly abridged from the xxvi. chapter of Bede's Life.

<sup>69</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 1, p. 677. This reason, assigned by Colgan for Bede's apparent omission of the circumstances and country of our saint's birth, appears to be well sustained.

<sup>70</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xx. "De Sancto Cuthberto," &c.

Commentarius prævius, sect. ii., pp. 94 to 96.

<sup>71</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xviii., sect. iv., n. 38, pp. 90, 91, 92.

<sup>72</sup> See "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., p. 392.

<sup>73</sup> See his "General Biographical Dictionary," vol. i., p. 587.

<sup>74</sup> See "Universal Dictionary of Biography," &c., edited by J. Bertrand Payne, p. 118.

<sup>75</sup> See his article, in the "Dictionary of Christian Biography," &c., edited by Dr. William Smith and Henry Wace, vol. i., p. 724. London, 1877 et seq.

<sup>76</sup> See Revised edition, vol. iii., p. 375. London, 1874.

<sup>77</sup> See vol. i. Edition of 1817, p. 220.

<sup>78</sup> Among these are Libellus de Ortu S. Cuthberti, de Historiis Hybernensium excerptus et translatus. This was printed, by the Surtees Society, in the "Miscellanea Biographica," p. 63. London, 1838. The following copies are known to be extant: MS. Eccl. Eborac. 16. I. 5. 8. MS. Bodl. Fairfax. 6. (3886). ff. 1-12 b., vell. folio., dble. cols., xiv. cent. MS. Harl. 4843. ff. 1-7 b., paper folio., xvi. cent. MS. Cott.

in this tradition ; for, some of the subjects, which ornamented the windows of their church, were derived from the legends thence taken.<sup>79</sup> These Manuscripts' statements<sup>80</sup> are said to have been confirmed in accounts given by Eugenius, Bishop, Hardionensis or Harundionensis—by some thought to be Armagh—by Matthæus O'Heney, Archbishop of Cashel, by St. Malachy O'Morgair ; as also were they confirmed, by the disciples of Saints Malachi, Matthias, Gilbert, and by a certain Irish priest. The Irish legends concerning his birth are also found, in a Vita S. Cuthberti, versibus hexametris rhythmicis, or in Leonine verse.<sup>81</sup> The Irish birth of this holy man is asserted, in a Tract, De Sancto Cuthberto Episcopo et Confessore.<sup>82</sup>

Yet, in the face of these authorities, Dr. Lanigan doubts of Cuthbert being an Irishman, and he thinks it probable, that our saint was a native of the Northumbrian kingdom ; and, of that part of it, now comprised, within the borders of Scotland.<sup>83</sup> His reasons appear to be as follows : because our saint in his youth tended sheep on mountains, in the neighbourhood of Mailrose, before he entered a monastery ;<sup>84</sup> because Simeon of Durham adds, that Cuthbert was then near the Lauder, a river of Berwickshire, which flows into the Tweed ; because from these circumstances Mabillon and others derive their inference of our saint's birth, in that part of the country ; because he did not follow St. Colman from Lindisfarne, when the latter left for Ireland ;<sup>85</sup> and, in fine, because of a very ambiguous passage, taken from Venerable Bede's metrical Life of our saint, in the Preface, where speaking of Cuthbert, as the light of Britain, he uses a word genuit, in the following connection :—

“ ————— hujusque Britannia consors
Temporibus genuit vulgur venerabile nostris,
Aurea qua Cudberetus agens per sydera vitam
Scandere celsa suis docuit jam passibus Anglos.”

The English and foreign writers, who regard Cuthbert as a native of England are, John Pitsæus,<sup>86</sup> Arnold Wion,<sup>87</sup> Possevin<sup>88</sup> and Edward Mahew.

Titus. A. ii. ff. 134-147 b., vell. 4to., xv. cent. MS. Lincoln's Inn, 104. ff. 169-183. paper, xv. cent. The author states in his Preface, that he collected the miracles of St. Cuthbert, before he discovered the Irish account of his descent.

<sup>79</sup> See Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy's "Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," vol. i., part i., pp. 310 to 313.

<sup>80</sup> These are said to have been drawn, in part, "ex Scottorum paginis et scriptis," by the unknown author.

<sup>81</sup> There is a MS. copy, in the Cottonian Library, classed Titus. A. ii. f. 148., vell. 4to., xv. cent. Five leaves are wanting in this copy. There is also a MS. copy, classed Harl. 4843. f. 261.

<sup>82</sup> These copies of it are found : MS. Cott. Tiber. E. I. ff. 75-85. MS. Bodl. Tanner. 15., vell. folio., xv. cent.

<sup>83</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xviii., sect. iv., p. 83, and n. 39, p. 92.

<sup>84</sup> Yet, Dr. Lanigan admits, the circumstance of St. Cuthbert living there, when a boy, does not necessarily establish the fact, that he was born in the place.

<sup>85</sup> It is related, that all the Irish of Lindisfarne followed him ; yet, in reference to St. Cuthbert not doing so, Dr. Lanigan remarks : "To this, however, it may be replied : 1. That Cuthbert was then not at Lindisfarne but at Mailros ; and 2, that those, who make him a native of Ireland, represent him as so very young, when carried over to Britain, that he could scarcely have retained a recollection of it. Why, it may be asked, was the memory of Cuthbert so much celebrated in Ireland, were it not the land of his birth ? I answer, that this was owing to his connexions with the Irish of Northumberland, his being a member of their establishments, his having observed their practices, &c. In like manner Gildas and St. David of Wales were greatly revered in Ireland, on account of their intercourse with the Irish."

<sup>86</sup> In "Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis."

<sup>87</sup> In "Lignum Vitæ," &c.

<sup>88</sup> In "Apparatus Sacer."

<sup>89</sup> There he remarks—"Most ancient writers assert that St. Cuthbert, Bishop of

This latter writer cites William of Malmesbury, as an authority for his statement; whereas, the latter writer does not even mention the place of Cuthbert's birth, no more than Venerable Bede, who wrote his life. The Rev. Alban Butler, when treating of the birthplace of our saint, at 20th March, says, he was born not very far from Mailros, or Melrose; but, he again contradicts it, in a note, appended to the Life of St. Ultan, at 4th September.<sup>89</sup> Watkins says, he was an English saint, and born in the North.<sup>90</sup> The English Protestant Bishop, Godwin, when treating on the prelates of England,<sup>91</sup> concurs in a similar statement. Other foreign writers adopt the same opinion, such as Mabillon,<sup>92</sup> Bulteau,<sup>93</sup> and J. Lacombe.<sup>94</sup> On the authority of a work,<sup>95</sup> which he quotes, Dempster makes our saint a native of Scotland.<sup>96</sup> But this author, so often convicted of attempts to confound the name of Scotia or Scotia Major, with that of Scotia Minor, by a similar process of confusion, frequently assigns natives of the former, to the latter country. However, he is the only ancient author, who claims for Scotland, the honour of our saint's nativity. The Rev. Thomas Innes also claims for this, his native country, the honour of giving birth to St. Cuthbert, and he states, that not only Scottish, but even learned English and French writers will have it, that he was a native of the eastern parts of the island, which make a part of the Kingdom of Scotland.<sup>97</sup> Moreri makes him a fellow-citizen of the Picts, and states, that he was born in "la Merche," a small district of Southern Scotland.<sup>98</sup>

Some authors assert, that St. Cuthbert was born, near the Irish metropolis, at Killmocuadruck,<sup>99</sup> or Kilmacudrick,<sup>100</sup> and such account seems to be based, on the Annals of St. Mary's Abbey of Dublin.<sup>101</sup> There was a church, in the former place, which was dedicated to our saint's memory.<sup>102</sup> Some interesting ruins of a mediæval church are still to be seen, not far removed from Clondalkin. A cemetery surrounds the old walls.<sup>103</sup> Another local tradition connects Kilmacud,<sup>104</sup> a townland, near the village of Stillorgan, Lindisfarne, who is honoured on the 20th March, was a native of Kells (County Meath); as appears from his life kept in the Cottonian Library, Sub. Vitell. D. xiv., 8."

<sup>90</sup> See his "Universal Biographical Dictionary," p. 422. New edition, London, 1821, 8vo.

<sup>91</sup> See his list of the Lindisfarne bishops, where he quotes Capgrave for St. Cuthbert's Irish descent in the text; but, in a note, he observes, "perperam vero. Natus ex humile genere in Septentrionale Anglia."—"De Præsulibus Angliæ Commentarius," p. 720.

<sup>92</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," Sæc. iv., p. 2.

<sup>93</sup> See "Histoire Monastique d'Occident," liv. iii., cap. 9.

<sup>94</sup> See his article in "Nouvelle Biographie Generale," tome xii., p. 662.

<sup>95</sup> "Chronicon Wingarten," pag. CCXVII.

<sup>96</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. iii., p. 135.

<sup>97</sup> See "Civil and Ecclesiastical History of Scotland," Chronological Memoirs, p. 230.

<sup>98</sup> See "Le Grand Dictionnaire Historique," &c., tome iv., p. 334.

<sup>99</sup> Interpreted, "Church of my Cudrick," or "Cuthbert." It is now called Kilma-huddrick, a townland and parish, in the barony of Newcastle, and noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheet 17.

<sup>100</sup> About four miles from Dublin. See Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoris Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. iii., p. 30.

<sup>101</sup> In this work, at A.D. 684, the most reverend Father Cuthbert of Lindisfarne is mentioned, with this addition, "de Hiberniæ nato in oppido Kilmacruhuick."

<sup>102</sup> Dr. Lanigan suspects, that the circumstance of its erection there gave rise to the supposition, that St. Cuthbert must have been a native of the place.

<sup>103</sup> The accompanying engraving, by Mrs. Millard, is from a drawing of the author, in August, 1878, and taken on the spot; afterwards, it was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman.

<sup>104</sup> The townland of Kilmacud, East and West, and also the parish of Kilmacud, barony of Rathdown, are marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Dublin," Sheets 22, 23.

<sup>105</sup> This site has been pointed out to the writer, by William J. Fitzpatrick, distinguished as the author of several excellent county of Dublin, with being the birthplace of St. Cuthbert, and taking its name from him. It is said, that from this locality, he emigrated to Scotland, and lived at Kirkcudbright, for some time. About the year 1798, the last interment took place, in an old and now almost forgotten graveyard, the site of which is shown, however, in an ornamental piece of ground, known as Kilmocharrick Old Church, County Dublin.

Lakelands. Trees grow over the graves, and a small stream passes by the spot, at present.<sup>105</sup>

Certain writers suppose, that St. Cuthbert was the child of humble parents;<sup>106</sup> but, this account seems to disagree, with the detailed statements to be found, in some very ancient Manuscripts. However, much mystery and legendary statements obscure the incidents of his birth,<sup>107</sup> and early life. The following is the most usual account of St. Cuthbert's Irish origin. Mortough, Muriardach, or Murchertach,<sup>108</sup> Monarch of Ireland, who had received the Christian faith, laboured sedulously to practise all its require-and popular works on Irish biography, history, and national subjects, and at the time, living in Kilmacud Manor House, not far from the place.

<sup>106</sup> Among these are Rev. James Raine, in the "Dictionary of Christian Biography," &c., vol. i., p. 724.

<sup>107</sup> William F. Skene thinks it possible, that Cuthbert may have been "the son of an Irish kinglet by an Anglic mother."—"Celtic Scotland," vol. ii., book ii., chap. v., p. 206.

<sup>108</sup> The following particulars are given, regarding the death of this king, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters." "The Age of Christ 527. After Muirchertach, son of Muireadhach, son of Eoghan, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, had been twenty-four years in the sovereignty of Ireland, he was burned in the house of Cleiteach over the Boyne, on the night of Samhain [the first of November], after being drowned in wine. Sin composed this quar-tain :—

"I am Taetan, the woman who killed the Chief of Niall; Gannadhaigh is my name, in every place and road."

Ceanfaeladh said :—

"The King Mac Erca returns to the side of the Ui-Neill; Blood reached the girdles in each plain;
the exterior territories were enriched ;

ments ; and, in these good practices, he was joined by his queen, Sabina,<sup>109</sup> who is venerated as a saint, at the place where her remains repose.<sup>110</sup> The monarch's place of abode is said to have been at Kells, or Kenanas, once a rich city of Meath, where his son Cuthbert was born, and, at the time, a brilliant light surrounded the place of his birth.<sup>111</sup> Mortough's reign is said to have commenced, A.D. 493, and to have lasted, until A.D. 515, by Dr. Jeffry Keating. This king met with great disturbances and opposition, in his government ; and, in one year, he was obliged to engage in the following memorable battles : the battle of Cinneich, the battle of Almaine, the battle of Cliach, the battle of Eibhline, and the battle of Moighe Hailbhe ; not long after this last action, he died at the house of Cheitthigh, and his end was accomplished, in a violent and treacherous manner.<sup>112</sup> Colgan thinks, that his reign did not commence, until after the Pontificate of Pope Anastasius II., who ascended the Chair of St. Peter, A.D. 496,<sup>113</sup> or even until after the accession of Pope Symmachus, in 498.<sup>114</sup> According to our historians, another king of this country, urged by motives of envy or ambition, is said to have surprised Murchertach's family by night ; and, to have murdered the monarch and his queen, with some members of his household. According to some, Sabina was spared from this slaughter, although overwhelmed in the misfortune and ruin of her family.<sup>115</sup> It is said, the house was set on fire, and the king's body was put into a vat, before it was drowned in the Boyne, about the year 527.<sup>116</sup>

Following another version of the story, one of King Murchertach's daughters had been spared, by the tyrant, who killed her father, in this slaughter of the family ; and, she, according to Capgrave, was the mother of St. Cuthbert.<sup>117</sup> Captivated with the beauty of this daughter, the tyrant—a

Seven times he brought nine chariots, and long shall it be remembered

He bore away the hostages of the U-Neill, with the hostages of the plain of Munster."

—Vol. i., pp. 174 to 177. In a note (i., p. 174) to this account, we read, that the death of this monarch is referred to A.D. 533, by the Annals of Tighernach and of Clonmacnoise. The Annals of Ulster refer his death to the year 533, or 535. All agree, that he was drowned in a puncheon or kyve of wine ; but there are other incredible circumstances, related in connection with his death, in the Annals of Clonmacnoise, as translated by Mageoghegan. See, also, notes (j. k., pp. 175, 176), ibid.

<sup>109</sup> She is said to have been venerated as a saint, on the 5th of November.

<sup>110</sup> See Capgrave's account.

<sup>111</sup> See Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi., pp. 274, 275.

<sup>112</sup> See Dermot O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii., p. 352. Duffy's edition.

<sup>113</sup> See Sir Harris Nicolas' "Chronology of History," pp. 208, 211.

<sup>114</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 2, p. 690.

<sup>115</sup> See Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi., p. 275.

<sup>116</sup> See Thomas Moore's "History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. xii., p. 253.

<sup>117</sup> Capgrave's "Vita S. Cuthberti," cap.

i. Colgan remarks, at this passage, that three things must be attended to : First, that the Annals of Ireland confirm this relation of King Murchertach's lamentable death. Secondly, that when it is said, "unica ejus filia reservata," the meaning must be, that this was the only one of the children who were there at the time saved from destruction, or, at least, the only daughter. For, all his other children were not put to death ; as we find, that in Capgrave's Life of our saint, Meldan and Eatan, the brothers to this daughter, who had been saved, were living after Murchertach's death. It is likewise certain, that three sons, named Domnald, Fergus, and Boetan, survived Murchertach, their father. By referring to the Annals of the Four Masters, it will be seen, that the two former died, A.D. 561, and, the latter, in A.D. 563. Other authorities, however, allow these princes a longer reign, and say, that they lived to a later period. Thirdly, it does not seem at all probable, that Cuthbert's mother was the proper daughter of King Murchertach, but rather his grand-daughter, by one of his sons, or, perhaps, even a great grand-daughter, by his grandson. There are two reasons, that may fairly be urged for this supposition. The first is, that as King Murchertach died, king of Connathe<sup>118</sup>—sought by every means in his power, it is said, to induce her consent to his unholy desires, which persuasions being virtuously resisted, this wicked man offered violence to the person of his defenceless captive. Having in time conceived a son, his birth was signalized by a miracle ; for, at the period of his nativity, an unwonted brightness surrounded the house, which seemed to be enveloped in flames. A certain holy bishop, on witnessing this wonderful event, gave thanks to God ; and, he sought permission from the boy's father, to take charge of Cuthbert's education. At the same time, he baptized the infant, by the name of Nulluhoc, or as Colgan conjectures, Nualloc, which signifies a "person mourning," or Nualludhoch, which denotes "lamentation;" because of the complaints and sorrow of the mother, whose feelings and virtue were equally outraged.<sup>119</sup> Another reason might likewise be added, to account for this appellation, viz., the miserable death and misfortunes of our saint's progenitors.<sup>120</sup> Others give the boy's name as Mo-uallóg, which means "my privileged one ;"<sup>121</sup> and, this is thought to have been exchanged<sup>122</sup> for the Saxon appellation Cudbert, or Cuthbert, which had a corresponding meaning.<sup>123</sup> Colgan, however, is of the opinion, that as the Monarch Murchertach came to his death, about the year 527, or before, and as Cuthbert was not born, until after the year 600, this saint must have been, at least, great-grandson to Murchertach. Such a conjecture appears to be confirmed, by Capgrave, who tells us, that the mother of our saint had two brothers, who were bishops, St. Meldan and St. Eatan. And, the Annals of the Four Masters certify, that three sons of Murchertach, namely, Domnald, Fergus and Boetan, survived their father. Now, it is said,<sup>124</sup> that St. Mælduman—which is only another name for Meldan—was the son of Boetan, son to Murchertach, son to Muredac, the son of Eugene, &c. ; and the Martyrologies of Tallagh and of Marianus O'Gorman tell us, that the 24th of April was dedicated to the memory of the saintly sons of Boetan, one of whom is known to have been the aforesaid St. Mælduman, or Meldan. Boetan was killed, by Cronan, Ruler of Kiennacht, in or about the year 563. If, then, our saint's mother had been daughter to Boetan, we must suppose her to have been born shortly before, or very soon after, her father's death ; when she would have been about forty years old, at the commencement of the seventh century, or fifty, were we to refer St. Cuthbert's birth, to A.D. 610. That he was born, after this date, is the supposition of some authorities. However, a diversity of opinion prevails, with regard to the exact year of Boetan's death ; but, following the authority of the Four Masters, it does not seem improbable, that Cuthbert's mother could conceive a child, at those somewhat advanced

A.D. 527, or perhaps before, and as Cuthbert was not born until after the year 600 ; it would be absurd to suppose, that this king's daughter, even if an infant at the time of her father's death, could have been mother of our saint, after attaining her seventieth year. In the second place, St. Meldan, or Mælduman, was Murchertach's grandson, and most probably one of the brothers to St. Cuthbert's mother, as mentioned in his Life, by Capgrave, and as may be seen, when treated at greater length, in succeeding passages of the text. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ, xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 4, p. 620.

<sup>118</sup> According to "Libellus de Nativitate Sancti Cuthberti de Historiis Hybernien-sium excerptus et translatus."

<sup>119</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hi- berniæ," xx. Martii, n. 5, p. 690.

<sup>120</sup> However, all these conjectures are built on the corrupt version of Capgrave's text.

<sup>121</sup> See Rt. Rev. Patrick F. Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi., pp. 274, 275.

<sup>122</sup> Uall is used for pride, in Dr. John O'Donovan's and Whitley Stoke's version of Cormac's "Glossary," p. 165. Uallach—derived from it—was used as a female proper name, in Ireland. See "The Topographical Poems of John O'Dubhagain and Giolla na Naomh O'Huidhrin." Introduction by Dr. John O'Donovan, p. 62.

<sup>123</sup> In Saxon, it means "one eminently skilful," or "illustrious for skill."

<sup>124</sup> In the "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," cap. 2.

<sup>125</sup> In the report of the Census of 1851, I periods of life.<sup>125</sup> Should his deductions on this matter be controverted, Colgan opines, that we may still suppose Cuthbert's mother to have been removed, by one or two generations, from the Monarch, Murchertach.<sup>126</sup> Yet, as this conjecture would seem to conflict, with Capgrave's testimony—for, he styles St. Meldan, brother to Cuthbert's mother—it must prove safer to be satisfied, with probable evidence, which although not thoroughly convincing, nevertheless contains nothing absolutely inconsistent, or impossible.

It is related, that the Bishop of Kells was preceptor to the boy, who soon learned to repeat the Creed and the Psalms. Under the bishop's charge of superintendence, during his early education, Cuthbert made some progress, in the acquisition of rudimental learning. One day, having accompanied his preceptor, on a walk, to look after some herds, the boy remarked, that he saw a black cow, which should shortly produce a red calf, with a white spot, on the middle of its forehead. Not long after this prediction, the calf appeared, answering to Cuthbert's description, as already given.<sup>127</sup> However, the good bishop was soon summoned to his eternal reward, and Sabina deemed it prudent to leave her native country. She entered a little coracle,<sup>128</sup> and sailed over to Portpatrick, in the Rinns of Galloway. There finding a vessel, she proceeded northwardly, and landed, at Letherpen harbour, on the coast of Argyll.<sup>129</sup> Thus, immediately after the death of his preceptor, Cuthbert's mother removed to Britain, taking our saint as the companion of her voyage. Sabina wore rich golden armlets and garments, which attracted the cupidity of robbers, but the prayers of her son saved her from molestation.<sup>130</sup> This appears to have taken place, during the boy's early youth. Here they are said to have tarried for a time, and afterwards they crossed into Lothian,<sup>131</sup> where the pious Oswald held sway, and where St. Aidan so zealously attended to the flock of Christ. Here St. Sabina confided the care of her child to a pious widow,—others have it to a religious man,<sup>132</sup>—who lived at a village called Wrangholm,<sup>133</sup> on the banks of the Leader, a stream which see it stated, that the mothers of England gave birth to children within this year, at ages varying from fifteen to fifty-five years. It is related, by the Editors of the "Ancient and Present State of the County of Down," chap. xx., sect. ii., p. 257, published at Dublin, 1744, 8vo., that about the year 1718, a certain Dr. John Sedgwick "delivered the wife of James Ducky, in the Parish of Hillsborough, of a dead child, which was Hydrocephalick, she being then in the fifty-seventh year of her age; an instance exceeding rare in any other country than Ireland!" I have also read a statement, copied from an American newspaper, regarding a mother over sixty years of age having given birth to a child, in the United States, in the year 1862.

<sup>126</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 4, p. 690.

<sup>127</sup> See ibid.

<sup>128</sup> The legend of Cuthbert's life, according to the Irish version, says it was of stone. "Et miro modo in lapidea devectus navicula, apud Galweiam in regione illa, quæ Rennii vocatur, in portu qui Rintsnoe dicitur applicuit."—Cap. xix.

<sup>129</sup> "Post hæc, curroc lapidea in Galweia derelicta, navim aliam subit, et alio portu, qui Letherpen dicitur, in Erragaithle, quæ est terra Scotorum, applicuit. Portus ille inter Erragaithle et Incegal situs est, lacus vero, qui ibi proximus adjacet, Loicafan vocatus est. Non tamen amplius quam tres viri cum matre et filio extiterant qui applicuerant."—Ibid. Mr. Skene explains, that the inlet Lochmelfort may be meant, near the head of which is Loch Avich; or if Loch Awe is meant, it may have been at Crinan, near which was Dunadd, the capital of Dalriada.

<sup>130</sup> The people afterwards had a tradition, that when branches or pieces of wood were left there, these ignited of themselves, owing to the merits of St. Cuthbert.

<sup>131</sup> Here "a church was afterwards erected in his honour, which is to this day called Childeschirche, and here the book of the nativity of St. Cuthbert, taken from the Irish histories, terminates. Childeschirche is the old name of the parish now called Channelkirk, in the upper part of the Vale of the Leader; and the Irish Life thus lands him where Bede takes him up."—William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland," vol. ii., book ii., chap. v., pp. 204, 205.

<sup>132</sup> See ibid., p. 264.

<sup>133</sup> This place is in Berwickshire, and in the vale of Lauderdale.

pours its waters from the north into the River Tweed, about two miles below Melrose.<sup>134</sup>

On their arrival, in Scotland, Cuthbert's mother went to the Bishop Columba, who is said to have ruled over the See of Dunkelde,<sup>135</sup> known to have been Caledonia's ancient capital,<sup>136</sup> at this early time, if we take another version of the story. By him, she was kindly received, according to Capgrave. Colgan is of opinion, that this bishop might have been St. Colman of Lindisfarne,<sup>137</sup> for the name is convertible into Columba,<sup>138</sup> Columban, and Columbin,<sup>139</sup> among Irish proper names, as he shows;<sup>140</sup> even the place in which he then resided was Dunkelden, or Dun-culden,<sup>141</sup> a town in Scotland, on the River Taum. According to the same authority, this bishop might have been Columba, surnamed Crag, of Ulster, or Columbanus, son of Beogna, who was bishop, or Columbanus, son of Echuid; all of these are mentioned, as disciples of St. Columkille, by his biographer Adamnan. However, it is stated, that Columba, the first bishop of Dunkelde, received the boy Cuthbert, and educated him, together with a girl, named Brigida,<sup>142</sup> a native of Ireland. She told him, that the Lord had destined him for the Angles, in the east of that province, while she was destined for the western population of the land of the Irish. While here, Cuthbert excited the envy of three clerics, from the region of the Angles, but these afterwards went to the Monastery of Hy, or Iona. The mother of Cuthbert having two brothers,

<sup>134</sup> See Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi, pp. 275, 276.

<sup>135</sup> He is stated, to have been its first bishop, but only on the authority of St. Cuthbert's Irish Life, which William F. Skene declares to be non-historical.

<sup>136</sup> A Pictish king is said to have made it a seat of religion, at an early period, by establishing a monastery of Culdees there, and in 1130, King David I. converted it into a cathedral. See "Encyclopædia Britannica," vol. vi, p. 175. Dublin edition of 1796.

<sup>137</sup> In the opinion of Colgan, this time, name, and dignity, concurring, furnish an indication to this effect: Bishop Colman of Lindisfarne flourished whilst Cuthbert was a youth; and, with St. Aidan, St. Finan, and others, who were sent by Scots or Irish as missionaries to England, they were consecrated previous to their mission, as may be collected from Ven. Bede's Ecclesiastical History (lib. iii., cap. 3, 17, 25, 26). This is also expressly remarked, by Florence of Worcester, in his Catalogue of the Bishops of the Church of Lindisfarne, in these words: "S. Aidanus a Scotis Episcopus ordinatus, ac missus Provinciis, in quibus regnavit Rex Oswaldus verbum fidei predicavit; et ab ipso Rege in Insula Lindisfarnensi Sedem Episcopalem, (ut petebat) accepit. Quo de hac vita sublato, Finan pro illo gradum Episcopalem a Scotis ordinatus ac missus accepit. Quo defuncto Colmanus in Episcopatu successit, et ipse missus a Scotis. Quo Episcopatu dimisso, ac in Patriam reverso, Tuda (qui et ipse Præsul a Scotis ordinatus) pro illo Pontificatum accepit." Since it appears, therefore, that St. Colman and others mentioned were consecrated bishops, before they had been sent on the English mission, there may be reason for supposing, that this Colman was identical with Columba, Bishop of Dunkelde.

<sup>138</sup> Thus, Adamnan sometimes calls Columkille, Columba; and Ionas calls Columbanus of Luxen, Columba.

<sup>139</sup> This means, "little Columba."

<sup>140</sup> Colgan in a parenthesis adds, "(quod tumulum Corylorum ex etymo interpretaberis)," and he says, that the fact of its only having become a permanent episcopal See in King David's time, about A.D. 1150, is not opposed to the account. For, there is no doubt, that in the time of Cuthbert's youth, there were bishops in the Pictish and Scottish country. Wherefore, it is probable that these bishops were distinguished, by the names of places, in which they lived. Hence, we may derive the title of bishop of Dunkelden, in this present instance. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 6, p. 690.

<sup>141</sup> It may be questioned, who was the prelate, called in Capgrave's Life, "Episcopum Columbam, qui primus Sedem Dunkelde rexit in Scotia."

<sup>142</sup> William F. Skene supposes, that the Brigida here alluded to was obviously meant for St. Bridget of Kildare, who belonged to a much earlier period. See "Celtic Scotland," vol. ii., book ii., chap. v., pp. 205, 206. However, this may not at all have been the intention of the writer, for many other Irish Brigids are noticed in our Calendars.

<sup>143</sup> William F. Skene supposes him to have been "no other than Eata, Abbot of living in Scotland, the Bishops Meldan and Eatan,<sup>143</sup> she remained with them, for some time;<sup>144</sup> and, her arrival in Lothian was probably, at some period, while the pious Oswald, the sixth Bretwalda, or king, ruled over the extensive province of Northumbria.<sup>145</sup> At length, having resolved on a pilgrimage to Rome, she took leave of her brothers, first having consigned Cuthbert to their charge.<sup>146</sup> She does not seem to have returned again, for most accounts regarding her state, that she departed there from life, and in great repute for her sanctity.<sup>147</sup>

CHAPTER II.

ST. CUTHBERT BECOMES A SHEPHERD IN EARLY YOUTH, AND HE IS FALSELY ACCUSED OF A CRIME—HIS YOUTHFUL SPORTS—EFFICACY OF HIS PRAYERS—HIS MIRACULOUS VISION AND VOCATION—HE ENTERS THE MONASTERY OF MELROSE—HE IS AFTERWARDS APPOINTED GUEST-MASTER IN A MONASTERY, FOUNDED AT RIPON—CUTHBERT'S DEPORTMENT AND VIRTUES—WITH OTHER MONKS, HE IS EXPELLED FROM THIS HOUSE, AND ON THE DEATH OF ST. BOISILUS, HE SUCCEEDS AS PRIOR—HIS MISSIONARY LABOURS.

THE occupation of St. Cuthbert, when he was young, seems to have been the tending of sheep, or cattle, on the mountains, near the River Leder, and on the upper part of its source. He was associated, with other shepherds, or Melrose, and afterwards Bishop of Lindisfarne."—"Celtic Scotland," vol. ii., book ii., chap. v., p. 206.

<sup>144</sup> Treating on St. Meldan and Eatan, Colgan observes regarding the latter name, that the Britons had a habit of transposing the first two letters, which according to an Irish mode of speaking and of writing should stand Aeta or Aetan. This latter form of the name is synonymous with Aedus, Aidus, Aedanus and Aidanus. These names are often found applied to Irish Saints; but, in no instance do we find among them the form of this appellation Eata or Eatan. It seems probable to Colgan, that the Meldan, and Eatan, or Aetan, here alluded to, were sons to Boetan, King of Ireland. Moreover, as already remarked, this Boetan had many holy sons, amongst whom a St. Melduman or Mældan is mentioned. Besides, he was confirmed in this opinion, by discovering in Irish Martyrologies the Natal day of two saints—one of whom was called, Meldanus Hua Coinn, and the other, Aetanus Hua Coinn—that is, of the race of Conn or Constantine. For, the race of that celebrated King of Ireland, called Conn or Constantine of the Hundred Battles, was known as the Hua Coinn; and, from this progeny, issued the aforesaid Boetan, and his father Murchertach, besides fifty-four Irish kings, as may be seen, in notes, affixed by Colgan, to his Acts of St. Meldan, at the 7th of February. The "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," cap. 1, 2, and on to 15, numbers beyond two hundred and thirty saints, derived from this race; among these, there can be no doubt, St. Meldan's and St. Aetan's names must be found. For, besides the account given in Capgrave's Life of our saint, various ancient Martyrologies seem to indicate a similar conclusion. Thus, at the 7th of February, Marianus O'Gorman, Maguire, and the Martyrology of Donegal, use the same words in this following sentence: "Meldanus filius Hua Coinn de lacu Oirbsen." Likewise, the Martyrology of Tamlacht: "Sanctus Meldanus de insula filiorum Hua Coinn." The Calendar of Cashel: "Sanctus Meldanus de insula filiorum Hua Coiran in lacu Oirbsen, in regione de Hi Oirbsen in Occidentali Con-nacia." From these notices, we are enabled to learn, that St. Meldan had at least one brother, who was a saint; and, from its being used as a place of habitation, the aforesaid island was called that of the sons of Hua Coinn, i.e., the descendants of the race of Conn or Constantine. Wherefore, at the 9th of October, the Martyrologies of Tal-laght, of Marianus O'Gorman, of Maguire and of Donegal, place "Sanctus Aetan-us sive Aedanus Hua Coinn;" and, it is probable, this saint was the brother of St. Mel-dan, as being descended from the same family. Since, therefore, it is stated, that St. Meldan and Eatan or Aetan were uncles to St. Cuthbert—as related in his Life by Cap-grave—and, that they were, if not the sons, at least the grandsons, or great-grandsons, of Murchertach, who was descended from Conn—according to the Irish Annalists—it seems almost a matter of certainty, that these Saints Meldan and Eatan were identical with saints already referred to, in the Irish Martyrologies, at the 7th of February, and at the 9th of October, and that, in consequence, they were grandsons or descenherdsmen, in the service of a master, on the folc-land, or public domain,<sup>1</sup> in the valley of Lauderdale,<sup>2</sup> and on the southern slopes of the Lammermoor hills.<sup>3</sup> In the Life of our saint, written by Capgrave, it is said, that after his mother's departure for Rome, Cuthbert came to a town denominated Dul,<sup>4</sup> and next he retired to a high mountain, called by the inhabitants Doilweme<sup>5</sup>—about a mile distant—where he began to lead a solitary life, spending whole nights in vigil, and continually praising God. The country around was covered with woods. By miraculous power, he produced a fountain, springing from a hard rock. This is still to be seen. There he built an oratory of wood, and he erected a large stone cross. Near it was a bath, formed from a single stone, and there he often immersed himself, spending the night in prayer.<sup>6</sup> He likewise exorcised a demon, who endeavoured to interrupt him, during the exercise of his devotions.<sup>7</sup> Whilst our saint lived this solitary life, bordering on the Pictish country, according to the same author, a king's daughter within that province became pregnant, having sinned with a certain young man. Being asked the name of her paramour, by her father, she falsely charged the crime on Cuthbert. He was said to have seduced her, by his personal attractions and blandishments. Filled with rage, her father went forth to the place, where our saint lived. The king was accompanied by his daughter, and by some of his guards. Upbraiding the servant of God, for his hypocrisy, the king asked why he dared, under the garb of religion, to pollute his sacred profession, by committing such a crime. He urged Cuthbert, likewise, in presence of all, to declare in an open manner, how he had contrived the dishonour of his daughter. The latter continued her false accusations, with the greatest pertinacity and assurance. Her charges brought great distress of mind on Cuthbert, who, turning to God in prayer, said, "O Lord, who alone knowest things that are hidden, reveal this work of iniquity, and manifest thy power, in such a manner, that thy holy name may be glorified for ever." Whilst offering up these prayers, and shedding an abundance of tears, the earth suddenly opened, on that very spot; and, before the eyes of all present, his guilty accuser disappeared. That place was afterwards known by the name of Coruen. The king, with those attending him, admiring the Almighty's just judgments, humbly asked our saint's pardon. This, indeed, was freely given; but, thenceforward, Cuthbert avoided all conversation or intercourse, with persons of a different sex.<sup>8</sup>

According to the account, as furnished by Venerable Bede, Cuthbert gave himself up to levity and to the sports of childhood, until the eighth year of his age, by dants of the aforesaid King Murchertach. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, nn. 7, 8, p. 691.

<sup>145</sup> The events of his reign are given, in Dr. Lingard's "History of England," vol. i., chap. ii., pp. 89 to 93. He reigned, with great sway, from A.D. 635 to A.D. 642.

<sup>146</sup> According to Capgrave's Life of St. Cuthbert, cap. iv., v., p. 679, in Colgan.

<sup>147</sup> See Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi., p. 276.

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> The meaning of this word is explained, in Kemble's "Saxons in England," vol. i., book i., chap. xi., pp. 289 to 301.

<sup>2</sup> See Le Comte de Montalembert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., pp. 392, 393.

<sup>3</sup> See William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland," vol. ii., book ii., chap. v., pp. 201, 202. "The Bride of Lammermoor" is one of Sir Walter Scott's celebrated novels.

<sup>4</sup> This is now known as the village of Dull, in Strathtay, in Athol, and where Adamnan, not long after St. Cuthbert's death, founded a monastery. This village is in Perthshire. See an account of it, in the "Imperial Gazetteer of Scotland," vol. i., pp. 410, 411.

<sup>5</sup> In the Life of our saint, by Capgrave, Doilwem is Latinized, "area pulchra."

<sup>6</sup> See William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland," vol. ii., book ii., chap. v., pp. 206, 207.

<sup>7</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii, Capgrave's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. vi., vii., p. 679.

<sup>8</sup> Capgrave's Life, cap. viii

seeking social amusements with young persons of his own years and of a like temperament. Abounding in natural agility and with a buoyant spirit, he was capable of contending among boys of his own age, and with those who were even older, in all their youthful sports. He was even considered, by his companions, as their skilled superior, in all boyish games. When other companions felt fatigued, in any contest or play, Cuthbert boasted his capability of contending anew, with any juvenile opponent. In leaping, in running, in wrestling, he received the victor's palm. But, as Cuthbert himself related the occurrence to Trumuin,<sup>9</sup> Bishop of the Picts, being one day engaged at his usual sports, with a number of boys, his limbs became strained, by practising various contortions and unusual positions, to exhibit his great agility. At this time, a companion, who was closing his thirteenth year, approached, and began to advise him with much earnestness, to turn his thoughts from idle pranks, and to employ his mind and limbs, in more useful pursuits. At first, Cuthbert disregarded these admonitions, when the boy turned away; then, falling on the ground, his face was observed, by other companions, to be bathed in tears. All his playmates ran to offer him consolation, enquiring, at the same time, why he wept. Amongst others, Cuthbert made the same enquiry, when the weeping boy exclaimed: "Why, O holy Abbot and Priest, Cuthbert, do you indulge in these sports, so contrary to your nature and rank? to play among boys becomes not you, whom the Lord hath designed to be a master of virtue, among your elders." Struck with these expressions, and the graces of God's holy Spirit having taken possession of his soul, Cuthbert formed a fixed resolution to devote himself wholly to the Lord's service. Thus were fulfilled and exemplified, in his own person, and in that of his youthful monitor, these words of the prophet, addressed to the Most High: "From the mouths of infants and of sucklings, thou hast perfected praise."<sup>10</sup>

During his youth, being seized with a grievous pain in one of his limbs, Cuthbert's knee became swelled to such a degree, that only with great difficulty and suffering, he could place his foot upon the ground. This tumour still increasing, at last he felt quite unable to walk. Whilst in this state, he was carried out of doors, by some kind persons in attendance; when suddenly, from a distance, a horseman of noble appearance, and clothed in white garments, approached towards him. The rider was mounted on a horse of very beautiful shape and bearing; but, when this cavalier had come to the place where Cuthbert reclined, he addressed our saint with great affability, asking jocosely, if he could afford any attention or hospitality. Cuthbert replied, he would most willingly gratify the stranger's wishes, were it not, he happened to be prevented by those pains he suffered for former numerous offences; and long as he laboured under this tumour of his knee, he could find no physician able to afford him any relief. The traveller, alighting from his horse, examined his swollen limb; he told Cuthbert to boil wheaten meal in milk, which was to be applied to the knee, hot as it could be borne, and afterwards he promised, that the patient should shortly be healed. With these appliances and directions, the traveller departed on his journey. Our saint, having complied with his prescriptions, was entirely relieved from his infirmity, in the course of a few days.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>9</sup> According to Menard's Benedictine Martyrology, his feast was held on the 9th of February. This holy man was consecrated by St. Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury.

<sup>10</sup> See Bede's Life of St. Cuthbert, cap. i. Also, Capgrave's Life of St. Cuthbert, cap.

ix. Henceforward, in quoting these Lives, as authorities for our saint's Acts, we shall refer only to the names of the authors, and to the numbers of their chapters, as furnished by Colgan.

<sup>11</sup> See Ven. Bede's Vita S. Cuthberti,

In many temporal and spiritual necessities, Cuthbert had recourse to God through prayer, and he was often assisted in a miraculous manner. His prayers were offered effectually, for the relief of others in distress, as the following narrative, given by an eye-witness, will sufficiently testify. There was a monastery, on the southern side of Tyne river, near its mouth, and where it enters the ocean. Afterwards, this religious house was known as Tiningham.<sup>12</sup> At that juncture, it had been occupied by a community of monks; but, in the days of Venerable Bede, it had been converted into a house for female religious. One day, some vessels were engaged in landing wood, for monastic uses, when suddenly a western gale blew with great violence, and carried those boats or rafts out towards the sea. Seeing the danger in which their brethren were placed, the monks, who occupied this monastery, felt alarmed for their safety. A vain effort was made for their deliverance, by launching some boats, which were unable to approach the other vessels, on account of the violent surging wind and waves. Despairing to effect anything, by human means, they had recourse to prayer. Kneeling down together, over a projecting point of land, they earnestly supplicated Divine Mercy, in favour of those forlorn mariners, who seemed devoted to almost certain destruction. At this moment, a crowd of rustics stood on the opposite bank of the river, and with these also appeared St. Cuthbert. When with deep grief, our saint beheld five vessels receding from view, until they appeared like so many small birds rocking on ocean's surface, he had the mortification of hearing the crowd remark, moreover, that the monks deserved this punishment, for having introduced new forms of living into their country. The saint addressing them said: "Why, brethren, do you wish evil, to those whom you see devoted to death? should it not be better and more humane, to beseech the Lord for their preservation, than to rejoice at their destruction?" But, the rustics, in a great rage against him, cried out: "Let no man dare pray for them, and may the Lord compassionate none of those, who took away old popular practices, by substituting new ones, which we cannot well observe." Cuthbert, however, fell upon his knees, and bending his head with reverence, poured forth prayers to God. Immediately, the wind changed in an opposite direction, and those outward barks were borne towards the monastery, near which the mariners landed, and to their great joy, after this providential and unexpected deliverance. Seeing such a result, the rustics felt ashamed of their infidelity, while they extolled Cuthbert's faith, and failed not in circulating the fame of this great miracle. Venerable Bede tells us, he heard this relation, from a trustworthy brother of his own monastery, who declared, that he likewise received this account, from one of the crowd, who happened to be present. That narrator besides was a man of simple mind, altogether incapable of forming such a story, without just grounds, and one, who had frequently related it to many companions.<sup>13</sup>

While engaged at the occupation of tending sheep, on the mountains, in this part of the country, it pleased the Almighty to call Cuthbert to the profession of a religious life, in Lindisfarne monastery. One night, while his companions were sleeping, Cuthbert, according to a usual custom, was engaged in vigil and prayer; when, on a sudden, he saw the heavens pouring forth preternatural light, which dispelled all darkness around, and a band of heavenly spirits descended upon earth. Here, without delay, having procured possession of a departed soul, radiant with beams of Divine Charity, they were again seen, cap. ii. Also, Capgrave's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. x.

<sup>12</sup> See Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi. p. 227.

<sup>13</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. iii. Capgrave's Life, cap. xi.

returning to the Kingdom of the Blessed. The servant of God, transported with desire to enter upon a course of life, which could merit for him such glory of the saints, immediately gave thanks and praises to God, for having been permitted to enjoy this magnificent vision. Then, awaking his companions, and relating what had occurred, at the same time, he expressed a belief, that some holy bishop, or great servant of God, had been called away, on that very night, to the joys of everlasting bliss. The shepherds felt a thrill of devotion, taking possession of their hearts, on hearing this account, given by their companion; and, when morning dawned, it was known, that St. Aidan,<sup>14</sup> Bishop of Lindisfarne, had been translated from earth to heaven, at the very moment of Cuthbert's vision. At once, our saint resolved upon entering Lindisfarne monastery, resigning the charge of his fleecy flock, into the hands of its master.<sup>15</sup> Revolving within himself the purpose for embracing a life of strict observance, a certain incident occurred, which taught him most implicit reliance, on the bounty of Divine Providence. One day, while he journeyed alone, and about the third hour, he came to a village, where entering the house of a pious woman, he wished to find fodder for an animal, on which he rode. It chanced to be Friday, which was a day of fast,<sup>16</sup> and his hostess asked permission to prepare dinner for his refreshment, as he should not meet with any other resting-place, on the road he travelled; hence, if he did not then eat, he might be obliged to remain without food, for a whole day.<sup>17</sup> The saint, however, refused to accept of her proffered hospitality, and continued his travels, until the shades of evening began to fall; when he found the journey, he had proposed for himself, could not be finished on that day, nor could he find a single inhabited house, where he might obtain shelter for the night. Seeing, on the roadside, some huts of shepherds, erected for their accommodation, in a temporary manner, but now deserted, he entered them. Tying the animal on which he rode to a wall, he collected a bundle of hay, which the wind had removed from the roof of those huts. This he placed before the horse, and betook himself to prayer, not having broken his fast during the entire day. Meantime, the horse, raising his head towards the top of the hut, began to eat that hay, with which it was covered. Suddenly, a piece of folded linen dropped from the roof. Having finished his prayer, Cuthbert went to examine this piece of linen; when, to his great surprise, he found half of a loaf yet warm, and a piece of flesh meat, quite sufficient for his refecton.<sup>18</sup> Giving thanks to God, for such a favour, he divided this bread with his horse, reserving the remainder for his own use. This account was given by Cuthbert himself, when bishop, to a certain religious priest, named Inguald,<sup>19</sup> living in a monastery, at the mouth of a river, called Vuiri,

<sup>14</sup> The Life of this saint will be found, at the 31st day of August.

<sup>15</sup> See Bede's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. iv. Capgrave's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xii.

<sup>16</sup> "Erat namque sexta sabbathi, quæ plerique fidelium ob reverentiam dominicæ passionis usque ad nonam horam solent protrahere jejuniûm."—Bede's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. v.

<sup>17</sup> In an ancient English National Council at Enham, it was decreed, that a fast should be observed, on every Friday, except it happened to be a festival. Among the Ecclesiastical Laws of King Ina and of King Canute, there is a like prescription. See Sir Henry Spelman's "Concilia," tom. i., pp. 518, 546.

<sup>18</sup> From this account, it might appear, that fasting on Friday was not accompanied by abstinence from flesh meat, at this time, and in that particular place. But, it must be observed, the incident related most probably occurred after midnight, or on Saturday morning.

<sup>19</sup> Colgan cannot find any mention of him in the Martyrologies, unless perhaps he was St. Higbald, a priest, who in the time of St. Cuthbert lived in Northumbria, and thence went into Hibernia. Of him, Bede treats in his Fourth Book of English Ecclesiastical History, chap. iii. In the English and other Martyrologies, he is commemorated, on the 22nd of September. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 7, p. 677.

now known as the Wear. The priest, already named, afterwards communicated this anecdote to Venerable Bede.<sup>20</sup>

At this time, Melrose was the great Keltic establishment for novices in Northumbria.<sup>21</sup> When our saint prepared to enter upon his monastic life, Lindisfarne monastery was peopled with many holy monks; but, that of Melrose<sup>22</sup> was inhabited, by a holy man, named Boisilus,<sup>23</sup> the fame of whose virtue had been widely divulged.<sup>24</sup> Cuthbert rode to the monastery of Melrose. When alighting to enter its church, for the purpose of offering his prayers, as a person of distinction, the visitor left his horse and a spear which he carried, in charge of a servant; for, it appears, he had not yet laid aside his secular habit. Standing before the gate of his monastery, Boisilus was the first to observe him. In a prophetic spirit, he exclaimed to those that were near: "Behold the servant of God, behold a true Israelite, in whom there is no guile." The Priest Stgfrid,<sup>25</sup> a religious man, just entering upon his monastic profession, was then present, as he told Venerable Bede; and, at that time, when the latter wrote our saint's life, his informant was still living as abbot, at an advanced age, in the monastery, called Wirensis. Boisilus received our saint with great kindness, and afterwards obtained an account of his reasons for leaving the world; then, this Prior of Melrose—for to such dignity was Boisilus advanced—gave Cuthbert a most cordial welcome. Afterwards, our saint was introduced to Eata,<sup>26</sup> who was Abbot of Mailrose and of Lindisfarne, at the same time; and, at length, having received tonsure, Cuthbert was admitted among the religious brethren, about the year 651, according to Capgrave.<sup>27</sup> No sooner had he entered the monastery, than he became distinguished, not alone by an observance of usual disciplinary rules; for he even practised austerities, not required by the engagements of his profession. He applied himself, with great zeal, to reading, labour, watching and prayer; he abstained from all kinds of intoxicating liquor, but made use of necessary food to support his constitution, during exercises of bodily and mental labour, to which he was subjected. A robust frame distinguished him, and the strength he possessed was adequate to the performance of his most laborious occupations.<sup>28</sup> The institute, under which St. Cuthbert began his religious profession was undoubtedly the same, that St. Aidan had formed at Lindisfarne, and which he had derived from the monastery at Iona.<sup>29</sup> At this time, likewise, the powerful King of Northum-

<sup>20</sup> See Bede's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. v. Also, Capgrave's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xiii.

<sup>21</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 20, p. 338.

<sup>22</sup> Mailros or Melrose monastery was situated on the banks of the Tweed, near Melrose town, about ten miles west of Kelso, in Scotland. Fleury very strangely mistakes, by placing it within the country of the Mercians, which comprised the central parts of England. See his "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome ix., lib. xl., sect. xliii., p. 95.

<sup>23</sup> The feast of St. Bosilius is celebrated on the 23rd of January, and he died, in the year 670, according to the English Martyrology. However, the more correct date for his festival is on the 23rd of February, at which day some account of him will be found, in this work. Ferrarius places his feast, at the 7th of August, and Menard at the 9th of September. He is mentioned, in Bede's "Ecclesiastical History." See lib.

iv., cap. 27; and lib. v., cap. 10.

<sup>24</sup> In the year 651, he was Prior at Melrose. See "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," vol. i., p. 292.

<sup>25</sup> He died on the 22nd of August, A.D. 688, according to Menard, "in observationes," lib. ii., at that date. Also, Edward Mailhew, in Tropheis, and other writers.

<sup>26</sup> See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 80.

<sup>27</sup> Life of St. Cuthbert, chap. xxiv.

<sup>28</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. vi., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xiv.

<sup>29</sup> Dean Cressy writes, "as yet Saint Wilfrid had not published in those parts the Holy Rule of Saint Benedict; neither was the Roman manner of celebrating Easter introduced among them: Which controversy divided the Black Monks from those whom Saint Columba and the Monastery of Hye sent into Brittany."—"Church History of Brittany," book xv., chap. xvi., p. 867.

<sup>30</sup> See Matthew of Westminster, "Flores Historiarum," pp. 230, 231.

bria, and its seventh Bretwalda, Oswio, reigned; for, after the defeat and death of his rival, Penda, in 655,<sup>30</sup> his territorial jurisdiction was extended over Mercia, while the Britons, the Southern Picts, and the Scots, were careful to avert his enmity, by the payment of an annual tribute.<sup>31</sup> After some years had passed, Alchfrid,<sup>32</sup> or Alefrid,<sup>33</sup> King of Northumberland, presented Eata<sup>34</sup> with a site, whereon to found a monastery. In this establishment, prayers were to be offered up continuously, for the future repose of King Alefrid's soul. The place was called Rhypuon, or Wrypum,<sup>35</sup> according to Bede; now, it is better known as Ripon.<sup>36</sup> Eata having taken with him some religious brethren, and amongst others, Cuthbert, his monastery was accordingly built, and the discipline of Mailrose was established within it.<sup>37</sup> Cuthbert was appointed to receive all guests, and to furnish them with suitable entertainment. Going forth one morning, he found a young man, without the monastery, and, according to the guest-master's usual custom, he began to exercise hospitable offices, presenting water to wash the hands and feet of this stranger, with a towel to wipe them. It being then winter season, snow had covered the ground; and our saint, supposing the traveller had suffered from cold and hunger during the night, placed this man's hands within his own bosom to restore their natural heat. He told the guest, that food should be immediately prepared. But, this stranger refused to partake of it, saying, he had a long journey to perform, before he could reach his mansion, to which he must instantly hasten. In fine, Cuthbert importuned him in the name of God to remain, at least until breakfast-time, when he consented. The prayers of tierce being over, Cuthbert set a table for the usual meal. Placing some viands thereon, he told the guest to partake of these, while he went to procure some warm bread, which he hoped was then baked. On returning, he found no trace of the stranger, not being able even to discover his parting footsteps on the snow-covered earth. Again, hastening to the refectory, to prosecute his employment, he found it filled with a most fragrant odour. On further examination, three loaves were discovered, which rivalled the lily in whiteness, the rose in fragrance, and honey in sweetness of taste. Our saint cried out, "I now perceive, that the Angel of God, whom I received, came to feed, not to be fed; for, behold he hath brought bread, such as earth cannot produce." Being moved with this miracle, to the saint it became an incentive for the attainment of higher virtues, and for the acquisition of greater graces. From that time forward, he often saw and conversed with Angels, who furnished him with food from heaven, whenever

<sup>31</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lingard's "History of England," vol. i., chap. ii., pp. 93 to 103.

<sup>32</sup> He was son to King Oswy, and associated, by the latter, in the government of his people.

<sup>33</sup> This was not Alfrid, King of Northumberland, and brother to King Egfrid; for, he did not obtain the kingdom, until St. Cuthbert had been appointed Bishop of Lindisfarne, in the time of Egfrid, as may be seen, by referring to the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of Bede's Life. Wherefore, the present Alfrid, or Alefrid, King of Northumbria, was predecessor of the former. To him Venerable Bede alludes, in the passages already mentioned, as also Matthew of Westminster.

<sup>34</sup> See his Life, at the 26th of October.

<sup>35</sup> It is said, likewise, to have been a monastery of thirty families.

<sup>36</sup> Ripon, at one time, was an episcopal city. See an account of it, in Dugdale's "Monasticon," vol. ii., pp. 130 to 133. Edition of 1817. London, folio.

<sup>37</sup> Dr. Lanigan thinks it is evident, from this account, that the monks of Mailros were of Irish institution, and followed the Irish system. Therefore, Mabillon was mistaken in his "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," tom. ii., p. 878, when asserting, that Cuthbert had received, not the Irish but the Roman tonsure. This had been said before, in an anonymous Life of Cuthbert; but, then the Bollandists justly suspect, that the passage relative to it is an interpolation. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xviii., sect. iv., n. 42, p. 93.

he felt hungry. Of affable deportment and pleasing manners, Cuthbert frequently excited those with whom he conversed, to most exalted practices of piety. When relating, for their edification, the actions of distinguished saints, he introduced examples, furnished by his own experience ; yet, through humility, he always spoke of himself in the third person, thus imitating the Apostle St. Paul, "I know a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I know not, or out of the body, I know not, God knoweth) such a one wrapt even to the third heaven, &c."<sup>38</sup> Good-natured and exceedingly well-tempered, the holy man was remarkable for his modesty, patience and tact, while regulating the various duties, devolving on him. He was also tolerant and moderate to a degree. In his life was exemplified the most perfect precepts of the monastic profession.<sup>39</sup>

With the prudent reserve which he maintains, in recounting the contest between St. Wilfrid and the Celtic saints, Venerable Bede speaks of a storm which suddenly arose, when the Roman paschal rite was proposed for introduction, to supersede the Celtic observance, at Ripon. We may well suppose, this was not effected, without considerable opposition ; however, the united power and influence of St. Wilfrid and of his friend Alchfrid caused the inmates to yield, as they wished to preserve their national usages.<sup>40</sup> Eata, Cuthbert, and certain other religious, at length were expelled from the monastery of Ripon, and their place had been occupied, by other monks. However, Cuthbert did not recede from his purpose ; but, he remained a faithful disciple of the holy Boisilus, endeavouring to emulate his words and actions. The Celtic community, with the Saxon element combined, preferred a return to Melrose—their parent house—where they enjoyed the practice of their Columban observances. Herefrid, afterwards Abbot of Lindisfarne, declared he had heard from the lips of Cuthbert himself, that being seized with a pestilence, then raging throughout Britain,—known in history as the Yellow Plague,<sup>41</sup>—the monastic brothers spent a whole night, offering up prayers for his recovery. These prayers were heard, for on the following morning, he was enabled to arise, and calling for his staff and hose, he went forth, leaning on the former, and thus gradually recovered his strength. But, a tumour remaining on his thigh, it extended afterwards to the intestines ; so that, during his whole future life, he felt occasional returns of this pain. A few days, afterwards, Boisilus died, A.D. 664, in the odour of sanctity ; he, likewise, having been stricken by the Yellow Plague. Cuthbert concealed the prediction of this holy man, regarding his own promotion, when he had retired into solitude ; lest such announcement might hasten an event, the realization of which, with his accustomed humility, he much feared. However, the holy man was known to signify his wishes to other brethren, that he might find an obscure habitation in some secluded island, where a surrounding ocean, might remove him from the sight and regard of all persons. Nor even there would Cuthbert consider himself secure from worldly temptations ; but, he earnestly desired this seclusion, that he might avoid any false glare of ambition or vain-glory.<sup>42</sup> On the death of Boisilus, <sup>38</sup> II. Cor. xii. 2. See Bede's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. vii. ; Capgrave's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xv.

<sup>39</sup> See Dean Cressy's "Church-History of Brittany," book xix., chap. i., p. 462.

<sup>40</sup> See Le Comte de Montalembert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xiv., chap. i., p. 149, and liv. xv., chap. i., p. 400.

<sup>41</sup> Its first appearance in the summer was on the Southern coasts ; thence it spread to Northumbria ; and about the beginning of August, it reached Ireland. See Thomas Moore's "History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. xiii., p. 280.

<sup>42</sup> Bede's Life, cap. viii. Capgrave's Life, cap. xvi.

<sup>43</sup> He "travelled far and near among the inhabitants of those parts, especially in the parts of Scotland to the south of the friths," Cuthbert was appointed his successor, about the year 664 ; and, he discharged the duties of superior, with great virtue and prudence. But, his pastoral vigilance was not confined alone to subjects, within the walls of his monastery : he often went out on missions, among people living in the neighbourhood, to reclaim them from certain superstitious practices and heathen observances, to which they were yet addicted, notwithstanding that faith which they professed and had recently embraced. To correct these errors, Cuthbert went to adjoining villages ; sometimes on horseback, but more frequently on foot, preaching the Gospel maxims, on all occasions. At that time, it was customary for early English neophytes, to assemble at whatever village a priest or cleric visited ; there to receive, with the greatest docility and reverence, instructions from their lawfully-appointed pastors. The angelic countenance of Cuthbert, joined with his fervid zeal and persuasive eloquence, had such an effect upon his dear humble children in the faith, that all who heard him were not only moved to contrition and penitence for their past errors ; but, even the people publicly confessed their delinquencies, in presence of their great missionary. He penetrated, moreover, to remote hamlets, among rugged and lofty mountains, in this part of the country ;<sup>43</sup> delighting in poverty of accommodation, afforded by unsophisticated but kind-hearted mountaineers, among whom he sojourned, and to their great spiritual advantage. He was frequently absent from his monastery, for the whole of a week ; sometimes, for two and three weeks, or even an entire month, he did not return, being employed among his beloved rustics, extending the kingdom of God, both by precept and example.<sup>44</sup>

Whilst our saint continued to rule over the family of Melrose, St. Ebba,<sup>45</sup>—daughter to Ethelfred, and sister to Oswald, both Kings of Northumberland—presided over a community of nuns, at Coldingham.<sup>46</sup> Hearing of the newly-appointed prior's zeal and fervour, she requested his presence in her nunnery, to give a suitable course of instruction to its inmates. The servant of God, in accordance with her request, set out for this habitation. Remaining there for some days, he preached in a most effective manner ; while his whole demeanour impressed this pious community of nuns, with sentiments of most profound veneration for his character.<sup>47</sup> During a sojourn with some brethren of a religious house, whilst they were buried in sleep, he often went out by night, to engage in prayer. The curiosity of a certain brother belonging to this house being excited, from a knowledge of this circumstance ; he stole out privately, on a particular night, to see what the saint did, or whither he went. Cuthbert was found to have gone down towards the sea, over which that monastery stood. Having waded into the water, until it reached his breast, Cuthbert continued to recite the divine praises, in this comfortless position, until morning's dawn. Then, returning to the shore, and kneeling down, he seemed in a rapture of prayer or meditation. While thus engaged, two otters, or sea animals, came out from the water, and couching near him on the shore, they began to warm his feet with their breath, and to cleanse them with their skin or fur. Afterwards, they returned to the water, when our saint retired to the monastery. Here, he engaged in the recital of canonical hours with the monks, at their usual time. The inquisitive brother also repaired to &c. See Innes' "Civil and Ecclesiastical History of Scotland," Chronological Memoirs, p. 245.

<sup>44</sup> Bede's Life, cap. ix. Capgrave's Life, cap. xvii.

<sup>45</sup> Her feast occurs, at the 2nd of April, according to the English Martyrology.

<sup>46</sup> Also called Coludi.

<sup>47</sup> See Le Comte de Montalembert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., pp. 422, 423.

<sup>48</sup> Bede's Life, cap. x. Capgrave's Life, cap. xviii.

<sup>49</sup> The Picts of Galloway were known as his monastery, and sought an early interview with the holy prior. Casting himself on his knees, with tears he asked pardon for a foolish curiosity, which induced him stealthily to hang on the footsteps of the man of God. Cuthbert replied, "What have you done, brother? or wherefore have you become a spy, on my nocturnal rambles? however, you shall obtain pardon for this offence, provided you keep as a secret what you have seen, at least during the term of my life." The monk promised a compliance with this condition, and immediately obtained the saint's pardon for his fault. His promise was faithfully observed, during Cuthbert's lifetime; but, after our saint's death, the circumstance was divulged to many persons, by him who had witnessed it.<sup>48</sup>

At another time, having occasion to make a journey to the people of Niduari, in the Pictish land,<sup>49</sup> he went by sea, two of his religious brethren having accompanied him. One of the latter afterwards became a priest, and related the following miracle, which occurred during their voyage. Having arrived at the place of their destination, on the day after our Lord's Nativity, and thinking the weather favourable for their voyage, while hoping to return under the same propitious auspices, within a short space of time, they had brought no provisions with them. However, they scarcely reached land, when a tempest arose, so as to preclude all hope of returning. Having spent some days, suffering from cold and hunger, while waiting for a favourable change of weather, the saint, nevertheless, did not interrupt his usual prayers and nightly vigils. At length, addressing his companions, he said, with a cheerful tone and manner: "Why, I ask, do we remain idle in this place, and not seek for some means of deliverance? Behold, the earth is covered with snow, and the sky with clouds; the atmosphere is filled with storms, and the ocean with waves; we are about to perish through want, while no man can be found to afford us relief. Let us, therefore, importune with prayer the Almighty, who formerly led his people through the depths of the sea, and who miraculously fed them in the desert, that he may also have compassion on us, in our extremity. I trust—if our faith fail not—that we shall not be left fasting this day, when he has already manifested so many wonders of his divine bounty; I recommend, that we go to a certain place to seek for food, which may be afforded us, at this festive time." Saying these words, he led them beneath that bank, on which he had spent the night in prayer. Here, to their great joy, they found three pieces of dolphin's flesh, which appeared to have been cut by human hands, and prepared for cooking. Giving thanks to God, Cuthbert said, "You see, dearly beloved, a result of hope and trust in the Lord; behold, he hath prepared food for his servants, and hath showed us we must remain here three days, according to the proportion of food provided for us three. Take ye, therefore, those gifts which Christ hath sent us, and let us refresh ourselves, having confidence; for, most certainly, after three days have elapsed, the sea and sky shall resume their serenity." The storm prevailed, with its accustomed violence, for the triduum which followed; on the fourth day, however, according to the prediction of Cuthbert, a calm ensued, and with favouring gales, they were wafted to those shores, they had desired to revisit.<sup>50</sup> On another day, he went forth from the monastery to preach, according to a usual custom, taking with him a boy, as his companion. Having travelled towards the village, whither he had been proceeding, and which lay at a considerable distance, he said to the boy: "Tell me, my son, where do you think we shall find refreshment, or have you in mind any person along the Niduari. "The traces of this visit have been left in the name of Kirkcudbright."—William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland," vol. ii., book ii., chap. v., p. 209.

<sup>48</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xi.

<sup>49</sup> See Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi., p. 286.

our route, at whose house we may receive hospitality?" Having been yet fasting, since they left home, this youth said in reply: "I have been considering such a matter, in my own mind, for we have brought no food with us, nor do we know any person on the way to entertain us, while no inconsiderable portion of our journey remains, and this we cannot accomplish without suffering from hunger." "Learn, my son, to have faith and hope in God," replied the saint, "for he never injures with hunger, those who serve him faithfully." Then looking towards heaven, the saint saw an eagle soaring overhead, and he exclaimed: "Do you perceive that eagle flying? even, through his agency, our Lord can provide for us to-day." While thus engaged in conversation, both saw this bird alighting on the banks of a certain river, towards which they went. Cuthbert said: "Do you behold where rests our servant, of whom I just now spoke? Run, therefore, and see what food it hath pleased God to send us through him, then bring it hither." Doing as he had been directed, the youth found a large fish, which this bird had lately taken from the river. Cuthbert said: "What have you done, my child? why have you not left his part with our servant? divide the fish in two portions, and give him that one, which his services merit."<sup>51</sup> This order being obeyed, and taking the other part along with them, when a time for their refectation arrived, they turned towards the next village. On presenting the fish to certain inmates of a house into which they entered, it was prepared, and sufficed as well for their family meal, as for our travellers' fare. Cuthbert preached the Divine word, and extolled God's benefits, within this humble tenement. Having resumed his journey, he again set out for the village, towards which his course had been directed.<sup>52</sup> About the same time, a number of persons collected around our saint, to hear him preach, in a certain village. The servant of God had a revelation, that the devil, wishing to retard the Gospel fruits, had prepared a stratagem for this purpose. In the midst of his discourse, he suddenly addressed a crowd, in these words: "Dearly beloved, as often as you hear mysteries of the kingdom of heaven expounded, you should always apply the most vigilant attention of your senses and minds; lest perchance, the devil, who hath a thousand fallacious arts, may prevent you from receiving God's word, through any want of interest on your part." He then resumed the ordinary tenor of his discourse. On a sudden, the evil one produced a great conflagration in their village, and a high wind seemed to spread the flames on all sides.<sup>53</sup> Immediately, the whole crowd, with a few exceptions, ran to extinguish this fire. They threw water on it, with little effect, until Cuthbert, offering up his prayers to God, procured its extinction. The crowd was filled with confusion, on seeing this, and flocking again to the servant of God, the people fell on their knees, imploring pardon for that inconstancy of purpose and of conduct, which induced them to disregard their preacher's admonitions.<sup>54</sup> On another occasion of like missionary labour, he entered the house of a certain religious woman, who was a nurse to him, during his tender years.<sup>55</sup> On this account, he was in the habit of calling her mother, and of frequently visiting her house, which was situated in a western part of the village. Through accident and want of caution, a great fire broke out, in an opposite direction. The wind, blowing with violence at this same time,

<sup>52</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xii. Capgrave's Life, cap. xix.

<sup>53</sup> Bishop Challenor calls this "a fantastical fire."—"Britannia Sancta," part i. March 20, p. 190.

<sup>54</sup> See Bede's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xiii., and Capgrave's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xx.

<sup>55</sup> From this account, it is probable, that in early youth or infancy, Cuthbert had lived in the southern part of Scotland.

<sup>56</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xiv. Capgrave's Life, cap. xxi.

<sup>57</sup> By Le Comte de Montalembert, he is called "un Les ealdormen du roi Egfrid," carried bundles of burning straw or thatch, with which the houses were covered, in all directions ; while the villagers endeavoured, but in vain, to arrest the raging flames, by throwing water on their blazing homesteads. Cuthbert's nurse hastened to the house, in which he resided, and she besought him to save her house, and the dwellings of her neighbours, from destruction, through his prayers. The saint told her not to fear for her property, which should be safe ; then, going before the door, he fell prostrate upon the earth. Whilst offering up his prayers, the wind suddenly changed, so as to divert the flames from this entire western portion of the village.<sup>56</sup>

Another friend of our saint, byname Hilmer, who was prefect to King Egfrid,<sup>57</sup> and a most religious man, had been frequently visited by Cuthbert. This man's wife became possessed by an evil spirit, so that she was an object of horror to all, who witnessed her sufferings ; but, finally, it was thought, she lay at the point of death. In this emergency, Hilmer mounted his horse, and speeding to Cuthbert, told him the doleful state of his companion. He besought our saint to send a priest to her, for administration of the Sacrament of our Lord's body and blood, that afterwards she might repose in consecrated ground. Hilmer felt ashamed, to confess the real state of his wife, who was distinguished for her charity and other virtues, lest our saint might think she had lived a life of hypocrisy. Cuthbert went to visit her, and, through a revelation, he learned the cause of her insanity. On returning, he purposed seeing her again, in company with her husband. On the way, St. Cuthbert, observing the grief of Hilmer, and suspecting its origin, said : "Do not weep, because I am about to find your wife in the state, I so much regret, for I know that she is troubled by a demon, a matter which you felt ashamed to disclose. I know, also, that before we arrive, she will be restored to sanity of mind, and that coming to meet us, she shall take those reins, and entreat us to enter, whilst eagerly she will engage in her accustomed kind offices towards us. For, the wicked are not alone tormented in this manner ; but, in God's secret councils, the just are sometimes possessed by demoniac influence, not only in their bodily members, but even in mind." While speaking these words, for the instruction and consolation of his companion, they both approached his house. Then, the evil spirit, being unable to bear the presence of the Holy Ghost, with which Cuthbert was filled, deserted this woman, who ran with joy to welcome the man of God, and she held the reins of the horse, on which he was mounted.<sup>58</sup> She besought him to remain for the night, and to impart his benediction to the house. While discharging offices of hospitality towards her guest, the woman declared, from the moment she had first touched the reins of Cuthbert's horse, she felt no further suffering from her former malady.<sup>59</sup>

CHAPTER III.

STUDIES AT MELROSE—ST. CUTHBERT IS TRANSFERRED TO BECOME PRIOR AT LINDISFARNE—HE CHOOSES TO LEAD AN EREMITICAL LIFE, IN THE ISLAND OF FARNE—HIS LABOURS AND AUSTERITIES—HE IS ELECTED BISHOP OF LINDISFARNE—KING EGFRID'S GRANTS TO ST. CUTHBERT—THE HOLY MAN'S PROPHECY AND VISION REGARDING THE DEATH OF KING EGFRID—CUTHBERT'S PREDICTIONS AND MIRACLES.

THERE can be no doubt, that Cuthbert gave a great impetus to learning, —“Les Moines d'Occident,” tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., p. 416.

<sup>58</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's “Lives of the Saints,” vol. iii. March 20, pp. 349, 350.

<sup>59</sup> See Ven. Bede's Life, cap. xv.

while ruling over the Abbey of Melrose, and that such influence continued to a period long subsequent. We have traces of primary schools in those early days. Narrating one of our saint's miracles, Reginald of Durham describes a village school, held in a church, at Norham, on the Tweed. It seems to have been a parish school, for parish boys. But, the monasteries of Scotland furnished education even to a higher class of pupils, than children taught in the burgh and choral schools.<sup>1</sup>

Venerable Bede states, that our saint, having ruled over Melrose many years, the most reverend Abbot Eata transferred him to a monastery, in the Island of Lindisfarne; in order, that he might teach the perfection of monastic discipline, by precept and example, to monks, over whom he was placed as Prior. Eata had jurisdiction over Melrose and Lindisfarne, being both bishop and abbot of the latter place, at this time. Having spent fourteen years, in Melrose Abbey, Capgrave says, he was transferred to that of Lindisfarne. Simeon of Durham places this removal, at the year 664; but, according to Capgrave's account, it must have been in the year 665. In our saint's new station, Cuthbert continued his former practices of visiting and evangelizing among people, living without the walls of his monastery; whilst advancing, at the same juncture, true spiritual exercises and piety within its enclosure. He wrought many miracles, and he restored to former health those afflicted, with various diseases of mind and body. Through prayer, he relieved those possessed by wicked spirits. Some brethren, in his monastery, felt disposed to relax somewhat their regular observances; but, by mildness and patience, gradually he brought them to the practice of rule, and through daily exercises of devotion. Frequently, when in conclave with his monks, some bitter remarks were made against him, when disputes arose, with regard to regular observances; yet, on these occasions, the prior calmly arose, and with a placid countenance, he adjourned any debated question to the following day. Then, as if no discussion had before occurred, Cuthbert began to advise his brethren: until, in fine, he succeeded, by impressing on them the justice of his opinions. His invincible patience enabled him to bear all adversities, against mind and body; and, even in the midst of contradictions, his countenance appeared cheerful, as if the Holy Spirit within his breast sustained him against all outward afflictions. Cuthbert was believed frequently to have spent three or four nights successively, in practices of watching and prayer, when he neither slept on his own bed, nor was there any place without the monastery, where he could rest. Whether he retired for prayer to secret places, or wrought with his hands to repel sleep, or walked around the island, was not exactly known; but his vigils were occupied by holy meditation, and in the recitation of Divine psalms. On certain occasions, he would gently reprove the impatience of some among his brethren, when disturbed in their daily or nightly slumbers, by saying: "No person disquiets me, by arousing me from sleep, but it rather affords me satisfaction, that having repelled sloth, I may apply myself by thought or deed to something useful."

Such was his fervour and compunction of heart, that frequently, whilst offering up the holy Sacrifice of Mass, his face was bathed with tears. While celebrating the Mass of our Lord's Passion, he felt most intense sorrow of soul; and, when inviting the people to raise their hearts to God, and to give him thanks, according to the ritual, he appeared to elevate his mind, rather than his voice. The tones of psalmody, when recited by him, produced a deeply plaintive melancholic feeling.<sup>2</sup> Filled with zeal, reproof was administered freely

ARTICLE I. — CHAPTER III. — <sup>1</sup> The Register of Kelso records, that a lady of high rank made over a part of her dowry lands to the monks of this place "on con-to sinners ; but still, his spirit of tenderness was manifested, in his treatment of penitents. Oftentimes, when hearing the confessions of his penitents, taking compassion on their offences, he shed abundance of tears ; thus, teaching them, by this example, the most effectual means for removing their disorders. His garments were neither distinguished, by any exact care, nor by any studied neglect, with which they were worn ; and, to the time of Bede, this becoming practice was observed in the use of garments, belonging to the brethren of Lindisfarne. Their habits were of plain woollen texture, nor were they rendered remarkable, by fanciful dyes or patterns.<sup>3</sup> The moderation and sanctity of our saint drew all hearts towards him ; while, even the immortalized and rebellious, among his spiritual children, began to imitate this example, set by their holy superior. In a short time, he was enabled to introduce, or rather to revive, the old spirit of regular discipline and observances.<sup>4</sup> After Cuthbert had ruled over his monastery of Lindisfarne, for a period of twelve years, in the twenty-sixth year of his monastic profession, he conceived a great desire to withdraw from the responsibilities and cares of his imposed office, that he might devote himself, in a more abstracted manner, to the service of his Creator. In the year 676,<sup>5</sup> according to Capgrave, he withdrew to an island, called Farne, which was situated some few miles, in the sea, and out from Lindisfarne. This small spot of land ceases to be an island, during the low ebb of ocean-tide, being then united by a depressed sandbank to the main shore. But, at high water, which occurs twice a-day, Farne is insulated by the sea. In popular rumour, it had the reputation of being inhabited by demons, before this sojourn of Cuthbert, who put to flight the hosts of darkness, on erecting his standard of the cross, within its borders.

Our saint constructed a building, there, almost circular in shape, the walls of which were about four or five perches in extent. On the outside, they were little more elevated than a man's height, when in a standing position.<sup>6</sup> The interior of the structure was dug out of the solid rock, and it was excavated in such a manner, that the saint could not see any object near his cell on the outside.<sup>7</sup> His view was solely directed towards heaven, which his heart had so frequently desired. The walls were constructed, with large masses of stone and turf, yet in a very rude manner.<sup>8</sup> So large were some of these stones, that it would seem impossible they could have been raised, by the strength of less than four men ; but, our saint is said to have been assisted, by an Angel, in elevating them to their several positions. He constructed two different dition that they should maintain her son among other scholars of the best rank in the monastery." See "Fasti Aberdonensis," edited for the Spaulding Club, by Cosmo Innes. Preface, p. vi.

<sup>2</sup> These are valuable details, as serving to illustrate ancient Irish ritualistic observances, and they show, that certain portions of the present liturgy date to a very early period of our national church history.

<sup>3</sup> These observations enlighten us on social usages of the seventh century.

<sup>4</sup> See Bede's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xvi., and Capgrave's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xxiii.

<sup>5</sup> "Anno DCLXXVI. Ethelredus Rex Merciorum adducto maglino exercitu Cantium vastavit ; et Ecclesias et Monasteria sine respectu divini timoris fœdavit. Eodem anno Insulam Farne vir Domini Cuthbertus [intravit] et per undecim annos mira animi alacritate Domino militabat."—Wharton's "Anglia Sacra." Chronicon Cænobii Sanctæ Crucis Edinburgensis, vol. i., p. 155.

<sup>6</sup> The rampart which is described by Bede, as enclosing St. Cuthbert's little monastery in Farne, may be taken as the type of the Irish monastic vallum. See, also, Venerable Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. 28.

<sup>7</sup> This description would nearly apply to the ruined hermitage on the top of Crogh Patrick, county of Mayo. The latter is square, however, and not circular interiorly.

<sup>8</sup> For an interesting account of this kind of structure, called a camhol, or cashel, see Dr. Petrie's "Ecclesiastical Architecture and Round Towers of Ireland," part ii., pp. 440, 446.

chambers: one served for the purpose of an oratory, and the other for ordinary uses. By digging through or breaking the rock, he contrived a partition between them; while, some shapeless rafters, covered with hay, formed the roof. At the entrance of Farne Island was a larger house, for the accommodation of those brethren, or other persons, who came to visit him; and, a fountain was near, which supplied them with fresh water.<sup>9</sup> But, his own cell, being built on a hard rock, was unprovided with spring water, until calling some of the brethren together, he remarked: "You see how this mansion, I have chosen, is destitute of water, but let us beseech him, who converts the solid rock into pools, and the crags into fountains of water, that giving glory, not to us, but to his own name, he would deign to open for us a streamlet from this stony surface. Let us dig, therefore, in the middle of this enclosure; for, I believe, that God will refresh us with a torrent of delights." They dug a well, therefore, and on the following morning, it was found to be replenished with water, which oozed from the earth, in such quantity, that it was sufficient for our saint's necessities, and, it never failed, afterwards, in affording a grateful supply. Having completed the necessary buildings, through the assistance of his religious brethren, Cuthbert began to live apart in his cell, going forth occasionally to minister for his visitors' wants. He was in the habit of washing their feet, with warm water; and, sometimes, through compliance with the wishes of others, he allowed them to return this same kind office towards himself. Through a love of mortification, he remained whole months, without removing boots, which covered his legs; and, it sometimes happened, that he discalced himself but once a year, and this only on Holy Thursday, for the ceremony of washing the feet. On account of his frequent prayers and genuflections, he was known to have wales and excrescences, on his knees and legs. In fine, wishing to remove, as much as possible, from human intercourse, he remained shut up in his cell, occupied with continual prayer, watching and fasting. When obliged to converse with others, it was only through the window of his cell; and, in the course of time, this outlet was also closed, being opened, only for the purpose of bestowing his benediction on persons without, or in some other case, which was generally one of great necessity.<sup>10</sup> At first, our saint was sustained by bread, which had been brought to his retreat, by the brethren, while the fountain furnished him with water; but, conceiving it to be more becoming his profession, to support himself by manual labour, he procured implements of husbandry. Having prepared the earth, he sowed wheat, in the spring-time. As the summer however advanced, no appearance of a growing crop was observable. One day, as some of Cuthbert's brethren visited him, he said: "Perhaps, it is not to be expected, that a growth of wheat should be produced from soil of this quality; or, perchance, it is not the will of God to give an increase; bring me, therefore, barley, to see if it will grow. If it does not please God to produce a crop of barley, it must be better for me to reside in the monastery, than to remain in this place, sustained by external labour." Barley was accordingly procured, and when the seed had been committed to earth, the season was already so far advanced, little hopes were entertained that it could grow; but, contrary to expectation, an abundant crop was promised, as the blades advanced to maturity.<sup>11</sup> Birds, however, came in flocks, to feed upon Cuthbert's ripening barley. As he afterwards declared, in a confidential manner, our saint said: "Why do you meddle with what is sown, when you have had no part in tending it? Or, perhaps, you suppose, that you have had more to do than I had, at this work? But, if it please God to allow you this liberty, do as he permits; if not, retire, and inflict no injury on me." These words, spoken with an air of pleasantry, were immediately followed by the departure of those birds, nor did they return, afterwards, to molest the crops of our saint, during such time as these continued growing.<sup>12</sup> A peculiar species of wild sea-bird, known as the eider duck, was said to have been tamed by the saint, and rendered subservient to his use. Before the middle of the twelfth century, these birds, frequenting the Farne Islands, were called St. Cuthbert's Ducks; and, many strange accounts are left us, regarding their habits and haunts.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>9</sup> See Bede's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xvii., and Capgrave's Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xxv.

<sup>10</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xviii. Capgrave's Life, cap. xxvi.

<sup>11</sup> Aubrey De Vere thus alludes to Cuthbert's manner of living, in "Legends of the Saxon Saints;"—

Again, when flocks of crows, which had long been accustomed to frequent his island, caused injury to the house-roof, under which Cuthbert received his religious brethren; the saint commanded them, to abstain from further damage, and to depart. Those ravens likewise obeyed his injunctions; but, some of them returned, in the course of a few days, bearing an humble offering to the holy man, and apparently as compensation for former injuries. Although they continued to build their nests in the island, for many subsequent years, yet, they offered no further molestation towards our saint, nor to his friends.<sup>14</sup> Besides this obedience, shown by mute animals to Cuthbert's wishes,—for according to the Northumbrian legends, he made the birds companions of his solitude and caressed them<sup>15</sup>—the very elements seemed propitious to his intentions. Desiring, at one time, to erect a small house, which should prove a convenient addition to his hermitage, near the sea-shore, and over a fissure in the rock, which was about twelve feet in width; Cuthbert besought those brethren who visited him, to bring on their return a beam of requisite length, to serve as a basement, for the erection of his hut. Promising compliance with his request, and having received their beloved father's benediction, they departed. On their return to the island, however, they forgot to fulfil their promise; but, on being reminded of it, they felt abashed, because of their neglect. However, Cuthbert, with his usual kindness, told them to feel no concern on this account, and to remain with him until the following morning saying, he trusted God would be mindful of his desire and necessity. They complied with our saint's invitation, and on the following morning, it was found, that the nightly tide of ocean had cast on shore a beam of the very length required, and near the exact spot, where his proposed hut was to be erected.<sup>16</sup>

There is a description, by Francis Grose,<sup>17</sup> of St. Cuthbert's oratory on Coquet Island, one of the Farne group, about a mile and a-half from the Northumberland shore. Accompanying this, there is a fine copperplate engraving of St. Cuthbert's Hermitage, with a stone coffin exposed, in the foreground. This is said to have been the one, which first enclosed the remains of our holy anchorite. The fame of our saint's virtues had extended, already, not only amongst inhabitants, living in the neighbourhood of Lindisfarne, but even to those, at the most remote extremities of Britain. Numbers flocked towards his cell, to

"In narrow cave
Worn from the rock, and roughly walled around.
The anchorite made abode, with lonely hands
Raising from one poor strip his daily food, Barley thin-grown, and coarse."

—"How Saint Cuthbert kept his Pentecost at Carlisle," p. 178.

<sup>12</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xix., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xxvii.

<sup>13</sup> See, "Miscellany of the Spaulding Club," edited by John Stuart, Advocate, vol. iv. Preface, pp. lxiv. to lxvii., and vi., pp. 329, 330.

<sup>14</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xx., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xxviii.

<sup>15</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 20, p. 345.

<sup>16</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxi., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xxix.

<sup>17</sup> See "The Antiquities of England and Wales," vol. iv., pp. 82, 83.

disclose their spiritual and temporal necessities, before the servant of God. He afforded the greatest consolation to all: the afflicted he comforted with pious exhortations, by reminding them of the empty vanities of this life, and of eternal rewards in the next; he pointed out the manner, in which the devil and his snares might be avoided, with assistance of God's grace, and by a firm trust in Divine Providence. He told them, how the enemy of man's salvation had frequently attempted to prevail against him, on his lone island, and how vain were those attempts, because the anchor of his hope rested, on a sure foundation. These things he did and said, not for a purpose of exalting himself in public estimation; but, he attributed personal happiness, in a spiritual point of view, to the cenobitical life which he had chosen, thus subjecting himself in all things, to the Abbot's rule, who regulated his hours of prayer, vigil, fasting and labour. He often referred to the care, bestowed upon his religious training, by the holy Abbot Boisilus, in Melrose monastery, and to certain predictions of that holy man, with regard to his future life; always wishing, however, that he might be able to escape a state, for which he seemed specially destined. This was understood to be an episcopal charge, which must necessarily deprive him of many advantages, found in a retired life, and in unremitting contemplation.<sup>18</sup> Venerable Bede tells us, that Herefrid, a priest of Lindisfarne, gave him the following account regarding a miracle, which was wrought by Cuthbert, in favour of the holy Abbess, Elfred,<sup>19</sup> who presided over a community of nuns, and who was also of regal descent. Being seized with some infirmity of a chronic nature, after suffering much pain, she gradually recovered her health, but she felt unable to stand or walk, except in a curved or bent posture. Having hoped, but in vain, to recover the use of her limbs, through medical aid; one day, she revolved in mind the desire of possessing something belonging to Cuthbert, for she trusted, it should become the means for removing her great debility. Shortly afterwards, a messenger brought her a linen cincture belonging to the saint, to whom her desire had been interiorly revealed; when, having placed it around her body, she found herself able to assume an erect posture the day following, and in three days, afterwards, her health was perfectly restored.

A few days subsequent to this occurrence, one of her nuns had been seized with an intolerable aching of the head; and, being about to die, as generally supposed, she was visited by the Abbess, who bound her head with Cuthbert's cincture, when immediately the pain left her. The zone was then carefully removed to a locker; but, when the Abbess required it, a few days afterwards, it could not be found.<sup>20</sup> On another occasion, Elfred desired an interview with our saint, to confer with him, on matters that greatly concerned her. Cuthbert complied with her wishes, and taking with him some of his religious brethren, he sailed to an island, at the mouth of a river, called Coquedus,<sup>21</sup> where he met the Abbess, according to her appointment. Having conversed with the saint, for some time, throwing herself at his feet, Elfred

<sup>18</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxii., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xxx.

<sup>19</sup> The author of the English Martyrology mentions an Ethelfreda, daughter to King Oswy, who was abbess of Whitby in Northumberland, where she was venerated on the 26th of December, having died A.D. 670. But, Colgan remarks, that he must have been in error, regarding the name and year of the death of this virgin, and perchance, even, as to the day of her veneration. For Bede, Hugh Menard, and Edward Maihew, in "Tropheis Benedictinis," call her Elfred, daughter of King Oswy, and, it is said, that her Natalis had been celebrated, on the 8th of February. As Bede in his Life of St. Cuthbert states, that she survived her brother, Egfrid, who was killed, A.D. 685, it cannot be denied, that she lived many years after the year 670. She was sister to Egfrid and Aldfrid, both kings of Northumbria. See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 20, p. 678.

<sup>20</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxiii., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xxxi., xxxii.

<sup>21</sup> In the Third Life of the Lindisfarne

besought him to tell, how long her brother Egfrid should live and reign, over his kingdom of the Angles. Cuthbert would not directly declare, what was known to him through a prophetic spirit, with which he was gifted; but, he expressed wonder, why a woman of her prudence and scriptural knowledge should not bear in mind the words of divine wisdom, regarding the man, who, living a long time, yet ought to recollect the near approach of his latter end, and how much more ought not he, who was only to live a single year, while death awaited him at the gates. This declaration was a sufficient intimation, regarding the approaching death of her brother, and Elfled, bursting into tears, requested him again to declare, who should be her brother's successor on the throne, as he had neither sons nor brothers. Cuthbert was silent for a moment, when he replied: "Say not that he wants them, for he shall have a successor, whom you shall regard, as Egfrid himself, and with the love of a sister." On being asked, where this person then was, our saint cried out: "Do you not see this widely-extended ocean? how many islands does it not contain? and, it is an easy matter for the Almighty, to provide from some of them a ruler, for this kingdom of the Angles." Elfled then understood him as alluding to Aldfrid,<sup>22</sup> who was a reputed son of her father, and who then had been living an exile in Ireland.<sup>23</sup> Here, he was engaged in the study of literature, as Egfrid proposed to have him elevated, to some of the higher church orders. Elfled hereupon exclaimed: "Oh, how different are the desires, that engage the hearts of men! Some rejoice, having acquired riches—others are always in need, even when loving riches. Thou rejectest the glory of this world when offered thee, when thou couldst attain episcopal rank, than which no station of life is more sublime—thou hast avoided this condition, by fleeing to the desert." Cuthbert replied: "I know that I am not worthy of such a dignity, nor can I even escape the Supreme Ruler's judgment. If he were disposed to subject me to so great a burden, I believe he would release me in a short time; and, perhaps, he would send me back to my usual place of retirement, after a term of two years. But, I command you, in the name of our Lord, that you relate not to any person, what you have heard from me, until after my death." When the saint had revealed these things, and had instructed the Abbess, on many points, he returned to the solitude of his cell, on Farne Island.

In the year 684, a Synod<sup>24</sup> was convened, under the presidency of Archbishop Theodore<sup>25</sup> of Canterbury,<sup>26</sup> at which Egfrid assisted. Cuthbert was then elected Bishop of Lindisfarne, with the unanimous assent of all present; but, notwithstanding many letters and messages sent to him, he refused to leave the place of his retreat. Whereupon, the king himself, accompanied by some of his nobles, the Bishop Trumwine, and other religious men, sailed over to the island. Kneeling before the saint, with earnest entreaties, they at length obtained his consent, to accompany them to the Synod. When he arrived there, after manifesting great reluctance, he was monk, as published by the Bollandists, we read, "in obuiam sibi navigare ad Coquedese petivit," &c.—Lib. iii., sect. 6, tomus iii., Martii, p. 121.

<sup>22</sup> This Aldfrid died, A.D. 705.

<sup>23</sup> However, the Benedictine Monk of Lindisfarne states, that he was then living in the island of Hy, which was the seat of St. Columba's famous institute. See Tertia Vita S. Cuthberti, lib. iii., sect. 6. The Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xx., p. 121.

<sup>24</sup> "Cuthbertus in synodo apud Twiforde juxta Alne flu: a Theodoro archiepiscopo Cantuar: in episcopum Lindisfar: electus est."—Leland, "De Rebus Britannicis Collectanea," vol. ii., p. 327.

<sup>25</sup> He was born at Tarsus, and his knowledge was so profound, that he was called the Philosopher. He was consecrated by Pope Vitalian, March 26th, A.D. 668. See Rev. John Alzog's "Manual of Universal Church History," vol. ii. Period 2. Epoch 1. Part i., chap. i., sect. 156, p. 61. Translation in English, by Rev. F. J. Pabisch and Rev. Thomas Byrne. Dublin Edition, 1879 et seq., 8vo.

<sup>26</sup> See John Britton's "History of the

compelled to assume duties of the episcopal office. However, he was not consecrated, until the following year, 685, at York.<sup>27</sup> During this year, the confirmation of his prophecy was also realized; for Egfrid was slain,<sup>28</sup> in a battle, fought against the Picts, while his brother, Alfrid, lately arrived from Ireland, succeeded him on the throne.<sup>29</sup> On the day of our saint's consecration, Eata was transferred from Lindisfarne See to another, with his own consent, as also with that of King Egfrid, Archbishop Theodore,<sup>30</sup> Bishop Cedd,<sup>31</sup> and other bishops, while Cuthbert assumed the government of his vacant bishopric. Egfrid bestowed upon him a tract of land in York, extending from the wall of St. Peter, to the great western city gate, and to a wall on the south side. Besides this, he presented the village of Creik, to our saint, with a circuit of land, extending around it, for the space of three miles, so that Cuthbert might have a resting-place there, during his journeys to and from York. Here, he founded a monastery, and he placed an Abbot over it. The king also gave him Carlisle city,<sup>32</sup> with a great portion of the adjacent country. There our saint established a community of nuns, with an Abbess presiding over them, and he likewise founded some schools. Cuthbert having raised a boy from the dead, in a village called Exenford, Egfrid gave him a tract of land, called Carthmel; and, after his victory over Vulfer, King of the Mercians, the same munificent prince bestowed upon him Mailros, and its dependent lands.<sup>33</sup> Before assuming the episcopal charge, Cuthbert returned to his island, where, for some time, he gave himself up to devout prayer and meditation. Then, he was invited to Mailros, by Eata, for the purpose of holding a short conference. On Cuthbert's return, he was met by one of King Egfrid's officers, who besought the saint to visit his village and house, to impart a blessing. When he consented to do so, this officer received him with much reverence, and told him that one of his servants was very ill; adding at the same time, he gave thanks to God, because Cuthbert deigned to honour his house with a visit, not doubting, but this arrival should be an occasion of great profit, spiritually and temporally, for the members of his family. Having blessed some water, Cuthbert gave it to a servant of the officer, who was named Baldhelm.<sup>34</sup> Afterwards, he became a priest of Lindisfarne, in the time of Venerable Bede, to whom he related this occurrence. Baldhelm being desired by Cuthbert, to give this water, that the sick man might drink; on pouring it the third Antiquities of Canterbury, with the Architecture of the edifice, Biographical Anecdotes of the Archbishops," &c. A.D. 1821, royal folio.

<sup>27</sup> See Poole's and Hugall's "Historical and Descriptive Account of the Cathedral Church of St. Peter's, York, and its Antiquities, and Chronological List of the Archbishops," &c. York, A.D. 1850, 4to.

<sup>28</sup> According to Venerable Bede, in his "Breviarium," or Epitome of his History, thus: "anno sexcentesimo octuagesimo quinto Egfridus Rex Nordanthumbrorum occisus est." Florence of Worcester and Matthew of Westminster, in their Annals, at the same year agree.

<sup>29</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxiv., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xxxiii., xxxiv.

<sup>30</sup> His feast occurs, at the 19th of September. He died A.D. 690, in the eighty-eighth year of his age, having been Archbishop over Canterbury See for twenty-two years.

See an account of him, in Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. ix. September xix.

<sup>31</sup> There were two holy brothers, bearing this name: one known as Bishop of London and Apostle of the Midland English and East Saxons, venerated on the 7th of January; the other called Bishop of Lichfield and Apostle of the Mercians, venerated on the 2nd of March. At these dates, owing to their connexion with Ireland, notices will be found in this work.

<sup>32</sup> See that excellent illustrated work, S. Jefferson's "History of Carlisle, account of the Castles, Seats, Antiquities in the vicinity, eminent Men," &c., published at Carlisle, A.D. 1838, 8vo.

<sup>33</sup> See Capgrave's Life, cap. xxxv., xxxvi.

<sup>34</sup> See Rt. Rev. Bishop Moran's "Irish Saints in Great Britain," chap. xi., pp. 293, 294.

time into the patient's mouth, he fell into a profound sleep. This happened towards evening, and on the following morning, the patient was perfectly restored to health.<sup>35</sup> Having assumed the grave responsibilities of his episcopal office, after Apostolic examples and precepts, Cuthbert endeavoured to ornament this high station, by his virtues and good works. His prayers were constantly offered, for the flock entrusted to his care; and, by salutary instructions, he led them to a knowledge and love of holy things, first teaching them by his own example, those virtues he desired them to practise. He protected the poor and the oppressed; he consoled afflicted and dejected persons; he brought sinners to repentance; he gave food to the hungry and clothing to the naked. Towards himself, he omitted none of his accustomed rigorous observances, often shunning the society of men, to engage in his monastic exercises. He displayed all perfections of the episcopal character, in discharging every duty belonging to his state.<sup>36</sup>

As related by the authentic chronicles of the time, King Egfrid led an army against the Picts, in the year 685.<sup>37</sup> Cuthbert had been divinely admonished, as related to Egfrid, regarding his impending fate, and the holy prelate set out towards Carlisle city, that he might prepare the queen for such calamitous event—she being then a resident in her sister's monastery, whilst awaiting the expected return of her husband.<sup>38</sup> On the following day, some citizens conducted our saint to their city walls, that he might see a remarkable fountain, formerly constructed by the Romans. While resting on his staff, he appeared profoundly affected with grief; his eyes were bent, first towards earth, and then, he raised them towards heaven. At length, heaving a deep sigh, he said in a subdued voice: "Perhaps, at this very time, a great misfortune is impending." A priest, standing by his side, conjecturing rightly the circumstance to which he alluded, asked him how this was known to him; but, Cuthbert felt unwilling to declare the revelation, made by the Almighty. He only said, "Do you not see how the air is wondrously disturbed and changed? yet, who can fathom the judgments of God?" It being Saturday, our saint at once went to the queen, and told her, to ascend her chariot immediately, as it was not lawful to travel on the following day. He urged her to proceed towards the royal city, adding, that perchance the king was killed. He promised to attend on her, in a short time, after having dedicated a church, belonging to a neighbouring monastery, on the following day. Having preached to brethren, connected with this monastery, towards the conclusion of his discourse, Cuthbert said: "I beseech you, dearly beloved, that you watch according to the advice of the Apostle—that you remain steadfast in the faith—that you act bravely, and have fortitude, lest any temptation, coming on you, should find you unprepared. Be mindful always of that precept of our Lord, "Watch and pray, that you enter not into temptation." His

<sup>35</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxv.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., cap. xxvi.

<sup>37</sup> In the edition of Venerable Bede's Works, printed at Cologne, at lib. iv., cap. 24, of his English History, it is incorrectly stated, "anno Dominicæ incarnationis sexcentesimo quarto," that he sent an army into Hibernia to devastate that country; and, in the following year, he was killed. However, this seems only to have been an error of the press, which has set A.D. 604, for A.D. 684. In the former year, he was not even born, for he fell in 685, according to Venerable Bede himself, in the fortieth year of his age, and in the fifth year of his reign.

<sup>38</sup> "Rex Egfridus, cum temere ad vastandam Scotorum Provinciam exercitum duxisset multum prohibentibus amicis, et maxime beatæ memoriæ Sancto Cuthberto, qui nuper fuit ordinatus Episcopus, introductus est, simulantibus fugam hostibus, in angustias inaccessorum montium, et cum maxima parte copiarum quas secum adduxerat est extinctus."—Fordun's "Scoti Chronicon, sive Scotorum Historia," lib. iii., cap. xliii. p. 648. See Gale's "Historiæ Britannicæ Saxonicæ, Anglo-Danicæ Scriptores xv."

auditors thought he alluded to the return of a pestilence, which raged in the neighbouring country, some short time before, when he again resumed: "Formerly, when I remained solitary on my island, certain brethren came to me, on the festival of our Lord's Nativity, and entreated me to leave my cell, that I might spend that day with them, in a joyous manner. I assented to their request, and, when sitting down in the midst of a banquet, I said to them: 'I beseech you, brethren, to observe this day with great reverence, for it is the natal day of our Lord Jesus Christ.' But, in a short time, while we indulged in feasting, hilarity, and conversation, I began to admonish them a second time, that we should be solicitous in watching and prayer, and that we should be prepared for the assaults of temptation. They replied, that I taught them a good lesson; but, however, as their days of fasting, prayer, and vigil, were many, rather they ought rejoice in the Lord on this day. For the Angel, at the birth of our Saviour, announced great joy to the shepherds, which was extended to all people. I said, 'It is well, let us do so.' But, having relapsed, during the banquet, into their former merriment, a third time I admonished them, in the same words, when they understood, that I would not so earnestly repeat them without cause. In fear, they said, 'Let us do as you require, for a great necessity compels us, that always being prepared, we may watch against diabolic snares and temptations.' Saying these things, I was ignorant, as they were, regarding the occurrence of any new temptation; but, by an interior instinct, I was warned on a necessity, for having the soul always fortified against sudden storms of temptation. Yet, when they left me in the morning for Lindisfarne monastery, behold! they found some of their companions dead, having been stricken with the plague. It continued to rage, and to increase in violence, for days and months, and almost during an entire year. Nearly the whole of that venerable company of fathers and brethren were called to bliss. And now, therefore, brethren, watch you also in prayer, that you likewise be found prepared, should any tribulation threaten you." As already said, these words were thought to forebode a return of the plague, until, on the following day, news was brought by a fugitive, that the king was slain in battle, and that his guards were killed around him. These events happened, at that very moment of our saint's standing at the Roman fountain, when they were revealed to his prophetic mind.<sup>39</sup> A short time after these occurrences, Cuthbert had occasion to visit Carlisle,<sup>40</sup> for a purpose of ordaining some priests, and of investing the queen herself with the religious habit. At this time, a priest, named Herbert,<sup>41</sup> or Herebert,<sup>42</sup> who led a solitary life, at the source of the Derwentwater, and who was a friend of the saint, took an opportunity to visit him, according to his annual custom, and for the express purpose of engaging in religious conferences. While these holy men were thus employed, amongst other things, Cuthbert said: "Remember, brother Herebert, you

<sup>39</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxvii., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xxxviii.

<sup>40</sup> It is said to have been called Caer-Luil or Caer-Leol, in ancient times, from Luil, a British potentate, reputed to have been its founder. See Lewis's "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. i., p. 515.

<sup>41</sup> "Recluse he lived
Within a woody isle of that fair lake
By Derwent lulled and Greta. Others thronged Round Cuthbert's steps; that hermit stood apart

With large dark eyes upon his countenance fixed,
And pale cheek dewed with tears. The name he bore
Was 'Herbert of the Lake.'"

—Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of the Saxon Saints," p. 190.

<sup>42</sup> Venerable Bede relates the death of Herebert, as occurring on the 20th of March, in his "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," lib. iv., cap. 29. He is mentioned, at the same day, by Hugh Menard, and in the English Martyrology.

tell me, at this time, and ask me all important things, since after we part again, we shall never see each other in this life. For, I am assured, the time of my dissolution approaches, and the deposition of my body is near." On hearing these words, Herebert fell at his friend's feet, and with tears and groans, he replied: "I beseech you, in the name of our Lord, that you desert me not, but that you will be mindful of your companion, and entreat the Almighty, as we have served him together in this life, we may also enjoy together the vision of his glory in heaven. Indeed, you know, that I have always endeavoured to live in obedience to your commands, and whatever faults I have committed, through frailty or ignorance, I have been careful to correct, according to your wishes." Cuthbert told him to arise, and that his desire should be accomplished.<sup>43</sup> The event was a fulfilment of this prophecy; for, on the departure of Herebert, these friends never more beheld each other with corporal sight, while their translation to heaven took place, on the same day, and at the same moment of time.<sup>44</sup>

The miracles St. Cuthbert performed were very numerous. One day, whilst engaged in a visitation of his diocese, during which he preached and gave confirmation, in all its towns and villages, our holy bishop came to the house of a certain Earl, named Hemna,<sup>45</sup> or Heunna,<sup>46</sup> whose wife lay at the point of death. This man received the saint, with great joy and veneration, giving thanks to God, for the arrival of such a guest. When the prelate's hands and feet had been washed, according to a usual custom, he received an account regarding the dangerous state of his hospitable entertainer's wife. The count wished our saint to sprinkle her with holy water, that thus she might be restored to health, through God's mercy, or that she might pass with greater ease, from her sufferings in this life. Holy water having been brought, Cuthbert directed a priest to sprinkle it on the patient, who immediately awakened from a deep stupor, in which she lay, and she was soon restored to perfect health. The lady then gave thanks to God, who had deigned to conduct such guests to her house, they being instruments under him of her recovery. Afterwards, she did the honours of the table, and exercised offices of hospitality, towards the holy bishop and his attendants.<sup>47</sup> A miracle of like nature was wrought, by our saint, in the presence of many persons. Amongst others, Edilwald,<sup>48</sup> Abbot of Mailrose, in Bede's time, was an eye-witness. While the saint was engaged at one of his visitations, he came to a village, where a community of holy women found refuge, at the instance of Cuthbert, when driven from their own house, through a fear of hostile marauders. One of these nuns—a relative to the aforesaid Edilwald—had been afflicted during an entire year with an intolerable pain in the head and side, which baffled the skill of her physicians. This being made known to Cuthbert, he anointed her with holy oil. From that hour, she began to grow better, and she was perfectly restored, in a few days.<sup>49</sup> Hilmer, the prefect—whose wife had been dispossessed of an evil spirit by our saint, as already mentioned—fell into a grievous distemper, <sup>43</sup> "Then Cuthbert knelt and prayed. At last he spake :—

'Thy prayer is heard; the self-same day and hour
We two shall die.'"

—Aubrey De Vere's "Legends of the Saxon Saints," p. 205.

<sup>44</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxviii., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xxxix.

<sup>45</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's 'Lives of the Saints,' vol. iii., March 20, p. 350.

<sup>46</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xx. De Sancto Cuthberto, &c. Tertia Vita S. Cuthberti, lib. iv., sect. 3, p. 122. This Life is said to have been written by a contemporaneous monk of Lindisfarne.

<sup>47</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxix., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xl.

<sup>48</sup> He afterwards succeeded St. Eadburt, successor of St. Cuthbert, in the See of Lindisfarne, according to Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica, Gentis Anglorum," lib. v. cap. i. Hedied, in the year 738, according to Matthew which brought him to the verge of dissolution.<sup>50</sup> Many of his friends came to visit him, and amongst others, one, who said he brought with him bread, which had been blessed by Cuthbert; adding, also, that he believed, if it were tasted by the sick man, with unwavering faith, it must prove the means of restoring him to health. All those, who were present, being pious lay persons, concurred in this opinion. A cup was filled with water, when a small portion of bread was put in it. The sick man having drank, he felt quite restored.<sup>51</sup> At another time, when the saint was making a visitation, through a mountainous and rural district, many from the surrounding villagers were brought, that he might impose hands on them. No church or place could be found, suitable for the bishop's habitation, and for that of his companions, who were obliged to cut down branches of trees to erect tents, for two days they remained here, whilst engaged in evangelizing and confirming the people. Amongst others, there appeared two women, bearing a young man, wasted with a long sickness; having laid him down on his bed, at an entrance to a wood, they sent to request the bishop, that their helpless charge might be allowed to appear in his presence, for the purpose of receiving his benediction. This request was granted, and when Cuthbert invoked a blessing on the patient, he was restored to health. Immediately rising, he partook of food, and, full of gratitude to God, he returned with the women, who had brought him into the saint's presence.<sup>52</sup> About this same time, a great mortality prevailed, through all the villages and towns in Lindisfarne diocese, so that, in many instances, the houses were left destitute of inhabitants. But, Cuthbert was not unmindful of a good pastor's duty, during the prevalence of this calamity. Having entered a certain village, which was called Medelpong,<sup>53</sup> ministering to the people's wants, he asked a priest, named Tidus,<sup>54</sup> who accompanied him, if he thought any remained, who had not availed themselves of the religious opportunities afforded them, as himself and his companions were about to leave for another station.<sup>55</sup> On looking around, a woman was observed in great affliction. Her son had just died, and she held another son in her arms, whose death was momentarily expected. Soon as the saint beheld her, he approached, and kissed the boy, while imparting a blessing. At the same time, he said to the mother: "Fear not, for no other member of your family shall die during this plague." The mother and her son lived, and for a long time afterwards, as authoritative vouchers for the truth of this prediction.<sup>56</sup>

CHAPTER IV.

PROPHETIC WARNING OF CUTHBERT'S APPROACHING DEATH—HIS VISION AT ABBESS ELFLEDA'S CONVENT—HE RETIRES TO LINDISFARNE, IN PREPARATION FOR HIS DEPARTURE—HIS LAST ILLNESS AND INSTRUCTIONS TO HIS MONKS—ST. CUTHBERT'S HOLY DEATH—DEPOSITION OF HIS REMAINS, AND VARIOUS REMOVALS OF HIS SHRINE—THE CATHEDRAL OF DURHAM—DESECRATION OF ST. CUTHBERT'S SHRINE IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY—SUBSEQUENT EXPLORATIONS TO DISCOVER HIS REMAINS—CALENDAR COMMEMORATIONS, CHURCHES AND CHAPELS BUILT TO HONOUR HIM—WRITINGS AND MEMORIALS—CONCLUSION.

OUR saint, having a presentiment of his approaching death, had desired a return to his solitude, that thus he might make preparation for his entrance of Westminster. Menard treats of him, at the 6th of January; the English Martyrology places his feast, at the 12th of February.

<sup>49</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxx.

<sup>50</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," De Sancto Cuthberto, &c. Vita Prima S. Cuthberti, cap. ix., sect. 49, pp. 110, 111.

<sup>51</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxxi., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xli.

<sup>52</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxxii.

<sup>53</sup> So states the contemporaneous monk of Lindisfarne.

to the joys of the blessed. With such view, he undertook a last visitation of his churches and religious houses, that he might set all things in order, and give his final instructions to the faithful. Being thus engaged, he was asked by the Abbess Elfred, or Elfleda, to visit one of her properties, on which a church had been erected, but still wanting consecration.<sup>1</sup> Whilst our saint was seated at table, in the monastery of this Abbess, his mind was suddenly diverted from the viands before him, his colour changed, and his eyes assumed a peculiar brilliancy, while the knife he held dropped from his hand. A priest in waiting, turning to the Abbess in a private manner, requested her to ask the bishop what he had seen; adding, that he knew the saint must have had a vision, which others could not behold, on account of changes over his countenance and because of his trembling hands. Elfred preferred this request to him; but, wishing to conceal what had occurred, he said in a jocose manner, "Why should I be able to eat the whole day? Ought I not rest at last?" As the Abbess still persisted in knowing the cause of this emotion, he at length said: "I saw the soul of a certain holy man brought by Angels, to the glory of heaven." Elfred asked, from what place he was brought, and likewise his name. The saint replied, that he belonged to her own monastery, and that she herself would declare the name, when he was about to celebrate Mass. On hearing this, the lady sent to learn who had lately died in her monastery. On the following day she heard, that one of her shepherds, who was a pious man, had incautiously ascended a tree, from which he fell, being killed about the time Cuthbert had a vision of his translation to heaven. This shepherd's name was Hadunald,<sup>2</sup> as the Abbess told Cuthbert, while he was preparing to celebrate Mass, and engaged at offices for the dedication of a church.<sup>3</sup>

Leaving this place, the saint came to a house of holy virgins, presided over by the Abbess, Verca;<sup>4</sup> and, this nunnery was situated, not far from the mouth of the River Tyne. While here, our saint, complaining of thirst, was asked what he would wish to drink—wine and beer, in turn, having been offered him. But, he desired water, which was accordingly drawn for him, from a neighbouring fountain. Having blessed it, he drank a little, and then he passed the water to a priest, who was near, and who again returned it to the servant. This latter asked, if it were lawful for him to drink from a cup used by the bishop, and being told it was, he drank; but, to his taste, this water had the flavour of wine, and on calling another of his brethren to taste it, he also pronounced a like opinion. Then, a declaration was made, that they had never tasted wine of more superior flavour. One of these men afterwards became an inmate of a monastery, at the mouth of the River Vuir. Venerable Bede testifies, that he received this account, from the lips of that brother; but, he happened to be dead, at the time when Bede wrote our saint's biography.<sup>5</sup> Indeed, the spiritual labours and great miracles of this holy man were numerous and of an extraordinary character.<sup>6</sup> Having dis-

<sup>1</sup> According to the account given by the contemporaneous monk of Lindisfarne.

<sup>2</sup> See Le Comte de Montalembert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., p. 419.

<sup>3</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxxiii., and Capgrave's Life, cap. xlii.

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER IV.—<sup>1</sup> See Le Comte de Montalembert's "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., pp. 425, 426.

<sup>2</sup> Hadpuald is the name given to him by the Monk of Lindisfarne, lib. iv., sect. 10, where this incident is related.

<sup>3</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xxxiv. Capgrave's Life, cap. xliii.

<sup>4</sup> The name of this holy woman, as here given, is not to be found in the Martyrologies. See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 27, p. 678.

<sup>5</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xxxv. Capgrave's Life, cap. xliv.

<sup>6</sup> See Abbé Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome ix., liv. xl., sect. xliii., pp. 95 to 97.

<sup>7</sup> The Lindisfarne Monk states, that he enjoyed the ministration and conversation of charged the duties of his episcopal office, for a term of two years, and finding his span of life about to close, Cuthbert resolved on abdicating the pastoral charge, by retiring again to his place of retreat, there to engage more closely in communion with God.<sup>7</sup> Many of his brethren continued to visit him, while in this island. On one particular occasion, when thus visited, after giving his guests a suitable instruction, he requested them to partake of food, which he had provided for them, before their intended return. However, having provisions of their own, they did not use those, which were furnished by our saint. Having refreshed themselves, they prepared to embark, when a great storm arose, which detained them during seven days on his island. While waiting a safe opportunity to sail, they had frequent interviews with Cuthbert, who visited them on the seventh day, at a house, where they lodged. On entering it, he saw that fowl, which he had recommended them to eat, still untouched. Then playfully chiding them, for disobedience to his wishes, he insisted on their preparing it for food, promising also the sea should become so tranquil, as to afford them a safe return. On complying with this request, the storm ceased, and those monks were enabled to leave. All particulars of this narrative, Venerable Bede gleaned from a holy priest, named Herefrid, who formed one of the company,<sup>8</sup> and who was held in great respect for his piety. At that time, he was Abbot of Lindisfarne.<sup>9</sup>

The solemn festival of our Lord's Nativity, A.D. 686, being over, a band of monks, who had visited him, were about returning to the mainland. When Cuthbert stood with them on the sea-shore, a venerable monk, whose frame was weakened by dysentery, asked him, when they should again return. Our saint, who had now a foreknowledge of death's near approach, said: "When you shall bear my body hence." Having spent almost two months, practising exercises of most rigorous penance, he was seized with a sudden illness.

His infirmity commenced on a Wednesday, and it terminated fatally on the same day,<sup>10</sup> having continued for three weeks. Before three days had elapsed, after the beginning of his sickness, Venerable Bede himself, with some of his brethren, visited Farne Island, for the purpose of receiving the holy man's blessing and admonitions. Having given a preconcerted sign, Cuthbert approached the window, and sighed deeply; then Bede inquired, if illness had seized on him, during the night. Cuthbert having replied in the affirmative, Bede thought it must have been the return of a chronic complaint, under which he laboured, and not a new sickness. He therefore said: "Give us thy benediction, for now it is time to sail, and return homewards." "Do as you say," the holy prelate replied, "go on board, and return home, in safety. But when God shall have received my soul, bury my body in this cell, close to my oratory, and towards the south, near the eastern side of that holy cross, which I have there erected."<sup>11</sup> Towards the northern part of this same oratory, there is a sarcophagus, buried in the earth, and which venerable Abbot Cudda<sup>12</sup> formerly gave me; place my body in this, wrapping it in fine linen, Angels, in his moments of solitude. See lib. iv., sect. 11, p. 123. "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii. Martii xx.

<sup>8</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xxxvi. Capgrave's Life, cap. xlv.

<sup>9</sup> See Bishop Challoner's "Britannia Sancta," part i., March 20, p. 195.

<sup>10</sup> See Abbé Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome ix., liv. xl., sect. xliii., p. 97.

<sup>11</sup> This mandate proves the antique Christian custom of erecting crosses in cemeteries, to serve as sepulchral monuments for departed persons.

<sup>12</sup> Colgan remarks, that under this name he has nothing to note, unless perhaps for Cudda we should rather substitute the reading of Ceadda. In this case, he thinks it may be the saint called Ceadda, who was abbot and bishop, and whose feast is at the 2nd day of March. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 28, p. 678.

<sup>13</sup> Her convent was at Tynemouth, at the

which you shall here find. While living, I would not use it for clothing ; but, for reverence due the holy Abbess, Verca,<sup>13</sup> who sent it to me, I have reserved it to shroud my remains." On hearing these words, Bede interrupted him : " I beseech you, father, since I learn you are ill, and about to die, that you would permit some of the brothers to remain here, as your attendants." But, to this recommendation, the saint only replied, " Go now, but return at a convenient opportunity." Bede still endeavoured to urge on the holy bishop, the necessity for accepting his proposal, but in vain ; then, he asked, when they should return. Cuthbert said, " When the Lord wills it, and signifies it to you." Hereupon, Venerable Bede called the brethren together, and having entered the church, he ordered them to offer up their prayers most earnestly for Cuthbert, whose words seemed to indicate, that the day of his dissolution had nearly arrived. Bede was anxious to return, on account of the holy bishop's infirmity ; but, a storm, which lasted during five days, prevented himself and his companions. This impediment he considers to have been providentially decreed, from events that followed. When the sea was calm, he returned to Farne Island, with some of his brethren ; and, there they found, that our saint had left his cell, to visit the house, in which strangers were received by him. Some necessity requiring the return of his companions, Bede alone remained on Farne Island, ministering to all wants of the holy bishop. Having warmed some water, he washed a bleeding ulcer, on the foot of Cuthbert ; and, seeing from his countenance, that the saint was wasted with fasting and infirmity, Bede requested him to drink a little wine he had heated. These offices being performed, the holy man was placed in a bed. His venerable biographer and friend, then sitting beside him, remarks, that he appeared much worn with sickness, during the absence of himself and of his companions. He, also, expressed wonder, why Cuthbert refused to receive proper attendance. " Through the providence and will of God," he replied, " has it happened, that being deprived of human assistance, I might endure adversity. For, after you departed from me, my weakness continued to increase ; wherefore, leaving my habitation, I came hither, that whosoever approached to render me assistance might find me here, without being obliged to enter my cell. From the time my limbs reposed in this place, I moved not from it, for the last five days and nights, but I remained here in quiet. As often as I felt my mouth parched with thirst and dryness, I took care to refresh myself with this food," pointing to an onion, which was almost half consumed. He resumed, " My spiritual assaults were never stronger, during the whole time of my residence in this island, than during these last five days." Bede did not venture to enquire more particularly, regarding the temptations of which he spoke, but only entreated him to receive some assistants. He consented, at length, and among the religious, who remained with him, was the Elder Bede,<sup>14</sup> a Priest, but, a distinct person from Cuthbert's biographer. This elder Bede was a familiar companion of our saint, acquainted with the existing state of his affairs ; and, therefore, his presence was judged necessary, to remind the prelate of trusts, which might remain unfulfilled, through a want of recollection. He named another person, in a embouchure of the River Tyne, which separated Deira from Bernicia, the two Northumbrian provinces. See Le Comte de Montalembert's " Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., pp. 427, 428, and n. 2.

<sup>14</sup> He is styled, Beda Major, by Venerable Bede ; but, Colgan is not able to find his name occurring, in any of the Martyrologies, unless he be a Bede, whom the people of Genoa are said to venerate, at the 10th of April, and who was buried, in the monastery of St. Benignus. See Arnold Wion's " Lignum Vitæ," at that date. However, as Colgan shows, from traditions and accounts regarding him, this holy man could not have been either the Elder Bede, here alluded to, nor the Venerable Bede, as some special manner, to remain with him. This brother was suffering from dysentery, which baffled the skill of his physicians ; but, being a man of great prudence, gravity and virtue, he was a faithful witness, regarding the closing actions of our saint's life. His biographer, Bede, leaving Farne Island, returned to the mainland. There he informed the monastic brothers, that Cuthbert expressed a wish to be buried on the island. He remarked, however : "It seems to me better and more advisable, to obtain permission from him, that his body be transferred to this place, and here buried, with suitable honour, in the church." This advice was well received. Venerable Bede with others returned and told the bishop, that they would not gainsay a desire he expressed, of being interred on the island ; but, however, they thought it right to entreat him, that he should consent to have his remains afterwards transferred to Lindisfarne. The dying saint replied : "Indeed, it was my wish to depose my body in this isle, where whatever efforts I made for God were performed. Here, I desire to end my course, and, hence, I hope the clement judge will raise me to a crown of justice ; and, for you, also, I think it better, that I rest here, on account of incursions to be feared from outcasts and enemies. Again, perchance, many shall fly for refuge to my remains, as whatever I may be, fame has divulged it abroad, that I am the servant of Christ. You may often be obliged to negotiate for my relics with princes, and therefore shall you suffer much inconvenience, from the possession of my body." His friends representing to him, with much earnestness, that a labour of this kind should prove not only light but grateful, Cuthbert after some thought replied : "If you wish to oppose my desires, and to take my body with you, it appears to me advisable, you should bury it in the church vaults, that you may be able to visit my tomb when you wish, and that others who come to you may enjoy the same privilege." Those, who heard him speak in this manner, thanked him for his permission and recommendation, on bended knees, and, then returning home, they renewed their visits, at intervals, to Farne Island.<sup>15</sup>

When Cuthbert found the time of death approaching, with a rapid progress of his disease ; about the third hour, one day, he was removed, at his own request, towards his cell and oratory. Amongst others, Bede assisted in bearing him, for the holy man felt unable to walk. When they approached his cell door, the monks asked permission, that some of them might be allowed to remain, as his assistants ; although they knew, for many years past, the saint suffered no person but himself, to enter this hermitage. Looking around him, he saw a brother, named Vualchstod, or Walchstod,<sup>16</sup> and who has been already spoken of, as wasted with dysentery. To him the saint granted this coveted permission. Having remained with the holy man, until the ninth hour, Vualchstod came out and called Venerable Bede, saying : "The bishop requires thy presence ; and, I can now relate to you a wonderful occurrence, for, from the time I entered and touched the prelate, when leading him to the oratory, I felt myself immediately relieved from every symptom of my long infirmity."<sup>17</sup> On entering the oratory, about the ninth hour, Venerable Bede found holy Bishop Cuthbert before the altar, in a recumbent posture. Then, he entered into a conversation with Cuthbert, who spoke with great difficulty. Amongst other matters, the pious and learned ecclesiastic was solicitous to know, what would be the valedictory instructions of our saint, to his religious brethren. The servant of God then gave a few admonitions, with regard to the considered him to have been. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. Vita S. Cuthberti, n. 29, p. 678.

<sup>15</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xxxvii. Capgrave's Life, cap. xlvii.

<sup>16</sup> See Dean Cressy's "Church-History of Brittany," book xix., chap. viii., p. 472.

<sup>17</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xxxviii. Capgrave's Life, cap. xlvii.

absolute necessity of preserving peace and humility, and of avoiding whatever might be calculated to oppose these virtues. "Always preserve peace among yourselves, and divine charity," said he, "and when necessity requires, that you take counsel regarding your state, be careful that you are unanimous in opinion. With other servants of Christ, hold friendly intercourse, and, in a great degree, esteem those as united to you in religion, who come to partake of your hospitality; receive, entertain, and dismiss, in a familiar and benignant manner, such persons, not conceiving yourselves to be superior to others of like faith and conversation. But, with those who differ from you, not observing the unity of Catholic peace, by not duly celebrating Easter at the proper time, or who live perversely, hold no communion. Know well, and bear in memory, that if necessity urge you, to choose between opposing interests; I had much rather, you should remove my bones from the tomb, and retire from those parts, taking up your habitation, wherever it shall please God to appoint, than that, on any account, you should consent to iniquity, or bend your necks to a schismatical yoke. Continue to study and to observe the Catholic decrees of our fathers most diligently; and, be you solicitous to practise those institutes of regular observance, which the Divine mercy has deigned to give you, through my ministry. For, I know, that although I lived in a contemptible manner, according to the estimation of some persons; you shall see, however, after my death, such as I have been, that my precepts are not to be despised."<sup>18</sup> With many interruptions, on account of increasing infirmities, he spoke such sentences; and, with a calm expectation of future felicity, the evening of that day closed. His prayers were prolonged, but in a silent manner, during the night. About the usual time for night prayer, Venerable Bede administered Holy Viaticum and Extreme Unction. Afterwards, raising his eyes to heaven and with uplifted hands, our saint's last breath was exhaled, in an attempt to give thanks to his Creator.<sup>19</sup> He died, on the 20th of March—the day for his festival—and in the year of our Lord, 686,<sup>20</sup> 687,<sup>21</sup> or 688,<sup>22</sup> according to various writers.

Soon, Bede himself went out, to announce the holy bishop's death to his brethren, who were then engaged, in a recital of the Fifty-ninth Psalm, which commences with these words: "Deus repulisti nos, et destruxisti nos: iratus es et misertus est nobis." It must be remarked, that this Psalm occurs, at Matins for Wednesday, in the Roman Breviary; and, as this portion of the Divine Office was usually said by monks of strict observance, before the dawn of day, it is probable, our saint died about the same time, on the morning of the fourth day of the week. Without delay, one of the brethren, taking two torches—one light in either hand—to an elevated part of the island, by this signal, he was enabled to announce the death of our saint, to the monks, who were living in Lindisfarne monastery. The brother, who was appointed to observe this telegraphic signal, from the tower of Lindisfarne, went immediately to its monastic church, where the monks had been engaged, reciting the matutinal office. It was a remarkable coincidence, that as he entered, the choir was engaged in reciting the Fifty-ninth Psalm, as in the former instance, their brethren had done so on the Island of Farne. The body of Cuthbert, being put on board a vessel, was conveyed to Lindisfarne. There, a great multitude

<sup>18</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 20, p. 355.

<sup>19</sup> See Bede's Life, cap. xxxix. Capgrave's Life, cap. xlviii., xlix.

<sup>20</sup> According to Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. iii., p. 31.

See, also, Harris' Ware's Works, vol.

iii., Writers of Ireland, book i., chap. iv., p. 43.

<sup>21</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xviii., sect. iv., p. 89. This is the true date for his death.

<sup>22</sup> See Dempster's "Historia Ecclesiastica of people, and a full choir of religious, chaunting Psalms, received it with due reverence and solemnity. It was afterwards consigned to a sarcophagus of stone, which was placed to the right of St. Peter's altar.<sup>23</sup> Bede relates, that a demoniac was restored, by having a portion of the water, that touched the body of our saint, poured into his mouth; and, he observes, likewise, that a well was shown, near the southern part of the church, where Cuthbert's relics reposed.<sup>24</sup> Many were here cured, from that time forward, as the water already spoken of had been preserved there; while, an elegant framework of wood surrounded this well, which had its margin formed of small stones.<sup>25</sup>

Eleven years<sup>26</sup> after the death of this holy man, when it was supposed his remains had crumbled into dust, the monks of Lindisfarne determined on exhuming his body, so that it might be placed in a shrine, and over that pavement, under which it had previously lain. This design was approved, by Bishop Eadbert, who had ordered the exhumation to take place, on the 20th of March, A.D. 698. On opening the tomb, Cuthbert's body was not only found whole, but even the saint appeared rather to be sleeping than dead; the very garments, in which he had been shrouded, preserving an air of freshness. At this time, holy Bishop Eadbert was spending the time of Lent, in a place remote from the monastery, engaged at exercises of penance and prayer, according to the manner of his venerable predecessor, Cuthbert. Most probably, he was on the Island of Farne; for, it is remarked, by Bede, that he was surrounded by the sea-waves. But, the brethren, who were present at Cuthbert's disentanglement, admiring these miraculous appearances presented to their view, removed a portion of the shrouding which covered the body, as a present for Bishop Eadbert. Through reverence, however, they dared not remove that covering, which adhered more immediately to his body. When the holy bishop beheld this relic presented to him, he kissed it with great reverence, and instructed the brethren, to procure a new covering for Cuthbert's remains, before placing them in the shrine, and to use the cloth instead of that shroud, which had been removed. He predicted, also, the great honour, which Lindisfarne was destined to enjoy, in after time, on account of this miracle. Soon, the brethren of the monastery, acting on their holy prelate's instructions, put a new shroud around the body of our saint. Afterwards, they placed it within a shrine, above the pavement.<sup>27</sup> Eadbert, who did not long survive this occurrence, was laid in the former tomb of Cuthbert. The shrine of this latter saint was placed over his body.<sup>28</sup>

The signs and wonders of Cuthbert's sanctity seemed to increase, even after his remains had been deposited in the tomb. Venerable Bede relates some miracles, which in his time were wrought at Lindisfarne, through the merits and intercession of this great servant of God. These narratives may be found, in the forty-fourth, forty-fifth and forty-sixth chapters, which close his Life of St. Cuthbert. Capgrave adds considerably to this record, and he gives us a very interesting account of Lindisfarne's subsequent history, from the fifty-third to the ninety-fifth, and last chapter, in his biography of our saint. We must rest satisfied, by merely referring the reader to these particulars, on account of the considerable length, to which our notices of St. Cuthbert have already extended. In passing to other topics, however,

Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. iii., num. 234, p. 136.

<sup>23</sup> Bede's Life of St. Cuthbert, cap. xl.

<sup>24</sup> Most likely, this is the miracle alluded to in the Life of our saint, attributed to a coeval monk, as published in the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii

xx. Tertia Vita, lib. iv., sect. 15, p. 124.

<sup>25</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xli.

<sup>26</sup> See Bishop Challoner's "Britannia Sancta," part i., March 20, p. 196.

<sup>27</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xlii. Capgrave's Life, cap. l.

<sup>28</sup> Bede's Life, cap. xliii.

we might remark on the great works done, through the religious foundation of Lindisfarne, from a missionary point of view.<sup>29</sup>

About 793,<sup>30</sup> the Danes made a descent upon Lindisfarne, when the monastery was nearly destroyed.<sup>31</sup> The monks had removed the remains of St. Cuthbert, and then, they fled with them into Scotland.<sup>32</sup> They went westwards to Whithern, in Galloway; but, when they sought to escape into Ireland, they were driven back by a furious tempest. The relics were afterwards moved to Norham, and thence to Melrose. Here they were kept, but only for a short time. The body, enclosed in a stone coffin, was launched upon the Tweed, and then conveyed to Tilmouth, in Northumberland.<sup>33</sup> In fine, the relics of St. Cuthbert were deposited, A.D. 999, by Bishop Aldhune,<sup>34</sup> on a steep plateau, in the form of a horse-shoe, where a chapel had been built, in 995.<sup>35</sup> This place was called Durham,<sup>36</sup> and at present, its gorgeous Cathedral<sup>37</sup>—a development of Irish Romanesque architecture on a magnificent scale, with later Gothic introductions of style—dominates high over the River Wear, the intermediate bank being covered with a belt of large ascending trees.<sup>38</sup> This remarkable building was erected in 1080;<sup>39</sup> but, it has since undergone various modifications.<sup>40</sup> Two grand towers, five naves, and two transepts,<sup>41</sup> rise beside the former episcopal palace, for to Durham was transferred the See of Lindisfarne, after the relics of our saint had been there permanently en-

<sup>29</sup> This is strongly represented, in the History written by Mr. Bright, of Oxford.

<sup>30</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus ii., lib. xxvi., sect. xxvi., p. 308.

<sup>31</sup> See "Chronicles of St. Colman, and of St. Colman's, Farahy, Diocese of Cloyne." By Rev. Courtenay Moore, M.A., Incumbent, part i., pp. 13, 14.

<sup>32</sup> The whole of this expedition is very circumstantially related, in the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xx. Translatio Corporis ad varia Loca et dein Dunelmum, pp. 124 to 137.

<sup>33</sup> The following are Sir Walter Scott's lines, as found in "Marmion," canto ii., stanza 14, on the frequent removals of St. Cuthbert's remains:—

"Nor did Saint Cuthbert's daughters fail
To vie with these in holy tale;
His body's resting-place of old
How oft their patron changed they told;
How, when the rude Dane burned their pile,
The monks fled forth from Holy Isle;
O'er northern mountain, marsh, and moor—
From sea to sea, from shore to shore,— Seven years Saint Cuthbert's corpse they bore.
They rested them in fair Melrose;
But, though alive he loved it well,
Not there his relics might repose;
For, wondrous tale to tell!
In his stone coffin forth he rides,
A pondrous bark for river tides,
Yet light as gossamer it glides
Downward to Tilmouth cell.
Nor long was his abiding there,
Far southward did the saint repair.

Chester-le-Street and Rippon saw
His holy corpse ere Wardilaw

Hail'd him with joy and fear;
And after many wanderings past,
He chose his lordly seat at last,
Where his Cathedral huge and vast Looks down upon the Wear.
There deep in Durham's Gothic shade
His relics are in secret laid."

<sup>34</sup> This Translation was commemorated, on the 4th of September, at which day a notice of it will be found in this work.

<sup>35</sup> See Britton's "History of Durham, the Towns, Castles, Antiquities, Nobility, Gentry." It contains a map and plates, and it was published, A.D. 1810, in 8vo.

<sup>36</sup> An interesting account of this place will be found, in the "Topographical and Historical Description of Durham," by Rev. T. Cox, with a map and cuts of Antiquities. It was published in 1720, as a small 4to volume.

<sup>37</sup> There is extant a Manuscript, intituled: Farrago Cartarum ad Historiam Ecclesie Dunelmensis spectantium. It is classed, MS. Bodl. 596. (2376). Ff. 203-206 b. vell. folio, xi. cent.

<sup>38</sup> See the Rev. G. Ormsby's "Sketches in Durham, illustrated by Historical, Biographical, and Architectural Notices." Cuts of Seals, Arms, Monuments, are in this work, which was published at Durham, in 1846.

<sup>39</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xx., at St. Cuthbert.

<sup>40</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman, was engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>41</sup> For a very complete technical descrip-shrined. A most competent critic<sup>42</sup> has pronounced the Minster of Durham to be one of the most imposing and best situated Cathedrals, in the wide world.<sup>43</sup> We learn from Monsignor Eyre's work,<sup>44</sup> that a statue<sup>45</sup> had been erected to our saint, four hundred years after his death. The Cathedral and Durham Cathedral, in England.

Monastery of Durham were also richly endowed, in honour of their famous patron; while princes and nobles proved themselves special protectors of the place. The bishop was declared a count palatine, and he obtained a very extensive civil jurisdiction.<sup>46</sup> Yet, Durham and its people suffered, in course of time, from the ravages of war.

William the Conqueror marched with an army towards the North, and on his way devastated the whole country, between York and Durham. This warlike expedition is referred to A.D. 1069.<sup>47</sup> From the city of Durham its inhabitants fled, and the monks left their convent. After a repose of seventy-five years, the bones of St. Cuthbert were once more removed to Lindisfarne. It is said, those who accompanied the relics were enabled to pass over dryshod, to the island on that occasion.<sup>48</sup> When the storm of war had subsided, the holy man's remains were brought to his former resting-place, and de-tion, see the fine folio volume of Robert William Billing, intituled, "Architectural Illustrations and Descriptions of the Cathedral Church at Durham." Published at London, in 1843.

<sup>42</sup> Le Comte de Montalembert.

<sup>43</sup> See "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., p. 436. This is an opinion, in which the writer agrees, from a close and careful inspection of all its surroundings and interior, made on the occasion of a visit, in July, 1872.

<sup>44</sup> "History of St. Cuthbert," &c.

<sup>45</sup> It bore this inscription: "Sanctus Cuthbertus Monachus Episcopus Lindisfarneensis nunc patronus ecclesie ac libertatis Dunelmensis."

<sup>46</sup> See Dugdale's "Monasticon," where he treats about the history of Durham.

<sup>47</sup> See John Speed's "Historie of Great Britaine," book ix., chap. ii., num. 17, p. 428.

<sup>48</sup> See this account furnished, in a very interesting article on Durham City, in Lewis'

posited in a shrine. It is related, that in the twelfth century, on the 29th of August, A.D. 1104,<sup>49</sup> the body of our saint was translated, and found to be entire.<sup>50</sup> It was publicly shown at Durham,<sup>51</sup> by Radulph, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury.

In the time of King Henry VIII., the shrine of St. Cuthbert was plundered<sup>52</sup> and demolished. The officials bore off his rich shrine, having removed the body, which was found to be entire.<sup>53</sup> Afterwards, the monks buried it privately, and under the spot,<sup>54</sup> where the faithful for so many ages had paid it such marked reverence. But, with the change of religious belief, a knowledge of the grave passed away from popular traditions, so that the exact spot now appears to be unknown.<sup>55</sup> Within the present century, the site of St. Cuthbert's relics was thought to have been ascertained; and, accordingly, in May, 1827, preparations were made for their disinterment. Under a blue stone, in the middle of the presumed shrine of St. Cuthbert, and at the eastern extremity of the choir of Durham Cathedral, was then found a walled grave, containing the supposed coffin of our saint. The first, or outer one, was said to have been that of 1541; the second of 1041; the third, or inner one, answered in every particular to the description of that, referred to A.D. 698.<sup>56</sup> This was found to contain—not, indeed, as had been averred then, and even until 1539, the incorruptible body, but the entire skeleton of the saint; the bottom of the grave was perfectly dry, free from offensive smell, and without the slightest symptom, that a human body had ever undergone decomposition within its walls.<sup>57</sup> The skeleton was found and swathed in five silk robes of emblematical embroidery; the ornamental parts were laid with gold-leaf, and these again were covered with a robe of "Topographical Dictionary of England," vol. ii., pp. 110, 111.

<sup>49</sup> For a further account, the reader is referred to that date, in the present work.

<sup>50</sup> See Rev. John Lingard's "Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," chap. viii., p. 162.

<sup>51</sup> See William of Malmesbury, Liber iv., "De Pontificibus Anglie."

<sup>52</sup> A copy of St. John's Gospel was found in the coffin, and in the eighteenth century, the Earl of Litchfield bestowed this precious document, on Rev. Thomas Philips, Canon of Tongres.

<sup>53</sup> According to the testimony of Harpsfield, sæc. vii., chap. 34.

<sup>54</sup> As we learn from "Ancient Rites of the Church of Durham," p. 160.

<sup>55</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xx., at St. Cuthbert.

<sup>56</sup> We have an interesting account, written by Rev. James Raine, and entitled: "St. Cuthbert; with an account of the state in which his Remains were found, upon the opening of his tomb, in Durham Cathedral, in the year MDCCCXXVII." Durham, 1828. This book contains four plates. This work elicited a reply—in which some exceptions are taken to his statements—from Rev. Dr. Lingard, and it is intitled: "Remarks on the Saint Cuthbert of the Rev. James Raine." It was published at Newcastle, 1828, 8vo.

<sup>57</sup> So lately as the month of July, 1872, a writer in the Quarterly Review states:—

"There can be no reasonable doubt, that these were the actual remains of St. Cuthbert. It is quite possible, that the body may have been incorrupt, when it was first disinterred in 698. Instances are known in which, from natural causes, bodies have remained perfect for a considerable length of time. But it would seem that, probably long before the translation in 1104 (when only one or two persons were allowed to touch it), what passed for the incorrupt St. Cuthbert had been in truth a skeleton so shrouded and enveloped in robes as to give the appearance of an entire body. The cavities of the eyes in the skull of the saint had been filled with round artificial balls of a whitish colour; indicating, perhaps, that when first the actual body showed signs of collapsing, these balls had been inserted to give the full outline beneath the face-cloth, which no one was ever allowed to raise." Respecting the relics, taken from among the robes, the same writer makes the following rather ill-considered remarks:—"They comprise, among others, a cross of gold of very ancient form, and set with garnets. It may well have been worn by St. Cuthbert in his lifetime; but, it is more certain, that a small portable altar—a square slip of oak plated with silver—is a personal relic of the saint. Only portions of the silver plating remain; and the oak beneath is inscribed with letters, linen. Besides the skeleton were deposited several gold and silver insignia, with other relics of the saint.<sup>58</sup>

At the present time, some doubt seems to prevail, regarding that exact spot, in which the body had been deposited.<sup>59</sup> In September, 1867, certain explorations took place, to ascertain its discovery and identification,<sup>60</sup> owing to the circumstance, that a hereditary Roman Catholic of Gateshead became a Protestant, and gave up a paper, on which was written a secular tradition.<sup>61</sup> This paper was said to have been taken from the inside of a waistcoat, belonging to a former Vicar-Apostolic.<sup>62</sup> The information given was ascertained to have been no hoax; and, accordingly, the late Protestant Dean Waddington invited some of the Fathers from Ushaw College, and the head of the English Benedictines, to witness the explorations. Digging was commenced, yet nothing was found but concrete and rock.<sup>63</sup>

In Ireland, the festival of St. Cuthbert, Bishop and Confessor, was formerly observed with an Office, containing Nine Lessons,<sup>64</sup> on the xiii. Kalends of April, corresponding with March 20th. In Rev. Dr. Kelly's edition of the "Martyrology of Tallagh," we find entered, at the xiii. of the Kalends of April, March 20th: "Cutbricti Saxonis (i. Insi Menoc)<sup>65</sup> Innse Menoc."<sup>66</sup> Our Irish writers frequently apply the term Saxon, to those saints of their country, who laboured among the Saxons. We do not discover any mention of this saint, in the Irish Calendar, preserved in the Royal Irish Academy, at the xiii. of the Kalends of April. The Scottish Kalendars have notices of this holy man, at the 20th of March, thus: the Kalendar of Drummond records his Natale, as Guthbert, in Britain;<sup>67</sup> also the Kalendar of Hyrdmanstown, as St. Cuthbert, Bishop and Confessor;<sup>68</sup> the Kalendar of Culenros has St. Cuthbert, Bishop;<sup>69</sup> the Kalendar De Nova Farina enters him, in a like manner;<sup>70</sup> the Kalendar of Arbuthnott has St. Cuthbert, Bishop and Confessor, with a notice, that his Office contained Nine Lessons;<sup>71</sup> the Kalendar in the Breviary of Aberdeen has Cuchbert, Bishop and Confessor, with a similar notice, regarding his Office;<sup>72</sup> in Adam King's Kalendar, we have entered S. Cuthbert, bischop and confess. in scotland vnder Eugenius ye 2;<sup>73</sup> while Dempster, in his "Menologium Scoticum," notes, at the form of which shows, that the altar was coeval with St. Cuthbert. It was no doubt used by him; and in accordance with a custom of that age, it may have been placed on his breast at his first interment."

<sup>58</sup> See notes to "Marmion."

<sup>59</sup> See, on this subject, the Fourth Series of "Notes and Queries," vol. xii., pp. 149, 274, 311.

<sup>60</sup> This event has been alluded to, in a local contemporaneous provincial newspaper, the Newcastle Chronicle, which states:—"The excavations commenced last week in Durham Cathedral, with a view of discovering the resting-place of St. Cuthbert, have created some stir. Although not the slightest doubt seems cast upon the information given of the whereabouts of the saint's body which led to these operations; some doubts are entertained, whether the spot where the present excavations have been commenced is the place indicated."

<sup>61</sup> It runs to this effect: "Subter gradus saxeos (secundum et tertium) climacis ascenditis et ducentis erga turrin campanarum in templo cathedrali civitatis Dunelmensis, prope horologium grande quod locatur in angulo australi fani ejusdem, sepultus jacet thesauros pretiosus (corpus S. Cuthberti)."

<sup>62</sup> To him, the pervert's father or grandfather had been a servant.

<sup>63</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 20, n. 1, pp. 359, 360.

<sup>64</sup> Thus, it is noticed, in the Kalendars of the Trinity College, Dublin. Manuscripts, classed: B. 1. 1. B. 3. 1. B. 3. 5. B. 3. 8. B. 3. 9. B. 3. 10. B. 3. 12. B. 3. 13. B. 3. 18, 19.

<sup>65</sup> This was the ancient Irish name for Lindisfarne.

<sup>66</sup> See, "Calender of Irish Saints," p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, at the present date, we find, Cuthbriictur Saxo se inu Menoc.

<sup>67</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendar of Scottish Saints," p. 8.

<sup>68</sup> See ibid., p. 38.

<sup>69</sup> See ibid., p. 55.

<sup>70</sup> See ibid., p. 69.

<sup>71</sup> See ibid., p. 97.

<sup>72</sup> See ibid., p. 114.

Durham, the Deposition of Cuthbert, bishop, on this day.<sup>74</sup> In his History of Scottish Writers,<sup>75</sup> more extensive notices are to be found. In Father Henry Fitzsimons' anonymous Catalogue of Irish saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare, at the 20th of March, we read Luchbertus,<sup>76</sup> but Cuthbertus most probably is meant. In the Martyrologies of Ado, of Usuard, of Bishop Challoner,<sup>77</sup> and in many others, St. Cuthbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, is commemorated at this day; as also in the Roman Martyrology. Indeed, few general Kalendars of the Church saints are without a similar record.<sup>78</sup>

Among the churches and religious edifices, dedicated to St. Cuthbert, the following deserve more especial notice. In Ireland, the church of Kilmacudrick, in the county of Dublin,<sup>79</sup> was a memorial edifice, as noticed in the Registry<sup>80</sup> of St. Patrick's Deanery.<sup>81</sup> There is a church at Dunluce, on the north coast of Antrim, which is said to have been dedicated to St. Cuthbert.<sup>82</sup> The late Very Rev. Monsignor Laurence Canon Forde, V.G., of Dublin Archdiocese, and P.P. over the district of Kilmacud, has most appropriately dedicated the handsome new Catholic Gothic church of Stillorgan, to St. Cuthbert's memory. The following churches in Scotland have been dedicated to this saint, viz.: Ballantrae;<sup>83</sup> Hailes;<sup>84</sup> Glencairn; Denesmor; Kirkcudbright;<sup>85</sup> Glenholm;<sup>86</sup> Ednam;<sup>87</sup> Drummelzier; Maxton;<sup>88</sup> Edinburgh;<sup>89</sup> Wick;<sup>90</sup> Prestwick;<sup>91</sup> Hauster;<sup>92</sup> Eccles; Drysdale; Girvan;<sup>93</sup> Ewes in Eskdale; Straiton in Carrick;<sup>94</sup> Manchline; Maybole;<sup>95</sup> Monkton;<sup>96</sup> Inverrig;<sup>97</sup> and Weem, near Dunkeld. The following fairs, as found in the old Almanacks, were held under his patronage, viz.: Langton in Merse, Poole, Grange, and Linlithgow.<sup>98</sup> In 1875, the Rev. William O'Shaughnessy,<sup>99</sup> Pastor of Girvan, commenced the erection of a small but elegant church, at Maybole,<sup>100</sup> and this he dedicated, to our Lady and to St. Cuthbert.<sup>101</sup> It is in

<sup>73</sup> See ibid., p. 147.

<sup>74</sup> See ibid., p. 195. The Scottish Kalendar and Camerarius also mention him at pp. 236, 249.

<sup>75</sup> See Thomas Dempster's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. iii., num. 234, p. 136.

<sup>76</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50.

<sup>77</sup> See "A Memorial of Ancient British Piety," p. 54.

<sup>78</sup> Stephen White also mentions him, in "Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. ii., p. 15, cap. v., p. 66.

<sup>79</sup> A.D. 1540, George Brown united it to the church of St. Machutus of Clondalkin.

<sup>80</sup> Folio 106 a.

<sup>81</sup> See Sir James Ware, "De Scripturibus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. iii., p. 31.

<sup>82</sup> Letter from Rev. David B. Mulcahy, headed Lys Marie, Ballynafiegh, Belfast, 14th June, 1878.

<sup>83</sup> See "Old Statistical Account of Scotland," vol. i., p. 211.

<sup>84</sup> Lib. Cart. S. Crucis.

<sup>85</sup> "New Statistical Account of Scotland." Kirkcudbright, p. 25.

<sup>86</sup> "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," p. 180. Lib. Eccles. de Scon, pp. 83, 84.

<sup>87</sup> Raine's "History of North Durham," and Anderson's "Diplom. Scotiæ."

<sup>88</sup> "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars.

i., pp. 203, 297.

<sup>89</sup> "Regist. Priorat. S. Andree," p. 29. "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Edinburgh, p. 664.

<sup>90</sup> "Origines Parochiales Scotiæ," pars. ii., p. 277. "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Caithness, p. 160.

<sup>91</sup> "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Ayr, p. 166.

<sup>92</sup> "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Caithness, p. 160.

<sup>93</sup> Charter, by Robert III., to Crosraguel," 24th August, 1404.

<sup>94</sup> "Charter to Crosraguel."

<sup>95</sup> "New Statistical Account of Scotland," Ayr, p. 499.

<sup>96</sup> Ibid., p. 170.

<sup>97</sup> "Charter to Crosraguel."

<sup>98</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 319.

<sup>99</sup> His earlier mission was in a poor joiner's workshop.

<sup>100</sup> Here the celebrated John Knox, over three hundred years ago, raised his sacrilegious hand against the Church of his fathers. He was at first discomfited, by the words and writings of the learned Quintin Kennedy, Abbot of the Franciscan Monastery of Crosraguel. But, he ultimately succeeded in destroying this religious institute, as also several parochial churches in that quarter.

<sup>101</sup> The accompanying illustration—giving a side and an end view—has been drawn, by William F. Wakeman, on the wood;

the early English Gothic style, having a nave, porch and tower. We find some notices of the ancient church of St. Cuthbert at Coldingham,<sup>102</sup> in the Martyrology, belonging to the church of Aberdeen. There is a place, in England, called St. Cubert, on the west coast of Cornwall. It has been suggested,<sup>103</sup> that it may have been named after our saint, the letter t being silent, as in the case of Kirkcudbright, in Scotland. Likewise, in the diocese of Beverly, at Mickley, there is a church dedicated to St. Cuthbert; as also

St. Cuthbert's Catholic Church, Maybole, Scotland.

one in the diocese of Hexham and Newcastle, at Wigton, at Durham, at Crook, at Darlington, at Ushaw, at Berwick-on-Tweed, at Cowpen, at North Shields, and at Prudhoe Hall.<sup>104</sup> The interesting relic, known as "The Durham Book, St. Cuthbert's Gospels, or the Lindisfarne Gospels," is said to have been miraculously preserved from the bottom of the sea, and to have remained uninjured in the water,<sup>105</sup> having been cast up by an extraordinary ebb of the tide at Whithorn, or Candida Casa. The book is yet preserved, in the British Museum, where it is shown to the public, as one of its greatest curiosities, and also as one of the most valuable Manuscripts, in this or in any other country. This book is nearly twelve hundred years old, and we must go back to the Saxon era, in order to relate its history. After St. Cuthbert's death, as some writers state, his successor Egrith, in 698, determined to show some singular respect towards the memory of his distinguished predecessor.<sup>106</sup> This he did, by writing out the Gospels—a work which should occupy the bishop many a long year. The Manuscript, which was from photographs furnished by the Rev. William O'Shaughnessy, and the engraving is by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>102</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. i., pp. 84, 85.

<sup>103</sup> By Rev. David B. Mulcahy, of Ballynaseigh, Belfast, in a letter to the writer, dated June 14th, 1878.

<sup>104</sup> The foregoing information has been gleaned, from the Official "Catholic Directory, Ecclesiastical Register and Almanack" for England, Wales and Scotland.

<sup>105</sup> See Cressy's "Church History of Brittany," book xxviii., chap. xix., p. 760.

<sup>106</sup> See Selden's "Scriptoris X," Præfatio, p. 25.

the result of his labours, may vie, in respect of its delicacy in penmanship, and the beauty of its general execution, with any that can be produced. It is written, in a large, bold, uniform hand; the ink retains all its depth of colour, and the unvarying equality of thickness as to letters is so remarkable, that it seems hardly possible, it was written with a common quill. It is in the Latin language, and it contains 258 double-column folio pages,  $13\frac{1}{2}$  inches by  $9\frac{1}{2}$  inches. It is written throughout, in uncial or initial letters, on carefully glazed vellum. Æthelwald, who succeeded Egfrith, clothed this book with a binding of gold and silver, and inlaid it with precious stones. The execution of this was mainly the work of St. Bilfrid,<sup>107</sup> a pious hermit, and a worker in gold. The initial letters of each Gospel are most remarkable; each one of them is of gigantic dimensions, most elegantly ornamented, with an endless variety of patterns. What astonishes most is the quality and permanence of its inks and colours. The history of this wonderful book became also a record for the Lindisfarne brethren. About fifty years after the time which has been mentioned, the Danes began to appear off English coasts, when they burned down Lindisfarne monastery, and murdered many ecclesiastics. Thus compelled to fly, while carrying with them the bones of St. Cuthbert and of other saints, together with their precious volume, the persecuted monks wandered about, until at last they settled at Durham. After a while, St. Cuthbert's gospels were translated into Saxon, the Dano-Saxon, or common language of that day, the translation being beautifully written between the Latin lines; and, this was done, about the year 950. From this period, some six centuries elapse, before any further account of St. Cuthbert's Book appears. When it again came under observation, it had been despoiled of its noble cover, which probably was stolen, at a time when monasteries had been dissolved. This seems to have been done, for sake of its gold and jewels. It was then found, in the hands of Robert Bower, Clerk of Parliament, under James I., and afterwards, it was in the library of Sir Robert Cotton, at Westminster. By him, it was bought, and afterwards, it was transferred to the British Museum, by Sir John Cotton, along with the remainder of his library. A few years ago, the Museum authorities suggested the idea of rebinding this book, in something like its original style. The honour of doing so fell into the hands of Edward Maltby, Protestant Bishop of Durham, who spent £100 on the work.<sup>108</sup>

According to John Bale,<sup>109</sup> St. Cuthbert is said to have written "Ordinationes Suae Ecclesiae," lib. i.,<sup>110</sup> and "Præcepta Vitæ Regularis," lib. i. In the Life of St. Cuthbert, by John of Tinmouth, and afterwards edited by John Capgrave, the Monastic Institutions of the saint, delivered to his monks, are mentioned. Probably, this is the same book as the one, called by Dempster, "Exhortationes ad Fratres."<sup>111</sup> He is said to have ordained by decree, that no woman should enter his monastery.<sup>112</sup> Lord Anthony Viscount Montaigne, who procured the relic from Sir Robert Hare, to whom Dr. Watson, the last Catholic Bishop of Lincoln, gave it, again presented the ring of St. Cuthbert, containing a sapphire enchased,<sup>113</sup> to Dr. Richard vocat." Centur. i., num. lxxxi., p. 82.

<sup>107</sup> See his Life, at the 6th of March.

<sup>108</sup> These foregoing particulars in the text, have been extracted from a report of a lecture, delivered in November, 1867, by the Rev. Henry Holden, D.D., of Durham, on "St. Cuthbert's Gospels." It has been noted in a local newspaper of that date, known as the Newcastle Daily Journal.

<sup>109</sup> See "Scriptorum Illustrum Majoris Britanniae, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam

<sup>110</sup> We find appended, "Prima Regula est de Domino."

<sup>111</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. iii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., chap. iv., p. 43.

<sup>112</sup> See John Bale's "Scriptorum Illustrum Majoris Britanniae, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam vocant, Catalogus," cent. i., num. lxxxix., p. 82.

Smith, Bishop of Chalcedon. Subsequently this was left, in the nunnery or English Canonesses, at Paris.<sup>114</sup> These nuns also possessed a tooth of St. Cuthbert,<sup>115</sup> saved probably at the time, when his shrine was rifled, in the sixteenth century. Not only by English Catholics has St. Cuthbert been held in veneration; but even, English Protestants have manifested respect for his memory, many instances of which could be adduced in proof.<sup>116</sup>

While contrasting the controversial and enterprising character of St. Wilfrid, with the humble and retiring, yet popularly active, missionary life of St. Cuthbert, the Comte de Montalembert remarks, how both, if rivals, regarding a ritualistic observance, were equally anxious to promote the cause of Catholic unity. The Celtic saint, however, was prone to persuade and to console, by his discourses; he was at once, the pontiff, the priest, the shepherd, the sailor, the agriculturalist of the Northumbrians, comprehending and partaking their occupations, their emotions, and their wants.<sup>117</sup> He taught them virtue, by practising it himself, and truth, by observing it without ceasing, but with a boundless charity. Thus, he acquired a greater veneration from people, princes, lords and prelates, than any other saint of his age and country, while it comes down to our own times, unfading and established.

ARTICLE II.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF CLEMENS, SOMETIMES CALLED CLAUDIUS CLEMENS SCOTUS. [Eighth and Ninth Centuries.] Many holy and learned Irishmen emigrated to France and Germany, where schools and monasteries were founded by them,<sup>1</sup> especially during the times of the great Emperor Charlemagne,<sup>2</sup> and of his nephew, Charles II. Those gifted immigrants contributed very materially to establish religion, civilization and culture, throughout the European Continent. Walafridus Strabo, Abbot of Reichenau, who flourished about the middle of the ninth century, bears testimony to those facts.<sup>3</sup> Among the distinguished strangers, that arrived on the Continent, in the eighth century, was Clemens, or Clement, sometimes called Clemens Claudius;<sup>4</sup> but, it is doubtful if these separate names belong to one and the same person. The name Claude Clement is applied, by John Bale, to this distinguished man; and Camerarius enters his festival, at the 5th of March, while Dempster<sup>5</sup> has produced two persons bearing the name of Claudius Clement, although, in reality one person should be under-

<sup>113</sup> See Bishop Challoner's "Britannia Sancta," part i., March 20, p. 197.

<sup>114</sup> See Mgr. Paul Guérin, "Les Petits Bollandistes, Vies des Saints," &c., tome iii., Mar. xx., p. 553.

<sup>115</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xx., at St. Cuthbert.

<sup>116</sup> At University College, Oxford, the Masters and Fellows kept a festival on St. Cuthbert's Day. Boswell tells us, because this holy man "was a saint of Durham, with which the College is much connected." The celebrated Dr. Johnson and his biographer dined with these College authorities, on St. Cuthbert's Day, A.D. 1776. See, Boswell's "Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D.," vol. ii., p. 445.

<sup>117</sup> See "Les Moines d'Occident," tome iv., liv. xv., chap. i., pp. 434-435.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See the Two Books, written by Monachus, Sangallensis, or the Monk of St. Gall, especially "De Gestis Caroli Magni," lib. i. Published by Henricus Canisius, in "Antiquæ Lectiones," tomus ii., pars. iii. Edition of Basnage.

<sup>2</sup> See, on this subject of Irish literary history, Christopher Anderson's "Native Irish and their Descendants," sect. i., pp. 9 to 19.

<sup>3</sup> See "De Rebus Ecclesiasticis," cap. 25. Vita S. Galli, lib. i., cap. i., and lib. ii., cap. 46.

<sup>4</sup> Claudius, a Spaniard, was made bishop of Turin, by Louis the Pious, in the ninth century, and the Irishman Dungal the Recluse wrote against him "Responsa contra perversas Claudii Turonensis Episcopi sententias." He taught the Sacred Scriptures in France, and he is related to have composed various commentaries on them. See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome x., liv. xlviii., sect. vii.

<sup>5</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus i., lib. iii., num. 242, p.

stood,<sup>6</sup> besides a Clemens, and a St. Clemens. However, according to Sir James Ware,<sup>7</sup> Bale is mistaken, by confounding the Irish Clemens, both with Claude,<sup>8</sup> another man of great piety and learning, and with Clement, who was Bishop of Auxerre, in France. Such, too, seems to have been the Bollandists' opinion,<sup>9</sup> when introducing his commemoration. However, Clement, Bishop of Auxerre, seems to have lived, at an earlier period than the time of our Irish Clemens. Our national hagiologist, John Colgan, has given us what he designates as the Acts of Clement, the supposed Irish founder of the University of Paris; but, this narrative abounds in mistaken speculations and other errors,<sup>10</sup> owing to the vague conceptions, suggested by his authorities, and their imperfect knowledge. The learned Mabillon<sup>11</sup> shows, that Clemens, Bishop of Auxerre, died, about A.D. 738; and, hence it is clear, that Colgan's inference is false, when confounding the latter with Clemens Scotus.<sup>12</sup> The Italian writer, Tiraboschi, institutes some inquiries, regarding our Clemens, under the name Claudius Clemens. He argues, that Claudius was a distinct person from the Irish Clemens, and he also arrived at the illogical conclusion, that no such person as Clemens existed. However, the anonymous monk of St. Gall<sup>13</sup> has not prefixed the name Claudius to Clemens. Therefore, the argument of Tiraboschi has little force, against the statement of the Monk of St. Gall.<sup>14</sup> We have no account, regarding the parents of this holy and learned man, nor do we know the exact place of his birth; yet, owing to the term Scotus, so constantly appended to his name, we may rationally infer, that Ireland was the country of his birth. Some of the Scottish writers,<sup>15</sup> indeed, state, that he was a native of British Scotia.<sup>16</sup> His arrival in France occurred, soon after the Emperor Charlemagne became supreme ruler over that country. This event took place, after the death of his brother Carloman, towards the latter end of 771. Therefore, it is probable, Clemens arrived about the year 772.<sup>17</sup> This may be inferred, likewise, from the opening narrative of the monk,<sup>18</sup> belonging to the 141, num. 303, pp. 175, 176, num. 304, pp. 175 (recte 177), 176, and num. 307, pp. 177, 178.

<sup>6</sup> According to Labbe, "De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis."

<sup>7</sup> See "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. v., p. 41.

<sup>8</sup> Trithemius, in his work, "De Viris Illustribus Ordinis S. Benedicti," mistakes him for a disciple of Venerable Bede. See lib. ii., cap. 28. He flourished, however, at a time long subsequent, living towards the close of the eighth, and at the beginning of the ninth, century. This appears, from the preface to his work "Commentarium in S. Mattheum," in which we find mentioned the Emperor Lewis the Pious, and his expedition against the Normans. See Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. v., p. 41.

<sup>9</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 7.

<sup>10</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. De S. Clemente prænominis Claudio, Universitatis Parisiensis Fundatore, et Episcopo postea Antisiodorensi, pp. 696 to 704.

<sup>11</sup> See "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus ii., lib. xx., sect. xlvii., p. 63.

<sup>12</sup> Sir James Ware and Walter Harris refute this identification. See Harris' Ware, vol. iii., "Writers of Ireland," book i., chap. vi., p. 56.

<sup>13</sup> Thus is he styled by Mabillon, in "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus ii., lib. xx., sect. liii., p. 67. At A.D. 781, Muratori calls him, "Monaco di S. Gallo," in "Annali di Italia."

<sup>14</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. iii., n. 20, p. 218.

<sup>15</sup> Among these is Buchanan, who also sets down his travelling companion, Joannes Albinus, as a British Scot, on account of the latter surname. See "Rerum Scotticarum Historia," lib. v., rex. lxx., p. 150. But, the Monk of St. Gall has it, that those who arrived in France were Scots from Ireland.

<sup>16</sup> In a work of J. P. Murray, "De Britannia atque Hibernia, a VI. ad X. Litterarum Domilicia," the pretensions of Buchanan are reproved, in connexion with this matter. Tomus ii., in N. Commentar. Soc. R. Gotting.

<sup>17</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. ii., pp. 207, 208.

<sup>18</sup> His Books on the Acts of Charlemagne

Monastery of Saint Gall, in Switzerland.<sup>19</sup> He tells us, that when Charlemagne began to reign alone, in the western parts of the world, and when literature was everywhere almost forgotten, it happened, that two Scots<sup>20</sup> from Ireland—distinguished as Clemens and Albinus<sup>21</sup>—came over with some British merchants to the shores of France.<sup>22</sup> Those accomplished men were incomparably skilled, in human learning, and in the holy Scriptures.<sup>23</sup> It is stated, that disturbances at home caused them to leave for Gaul.<sup>24</sup> As they produced no merchandise for sale, they used to cry out to the crowds, flocking to purchase: "If anyone is desirous of wisdom, let him come to us, and receive it; for, we have it to sell." Their reason for saying they had it for sale was that they perceived the people inclined to deal in saleable articles, and not to take anything gratuitously, and that thus they might rouse them to the acquisition of wisdom, as well as of objects, for which they should give value.<sup>25</sup> As the sequel showed, by speaking in that manner, they hoped to excite the wonder and astonishment of those persons hearing them. They repeated this declaration so often, that an account was conveyed, either by their admirers, or by those who thought them insane, to the illustrious King Charles. He being a lover of learning, and very desirous of wisdom,<sup>26</sup> had the strangers conducted with all expedition before him, and he asked them, if they truly possessed wisdom, as had been reported to him.<sup>27</sup> They answered, that they did, and that they were ready, in the name of the Lord, to communicate the gift to such as would seek for it worthily. On inquiring from them, what compensation they should expect for it, the Irishmen replied, that they required nothing more than convenient situations, ingenious minds, and, as being in a foreign country, to be supplied with sustenance and raiment. Charles had established a school in his own palace, over which Alcuin was placed,<sup>28</sup> and subordinate to him was the Scottish, or were addressed to Charles the Fat, and therefore these must have been written, between A.D. 884 and A.D. 888. He is cited by Mabillon, under the designation "anonymus Sancti Galli monachus," in "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus ii., lib. xx., sect. liii., p. 67.

<sup>19</sup> Melchior Goldast and Archbishop Usher have supposed, he was the celebrated Notker Balbulus.

<sup>20</sup> In Du Chesne's "Rerum Franciarum Scriptores," their names are omitted, in the Monk of St. Gall's work, as edited, and they are wanting in various Manuscripts. Vincentius Bellovacensis and others call one of them by the name of John, but they probably thought John Scotus Erigena—who lived many years later—was the travelling companion of Clemens. See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. ii., n. 9, pp. 209, 210. Muratori observes, that the name of Clemens' travelling companion is not exactly known. See "Annali di Italia," at A.D. 781, as also "Antiquitates Italicae Medii Ævi," tomus iii. Dissert. 43.

<sup>21</sup> Eginhard speaks of a preceptor to Charlemagne, in these terms: "in ceteris disciplinis Albinum, cognomento Alcuinum, item diaconem de Britannia, Saxonici generis hominem, virum undequaque doctissimum, præceptorem habuerit."

<sup>22</sup> See Archbishop Ussher's "Veterum Epistolarum Hibernicarum Sylloge," Præfacio.

<sup>23</sup> Colgan contends, that the real name of Albinus was John; but, Dr. Lanigan throws out a conjecture, that it may have been the Latinized form of his original Irish name, Finbarr, Finan, or Finian. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. ii., n. 9, p. 210.

<sup>24</sup> See Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. v., p. 38.

<sup>25</sup> Although Brucker acknowledges, that these persons came to France, yet he rejects a great part of this narrative as fabulous. See "Historia Philosophiæ," tom. iii., pp. 586, 629.

<sup>26</sup> See L. P. Anquetil's "Histoire de France," Deuxieme Race dite des Carlovingiens, pp. 62, 63.

<sup>27</sup> Tiraboschi denies, that such persons were in existence, and he treats the whole account as a fable. See "Storia della Letteratura Italiana," tom. iii., lib. iii., cap. i. However, Dr. Lanigan very lucidly shows, how unfounded were his grounds for such a supposition. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. ii., n. 11, pp. 211 to 213.

<sup>28</sup> See Rev. Dr. John Alzog's "Manuel of Universal Church History," vol. ii.

rather Irish, Clement, while about the same time, Claude, a Spaniard, taught the Scriptures there.<sup>29</sup> This may account for the confusion of names, Clemens Claudius, or Claudius Clemens.<sup>30</sup> The Universities of Paris and of Pavia are said to have owed their origin to the munificent Emperor Charlemagne.<sup>31</sup> He selected the two distinguished Irishmen, Clement and Joannes Albinus, to take charge of those great schools.<sup>32</sup> It has been conjectured, that the learned strangers arrived, in France, late in 772, and that probably they lived with Charlemagne, until some time in the year 773.<sup>33</sup> Charles, having heard the proposals of Clement and Albin, graciously kept both with himself,<sup>34</sup> for a short time.<sup>35</sup> After some interval, when obliged to proceed on a military expedition,<sup>36</sup> he desired Clemens to remain in France,<sup>37</sup> entrusting to his care a great number of boys, not only of the highest noblesse; but, likewise of the middling and lower ranks in society, all of whom, by his orders, were provided with victuals and suitable habitations. The other Irishman, by name Albinus, he directed to Italy,<sup>38</sup> and assigned to him the Monastery of St. Augustine, near Pavia, that such persons, as choose to do so, might there resort to him for instruction.<sup>39</sup> On hearing how graciously the most religious King Charles used to treat wise men, Albinus, or rather Alcuin,<sup>40</sup> an Englishman, took shipping, and went over to visit the great monarch, whose celebrity was then established. It is well known, that Clemens and Albinus were in France, before the great English scholar, Alcuin,<sup>41</sup> waited on Charlemagne, in 781.<sup>42</sup> Then Alcuin—also called Albinus<sup>43</sup>—first arrived in that country, although himself and the Emperor had previously met in Italy. There, Charlemagne had exacted a promise, that Alcuin should visit France, after the Emperor's return to it.<sup>44</sup> Clemens was able to render Alcuin very great assistance, in the work of education.<sup>45</sup> We read<sup>46</sup> of a certain Albinus, who was sent by Charlemagne to Pope Second Period. Epoch i., part i., chap. iv., num. 172, p. 125. Dublin Edition.

<sup>29</sup> See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome x., liv. xlv., sect. xviii.

<sup>30</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. xiv., p. 262, and n. 143, p. 265.

<sup>31</sup> His nephew Lothaire I. appointed the learned Dungal to conduct the University of Pavia, with many other less celebrated schools, in Italy. See "Irish Folk-lore," by Lageniensis, chap. xxx., page 276.

<sup>32</sup> See Antonius' "Historia." The foregoing accounts, he has taken "ex archivis ecclesiæ Arelatensis." See, also, Father Stephen White's "Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. v., pp. 61, 62.

<sup>33</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. iii., n. 14, p. 215.

<sup>34</sup> According to Joannes Rossus Warwicensis, in his book "De Regibus."

<sup>35</sup> See the account left us, by the Monk of St. Gall, "De Gestis Caroli Magni," in Canisius' "Antiquæ Lectiones," tomus ii., pars. 3. Edition of Basnage.

<sup>36</sup> This appears to have been the expedition of A.D. 775, or of 776, against the Saxons. See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome ix., lib. xlv., num. xii., pp. 442, 443.

<sup>37</sup> See Arnold Wion's "Lignum Vitæ," lib. v., cap. 95.

<sup>38</sup> About a hundred years, previous to this time, literature was at a very low ebb in Italy, as is proved by the letters of Pope Agatho, and of the Roman Synod, A.D. 680, to the Emperor Constantine. See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome ix., liv. xl., sect. vii., pp. 19 to 23. This is admitted, likewise, by Muratori, in "Antiquitates Italicæ Medii Ævi," &c., tomus iii. Dissertatio 43.

<sup>39</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus ii., lib. xx., sect. liii., p. 67.

<sup>40</sup> He has often been confounded with the Irish Albinus, as D. Rothe shows in "Bridgida Thaumaturga."

<sup>41</sup> He assumed the classic appellation of Flaccus Albinus.

<sup>42</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," at A.D. 781, tomus ii., lib. xxv., sect. xxii., p. 258.

<sup>43</sup> According to the Monk of St. Gall, who distinguishes him from the Irish Albinus.

<sup>44</sup> Some years later, Alcuin proceeded to England. There he remained, until 792 or 793, when he went back to France, where his remaining days were spent.

Adrian, as one of his ambassadors, in 773.<sup>47</sup> It is supposed,<sup>48</sup> that he was the Irish Albinus, favoured so greatly by the Emperor,<sup>49</sup> as had been, likewise, his countryman Clemens, the companion of his travels. Towards the latter end of 774, Charlemagne got possession of Pavia, where Albinus afterwards taught, under his patronage, and where it is said he died, leaving some writings, regarding which different opinions have been circulated. Clemens is stated to have been the real founder of the University, established by Charlemagne at Paris, according to various writers.<sup>50</sup> Those appointments have been referred to A.D. 792.<sup>51</sup> Among the pupils of Clement the Scot were Modestus and Candidus,<sup>52</sup> sent by Abbot Ratgar<sup>53</sup> to be instructed in the classic branches of learning, then comprised under the denomination of grammar.<sup>54</sup> The place where Clemens kept his school has not been so clearly ascertained.<sup>55</sup> Several have asserted, that it was at Paris,<sup>56</sup> and even that he was the first founder of the celebrated University established, in that city.<sup>57</sup> However, Charlemagne had other places, where he was accustomed to reside, and it may be probable, that in one of these localities, the school of Clemens had been first established. Boys were left under his care, by the Emperor, during his absence on warlike expeditions. Returning on one occasion from a campaign, the illustrious monarch desired those boys to be examined in his presence, to find what progress they had made in classical and scientific studies. It is remarked, that while he found the sons of the nobility had neglected their books and lessons, the boys of an inferior rank in society had made a wonderful proficiency. That just monarch thereupon solemnly averred, when distributing preferment and places, he would have regard, solely to merit and to learning, and that he should make no distinction on the score of rank or birth.<sup>58</sup> In the year 802, Clemens was alive and teaching, and if he were the Clemens, who wrote the Life<sup>59</sup> of the Emperor Charlemagne,<sup>60</sup> he must have lived, after the death of his celebrated sovereign.<sup>61</sup> His history has been greatly confused, owing to the circumstance, that he has been confounded with Claudius Scotus, who flourished about the

<sup>45</sup> See Brucker's "Historia Philosophiæ," tom. iii., p. 629.

<sup>46</sup> From Anastasius Bibliothecarius.

<sup>47</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus ii., lib. xxiv., sect. xlv., p. 226.

<sup>48</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. iii., p. 213.

<sup>49</sup> He is noted, as "Albinus deliciosum ipsius regis," by Mabillon.

<sup>50</sup> See the authorities cited, by Claude Robert, in "Gallia Christiana," when treating about Deofrid, in his List of the Bishops of Paris, num. 41. Other writers state, that William Clemens, Joannes Scotus, Raban and Alcuin were the founders, and as Hector Boetius adds "cum valida Scotorum manu." "Hystoriæ Scotorum," lib. x., p. 194.

<sup>51</sup> See Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. v., p. 38.

<sup>52</sup> These were directed to Clemens for instruction by Ratgar, Abbot of Fulda, when he sent Rabanus Maurus and Hatto, to Tours, for the purpose of studying under Alcuin. This we learn, from Brower's notes to the Poems of St. Raban.

<sup>53</sup> He became Abbot of Fulda, A.D. 802, and this happened soon after his accession.

<sup>54</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti" at the year mentioned. Tomus ii., lib. xxvii., sect. xi., p. 359. Also, lib. xxix., sect. xxvi., p. 472.

<sup>55</sup> The Monk of St. Gall does not mention the place.

<sup>56</sup> Such as Vincentius Bellovacensis.

<sup>57</sup> There was no University at Paris, in his time, and until about the end of the eleventh century, even the embryo of one had not been established. See article Université in the French "Encyclopédie."

<sup>58</sup> This is related, by the Monk of St. Gall, in his work, "De Gestis Caroli Magni." See, also, Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. iii., p. 214, and n. 18, p. 217.

<sup>59</sup> In his commentaries on the Roman Commonwealth, by Wolfgang Lazius, this biography is quoted. See Sir James Ware, "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. v., p. 41.

<sup>60</sup> Dr. Lanigan deems this very probable.

<sup>61</sup> Charlemagne died, on the 28th of January, A.D. 814. See Fleury's "Histoire year 820, according to Cardinal Bellarmine.<sup>62</sup> Several tracts have been attributed to our Clemens;<sup>63</sup> but, it is not certain, that he was the author of all these productions.<sup>64</sup> According to Sir James Ware,<sup>65</sup> Clemens, the companion of Albinus, wrote "Grammatica quædam Collectanea;" and, he may possibly be distinguished from another Clemens, who wrote "Vita Caroli Magni," as also from Claudius,<sup>66</sup> a pious and learned man, who flourished A.D. 815. In closing his very obscure account, Colgan states, that Clement is said to have been living A.D. 818, and to have died on the viii. Kalends of April, at Auxerre, where he was buried in the church of St. Amator.<sup>67</sup> Quoting Arnold Wion, Thomas Dempster notices, at the 20th of March, a festival for Claudius, Bishop of Auxerre, and founder of the Paris Academy.<sup>68</sup> This latter is confounded with our Clemens,<sup>69</sup> who, as it appears, lived on earth, until after the commencement of the ninth century.

ARTICLE III.—ST. HIMELINUS, CONFESSOR. On the authority of Molanus, at the 20th of March, St. Himelinus is entered in Henry Fitzsimons' Catalogue of Irish Saints.<sup>1</sup> He is, apparently, the saint mentioned already, at the 10th day of this month.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. CAMAN, OR CONAN, OR CONARIUS, SON OF CORRE. We find the name, Caman mac Corae, inserted in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 20th of March. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have the entry Conarius, son of Corra. The festival of Conan, son of Corrè, is recorded in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> on this day.

ARTICLE V.—ST. AEDHAN, OF CLUAIN-MAELAIN, PROBABLY, CLONMELLON, COUNTY OF WESTMEATH. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> records this holy man, at the 20th of March. The place may be identical with that locality, formerly denominated Cluain-Milain, i.e., Milan's Lawn or Meadow, Ecclesiastique," tome x., liv. xlv., num. ix., pp. 143, 144.

<sup>62</sup> See the seventh Tome of his collected works, "De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis," p. 270.

<sup>63</sup> Among those, which pass under his name, are "Summa Quædam," and "De Evangelistarum Concordia;" but, rather, it is thought, these should be assigned to one Clementus Canonicus Lanthoniensis, about whom Bale writes. See "Scriptorum Illustrium Majoris Britanniae," &c. Centur, 3, num. 2.

<sup>64</sup> Various writers have made him the author of works, usually ascribed to Claudius; and, again, owing to this confusion, the latter has been supposed the writer of tracts, which perhaps Clemens wrote. See Rev. D. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. iii., and n. 25, pp. 214, 215, 219.

<sup>65</sup> See "De Scriptoribus Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. v., p. 41.

<sup>66</sup> In addition to the work, "Commentarium in S. Mattheum," Claudius is said to have composed the following books: "In omnes Epistolas S. Pauli;" "Commentaria in Pentateuchum;" "Commentaria in Libros Josuæ, Judicum, Ruthæ, et in Psalmos;" "Memoriale Historiarum;" "Summam quædam;" "Homilias;" and "De Evangelistarum Concordiâ."

<sup>67</sup> For this statement, he quotes Claude Robert and Demochares, in "Catalogus Episcoporum Antissiodorensium."

<sup>68</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 195.

<sup>69</sup> He has been confounded, also, with Claude, Bishop of Turin, who, according to Colgan, was a Spaniard. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xx. Martii. De S. Clemente prænomine Claudio, p. 703.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholiciæ Hiberniæ Compendium," tomos i., lib. iv., cap. xii., p. 55.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, the entry seems to be Conanur fil. Coppæ.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., xx. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 76.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find Avonur de Cluain moelain.

now Clonmellon, a small town in the barony of Delvin, and county of Westmeath.<sup>2</sup> Marianus O'Gorman records Ædanus, of Cluain-moelain, at this date. We find the name, Aedhán, of Cluain-maeláin, also set down, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> as having a festival, at this date. The Bollandists<sup>4</sup> enter his feast, likewise, on the 20th of March.

ARTICLE VI.—MUCCIN, OR MUCCINUS. At this date, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> record a festival, in honour of Muccin.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. CATHCAN, BISHOP OF RATH-DERTHAIGHE. A record appears in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at this same date, regarding a St. Cathcan. There, his locality is designated, Ratha Turthaighe. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> record him, likewise, as Cathchan, of Rath-dertaighe. Under the head of Rath-Darthaighe,<sup>3</sup> (or Derthaighe), Duaid Mac Firbis enters a Cathchan—or perhaps Cathchu—bishop, at March 20th.<sup>4</sup> Likewise, on this day, we find entered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> as having veneration paid him, a St. Cathcan,<sup>6</sup> Bishop, of Rath-derthaighe.

ARTICLE VIII.—FESTIVAL OF ST. POLYCRONUS, AND OF HIS COMPANIONS, MARTYRS. In the old Martyrology of Tallagh, as the Bollandists observe, the following holy Martyrs are set down, at this date, viz.: Gregory, Commodus, Fiscianus, Pomerus, Policronus, Parmenus, Chrisotheus and Helius.<sup>1</sup> Among these, Policronus is noted as a bishop, and with special eulogy, by St. Ængus the Culdee, in his "Feilire."<sup>2</sup> At the 19th of March, the Bollandists have treated of other Martyrs, in Africa;<sup>3</sup> and, among these, the name of a Fiscianus is to be found, but it does not seem certain, that he can be identified with one of the foregoing holy athletes of Christ.

ARTICLE IX.—ST. ELIMIA, OR FELIMIA. Such is the entry of the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> quoting as authorities the Martyrologies of Tallagh, and of

<sup>2</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (o), p. 393.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., xx. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 76.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we also find Muccinur.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., xx. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 76.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, it is Cathchanur de Rath Deartaighe.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., xx. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 76.

<sup>3</sup> This place has not been identified, according to William M. Hennessy's note.

<sup>4</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy." Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 124, 125. See, also, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," nn. 22, 23, p. 173.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 80, 81.

<sup>6</sup> In the table, subjoined to this Martyrology, he is likewise called Catalhus, i.e. Cathal.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., Martii xx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 76.

<sup>2</sup> The following stanza, with its English translation, has been obligingly furnished, by Professor O'Looney, from the "Leabhar Breac" copy:—

b. xiii. kl. etrecht polícroni noem eppuc ip caou
Cecharng ceim ar oirgu
Co mor pluas baonu.

"Death of Policronus
A holy bishop who chastest,
He proceeded in the straightest way
With a great host who were bravest."

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., Martii xix. De Sanctis Martyribus Afris Basso seu Bassio et aliis xx, Lucello, Fisciano, Pomeno, Jossero seu Josippo, Apol-

Marianus O'Gorman, at the 20th of March. Yet, the name occurs not, either in Rev. Dr. Kelly's published copy, nor in the Manuscript copy of the Tallagh Martyrology, as preserved in the Franciscan Library, Dublin.

ARTICLE X.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF LACTINUS, OR LACINUS, A BISHOP AND CONFESSOR, IN IRELAND. According to the Manuscript of Florarius, as also according to Ferarius and Dempster, the feast of Lacinus, or Lactinus, a bishop, and in Scotia, or Hibernia, belongs to the 20th of March.<sup>1</sup> This, however, seems referable to St. Lactin, Abbot and Bishop, at Freshford, in Ireland, and who has been already noticed at the preceding day.<sup>2</sup>

ARTICLE XI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. MOCHTA, BISHOP OF LUGHMAGH, OR LOUTH, COUNTY OF LOUTH. [Fifth Century.] Under the head of Lughmhagh, now known as Louth, Duald Mac Fírbis enters, Mochta, bishop, from Lughmhagh, and it is noticed, that 300 years was his age. March<sup>1</sup> 20th seems to follow.<sup>2</sup>

ARTICLE XII.—ST. CORMANUS, OR CORNANUS. [Seventh Century.] According to Camerarius, a St. Cormanus, or Cornanus, was the first Apostle of the Northumbrians,<sup>1</sup> before St. Aidan, about the year 638. He is said to have been of an austere cast of mind,<sup>2</sup> and his feast is set down at this day. If the premises be correct, he may have been an Irish missionary, perhaps from Iona.

Twenty-first Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. ENDEUS OR ENDA, ABBOT OF ARRAN, COUNTY OF GALWAY.

[FIFTH AND SIXTH CENTURIES.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—BIRTH AND FAMILY OF ST. ENDEUS—HE SUCCEEDS HIS FATHER AS REGULUS OF ORIEL—HE IS PERSUADED TO BECOME A RELIGIOUS—HE VISITS ROSNAT AND ROME—HE IS ORDAINED PRIEST, AND HE RETURNS TO IRELAND, WHERE HE FOUNDS MONASTERIES—FROM HIS BROTHER-IN-LAW, ÆNGUS, KING OF MUNSTER, HE OBTAINS A GRANT OF THE ARAN ISLANDS.

EARLY on a warm summer day,<sup>1</sup> the writer selected one of those canvas-covered and light currachs, which lay near the little harbour of Ionio, Ammono Saturnino, Basilia et aliis vii., p. 26.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., xx. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints," p. 76.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 195.

<sup>2</sup> See, also, the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 76.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> March 20th is partly effaced, in the original Manuscript. August 19th is the festival for St. Mochta, in the Martyrology of Donegal, and in the Martyrology of Tamlacht.

<sup>2</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 118, 119.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 236, 316.

<sup>2</sup> See Bellenden's Boece, vol. ii., cap. ix., 19.

Doolin,<sup>2</sup> and off the west coast of Clare. Taking the boat on his shoulders, a fisherman tossed it afloat on the sea. With scarcely a breeze to ruffle the surface of the Atlantic ocean, two vigorous boatmen next drew their oars through the deep, calm waters, and bore away in the direction of the Aran Islands, the distance across the waves being about nine English miles. A warm haze veiled the group in dark, misty outlines, nor was the landward prospect clear, to obtain a good view of the grand cliffs at Moher, and the far-off mountains in Connemara, as the frail skiff skimmed along with incredible speed and buoyancy from the shore. After rowing for one hour and ten minutes, we landed on Innishere, or the south-eastern island, in a little sandy cove, under the beautiful old church of St. Kevin. Soon were we surrounded by several of the islanders, and thus accompanied, we were enabled for some hours to ramble over this island, and to obtain a sketch of that ruin, which had most engaged our attention. Another debarkation brought us to Innishmaan, or the Middle Island, which was explored in like manner, while the great Cyclopean fortress of Dun Connor was a chief object of wonder. Towards evening, it was time to embark for Aranmore; and, there, during a sojourn of four days, we were busily and delightedly occupied with the numerous antiquities scattered over its surface, not the least interesting of which was that old church of Killeany, rendered so venerable, owing to its connexion with the holy founder Endeus. His Acts we shall here endeavour to unveil.

Manuscript copies of St. Endæus' Life are extant.<sup>3</sup> One of these,<sup>4</sup> the authorship of which has been attributed to Augustine Magraidin, we find published—with some omissions<sup>5</sup>—by Colgan,<sup>6</sup> with Appendices and notes in illustration. In the Dublin Franciscan Convent Manuscript, "Vitæ Sanctorum," ex Cod. Inisensi, is now the Latin Life of St. Endeus, Abbot,<sup>7</sup> which Colgan has published. Besides, the latter writer states, that a copy of St. Endeus' Office was reported to have been preserved, in the county of Galway, at that time; while, the Rt. Rev. David Rothe, Bishop of Ossory, was thought to have had a Life of Endeus in his possession. Selecting the Manuscript,<sup>8</sup> taken from the Book of All Saints' Island, for illustrating his life—with a preliminary chapter, and somewhat differing from Colgan's version<sup>9</sup>—the Bollandists have published Acts of this saint, comments preceding them, in eight sections.<sup>10</sup> In various collections of the Lives of holy persons, the Acts of St. Endeus are included, at this date. Among the more modern ones may be noted, Bishop Challenor,<sup>11</sup> Rev. Alban Butler,<sup>12</sup> the Cistercian Monk,<sup>13</sup> L. Tachet de Barneval,<sup>14</sup> and Rev. S. Baring-Gould,<sup>15</sup> who acknowledges his indebtedness to Rt. Rev. George Conroy, late Bishop

ARTICLE I. — CHAPTER I. — <sup>1</sup> In the month of June, 1877, during a sojourn at the Lisdoonvarna springs.

<sup>2</sup> A townland, in the parish of Killilagh, in the barony of Corcomroe, shown on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheets 8, 14.

<sup>3</sup> In the public library, at Oxford, are found the following: Vita S. Endei Abbatis Aranensis. MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 505, pp. 1-8, vell. fol. dble. cols. xiv. cent.; and MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 485, f. 179, vell. 4to, xiv. cent.

<sup>4</sup> Taken from the Manuscript Book of the Island of All Saints, on Lough Ree.

<sup>5</sup> One or two chapters were mislaid, among Colgan's papers, at the time of publication.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxi.

Martii. Vita S. Endei, pp. 704 to 715.

<sup>7</sup> From pp. 291 to 304.

<sup>8</sup> Furnished by Father Hugh Ward.

<sup>9</sup> This publication, the Bollandists deemed to be confusedly compiled.

<sup>10</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxi. De S. Endeo Abbate Aranensi in Hibernia, pp. 267 to 274.

<sup>11</sup> In "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 199.

<sup>12</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March 21.

<sup>13</sup> At p. 382.

<sup>14</sup> See "Histoire Légendaire de l'Irlande," chap. xiv., pp. 443 to 448.

<sup>15</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 21, pp. 376 to 387.

<sup>16</sup> This at first appeared, in the "Irish

of Ardagh, for his charming brochure,<sup>16</sup> "A Visit to Aran-More."<sup>17</sup> From the latter source, likewise, the present writer has drawn some of his materials, for the present brief biography.

This holy man's name is written in Irish, Einne<sup>18</sup> and Ende, while in Latin, it is Endeus, as also Enna, and it is pronounced Eany, by the Araners.<sup>19</sup> For many early particulars of his Acts, the reader is referred to the Life of St. Fanchea, written for the 1st of January. There, we learn, that his father was Conall Derg, son of Daimhin, son to Coirpre Domhairgid. He sprung from the race of Colla-da-chrioch. Aebhfhinn, daughter of Ainmire, son to Ronán, King of the Ards, was his mother, and also the mother of Libae, as the O'Clery's Martyrology takes care to notice.<sup>20</sup> St. Endeus, who is incorrectly placed by Colgan, among the disciples of St. Patrick, because he is said to have flourished in his time, is called Mac hua-Daimene, or nepos Dameni.<sup>21</sup> He was the only son to Conall, King of Oriel. His territories included the modern counties of Louth, of Monaghan, of Armagh, and of Fermanagh. The sisters of Endeus were Saints Fanchea, or Fainc,<sup>22</sup> Lochina, Carecha,<sup>23</sup> and Darenia.<sup>24</sup> Endeus was born in Oriel, about the middle of the fifth century; but, his acephalous Acts do not furnish the particulars of his boyhood's years, nor are they supplied, in the more complete Bollandist version. Being especially distinguished for daring and courage, as a soldier, on the death of his father, the youthful Enda was chosen to succeed him, in the little kingdom of Oriel, so called from its lying southwards, in reference to more northern regions.

His holy sister, Fanchea, who greatly loved him, was incessant in her exertions to gain her brother's heart for the welfare of the Church. With all his defects of character, she knew Enda to be chivalrous and pure. For a time, her words of warning and entreaty remained without apparent result. However, the season of grace came, when Enda had asked from his sister in marriage one of the royal maidens, under her care. These were receiving their education in that convent, over which she presided. In the Life of St. Fanchea,<sup>25</sup> we have already related the miraculous occurrence, which led her brother to renounce all worldly care and ambition, in order to embrace the religious state. Enda had resigned his heirship to a kingdom, and the great wealth of his patrimony for God's sake. Then, at the pressing solicitations of St. Fanchea, and at the hands of some spiritual father,<sup>26</sup> he took the monk's habit and tonsure, for what the tonsure signified, he fulfilled by his actions.<sup>27</sup> The holy man resolved on founding a monastery, within his patrimonial district, and at the foot of the mountain Bregh, on the confines of Ulster. Here he was director and æconomus of the workmen; but, it does not appear, that he had actually presided over a monastery, in the place, although deriving name from him, apparently as a founder. Some curious remains are extant, near Ecclesiastical Record," vol. vii., Oct., 1870, part i., pp. 19 to 31, and Dec., 1870, part ii., pp. 105 to 123.

<sup>17</sup> Published by Messrs. Brown and Nolan, Dublin, 1870, 8vo.

<sup>18</sup> See "A Chorographical Description of West or H-lar Connaught," by Roderic O'Flaherty, Esq., edited by James Hardiman, M.R.I.A., n. (b), p. 79.

<sup>19</sup> Colgan endeavours to account for the derivation of this name, but only in a conjectural and doubtful manner.

<sup>20</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 82, 83.

<sup>21</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 268.

<sup>22</sup> Her feast occurs, on the 1st of January.

<sup>23</sup> Her festival has been assigned, to the 9th of February.

<sup>24</sup> She is said to have been wife to Ængus, King of Cashel. His death is placed, by the Four Masters, in the year 489.

<sup>25</sup> At the 1st of January.

<sup>26</sup> Colgan remarks, that St. Fanchea and her nurses were present, probably, on this occasion.

<sup>27</sup> See Vita S. Endæi, auctore Augustino

Killany.<sup>28</sup> Following the advice of his pious and beloved sister, Fanchea St. Enda is said to have proceeded to Rosnat, in Britain, where he remained for some time, under the spiritual direction of St. Mansenus, or Manchan. Afterwards, he is said to have visited Rome; and here, in a miraculous way, Fanchea, with some of her religious daughters, visited the austere saint, who refused to see his sister, although she spoke to him.<sup>29</sup> Following the example of other holy men, and preparing himself in everything for the order of priesthood, at length Endeus was ordained. Soon he was found pleasing to the most high God. He next built a monastery, called Latinum, or Laetinum, or "the Place of Joy." Rightly it was so called, because therein the command of loving God and our neighbour was most faithfully observed. The locality, however, is not known. Returning to Ireland, with one hundred and fifty companions, he landed at Colptha port,<sup>30</sup> now Drogheda, and he built several churches thereabouts, on either side of the River Boyne.<sup>31</sup>

The Aran Islands,<sup>32</sup> off the coast of Galway, were then but little known to Ængus Mac Natfraich, King of Munster, who lived at Cashel, although his jurisdiction extended over them. He had been married to Darenia,<sup>33</sup> the sister of Endeus, and the latter, yielding to the advice of his other sister, Fanchea, asked permission to found a religious establishment there. Ængus advised him, however, to build it, rather near to Cashel, where fertile land could be obtained, and where his society might be enjoyed, by the king and by his sister. But, Endeus declared, that Aran was to be the place of his resurrection, and that it sufficed for his wants. However, the king declared he had never even seen the island; when, in a miraculous manner, the earth swelled upwards, at Isel,<sup>34</sup> near Cashel,<sup>35</sup> where they then stood. The king, thus being enabled to view the distant spot, declared it to be a fair land, which he willingly gave to God and to St. Endeus.<sup>36</sup>

CHAPTER II.

ST. ENDEUS LEAVES CASHEL, AND AFTERWARDS, HE SETS OUT FOR THE ARANN ISLANDS—KILLEANY CHURCH IN CLARE—ENDEUS FOUNDS HIS CHURCH AND MONASTERY, ON ARANMORE ISLAND, AT KILLEANY—ECCLESIASTICAL DIVISIONS ON ARAN—MIRACULOUS GIFTS FROM HEAVEN—THE NUMEROUS DISCIPLES OF OUR SAINT.

HAVING sought and obtained the benediction of his relative, the king returned to Cashel, while the holy man led a number of religious disciples towards Magardin, apud Colgan, in "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxi. Martii, at p. 705.

<sup>28</sup> In Wright's "Louisiana," Book i., Plates xv., xvi., are represented interesting copperplate engravings of an artificial Mound, near the town of Killany, and near the old church. A letter-press description is given, at p. 10.

<sup>29</sup> See L. Tachet de Barneval's "Histoire Légendaire de l'Irlande," chap. xiv., p. 147.

<sup>30</sup> There, too, according to the Acts of St. Endeus, St. Patrick is said to have landed.

<sup>31</sup> See "A Visit to the Aran-More of St. Enda," part i., p. 29. "Irish Ecclesiastical Record."

<sup>32</sup> In James Hardiman's "History of Galway," there is an interesting account of the Aran Islands. See Appendix.

<sup>33</sup> According to the Latin Life of St. Kieran of Saigir, however, Ethnea Huachach is said to have been the wife, who was slain with him.

<sup>34</sup> Perhaps, the ancient name of Athassel, where now are to be found the ruins of a fine mediæval Abbey.

<sup>35</sup> Our Frontispiece to the present volume has an illustration of this ancient city, which is also celebrated in connexion with Irish Hagiology.

<sup>36</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxi. Martii. Vita S. Endei Abbatis Aranensis, cap. i. to xiii., pp. 704 to 708, with nn. 1 to 26, p. 710. Also, the Bollanda convenient port. Thence, they are said to have been conveyed, in a miraculous manner, to another landing place, called Leamhchoill<sup>1</sup>—more correctly Ochoill<sup>2</sup>—on the northern part of Aran. The islands here were then inhabited by pagans, who had migrated from the adjacent coast of Clare, and from that maritime district, known as Corcumruaidh, now Corcomroe. Not far distant, is still to be seen the old church of Killeany,<sup>3</sup> which is situated in the townland and parish of the same name,<sup>4</sup> within the barony of Burren, and county of Clare. Whether it had any particular connexion or not, with the early visit of St. Endeus to this place, may be questioned; but, he is certainly regarded, as the special patron. It consisted of a nave, divided by a high Gothic pointed archway from a choir.<sup>5</sup> Perhaps, a more ancient church occupied its site, for the present ruins represent a structure of mediæval erection. The walls have several massive lime-stones worked into them, and the whole district around is covered with limestone dists' "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxi. Vita S. Endei, Abb. Aranensis, cap. i., ii., iii., with notes, pp. 269 to 271.

Killeany Church, County of Clare.

CHAPTER II.—'According to O Flaherty, this place was on the west continent, having "a ferry-port into the island."

<sup>2</sup> This is said to have been so called, from Ochoill, and it has "a port for boats to arrive."—"A Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught," written A.D. 1684, by Roderic O'Flaherty, Esq. Edited by James Hardman, M.R.I.A., p. 84. However, the editor does not agree with his author, regarding the situation of the Leamhchoill, mentioned in the Life of St. Enna; for, he says, it "is the place on the great island called Ocuill, where the great stone, 'lapidem grandem,' on which he sailed from Garomna isle to Aran! is still shown, about half-a-mile north-west of Cromwell's fort. It is a huge, rough rock, and is called the currach stone, from curach, a boat."—Note (l.)

<sup>3</sup> This Killeany church is shown, on the fine old Map of the county of Clare, by Henry Pelham.

<sup>4</sup> These are to be found, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheets 5, 8, 9.

<sup>5</sup> Interiorly, the nave measures 34 feet, 6 inches, in length, by 19 feet, 2 inches, in width. The choir has the same breadth, and it is 19 feet, 6 inches, in length. It contains the remains, with the covering flag-rocks and walls, cropping up among the soil, so that outlines of the old building are scarcely contrasted in colour from the surrounding fields. A cemetery, enclosed within a low, square wall, extends outside of the ruins.<sup>6</sup>

The chief man of the Gentiles, on Aran, was Corban, who is said to have been at first hostile to St. Endeus, and who prepared plots to destroy the holy man. However, when he was convinced, in a miraculous manner,<sup>7</sup> that the Almighty had designed Endeus to remain there, the pagan presented the island and himself to God and to his servant. Where our saint first offered sacrifice to the Heavenly King, there too he established, afterwards, his monastery, on the eastern side of the island.<sup>8</sup> Here, he is said to have founded a House of Regular Canons, about the year 480.<sup>9</sup> Ussher has it so early as 449.<sup>10</sup> The situation was of singular retirement, and well suited for the rigours of a penitential life.<sup>11</sup> It is now known as Killeany,<sup>12</sup> and it is situated, about one mile from Kilronan, the chief town on Aranmore. Near this place, also, was Port-Doibhche,<sup>13</sup> connected with one of the wild legends,<sup>14</sup> related in the Life of St. Endeus; while, in each of the other two islands is shown Trach-na-neach<sup>15</sup>—corruptly pronounced Traghteach—likewise noticed there, and so called, as yet, by the islanders. Afterwards, assuming the government of that monastery, which he founded on Aranmore, the holy man soon collected a fervent band of disciples, who were subject to his rule.

One half of the island was assigned, by Endeus, to become the special property of this monastery; although, at first, the holy abbot had divided the island into ten parts, and had built thereon ten monasteries, each under the rule of its proper superior. He was regarded as a Father, while under him another was placed, as second in rank, with a right to succeed, in case of his stone of its rude altar, immediately under a beautifully-coved eastern window, of most perfect masonry. The ope externally is narrow, but it is widely splayed internally. Some remains of ornamental pilasters and courses of masonry are yet to be seen. There is a circularly-headed window internally, and pointed on the outside, in the south choir-wall; and, in the north choir-wall, there is a low, square window. In the south nave-wall are two additional windows, circularly-coved inside, and pointed on the outside. The north wall is featureless, but in the west gable are two windows, one in the top, and the other near the bottom. Between them appear interiorly-projecting stones, as if to support a gallery or roof. The nave walls were four feet in thickness, while the door was in the south wall, and it was of low, pointed, Gothic shape above, although its place is now only a deformed breach. Drip stones yet hang over the upper courses of masonry, and the three gables are still nearly perfect, with offsets, on which the roof-tree and rafters formerly rested.

<sup>6</sup> The accompanying illustration was drawn, by the writer, on the spot, in June, 1877; it has been copied on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, and it was engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>7</sup> One of the local legends is, that St. Endeus drove from a pasture, called Arnagcaorach, the horses of Corban, and that they swam over to a spot on the Middle Island, which, thenceforward, was known as Traighneach, or the "horses' shore." They passed, also, from the Middle to the Eastern island.

<sup>8</sup> The Latin writer of our saint's Acts adds, "hodie Cella Sancti Endei vocatur."

<sup>9</sup> See Sir James Ware, "De Hibernia et Antiquitatibus ejus Disquisitiones," cap. xxvi., p. 214.

<sup>10</sup> See Index Chronologicus, A.D. CCCCLIX., in "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," p. 519.

<sup>11</sup> Near this place, a Franciscan monastery is said to have been founded, A.D. 1485, probably by the O'Briens, who then owned the Aran Islands.

<sup>12</sup> The town and townland so called are situated, in the parish of Inishmore, barony of Aran, and will be found, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Galway," Sheets 110, 111, 119.

<sup>13</sup> In Irish, port Doibhe, "the port of the large vessel," or "hogshead;" in Latin, it is called, Portus Dolii.

<sup>14</sup> See the Life, in Colgan, chap. xvi.

<sup>15</sup> In Irish, Tragh na neach, "the horse's track," or "shore." See the Life in Colgan, chap. xv.

<sup>16</sup> Here, Colgan introduces a misplaced narrative, according to the Bollandists, who abridge it in a note (g.): "Hic sequebatur death. While the prelates should be interred, within their own proper cemeteries, it was regulated, that the old monks were to be buried, with the rest of their brethren. However, a controversy arose among the disciples; for eight of those monastic Fathers maintained, that a fair division of Aran had not been made. It was resolved, to ask for light from on high, in order to determine such a doubt; and, accordingly, a triduum, of fasting was twice completed. After this, the Angel of the Lord appeared to St. Endeus, and brought with him two gifts from heaven; one was a Book of the Four Gospels, and the other was a priest's chasuble, to signify, that he was worthy the double honour of teaching and of governing. That Book of the Gospels was afterwards kept, with great veneration, in the church of St. Endeus; while the chasuble, wrought with gold and silver, was preserved to the time, when the biographer of our saint lived, yet in his day, the ornamentation had given place to the baser material of brass. The division of the island—one half appertaining to Endeus, while the rest of it had been equally divided among the other ten monasteries—continued to the period, when his ancient Acts had been composed.<sup>16</sup>

We are told, that thrice fifty was the number of St. Endeus' congregation,<sup>17</sup> in the O'Clery's Calendar. Some very extraordinary miracles are related of the saint, while he lived upon Aran. Thus, when the monks of his monastery at one time complained, that they had no ready access to the sea, owing to the projection of a rock, which was a source of danger to navigators; Endeus signed it with his abbatial staff, and returning homewards, an angel appeared, on the night succeeding, and holding in his hand a sword of lightning. Striking this against the rock, it was divided midway, by a large chasm, which afterwards afforded a safe passage for those entering the port.

The fame of St. Enda's austere holiness, and of that angelical life, which so many were leading in Aran under his guidance, soon spread far and wide, throughout the land. The sweet odour of Christ was diffused from the lonely island in the Atlantic, and it penetrated to every part of Ireland. Wheresoever it reached, a gracious message stirred with joy the hearts of the noblest and best among God's servants.<sup>18</sup> Thus, St. Kyran,<sup>19</sup> afterwards the illustrious abbot and founder of Clonmacnoise, became his disciple. The celebrated navigator, St. Brendan,<sup>20</sup> with fourteen of his monks, visited our saint, and remained with him three days and three nights. Then, having received his blessing, the holy Brendan and his companions set out for the coast of Kerry.<sup>21</sup> Aged and infirm persons came, to close in religious peace fabulosissima narratio: de Pupeo Romæ ad Pontificatum electo per columbæ super eo descensum, quod fuerit consuetum futuri Pontificis apud Romanos indicium: cui nihilominus onus illud honoremque recusanti, S. Hilarius suffectus sit, anno scilicet 461. Certamen quoque habet humilitatis inter SS. Endeum, Helucum, et Pupeum exortum, Prælaturam detrectantibus singulis, consulto prius per internuntios Papâ, tandemque diremptum trium candidarum auium aduentu, ea quæ dicta sunt munera Endeo deferentium."

<sup>17</sup> In a note, Dr. Todd here says, "Congregation: i.e., the number of his monks."

This is also the statement of O'Flaherty.
<sup>18</sup> See "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. vii., December, 1870. A Visit to the Aranmore of St. Enda, part ii., p. 105.

<sup>19</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of September.

<sup>20</sup> See his Life, at the 16th of May.

<sup>21</sup> These incidents are charmingly rendered in verse, in the "Voyage of St. Brendan," by Denis Florence MacCarthy. See "The Bell-Founder and other Poems," at p. 180.

"Hearing how blessed Enda lived apart,
Amid the sacred caves of Ara-Mhor;
And how, beneath his eye, spread like a chart,
Lay all the isles of that remotest shore
And how he had collected in his mind
All that was known to man of the old sea,
I left the hill of miracles behind,
And sailed from out the shallow, sandy Leigh.

the remnant of their days, which at their best they had accounted as few and evil. As the prophet declared, "it was called the holy way."<sup>22</sup> St. Finian of Moville,<sup>23</sup> was one of St. Enda's disciples, on Aran; while St. Finian of Clonard,<sup>24</sup> St. Jarlath of Tuam,<sup>25</sup> St. Mac Creiche,<sup>26</sup> of the Corcomroe race, St. Guigneus,<sup>27</sup> St. Papeus,<sup>28</sup> St. Kevin of Glendalough,<sup>29</sup> St. Carthage of Lismore, St. Lonan Kerr,<sup>30</sup> St. Nechatus, or Nechanus,<sup>31</sup> and St. Libeus, called St. Enda's brother, lived with him on the island.<sup>32</sup> And thus, Aran gradually came to be, as the writer of the Life of St. Kieran of Clonmacnoise describes it, the home of a multitude of holy men, and that sanctuary, where repose the relics of countless saints, whose names are known only to the Almighty God.<sup>33</sup>

CHAPTER III.

STRICT RULE OF ST. ENDEUS—HE VISITS THE ADJOINING COAST OF GALWAY, AND AFTERWARDS HE RETURNS TO ARAN—HIS DEATH—FESTIVAL DAY AND HIS COMMEMORATION—CONCLUSION.

MARIANUS O'GORMAN styles St. Endeus, "the virginal Saint of Aran Island," and there an angelical life did he lead, in the midst of his children. Especially he was remarkable for his penitential exercises. Legends—current regarding him—confirm the impression, that he exacted a very strict discipline, which he imposed, not alone on himself, but which he required from the monks, living under his rule. We are told, that the test and proof, which he "Again I sailed, and crossed the stormy sound

    That lies beneath Binn-Aite's rocky height,
And there, upon the shore, the saint I found Waiting my coming through the tardy night.
He led me to his home beside the wave,
    Where, with his monks, the pious father dwelled;
And to my listening ear he freely gave
    The sacred knowledge that his bosom held.

"When I proclaimed the project that I nursed,
    How 'twas for this that I his blessing sought,
An irrepressible cry of joy outburst
    From his pure lips, that blessed me for the thought.
He said, that he, too, had in visions strayed
    O'er the untrack'd ocean's billowing foam;
Bid me have hope, that God would give me aid,
And bring me safe back to my native home.

"Thus having sought for knowledge and for strength,
    For the unheard-of voyage that I planned,

I left these myriad isles, and turned at length
    Southward my bark, and sought my native land."

<sup>22</sup> Isaiah xxxv. 71.

<sup>23</sup> His feast is usually assigned, to the 10th of September.

<sup>24</sup> See his Life, at the 12th of December.

<sup>25</sup> See his Life, at the 6th of June.

<sup>26</sup> His feast has been referred, to the 11th of August.

<sup>27</sup> His feast does not seem to be known.

<sup>28</sup> Colgan conjectures, that he may have been the St. Papan, venerated on the 13th of July—it seems most probable, a mistake for the 31st of that month.

<sup>29</sup> His feast occurs, at the 3rd of June. Yet, the saint so called, although bearing a similar name, is said to have been his brother, and to have been venerated, on the 12th of June.

<sup>30</sup> He was venerated, it is thought, on the 6th of June.

<sup>31</sup> He is said to have been venerated, at the 3rd of May.

<sup>32</sup> See the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. vii., pp. 109 to 112.

<sup>33</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxi. Martii. Appendix ad Acta S. Endei, cap. ii., p. 712.

CHAPTER III.—' This was a boat or canoe, of wicker work, covered with skins. It is still used in Ireland—especially about used every evening, to clear them from sins, was to put every man of them in turn into a curach,<sup>1</sup> without any hide upon it at all. Then was it floated out upon the sea. The salt water could get into the curach, if there happened to be any crime or sin upon the man, who was in it. It could not get in, if he were free from sins. Enda, the abbot, was the last man that entered the curach. There was not found any man, of those one hundred and fifty monks, who did not escape a wetting from the curach, excepting only Gigniat, sometimes called Gigneus, the cook of Enda,<sup>2</sup> who lived at a place called Acadh-Draighnich. He seems to have joined the community of our saint, after the latter had returned from his visit to Medraighe, said to have been a maritime district of Southern Connaught, and in the county of Galway. During this journey, St. Endeus asked certain fishermen to give himself and his companions some fish, for their refectation. One boy alone presented a fish, he had taken. The holy man declared, that in that haven, fish should thenceforward be scarce, and this prediction was verified. Thence, he went to the harbour, where the outflowing waters of Lough Orbsen reach the sea, and where the hospitable young fisher was born. Endeus prayed the Almighty, that the bay should abound in fish, ever afterwards, and his prayer was graciously heard. On an island, Ehinis,<sup>3</sup> of Lough Orbsen, our saint received a kindly greeting and welcome from a chief man, named Crumther Coelan.<sup>4</sup> Here a miracle—but of the legendary class—was performed.

Killenay Old Church, Arranmore, County of Galway.

Aran—although now, generally, it is covered with tarred canvas.

<sup>2</sup> The legend continues this account, in the following conversation between him and the abbot:—"What hast thou done, O Gigniat?" said Enda. The cook said, that he did nothing, but put a little addition to his own portion from the share of Ciaran, son of the artificer. Enda then ordered him to leave the island. And, he also said, "There is no room for a thief here; I will not permit this at all."

<sup>3</sup> Or Horse Island, now Inis Gearain, or Garron Island, having the same sense.

<sup>4</sup> His feast has been assigned, to the 25th of April, by O'Flaherty.

Afterwards, the holy abbot returned to Aran, and Enda remained there, until he grew decrepit with years.

The virtues and fame of St. Endeus were long remembered, even after his departure from life. Cuimin of Coindeire, in the poem which begins, "Patrick of the Fort of Macha loved," states, that St. Enda used to be in a stone prison praying for all persons;<sup>5</sup> which shows, how the traditions of Aran commemorated his extraordinary devotion, and austerity of living. The date for St. Enda's death has not been fixed, by Colgan; but, he conjectures, that it must have taken place, about the year 540.<sup>6</sup> Tradition still preserves in popular affection that spot, where his grave is pointed out, beside the ruined church of Killeany,<sup>7</sup> and, in the cemetery, which surrounds it. The white sands sweep over it, from the adjoining sea-shore, and lonely was the position chosen for his entombment. And, in the mortuary chapel of St. Enny, it is said, that 127 saints are buried in the same grave.<sup>8</sup> In his day, we are told, by O'Flaherty,<sup>9</sup> that north-east of this chapel, in the graveyard, St. Enna was buried in a grave, over which was visible a stone, and that 120 graves of saints, with divers other tombstones, were then extant. Many of these are now buried in the sands.

Besides the two places called Killeany, in the counties of Galway and of Clare, as already mentioned, and which were dedicated to our saint; we find, among the Irish Ordnance Survey, similar names, viz.: Killeany,<sup>10</sup> in the parish of Moyglare, and barony of Upper Deece, county of Meath; Killeany,<sup>11</sup> in the parish of Clonenagh and Clonagheen, barony of Maryborough West, Queen's County; as also, Killeany Beg and Killeany More,<sup>12</sup> in the parish of Kilfergus, and barony of Shanid, county of Limerick. Whether our saint was venerated at these latter places, we are not able to determine; however, we are told, that the church of Spidell,<sup>13</sup> west of Galway town, was dedicated to St. Enna, in O'Flaherty's time. It seems likely, moreover, that he was patron of other places, and especially, in the western parts of Ireland.

The festival of St. Endeus is commemorated, at the 21st of March, as we find from St. Ængus the Culdee, in his Festilogy.<sup>14</sup> The published Martyrology

<sup>5</sup> Thus the poem says:—

"Enda of the high piety loved
In Ara, victory with sweetness
A prison of hard narrow stone
To bring all unto heaven."

<sup>6</sup> See, also, Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. viii., sect. vii., p. 396, and n. 82, pp. 397, 398.

<sup>7</sup> The accompanying illustration of this old church was sketched, originally, by an accomplished artist, Howard Helmick, Esq., Dangan Cottage, Galway, and presented by him to the writer, in 1877. It has been transferred to the wood, by William F. Wakeman, having been engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>8</sup> Such is an account, I have received, from Rev. John A. Concanon, P.P., in a letter, headed Arran Island, January 15th, 1877.

<sup>9</sup> See "A Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught, written A.D. 1684," p. 83.

<sup>10</sup> It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 50, 53.

<sup>11</sup> It is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheet 23.

<sup>12</sup> These are described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheet 18.

<sup>13</sup> Its Irish name is Spíodéal, "an hospital," and it was an old English, as well as a Scotch term for such a place. "Rob not the spital."—Jonson.

<sup>14</sup> For the following extract, from the Leabhar Breac copy, and its English translation, the writer is indebted to Professor O'Looney:—

c. xxi. kl. Dón bith ba moí mbuaroe Dennoecht ba lecc aige, for oen lich leir rluagosa
Enna aipoeic aipne.

"To the world great were the gifts
Of Benedict the powerful chief, of Tallagh<sup>15</sup> commemorates our saint, as Ennae, Airne, Mac Ainmire, mic Ronain, i. do Creamthannaibh; but, it would seem, this entry had been incorrectly written, by the scribe, for in the Franciscan copy,<sup>16</sup> we find a different notice, at the 21st of March. The Calendar of Cashel, Marianus O'Gorman, and Maguire, notice his descent, while commemorating his festive day.<sup>17</sup> In the anonymous Calendar, published by O'Sullivan Beare,<sup>18</sup> there is a St. Eudius—which we may suspect to have been an incorrect printing for Endeus—at the 21st of March. Again, the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>19</sup> mentions, as having a festival on this day, Enda, Abbot, of Ara. Besides the foregoing, several foreign Martyrologists, such as Canisius, Philip Ferrarius, and the Carthusian Martyrology, note his feast, at the same date, in Ireland.<sup>20</sup> At the 12th of the April Kalends, which corresponds with the 21st of March, we are told, that in Hibernia, the Holy Confessor Enna this day went to Christ. Such is a notice in the Kalendar of Drummond.<sup>21</sup> In the "Memorial of British Piety,"<sup>22</sup> his festival is noticed, while the "Circle of the Seasons" records him, likewise, at the 21st of March.<sup>23</sup>

As the spirit of Saul was proud, and as his impulsive zeal urged him to take an active part in public affairs, it required a special grace from the Almighty, to make him sensible of his errors. Nothing less than a miracle was wrought, to change his heart and disposition. But, when his conversion had been thus effected, his vigorous intellect and impulsive nature led him to brave all trials and persecutions, to spread still more a knowledge of God's holy law. His humility and charity displaced his former pride and cruelty. So, like the Apostle St. Paul, the present young athlete of Christ was miraculously rescued from a career of crime, to become a spiritual leader, teacher and shepherd of his people. He feared not the violence of men, when he had combated his own strong natural passions; nor had human respect any power, to lead him away from the path of duty.

ARTICLE II.—ST. ISENGER, BISHOP OF VERDEN, SAXONY. [Ninth Century.] High-toned morality is rare, in this world of sin and selfishness; but, that perfect love of God, which rejects all things for his sake, is still rarer. Hence, we must regard with great admiration those, who here made noble sacrifices, actuated by a true missionary spirit. The most probable supposition, at which we can arrive regarding St. Isenger, should leave him a native of our country. He is said to have come from Scotia, which must probably mean Scotia Major, or Ireland, unless the contrary be clearly indicated, which we do not find to be the case. Likely enough, his original name underwent some alteration. The English Martyrology asserts, that he was a Benedictine monk, and an Abbot of Amarbaric; and that, having ruled this monastery for some years, being moved with zeal for the conversion of people inhabiting the neighbouring regions, he set out towards Belgium and Germany. He was afterwards appointed Bishop of Verden,† in Saxony, being the successor to Saint Cortilla. He was also a Scot, and to show that

On one festival, pious hostful
Enda the illustrious of Aran."

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix.

<sup>16</sup> Here we read, Enœur seu Enniur Apannenir.

<sup>17</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxi. Martii. Appendix ad Acta S. Endei, cap. i., p. 711.

<sup>18</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi.,

p. 50.

<sup>19</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 82, 83.

<sup>20</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxi. Martii. Appendix ad Acta S. Endei, cap. i., p. 711.

<sup>21</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 8.

<sup>22</sup> Supp. 54, 55.

<sup>23</sup> See p. 81.

ARTICLE II.—† "Ad Ienum fluvium

many predecessors of Isenger, in the See of Verden, were Scots or Irish, Colgan cites a passage from Crantzius, in which it is asserted, that almost all Bishop Waltherus' antecessors were of English or Scottish birth. At the 21st of March, Dempster<sup>2</sup> introduces, as being venerated at Verda, Isinger, the seventh bishop, a confessor; and, of course, it is assumed, that he was a native of Scotland. It is said, that after Isenger had enjoyed the dignity of bishop, for some time, he laid down his life for the Faith, in the year 824, according to some authorities; Colgan remarks, however, that he had not seen such statement verified, by the testimony of any ancient writer. Again, although placed seventh on the roll, Albert Crantzius says,<sup>3</sup> that no certain authority enabled him to form an opinion, demonstrating Isenger's origin, or the time and order of his succession in the episcopacy. He lived, about the beginning of the ninth century; and, although we are left in ignorance of his Acts, yet his career must have been illustrious, for as a saint, he is venerated and commemorated, at the 21st of March, by hagiographical writers, such as Ferrarius, Wion, the English Martyrology, Bruschius, Bucelinus,<sup>4</sup> Dempster,<sup>5</sup> Camerarius,<sup>6</sup> Colgan,<sup>7</sup> Henry Fitzsimon, an anonymous Calendar published by O'Sullivan Beare,<sup>8</sup> by the Bollandists,<sup>9</sup> and by others. His remains were interred, in the Cathedral church of Verden, where they were held in much honour by the citizens, for a long time after his death.

---

ARTICLE III.—ST. LUICHEALL, SON OF CIARAN. On the 21st of March, the published Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> enters the name of Lucill mac h. Chiara,<sup>2</sup>—but, more properly, it should be written, the son of Hua-Kierain. Nothing more is given, to indicate his natal spot. The Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> on this day, also registers, Luicheall, son of Ciaran, as having veneration paid him. The Bollandists note his festival, at this same date, as “Lucellus filius Hua-Kierain.”<sup>4</sup>

---

ARTICLE IV.—ST. MOMHANNA, VIRGIN. The name of St. Momhanna, a Virgin, occurs in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman and of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> as having a festival, on this day; while the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> notice her, as Momhanna Virgo.

---

sita,” as Colgan remarks, and it is not to be confounded with a place, similarly named, in the Duchy of Cleves.

<sup>2</sup> See “Menologium Scoticum,” Bishop Forbes' “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 195.

<sup>3</sup> See “Rerum Germanicarum Historici Clarissimi, Ecclesiastica Historia, sive Metropolis,” lib. i., cap. 29, p. 21. Editio Francofurti, MDLXXX. fol.

<sup>4</sup> The two writers here named do not bestow on Isenger the title of Saint or Blessed.

<sup>5</sup> Lib. ix., num. 710.

<sup>6</sup> In “Menologium Scoticum.”

<sup>7</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xxi. Martii. Vita S. Isengeri, p. 716.

<sup>8</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's “Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernici Compendium,” tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 55.

<sup>9</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxi. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 257.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix.

<sup>2</sup> In the Franciscan copy, the entry is Lucellur reu Lucillur fil hua Ciarra reu Ciarain, at this date.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 82, 83.

<sup>4</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxi. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 256.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 82, 83.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxi. Among the pretermitted Saints, p. 256.

Twenty-second Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FAILBEUS, OR FAILBHE, EIGHTH ABBOT OF IONA, SCOTLAND.

[SEVENTH CENTURY.]

THE few particulars of this saintly superior's Acts, that are known, have been recorded by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> at the 22nd of March.<sup>2</sup> With the reservation, that Adamnan has no particular notice of his sanctity—although admitting that his festival has been assigned to this day, by the Irish Martyrologists—the Bollandists notice Failbeus, Abbot of Hy.<sup>3</sup> His father was Pipan, son of Amalgad, son to Duach;<sup>4</sup> so that he belonged to the race of Conall Gulban, son to Niall of the Nine Hostages. Like all the first superiors of St. Columba's celebrated establishment, the present holy man was born in Ireland; and, probably, at an early age, he left it to make his religious profession. He was the eighth in succession, among the abbots of Iona; and, we are informed, that Failbe supplied Adamnan, with several traditions, relating to the great St. Columba. These have been inserted in his biography.<sup>5</sup> The holy subject of this notice ruled over Iona monastery, from A.D. 669 to 679; and, he died, on this day, assigned for his festival. He departed, in the year 674, according to the Annals of Clonmacnoise; or A.D. 677, according to the Annals of the Four Masters;<sup>6</sup> or in 678, according to those of Ulster; or A.D. 679, according to the Annals of Tighernach.<sup>7</sup> The name, Failbhe, Iae, is the only record we meet with, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>8</sup> and concerning him, at this date. In Hibernia, states the Kalendar of Drummond, at the xi. April Kal. or 2nd of March, the Holy Confessor Falbe, Abbot of the monastery at Hy, went to Christ.<sup>9</sup> Likewise, the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>10</sup> enters on this day, Failbhe, son of Piopan, Abbot of Ia, and a successor to St. Colum Cille.

ARTICLE II.—ST. DARERCA, SISTER OF ST. PATRICK. [Fifth Century.] Enumerating Darerca, among St. Patrick's sisters,<sup>1</sup> Colgan also inserts a summary of statements, at the 22nd of March.<sup>2</sup> He derives her Latinized name, from the Irish Diar-shearc, signifying "constant" or "firm love," or ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxii. Martii. De S. Failbeo Seniore, sive primo Abbate Hiensi, pp. 719, 720.

<sup>2</sup> By a typographical error, in Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," it is stated, at March 2. See lib. i., cap. i., n. (d), p. 16.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 368.

<sup>4</sup> See the "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," quoted as authority for his pedigree, in Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. iii., p. 480, and cap. x., p. 490.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," lib. i., cap. i., p. 16, cap. 3. p. 26.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 284, 285, and n. (p.) Ibid.

<sup>7</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," Additional Notes, (O), p. 376.

<sup>8</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find, failbeur abb hieniri.

<sup>9</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of the Scottish Saints," p. 8.

<sup>10</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 269.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxii. Martii. Vita S. Darercæ, pp. 716 to 719.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

from Der-shearc, which means "love of tears"—attributable to her devotional feelings. St. Patrick, says Jocelyn,<sup>3</sup> had three sisters of remarkable sanctity and perfection, whose names were Tygridia, Darercha, and Lupita. The youngest of those sisters is said to have been Darerca. As a widow, and as the happy mother of a holy progeny of children, the Bollandists enter her feast.<sup>4</sup> If we are to credit some accounts, she had no less than seventeen sons; while they are even supposed to have all become bishops, and to have been honoured as saints. Besides these, she is said to have had two holy daughters, who were virgins. But, as already stated, in our Life of St.

Teampul na Naomh, Lough Corrib, County of Galway.

Patrick,<sup>5</sup> considerable discrepancy exists among writers, in reference to those statements, nor can they be advocated with any degree of certainty. Besides these accounts, in the church of Innisghoill, or the Foreigner's Island, on Lough Corrib, county of Galway, it is believed, that the son of Darerca, otherwise called Limenuch, was interred, and that the inscription on his tombstone may still be seen, near the ancient church of Inchaguile.<sup>6</sup> A wonderfully beautiful Irish Romanesque doorway<sup>7</sup> yet remains in the building, known as Teampul na Naomh, or "church of the saint." Another and an older structure is near it, called Teampul Phadruig,<sup>8</sup> which Petrie deemed to be probably a foundation of our national saint, and old as his time. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>9</sup> at the 22nd of March, is entered the name of Darerca. The few words which follow this record are misplaced. She is Vita S. Patricii, cap. l., p. 76, and nn. 49 to 53, p. 110.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, pp. 367, 368.

<sup>5</sup> See chap. iii., and n. 63.

<sup>6</sup> See an excellent woodcut of this church, in a little work, called "A Week in the West of Ireland," Illustrated by W. F. Wakeman, p. 23.

<sup>7</sup> The accompanying illustration was drawn on the spot, by William F. Wakeman, and it was transferred by him to the wood: it was engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>8</sup> An illustration of this has been given already, in the Life of St. Patrick.

represented as having been a widow, and to have emigrated to Ireland. Here she flourished, after the middle of the fifth century; and, supposing her to be the sister of St. Patrick, her parents, and her pedigree, as also a few other particulars, will be found recorded, in the Life we have given of the great Irish Apostle. She is said<sup>10</sup> to have been venerated in Line, a spacious plain, near the town of Carrickfergus, in Ulster. As Dararcha, she is set down in Henry Fitzsimon's List,<sup>11</sup> while Marianus O'Gorman<sup>12</sup> does not forget to record her feast, at the 22nd of March. We find, set down in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>13</sup> as having a festival, on this day, Darerca, sister of Patrick. It is remarked, by Colgan, that she must be distinguished from St. Darerca, or Moninna, of Kill-Slebhe, of the Roderician family, in Ulster.<sup>14</sup> Archbishop Ussher,<sup>15</sup> however, has not made such a mistake, although this statement is to be found in Colgan's work. The writer has been informed,<sup>16</sup> that St. Darerca is patroness of Valencia Island.<sup>17</sup> There is a well, called Tobar Re Domnach, where the people held a patron on St. Darerca's day, the 22nd of March. This celebration is still kept up. At Valencia, the Catholic church was dedicated,<sup>18</sup> to St. Darerca.

ARTICLE III.—ST. TRIEN, OR TRIENAN, ABBOT OF KILLELGA. [Fifth or Sixth Century.] Some notices of the present holy man are found, in Colgan's work.<sup>1</sup> St. Trian, Trienan, Trenan,<sup>2</sup> or Trena,<sup>3</sup> was son to Dedius.<sup>4</sup> He was descended, in the fifth degree, from Fiach Aradius, who was king of Ulster, in the year 240;<sup>5</sup> and from whom the Dalaradian family derived its origin, as also the territory of Dalaradia its name. According to the O'Clery's Calendar,<sup>6</sup> St. Trian was the son of Deit,<sup>7</sup> of Cill Ealga, and he sprang from the race of Trial, son to Conall Cearnach. In a sort of conjectural way, the Rev. Dr. Lanigan deems it possible, that this Trian or Trena may have been the bishop Trianus, a Roman, who entertained St. Patrick in the monastery of Craibhach, near the Brosna, on the north-eastern limits of the old Munster province.<sup>8</sup> Trian is classed, moreover, among the disciples of St. Patrick, <sup>9</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy is marked Darerca.

<sup>10</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxii. Martii. De S. Darerca, &c., n. 6, p. 719.

<sup>11</sup> Her feast, however, is not here given. See Catalogus Aliquorum Sanctorum Hiberniæ.—O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Hiberniæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xii., p. 53.

<sup>12</sup> He enters "Darerca Virgo nobilis, soror sancti Patricii."

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>14</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxii. Martii. De S. Darerca Vidua, S. Patricii Sorore, cap. ix., p. 718.

<sup>15</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii. pp. 429, 430.

<sup>16</sup> By Rev. Eugene Murphy, C.C., Dromod parish, county of Kerry, in July, 1871.

<sup>17</sup> This island and parish, in the barony of Iveragh, is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Kerry," Sheets 78, 79, 87, 88.

<sup>18</sup> By the Most Rev. David Moriarty, Bishop of Kerry, about the year 1861.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxii. Martii. De S. Trieno sive Trienano Abbate de Kill-elga, p. 720.

<sup>3</sup> He is called Trenan, or Trenanus, in the Lives of St. Columba, of St. Endeus, and elsewhere.

<sup>4</sup> So he is usually called, in the Martyrologies.

<sup>5</sup> His genealogy is thus given in the "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," cap. 23. "S. Trienus, sive Trienanus, filius Dedii, filii Luctæ, filii Finnochadii, filii Fethlimidii, filii Sodani, filii Fiachi Aradii, &c."

<sup>6</sup> This may be collected, from a Catalogue of the kings of Ulster. See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxii. Martii, nn. 2, 3, 4, p. 720.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, at pp. 84, 85.

<sup>8</sup> The Irish Calendar, also, in the Royal Irish Academy, at the 22nd of March, has "Trieno mac Deit Cille Elga."

<sup>9</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. vi., sect. xi., and nn. 110, 111, pp. 302 to 304. Also, chap. vii., sect. vii., and n. 83, pp. 348, 349.

<sup>10</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta

by Colgan.<sup>9</sup> Craibhach<sup>10</sup> was in the north-eastern part of Munster, and a part of the present King's County formerly belonged to that province. Trian is supposed to have lived, about the end of the fifth, or in the beginning of the sixth, century, as he was a familiar acquaintance and friend of St. Mochteus,<sup>11</sup> who departed this life, A.D. 534.<sup>12</sup> Cill Ealga, Killelga, Cill Dealga or Cill Deilge, is said to be identical with the present Kildalkey, a parish in the barony of Lune, and county of Meath.<sup>13</sup> Colgan supposes this saint, to have been Abbot of Killelga, in the diocese of Meath; and to have been joined by ties of friendship with St. Mocteus Lugmagh.<sup>14</sup> His feast is celebrated on the 22nd of March. At this date, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>15</sup> inserts the name Treno mac Confeid. He is commemorated, likewise, by Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>16</sup> and by Cathal Maguire.<sup>17</sup> We read in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>18</sup> about St. Trian, as having a festival on this day. The Bollandists notice the celebration of Trena, or Trienius, at the 22nd of March.<sup>19</sup> His memory was revered, in Colgan's time, at a certain church, in the diocese of Dromore. The name of this church is not given, because it escaped the memory of our national hagiologist; although he acknowledges, that its name had been formerly furnished, by the parish priest of that place. However, it lay within the territory of Dalaradia, from which our saint derived his origin.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. MOLOCCA, OR MOLOCUS, SON OF COLMAN FINN, OF LILCACH. Such is the description we find, regarding this almost unknown holy personage. He is entered, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 22nd of March, under the designation, Molocca mac Colmain find i Lilchaich. A notice of his feast occurs in the Bollandists' collection.<sup>2</sup> Again, the name Molocca, son of Colman Finn, occurs in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> as having been venerated on this day. The exact locality of Lilcach, or Liolcach, has not been determined. It was near the Boyne, as we are informed; and, in all probability, not far removed from Slane, in the county of Meath.<sup>4</sup>

ARTICLE V.—FEAST OF ST. SECUNDUS. The Feilire<sup>1</sup> of St. Ængus the Culdee has a festival for St. Secundus, with a eulogy, at this date. We do Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 269.

<sup>10</sup> Archdall has placed Croibhech, or Croebheach, in Kerry. He adds even, that it was near the River Brosnach, as if this river were in Kerry. Then he mentions Trian as having been there. And, what is truly strange, he quotes Colgan for his purpose; notwithstanding that hagiologist's repeated statement, that said place was in East Munster or Ormond. See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 301.

<sup>11</sup> His feast occurs, at the 19th of August.

<sup>12</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 176, 177.

<sup>13</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. xxv., pp. 141, 142.

<sup>14</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxii. Martii. Vita S. Trieni, p. 720, and note 1.

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find, Treno seu Tpenur fil. Oeoni seu Oeñi.

<sup>16</sup> In the Martyrology of Marianus O'Gorman, at the same day, we read: "S. Trena, filius Dedii, de Kill-elga."

<sup>17</sup> Cathal Maguire's Martyrology says: "S. Trena filius Dedii."

<sup>18</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>19</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., xxii. Martii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 368.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we read, Molocur fil. Colman finn de Lilcach.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 368.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>4</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. xxvi., p. 149.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> To Professor O'Looney I not find, that the Bollandists mention him, at the 22nd of March; but, he seems to have been a foreign saint.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. DIMMA, OR DIOMMA. This name, written Dimma as an entry, occurs at the 22nd of March, in the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>1</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>2</sup> registers, likewise, on this day, Diomma. It seems doubtful, if this be not the St. Diman,<sup>3</sup> Bishop, the son of Senach,<sup>4</sup> who belonged to the race of St. Brigid.<sup>5</sup> In the Martyrology of Marianus O’Gorman, St. Dima’s feast is this day noticed, as the Bollandists state.<sup>6</sup>

ARTICLE VII.—EGRESSIO FAMILIÆ BRENDINI, OR DEPARTURE OF ST. BRENDAN, AND OF HIS MONKS, FROM IRELAND. [Sixth Century.] At this date, the Bollandists<sup>1</sup> notice a festival, which the early Irish held in veneration, because it was commemorative of an event, very celebrated in traditional history. For further particulars, however, they refer us to the Acts of St. Brendan, which were to be given on the 16th of May, the chief feast in his honour. In deference to such authorities, we prefer reserving the narrative, for that same day. We read, also, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> that a festival was observed on the 22nd of March, to commemorate the Egressio familiæ Brendini, or the Departure of St. Brendan, and of his religious family, on their celebrated Transatlantic voyage. This interesting story is told, by Colgan,<sup>3</sup> and at considerable length, on the same day.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ILLINUS. Among Irish saints, in the Franciscan copy of the Martyrology of Tallagh, is noted Illinus,<sup>1</sup> at the 22nd of March. Elsewhere, I cannot find such a name.

ARTICLE IX.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. DAGAM, A BISHOP. In Scotia, on the 22nd of March, according to Dempster,<sup>1</sup> Dagam, a bishop, was held in veneration. He, as we are told, being admonished by the Apostolic See, abandoned his error of celebrating the Pasch, after the Asiatic manner. The Bollandists, quoting Dempster, and Hector Boece, notice St. Dagamus, in Scotia, while they remark, that Ferrarius<sup>2</sup> has reproduced this am indebted for the following extract, taken from the Leabhar Breac copy, with the English translation:—

o. xi. kl. ἀπο κεφαλ Secundo Cain i mbriathraib biae balce ler ler dapoadae faillbe ainle iae.

“The high suffering of Secundus,
Gentle in words of noble import,
A powerful torch conspicuous over the rampart
Was Faillbe the beautiful of Iona.”

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we have Dima.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>3</sup> See notices of his namesake, at the 9th of this month.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan’s “Trias Thaumaturga.” Appendix Quarta ad Acta S. Brigidæ, cap. 3, p. 613.

<sup>5</sup> According to the Genealogic Sanctiloggy, chap. xiv.

<sup>6</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 368.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 369.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy egressio familiæ Brendani.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xxii. Martii. De Egressione Familiæ S. Brendani, pp. 721 to 725.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> Thus, Ulunur.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See “Menologium Scotticum,” in Bishop Forbes’ “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 195.

entry, from the authors, already cited.<sup>3</sup> Being admonished by the Holy See, he abandoned the Asiatic mode of celebrating Easter; although previously he was its strenuous supporter; and, in consequence, he refused to hold hospitable relations with Saints Laurence and Justus.<sup>4</sup> If we are to credit Dempster, he also wrote a Book, addressed to the Church of the Britons.<sup>5</sup>

ARTICLE X.—ST. DEGHTICHE, OR DEGHTIGHI, VIRGIN. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> records a Saint Deghitghi, but without further designation, at this day. We find mentioned, also, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> a saint named Deghitche, as having a festival celebrated, at the same date. The Bollandists<sup>3</sup>—alluding furthermore to Marianus O’Gorman—have St. Degithea, a Virgin, at the 22nd of March. Colgan offers a passing conjecture,<sup>4</sup> that the present holy woman may be identical with a St. Geghia, of Inis Geghe, who is mentioned, in the Irish Life of St. Farannan.<sup>5</sup>

ARTICLE XI.—THE BLESSED BRIANUS, KING AND MARTYR. [Tenth and Eleventh Centuries.] At the 22nd of March, in the anonymous list of Irish saints published by O’Sullivan Beare,<sup>1</sup> we find St. Brianus entered. On the authority of Marianus, in the Catalogue of Henry Fitzsimon, at the same date, he is called Brianus Rex.<sup>2</sup> This king is also called Barnabas, by Father Stephen White,<sup>3</sup> and Marianus Scotus gives an account of his martyrdom, A.D. 1014. Hence, it is easy to infer, that the illustrious and pious monarch of Ireland, Bryan Boroimhe is meant; but, we reserve for the 23rd of April, the narrative of his glorious life, which was so greatly useful to his country, and to the Church of God.

ARTICLE XII.—ST. IBAR, OR IBARUS, BISHOP AND CONFESSOR. Among the Scottish entries, in the Kalendar of David Camerarius,<sup>1</sup> at the 22nd of March, we meet with St. Ibar, or Ibarus, Bishop and Confessor. He is said to have baptised St. Filan, the Abbot, whose festival has been assigned to the 9th of January. By Colgan, it is supposed possible, the present Ibar may be the saint commemorated by Marianus O’Gorman, at the 13th of August. The Life of St. Filan, and the Breviary of Aberdeen, are cited by Camerarius, for proof of Ibar’s sanctity. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> observe, with the foregoing statements, that he may be the Ibarus, or Iborus, mentioned in the Life of St. Brigid, and whose festival is usually placed, at the 23rd of April.

<sup>1</sup> In “Catalogus Generalis.”

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 368.

<sup>3</sup> See Venerable Bede’s “Historiæ Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum,” lib. ii., cap. iv.

<sup>4</sup> See “Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scottorum,” tomus i., lib. vi., p. 209.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find, Δεγίττεια ὑπὸ γο.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 368.

<sup>4</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xv.

Februarii, n. 37, p. 340.

<sup>5</sup> See his Life, at the 15th of February.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists notice this entry, in the “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 368.

<sup>2</sup> See “Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium,” tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 53.

<sup>3</sup> This writer says his death occurred “8 cal. Maii in parasceve paschæ 6 feria.” See

“Apologia pro Hibernia,” cap. iii., p. 23. ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes’ “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 236.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 369.

Twenty-third Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MAIDOC, OR MOMHAEDOG, ABBOT OF FIDDOWN, COUNTY OF KILKENNY.

[SIXTH CENTURY.]

AT the 23rd day of March, Colgan<sup>1</sup> gives a very confused and doubtful account of this saint.<sup>2</sup> However, it being the only accessible material we find, for the life of St. Maidoc, it may be remarked, that his Acts—which were formerly known to be extant—have either been completely lost, or not yet published. However, as Colgan observes, although the memory of this Maidoc, Abbot of Fiddown, had been celebrated, in all our native Festilogies and Histories; still, little now remains on record, except some account of his race and country, the time at which he flourished, and different conjectured feasts, instituted in his honour. To his name is sometimes prefixed the particle, mo; and, he is called Momoedoc, by some of our Martyrologists.<sup>3</sup> He is noticed, with doubts expressed, however, by the Bollandists;<sup>4</sup> but, he seems to be a different person, from St. Domnoc, Dominicus, or Modomnoc, Patron of Tibberaghny, and of Fiddown, venerated on the 13th of February.<sup>5</sup> We are told,<sup>6</sup> that the present saint was son to Midna, son to Metus,<sup>7</sup> son of Nenned, son to Nazar, son of Coimthann the Small, son to Eochod, son of Ænguss, son to Crimthann, son to Cathair Mor, or the Great, King of Ireland.<sup>8</sup> This last-named prince, after having been three years as king over Ireland, was slain by Conn, and the Luaighni, of Teamhair, in the battle of Magh h-Agha, about the year of Christ, 122.<sup>9</sup>

The Calendar of Cashel<sup>10</sup> states, that our saint had been surnamed Mionn Gaoidhel, signifying, “pledge of the Irish,” that he had been Abbot of Feadh-dun, in Ossory, and that he was son of Saint Radegundis, Queen. But, Colgan remarks, that this cannot be understood, as referring to Maidoc’s corporal procreation; since no queen and saint, bearing this name, can be discovered, except St. Radegundis, daughter to Berchar, King of the Thuringians, and who, in her youth, had been espoused to Clothaire, King of the Franks. Afterwards, she became a religious, with the consent of her husband, who at first had refused it.<sup>11</sup> Wherefore, our saint, being called the son of Radegundis, seems to imply, not that he was her son, according to the flesh, but in a spiritual sense, after the meaning of Fortunatus, who ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xxiii. Martii. Vita S. Maidoci, p. 727.

<sup>2</sup> See Dr. Lanigan’s “Ecclesiastical History of Ireland,” vol. ii., chap. xiv., sect. x., n. 133, p. 340.

<sup>3</sup> St. Ængus the Culdee, the Martyrology of Tallagh, the Sanctilogium Genealogicum, and the Martyrology of Donegal, are among the number.

<sup>4</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, pp. 440, 441.

<sup>5</sup> See his Life, already written, for that day.

<sup>6</sup> In the “Sanctilogium Genealogicum.”

<sup>7</sup> Metus was the brother to St. Columba,

VOL. III.—No. 15.

Abbot of Tirdaglas, whose feast is kept, on the 13th of December. This St. Columba was consequently a grand uncle of St. Maidoc. See, Colgan’s “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xxiii. Martii. Vita S. Maidoci, p. 727.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan’s “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xxiii. Martii, n. 2, p. 727.

<sup>9</sup> See Dr. O’Donovan’s “Annals of the Four Masters,” vol. i., pp. 102, 103, and note (k.)

<sup>10</sup> At the 13th of August.

<sup>11</sup> The Acts of this queen, written down by Fortunatus and Bandommia, as a religious, are published by Surius, in his work, “De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis,” vol. iv., at August 13th.

wrote her Acts, and who also calls her his mother. Besides the surname, Mionn Gaoidhel, which he bore, Maidoc was also called Mionn-Albain, which signifies, "the sacred pledge of the Albanian Scots."<sup>12</sup> From these foregoing circumstances, Colgan infers, that he spent some time in Scotland, where he was greatly honoured, as in his native country;<sup>13</sup> and, that he must also have lived in Gaul, perhaps as a guest of St. Radegundis, the queen.<sup>14</sup>

Whether or not our saint had been the first founder of a monastery, at Fiddown, we have no means of discovering, at present. This place, anciently called Fidh-duin, or Feadh-duin, and which means, "wood of the Fort," is situated in Iverk barony, county of Kilkenny.<sup>15</sup> Without the least authority for his statement, except perhaps, the account given by Colgan, Archdall tells us, that his reputed mother Radegundis died in 590, our saint being Abbot of Fiddown, in the same year.<sup>16</sup> Besides the usual relation of our saint having been abbot over this monastery, Marianus O'Gorman, and the Martyrology of Donegal, style him Bishop of Fedh-duin, in Ossory, when recording his festival, at the 18th of May.<sup>17</sup> Again, our saint's festival is placed at this day, by St. Ængus, and by the Martyrology of Tamlacht,<sup>18</sup> by the Calendar of Cashel, and by Cathald Maguire. This appears to have been his principal feast.

Yet, there were three other days dedicated to his memory, according to our Irish Martyrologists or Hagiologists. St. Ængus the Culdee,<sup>19</sup> the Tallagh Martyrology,<sup>20</sup> the Calendar of Cashel, Cathald Maguire, the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Donegal,<sup>21</sup> as edited by Rev.

<sup>12</sup> After commenting on this double surname, which he shows to have been applied to our saint, by the Martyrologists, Colgan adds: "Ubi adverte dictionem Hibernicam Mionn, significare rem sacram, sacramentum, juramentum, vel pignus sacram; et aliquando per translationem rem in magno pretio, vel veneratione habitam."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii, nn. 5, 6, p. 727.

<sup>13</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendar of Scottish Saints," p. 7. There we read: In Hibernia, the Holy Confessor Momedoc and the Holy Daughter Virgin Feradig, on this day went to Heaven, states the Kalendar of Drummond. Also, allusion is made to him, at p. 411.

<sup>14</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii. Vita S. Maidoci, p. 727.

<sup>15</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (u), p. 443.

<sup>16</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 351.

<sup>17</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii, p. 727. In the Irish Calendar, at the xv. of the Kalends of June, (May 18th), I find, "ΜΑΙΗΔΟΔΩΓ ΕΑΥΡ ΦΕΔΩΑ ΔΥΙΝ Μ ΟΡΡΑΓΙΝ." See Ordnance Survey Office Copy Common Place Book F., p. 47, now in the Royal Irish Academy. In a marginal note, ΦΕΔΩΑ ΔΥΙΝ is translated into English, by Mr. O'Donovan, as meaning, "Fidown, Kilkenny."

<sup>18</sup> In the Rev. Dr. Kelly's Edition of the Tallagh Martyrology, we find the festival of "Momedoc Feda Duin," at the 18th of

May, or xv. of the Kalends of June. See "Calendar of Irish Saints," &c., p. xxiv.

<sup>19</sup> In the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, "Leabhar Breac" copy, occurs the following stanza, kindly transcribed, and translated into English, by Professor O'Looney:—

e. x. kl. ingen co fluas deimmar fepadag is apdoin
 O Chruir ar fet orpoin momoedoc mino alban.

"Daughter with a mighty host
 Of Feradach who was exalted,
 From Christ whose dignity is known,
 Momoedoc, the diadem of Alba."

To the word diadem is attached the following foot-note: "(a). Mind here means a saint or ecclesiastic, whose dignity was established and duly recognised, and whose minda, or relics, were held in veneration, and regarded as inviolable. Thus he was a diadem, and his feast was celebrated with honour."

<sup>20</sup> In the Rev. Dr. Kelly's edition of the Tallagh Martyrology, we find the festival of "Momedoc Fedha Duin, i. Midhui mac Midgnai" entered, at the 23rd of March, or x. of the Kalends of April. See, "Calendar of Irish Saints," &c., p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we read: MOMAIOOCUR OE FEODH-DUIN

<sup>21</sup> Here he is simply called Momhaedóg; but, in a note, Dr. Todd says, "Colgan seems to have had a different copy of this

Drs. Todd and Reeves,<sup>22</sup> assign his feast to the 23rd of March.<sup>23</sup> The Calendar of Cashel, when placing his festival at the 10th of April,<sup>24</sup> calls our saint, Mumonius, which would seem to indicate, that he dwelt in Munster, although his family undoubtedly belonged to Leinster.<sup>25</sup> Another day, dedicated to the memory of our saint, is said to have been the 13th of August, when, according to those authorities already quoted, his name had been venerated.<sup>26</sup> At this day, also, Marianus calls him son of St. Radegundis the queen, whose Natalis is celebrated on the 13th of August.<sup>27</sup> It is not possible, however,—if all these festivals were intended to honour him,—to decide, on which of the above-mentioned days our saint died ; for his Acts, which might probably throw some light on this subject, are not now known to be extant.

ARTICLE II.—ST. TRIANUS, A ROMAN BISHOP. [Fifth Century.] Constructing some Acts, from passages in the old Lives of St. Patrick, Colgan notices this saint, at the 23rd of March.<sup>1</sup> It appears, therefrom, that he was a Roman bishop, who arrived in Ireland, at an early period of our Christian history. He is said to have been a disciple of St. Patrick, and he flourished, consequently, about the middle of the fifth century. At a place, called Croebheach,<sup>2</sup> near the River Brosna, he presided over a community of monks ; and, afterwards, he seems to have been created a bishop, having jurisdiction over an adjoining extent of country. He was remarkable for his distinguished virtues. The name of Trian, without any other distinguishing epithet, occurs in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>3</sup> at the 23rd of March. The year for his death has not been ascertained. A conjecture has been hinted, by the Rev. Dr. Lanigan, that the present holy man may not have been different from St. Trena, of Kill-Elga, in Meath, and who flourished, early in the sixth century.<sup>4</sup> Colgan<sup>5</sup> sets the present holy man down, as one of St. Patrick's disciples. The Bollandists have merely a brief entry of his name, at this day.<sup>6</sup> work, for he tells us (Actt. SS., p. 727,<sup>n</sup> 7), that the 'Mart. Dungallen' has the following notice of this saint on 23 Mart., 'Momoedocus, de Fedh-duin, i.e., Mida, filius Midgnæ.' These words, however, occur in the Mart. Taml., and it is possible, that Colgan may have attributed them to the Mart. Dung. by mistake. It is evident, that the compilers of the present work did not (with Colgan) identify Momhaedóg with the saints of the same name, who are commemorated April 11, May 18, and August 13."

<sup>22</sup> At pp. 84, 85.

<sup>23</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii, n. 7, p. 727.

<sup>24</sup> Such is Colgan's statement, but I rather suspect, the Calendarium Casselense must have meant, the x. of the Kalends of April, which should correspond with the 23rd of March. With such account, he also says, the Martyrology of Donegal coincides.

<sup>25</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii, n. 8, p. 727.

<sup>26</sup> In the Rev. Dr. Kelly's edition of the Martyrology of Tallagh, the feast of "Momedoc Fedu duin" occurs, at the Ides, or 13th day of August. See, "Calendar of Irish Saints," &c., p. xxxii.

<sup>27</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii, n. 10, p. 727. See her Life, at this day, in Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Saints," vol. viii.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii. Vita S. Triani, pp. 725, 726.

<sup>2</sup> One Daluan of Croebheach is spoken of, as a disciple of St. Patrick. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. xii., p. 131. However, although the Tripartite Life is silent on the subject, Colgan makes St. Patrick erect a church for Daluan. See ibid. Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiv., p. 271. Afterwards, Archdall transferred that supposed church into an abbey, founded by St. Patrick, in his "Monasticon Hibernicum."

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find Τριανου.

<sup>4</sup> See notices of him, at the 22nd of March.

<sup>5</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 265.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii.,

ARTICLE III.—ST. TRENAN, OF KILL-DAELEN, MONK. [Supposed to belong to the Sixth Century.] Jealous of its honours, ambitious for its dignity, proud of his profession, and always anxious for the improvement of its moral tone, our saints felt equally gratified, discharging humble duties, when members of religious bodies, as when elevated to a position of dignity or power, in any monastic institute. Some notices of this holy man are contained in Colgan's work;<sup>1</sup> however, the Bollandists<sup>2</sup>—regarding them as somewhat doubtful—seem to think, he may not be a different person from the St. Trien, or Trienan, Abbot of Killelga, and son to Dedius, venerated on the preceding day. However this may be, in Rev. Dr. Kelly's "Calendar of Irish Saints,"<sup>3</sup> the present holy man is noted, at the 23rd of March, as S. Treno Cilli Daelen.<sup>4</sup> St. Trenan or Trena<sup>5</sup> is said to have sprung from the race of Mocu-ruintir,<sup>6</sup> and to have lived as a monk, under St. Columkille's rule, and under that of his successor, St. Baithen,<sup>7</sup> in the Island of Hy.<sup>8</sup> Hence, he must have flourished, after the middle of the sixth century.<sup>9</sup> In St. Columba's Acts, as written by Adamnan, our saint is said to have been sent on a mission to Ireland, by his abbot. When preparing to sail from Iona, he complained to St. Columkille, that he needed a sailor, to bear him company. Hereupon, Columba said, "I cannot find the sailor you desire, but go in peace, you will arrive in Ireland, with prosperous and favouring gales; and, you shall see a man, coming towards you from afar, who will direct the prow of your bark, towards Scotia."<sup>10</sup> He shall be the companion of your journey, for some days in Ireland; and, returning with you, he shall come to us—he will be a man approved by God, and he shall spend the remaining part of his time with us in good conversation." When Trenan and his sailors approached the port, having received St. Columkille's blessing, they recognised that man, promised to them by their abbot.<sup>11</sup> Our saint was also cured of a dropsy, by St. Baithen, who strictly enjoined it on him, as an obligation, to keep this miracle concealed, so long as Baithen lived. Little more is known regarding our saint, but that his memory had been revered, in Kill-daelen church, on the 23rd of March, according to our Martyrologies. We find a Kildallan, enumerated among those hospitals in the county of Cavan, which were endowed with Termonlands.<sup>12</sup> Whether this place was identical with Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii. Vita S. Trenani, p. 726.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

<sup>3</sup> See his "Martyrology of Tallagh," p. xix.

<sup>4</sup> In the Franciscan copy, he is thus entered, Ṭṛeno ṛeu Ṭṛenmṛ ṁe Cill ṁa Olen.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," lib. i., cap. 18, p. 74. There Adamnan calls this saint Trena-nus.

<sup>6</sup> In Irish, māc-ti-runtir. The three Magi, who opposed St. Patrick, are said to have been Generis Runtir, according to Tirechan's account in Liber Ardmachanus, fol. 10 aa. The Dal-Ruinnitir occupied Cluaoin-Chaoin, now Clonkeen, in the western part of Louth County. See ibid., note (c).

<sup>7</sup> A Trenanus is mentioned, in the Bollandists' Acts of St. Baithenus. See, "Acta Sanctorum," tomus ii., Junii ix., p. 237.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., p. 492.

<sup>9</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii. Vita S. Trenani, p. 726.

<sup>10</sup> In Rev. Dr. Reeves' version of Adamnan, the epithets, Hibernia and Scotia are found indiscriminately used, in giving this narrative.

<sup>11</sup> In the narrative we read: "appropinquanti ad portum naviculæ Laisranus Mocu-moie citior ceteris occurrit tenetque proram." This individual is styled Hortulanus, in the title of the chapter. We are told this tribe-name is also applied, to a Saint Fintan, previously mentioned. See Rev. Dr. Reeves' Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," pp. 47-48, note (e).

<sup>12</sup> In the Addenda to Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 784, there is a notice of Kildallan, with "two cartrons of land, the present church of Kill-daelen, we have no means for ascertaining with accuracy. All traces of the ancient church there have long since disappeared, and only a large ash tree remains, so as almost entirely to overshadow this old and sequestered cemetery.<sup>13</sup> The year of his death is not known; yet, it is probable, he survived until the beginning of the seventh century. That this saint was a distinct person from St. Trien, Abbot of Kill-Elga,<sup>14</sup> is manifest, because of the different periods at which they flourished,<sup>15</sup> the different places in which they were venerated,<sup>16</sup> and the different families from whom they respectively descended.<sup>17</sup>

Kildallan Graveyard, County Cavan.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. DARERCA, A VIRGIN. We find, written in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> that Darerca, a Virgin, had veneration paid her, at the 23rd of March. However, we consider this to have been an entry by mistake, for Darerca, a Widow, and which rather refers to the previous day, as we have already seen. Yet, the supposition of Colgan may be adopted, that the present holy woman is possibly identical, with a St. Derfroechia, or Darerchia,<sup>2</sup> the daughter of Echu, or Eochod, King of Orgiall. If so, she was sister to St. Kinnia, or Cinnia,<sup>3</sup> who lived in the time of St. Patrick.<sup>4</sup> annual value 28s.,” under the Inquisition, taken the 9th September, 1590.

<sup>13</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman, and engraved by Mrs. Millard, was sketched by the writer, from the interior of the graveyard.

<sup>14</sup> See his Life, at the 22nd of March.

<sup>15</sup> St. Trenan of Kill-daelen lived after, or towards, the close of the sixth century. St. Trien of Kill-Elga flourished, about the close of the fifth and the beginning of the sixth century.

<sup>16</sup> The one at Kill-Daelen, the other at Kill-Elga.

<sup>17</sup> St. Trenan of Kill-Daelen descended, “de gente Mocu-ruinter.” St. Trien, Abbot of Kill-Elga, belonged to the Dal-Aradian family.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find Дарерка ииго.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” xxi. Martii. Acta S. Endæi. Appendix, cap. iv., p. 713.

<sup>3</sup> See her Life, at the 1st of February.

ARTICLE V.—THE DAUGHTER OR DAUGHTERS OF FERADHACH. In the “Feilire” of St. Ængus, the daughter of Feradach is commemorated, on the 23rd of March; while, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> registers Inghena Feradaigh, or “the daughters of Feradach.” One of these most probably was St. Kentigerna, whose Acts have already appeared, at the 7th of January. A festival, in honour of the Daughter of Feradhach, was celebrated on this day, as we read from the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>2</sup> The Filiae Feradachi are noticed, merely, at this date, by the Bollandists.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE VI.—ST. LASSAIR, OR LASSAR, DAUGHTER OF FINTAIN. An entry appears, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 23rd of March, regarding St. Lassair, daughter of Fintain. On this day is registered, likewise, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> Lassar, daughter of Fionntan. The Bollandists notice Lassara filia Fintani.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE VII.—ST. MOCHOLLA, VIRGIN. This day, the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> as also the Bollandists,<sup>2</sup> have on record a festival, in honour of St. Mocholla, Virgin.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. MAINCHAIN, OR MANCHEN. A saint, bearing the name of Mainchein, is entered on this day, in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists notice him as Manchenus.<sup>2</sup>

ARTICLE IX.—ST. FERGUSA, OR FERGASS. The Martyrology of Tallagh records, at the 23rd of March, a saint called Fergus; <sup>1</sup> or, as in the Franciscan copy, Fergusius.<sup>2</sup> Under this latter name, his record is contained in the Bollandists’ work.<sup>3</sup> On this day, likewise, we find mentioned, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> Fergass, as having veneration paid him. Under the head of Daimhlaig, or Duleek, Duaid Mac Firbis enters, Fergus, Bishop of Daimhlaig, quievit 772.<sup>5</sup> The Annals of the Four Masters,<sup>6</sup> however, place his demise at A.D. 778, and those of Ulster at A.D. 782, but Dr. O’Donovan states A.D. 783 to be the correct year for such an entry. We cannot be sure, however, that he was the holy man, noticed in our Calendars, at this day.

ARTICLE X.—ST. CAIRLAIN, OR CAIRLANUS. Veneration was given to

<sup>4</sup> See his Life, at the 17th of March.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. Also, the Franciscan copy, at this date, has filiae feradachi.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Lappara filia fintani.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii.,

Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> As edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix.

<sup>2</sup> Here we read ferguriur.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>5</sup> See “Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy,” Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 104, 105.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O’Donovan’s edition, vol. i., pp. 382 to 385, and n. (s). Ibid.

Cairlain, at the 23rd of March, as we find recorded, in the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>1</sup> We meet with the entry of Cairlanus, on the same day, in the Bollandists' work,<sup>2</sup> yet nothing further is given to distinguish him.

ARTICLE XI.—ST. FAILBE, OR FAILBEUS. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> records a festival, in honour of Failbe, at the 23rd of March. In the Bollandists' work, at the same date, we find the simple entry of Failbeus repeated.<sup>2</sup>

ARTICLE XII.—ST. CIANNAT, VIRGIN. We read, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> that Ciannat, a Virgin, had veneration paid her, on this day.

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. BAETAN, OR BOETAN, OF KILL-BOEDAIN, OR SHILVODAN, COUNTY OF ANTRIM. [Sixth Century.] Some notices of this holy man are to be found, in Colgan's work,<sup>1</sup> at the 23rd of March. He is said to have flourished, after the beginning of the sixth century, in the province of Munster. The O'Clerys consider, that he may have been the Baetan, brother to Corbmac<sup>2</sup> and Eimhin,<sup>3</sup> who belonged to the race of Eoghanmor, who was son to Oilíoll Olum. Again, he is thought to have been one of six holy brothers,<sup>4</sup> noticed by our Calendarists. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>5</sup> at the 23rd of March, his record appears simply, as Boetan, a Monk. Hence, we should be inclined to infer, that he did not obtain any exalted position, in the Irish Church. According to the Life of his reputed brother Cormac,<sup>6</sup> Baetan is said to have built a church, which was called Kill-Beodain, in the first instance, and afterwards it was known as Kill-Oscoba, when he went into those northern parts, where he was hospitably received and entertained, by the noble family of Sodan. They bestowed land and possessions, as an endowment; and, the distinguished races of Cinell-Decill, Clann Scoba, and Sil-noi-ridhin, regarded this saint, as their special and favourite patron. However, in course of time, the Cinell-Decill adopted as their patrons, St. Cuan and St. Colman, to whom their prayers and devotions were most directed. The two other families of Clann Scoba and Sil-noi-ridhin continued faithful to their patron, St. Baetan, until the descendants of Tomultac attacking them, not only deprived them of local influence, but even invaded their holy ground and sanctuary, at Kil-beodain. To this church, they gave in future, as its title, Kill-Oscoba. This place was subsequently written, the church of Schilowodan, Sillwoodan, Silwooden, and Silvodan. The locality is now known, as the Grange of Shilvodan.<sup>7</sup> It is also a parish, situated to the north of Lough Neagh.<sup>8</sup> There are no remains

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we have Cairlanus.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy Failbeus is noted.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii. Vita S. Boedani, p. 728.

<sup>2</sup> His Life will be found, at the 13th of December.

<sup>3</sup> His Acts occur, at the 22nd of December.

<sup>4</sup> Their names are, Becanus, Culanus, Eminus, or Evinus, Diermitius, Corbmacus, Boedanus, or Baitanus.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by the Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we read Baitanus monaighe.

<sup>6</sup> His Acts are to be found, in Colgan, at the 26th of March. In the present work, his Life will be found, at the 13th of December.

<sup>7</sup> It lies, in the barony of Upper Toome, and it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheets 43, 44.

of a graveyard, in Shilvodan ; but, it is supposed a burial-ground formerly existed, in Tavnaghmore townland.<sup>9</sup> The Bollandists notice, at the 23rd of March, the festival of Baithenus Monaighe, with an allusion to his commemoration, in the Martyrologies of Tallagh and of Marianus O'Gorman.<sup>10</sup> According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>11</sup> veneration was given, on this day, to Baetan of Monu. It is thought, by Colgan, that this place must be identical with Moinmore, which was situated, in the southern part of Munster.<sup>12</sup> Our saint seems to be quite a distinct person, from the St. Buadhmael, already alluded to, in the notices of St. Buatan, or St. Batan, of Methuis Truim, or Eathais Cruimm, at the 24th of January.

ARTICLE XIV.—ST. FINGAR, OR GUIGNER, AND ST. PIALA, VIRGIN, WITH THEIR COMPANIONS, MARTYRS, IN BRITAIN. [Fifth Century.] With a previous commentary, and at some length, following the account of a writer, named Anselm,<sup>1</sup> the Bollandists have published the Acts of St. Fingar, or Guigner, and of St. Piala, Virgin, with their Companions, Martyrs, at this day.<sup>2</sup> Already, at the 23rd day of February, we have written their Acts. A conjecture has been offered,<sup>3</sup> that the Coroticus, denounced by St. Patrick, for his persecution of his Irish converts, was no other, than the Theoderic, or Theodorus, King of Cornubia, said to have been the tyrant, who condemned the present martyrs to death. It is thought, by the Bollandists, that the name Fingar, by which the chief of those martyrs was best known, in Ireland, has its equivalent as Guinger, in the old British dialect.<sup>4</sup> It has been supposed, likewise, that Piala may have been the Cornish name for the Irish Calla, or Kiara.

Twenty-fourth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. DOMANGARD, OR DONARD, PATRON OF RATH-MURB. HOLG, OR MAGHERA, COUNTY OF DOWN.

[FIFTH AND SIXTH CENTURIES.]

UNDER the year of the world 2533, the Annals of the Four Masters state, that Slainge, son of Partholan, died, and that he was interred in the cairn of Sliabh-Slanga. This old monument still forms a very conspicuous object, on the summit of Slieve Donard ; and, hence, its more ancient name was Sliabh-Slanga, or the Mountain of Slainge. This was within the territorial division of Dalaradia, and in the south-eastern part of the present

<sup>8</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dro-more." Appendix DD, pp. 302, 303. And Appendix LL, p. 377.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid., p. 303.

<sup>10</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 440.

<sup>11</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>12</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiii. Martii. De S. Boedano Abbate Kill-Boedain, n. 2, p. 723.

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> Ex MS. Parisiensis S. Victoris.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiii. De S. Fingare sive Guignerio S. Piala Virgine et Sociis Martyribus in Britannia, pp. 455 to 457.

<sup>3</sup> In a letter, from Rev. J. Adams to the writer, and dated Stockcross Vicarage, Newbury, September 26th, 1876.

<sup>4</sup> Thus Fin means white, in Irish, while Guin, or Win, has the same meaning, in the British language.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> Pronounced Donard, or county of Down. But, the hero Slainge is almost forgotten, in the traditions of this neighbourhood. Long ages afterwards, the holy man, St. Domangart, or Domhanghort,<sup>1</sup> otherwise called Domangard,—Anglicised Donard,<sup>2</sup>—Dovengardus, or Dominicus,<sup>3</sup> had selected this, the highest of the granitic Mourne Mountains, for a penitential hermitage. It is now universally called Slieve Donard,<sup>4</sup> assuming thus the name of its ascetic local patron. We find, at the 24th of March, in Colgan,<sup>5</sup> some notices of St. Domangard, the Bishop; while, we are informed, his Acts and an Office Proper to him were then extant. The Bollandists have some brief Acts of this saint,<sup>6</sup> contained in five paragraphs; however, these add little to our knowledge of his life or actions, which are obscure. He is called the son of Eochaidh, or Eochaidh,<sup>7</sup> a wicked tyrant, who ruled in Ultonia,<sup>8</sup> and who incurred the displeasure of St. Patrick; because, he had two maidens drowned, who embraced a religious life. The pedigree of Eochaidh is thus given, in the Genealogies of our ancient saints: <sup>9</sup> he was the son of Muredach,<sup>10</sup> son to Forga, son of Dallan, son to Dubtach, son of Miendog, son to Luhad, son of Ængus Finn, son to Fergus Dubbed, son of Imchad, son to Fiennchad, son of Ogoman, and whose father was Fiatach Finn, Monarch of Erin, and who sprung from the seed of Heremon. But, the holy woman Derinill,<sup>11</sup> or Derinilla, surnamed of the four breasts,<sup>12</sup> was his mother; and, as we are told, although a pagan, she cast herself at St. Patrick's feet. Then, having been baptized by him, the Irish Apostle blessed the child, at that time, borne in her womb.<sup>13</sup>

Downart. Sometimes he is called, by the people of Mourne, St. Donnaght. See "Legend Lays of Ireland," by Lageniensis. No. xx. A Legend of Slieve Donard, n. 1, p. 122.

<sup>2</sup> The letters m and g are silent, according to the Irish rules for pronouncing his name, as it is usually found spelled.

<sup>3</sup> Alluding to the monastery of Maghera, Giraldus Cambrensis names Slainge as "Salanus," and Donard as "Dominicus." Thus, he alludes to that exceeding high mountain, which overhangs the sea, that flows between Ireland and Britain, and which is called Salanga. And because at the foot of it, after the lapse of many ages, as he states, St. Dominicus had erected a distinguished monastery, it more commonly bears the name of Dominicus' mountain. See "Topographiæ Hibernicæ," Dist. iii., cap. ii., p. 141, in Giraldi, "Opera," Edited by James F. Dimock, M.A., vol. v.

<sup>4</sup> In the Poem, "Diarmid's Chase," Miss Stewart thus distinctively alludes to it:—

"The evening sun, with golden gleam
Upon the mountain shed its beam,
And yet did play with softening glow,
Upon the bright waves' rippling flow;
Slieve Donard's towering majesty
Presided over rock and tree."

—"Mirror of the Heart," or Lays of Loyalty, Patriotism, Chivalry and Devotion, p. 40. Dublin, 1861, 4to sm.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxiv. De S. Domangardo Episcopo, pp. 742 to 744, with notes.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiv. De Sancto Domangarto Episcopo in Hibernia, pp. 483, 484.

<sup>7</sup> In the table, added to the Martyrology of Donegal, we find the following comment within brackets. It is thus rendered from the Irish into English: "[Domangart, son of Eochaidh, M. Gen.: Domangort, the Pilgrim, son of Saran. M. Gen.]" And in a note, added by Dr. Todd, at this passage, we read: "This is a reference to the Martyrologium Genealogicum, where the genealogy of Domhangort, son of Eochaidh, is given up to Fergus Dubhdach, Book of Lecan, fol. 39, a.e. But the other Domhangort, here called the Pilgrim, does not appear to be there mentioned." See, ibid., pp. 404, 405.

<sup>8</sup> It is said, for twenty-four years. By some writers, his death is placed at A.D. 503; but, Colgan thinks he departed many years before, and during the lifetime of St. Patrick.

<sup>9</sup> Chapter xix.

<sup>10</sup> He is said to have died, in the time of Oilioll Molt, King of Ireland, who reigned twenty years, and who lived to 478, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," pp. 148 to 151.

<sup>11</sup> Some call her Derinilla Cethuir-Chicheach, which may be rendered, "of the four provinces." See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," Appendix S., p. 236.

<sup>12</sup> This, we are told, was owing to no unnatural deformity; but, because, she suckled four different progenies, the children of her

Domangard was born, towards the close of the fifth century,<sup>14</sup> as we may infer from such accounts;<sup>15</sup> and, he was afterwards called Domangart, according to the more correct rendering in Irish, although more commonly pronounced by the vulgar Domhangard.<sup>16</sup> A name given to him, likewise, is that of Donagh, or Donat, and it is popularly thought, that by his application, much money was collected, for building the Cathedral of Down, which is supposed to be the first one erected there, in the fifth century.<sup>17</sup> It does not appear, that when a child, he had ever seen St. Patrick; however, Jocelyn mentions this St. Dovengardus,<sup>18</sup> as a disciple of the great Irish Apostle.<sup>19</sup>

Slieve Donard towers over the range of lofty mountains which stretch away from its sides. It involuntarily forces on the imagination a feeling of total severance from mankind, and it forcibly recalls to our minds, how the saints valued heaven, and what price they were prepared to pay for it. Little more can be said, but that it afforded a rugged welcome to the austere patron, who had selected it for his lonely dwelling. A tradition in this neighbourhood highly celebrates the virtues, devotion, and miracles of St. Donard.<sup>20</sup> It would seem, that he desired seclusion from the world, and, therefore, he sought a place removed from all society with worldlings. This holy retreat of St. Donard was perched on the very high mountain, which still perpetuates his name.<sup>21</sup> Here, it is thought, by the people, that their patron appears to celebrate Mass every Sunday. The church or hermitage was situated, on the highest top of that same mountain, far away from every human dwelling.<sup>22</sup> It is about nine miles S.W. from Downpatrick; and, the appearance of these upper regions has been well described, by Dr. O'Donovan, who ascended to the spot, in the year 1834.<sup>23</sup> The ruins of that hermitage on Slieve Donard, four successive husbands. Among her holy sons are enumerated: St. Mura, Abbot of Fahan, who is venerated, at the 12th of March; St. Cillen of Achadh-cail, in the territory of Leith-Cathuil; St. Machumma, or Dochumma, either of Inis Mahee, venerated on the 31st of January, or of Druimbo; St. Ailleán, or Aillaloc, venerated, perhaps, at the 24th of July; and St. Aidan, whose festival is not so easily determined. Some conjecture seems to be offered, that St. Domangart, and St. Mochumma were sons, by the same father. See "Opuscula," attributed to St. Ængus the Culdee, lib. iv., cap. vii. Also Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xii. Martii, nn. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, p. 587.

<sup>13</sup> The Bollandists comment on some anachronisms of statement, as found in the attributed relationships.

<sup>14</sup> See the Life of St. Patrick, chap. xxi., where such an account is given, in more detail.

<sup>15</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiv. Martii. Vita S. Domangardi, pp. 742 to 744.

<sup>16</sup> On this saint, and his localities in Down, the reader will find exhaustive and correct information, in Rev. James O'Lavery's "Historical Account of the Diocese of Down and Connor, Ancient and Modern," vol. i. Preface, pp. ix., xxix., and, also pp. 25, 46, 48 to 52.

<sup>17</sup> See Harris' "Ancient and Present

State of the County of Down," chap. v., p. 121.

<sup>18</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Vita Sexta S. Patricii, cap. cxxix., cxxx., and n. 131, p. 114. Ibid.

<sup>19</sup> See ibid. Appendix Quinta ad Acta S. Patricii, p. 266.

<sup>20</sup> See Walter Harris' "Ancient and Present State of the County of Down," chap. v., p. 121.

<sup>21</sup> Father MacCana, in his "Irish Itinerary," says:—"But I cannot forbear to observe how our saints, scorning the earth about which the miserable race of man so vehemently contends, sought a loftier range; for it is a fact for which I can vouch that, on the summit of that lofty pile, and in a different region of the world, as it were, they sought an abode of holy retirement, of which heavenly seclusion the traces still remain; for in that elevated region of the sky there exists a hermitage sacred to St. Domangart."

<sup>22</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," pp. 27, 28, and Appendix A, pp. 154, 155. Also, Calendar LL, p. 377.

<sup>23</sup> This visit he has described, in a letter dated at Castlewellan, April 23rd, 1834, when engaged on the Irish Ordnance Survey. The account will be found, in n. 1, to the legend of Slieve Donard, in "Legend Lays of Ireland," pp. 121 to 126.

<sup>24</sup> In "The Irish Educational Journal and may still be seen, covering a deep and once sacred well. It is supposed to have had an internal communication, reaching into the Irish Sea, at Dónagh's Cave, southwards of Newcastle.<sup>24</sup> On the very summit of Slieve Donard were two remarkable objects, in 1744.<sup>25</sup> These lay on the north-east side. One wrecked edifice was composed of rude walls, and partitions, called chapels.<sup>26</sup> Perhaps this was the oratory and cell, erected by St. Domangard, according to Harris' conjecture. Another was a heap of stones, piled up in a pyramidal figure. In this were several cavities, wherein devotees sheltered themselves in bad weather, while they heard Mass;<sup>27</sup> and, in the centre of this heap, there was a cave, formed by broad, flat stones, so disposed as to support each other, without the help of cement. We are told, by Colgan, that during the severe and terrible persecution of the heretics, this mountain hermitage of St. Domangard used to be frequented, by a great concourse of people; while frequent pilgrimages, in honour of that wonder-working servant of God, were made by the Catholics of those northern parts. Here, two churches were consecrated to him, according to Father Colgan; one of these was at the base of a very high mountain, overhanging the sea, in the eastern parts, which was called Rath-murlbulg, or Rath-murrow, now Machaire-Ratha, or Maghera<sup>28</sup> However, Murlough on the coast of the County Antrim, has been confounded with Murlough, on Dundrum Bay, by some of our Calendarists, who thought his place was in the territory of Dalriada, which lies in the northern part of Antrim County.<sup>29</sup>

A little north-westwards from the ruins of the old church of St. Domangard, in Maghera, there is the stump of a round tower,<sup>30</sup> in a ruinous state, only twenty feet of it now remaining. Its doorway faces towards the east, and it is just seven feet from the ground, while its walls are topped with vegetation. This round tower was thrown down, about the year 1710 or 1712.<sup>31</sup> The chief church of St. Domangart is said to have been at Maghera; while ruins of its ancient church, of which the western gable and the south wall remain, measure forty-five feet nine inches, in length, and twenty-one National Teachers' Gazette," we read as follows:—"It is not easy to say whether the frightful sea-monster called the Muir-dris, did not use this passage to show itself at the top of S. Donard at times. It must have been a remarkable place in ages gone by, even in pagan times. We find Bishop, about one hundred and fifty years ago, mentioning those localities in connexion with Crom dugh at Lammas time of the year. Holy Bay is the name for Dundrum bay on a map preserved in T.C.D. The Three big Sundays are still kept up in Newcastle at Lammas, and also at The Twelve Cairns, within two or three miles of Dro-marra, and at the S.W. extremity of the Mourne range. They may, however, have their origin, at least some of them, in the great national gathering of the people, instituted by Lewy the Long-hand, one of the Tuatha de Danann kings of Ireland."

<sup>25</sup> See Harris' "Ancient and Present State of the County of Down," chap. v., p. 121.

<sup>26</sup> "Sir William Petty mentions, in his maps, a 'chappel' on the N.E. side of Slieve Donard, which he calls Leniord's Chappel; but, probably for want of due information, he has corrupted the name, and the true name of it is Donard's Chappel."—Ibid.

<sup>27</sup> See J. B. Doyle's "Tours in Ulster," p. 69.

<sup>28</sup> The name of this parish was originally Rath-murbhulg—pronounced nearly Ramurlough—which signifies "the rath at the sea inlet." There are two townlands, named Murlough. One of these is in this parish, and the other in the parish of Kilmegan.

<sup>29</sup> This Dr. Reeves shows, by the following quotation from an ancient MS. :—"Donard, from Rath-murbulg, in Dalriada (recte Dalaradia), from Sliabh-Slanga."

<sup>30</sup> In the "Dublin Penny Journal," of June 4th, 1836, vol. iv., No. 205, p. 388, there is given a drawing of it, and it is called a Clog-Teagh. It is erroneously stated to be on Slieve Donard mountain, thus confounding Slieve Donard, with Maghera, whose patron saint was Domanghort.

<sup>31</sup> Thus speaking of the graveyard, Walter Harris says:—"Near it formerly stood a high round tower, which, about thirty years ago, was overturned by a violent storm, and lay at length and entire on the ground, like a huge gun, without breaking to pieces, so wonderfully hard and binding was the cement in this work."—"Ancient and Present State feet six inches, in breadth. These are in the churchyard. The beautiful Norman arch, at the western entrance, is in good preservation; the windows in the south wall are narrow, and of elegant design.<sup>32</sup> Writing in 1645, Colgan<sup>33</sup> states, that in the church of Maghera there were preserved in great veneration a bell, called The Gluman, which formerly belonged to St. Domangard, and one of his shoes, enshrined in a precious covering of silver and gold. These sacred articles are now entirely unknown, in the locality, nor is there the slightest tradition respecting them, according to the Rev. James O'Laverty.<sup>34</sup> The founder and patron saint of Maghera was St. Donard, whose festival was religiously kept there, on the 24th day of March; although, Father MacCana was unable to name the patron, when he wrote.<sup>35</sup> The parish of Maghera,<sup>36</sup> sometimes called, from one of its churches, the parish of Bryansford, consists of the civil parish of Maghera, and those townlands of the civil parish of Kilcoo, which are not included in the ecclesiastical parish of Kilcoo. It may have been, because Maghera<sup>37</sup> was a See, that it enjoyed the privilege of having a round tower, according to the opinion of the Rev. James O'Laverty, who entertains no doubt, that when the whole question of the round towers is investigated, it will be found, that they were the insignia of cathedral churches. There is not preserved the name of any, among St. Donard's successors in the See, however; and, it would seem, that at an early date, like many other minor Sees, Maghera<sup>38</sup> became incorporated in the diocese of Down, while the bishop enjoyed its ancient See lands. These, notwithstanding, appear to have been encroached upon, by lay impropiators, and notably by the Mageniss family, in 1622.<sup>39</sup> It is not unlikely, that the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Maghera extended over the parish of Maghera, and over the parishes of Kilkeel, Kilcoo, and Kilmegan, which in later times were under the jurisdiction of the "Plebanus" of Kilkeel, though the parish of Maghera was never under the spiritual care of that dignitary, it being immediately subject to the bishop.

of the County of Down," chap. iii., sect. vi., p. 82.

<sup>32</sup> See "Papers on Down and Connor," in the Ulster Examiner of July 9th, 1870.

<sup>33</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiv. Martii. De S. Domangardo Episcopo, p. 743.

<sup>34</sup> See an article in the Ulster Examiner, of July 9th, 1870, under the heading "Papers on Down and Connor," No. xviii.

<sup>35</sup> In his "Irish Itinerary," he remarks:—"From the foot of the mountain (Slieve Donard) on the east there stretches an agreeable plain, where there is a fortress of the Mageniss family, called New Castle, which was burned by the hostile Scots in 1643. In this plain, not far from the aforesaid castle, is situate the parish church of Maghare-rath (Maghera); the name of the saint to whom it is sacred my memory does not at this moment supply. One thing I can state, that it, as well as many other sacred places, was endowed with no inconsiderable estates by the chiefs of the MacCartan family, who formerly enjoyed an extensive rule in these parts, and I may add that I know not of any other nobles who were more generous to the Church of God than the lords of that most ancient family, for it is an acknowledged fact that they both built all the churches in the territories of Ivechia (Iveagh) and Kinnalfagartay (Kinalarty) and endowed them with the choicest lands." However, it seems, Father MacCana ascribes too much to the MacCartans, for many of those churches were endowed by the Magenisses and other co-relatives of the MacCartans. See Rev. James O'Laverty's "Historical Account of the Diocese of Down and Connor, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., pp. 50, 51.

<sup>36</sup> See ibid., p. 47.

<sup>37</sup> In the Pope Nicholas' taxation the parish of Maghera was valued at twenty shillings. But in the "Terrier" of 1615 the entry is "Matherira, it is a mensal, and hath four townlands; it pays in proxies, 4s.; in refectons, 4s.; in synodals, 2s."

<sup>38</sup> In the report of the Protestant bishop, in 1622, it is described "Magherah, a chappel ruinous, consisting of four or five townes very small. The Bps. Mensall, the two partes of all the Tithes belong to ye Bp." This was probably the old Catholic arrangement.

<sup>39</sup> Thus, the Protestant bishop complains—"Item the foure townes of Magherera being ancycntly known by the Bps. landes were lately found by an Inquisition to Sr. Arthur Magnely (Magenis), and to some of

The "Calendar of the Four Masters" places the death of St. Donard, at the very beginning of the sixth century; but, notwithstanding, it considerably antedates the event. "Domangort, son of Eachach, Bishop of Rathmurbul, in Dalriada and Dalaradia, A.D. 506." An Office was composed, in honour of this saint; and, Colgan gives a portion, consisting of Antiphon, Verse, Response and Prayer. In this latter, allusion is made to St. Patrick restoring our saint to life, in the Roman Curia. The year of our saint's death, in reality, is not known. This circumstance may have given rise to a legend, that St. Donard is preserved alive, to raise the relics of St. Patrick, before the general judgment, and, it appears to have been long current in Ireland. We find it thus told, in a recently published work:<sup>40</sup>—"There are, moreover, keepers of St. Patrick's people in Erin living still. . . . There is another man from him in Sliabh-Slainge—that is, Domangart, son of Eochaidh. It is he that will raise Patrick's relics a little before the judgment. His cell is in Rath-murbhuilg, at the side of Sliabh-Slainge. And there is always a leg (of mutton), with its accessories, and a vessel of ale before him every Easter, which is given to Mass people on Easter Monday always.<sup>41</sup> According to an ingenious writer, on this matter, such story seems to indicate, that St. Donard was at the translation of St. Patrick's relics, as referred to in the "Book of Armagh."<sup>42</sup> In our Calendars, Domangart mac Eochach, is the simple entry, found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>43</sup> at this date. His feast occurs, likewise, in the Martyrology of Cashel, where his pedigree is given; yet, according to Colgan, it is defective by two links, thus differing from the Genealogies of the Irish saints, to which allusion has been made. Marianus O'Gorman enters him thus: Domangartus Rathensis, Filius Fælix Eochodii de Rathmurbuilg in Dalaradia. Under the head of Rath-Muirbuilg,<sup>44</sup> Duaid Mac Fírbis enters, Domangart, son of Eochaidh, an eminent bishop, for March 24th.<sup>45</sup> Again, he is set down, in Henry Fitzsimon's List of Irish Saints; but, no special festival day has been assigned there to this holy man.<sup>46</sup> Also, we read, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>47</sup> that on this day was venerated, Domhanghort, son of Eochaidh, Bishop of Rath-Muirbuilg, in Dalriada. But this is a mistake for Dalaradia. This distinguished man was venerated, moreover, in Scotland; for, we read, at this date, in the Calendar of Drummond: Also on this day, the Holy Confessor and Priest Domhangart, descended from a noble race of kingly ancestors.<sup>48</sup> The virtues and the memory of St. Donard are still enshrined, in the veneration of a pious people, who live within the mountain range of Mourne, and throughout the adjoining districts.

---

ARTICLE II.—ST. CAIMIN, ABBOT OF INIS-CALTRA, ON LOUGH DERG, COUNTY OF CLARE. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] Unrivalled scenes of his freeholders of the which Inquisition a great part of the Jurors were of the name of Magyness."

---

<sup>40</sup> See Miss M. F. Cusack's Irish "Tripartite Life of St. Patrick," at p. 418, the original of which is now preserved, in the Bodleian Collection.

<sup>41</sup> The story of the leg of mutton and its accessories may have had its origin in the belief, that plenty should attend during the year the person who heard Mass on Easter Monday, in Maghera church.

<sup>42</sup> When the church was being built over the body, the men who were digging the ground saw fire bursting forth out of the sepulchre, and, flying back, they were afraid of the scorching fire and of the flames.

<sup>43</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Domangart mac Ech.

<sup>44</sup> Now Maghera, County Down.

<sup>45</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 124, 125.

<sup>46</sup> See "Catalogus Aliquorum Sanctorum Ibernæ."—O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xii., p. 53.

<sup>47</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>48</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 8.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Innis-Cealtrach is inter-beauty, in various parts of our island, were adorned, likewise, with those noble souls, aspiring to brighter realms in God's everlasting kingdom. There imperishable beauty alone reigns. But, as a region of enchantment on earth, we may instance the island of Iniscaltra,<sup>1</sup> with which St. Caimin is specially associated. It is also called Inniscaltra, Iniscaltro, Inniskeltair, Island of Saints, or Holy Island.<sup>2</sup> This spot involuntarily awakens reverence and admiration, in the mind of every tourist. It lies, in that part of the parish of Inniscaltra, which is within the barony of Tulla, and county of Clare.<sup>3</sup> However, the greater part of this parish is situated, in the barony of Leitrim, and in the county of Galway.<sup>4</sup> By a worthy lover and cultivator of his country's language and antiquities,<sup>5</sup> we are informed, that the history of this place, even in the dark days of paganism, was most interesting, and that it is in great part preserved, through prose and verse, in our native records. It was then known, under a pagan name, as the retreat of kings, druids, and warriors, and it was the scene of many an adventure and enterprise, in which the ancestors of several, belonging to the surrounding districts, were actors. Thus, it continued to be a favourite resort of chiefs and druids and bards, while it was made the home of chivalry and song, by our pagan ancestors, down to the dawn of Christianity.<sup>6</sup> Among the saints of the third order, and among the most celebrated saints of Ireland, the holy man Caimin, or Camminus, of Inish-Keltair, is commemorated, by the learned Ussher.<sup>7</sup> There seems to be an Irish metrical Life of this saint extant. It was copied by Michael O'Clery, from some older documents, and it is kept, in the Burgundian Library, at Bruxelles.<sup>8</sup> This appears to have come under Colgan's observation; for, he alludes to it, at the 25th of March, as having been in part ascribed to St. Dalbach.<sup>9</sup> Yet, containing fabulous and apochryphal matter, he suspects this compilation to be worthless, however eulogistic of St. Caimin's virtues. Therefore, Colgan chiefly introduces for illustration of his subject the account of an old commentator on St. Ængus, with some other remarks and a few notes.<sup>10</sup> The descent of this holy man is thus given, in the Genealogies of the Irish saints,<sup>11</sup> and by Selbach.<sup>12</sup> His father was Dima, the son of Fergus, son to Alild, son of Dathy, son to Crimthann, son of Enna Kennselach, son to Laurad, son of Breassail Belach. Thus, he came from the noble race of Cathair Mor, the King of Leinster. His mother is called Cumania, the daughter of Dalbron; and, he seems to have been born about, or after, the middle of the sixth century. This holy man is said to have been a half-brother to the celebrated and hospitable Guaire, King of preted, "Island of Churches," by Professor O'Looney.

<sup>2</sup> See "Notes on Irish Architecture, by Edwin, Third Earl of Dunraven," Edited by Margaret Stokes, vol. ii., pp. 55 to 60, where a very interesting history of the place, accompanied by several beautiful illustrations, will be found.

<sup>3</sup> That portion of Inishcaltra, in the barony of Upper Tulla, is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Clare," Sheet 29.

<sup>4</sup> The portion in the barony of Leitrim is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Galway," Sheets 131, 134, 136.

<sup>5</sup> Professor Brian O'Looney.

<sup>6</sup> Mr. O'Looney adds:—"It is a curious fact in its history, that it is one of the places in which SS. Iber and Ailbe, of Emly, in the present county of Tipperary, are said to have preached and predicted the coming of the true faith into Ireland, before the advent of St. Patrick. It is stated, that St. Ciaran, of Ossory, planted the cross in Corcalayda thirty years before the coming of St. Patrick into Ireland, and one of the best episodes of his life is the account of his retreat in the Innis, now called Holy Island."

<sup>7</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii., p. 503.

<sup>8</sup> MSS. vol. iv., part ii., p. 156.

<sup>9</sup> Said to have been venerated, at the 23rd of October.

<sup>10</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxv. De S. Camino Abbate Inis-Keltraensi, pp. 746, 747.

<sup>11</sup> Chapter xx.

Connaught, who died A.D. 662.<sup>13</sup> With a desire to mortify his flesh, by vigils, fasts, austerities, and to engage in exercises of Divine contemplation, St. Caimin resolved on retiring into a remote island, on Lough Dearg, on the Shannon. Here he lived for some time, but the fame of his virtues caused a number of disciples to resort thither, so that he was obliged, at length, to found a monastery and a church, on the beautifully isolated spot, now known as the Island of the Seven Churches.<sup>14</sup> He assisted at the great Convention or Synod of Easdra, in the year 580.<sup>15</sup> St. Caimin was the bosom friend of SS. Senan<sup>16</sup> and Luchtigern,<sup>17</sup> when the schools of the Island of Caimin brought seven ships, laden with foreign students, into the lakes of the Shannon. Our saint appears to have cultivated sacred studies; for, the Psalter of St. Caimin,<sup>18</sup> and the celebrated book of Caimin, were both written by him, according to a prevailing account. This latter book, with his beautiful Poem or Hymn to the Blessed Virgin, should be enough to recommend the seat of such learning and piety to the attention of every good and enlightened Christian. His church on Iniscaltra was called, afterwards, Teampull Caimin. On this island, too, are the ruins of a church, dedicated to St. Mary. It is the old Tempul Muire, or "Church of Mary," the Blessed Virgin Mother of God. It was founded, by St. Caimin himself, and as we are told, about the year A.D. 645, when few could understand the mysteries of the Immaculate Conception. Caimin understood and expounded them. He founded that old church, and he dedicated it to Mary, while he had a statue raised to her honour in it.<sup>19</sup> Two cemeteries are yet on the island; one dedicated to St. Caimin, and the other to the Blessed Virgin.<sup>20</sup> A very ancient vellum book stated, that Caimin of Inis Cealtra was, in his manners and life, like unto Paucomius,<sup>21</sup> the monk. We are told, that the influence exercised by St. Caimin on the ruling classes was great. Besides, various enactments and judgments, matured and given to the public, by virtue of legislative assemblages, held in the old church of St. Caimin, are among the ancient

<sup>12</sup> Chapter xviii.

<sup>13</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 272, 273.

<sup>14</sup> A Map of this island, with the position of its various remains, will be found at p. 58, of the work already alluded to, as edited by Miss Stokes.

<sup>15</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xv. Februarii. Vita S. Farranani Confessoris, cap. vii., and n. 23, pp. 337, 339.

<sup>16</sup> See his Life, at the 8th of March.

<sup>17</sup> Perhaps, St. Luchtigerna, Abbot of Inistymon, county of Clare, venerated, on the 28th of April.

<sup>18</sup> This transcript, attributed to St. Caimin, was in Colgan's possession, and it embraces the 119th Psalm, being only a fragment of probably the whole Psalter Caimin had written. In the time of Sir James Ware, it was kept in the Franciscan Convent at Donegal. See "De Scriptoriis Hiberniæ," lib. i., cap. iii., p. 24. It was afterwards brought to Louvain, and, at present, it is preserved in the Franciscan Convent, Dublin, where the writer had a full opportunity, for admiring its elegant and wonderfully legible caligraphy, on the old parchment.

<sup>19</sup> "I do not think I will err much," adds

Professor O'Looney, "if I say, that statues or shrines of the Blessed Mother were not very numerous at this time (Circa 645). This temple continued in great repute, and was frequented by queens and princesses, and by the wives and daughters of the noble grades of society, till the place was plundered by the Danes. The original church was demolished, but it was restored again—it was plundered over and over, and each time the piety and patriotism of the natives restored it as long as the ancient clans held sway in the land. The cemetery attached to this old ruin was once in great repute, had special graces and indulgences attached to it, and in its clay to-day will be found the ashes of many a noble queen and pious virgin, who, having placed their confidence in Mary, were buried under her protection in the cemetery of Tempul Muire."

<sup>20</sup> In the Freeman's Journal of May 26th, 1876, appeared a letter from Professor Brian O'Looney, dated Catholic University, Stephen's Green, Dublin, 16th of May, and giving the foregoing, with other particulars here introduced. The desecration of these cemeteries, and the representations of Rev. M. J. Kenny, P.P., of Scariiff, called the local Board of Guardians to the duty of enclosure.

laws and institutions of Ireland. His influence with the sons of Aedh Slane, Dermot and Blathmac, joint sovereigns of Erin, and with Guaire Aidhue, King of Connaught, and his judgments on the latter, on the eve of the battle of Carn Connaill, fought between them A.D. 645, are among the most remarkable evidences remaining of the relations between the Church and State, in Ireland, at the time to which the Acts refer.<sup>22</sup> At present, the ruins<sup>23</sup> on Inniscaltro Church and Round Tower, Lough Derg.

Inniscaltro are of exceeding great interest.<sup>24</sup> The Round Tower<sup>25</sup> there is yet remarkably perfect. Several inscribed tomb-stones<sup>26</sup> are remarkable, likewise, for their antiquarian interest. Very many illustrations of the place

<sup>21</sup> His feast is kept, on May 14th.

<sup>22</sup> According to Mr. O'Looney's letter.

<sup>23</sup> The accompanying view of St. Caimin's church and round tower was drawn on the spot, by William F. Wakeman, and afterwards it was transferred to the wood, by him. The engraving is by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>24</sup> Inniscaltro, or Holy Island, with its Round Tower and three other buildings, we find represented on Henry Pelham's fine old Map of the County Clare, with a notice that Inniscaltro parish was in controversy with Galway County—by which we may probably understand, that it was claimed as belonging to the latter.

<sup>25</sup> Treating of Inis Cealtra, in his poem on the Shannon, and in the expansion of the same river, called Lough Deirgart, anciently Loe' Deirge Deirge, Michael O'Brannon says, in reference to this saint and his churches:—

'San reádt maó céao úb'n ácair Cmor-t-amuil

Do éur naomí Caimín tiamá ba meirneamail

Seádt o-teampala a'ir clogáir aro le coimneairt

A n-uir Cealtreac a meóbb loe' Deirgeairt.

"In the seventh century of the Christian era

Saint Caimin—a vigorous chief—erected

Seven churches and a high Clogaus with strength,

On Inis-Cealtra in the middle of Lough Deirgart."

<sup>26</sup> One of these is engraved, in William F. Wakeman's interesting work: "Archæologica Hibernica. A Hand-Book of Irish Antiquities, Pagan and Christian." Part ii. Early Christian Antiquities. See chap. iv., p. 96.

<sup>27</sup> Among drawings of St. Caimin's church are preserved,<sup>27</sup> by artists, and in the local Guide-books. One day, as we are told,<sup>28</sup> while St. Caimin was at Iniskealtra, with his brother Guaire and St. Cumineus,<sup>29</sup> surnamed the Long, our saint asked Guaire what he should most desire to be in the church there. Guaire declared, he should wish it to be filled with gold and silver, so that he might give it for pious uses, such as to build religious structures and to support the poor. Afterwards, St. Caimin prophesied, that he should become a king, and, also, that he should have great wealth. Then Guaire asked St. Cumineus the Long, what he should most wish the church to be filled with, and the latter replied, with good books, to satisfy the pious desires of students, to bring their souls from the bondage of Satan, and to the precepts of God. Afterwards, both his guests asked St. Caimin, what he should most desire. The holy servant of Christ replied, that if it pleased the Lord, he should desire the church to be filled with the infirm and diseased of every class; so that all their afflictions might be heaped on his own body, and that for a Saviour's love, he should be deemed worthy to bear the infirmities of the whole world. It is said, all the foregoing desires were accomplished, and in the degree desired by all, while each one received a crown of life, at the close of his days. But, our saint was loaded with so many diseases, that his flesh wasted away, his nerves became weak, and his bones were scarcely left hanging together, when his hour of final dissolution came. We are informed, that he died, about the middle of the seventh century.<sup>30</sup> The Annals of Innisfallen record his happy death, at the year 653. Bishop Challenor,<sup>31</sup> and the "Circle of the Seasons,"<sup>32</sup> follow the same authority. It is said, he had been buried in his own church.<sup>33</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>34</sup> mentions a veneration paid, on this day, to St. Caimin, of Inis-cealtra, in Loch Deirgdheirc, now Lough Derg, on the Lower Shannon, near unto Magh-neó-n-Orbrúighe, and to Tuaim Gréine, the town of Cronan. Most of our Martyrologists and Calendarists set down his festival, on the 24th of March; thus, Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>35</sup> the Calendar of Cashel,<sup>36</sup> Maguire, the Carthusian Martyrology, Patrus Canisius, and Philip Ferrarius. Others refer his feast to the day succeeding.

ARTICLE III.—ST. SCIRE, OR SGIRE, VIRGIN, OF CILL-SGIRE, NOW KILSKYRE, COUNTY OF MEATH. [Sixth Century.] Scire, Virgin, is the only entry regarding her, that we find, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 24th of March. The Bollandists have a mere notice of her feast, at the same date.<sup>2</sup> The Blessed Sgire, and her sister Corcaira Caoin, belonged to the race of Fergus, son of Eochaidh Muighmhedhoin.<sup>3</sup> According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> veneration was given, on this day, to Sgire, Virgin, of Cill-and Round Tower, there is one in the collection of sketches, made for the Irish Ordnance Survey for Galway County, and to be found in the Royal Irish Academy.

<sup>28</sup> By the old Scholiast of Ængus.

<sup>29</sup> His feast is assigned to the 12th of November, and to the 2nd of December.

<sup>30</sup> See Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," vol. ii., pp. 18, 19.

<sup>31</sup> See "Britannia Sancta," part i., p. 203.

<sup>32</sup> See at p. 85.

<sup>33</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 47.

<sup>34</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, see pp. 84 to 87.

<sup>35</sup> "Caminus de Inis-Keltra."

<sup>36</sup> "S. Caminus sive Caninus de Inis-Keltra."

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Scire tñp.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 473.

<sup>3</sup> This saint was the daughter of Eugene, son to Carannan, son of Alild, son to Fergus, son of Eochard Moimedonius, according to the Genealogy of the Saints, and the Continuator of Ængus.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

<sup>5</sup> "Sgire o cill sgire i bpepamanach agur an iapcar mroe. H. I. 10. 124 a."

Sgíre, in Meath. As if doubtful regarding her exact locality, the writer remarks, that there is, also, a Cill-Scíre<sup>5</sup> in Fera-Manach, or Fermanagh, in Ulster. The parish of Kilskyre, or Kilskeer, is situated in the barony of Upper Kells, county of Meath.<sup>6</sup> The church and monastery in this place, and which may be Anglicised, "the church of St. Scíre," was founded at an early age, and they were dedicated to St. Schirra. The present holy woman probably founded a nunnery in Kilskyre, and lived in it. However, she is held in great veneration, at this place.<sup>7</sup> St. Skyria, of Kill-Skyria, assisted at the great Council, which was held, A.D. 580.<sup>8</sup> She is named, as one of the principal saints of the race of Cumna, who met St. Columba, at the place, called Easdra. This holy woman died, about the close of the sixth century,<sup>9</sup> and her feast was celebrated, on the 24th of March. St. Ængus,<sup>10</sup> the Martyrology of Tallagh, and the Calendar of Cashel, are authorities for that statement. In the Kalendar of Drummond, likewise, she is noticed.<sup>11</sup>

ARTICLE IV.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. MONTAN, OF KILL-MANTAIN, COUNTY OF WICKLOW. [Fifth Century.] A feast has been assigned to St. Montan, of Killmantain, near the town of Wicklow, on this day. His Acts have been given, already, at the 2nd of this month.

ARTICLE V.—ST. LUGHADH, SON OF EOCHADH, OF CLUAIN-LAOGH, NOW CLONLEIGH, COUNTY OF DONEGAL. [Sixth Century.] A holy man is recorded, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 24th of March, as Lughaidh, mac Eachach. He is classed, among the disciples of St. Columkille.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists pass him over, with a few brief remarks.<sup>3</sup> We are told, that Lugaíd Mocu-Theimne, or "the son of Teimne,"<sup>4</sup> was the son of Eochaid, son of Illan, son to Eogan, son to Niall of the Nine Hostages, as his paternal pedigree has been traced, in the Genealogies of the Irish Saints.<sup>5</sup> He was a relation of St. Columba,<sup>6</sup> and his companion, when the latter first set out on his voyage to the shores of Britain. As we are informed, by the Martyrology of Tallagh, this saint belonged to Cluain Laigh. This place is at present

MS. Note in Wm. M. Hennessy's copy of the Donegal Martyrology, and appended at this passage.

<sup>6</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 9, 10, 15, 16, 23. The townland, so called, is on the two latter Sheets.

<sup>7</sup> A very interesting and complete account of this parish will be found, in Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xvi., pp. 321 to 326.

<sup>8</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xv. Februarii. Vita S. Farannani, cap. vii., p. 337.

<sup>9</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. xxvi., p. 147.

<sup>10</sup> The following extract from the "Leabhar Breac" copy of the "Feilire," and its English translation, were furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

f. ix. kl. An Lanamain Ugoach fhuinnis etla sinbech Scíre cam cap tpeoan mochta cpeoal cpaiboech.

"The lustrous couple Who hath been washed with arduous repentance,
Scíre the gentle, who loved fasting,
The fervent pious Mochta."

<sup>11</sup> "In Hibernia, the Holy Virgin Scíre and the Holy Confessors, Mochta and Comin, went Companions to Christ."—Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 8.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Lugaio mac Eachach.

<sup>2</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., num. 74, p. 491.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 473.

<sup>4</sup> See "Memoir of the City and North-Western Liberties of Londonderry," part ii., sect. 2, p. 27.

<sup>5</sup> Chapter i.

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

called Clonleigh,<sup>7</sup> meaning the "pasturage," "lawn," or "insulated meadow of the calves." This parish is situated, on the western bank of the River Foyle, about two miles northward from Lifford,<sup>8</sup> in the barony of Raphoe, and in the county of Donegal,<sup>9</sup> formerly Tyrconnell. There was a monastery of considerable importance,<sup>10</sup> in this place.<sup>11</sup> Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire have this holy man, in their respective Calendars.<sup>12</sup> On this day is entered, likewise, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>13</sup> Lughaidh, son to Eochaidh, of Cluain-laogh.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. FERGUSA. At the 24th of March, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> records the name Fergus, without any further designation.

ARTICLE VII.—FEAST OF ST. MANCHAN, OF LEMANAGHAN, KING'S COUNTY. In the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> we find, that on this day was celebrated a festival, in honour of Manchan, son of Failbhe. He descended from the race of Conall Gulban, son to Niall. There is a church, called Leth-Manchain, in Dealbhna Mac Cochlain, adds the writer. It is now known as Lemanaghan, a parish in the barony of Garrycastle, King's County. Within five miles of this place, we are told, Manchan's well and station<sup>3</sup> were to be seen.<sup>4</sup> This saint has been noticed, already, at the 24th day of January.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. CAIRLON, OR CAORLAN, ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH, COUNTY OF ARMAGH. [Sixth Century.] In Colgan's work, there are a few paragraphs and notes, commemorating this saintly prelate, at the 24th of March.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists, likewise, have a brief notice of him.<sup>2</sup> He died, at this day, on which our Annalists and Martyrologists record his feast. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>3</sup> merely enters the name, Cairlon, Bishop, at the 24th of March. Marianus O'Gorman, and Cathal Maguire have a notice of his death, on the same day, in their respective Martyrologies.<sup>4</sup> Caorlan, Bishop, of Ard Macha, is set down, likewise, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> as having a festival at this date. Belonging to the diocese of Armagh, and probably born there,<sup>6</sup> this saint was descended from the Hy-Niellan<sup>7</sup> or <sup>7</sup> This parish is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 62, 63, 70, 71, 79.

<sup>8</sup> "Ad ripam Eurypi, Lochfeabhuil nuncupati."—Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., p. 491.

<sup>9</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iv., n. (q), pp. 1113, 1114.

<sup>10</sup> See the "Ulster Inquisitions."

<sup>11</sup> Also, Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. ii., num. 53, p. 495.

<sup>12</sup> See ibid. Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., p. 491.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Fergus.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

<sup>2</sup> The Irish word employed for this is cúruir, meaning a station, a pilgrimage, a circuit.

<sup>3</sup> See, ibid. Appendix to the Introduction, p. xlv.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvi. De S. Cairlano Archiepiscopo Ardmachano, p. 744.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., Martii xxiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 473.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has epi Cairlan.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," n. 5, p. 744.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 84, 85.

<sup>6</sup> Colgan refers to his copy of the Four Masters, to prove this statement. When treating on his death, at the year 587, he makes use of these words, in a note: "De eo ad eundem annum in Annalibus sic scri-

O'Niallan family. He flourished at an early period of our history. He was abbot over a community of monks, in this part of the country, about A.D. 546; at which time, he was restored to life, by St. Dagæus. This we find recorded, in the latter saint's Acts, at the 18th of August. Cairlan subjected himself and his monastery to the saint, in token of gratitude. But, as a counterpoise, Dagæus placed himself and his own monastery, under the rule of our saint, who was called to preside over the Primatial See of Armagh, on the death of Fedlimid Fionn,<sup>8</sup> A.D. 577.<sup>9</sup> St. Cairlan ruled over this church, for a duration of ten years.<sup>10</sup> This saintly prelate died, in the year 587, according to the Annals of Clonmacnoise, and of the Four Masters;<sup>11</sup> or A.D. 588, according to Sir James Ware. Walter Harris notices this difference of year, for which the Rev. Dr. Lanigan<sup>12</sup> takes him to task; yet, in his remarks, the latter writer labours under a mistake, by supposing, that the Four Masters have antedated their events, by one year, in all the earlier centuries. However, in his splendid edition of the Annals of the Four Masters, Dr. O'Donovan has completely set at rest this misapprehension, as may be seen by referring to his volumes.<sup>13</sup> Discrepancies occur, no doubt, between the Four Masters and other ancient annalists in date; but, these irregularities of chronology are by no means uniformly presented by exact annual differences, and the learned editor when necessary supplies new data, to resolve them.<sup>14</sup> It is remarkable, that the actions of St. Cairlan are little known, although the memory of his sanctity is not left unrecorded, in all our Calendars and Martyrologies.

bunt Quatuor Magistri. Anno Christi 587. & vigesimo Aidâ, filii Anmirii, Hiberniæ Regis, S. Cairlanus Episcopus Ardmachanus, de Hi Niellan oriundus, obiit 24. Martii.—Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ, xxiv. Martii. Vita S. Cairlani, n. 4, p. 744. It must be remarked, however, that in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," at the same year, although we find this saint's death recorded, there is no mention of the place, in which he was born, either in the original Irish, or in the English translation.

7 "This tribe, who furnished so many Archbishops to the See of Armagh, were seated in the present baronies of Oneilland, in the County of Armagh."—O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (o), p. 327.

<sup>8</sup> With regard to the term Abbot, applied to this Prelate, Harris remarks: "Possibly the reason why the same person is sometimes called Abbot, and sometimes Archbishop of Armagh, may be this: that as there was a celebrated Abbey at Armagh, the Abbots were often elected into the Archiepiscopal Chair; and after their election, many of them have retained the name, by which they were known before; and from thence came to be called Abbots, after their advancement. Or, it may be; as Abbot, in the Syriack language, signifieth a Father; so the Archbishop of Armagh may in this sense be called, Abbot, as being the common father of all the Bishops of Ireland."—Harris's Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 38.

<sup>9</sup> Although called Abbot of Armagh, according to an ancient custom, by our Annalists; yet is he recognised, as Bishop of Armagh, by the Psalter of Cashel, and, likewise, in the Catalogue of Primates governing the former See.

<sup>10</sup> See ibid., pp. 38, 39.

<sup>11</sup> See, O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 212, 213, and n. (o). Ibid.

<sup>12</sup> Referring to Harris's statement, that the Psalter of Cashel places Cairlin's death, in 587; Dr. Lanigan says, "had he looked into Tr. Th., p. 292, where said Psalter is quoted, he could have found that it does not mention the year of the Christian era, in which Cairlan or any Archbishop of Armagh died. It merely states the number of years, during which each of them held the See, and gives ten to Cairlan."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xii., sect. i., n. 4, p. 184.

<sup>13</sup> Of Feidhlimidh Finn, Dr. O'Donovan says: "He is set down as Primate in the list of the Archbishops of Armagh given in the Psalter of Cashel, published by Colgan in Trias Thaum., p. 293, and in the Bodleian MS., Laud. 610."—"Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (x), pp. 209, 210.

<sup>14</sup> In O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 212, 213, Caerlan's death is thus recorded: "The age of Christ 587. The twentieth year of Aedh. St. Caerlan, Bishop of Ard-Macha, died on the twenty-fourth day of March."

ARTICLE IX.—See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiv. Martii. Vita S. Mochtei, pp. 729 to 737.

ARTICLE IX.—ST. MOCHTEUS, OR MOCHTA, BISHOP OF LUGMAGH, OR LOUTH. [Fifth Century.] Colgan received the Acts of this saint, taken from a Salamancan MS., and written by some unknown author.<sup>1</sup> To these he has added notes, with an Appendix, comprising five distinct chapters. The Bollandists notice him merely, at this date.<sup>2</sup> The holy man, we are informed, drew his first breath in Great Britain, where he gave indications of future excellence. He is classed among St. Patrick's disciples,<sup>3</sup> and he was contemporaneous. He is called Macteus, in the Salamancan copy, from which Colgan takes a considerable portion of his Acts. At this date, we find a festival recorded, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>4</sup> to honour Mochta, of Lughmagh. He lived to a great age; but, according to some accounts, he died A.D. 534. Such is the date found, in the Annals of the Four Masters.<sup>5</sup> Another festival to his memory occurs, on the 19th of August, at which day, further notices may be seen, regarding him.

ARTICLE X.—ST. MACCARTHENN, BISHOP OF CLOGHER, OR SUPPOSED BY SOME TO BE ST. MACCARTHENN, PATRON OF DOMNACH-MOR MUIGHE-TO-CHUIR, OR DONAGH PARISH, COUNTY OF DONEGAL. [Probably Fifth and Sixth Centuries.] At the 24th of March, Colgan<sup>1</sup> has elaborate accounts of St. Macarthann, Bishop of Clogher. The Bollandists have only a brief notice.<sup>2</sup> In the time of St. Patrick, lived two holy sons of Carthenn, or Caerthenn, and by his patronymic, each is usually known, as Mac Carthenn, or "son of Carthenn." Now, in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman, of Cathal Maguire, and of Donegal, as also in the Calendar of Cashel, we have two distinct festivals for a St. Maccaerthenn: one feast, at the 24th of March; and, another, at the 15th of August. Although some of the afore-said authorities seem to refer both festivals to St. Maccaerthenn, Bishop of Clogher; yet, others speak more indefinitely, so that Colgan is much inclined to believe, that the feast for the 24th of March belongs exclusively to a St. Maccarthenn, Bishop, who was left by St. Patrick, in charge of the church of Domnach-mor Muighe-tochuir,<sup>3</sup> now known as Donagh,<sup>4</sup> in the barony and peninsula of Inishowen, county of Donegal. However this may be, at present, the Irish Church celebrates the festival of St. Maccarthen, Bishop of Clogher, as a Double, at this date, March 24th; while, in the diocese of Clogher, as the patron, he is honoured with a Double Feast of the First Class. To obtain more explicit information, on this subject, during the uncertainty now existing, we defer to the 15th of August, the Life of the latter saint.

ARTICLE XI.—FESTIVALS OF BISHOP MAC CAIRTHINN AND OF MAELDOTUS. The Kalendar of Drummond,<sup>1</sup> at the 24th of March, states: Likewise, this same day, the Natale of the Holy Confessors, Esco Mac Cairthinn

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiv. Among the pretermitted saints," p. 474.

<sup>3</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 266.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. To the entry of this saint's name, we here find these words appended, "Cumman matris ejus nomen." In the Franciscan copy, I can only well decipher, mochtta luğ.

<sup>5</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 176 to 179.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," xxiv. Martii. De S. Macaerthenno Epis. Clochorensi, with Notes and Appendix, pp. 737 to 742.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 473.

<sup>3</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," lib. ii., cap. cxxi., p. 145.

<sup>4</sup> See ibid., n. 175, p. 181. In the Franciscan copy of the Tallagh Martyrology, I read, epy capteno, with other obscure words added.

and Maeldotus. We have no doubt, but the prefix Esco is meant for Easpog or Bishop Mac Cairthinn, to whom allusion has been already made. Who Maeldotus was—although most probably an Irish saint—we have no opportunity for determining.

ARTICLE XII.—FESTIVAL OF ST. PATRICK, ARCHBISHOP. At the 24th of March, the Kalendar of Drummond<sup>1</sup> says: Also the same day, the Octave of St. Patrick, Archbishop. It seems probable, the great Patron of Ireland is here meant.

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. DUNCHAD, OR DONAT, ABBOT OF IONA. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] Accounts of this saintly abbot will be found, in Camerarius,<sup>1</sup> in Colgan,<sup>2</sup> in the Bollandists,<sup>3</sup> in Bishop Forbes,<sup>4</sup> at the 24th of March; although most writers refer his festival, to the 25th of May,<sup>5</sup> where some account of him will be given.

Twenty-fifth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. ENAN, OR ENANUS, OF DRUIM-INDICH, OR DRUMEENY, COUNTY OF ANTRIM.

[PROBABLY IN THE FIFTH OR SIXTH CENTURY.]

WHEN the sons of God retire into solitude to please and serve him, their thoughts find little, in common or in sympathy with the world's concerns. The Bollandists have a brief notice of Enanus.<sup>1</sup> His festival was observed, on the 25th March, under which day, his name and Acts are noticed by Colgan.<sup>2</sup> This holy man was son to Muadan; and, he is supposed, by Colgan, to have lived as a monk, under the rule of St. Comgall, at Bangor,<sup>3</sup> who founded a monastery there, about the year 559.<sup>4</sup> If this supposition be correct, on one occasion, when St. Comgall, with his own hands, had made a little bed, or coffin, with boards, Enan is said to have exclaimed: "O holy father, you perform a good work for the brothers, about to rest in this coffin. It shall profit them much, in obtaining salvation; I wish, that I deserved to pass out of the world in it." St. Comgall replied: "It shall

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 8.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 8.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> The Scottish Entries, in the Kalendar of David Camerarius, at the 24th of March, thus state: St. Duunchad or Dumchadus, Abbot of the Island of Hy, so remarkable for its holy men. He presided many years over the monastery of Hy, not without fame for his sanctity and miracles. See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 236.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxiv. Martii. De S. Dunchado seu Donato, Abbate Hiensi, pp. 744 to 746.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii.,

Martii xxiv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 474.

<sup>4</sup> See "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 328.

<sup>5</sup> Colgan promised further to notice him, at this day.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 532.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxv. De S. Enano Confessore, p. 747.

<sup>3</sup> See the Acts of this saint, at the 10th of May.

<sup>4</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. xii., p. 62, and ibid., n. 199, p. 66.

happen to thee, brother, as thou desirest, and from this bed thou shalt go to Heaven." It chanced, that the brother was sent to a certain place, at some distance from Bangor Monastery, and while there he died. By orders of St. Comgall, his body was brought to the monastery of Bangor. There, after a lapse of two days, the holy abbot restored him to life; and, he lived, afterwards, for many years. This brother often told his companions, what had been seen and heard, after his departure. As two angels, sent by God, were conducting him to Heaven, and whilst one of these accompanied him, on either side, other blessed spirits met them, giving orders to unite the soul of Enan to his body; for, St. Comgall had asked from God his restoration to life, which petition had been granted. Enan lived to an old age subsequently, and, at the last hour, he passed out of this life, in the bed already mentioned. Notwithstanding the foregoing account, this saint seems to have been that person, who is styled in the Calendar of Marianus O'Gorman, "Enanus egregius, diuturnæ quietis, et Muadani filius;" and, from whose father, a parish church derived the name Rath-Muadain, "Arx Muadani," or "the fort of Muadain."<sup>5</sup> Already, some account of this place will be found, in the notices of Ereciacius, at the 3rd of March. About three perches southwards was a burying-ground, locally called Killeena,<sup>6</sup> or Killenan, interpreted "the church of Enan,"<sup>7</sup> which was long disused, and which was under cultivation.<sup>8</sup> It is thought, that the church in question very probably was the "Ecclesia de Druim-Indich," which the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick states to have been founded by him, in the region of Cathrigia, now known as the barony of Cary, in the county of Antrim. It had been placed, under the care of St. Enan.<sup>9</sup> Now, Druim-Indich may be identical with the modern Killeena, in the parish of Ramoan, and county of Antrim, according to the opinion of Rev. Dr. Reeves.<sup>10</sup> In the townland of Drumeeny, in Glenshesk, a little west of the river which bounds the parish, there is a gentle eminence. On this mound are the remains of an ancient chapel.<sup>11</sup> This structure, however, is vulgarly called Gobbin's Heir Castle; and, it is even thus denominated, in William Shaw Mason's work,<sup>12</sup> as also on the Irish Ordnance Survey Townland and Index Maps.<sup>13</sup> But, the term Castle is a complete perversion, as every feature of the spot is indicative of an ecclesiastical character. The first two words are evidently a corruption of Goban Saer,<sup>14</sup> the title of that celebrated architect,<sup>15</sup> to whose skill the traditions of the

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. cxxx., p. 146, col. 2, and n. 203, p. 182, col. 2.

<sup>6</sup> This does not appear, on the Ordnance Survey Maps.

<sup>7</sup> See J. B. Doyle's "Tours in Ulster," p. 223.

<sup>8</sup> On the S.E., there is a long cave, running northwards. In its wall, according to the report of a tenant of the land, are two stones; one had a crucifix carved on it, and the other had a cross. About twelve perches northwards, there are several large pillar stones, now lying prostrate.

<sup>9</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. cxxx., p. 146.

<sup>10</sup> "The Four Masters," at the year 818, record a meeting of the Northern and Southern Hy-Niall, at a place called Opum-moech, which O'Connor renders Collis-equi: but this was situated in a plain, and appears to have been far south of the place under consideration."—Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix Z, pp. 284, 285.

<sup>11</sup> It was 28 feet 9 inches long, and 15 feet wide, in the clear. Walls 10 feet high, and 3 feet thick. There seems to have been a narrow window, in the east gable, as also in the north wall, near the altar end, and in the south wall. The font, together with the dressed sandstone quoins, was carried away to a field at some distance.—Ibid.

<sup>12</sup> See where Rev. Luke Conolly treats about Ramoan Parish, in the "Statistical Account or Parochial Survey of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 506.

<sup>13</sup> See "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Antrim," Sheet 9.

<sup>14</sup> In Irish written Goban Saor, or "Goban the Artificer."

<sup>15</sup> An interesting account of him is given by Mr. Petrie, in his incomparable work on country ascribe the erection of so many churches and round towers. A curious excavation, known as the Goban Saer's Cave, lies near to Killeena. Various interesting antiquities are there to be found.<sup>16</sup> Were we to consider this Enan as a saint, who flourished under the care of St. Comgall, it can hardly be allowed, he was the same as that person, who had been placed over Druim-Indich church, by St. Patrick, about the year 460. Yet, this is a supposition, advanced by Colgan, but, apparently, with less confidence, than his former conjecture, as noticed. The year of our saint's death is unknown. His name Enan mac Muadain is recorded, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>17</sup> at the 25th of March. Cathal Maguire inserts the feast of this saint, in his Calendar, at the present day. Likewise, Enan, son of Muadan,<sup>18</sup> is mentioned in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>19</sup> as having a festival, at this date.

ARTICLE II.—ST. COLUMBA, DAUGHTER OF BAOIT.. A notice appears, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at this date, of "Columb inghen Buiti." The Bollandists only note down this entry.<sup>2</sup> The festival of Columba, daughter of Baoit, also occurs, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> on this day.

ARTICLE III.—FESTIVAL OF ST. CAMMIN, ABBOT OF INNIS-CALTRA, COUNTY OF CLARE. [Seventh Century.] Some of our Martyrologists, as we have seen, place the festival of this saint, at the previous day; while others have him recorded, on the 25th of March. Colgan has collected and published his Acts, at the present date, which is the one preferred, by our most ancient Calendarists.<sup>1</sup> At this day, likewise, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>2</sup> registers Cummin. It tells us, moreover, that his mother was called Cumman.<sup>3</sup> The Rev. Alban Butler<sup>4</sup> has the festival of St. Cammin, Abbot, at this date, at which the Bollandists<sup>5</sup> have some notices.

ARTICLE IV.—THE INCARNATION AND CRUCIFIXION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, AND THE MARTYRDOM OF THE APOSTLE ST. JAMES. In the "Feilire"<sup>1</sup> of St. Ængus, we find the foregoing festivals noted, as having the "Ecclesiastical Architecture and Round Towers of Ireland," part ii., sect. iii., subsect. 3, pp. 385, 386.

<sup>16</sup> Mr. George Langtry has given a very interesting account of these, in "The Journal of the Royal Historical and Archaeological Association of Ireland," vol. i. Fourth Series. No. 8. October, 1871, pp. 571 to 574.

<sup>17</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Enan mac Muadan.

<sup>18</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. cxxx., p. 146, n. 203, p. 182.

<sup>19</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, we find, Columbe.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 532.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxv. Martii. De S. Camino Abbate Inis-Keltraensi, pp. 746, 747.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Cammin Sci.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xii. Januarii, n. 6, p. 59.

<sup>4</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xxv.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 533.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> The following extract from the "Leabhar Breac" copy, with its English translation, has been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

5. um. kl. Cpochao ocuf compep 1iu cpup acopi for oenlith collep
1a paip iacopi.

"The Crucifixion and Conception
Of Jesus Christ, it is meet
On one feast with piety [to celebrate them]
With the passion of James," been celebrated, on this day, in the ancient Irish Church. The feast of Christ's Incarnation is now usually called that of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary.<sup>2</sup> There seems to have been a very generally received tradition, likewise, that the Crucifixion of Our Divine Saviour occurred on this day. Besides, the Martyrdom of St. James, the Apostle, who was beheaded by Herod, about the Feast of the Pasch, is celebrated in many ancient Martyrologies.<sup>3</sup> Sometimes, the present Apostle is called "Frater Domini,"<sup>4</sup> and sometimes, "Frater S. Joannis Evangelistæ."<sup>5</sup> Elucidations of the festivals here entered will be found, in the writings of various learned Catholic divines,<sup>6</sup> who have treated on the subject.

ARTICLE V.—ST. LUCELLA. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> observe, that Marianus O'Gorman has such an entry, at this date, in his Martyrology, and that one of the Holy Daughters of Leinin<sup>2</sup> is similarly named.

ARTICLE VI.—FESTIVAL OF ST. KILIAN, A BISHOP, AND OF THEOTMANUS, A DEACON. [Seventh Century.] Noticing these saintly Martyrs, the Bollandists<sup>1</sup> remark, that their chief feast is on the 8th of July; while, in the Manuscript of Florarius, the first is mentioned, and the latter by Camerarius, at the 25th of March.

Twenty-sixth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MOCHELLOC, OR CELLOC, PATRON OF KILMALLOCH, COUNTY OF LIMERICK.

[SIXTH AND SEVENTH CENTURIES.]

THIS saint is called Mottellog, by some writers,<sup>1</sup> but more correctly Celloc, Cellenus, or Kellenus, by others, who derive his name Mochelloc, by which he is best known, from the endearing prefix, "mo," Anglicised into "my," being joined with Chelloc. Certain authorities<sup>2</sup> say, that his father was named Oblen, and that he descended from the noble and ancient race of Connor, King of Ireland.<sup>3</sup> However, Colgan is of opinion, that Oblen must have been the name of his grandfather, or great-grandfather,<sup>4</sup> The Martyrologies of Tamlacht and of Marianus O'Gorman, with the Irish

<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists have an interesting series of Disquisitions, on this festival, in the "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., Martii xxv., under the heading, "Sacra Memoria Annunciationis S. Mariæ Virg. et Incarnationis Filii Dei," in Four Sections, pp. 534 to 540.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid. Sacra Memoria Jesu Christi Crucifixi, in Three Sections, pp. 540 to 543. The Franciscan copy of the Tallagh Martyrology also notes this Festival.

<sup>4</sup> See ibid. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 553.

<sup>5</sup> St. James the Less, whose feast is held, on the 1st of May.

<sup>6</sup> St. James the Great, whose feast is kept, on the 25th of July.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., Martii xxv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 532.

<sup>2</sup> See notices of them, at the 6th of March. ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., Martii xxv. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 533.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> Such as the Carthusian writers of their Martyrology, Petrus Canisius, Ferrarius, in his General Catalogue, and Fitzsimon, in his Catalogue of Irish Saints.

<sup>2</sup> Such as the "Sanctilogium Genealogicum" and Seluacius.

<sup>3</sup> Speaking of our saint, Dr. Keating says, that this religious person was derived from the family of Conaire, the son of Eidersgeoil,

Calendar, state, that our saint's father had been named Tuladhran.<sup>5</sup> So far, have we been enabled to collect illustrations, in reference to this holy man's genealogy; and, the pedigree of a saint is at least interesting, as that of a monarch. The Bollandists have published short Acts of this saint,<sup>6</sup> and following closely the accounts of him, as left us, by Colgan.<sup>7</sup> This pious servant of Christ was a relative to, and contemporary with, Finan, of Kinnetty.<sup>8</sup> Our saint appears to have flourished, about the close of the sixth, and beginning of the seventh, century. He is usually called Mochelloc, of Cathuir-mac-Conchaigh, or Conchaigh,<sup>9</sup> an ancient city near Lismore, in the present county of Waterford. A query is proposed by Dr. Lanigan, if Mocollop,<sup>10</sup> the name of a parish near Lismore, be not a corruption of Mochelloc?<sup>11</sup> This, however, seems to be a conjecture, not well sustained.<sup>12</sup> The place of our saint was in the Munster Decies. Archdall declares himself unable to assign the exact location for Cathuir-mac-Conchaigh.<sup>13</sup> We are told, by Keating, that this saint was founder of Kilmallock church,<sup>14</sup> and this name is supposed to be a contraction from Kill-mochelloc.<sup>15</sup> But, we find, some fanciful and supremely ridiculous derivations, for the name of this town.<sup>16</sup> A very interesting account of Kilmallock<sup>17</sup>—because of its remains<sup>18</sup>—called the Balbec of Ireland,<sup>19</sup> with some excellent illustrations of its ruins, will be found in the work of Lady Chatterton.<sup>20</sup> Several beautiful drawings

See Dermot O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii., p. 403.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvi. De S. Mochelloco, p. 749.

<sup>5</sup> In the Irish Calendar, at the vii. of the Calends of April (March 26th), I find Cillén mac Tolóipáin in Derribmuman.—Ordnance Survey Office Copy for Phoenix Park. Common Place Book, p. 33. This is now deposited, in the Royal Irish Academy's Library.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvi. De S. Mochelloco sive Kelleno Kellociæ in Hibernia, p. 626.

<sup>7</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvi. De Mochelloco Kellochic Patrono, p. 749.

<sup>8</sup> His feast occurs, at the 7th of April.

<sup>9</sup> In the Martyrology of Tallagh, at the vii. of the Kalends of April (March 26), I find this saint's festival, entered in the following manner: "Mochelloc mac Tuladhrain o Chathir mic Conaich." See Rev. Dr. Kelly's "Calendar of Irish Saints," &c., p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, I can only make out Mochelloc.

<sup>10</sup> This place, in the parishes of Lismore and Mocollop, baronies of Coshmore and Coshbride, is noted on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Waterford," Sheets 19, 20.

<sup>11</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. i., chap. i., sect. xii., n. 100, p. 28.

<sup>12</sup> "Dr. Lanigan and Moore have hesitated to assert, that it is certain, the Cill Mochelloc of the ancients is the present town of Kilmallock; but, there can be no doubt of their identity, as every man in the province of Munster calls Kilmallock by no other name than Cill mocheallóg [Kill Mocheallog] when speaking Irish."—"County Limerick Letters of the Ordnance Survey Office, Phoenix Park," vol. i., p. 307. Mr. O'Donovan's Letter, dated August 12th, 1840.

<sup>13</sup> See Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 686.

<sup>14</sup> "St. Mocheallog, who erected and consecrated Cill Mocheallog, &c."—Dermot O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," book ii., p. 403.

<sup>15</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. vi., p. 29.

<sup>16</sup> One of these is here submitted: "I next turn to Kilmallock, the ancient name of which as given by Ptolemy was Macollicon—a metathesis for Mallochicon; and the final icon, which is only a Greek termination, being taken away, leaves Moloch, that is, Moloch the Apollo or great divinity of the ancient universe.

"To divert the nations from this misplaced enthusiasm, one of the early converts to Christianity assumed to himself the name of Maloch; and then, prefixing to it the adjunct Kill made it the church of Maloch, instead of the city of Moloch."—O'Brien's "Round Towers of Ireland," chap. xv., pp. 201, 202.

<sup>17</sup> It is within the parishes of St. Peter and St. Paul, in the barony so called, and it is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Limerick," Sheet 47.

<sup>18</sup> See Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Ireland: its Scenery, Character," &c., vol. i., p. 351. In this work may be seen some wood-cut illustrations of it.

<sup>19</sup> Under a heading of this sort, Crofton Croker has written some good lines on Kilmallock:—

of the ecclesiastical and military antiquities there are preserved.<sup>21</sup> The glories of Kilmallock are now, however, among the shadows of the past.<sup>22</sup> It was formerly an important borough, and even a walled town. It is celebrated, both in the ecclesiastical and military annals of Ireland. It had four gateway towers of lofty and imposing character; it can now boast only Blossom's-gate.<sup>23</sup> The Dominican Abbey, on the banks of the Lubach River, is a ruin, still presenting a fine effect. The choir is unrivalled for symmetry and elegance of design.<sup>24</sup> The Abbey of Kilmallock stands, on the east side of the town, and outside of its walls.<sup>25</sup> In addition to this, the visitor to Kilmallock will be attracted to the old mediæval church of the Apostles, St.

"When first I saw Kilmallock's walls,
'Twas in the stillness of moonlight;
And lofty towers and stately halls Frowned darkly then enwrapped in night,
Just touched with tinsel, streaks and gleams,
Mysterious, as a town of dreams."

<sup>20</sup> See her "Rambles in the South of Ireland, during the year 1838," vol. ii., chap. xii., pp. 236 to 305.

<sup>21</sup> Among the 46 sketches of Ordnance Survey Antiquities, referring to the county of Limerick, are the following respecting Kilmallock: 1. The parish church at Kilmallock, with its Round Tower. 2. South Gate of Kilmallock. 3. The chancel of the Abbey of Kilmallock. The foregoing are pen and ink sketches, I believe by the artist, W. F. Wakeman, although his signature is only affixed to the latter. They are drawn on letter paper, in his usual correct style; but, they are not highly finished, although sufficiently so for the purposes of a tasteful and correct engraver. The following are in pencil—some of them with colour shading—and on thick drawing paper, about 16 by 12 inches: 1. The Abbey of Kilmallock, from the west. 2. The gate at Kilmallock, on the Cork road. 3. Abbey of Kilmallock. 4. The parish church of Kilmallock. 5. Round Tower of Kilmallock. 6. Kilmallock Abbey. Although some of these drawings refer to the same object, all are different views, and as the signature of Mr. Wakeman and his initials are affixed to some of them, and as all are very much in his style, I infer, that he must have been the artist, who designed all of them. They are only, however, outline drawings.

<sup>22</sup> See Ferrar's "History of Limerick," part iii., chap. iii., p. 187.

<sup>23</sup> See an article, by Miss Braddon, "Ireland for Tourists," in "Belgravia," August, 1874.

<sup>24</sup> It contains the dilapidated tomb of the last of the White Knights. There are also the ruins of the abbot's private residence, which after the Reformation was occupied, by the civic powers, and so late as 1604, it was inhabited by the White Knight. The site of an ancient hospital for lepers is still called the Spidalfield.

<sup>25</sup> It consists of several divisions, of which the following are the principal: A beautiful chapel, extending to the east of the tower, and measuring 66 feet, 6 inches, in length, on the inside, and 24 feet, in breadth. It is lighted, by six Gothic windows, placed on the south wall, and measuring about 12 feet, in height, and 5 feet, in width, and by a very magnificent one, placed on the east gable, and measuring about 20 feet in height, and 16 feet in width, on the outside, and divided into five compartments, pointed at top. * * * * * The arches from which the tower springs are unusually narrow; they are 7 feet, 6 inches, in width, and 24 feet, in height. Another chapel extends to the west of the tower, and it measures 87 feet, in length, and 24 feet, in breadth. Its south wall is destroyed, but its north wall is perfect, and it contains three windows, and two pointed doorways. Its west gable is in good preservation, and it contains one pointed doorway, and over it, there is a large Gothic window. The side walls of these chapels are about 28 feet, in height, and they vary in thickness, from 2 feet, 9 inches, to 3 feet, 10 inches. The south wall is 2 feet, 9 inches; but, the north wall and west gable are 3 feet, 10 inches, in thickness. The western chapel may be called the Nave, and the eastern the Choir, of the Abbey church, but the choir arch is a miserable one. North from the tower extends another long house, measuring 90 feet, in length, and 17 feet, 4 inches, in breadth, and lighted by 11 windows, of various forms and sizes. To the south of the tower, there is another chapel, or transept, on the north side of which there are two large pointed arches. It measures 38 feet, in length, and 36, in breadth, and it is lighted by three windows, two of which are on the east wall, and a very large one, on the south gable, which is divided into five compartments. There is another small window, on the same gable, near the S.W. corner. The western side of the tower was destroyed, according to tradition, by the great warrior Cromwell. * * * * * The refectory, or as the people call it "dwelling-house," of this abbey, consists of

Peter and St. Paul.<sup>26</sup> The chancel or eastern portion is now used, as the Protestant church of Kilmallock. This portion is  $49\frac{1}{2}$  feet long, by  $25\frac{1}{2}$  feet, in breadth—the walls being 3 feet, in thickness. The western portion, or nave, is 80 feet long, by 65 feet, in breadth: it contains 14 windows, which are all in the pointed style. There are on each side four lofty pointed arches, springing from large square pillars, dividing the centre from the side aisles. There were also arches, springing from these pillars, in a lateral direction, and terminated by the walls, on each side; but, they are now destroyed. The tower is situated, at the north-west corner. It is round, and its style seems a modification of the ancient Irish clochus, but intermediate between it and the Norman tower of subsequent ages.<sup>27</sup> Some writers ascribe the erection of a monastery, in this town, to our saint, without sufficient authority.<sup>28</sup> He is said, likewise, to have discharged the offices of bishop a large kitchen, arched overhead, and over it is a large dining-room. The kitchen is 56 feet, in length, and 19, in breadth, and the height to the top of the vault is about 16 feet. It had two apartments off it, one at the east, and the other, off the south, side. This kitchen has two large fire-places, and it is lighted by five windows, of which four are on the north wall, and one is on the west gable. It was entered, by four pointed doorways; one on the west gable, two on the south wall, and one at the east end, which is now just destroyed. The dining-room over this kitchen is a very spacious one, being 67 feet, 6 inches, in length, and 32 feet, in breadth. It is lighted, by seven quadrangular windows, of which four are on the north wall, and three are on the east gable; but, its south wall, which probably contained several windows, is destroyed. See "County Limerick Letters, Ordnance Survey Office," vol. i., pp. 365 to 368. Mr. O'Donovan's Letter, dated August 12th, 1840.

Kilmallock Church and Round Tower.

<sup>26</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn on the spot by William F. Wakeman, and transferred by him to the wood, was engraved by George A. Hanlon.

<sup>27</sup> There is a small building, at the S.E. corner, formed by the south wall projecting  $19\frac{1}{4}$  feet; the breadth of this building, from E. to W., is 24 feet. It is separated, from the main body of the church, by a pointed arch. The walls of this church, which are parapeted, including the parapet, are about 40 feet in height. See "County Limerick Letters of the Ordnance Survey Office," formerly in the Phoenix Park, vol. i., pp. 368, 369. Mr. O'Donovan's Letter, dated August 12th, 1840.

<sup>28</sup> Thus, Archdall's "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 424. Harris' Ware, vol.

and of abbot. But, these writers would appear to have fallen into an error, in saying, that the old monastery of our saint had been converted into the Protestant church,<sup>29</sup> or that it was even situated on its site.<sup>30</sup> It is possible, that as Kilmallock had become a more remarkable place than Cathuir-mac-Conchaigh, or the church of Kill-Odhraín—where likewise he was venerated—the former town might have been a bishopric, or abbey, over which Mochelloc presided.<sup>31</sup> Kill-odhraín was perhaps only another name for Cathuir-mac-Conchaigh, and this the Calendar of Cashel indicates. Having attained a very old age, our saint died, at a place called Letha<sup>32</sup>—thought to have been Fiodh-Lethan,<sup>33</sup> near Lismore—on the 26th of March, the day for his festival, after A.D. 639, and before A.D. 656, during the joint reigns of Connall and Kellach.<sup>34</sup> Letha was a name, given by our historians to Latium, or Italy; and, there are writers, according to Maguire, who say, that our saint died, in Rome. Others again tell us, that he departed at Kildachelloc, in Hy Cairpre, of Munster.<sup>35</sup> The festival of this holy man, with that of the two Sinchells, is found in the Festilog of St. Ængus,<sup>36</sup> at the 26th of March. The name Mochelloc, son of Tulodraín, of Calthir mic Conaich, is inserted, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>37</sup> at the 26th of March. The Calendar of Cashel,<sup>38</sup> Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>39</sup> and Cathal Maguire,<sup>40</sup> mark his festival, at

"Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 266, and the local historians, Fitzgerald and M'Gregor, who say: "An Abbey was founded in this town, by St. Mochollog, who died, between the years 639 and 656; this is now the parish church, and is kept in good repair."—"History, Topography, and Antiquities of the County and City of Limerick," vol. i., p. 340.

<sup>29</sup> See Ferrar's "History of Limerick," part iii., chap. iii., p. 187.

<sup>30</sup> This Mr. O'Donovan shows, in this following statement: "The foundation of the old church, to which, according to tradition, the name Cill Mocheallog was originally given still remains; it is situated on the south side of a hill on rising ground, about a quarter of a mile N.W. of the town of Kilmallock. There are only about two feet in height of the walls of this old church now remaining, and they are nearly covered with earth and grass. The length of St. Mocheallog's church is 22½ feet, its breadth 12 feet 3 inches, and the thickness of its walls 3 feet. The few stones of the foundation which can now be seen are large; and no lime-mortar can be seen between them. There is a small graveyard attached to this ruin, but it is scarcely ever used at present. Very considerable remains of the town wall of Kilmallock are still visible. One of the gates with its tower is in good preservation; and a square tower or castle stands in good preservation, near the west end of the town. Many ancient houses are yet to be seen in this old town, of which the artists should make careful sketches, before the hand of improvement disfigures them all."—"County Limerick Letters, Ordnance Survey Office," vol. i., pp. 369, 370. Mr. O'Donovan's Letter, dated August 12th, 1840.

<sup>31</sup> Dr. Lanigan remarks, that although he finds this saint honoured, with the title of bishop, he suspects, it is only on weak authority; and, he adds in a note: "Mochelloc is not called bishop in any of the Irish Calendars quoted by Colgan." See, "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xvii., sect. vi., p. 29, and n. 77, p. 30.

<sup>32</sup> According to St. Ængus, the Culdee.

<sup>33</sup> In his comments on the "Festilogium" of Saint Ængus, Maguire states, that Letha was the name of a wood, in the Munster Decies, in which the ancient city of Cathair-mac-Conchaídh was formerly situated.

<sup>34</sup> These were sons to King Maelcob.

<sup>35</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvi. Martii, nn. 10, 11, p. 749.

<sup>36</sup> The following extract, and its translation, have been furnished, by Professor O'Looney:—

A. III. KL. hilletha uorochpatar mochelloc iar lathib peil na rinchell rútham cille aroble achro.

"In Letha they perished—
Mochelloc after many days,
The feast of two ever-living Sin-chells,
Of vast Cill Achad."

<sup>37</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix.

<sup>38</sup> There is read: "S. Mochellocus de Kill-Odhraín, de Cathuir mac Conchuid."

<sup>39</sup> He says: "S. Kellenus filius Tuladh-rani in regione," &c.

<sup>40</sup> His account seems to be accompanied with doubts, regarding this saint's identity and place.

this same date.<sup>41</sup> In the O'Clery's Martyrology<sup>42</sup> is found, at this date, as an entry, and within brackets: [Mocheallog, who died in Letavia.—Felire Aonghuis.] The Carthusian Martyrology distinguishes a Mottellog, Abbot and Confessor, from this saint, who is named Mokellock, Bishop and Confessor. There is hardly a doubt, but this is the Motalogus, mentioned at the 26th of March, in the anonymous list, published by O'Sullivan Beare.<sup>43</sup> However, these names only characterize but one and the same person; the denomination being somewhat varied by different writers.<sup>44</sup> The Kalendar of Drummond, at the vii. of the April Kalends, or 26th of March, commemorates: In Hibernia, the Holy Confessors, Mochelloc and Sinchele, who, on this day, went to Christ.<sup>45</sup>

ARTICLE II.—ST. SINCEALL, ABBOT OF CILL-ACHAIDHDROMFOTA, NOW KILLEAGH, KING'S COUNTY. [Fifth and Sixth Centuries.] It was thought, in the seventeenth century, that the Life of this saint existed, in Ireland; and, from allusions made, it is even supposed, that the author of the Martyrologium Salisburiense,<sup>1</sup> and John of Kerkersteed,<sup>2</sup> had perused it, as they state, that many of his miracles were on record. Colgan has drawn, from various sources, the Acts of a holy man,<sup>3</sup> who is called Senchellus Senior,<sup>4</sup> by some writers, to distinguish him from a Senchellus Junior, a relative, who lived at the same place, as a monk, or abbot, or who died there. The former flourished, towards the close of the fifth century, in Lagenia. When referring to St. Sinchellus, Ab. de Kill-achadh, at this day, the Bollandists<sup>5</sup> desire to reserve further notices, for the 25th of June. He was the son of Cennfhionnan, or Kennfinnan, and ninth in descent, from Cathaer Mor, according to the accounts of some. We learn, that Kennfinnan was son to Imchad, son of Cruac, son to Dulgeus, son of Imchad, son to Brelac, son of Lugad, son to Laurar, son of Corbmac, son to Cucorb, son of Mogorb, &c., according to the Genealogies of the Irish Saints.<sup>6</sup> This was a renowned Leinster family line. Now, Senchell Junior<sup>7</sup> had for his father, Corcran, son of Erc, son to the already-mentioned Cruac, as our Genealogists relate.<sup>8</sup> As we have seen, in the previous article, some authorities will have the festival of both holy men, at this date. Thus, the published Martyrology of Donegal<sup>9</sup> mentions on this day, and within brackets: [Da-Sinceall.]<sup>10</sup> We are informed,<sup>11</sup>

<sup>41</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvi. Martii, nn. 10, 11, p. 749.

<sup>42</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

<sup>43</sup> In Henry Fitzsimon's Catalogue, and on authority of the Carthusian Martyrology, St. Motalogus, Abbot, occurs at the 25th of March. See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 56.

<sup>44</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvi. Martii, p. 749, nn. 10, 11.

<sup>45</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," pp. 8, 9.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Published, at London, A.D. 1526.

<sup>2</sup> In a work, "De Sanctis Præsulibus Iliberniæ."

<sup>3</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvi. Martii. De S. Senchello Abbate et Episc. de Kill-Achuidh, pp. 747, 748.

<sup>4</sup> Sir Charles Coote, quoting the Annals of Ulster, calls him St. Sincell Mac Genenain. See "Statistical Survey of the King's County," Introduction, p. 13.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 607. They remark, that Witford calls him Finchellus—a typographical error.

<sup>6</sup> Chapter xx.

<sup>7</sup> His feast is generally referred to the 25th of June.

<sup>8</sup> See ibid.

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

<sup>10</sup> In note, Dr. Todd here says, "The clause within brackets is in the more recent hand. But the 'Dasinceall' of the F. Aong. is evidently the same as the Sincheall above mentioned; Da for Mo. Nevertheless, a gloss in the Brussels MS. of the F. Aong. says, 'Da noem cognominer,' 'two saints of the same name,' as if Dasinceall meant 'two Sinchealls;' and the mention of 'old Sincheall,' in the text, seems to hint that there was another."

that at Cill-achaidh dromo-fota, in Ui Failghe, Sinchell Junior was a priest, and Sinchell Senior, a bishop. Again, we learn, that there were twelve bishops, and twelve pilgrims, with many other companions, in Cill Achaidh Droma Fota, according to Duald Mac Firbis' account.<sup>12</sup> Several of these holy persons are named, in an ancient Litany, attributed to St. Ængus the Culdee.<sup>13</sup> Now, this place is identical with the present Killeigh,<sup>14</sup> a village, in the parish and barony of Geshill, in the King's County. A St. Senell<sup>15</sup> of Kill da reis, a campanarius of St. Patrick, is supposed<sup>16</sup> to have been identical with the St. Sinchell, venerated on the 26th of March. Perhaps, his cell was Carcuir Sinell, or "the retreat of Sinell," in Lough Melge,<sup>17</sup> according to the conjecture of Colgan.<sup>18</sup> Before the Elder Sinchell settled at Killeigh, however, as we are told, St. Ailbeus,<sup>19</sup> an Abbot, had abandoned in his favour the church of Cluain-Damh,<sup>20</sup> on the banks of the River Liffey, in the province of Lagenia. At this time, our saint was searching for a place, in order to fix his habitation. We find him classed, among the disciples of St. Patrick.<sup>21</sup> How long he remained at Cluain-Damh, we have no means for ascertaining; but, he is said, afterwards, to have opened a great religious establishment, and a school, at Killeigh. One hundred and fifty holy monks are stated to have been there, under the two Sinchells; besides the twelve Bishops and Pilgrims or strangers, who were interred, in the ancient cemetery of the place.<sup>22</sup> This was the emporium of piety and science, in the time of the Elder Sinchell, whose Rule of Life for his Religious, full of wisdom, and of good and ascetic decrees, was extant, to Colgan's knowledge. Our forefathers in the Faith had an unbounded veneration for this holy man.<sup>23</sup> According to Maguire's and Duald Mac Firbis' account, 330 years was his age, and others have adopted it, as having been the very extraordinary span of his life. However, Colgan thinks this statement was owing to the wrong insertion of numerals, and that his age should be reduced to 130 years. St. Sincheall died A.D. 548, according to Duald Mac Firbis, the Annals of the Four Masters<sup>24</sup> and of Ulster,<sup>25</sup> while the "Chronicon Scotorum" has 551, as the year of his death. On the 26th of March, we find set down in the

<sup>12</sup> By Duald Mac Firbis.

<sup>13</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 92, 93.

<sup>14</sup> It states the names of the Bishops of Cill Achidh, viz.: three Budocis, three Conocis, Morgini, six Vedgonis, six Beuanis, six Bibis, nine Glonalis, nine Ercocinis, nine Grucimnis, twelve Uennocis, twelve Contumanis, twelve Onocis, Senchilli, Britanus, from Britain, Cerrui, from Armenia. See the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record," vol. iii., May, 1867, pp. 392, 393. The names are given differently, by Colgan, in some cases.

<sup>15</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the King's County," Sheet 25.

<sup>16</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xcvi., p. 167.

<sup>17</sup> By Colgan.

<sup>18</sup> Now Lough Melvin, between the counties of Leitrim and Fermanagh.

<sup>19</sup> See ibid., n. 120, p. 188.

<sup>20</sup> He would seem to have been identical with St. Ailbe, Bishop of Emly, venerated at the 12th of September, although in Colgan's work an evident error, of December, is introduced.

<sup>21</sup> Colgan thus interprets it, "de Prato Boum."

<sup>22</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 269.

<sup>23</sup> Several interesting objects of antiquity are to be seen there. See "Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol. ii., p. 469.

<sup>24</sup> Of him, this character was given, after his death:—

"The men of heaven, the men of earth,
A surrounding host,
Thought that the day of judgment
Was the death of Sincheall.

"There came not, there will not come from Adam,
One more austere, more strict in piety;
There came not, there will not come all say it,
Another saint more welcome to the men of heaven."

Festilog of St. Ængus, and in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>26</sup> the name of Sinchell, Abbot of Chilli Achaidh. Marianus O'Gorman<sup>27</sup> and Maguire have like entries. The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>28</sup> registers, on this day, the festival of Sincheall, Abbot, of Cill-Achaidh-dromfota. And, under the same heading, Duaid Mac Firbis enters the Elder Sinchell. On his feast day, the liberal Margaret Calwagh O'Connor Faly's wife, who died A.D. 1451, was accustomed to give great largesses at Killaichy,<sup>29</sup> and to entertain most hospitably numbers of people.

ARTICLE III.—ST. GARBHAN, OF DUNGARVAN, COUNTY OF WATERFORD, OR OF AGHOLD, COUNTY OF WICKLOW. [Supposed to belong to the Sixth or Seventh Century.] The festival of this saint is celebrated, on the 26th of March, according to our Irish Martyrologies; and, on this day, his Acts are given, by Father John Colgan.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists observe, in their brief commemoration, that Garbanus Abbas de Achadh-abhall is in the Martyrology of Marianus O'Gorman, while Finianus de Achaidh-Garbhain, is in the Martyrology of Tallagh, while both seem to be regarded as identical, by Colgan.<sup>2</sup> St. Garvan, or Garbban, was born in the sixth century, according to received accounts. These, however, are very obscure; for, the Garban of Achadh-abhall has been confounded, with the Finian of Achaidh-Garbhain. The present holy man is thought to have received his religious training, from St. Finbarr,<sup>3</sup> in the monastery of Loch-Eirc. This is the supposed site of the present Cork city, according to some writers; while others state, it was identical with Gougane Barra. Here, Garbhan is said to have become distinguished, for piety and learning. About the beginning of the seventh century, when he had attained celebrity, St. Garvan was placed over a church, then called Achadh Garbhain. Antiquaries—for the most part following Colgan as an authority—have conjectured, that it occupies the present site of Dungarvan,<sup>4</sup> a seaport town, in the county of Waterford.<sup>5</sup> He ruled over a monastery, established at some place, similarly called; for, the Martyrology of Donegal styles him, Abbot of Achadh Garbhain. Harris<sup>6</sup> and Archdall<sup>7</sup> follow the foregoing conjecture,<sup>8</sup> which they assume to be an absolute statement; while the latter writer has it, that Garbhan, a disciple of Barr, founded an

<sup>24</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. i., pp. 186, 187, and nn. (w, x.) Ibid.

<sup>25</sup> See Sir Charles Coote's "Statistical Survey of the King's County," Introduction, pp. 13, 14.

<sup>26</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Sinchell ab Chilli Achaidh.

<sup>27</sup> He states: "Senchillus senior, Abbas de Kill-achadh."

<sup>28</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

<sup>29</sup> A curious account of this celebration is on record. See Dudley Mac Firbis' "Annals of Ireland from A.D. 1443 to 1468," "Miscellany of the Irish Archæological Society," vol. i., pp. 227, 228.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvi. Martii. De S. Garvano, Abbate, pp. 750, 751, and n. (1.)

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 606.

<sup>3</sup> The feast of this saint is kept, on the 25th of September, and the reader is referred to his Life, written for that day.

<sup>4</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Waterford," Sheet 31.

<sup>5</sup> "Dungarvan is a good fishing town, on a small harbour, and enjoys a considerable share of the coasting trade. It is supplied with fresh water from the River Phintix, by an aqueduct of about six miles in length."—Beaufort's "Memoir of a Map of Ireland," p. 100.

<sup>6</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "The Antiquities of Ireland," chap. xxxviii., p. 266.

<sup>7</sup> See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 188.

<sup>8</sup> On this topic, Rev. Dr. Lanigan remarks: "The conjecture itself is very weak. Achadh and Dun have quite different meanings; the one signifies a field and the other a fort; and the town of Dungarvan, in all probability, owes its name not to a monk but to a chieftain. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xiv., sect. iv., n. 69, pp. 318, 319.

abbey at Dungarvan, although he could not discover any vestige of it. The town<sup>9</sup> itself is situated on a point of land, formed by the estuaries of the rivers Brickey and Calligan. There are considerable ruins of the walls still remaining, as also of the principal castle, which is situated in the centre of the town.<sup>10</sup> Our saint was a different person from St. Garbhan, son to Lugad, and a disciple of St. Kevin,<sup>11</sup> who was venerated, on the 9th of July,<sup>12</sup> near Dublin; as likewise, from St. Garbhan, bishop and son to Ænguss, whose festival was celebrated, on the 21st of November.<sup>13</sup> Such conclusion is sufficiently established, because the father to St. Garbhan, of Dungarvan, was named Finnbar. Some doubt has been entertained, that our saint established a religious house at that place. The 26th of March was probably the day of his death—the year is unknown. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>14</sup> simply records a different name, at the 26th of March, as Fintan,<sup>15</sup> Achaidh Garbhain. Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>16</sup> and Cathal Maguire,<sup>17</sup> enter his festival, at this day. In the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>18</sup> we find mentioned, on to-day, as having been venerated, Garbhan, Abbot of Achadh. This, add the O'Clerys, may be Garbhán, of Cill Garbhain, Abbot of Achadh-abhall,<sup>19</sup> and now known as Aghowle,<sup>20</sup> or Aghold, in the county of Wicklow. If so, as they are pleased to state, his mother was Roignach, sister of Finnian. There is a parish of Kilgarvan,<sup>21</sup> in the county of Wexford. There, also, is to be found a St. Garvan's well, where a patron was formerly held; but, the festival day is not now remembered.<sup>22</sup>

ARTICLE IV.—ST. GOBBAN, ABBOT, OF ARD-DAIRINNSI. The name of this holy person is entered, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 26th of March, as Abbot of Airdni Dairindsí. Some notices are to be found, in Colgan's great work, at the same date;<sup>2</sup> but, then, a great deal of uncertainty prevails, as to whether he was a Gobban, who is mentioned in the Life of St. Ailbe,<sup>3</sup> as having been one of his disciples, and who is regarded as the patron of Kinsale, or a St. Gobban, mentioned, as Abbot of Leighlin, and who is noticed, in the Acts of St. Laserian.<sup>4</sup> Doubt, regarding the site of his religious house and place likewise exists. One of the Aran Islands is

<sup>9</sup> It "was incorporated by an Act of Parliament A.D. 1463, and declared to be one of the ancientest Honours belonging to the Crown of England in Ireland."—Campbell's "Political Survey of Great Britain," vol. i., book i., chap. vi., p. 247, note (u.)

<sup>10</sup> "It is still occupied, as a military post." See "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. v., n. (o), p. 1676.

<sup>11</sup> For a notice of this saint, see the Life of St. Kevin, at the 3rd of June, chap. vi.

<sup>12</sup> According to the Martyrology of Tallagh, the Calendar of Cashel, and Marianus.

<sup>13</sup> The Genealogies of the Irish Saints, chapter iv., Marianus, Maguire, and the Donegal Martyrology, are authorities.

<sup>14</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has FINNAN ACHHO.

<sup>15</sup> This is probably a mistake for Garbhan.

<sup>16</sup> He has, "Garbanus de Achadh."

<sup>17</sup> Who calls him Abbot of Achadh Garbhain.

<sup>18</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

<sup>19</sup> In a MS. annotation by William M.

Hennessy, I find "Leacan-Phupail (The Pavilion flag) in Achadh-Abhla. See Book of Lismore, p. 67 b. Aghoold, County Kildare or Wicklow."

<sup>20</sup> The townlands of Upper and Lower Aghowle, in a parish of the same name, and in the barony of Shillelagh, are shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheet 42. The parish itself is on Sheets 37, 42, 43.

<sup>21</sup> It is in the barony of Shelmaliere West, and it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Wicklow," Sheets 31, 35, 36.

<sup>22</sup> See the "County of Wexford Records, belonging to the Irish Ordnance Survey," vol. ii.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy enters Gobban ab. ACHHOI DAIHO.

<sup>2</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvi. Martii. De S. Gobano Abbate de Airdne Dairinnsi, p. 750.

<sup>3</sup> His festival is kept, on the 12th of September.

<sup>4</sup> His feast occurs, at the 18th of April.

called Airdne, in old documents; while there was a place, named Dair-inis, in the territory of Hy-Kinsellach, in the province of Leinster, and another near Lismore, in Munster. Yet, none of these are known, with any degree of certainty, to have been his place. The Bollandists,<sup>5</sup> also notice him. One conjecture has it, that he may have been the Mo-Gaban, or Goban, brother to St. Sedonius, or Sedna,<sup>6</sup> a Bishop, and a disciple of St. Senan,<sup>7</sup> Abbot of Scatterry Island. Again, Colgan thinks, that he may have been identical with Gobban,<sup>8</sup> the celebrated father of a thousand monks, and who afterwards ruled over the church of Kill-Lamruidhe, near the mountain of Sliabh na mbhan bfionn, or Gobban, of Teg-da-Goban, near the River Bann, in Ulster. However this may be, the festival of Gobban, Abbot of Ard Dairinnsi, occurs, in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman, of Maguire, and of Donegal,<sup>9</sup> on this day.

ARTICLE V.—ST. LAPPAN, OR LAPPANUS. A record is found, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 26th of March, regarding a St. Lappan. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> notice him, at the same date, as Lappanus. Again, Lappan is set down, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> as having a festival, at this date, but without any relation to a locality.

ARTICLE VI.—FEAST OF ST. FINTAN, A BISHOP. Formerly, in the Irish Church, the festival of St. Fintan, a Bishop, was celebrated, on the seventh day of the April Kalends, corresponding with the 26th of March; and, his Office was comprised, in nine Lessons.<sup>1</sup> It may be, he was not different from the St. Finianus, of Achaidh-Garbhain,<sup>2</sup> to whose name attention has been already drawn, on this day, and in a previous article.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. MOCHTA, OF INIS-MOCHTA, NOW INISHMOUTHY, OR INISHMOT, COUNTY OF MEATH. [Ninth and Tenth Centuries.] Different from another celebrated saint of this name, and connected with Louth, is the present holy man.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have a notice of him. We find, on this day recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> the name Mochta of Inis-Mochta. This locality has been identified with Inishmouthy, county of Meath, by William M. Hennessy.<sup>4</sup> It is also called Inishmot,<sup>5</sup> now a parish, in the barony of Lower Slane. The ruins of Inis-Mochta church are still to be seen, on a romantic spot of ground, containing about two acres. A solitary wall only remains, at the present time; and, latterly, the graveyard has been neglected for interments.<sup>6</sup> This locality was formerly an island. At

<sup>5</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 606.

<sup>6</sup> See an account of him, at the 10th of March.

<sup>7</sup> His feast occurs, at the 8th of March.

<sup>8</sup> His festival is set down, at the 6th of December.

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Lappani.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 606.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> According to the MS. in T.C.D., classed, B. 3. 12.

<sup>2</sup> Or, as it seems to us, from the small and indistinct letters of the Franciscan copy of the Tallagh Martyrology ΔΙΡΩΝΙ ΘΑΙΡΩ.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See Reeve's Adamnan's "Life of St. Columba," n. (p), p. 6.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 606.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>4</sup> MS. note to his copy of this work.

<sup>5</sup> It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Meath," Sheets 6, 7.

<sup>6</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of present, the site is surrounded by low, marshy ground, which is frequently covered with water, during the winter season.<sup>7</sup> The name of this place may be rendered, in English, "the Island of Mochta." His festival was celebrated here, on the 26th of March.<sup>8</sup> This saint appears to have flourished, in the early part of the tenth century. The death of Mochta of the Island, son to Cearnachan, priest of Armagh, is recorded at A.D. 922.<sup>9</sup> There can hardly be a doubt, but that he is identical with the present saint.

---

ARTICLE VIII.—FEAST OF ST. CORBMAC. [Fifth or Sixth Century.] The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>1</sup> registers St. Corbmac, as having been venerated, on this day. At the same date, Colgan has given the Acts of this saint.<sup>2</sup> We have preferred, however, treating about him, at the 13th of December, where his Life may be read. The Bollandists<sup>3</sup> have a notice of him, at this day.

---

ARTICLE IX.—ST. CILLEN, OR KILLENUS. The name of Cillen occurs, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 26th of March, and, apparently, in conjunction with the saint's name, which immediately succeeds. He is thought, by Colgan, to have been identical, probably, with a St. Chillin,<sup>2</sup> mentioned as a disciple of St. Senan, or Senanus, Abbot of Iniscattery, in the county of Clare. According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> we find that Cillen, son of Tolodhran, in Deése-Mumhan, had a festival, on this day. The Bollandists<sup>4</sup> insert the feast of Killenus, at the 26th of March.

---

ARTICLE X.—ST. CARTHACH, SON OF ERETHAIDHE, BISHOP. An entry is found, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at this same date, March 26th, of Cartach mac Airbertaigh. The Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>2</sup> on this day, likewise, registers the name of Carthach, son of Erbthaidhe, Bishop.

---

ARTICLE XI.—ST. MONTANUS. According to Marianus O'Gorman and Maguire, a St. Montanus was venerated, at the 26th of March. The Scho-

---

Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xvi., p. 340.

<sup>7</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., n. (c), pp. 610, 611.

<sup>8</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiii., note, p. 549.

<sup>9</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 610, 611.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvi. Martii. Vita S. Corbmaci, pp. 751 to 756.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 607.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr.

Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Cilliani, with some more indistinct lettering.

<sup>2</sup> See a notice of him, in the Life of St. Senan, at the 8th of March, vol. iii., chap. ii., n. 42.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 606.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy, I can only make out Cærtae mac—the rest being illegible to me.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 86, 87.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Trias Thaum.

liast on Marianus makes him a bishop. Colgan did not chose to say, whether the maritime town of Kill-Montain, or "the cell of Montan," in Lagenia, had its name from the present, or from that St. Montan, venerated on the 2nd of March.<sup>1</sup>

ARTICLE XII.—ST. CEANANNAN. This name is found, although strangely placed, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> on the 26th of March. In the Acts of St. Patrick, he is said to have built a church, in the territory of Cathrigia, which was formerly known, as Domnach Coinri. Over this, he placed two of his disciples, who are called the two Connennans.<sup>2</sup> Whether or not, the present saint was one of these appears to be doubtful. As we have already seen, at the 12th of March, it is thought, that the present holy man may be identified with the St. Kennanac, or Ceannannach, who was venerated, on the Middle Island of Aran. According to a popular tradition, Concaunnaun, and the seven sons of kings, are supposed to rest, in the oratory, at Inismaan. Dr. Petrie describes the very ancient church, called Tempull Ceannanach,<sup>3</sup> on Inis Meadhoin, or the Middle Island, of Aran.<sup>4</sup> The stones used are of immense size. One of them is not less than eighteen feet in length, which is the entire external breadth of the church. The little oratory of this saint,<sup>5</sup> known as Killcannaun, is near the sea-shore, to the south. A much-used burial-ground, containing many fine flag tombs, is there; and, not far removed from its site, on the ocean's verge, another cemetery has been found. In Dr. Petrie's great work,<sup>6</sup> there is a beautiful engraving of the curious triangular-headed window, in the east wall of Kilcananagh church, on the Middle Island of Aran, as viewed interiorly. There, the relics of Concaunnaun, and of these holy persons, called the seven sons of kings, were kept, according to Dr. O'Donovan and Mr. Wakeman.<sup>7</sup> Ceanannan is mentioned, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>8</sup> as having had a festival, on this date.

ARTICLE XIII.—ST. MOLOCCA, OR MOLAGA, OF LILCACH, COUNTY OF MEATH. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> the name Molocca, of Lilchaich, at the 26th of March, is found inserted.<sup>2</sup> We are not able to state, whether or not, there is any connexion between the present holy man, and him, similarly named, at the 22nd of this month. We find, moreover, on the 26th day of March, the festival of Molocca is simply entered, in the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>3</sup> His place is not named.

turga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. iii., cap. xlii., pp. 157, 158, and n. 74, p. 186.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix.

<sup>2</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. cxxx., p. 146, and nn. 201, 202, p. 182. Also, Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 267.

<sup>3</sup> See "The Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, anterior to the Anglo-Norman Invasion," part ii., sect. iii., subs. 2, pp. 188, 189.

<sup>4</sup> Besides this, there was a church, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary; both being subject to the parish of St. Endeus, in the time of Colgan. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvi. Appendix ad Vitam S. Endei, cap. vii., p. 715.

<sup>5</sup> Father Concannon, P.P., of Aran Islands, told me, St. Concaunnaun was patron of Ballynakill parish, in the county of Galway.

<sup>6</sup> "The Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, anterior to the Anglo-Norman Invasion." See part ii., sect. iii., subs. 2, p. 184.

<sup>7</sup> See Duffy's "Magazine," for an article on the Aran Islands.

<sup>8</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix.

<sup>2</sup> In the Franciscan copy, I can only read the entry molocca. There is some small indistinct lettering beneath.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

Twenty-seventh Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. GELASIUS, OR GIOLLA-MAC-LIAG, ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH, COUNTY OF ARMAGH.

[ELEVENTH AND TWELFTH CENTURIES.]

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION—AUTHORITIES—YOUTH AND EARLY EDUCATION OF ST. GELASIUS—HE BECOMES A CANON AND AFTERWARDS AN ABBOT AT DERRY—CALLED TO THE PRIMACY OF ARMAGH—HIS VISITATIONS AND WORKS OF RELIGION, PEACE AND MERCY.

THE present holy man effected great and glorious results, in the important state and office to which he was called. Colgan has published his Acts, at the 27th day of March.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> are very succinct, in their observations regarding him. In Harris' Ware,<sup>3</sup> there is a considerable space given to his Memoirs, which, however, are chiefly extracted from Colgan, and from our Irish Annals. The Rev. Dr. O'Connor<sup>4</sup> and Rev. Dr. Lanigan<sup>5</sup> have their respective notices of him; as also, the Rev. Robert King,<sup>6</sup> Miss M. F. Cusack,<sup>7</sup> and Rev. Sylvester Malone.<sup>8</sup>

The Yellow Book of Lecan calls the father of this saint, Diarmaid, who was the son of Rory.<sup>9</sup> One of the most distinguished poets of the period, the father of this celebrated bishop, was esteemed a man of great learning. Wherefore, his son is called Antonomastically,<sup>10</sup> "the son of the Poet," or Gilla-Mac-Leigh, i.e., Gilla, son of the Scholar. We are informed, likewise, that Gilla, or as the name has been Latinized, Gelasius,<sup>11</sup>—by the Irish he was usually called Mac-Liag<sup>12</sup>—was the son of Rory,<sup>13</sup> and that he was born in the year 1087, or 1088.<sup>14</sup> However, in a passage from Maolbrigte, quoted by Dr. O'Connor,<sup>15</sup> our saint is called Mac Liag mac mic Ruadri, as if grandson of Roderick, while Mac-Liag seems to be explained, "son of the man of poems." During his youth, he addicted himself to useful studies, while piety and contempt for worldly advantages actuated his conduct. On growing up, this admirable servant of Christ embraced a monastic state. He became a Canon, or rather—as we are told—an Erenach,<sup>16</sup> in the Columban Abbey of

ARTICLE I.—CHAPTER I.—<sup>1</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvii. Martii. De S. Gelasio, Abbate Primum Derensi, et postea Archiepiscopo Ardmachano. Ex variis, pp. 772 to 779.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 686.

<sup>3</sup> See vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," pp. 57 to 61.

<sup>4</sup> See "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus i., pars. ii., Prolegomena, p. 144.

<sup>5</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iv., chap. xxvii., sect. i., and nn. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, pp. 102 to 105.

<sup>6</sup> See "Memoir Introductory to the Early History of the Primacy of Armagh," pp. 102 to 110.

<sup>7</sup> See "The Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. x., pp. 549, 550.

<sup>8</sup> See "Church History of Ireland," chap. i., p. 26.

<sup>9</sup> See Miss Cusack's "Life of St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland," chap. x., p. 549.

<sup>10</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 57.

<sup>11</sup> So is he called, by Marianus O'Gorman, and by other writers.

<sup>12</sup> In Irish Leighin signifies "a scholar," and Liagh, "a physician."

<sup>13</sup> See "Memoir of the City and North-Western Liberties of Londonderry," part ii., sect. 2, p. 29.

<sup>14</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iv., chap. xxvii., sect. i., p. 102.

<sup>15</sup> See "Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores," tomus i., pars. ii., Prolegomena, p. 144.

<sup>16</sup> Dr. Lanigan considers this title, as equivalent to Archdeacon.

Derry.<sup>17</sup> In the thirty-third year of his age, A.D. 1120, according to Colgan,<sup>18</sup> he was elected abbot over this religious community. However, according to Dr. Lanigan, his appointment, as abbot over Derry, was not prior to 1121.<sup>19</sup> He governed it, for sixteen years; and, about the time of his accession, the Irish Annals<sup>20</sup> record the death of Domhnall, son of Ardghar Mac Lochlainn, King of Ireland, at Doire-Choluim-Chille. He was a pious and munificent monarch. During the year 1824, Ardgar, the son of Aedh, Prince of Aileach, had rashly violated the right of sanctuary, which the monastery of Derry enjoyed, on account of St. Columba, its first founder. A tumult was raised in consequence, and that prince was killed in the streets of Derry. This was deemed to have been a deserved punishment, inflicted on him, because of his impiety.<sup>21</sup> We read, that Finn Ua Conaingen, who was Erenach of Derry, for a time, departed this life, A.D. 1124, and what seems yet more singular, Bebbin,<sup>22</sup> a female Erenach of the place, died on the 23rd of December, A.D. 1134.<sup>23</sup> During the last years of his government over that Abbey, Gelasius had the misfortune, on the 30th of March, A.D. 1135,<sup>24</sup> to see the whole city of Derry, with its churches, reduced to ashes.<sup>25</sup> Such misfortunes are of frequent recurrence, in that age; for, Irish cities and towns—perhaps also churches and religious establishments—were very generally constructed of perishable materials, viz.: wood, wattles, and thatch.<sup>26</sup> The holy abbot felt the deepest affliction, because he had not the power to repair that loss, before he was advanced to a still higher office.<sup>27</sup>

He was consecrated Archbishop of Armagh, in the year 1137,<sup>28</sup> when the great St. Malachy O'Morgair<sup>29</sup> had resigned this distinguished position.<sup>30</sup> This year, too, our Annals relate a change of abbots at Ard-Macha, viz.: the Airchinneach of Doire Choluim Cille taking the place of Niall, son of Aedh.<sup>31</sup> The newly-appointed Archbishop, in A.D. 1138, undertook the whole primate Circuit of Munster, as his duty of Visitation. During this progress, Gelasius reformed whatever abuses he found prevailing.<sup>32</sup> It would seem, <sup>17</sup> If we are to credit Harris, "it is certain the Abbey of Derry owed its filiation to the House of St. Peter and St. Paul of Armagh, which past question was of the Augustin Congregation."—Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 57. But, the Rev. Dr. Lanigan very clearly shows, how mistaken both Ware and Harris had been, in their statements. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iv., chap. xxvii., sect. i., n. 7, pp. 104, 105. In like manner, and without just warrant, the Benedictines have claimed both this holy man, and the Abbey of Derry, as belonging to their Order.

<sup>18</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. De S. Gelasio, cap. iii., and n. 8, pp. 773, 779.

<sup>19</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iv., chap. xxvii., sect. i., n. 8, p. 105.

<sup>20</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," this event is set down, under A.D. 1121. See vol. ii., pp. 1012, 1013.

<sup>21</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. De S. Gelasio, cap. v., p. 773.

<sup>22</sup> She was daughter of Mac Conchaille.

<sup>23</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1022, 1023, and 1046, 1047.

<sup>24</sup> See "Memoir of the City and North-Western Liberties of Londonderry," part ii., sect. i., p. 19.

<sup>25</sup> This burning has been assigned to March 30th, A.D. 1135, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1048, 1049.

<sup>26</sup> It has been asserted, by Pinkerton, that even Celtic churches, as well as houses, had been built of wattles. See "Enquiry into the History of Scotland," vol. ii., p. 141.

<sup>27</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. De S. Gelasio, cap. vi., p. 773.

<sup>28</sup> Colgan endeavours to show, that Gelasius was elevated to this dignity, in 1136, but he fails to prove it, as Dr. Lanigan properly states, in his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iv., chap. xxvii., sect. i., n. 5, p. 103.

<sup>29</sup> See his Life, at the 3rd of November.

<sup>30</sup> See Father Stephen White's "Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. iv., p. 33.

<sup>31</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1054 to 1057.

that he had an assistant, while absent on that tour; for, on the 29th of January, 1139, we learn, that Maelbrighde Ua Brolchain, or Mæl-Bridgid-O'Brolcain, died.<sup>33</sup> He is said to have been a Suffragan to our prelate; and, some writers call him Bishop of Armagh. He was a man of great virtue and distinction.

The following year, Gelasius visited, for the first time, and as the successor of St. Patrick, the province of Connaught. He was received there, as primate, for the churches were adjusted to his jurisdiction. With great reverence and courtesy, tribute was decreed to him, by King Toirdhealbhach Ua Conchobhair, or Tordelvac O'Connor, and by the chiefs, or nobles. He bestowed a blessing on them, and after arranging all ecclesiastical affairs and rights, thence he returned to Armagh, bearing with him many valuable presents. The greater part of the year 1143 was occupied, by the primate, in effecting a great work of peace and charity, and in composing differences between two rival opponents. A war had broken out, between the recognised Monarch of Ireland, Tordelvac, and Murchadh Ua Macleachlainn, or Murrough O'Melaghlin, King of Meath. The latter had been under the protection of the relics and guarantees of Ireland. Gelasius aided, in procuring his liberty. The Monarch O'Connor, pretending to levy a host for the invasion of Munster, advanced his Conacian forces against Ua Maeleachlainn. He was thus surprised, and made a prisoner, while the hostages of Meath were brought with him to Dunmore, by King Tordelvac. Filled with zeal, to promote the glory of God and the interests of the Church, Gelasius strenuously set about rebuilding the Cathedral, on a grand scale, at Armagh, with other religious houses adjoining. As these were to be erected in stone, so a great quantity of lime must be used for cement. To accomplish that end, he is said to have erected, in 1145, a limekiln of unusual dimensions. This work extended sixty feet, on each of its parts, in dimension.<sup>34</sup> Three years, afterwards, this prelate and the illustrious St. Malachy O'Morgair, as the Pope's Legate, held a Synod in the church of Holm-Patrick, near Skerries, in the present county of Dublin. We are informed, that fifteen bishops, two hundred priests, and many more of the clergy, assisted at its sessions. The subject of their conference related to matters of reformation. The Pall was an object desired by the clergy, and they unanimously agreed, to send Malachy as their spokesman to the Pope, in order to represent their wishes. This glorious Confessor died the same year, while on his journey to Rome, at Clairvaux, in France.<sup>35</sup> Archbishop Gelasius was earnestly engaged, during the remainder of that year, in restoring and establishing a firm peace, among his neighbours. To accomplish that end, Maurice O'Lochlain, Prince of Tyrone, and all the petty princes and nobles of Tyrone, of Orgiell,<sup>36</sup> and of Ulidia,<sup>37</sup> appeared at Armagh, on his summons. There, he heard and settled their respective claims and complaints. It was agreed, that all the rest should obey, and give hostages to Maurice O'Lochlain. On the 24th of November, 1150, a great calamity happened at Armagh. The third and greatest quarter of Armagh, which was called the Trian-Mor, took fire, and the inhabitants were left homeless; as the most part of it was

<sup>32</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 57.

<sup>33</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1062, 1063.

<sup>34</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. De S. Gelasio, cap. xiv., p. 775.

<sup>35</sup> See Rev. Robert King's "Primer of the Church History of Ireland," vol. ii., book iv., chap. iv., pp. 479, 480.

<sup>36</sup> Orgiell, called also Oriell, and Uriell, extended from Fermanagh, to the counties of Louth, Monaghan and Armagh.

<sup>37</sup> Ulidia comprehended the counties of Down and of Antrim, before the English Invasion.

burned, to the very ground. This was enough, not only to excite the sympathies of the primate, but to call forth his strenuous exertions, for the repairs of his city, and to alleviate the sore wants of his flock. Therefore, he made a visitation, through all his diocese of Armagh, in order to obtain subsidies from well-disposed persons. His appeal was eminently successful. Every nobleman and distinguished inhabitant of each village contributed an ox, while the prince of the country gave twenty, as his quota to repair that loss.

CHAPTER II.

THE SYNODS OF KELLS, OF MELLIFONT, AND OF BRIGH-MAC-TAIDGHE—GELASIUS CONSCRATES ST. LAURENCE O'TOOLE—SYNOD AT CLANE—CONVENTION AT ATHBOY—CLOSE OF HIS CAREER—DEATH, COMMEMORATION AND CHARACTER.

WHILE Gelasius was Archbishop of Armagh, in 1151, Pope Eugene III.<sup>1</sup> had sent John Paparo, or Joannes Papiron, bearing as his title, Cardinal Priest of St. Laurence in Damaso, and as Papal Legate, into Ireland. He remained a week,<sup>2</sup> as guest, in the house of the Archbishop of Armagh.<sup>3</sup> In 1152,<sup>4</sup> the great National Synod of Kells,<sup>5</sup> in Meath, was convened. Some writers assign to Mel,<sup>6</sup> or Mellifont, and others to Drogheda,<sup>7</sup> the site for holding this Council. The decrees by which simony and usury had been condemned in it passed unanimously, but when the Cardinal set forth his favourite yet strange system of tithes, the proposition was instantly rejected; nor do we find, says a writer, that it had met with the approval of a single ecclesiastic in this National Synod.<sup>8</sup> The ancient Book of Cluain-Ednach—as quoted by the Rev. Jeffery Keating<sup>9</sup> and by other writers<sup>10</sup>—states, that this Synod was opened, in 1157;<sup>11</sup> but, this account is supposed to have been taken from a faulty entering, and not warranted by the original copy of the Book

CHAPTER II.—<sup>1</sup> His pontificate began in 1145, and he died on the 8th of July, A.D. 1153. See Rey. John Alrog's "Manual of Church History." Translated by Rev. F. J. Pabisch and Rev. Thomas S. Byrne, vol. ii., Period 2, Epoch 2, part i., chap. i., sect. 218, pp. 387, 392.

<sup>2</sup> See Rev. Robert King's "Primer of the Church History of Ireland," vol. ii., book iv., chap. v., p. 483.

<sup>3</sup> He also imparted his blessing. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1094, 1095.

<sup>4</sup> Some writers incorrectly have it, in 1151, such as Ussher, in his Index Chronologicus, A.M. MCII. See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," p. 546. Colgan also gives it, as the date, according to the "Annals of the Four Masters," which he used; but in Dr. O'Donovan's edition, it is set down, under A.D. 1152. It was a Bissxetle year, in which, according to Keating, it was held; the next to it should be 1156, and the year certainly could not have been 1157. The Annals of Mary's Abbey, near Dublin, those of Multifernan, the Book of the Clergy of Cluain-Ednach, and certain manuscript Annals, in the custody of Harris, are authorities, for the date given in the text.

<sup>5</sup> Also called Kenlis, or Kenanuse.

<sup>6</sup> It has been conjectured, that some writer had fallen into the mistake of making Kell into Mell.

<sup>7</sup> "Admonasterium Pontanense." Possibly, Mellifont went by this name, says Harris, because it stood near Drogheda.

<sup>8</sup> See Rev. M. J. Brenan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," Twelfth Century, chap. i., p. 230.

<sup>9</sup> See Dermot O'Connor's Keating's "History of Ireland," part ii., p. 517. Duffy's edition.

<sup>10</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. De S. Gelasio, cap. xix., p. 776. Also, MacCurtin's "Brief Discourse in Vindication of the Antiquity of Ireland," p. 278.

<sup>11</sup> We may suppose, says Harris, although the Synod opened in 1152, at Kells; yet that it continued by adjournment, at different places, until 1157. Thus, the Council of Trent continued about eighteen years, and during that time, it was adjourned to Bologna, and back again to Trent. If this be so, Cardinal Paparo did not preside in it, of Clonenagh.<sup>12</sup> Indeed, there are sufficient grounds, to warrant such a conclusion ; while the facts and statements made, in reference to it, draw our inferences to the year 1152. The recorded deaths of certain individuals,<sup>13</sup> assisting thereat, are confirmatory of such a date, as we find from the Annals. To this celebrated Synod, its decrees, and transactions, allusion has been already made.<sup>14</sup> To the Archbishoprics of Armagh and of Cashel were now added those of Dublin and of Tuam,<sup>15</sup> with a re-distribution of the suffragan Sees.<sup>16</sup> This was a very numerously attended Council ; twenty-two bishops and five bishops elect<sup>17</sup> having been assembled, with about three hundred ecclesiastics. This prelate, Gelasius, is called the first Archbishop of Armagh,<sup>18</sup> because he was the first, who used the pall ; although others before him were called Archbishops and Primate, out of reverence for St. Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland.<sup>19</sup> That very same year, in which the Synod of Kells was held, our primate was wounded by O'Carroll, King of Ergall.<sup>20</sup> Owing to this crime, O'Carroll was deposed, by Melaghlin, King of Meath.

The present saint was indefatigable for thirty-eight years, while he continued to rule over the See of Armagh. He held another Synod, in 1157, as it has been stated, in the Abbey of Mellifont. This, Harris takes to be only an adjournment of that held in 1152. In the Synod convened at Mellifont, Christian O'Conarchy, Bishop of Lismore, and the Pope's Legate, presided. Seventeen bishops, besides the Legate and Primate, assisted. It was honoured, likewise, with the presence of Murtoigh O'Loughlin, King of Ireland, O'Eochaid, King of Ulidia, Tiernan O'Rourke, Prince of Brefny, and O'Carroll, Prince of Ergall, or Oriel. The chief matter of consequence, transacted in this Synod, was the public excommunication of Dunchad O'Melaghlin, King of Meath, by the bishops and clergy, and his formal deposition, by the princes, assembled. To occupy his principality and exercise jurisdiction in Meath, his brother Dermod was substituted. What his exact offence was, we are not specifically informed ; but, in the anonymous Annals, quoted by Harris, it is said, "that the cursed Atheist was excommunicated from the Church, for dishonouring the Comarb (i.e. Primate) Jesus's Staff, and all the clergy." With great solemnity, the prelates and ecclesiastics consecrated that church, belonging to the Abbey of Mellifont. The kings and princes present made great oblations, to aid in its construction and foundation.<sup>21</sup> all that time ; for, we are told by the Book of Cluain-Ednach, before quoted, that on the 24th of March, the same year, and immediately after the finishing of the Council, he began his journey homewards to Rome. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 59.

<sup>12</sup> Harris believes, that the translator of Keating erred, because in an English translation of that writer, and kept in manuscript in Archbishop Marsh's library, Dublin, the date is 1152, as it ought to be.

<sup>13</sup> Thus, among them, Dungall O'Cellaic, Bishop of Leighlin, died, in 1152, five years before the term allotted, by Keating, for the celebration of this Synod.

<sup>14</sup> See our "Lives of the Irish Saints," vol. ii., Fourth Day of February. Art. v. Reputed Festival of St. Gille, or Gillibert.

<sup>15</sup> The Cardinal brought with him four Palls for these Archbishops, which he distributed.

<sup>16</sup> A number of suffragan bishops was made subject and allotted to each Archbishop.

<sup>17</sup> In Sir James Ware's work, "De Hibernia et Antiquitatibus ejus," the names of the Archbishops, and Bishops, who assisted at the said Synod, as also, the designation of their respective Sees are set down. See cap. xvii., pp. 73 to 78.

<sup>18</sup> According to the Annals of St. Mary's Abbey and those at the end of Camden.

<sup>19</sup> From the beginning, his See was held, in the greatest honour, not only by the Irish bishops and priests, but by kings and princes.

<sup>20</sup> The Annals, which are my authority for this, says Harris, do not inform us how, or on what occasion, it happened.

<sup>21</sup> King Murtagh gave 140 oxen, or cows, 60 ounces of gold, and a townland, near Drogheda, called Finnabhuair Naningeau. O'Carroll gave 60 ounces of gold ; and

The year following, this indefatigable and venerable old pastor held another Synod, at Brigh-Thaigh, or Brigh-Mac-Taidghe, in Meath.<sup>22</sup> Twenty-five bishops, with Christian O'Conarchy, Bishop of Lismore, the Pope's Legate, assisted at it. None of the Connaught bishops were present, at this Synod, on account of the following occurrence, related in our Annals. While on their way to this Convocation, having left Clonmacnoise, the very next morning they were set upon and plundered, at Cuirr Cluana,<sup>23</sup> while two laymen of their company were murdered, by a party of soldiers, belonging to Dermot O'Melaghlin, King of Meath.<sup>24</sup> Either this accident, or their being busied in their own country, at a Synod, held by them, during this year, in Roscommon, prevented their appearance. Besides some reformatory decrees, relating to discipline and manners, by common consent, the clergy of this Synod erected the Abbey church of Derry into a Cathedral. They appointed Flathbert O'Brolcan, Abbot of Derry, as its bishop, and they constituted him supreme moderator, over all the Abbeys of Ireland. About the year 1160, a Charter was granted, for the foundation of a Cistercian Abbey, at Newry, by Maurice McLoughlin, King of all Ireland; and, foremost among the witnesses and sureties is set down, as subscribing to it, Giolla Mac Liag, Archbishop of Armagh, holding the Staff of Jesus in his hand.<sup>25</sup> In the year 1162, Gelasius consecrated St. Lawrence O'Toole,<sup>26</sup> Archbishop of Dublin, as the first Bishop or Archbishop of that See, that ever was consecrated in Ireland. Before this time, the prelates of Dublin, as also those of Waterford and of Limerick, received consecration, from the Archbishop of Canterbury. They also paid canonical obedience to him.

In the year 1162, or 1163, Gelasius convened a Synod of twenty-six bishops at Cleonad, or Clane, in the diocese of Kildare. A decree was promulgated, during their Session, that for the time to come, no person should be admitted as a public reader, or lecturer,<sup>27</sup> in divinity, but such as had been educated as students, in the University of Armagh; or, as the anonymous Annals, quoted by Harris, state, such as had been fostered, or else adopted, by Armagh. According to these words, there was room left for incorporation or admission ad cundem, from other Universities.<sup>28</sup> Again, under this year, it is stated, that the visitation of Cinel-Eoghain was made by the successor of Patrick, Gillamaciag, son of Ruidhri, the like of which had not previously occurred.<sup>29</sup>

The greatest part of A.D. 1165 was taken up, by the primate, in making peace, between Murtoigh MacLoughlin, King of Ireland, Eochaid Dunleve, King of Ulidia, and Donat O'Carroll, Prince of Ergal. Next year, this truce was perfidiously broken, by Murtoigh, who surprised Eochaid, and cruelly Tiernan O'Ruairk's wife, daughter to O'Melaghlin, Prince of Meath, presented as much, together with a golden chalice for the high altar, as also holy ornaments for nine other altars, which were in the same church. See Moore's "History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xxvi., pp. 196, 197. This gives us an idea of its great magnificence.

<sup>22</sup> This means, "the Hill of the Sons of Teigue," a place near Trim, in Laeghaire. The "Annals of Clonmacnoise" call the place Breyvictieg.

<sup>23</sup> Or, at the wooden bridge of Clonmacnoise, which it seems was formed of joists, over the River Shannon, according to the "Annals of Clonmacnoise."

<sup>24</sup> Carbre the Swift and his Kerne are mentioned as the murderers, in the "Annals of Clonmacnoise."

<sup>25</sup> The original of this valuable historic Record is ably translated into English, accompanied with illustrative notes, by the learned Irish scholar, John O'Donovan, in "The Dublin Penny Journal," vol. i., No. 13, pp. 102 to 104.

<sup>26</sup> See his Life, at the 14th of November.

<sup>27</sup> Called in Irish, Fearleighinn. The desire was probably to promote uniformity of scholastic teaching and discipline, throughout the rest of Ireland.

<sup>28</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," p. 60.

<sup>29</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1146, 1147.

put out his eyes. As a just retribution, Donat avenged his confederate's quarrel, took the monarch unprepared, and slew him, in the battle of Letter Luin.<sup>30</sup> These and such like tumults bore heavily on the spirits of our primate, who loved nothing more than peace. His grief soon afterwards was increased, in 1166, by the accidental burning down of a great part of Armagh.<sup>31</sup> In 1167, a great assembly of the clergy and princes of Leth-Cuin, or the northern parts of Ireland, was convened, at Athboy, by Roderick O'Connor, King of Connaught, and Monarch of Ireland.<sup>32</sup> At this, Gelasius, Archbishop of Armagh, Laurence O'Toole, Archbishop of Dublin, Cadla O'Dubhai, Archbishop of Tuam, besides many other bishops and princes, assisted. They passed many laws, at this great Convention, both for the public peace, as also to promote the discipline and good government of the Church. A restitution of his prey, to the Coarb of St. Patrick, by the people of Hy-Failghe, of Offaly, was decreed at this Synod.<sup>33</sup> Another was held, at Armagh, in 1170, by this prelate, and by the Irish clergy. The chief subject of their consultations, however, was to enquire into the cause of the invaders' arrival, in their country, and their designs upon its independence. They concluded, that the sins of the people had subjected them to Divine vengeance. The practice of buying English children from merchants and pirates, and of making them slaves, was very properly condemned. Regarding this matter, a resolution was entered upon, and by public consent they made a decree, that all the English, who were in servitude, should have their liberty. By a common vice of their country, the English had a custom, to sell their children and kinsfolk as slaves, and to send them into Ireland, at that time, although their sellers were neither in want, nor in extreme poverty.<sup>34</sup>

In the eighty-fifth year of his age, A.D. 1172,<sup>35</sup> Gelasius made his fourth and last visitation, round all Connaught. This he continued through Ulster, until he came to Armagh, where he spent the chief residue of his life. He now began a due and a final preparation, for the enjoyment of eternal rewards. His employment on this occasion<sup>36</sup> most probably hindered him from waiting on King Henry II., while this monarch was at the Council of Cashel, A.D. 1172. Afterwards, the primate went to Dublin, in the depth of winter. He submitted to the king, as to his supreme temporal sovereign. He had a white cow driven before him, during his long journey, and wherever he went. On the milk of this animal alone he lived, and in the opinion of the vulgar, as Cambrensis tells us, he was reckoned a saint.<sup>37</sup> He lived, nearly <sup>30</sup> Moore states, that this is "a wild tract in the neighbourhood of Lough Neagh,"—"History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xxvi., p. 196. It is now called the Fews.

<sup>31</sup> On this occasion, throughout the length of two streets the fire extended, from the cross of Columcille to the cross of Bishop Eugene, and from the cross of Bishop Eugene in the second street to the cross of Rath Gate. All the Rath was burned, with its churches, excepting the Regles of St. Peter and St. Paul, and a few houses. A street to the west of the Rath, from the cross of Seachnall to the cross of Brigid, excepting a small portion, was consumed.

<sup>32</sup> This year, too, King Roderick O'Conor made a grant of ten cows each year, on behalf of himself and of his successors, in honour of St. Patrick and to the Lector of Armagh, so that he should give lectures to the students of Ireland and of Alba, or Scotland, generally.

<sup>33</sup> See Rev. Robert King's "Memoir Introductory to the Early History of the Primacy of Armagh," p. 109.

<sup>34</sup> See Giraldus Cambrensis' "Opera Omnia," edited by Dimock, vol. v. "Expugnatio Hibernica," lib. i., cap. xviii., p. 258.

<sup>35</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., pp. 6, 7, and n. (u.) Ibid.

<sup>36</sup> Cambrensis imputes his absence, however, to his extreme old age, and infirmities.

<sup>37</sup> See "Expugnatio Hibernica," lib. i., cap. xxxv., p. 283. "Opera Omnia," vol. v. Edited by Dimock.

two years, after this journey. At length, worn out with old age and labour, the term of his existence closed. He departed this life, in the year 1173, according to the Annals of Innisfallen,<sup>38</sup> and those of the Four Masters, and on the Wednesday after Easter.<sup>39</sup> At this very same year, it is recorded, that Hugh Magennis and the Clann-Aedha, plundered the large third of Armagh city,<sup>40</sup> which was one of its chief divisions.<sup>41</sup> But, whether this destruction occurred, before or after the death of Gelasius, is not recorded. Magennis was killed, however, three months after this plundering. St. Gelasius died, on the 27th of March, A.D. 1174, according to Harris' Ware,<sup>42</sup> and when he had attained the eighty-seventh year of his age. He is commemorated, in the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Cathal Maguire. We find mentioned, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>43</sup> as having a festival on this day, Gelasius, i.e. Giolla-Mac-Liag, successor of Patrick. This illustrious prelate bears a very high character, among our Irish writers, for his holiness, capacity, learning, wisdom, humanity, and hospitality.

ARTICLE II.—ST. RUDBERT, OR RUPERT, BISHOP OF SALTZBURGH. [Seventh or Eighth Century.] This holy man was a great lover of chastity and temperance. His zeal for the conversion of souls was very great, and he was so charitable, that he always gave abundantly of his substance, thus impoverishing himself, in order to enrich the poor. Also, in fasting, in watching, and in other acts of mortification, he took care to ensure a victory over temptations.<sup>1</sup> The record of this renowned saint is contained in a very ancient Life, said to have been written, by Arno, Bishop of Saltzburgh, who flourished in the year 800.<sup>2</sup> His Acts are to be found, likewise, in the collections of Lippeloo,<sup>3</sup> of Canisius,<sup>4</sup> of Colgan,<sup>5</sup> of Brunner,<sup>6</sup> of Rader,<sup>7</sup> of John Aventinus,<sup>8</sup> of Jacobus Januensis, of Surius,<sup>9</sup> of Cornelius Grazius,<sup>10</sup> of Haruæus,<sup>11</sup> of Valentinus Leuctius,<sup>12</sup> of Marcus Velsirus,<sup>13</sup> of Wigulæus Hundius,<sup>14</sup> of Petrus de Natalibus,<sup>15</sup> of Arnold Wion,<sup>16</sup> and of Petrus Cratopolius.<sup>17</sup> Also, notices will be found, in the Chronicon Generale Mundi,<sup>18</sup> in the work of Gaspard Brusch,<sup>19</sup> in that of Le Cointe,<sup>20</sup> of the Bollandists,<sup>21</sup> of the

<sup>38</sup> These, as we are told by Harris, often anticipate the Christian era, by one year.

<sup>39</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's Edition, vol. iii., pp. 12, 13.

<sup>40</sup> See ibid., pp. 10, 11, and n. (i.)

<sup>41</sup> There were four altogether, so far as we find them specially designated, viz.: 1. Rath Ardmaccha, perhaps that portion on which stood the Cathedral, or more probably, the great fort of Macha; 2, the Trian Massan; 3, the Trian Mor; and 4, the Trian Saxon, inhabited chiefly by English students and English merchants. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, pars. iii., p. 300.

<sup>42</sup> See vol. i., "Archbishops of Armagh," pp. 57 to 61.

<sup>43</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Such is the testimony of an ancient writer of his Acts, as published by the Bollandists.

<sup>2</sup> According to Andreas Brunner, in "Annalium Boiorum," lib. v., cap. i. and viii.

<sup>3</sup> The First Volume of his "Vitæ Sancto-rum" mentions, St. Rupert, Bishop, at the 27th of March, pp. 1078 to 1085.

<sup>4</sup> In "Antiquæ Lectiones," tomus vi.

<sup>5</sup> He takes them, from various sources, in his "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. Vita S. Ruperti Episcopi, with an Appendix in six Chapters, and notes, pp. 756 to 770.

<sup>6</sup> In "Annalium Boiorum," lib. v., cap. i. and viii.

<sup>7</sup> In "Bavaria Sancta," tomus i.

<sup>8</sup> In "Annalium Boiorum," lib. iii.

<sup>9</sup> In his work "De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis."

<sup>10</sup> In "Vitis Sanctorum," tomus i.

<sup>11</sup> At the 27th of March.

<sup>12</sup> His work is written, in the German language.

<sup>13</sup> Lib. iv.

<sup>14</sup> In "Metropolis Salisburgensis." Ingolstadt, A.D. 1582, fol.

<sup>15</sup> Lib. ii., cap. v.

<sup>16</sup> "Lignum Vitæ," lib. ii., cap. liii.

<sup>17</sup> "De Episcopis Germaniæ."

<sup>18</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvii. Martii. Appendix ad Acta S. Ruperti, cap. ii., p. 767.

Benedictines,<sup>22</sup> of the Cistercian Monk,<sup>23</sup> of Baillet,<sup>24</sup> and of Alban Butler.<sup>25</sup> According to several writers, St. Rupert was by birth a Frenchman.<sup>26</sup> Other accounts have it, that his origin had been derived from the French kings, and from the chieftains of Scotia<sup>27</sup>—interpreted, by most writers, to mean Hibernia.<sup>28</sup> Several writers have asserted, that St. Rupert lived, during the fifth and sixth centuries. Bishop De Burgo has very particularly noted the year of his birth to be A.D. 537.<sup>29</sup> Upon no slight grounds, Mabillon and Bulteau think this saint lived a whole century later than is generally supposed, and that he flourished in the seventh and eighth centuries. There are, no doubt, irreconcilable statements to be found in his Acts, which seem to have been derived from uncertain traditions, and all of which cannot be received as authentic. According to Dempster,<sup>30</sup> St. Rupert descended from a race of chiefs, belonging to Scotia.<sup>31</sup> However, most of the German writers, who have treated about their great Apostle—drawing their accounts from Bishop Arno of Saltzburgh, or from some anonymous disciple<sup>32</sup> of St. Eberhard, Bishop of Saltzburgh,—have agreed, that their patron belonged to Ireland, and this also the more ancient accounts seem to establish.<sup>33</sup> It is thought, moreover, that the foreign name Rupert, or Rudpert, may have been a modification, from the Irish name Robertach, or Rophartach.<sup>34</sup> He was of royal blood, and the Acts attributed to Bishop Arno state,<sup>35</sup> that he was baptized in Scotia, by St. Patrick.<sup>36</sup> However, our saint was still more illus-

<sup>19</sup> "In Monasteriorum Germaniæ præcipuorum Chronologia." Ingolstadt, A.D. 1551, fol.

<sup>20</sup> In "Annales Ecclesiastici Franco-rum." Paris, A.D. 1665, et seq., fol.

<sup>21</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xviii. There is a previous commentary, in Two Sections. Afterwards, Vita ex MS. Florentino et Canisio, in Two Chapters: then Vita II ex MS. Rubæ-Vallis, in Two Chapters. Notes are appended to these chapters, pp. 699 to 706.

<sup>22</sup> In the Third volume of the "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," from the year of Christ 700 to 800 (Saculum iii. Pars Prima), we find a Life of St. Rudbert, Bishop of Saltzburg, with previous observations. The Life is in six paragraphs; there is an Elogium Historicum in seventeen paragraphs, and there is an Appendix, in seven paragraphs, pp. 339 to 347.

<sup>23</sup> At the 27th of March, the name of St. Rupert, or Robert, Bishop of Saltzbourg, C., is set down.

<sup>24</sup> In "Les Vies des Saints," tome i., is registered St. Rupert, or Robert, Bishop of Saltzbourg, at the 27th of March, pp. 349 to 352.

<sup>25</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other Principal Saints," vol. iii., March xxvii.

<sup>26</sup> It must be remarked, that the Rev. Dr. Lanigan—in a too summary manner—dismisses the idea, that Rupert was a native of Ireland, and the probability, that he had Irish connexions. Yet, Lanigan's chief arguments seem to be, that there are absurd accounts in those Acts, which ascribe his baptism to St. Patrick, that he died afterwards in the seventh, or eighth, century, and that his name Rudpert, or Rupert, is not an Irish form. Yet, he acknowledges, that by the maternal line, he may have been connected with some Irish princes. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. vi., and n. 65, pp. 162 to 164.

<sup>27</sup> This account, remarks Canisius, is taken from an ancient history, which was to be found in a Manuscript, belonging to a monastery, at Saltzbourg, this even having been drawn, from a still older record.

<sup>28</sup> On this matter, the reader may consult Gaspar Bruschi, treating on the Monastery of St. Peter at Saltzburgh, Petrus Cratepolius, "De Episcopis Germaniæ," Viguleus Hundius, in Metropoli Salisburgensi, Cornelius Grazius, "De Vitis Sanctorum," tomus i., Matthew Rader and Andrew Brunner.

<sup>29</sup> See "Officia Propria Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Die xxvii. Martii, lect. iv., p. 40.

<sup>30</sup> See "Menologium Scoticum," in Bishop Forbes's "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>31</sup> Both Dempster and Camerarius, at the 27th of March, endeavour to claim Rupert, as a Scotchman.

<sup>32</sup> He is said, by Brunner, to have written the Acts of St. Rupert, A.D. 1186.

<sup>33</sup> See Andrew Brunner, "Annalium Boiorum," lib. v., cap. i.

<sup>34</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvii. Martii, n. 2, p. 761. Also, Appendix ad Acta S. Ruperti, cap. iii. pp. 767, 768.

<sup>35</sup> Various other German writers have a similar statement, such as the anonymous writer of his Acts, as published by Canisius, Cornelius Grazius, &c.

<sup>36</sup> This is clearly a mistake, as referring to the Apostle of Ireland, when we take into account the years in which the present saint trious for his faith and piety ; as, likewise, for his ecclesiastical learning, and for the extraordinary virtues and self-abnegation he practised, from his youth, and as he grew to manhood. Despising riches and pleasures, leaving his parents and native country, he is said to have visited Rome, where he made a pilgrimage to the sacred places, with great devotion. There, too, he learned what places he should select, for his future mission and government. We are told, likewise, that his brother Trudbertus<sup>37</sup> and his sister Erentrude<sup>38</sup> were his companions, as they had resolved on missionary labours and sacrifices abroad, when leaving their own country. The time for separation from his brother and sister had now come ; and Trudbert, leaving with them the bounds of Italy, came to a valley, called Prysgangia, or Brisgangia,<sup>39</sup> not far from the River Rhine. Here, he had resolved on taking up his residence, and here, too, he began to cultivate some wild land, near his hermitage. But, soon it was destined to become the place of his martyrdom. Meantime, the holy Rupert and his angelic sister Erentrude continued their journey, along the bed of the Rhine, until they came to Bormacia,<sup>40</sup> now known as Worms,<sup>41</sup> on that great river. At this time, Hilpert,<sup>42</sup> Hildebert, or Childebert,<sup>43</sup> as variously written, was king over that part of the country—the people of which are called Vangiones,—and during the second year of his reign, St. Rupert arrived. He drew persons from the neighbourhood, as from remote provinces, to receive his doctrine, advice and instructions. He removed all their doubts and scruples. He comforted the afflicted, while he cured the sick. He healed the disorders of souls, and moved many by his great example. At this time, he was in the fortieth year of his age.<sup>44</sup> So distinguished were his merits, that these caused him to be elevated, with universal acclaim, to the Episcopal See, at Worms.<sup>45</sup> However, a tyrant, named Borcharius, hating the Church and clergy, and ruling that people, among whom he lived—they being for the most part idolaters—could not bear the lustre of such sanctity, which condemned their irregularities and superstitions. About the year 580,<sup>46</sup> it is said, they beat him with rods, loaded him with all manner of outrages, and then expelled him their city.<sup>47</sup> This he bore with great meekness and patience. For two years, he is said to have wandered, as an exile, and during this interval, he made a second journey to Rome, in the time of Pope Pelagius II.<sup>48</sup> While here, he prayed to the Almighty for light to guide his future course, and feeling that Germany was destined to become the theatre of his labours, Rupert set out once more is said to have flourished, and the year in which he died. Noticing this difficulty, Colgan considered, that the nephew of the great St. Patrick, or Patricius Junior, may have been meant. See “Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ,” Martii xxvii. Appendix ad Acta S. Ruperti, cap. iii., pp. 767, 768. Yet, it seems better to dismiss this account, as derived from a false tradition.

<sup>37</sup> His festival belongs to the 26th of April.

<sup>38</sup> By some writers, however, she is called his niece. Her feast is usually assigned to the 30th of June. The Translation of her Relics is observed, on the 3rd of September.

<sup>39</sup> This place is said to have been within the territory of the Rauraci, near the Hyrcinian forest, in Upper Germany.

<sup>40</sup> Sometimes written, Bormitomagum.

<sup>41</sup> In Latin, Wormacia.

<sup>42</sup> We also find him called Hylderich.

<sup>43</sup> This was not the Childebert, who died A.D. 560, or 561, but rather Childebert, son of Sigebert, who ruled over Austrasia, and afterwards over Burgundy, from the year 576 to 596, according to Miræus, in his Belgic Annals.

<sup>44</sup> According to the Life, published by Canisius.

<sup>45</sup> According to Dempster, he founded this See. “Menologium Scoticum,” in Bishop Forbes’ “Kalendar of Scottish Saints,” p. 194.

<sup>46</sup> This happened, during the lifetime of Childebert, son of Sigebert.

<sup>47</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler’s “Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other Principal Saints,” vol. iii., March xxvii.

<sup>48</sup> He ruled from 578 to 590. See Sir Harris Nicolas’ “Chronology of History,” p. 211.

<sup>49</sup> He was a relative of Garibald, who for that country. But God, who protected his servant, had prepared for him a rich harvest of souls. At that time, Theodo, or Theodon the Elder, was Duke of Bavaria. At this time, too, he was a Pagan chief.<sup>49</sup> Hearing about the great reputation and miracles of St. Rupert, that ruler sent messengers to him. These noblemen earnestly besought our saint, in the name of Theodon, to come and preach the gospel to his people, the Baioarians, or Bavarians. The old Reginum, afterwards called Rigensbourg, and now Ratisbon, was the capital of all those provinces. This happened two years after Rupert's expulsion from Worms, and about A.D. 582. However, according to the Salzburg tradition,<sup>50</sup> he came to Ratisbon, during the first half of the sixth century;<sup>51</sup> while several writers hold, that St. Rupert did not arrive there, before the time of Duke Theodo II., A.D. 696,<sup>52</sup> and, in the second year of the reign of King Childebert III.<sup>53</sup> When our saint approached the city, Theodo and all his courtiers came to meet him, and he was conducted to the court, in a sort of triumphal progress. Nevertheless, the Christian faith had been planted, in that country, two hundred years before, by St. Severinus.<sup>54</sup> He was regarded, as the Apostle of Noricum, or Austria. After his death, heresies and heathenish superstitions prevailed. These had almost entirely extinguished the light of the Gospel, for a long interval. St. Valentine,<sup>55</sup> Bishop of Passau, had also laboured, in those parts. Bagintrude, the sister of Duke Theodon, had been already a Christian. Therefore she had religiously disposed her brother; and, through his excellent example, that whole country was ready to receive the Christian faith. Soon Rupert found the hearts, both of the nobles and of the people, quite docile to the Word of God. Having the help of other zealous priests, whom he had brought with him, our saint instructed the chief. Having ordered a general fast, Rupert baptized Duke Theodon with the lords and people of that whole country. God confirmed his preaching by many miracles. At the chief's request, Rupert went afterwards on board a vessel, and he sailed down the Danube, through Norica, even to lower Pannonia. In the villages, towns, and castles, of these countries, the great herald of the Gospel proclaimed the glad tidings of salvation, and everywhere the empire of paganism began to crumble, while the practices of idolatry and superstition began to disappear. After Ratisbon, the capital, the second chief seat of his labours was Laureacum, now called Lorch,<sup>56</sup> where he healed several diseases, by prayer, and where he made many converts. Through the Alpine region of Carinthia,<sup>57</sup> he travelled and preached. The Duke and his subjects desired that St. Rupert should definitely fix upon a place, for his permanent residence, as a bishop. He came to a lake, called Walarius,<sup>58</sup> otherwise, the Waller-zee. Here, he erected was chief over the Bojari, or Bavarians, who had settled in Noricum and Vindelicia. Towards the close of the sixth century, he had become a Christian. See "Monumenta Boica Monac." This great work appeared, from A.D. 1769 to A.D. 1861, in 37 vols.

<sup>50</sup> This tradition has been defended, by Koch-Sternfeld, in a Treatise, published A.D. 1850, On the true age when St. Rupert lived, and later still, A.D. 1866, by Friedrich, in his work, On the true age of St. Rupert, published at Bamberg.

<sup>51</sup> The whole of this Chronological controversy has been ably treated, in Mohler's Church History, edited by Gams, vol. ii., pp. 60 to 67.

<sup>52</sup> Mabillon, Hansiz, and Wattenbach, favour this view. In his History of the Religion of the People, Gfrörer has given reasons for stating, that after Pepin's death, A.D. 714, he suddenly left Bavaria, A.D. 716, and returned to Worms, where he died. See vol. i., pp. 280 et seq.

<sup>53</sup> He ruled from A.D. 695 to 711.

<sup>54</sup> His feast occurs, at the 8th of January, and he died A.D. 482.

<sup>55</sup> His feast is kept, on the 7th of January, and he died A.D. 440.

<sup>56</sup> A town on the River Danube, lying midway between Ratisbon and Vienna.

<sup>57</sup> The people were called Carinthii, by some writers, and by others Charantui.

a church, in honour of St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles. Thence, he went towards the River Juvavia,<sup>59</sup> and he found there a romantic and mountainous region, very suitable for his purpose.<sup>60</sup> That place was covered with woods, and, at the time, it was only sparsely inhabited, although formerly it was the site of a well-known city. Old Juvavia was then almost in ruins; but, it was soon rebuilt, and, afterwards, it was called Saltzburg. Rupert is called the first Archbishop of this See, by Dempster.<sup>61</sup> Here, the holy prelate built a church, dedicated to St. Peter, to which, afterwards, he added a monastery, and thus secured the permanency of his infant church.<sup>62</sup> The Duke Theodon adorned and enriched it, with many magnificent donations. These enabled St. Rupert to establish clerics, and to found there several noble churches and monasteries. After that, Theodon became infirm. Before this prince's death, his son Theodebert, or Diotper, was called to his bedside, and strongly recommended to aid the good work commenced. His zeal and piety augmented considerably the revenues of the Church, in Salzburgh; and, Theodebert, in all things, obeyed the instructions of his father. Through his munificence, the church of St. Maximilian was established, having a large tract of wood, the village of Albina, and several possessions, to found a monastic house attached to it. With a view of spreading still more the reign of Christ, St. Rupert took a journey into his own country,<sup>63</sup> in order to procure a new supply of able labourers. He brought back to Saltzburg twelve holy missionaries,<sup>64</sup> with his niece St. Erentrude, a virgin, consecrated to God. He built for her a great monastery,<sup>65</sup> called Nunberg. Over this, she presided, as the first abbess. The illustrious prelate Rupert laboured, for several years, in this See; and, he travelled with a chosen band of disciples, over Norica. Wherever he preached the Gospel of Christ, numbers abandoned their errors and vices, acquiring charity, humility, and all other Christian virtues, in their stead. This illustrious evangelist is said to have brought over the whole Bavarian nation to the faith, before his mission closed. He declared with a prophetic spirit to his disciples and friends, that the day of his departure was now fast approaching. This caused the most intense emotion and the deepest sorrow. But, recommending them, with the people of Salzburgh and of Norica, to Christ, Rupert most earnestly desired, that his successor should be chosen. Wherefore, a very holy man, called Vitalis, was elected. The Lent now approached, and he was attacked with febrile symptoms. Afterwards, exhorting his friends to be resigned, and to practise

<sup>58</sup> The MS. Life Rubeæ Vallis has it called Vinalarium.

<sup>59</sup> The MS. Life Rubeæ Vallis has it "locum super fluvium Viarum, antiquo vocabulo Vivarium," &c. See the Bollandists, Vita II., cap. i., num. 3, 4, p. 705.

<sup>60</sup> The MS. Life Rubeæ Vallis states, that under the Roman Empire, beautiful dwellings had been here built. See ibid.

<sup>61</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendar of Scottish Saints," p. 194. Menologium Scoticum.

<sup>62</sup> See Rev. John Alzog's "Manual of Universal Church History," translated and edited by Rev. F. J. Pabisch and Rev. Thomas S. Byrne, vol. ii., Period 2, Epoch I., part i., chap. i., sect. 157, p. 78.

<sup>63</sup> Matthew Rader having stated, in "Bavaria Sancta," tomus i., "in Galliam regressus, socios inde secum," &c., afterwards corrects himself, in tomus iii., in these words: "In Patriam veterem, inquam Scotiam, quæ et Hibernia Insula vocatur, regressus," &c.

<sup>64</sup> These are named, Gizilarius, or Gisolarus, Domingus, Maternus, Dignulus, Chunialdus, or Conaldus, Isenardus, Gerardus, Arioferidus, Vitalis, Ratharius, Erchanfridus, and Lethaldus, according to Rader and Joannes Aventinus. See also Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvii. Martii. Appendix ad Acta S. Ruperti, cap. v., pp. 769, 770. The names of some among the foregoing do not occur in the Calendars; nor will the fact of some among them, bearing Latinized and German forms of name, invalidate the possibility of a more ancient Irish name having been changed for a Continental one.

<sup>65</sup> "Oratorium initio construxit," says Viguleus Hundius, in Metropoli Salisburgensi, p. 256.

the virtues becoming Christians, the holy bishop felt that the supreme moment had come, when the morning of Christ's Resurrection from the grave had dawned upon him. After St. Rupert had celebrated the Easter Mass, he received the Holy Viaticum, while a number of his familiars stood in tears, by his bed-side. Certain religious men, who were present, saw Angels bearing his soul to Heaven, while they sang canticles. Easter-day fell that year, on the 27th of March; and, hence, this is regarded, as his Natalis. As we have seen, great differences of opinion prevail, regarding the year for his departure. In one instance, it is asserted, that he lived to the ripe age of eighty-six, and that he was honourably interred, in the church of St. Peter, at Saltzburgh. Some writers place his death, early in the seventh century, as at A.D. 623,<sup>66</sup> or 628;<sup>67</sup> others have it, between 705 and 710;<sup>68</sup> while, the learned Mabillon<sup>69</sup> asserts, that he died A.D. 718. There seems to be considerable variance, also, regarding the length of time he ruled over Saltzburgh, as bishop; for, while some writers set down twelve years, others again have it, that he was forty-two, forty-four, or even forty-six, years, in the episcopate of that See.<sup>70</sup> It is said,<sup>71</sup> he wrote a Book, On the True Faith, addressed to Theodo, Prince of the Bavarians, as also Epistles to different persons.<sup>72</sup> If we credit Dempster, he wrote other works,<sup>73</sup> but Colgan states, no other writer has mentioned these. At this day, the Roman Martyrology, and different other Martyrologies, commemorate him. The Carthusian Martyrology, in like manner, Molanus, Petrus Galesinus, Canisius, Felix, Hugh Menard, Arnold Wion, Ferrarius, Saussay, Dorgain, assign his chief festival to this date.<sup>74</sup> In Convæus' list of Irish Saints, St. Rudpertus is mentioned, as hereditary prince of the kingdom,<sup>75</sup> first Bishop of Salzburg, and patron of Pannonia, Bavaria, and Norica, at the 27th of March. At this same date, he is set down by Dempster, who claims him as a Scottish saint.<sup>76</sup> Bishop De Burgo prepared a Proper Office for him, and it has been compiled, from the Proper Offices, contained in the Breviaries of Saltzburgh, of Vienna, of Herbipolis, and of Frisingen.<sup>77</sup> This is not recited, however, in the Irish Church. Henry Fitzsimon's Catalogue enters him as Rudbertus, Bishop, at the 27th of March, on the authority of Molanus, Wolfgang and Lacius. The latter states, also, that he was a son to the King of Hibernia.<sup>78</sup> In the anonymous list of Irish saints,<sup>79</sup> his name also appears, at the same date, as Rudbertus. The countries he has served justly celebrate his memory, in their own Proper Offices. In Ireland, his Office is recited as a Double, but with the Common Lessons, on the 27th of March. His feast is set down <sup>66</sup> Hundius has this statement, on the authority of other writers, and Colgan adopts it, after an elaborate investigation of data, on which he deems it based.

<sup>67</sup> Brunner and Rader have this account; but, as Colgan remarks, the Feast of the Resurrection of our Lord, did not fall on the 27th of March, that year.

<sup>68</sup> See Rev. John Alzog's "Manual of Universal Church History," translated and edited by Rev. F. J. Pabisch and Rev. Thomas S. Byrne, vol. ii., Period 2, Epoch 1, part i., chap. i., sect. 157, n. 3, p. 78.

<sup>69</sup> See his "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," sæc. iii., pars. i. Elog. Histor.

<sup>70</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. Appendix ad Acta S. Ruperti, cap. iv., pp. 768, 769.

<sup>71</sup> See ibid., cap. vi., p. 770.

<sup>72</sup> According to Possevin, in Apparatu.

<sup>73</sup> Their titles are thus set down: Ad Theodonem et Theodobertum Reges, Pro Monachis, lib. i. Piam et Paternam Exhortationem ad Fratres, lib. i. See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xvi., num. 1039.

<sup>74</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. Appendix ad Acta S. Ruperti, cap. i., p. 767.

<sup>75</sup> See Henricus Canisius' "Antiquæ Lectiones," tom. vi.

<sup>76</sup> See "Menologium Scoticum," at the 27th of March, in Bishop Forbes' "Kalendar of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>77</sup> See "Officia Propria Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Die xxvii. Martii, pp. 39 to 44.

<sup>78</sup> See O'Sullivan Beare's "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. x., p. 47, cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 56.

for this day, likewise, in the work of Stephen White,<sup>80</sup> and it occurs in the "Circle of the Seasons."<sup>81</sup> Great miracles were wrought, through his intercession, when he had been removed to life eternal. This great and holy man, as would appear from the earliest Bavarian records and traditions, was a native of Ireland, and therefore his Acts are very justly set down, in our collection. We should feel proud of the honour he conferred on our country, and grateful for the services he has rendered to the universal Church, in any alternative; for, he is regarded, as the Apostle of Bavaria, Austria, Pannonia, Styria and Norica. Into these pagan provinces, he brought the Gospel, and with it, the crowning work of Christian civilization.

ARTICLE III.—ST. SUAIRLECH, BISHOP OF FORE, COUNTY OF WESTMEATH. [Eighth Century.] A few brief notices of this sainted bishop are set down, by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> at the 27th of March; while the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> more briefly record him, as Suarleclus, Episc. Fobariensis. Our Irish accounts style him, Suarlech, or otherwise, Suarlius, or Suairleth. He became a monk, in the Abbey of Fore, county of Westmeath. By some, he is said to have been a disciple of St. Fechin,<sup>3</sup> the founder, who died, A.D. 664.<sup>4</sup> This statement, however, seems hardly reconcilable with chronological dates. After living many years, in humble subjection and in practising a penitential life, he succeeded Dubdaboren,<sup>5</sup> in the government of that monastery. To the office of Abbot he was advanced, about the year 735. Afterwards, he was assumed to the exercise of episcopal functions; he being, as is supposed, the first Bishop of Fore; for, we do not read, that any of his predecessors, in the monastery, had previously enjoyed such a title.<sup>6</sup> During the reign of Domnald<sup>7</sup> Murchadh, King of Ireland, our saint was called to the enjoyment of eternal felicity,<sup>8</sup> on the 27th of March. He died, on that day, in the year 745;<sup>9</sup> and, during this very same year, Fore was burned.<sup>10</sup> The Annals of Ulster place his death, at A.D. 749. He must have attained a very advanced age, were we to credit the statement, of his having been in early life, a disciple, under St. Fechin. His name is found, in the Martyrology of

<sup>79</sup> Published by O'Sullivan Beare.

<sup>80</sup> See "Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. ii., p. 15, and cap. iv., p. 37.

<sup>81</sup> See p. 87.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxvii. Martii. De S. Suarlii, p. 772.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 686.

<sup>3</sup> His feast occurs, at the 20th of January.

<sup>4</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 276, 277, the death of St. Feichin, of Fobhar, or Fore, is recorded, as having occurred, on the 14th of February, 664.

<sup>5</sup> The death of this abbot is thus entered, at the year 735: "Dubhdabhoireann, Abbot of Fobhar [Fore], died." — Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 336, 337.

<sup>6</sup> Most of the superiors here are called Abbots. However, his successor St. Aedgenius is said to have been Bishop of Fore, for some years, and to have died, A.D. 766.

<sup>7</sup> This monarch Domnald, or Daniel, son of Murrough, ascended the throne of Ireland, in the year 740, and he reigned to A.D. 782,—a period of forty-two years,—according to Keating. But, following the "Annals of the Four Masters," Domhnall commenced his reign, A.D. 739, and he died, in the year 758.

<sup>8</sup> "The age of Christ, 745. The seventh year of Domhnall. St. Suairleach, Bishop of Fobhar [Fore], died on the 21st of March." — Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 348, 349.

<sup>9</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., n. p. 562. In the First Volume of this work, the day of his death, through mistake, is entered, at the 21st of March. See chap. x., p. 67.

<sup>10</sup> The same fate befel it, A.D. 812, 817, 970, 1095, 1112, 1114, 1167 and 1169. Yet, notwithstanding these repeated burnings, the bell of St. Fechin, a religious relic, was preserved. This, with other relics, in presence of the Abbot of Fore, and certain ecclesiastics, was a surety and guarantee of peace between Turlagh O'Connor, King of Connaught, and Murrough O'Melaghlin, King of Meath, in A.D. 1143.

Tallagh,<sup>11</sup> at the 27th of March, as Suairleach, Bishop. Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire, likewise, record him, as Bishop of Fore, at this day. Under the head of Fobhar, Duaid Mac Firbis enters, Suairlech, bishop of Fobhar, rested, A.D. 745, March 27th.<sup>12</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>13</sup> has entered, likewise, on this day, Suairlech, Bishop of Tobhar.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. FINTAN OR FIONNTAIN, DENOMINATED, MOUTH OF THE PSALMS. [Supposed to be of the Sixth or Seventh Century.] In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> the name is set down, as Fintan os Psalmorum, at the 27th of March. Marianus O'Gorman calls him Bel na Salm, Latinized, by Colgan, Os Psalmorum, or Psalmicanus. Our Irish Hagiographer,<sup>2</sup> who has a few particular observations regarding him, at this date, conjectures, that this holy man may be identical with St. Fintan, surnamed Corach,<sup>3</sup> whose Feast and Acts occur, at the 21st of February.<sup>4</sup> If so, he flourished towards the close of the sixth, and at the beginning of the seventh, century. The Bollandists<sup>5</sup> have noted our saint, at the 27th of March. Among various holy persons, bearing a like name, one denominated Fionntain, i.e. Mouth of the Psalms, we have recorded, in the Martyrologies of Cathal Maguire and of Donegal,<sup>6</sup> as having been venerated, on this day.

ARTICLE V.—ST. MOCHONNA, OF MAGH-EO, NOW MAYO, COUNTY OF MAYO. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> has a record, at the 27th of March, commemorating Mochonna Maighi Eo, or of Mayo. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> enter his feast, in like manner, Mochonna de Mag-eo. An allusion is made to him, by Colgan, but only as one of many Irish saints, bearing such a name, when endeavouring to account for the identity of Conan, a smith, or an artificer, whom St. Patrick placed over a church, at Dromat.<sup>3</sup> Apparently without warrant, and in his list of supposed Regular Canons at Mayo, Archdall<sup>4</sup> places St. Mochonna, between the Abbot St. Muredach, who died A.D. 726, and St. Aidan, Bishop, who departed, A.D. 768. We read, on this day, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> the name Mochonna, of Magh-eo. When he flourished does not seem to be known.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. SIOLLAN. A saint, bearing the name, Siollán, is mentioned, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> on this day, as having veneration

<sup>11</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Suairleach Eapri.

<sup>12</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 108, 109.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Fintan os Psalmorum.

<sup>2</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxvii. De S. Fintano Psalmicano, p. 771.

<sup>3</sup> We are told, by Colgan, that this Irish word has an equivocal signification: sometimes it means "voluble," and sometimes "given to psalms," or "canticles," "a psalmodist," or "a psalm-singer."

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Februarii. De S. Fintano Abbate et Episcopo Cluainfertensi, p. 385.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 686.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has Moconne Maigh eo.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 686.

<sup>3</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. lvi., p. 137, and n. 115, p. 178.

<sup>4</sup> See "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 505.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii.,

paid to him. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> have a passing notice, at this date, with an indefinite allusion to a St. Sillan, mentioned in the Acts of St. Berach,<sup>3</sup> as furnished by Colgan.<sup>4</sup>

ARTICLE VII.—ARRIVAL OF ST. SELLAN'S RELICS. We find mentioned, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at this date, March 27th, Adventus Reliquiarum Sellani, or the Arrival of St. Sellan's Relics. Who this holy man was, we cannot ascertain; nor can we find, with what place he had been connected; nor is it permitted us to state, the occasion, the locality, or the year, referring to this translation of his relics. It is probable, however, the present festival is not different, from that commemorated in the Martyrology of Donegal, at this day, where the simple name, Siollán, is recorded. This appears to have been the opinion of the Bollandists,<sup>2</sup> likewise, when alluding to the notices, contained in our Irish Calendars, at the present date.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. ARCHIBALDUS, ABBOT AND CONFESSOR, IN ANGLIA. On the authority of the English Martyrology,<sup>1</sup> at the 27th of March, we find St. Archibaldus, Abbot, entered in Henry Fitzsimon's Calendar of Irish Saints. In the anonymous list, published by O'Sullevan Beare,<sup>2</sup> at the same day, we meet with the simple name Archibaldus. So far as we can glean, he is the Abbot and Confessor, in Anglia, and referred to by Galesinius, as he found him, in some Manuscript account. Wion supposes him to have been the same as Erenwaldus,<sup>3</sup> who was consecrated a Bishop of London, after he had been an Abbot. Camerarius makes Archibaldus a Scottish saint, and asserts, that he was Abbot of Carnaminensis; but, the Bollandists,<sup>4</sup> who record these statements, at the 27th of March, wish to have more light thrown on such obscure matters.

ARTICLE IX.—FEAST OF THE RE-COLLECTION OF ST. WASNULPH'S RELICS. The Natalis and Acts of St. Wasnulph are to be found noticed, at the 1st of October. The Translation of his relics, at the 10th of January, and on this day, the feast of the Re-collection of his Relics, are recorded.

ARTICLE X.—THE FESTIVAL DAY OF OUR DIVINE LORD'S RESURRECTION. In the ancient Irish Church, the Festival of Our Divine Lord's Resurrection was observed, on the 27th of March, as we have it recorded, in the "Feilire"<sup>1</sup> of St. Ængus. This accords, also, with the accounts, con-

Martii xxvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 686.

<sup>3</sup> His Life occurs, at the 16th of February.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Februarii xvi. Vita Secunda S. Berachi, cap. vii., p. 345, and n. 6, p. 348.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. The Franciscan copy has, in like manner, at this date, Adventus reliquiarum Sillani.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 686.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> The Second Edition of John Wilson's compilation.

<sup>2</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ

Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 52.

<sup>3</sup> The Bollandists promised to treat of him, at the 30th of April.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 686.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> The following extract from the "Leabhar Breac" copy, and its English translation, have been furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

b. iii. kl. h̄ rex kalaino ap̄reil 1ar tuarlucao anman
 ar̄n̄pach r̄eol ōeum̄ar 1ru ab̄r̄u th̄alman.

tained in very ancient Martyrologies and writings, as may be seen, by consulting the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup>

ARTICLE XI.—ST. CUNIALD, AND ST. GISILARIUS, OR GILLISANUS, COMPANIONS OF ST. RUPERT. At this date, Andrew Saussay sets down the Festival of these holy persons, classed by Colgan among the Irish saints,<sup>1</sup> and said to have been the colleagues of St. Rupert, Bishop of Saltzburgh. The Bollandists omit their festival, at this day. However, it is acknowledged, that their chief feast was celebrated, on the 24th of September, which is that of the Translation of their relics. Further notices will be found, at that date, in reference to those holy men.

ARTICLE XII.—ST. GUMBERT, OR GUNDIBERT, A FRENCH MARTYR, IN IRELAND. We are informed, by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> that Emma was the mother of this holy martyr, and of his brother, St. Niuard. However, there seems no warrant, for Colgan placing his festival, at the present date; whereas, the second edition of the Rheims Breviary enters it, at the 29th of May.<sup>2</sup> It would appear, that Gumbert had entered into the holy state of Matrimony with Berta, and had lived with her many years, while the spouses preserved an inviolable chastity, after the example given by many other persons of their age and country. Such account is taken from the Breviary of Rheims.<sup>3</sup> In France, this holy man had erected two convents for pious women. One of these was near the gate of the city of Rheims;<sup>4</sup> while the other was erected, on his own property (Auennacensis), for his wife Berta, and this was afterwards endowed with the goods of pious men, while Queen Irmentrude was a great benefactress. To promote God's glory, and through a religious motive, Gumbert went to Ireland, and to that part, occupied by the Scoti. He built a monastery there, and while praying in it, he was martyred by barbarians. His relics seem to have reached France, and to have been deposited, in the convent chapel of his wife Berta. There, his intercession was invoked, through subsequent ages, while miracles bore testimony to his sanctity.

Twenty-eighth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. CAIRNECH, BISHOP.

[FIFTH AND SIXTH CENTURIES.]

WE can hardly be said to possess very authentic memorials, regarding this holy man; although Colgan has given us a short Life, compiled "On the sixth of the Kalends of April,

After the redemption of souls,
Then rose—a wonderful news—
Jesus from the womb of the earth."

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxvii. Sancta Memoria Jesu Christi Resurgentis, p. 687.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," Martii xxvii. De SS. Cunialdo et Gisilario sive Gillisano, p. 771.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," Martii xxvii. S. Gumberti sive Gundiberti Martyris Memoria, p. 771.

<sup>2</sup> At this date, Colgan promised to say more regarding him, as also at the 29th of April, the date for his Natalis, according to Ferrarius, Menard, and other writers.

<sup>3</sup> In the first edition, printed A.D. 1600, St. Gumbertus is the name given, in his

from a few records, which came to his hands. However, it would appear, from a statement he has made, that the Acts of St. Cairnech were either lost, or that they had not come into his possession. We are informed, that he was anciently held, in very great veneration, throughout Ireland. So far as we shall be able to disentangle the probable events of St. Cairnech's life, from clouds of fable with which they are surrounded, it will only be necessary to remark, that little more can be known about him, than what mere conjecture furnishes; unless, as may probably be the case, some hitherto unpublished Manuscript should be discovered, and brought to light, which may supply the defective materials we can now procure. We are told, by a well-known Irish writer,<sup>1</sup> that as it concerns his etymon, Cairneach continued to signify a priest, even in the Christian times, from the practice of the druids officiating at the Cairns. Yet, it seems doubtful enough, that such a derivation throws any light on the etymology of our saint's name. The following accounts, relating to St. Cairnech and his relatives, and which have been lately rendered accessible to the public, are contained in an Appendix, to the Irish Version of Nennius' Historia Britonum,<sup>2</sup> ably edited by Dr. James Henthorn Todd, and by the Hon. Algernon Herbert.<sup>3</sup> The legend of St. Cairnech's miracles<sup>4</sup> is found in the Book of Ballymote.<sup>5</sup> Likewise, it occurs, as an interpolation, in Nennius' History of the Britons.<sup>6</sup> The legend itself is supposed to have been composed,<sup>7</sup> subsequently to the close of the eleventh century; and, perhaps, at a much later period. The author is unknown. An extract, from a Manuscript of Mac Firis,<sup>8</sup> throws some light on Cairnech's relatives, Muredhach Mac Eogan, and his wife Erc, who was maternal aunt to our saint. The history of these latter persons receives still farther elucidation, by the publication of a poem,<sup>9</sup> extracted from a Manuscript volume of Bardic verses.<sup>10</sup> From these sources, and from the few meagre notices left us, by Colgan, we are enabled to give the following account,

Office; and, it is set down, with an Octave, but the date for his feast is not noted.

<sup>1</sup> The Breviary of Rheims adds: "cujus restat Aula, Sacellum, et Capella, S. Patri-cii multis ornata miraculis."

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See Toland's "History of the Druids," p. 105. He adds in note (24), on this passage: "This is the true origin of the word Cairneach, as signifying a Priest; but not derived, as men ignorant of antiquity fancy, from Coroíneach, alluding to the crown-formed tonsure of the monks, not near so old as this word."

<sup>2</sup> This work was published, by the Irish Archæological Society. Dublin, 1848.

<sup>3</sup> A translation of the Irish version and notes by the former, and an Introduction and additional notes by the latter, manifest acquaintance with the sources of Irish history, and an impartiality of investigation, highly creditable to the industry and ability of both these gentlemen.

<sup>4</sup> It is probably a pure fiction, like many other things in this "fabula perquam futilis," Sgel goimgech gan uach fínnne, as it is truly called, in a note, containing the handwriting of old Charles O'Connor, on the margin of the Book of Ballymote.—See Dr. Todd's note (r), p. 186, in the Irish version of the "Historia Britonum."

<sup>5</sup> This valuable Manuscript had been written in the fourteenth century, and it is now preserved, in the Royal Irish Academy's Library.

<sup>6</sup> It is inserted, before an account, which he gives of the English Saxon Conquest, and after the desertion of Britain, by the Romans.

<sup>7</sup> It is probably quoted, by Dudley Mac Firis, whose MS. was in the possession of Earl Roden; but, whether "the old book," from which this antiquary quotes, be the Book of Ballymote, or some other book, containing similar matter, we cannot now decide, with any degree of accuracy.

<sup>8</sup> It is published, in the Irish version of Nennius.

<sup>9</sup> It commences, with these words, "Enna the pupil of hardy Cairbre," as translated from the Irish.

<sup>10</sup> This was preserved, in the Royal Irish Academy, for the examination and transcription of Irish scholars. It was the property of the late O'Connor Don, who gave it in trust to the Academicians, for the aforesaid purpose. See Irish version of the Historia Britonum of Nennius, for the foregoing and subsequent particulars. Editor's Preface, pp. vi., vii. Appendix, pp. 178 to 193. Additional Notes, No. xxii., pp. ci. to cxi.

<sup>11</sup> "Natus est hic Sanctus circa sæculi corrected, also, from annotations, by the Editors of Nennius' Irish version. St. Cairnach was born, in the county of Louth, about the middle of the fifth century.<sup>11</sup> His father was named Sarran, and he is said<sup>12</sup> to have acquired dominion, over the Picts and Saxons. If such be the case, however, his sovereignty must date at a period, somewhat subsequent to the Saxon invasion, A.D. 449; although the legend gives an account of his conquests in Britain, as occurring first in order. According to the Genesis<sup>13</sup> of Irish Saints, Sarran was son to Colchuo, Coelchu, or Colgan, son to Tuathal, son to Fedhlim,<sup>14</sup> son to Fiachra Cassan, the son of Colla da Crioch.<sup>15</sup> Besides our saint, Saran is said to have been the father of a St. Ronan, and of a St. Becan, or Brecan. Loarn<sup>16</sup> was made first King of Scotland, A.D. 503,<sup>17</sup> and he is said to have reigned, for the duration of ten years.<sup>18</sup> He had two daughters, named respectively, Erc, and Pompa,<sup>19</sup> or Babona.<sup>20</sup> To his name had been affixed the epithet Mor, "great."<sup>21</sup> His father was named Erc, and, strange as it may appear, his daughter was distinguished by the same appellation. The legend of our saint's Life states, that Erc was first married to Sarran, that she afterwards eloped with Muiredhach,<sup>22</sup> to Ireland, and bore him four sons, viz.: Muircheartach Mac Erca, who was afterwards King of Erin, Fearadhach, Tighearnach and Maian. A supposition has been made, that Erc had been only betrothed to Sarran, and that the marriage ceremony had never taken place between them. This, however, is improbable, for the reason, that she was afterwards obliged to perform a severe public penance. This supposes some guilt of a public and of an infamous character.<sup>23</sup> Being deserted by Erc, Sarran procured an alliance with her quinti medium in finibus Orgiellorum, nobili oriundus prosapia."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxviii. Martii, p. 782.

<sup>12</sup> In the legend.

<sup>13</sup> Chap. xiii.

<sup>14</sup> He is made the son of Fechim, son of Fiach, son of Colla da Crioch, in another authority, quoted by Colgan, in n. 2, but the first is more correct. See Dr. Todd's note (b), p. 175. The author in question is conjectured to be Seluacius, or some one who wrote on the Genealogies of the Irish saints, chap. xi.

<sup>15</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxviii. Martii, p. 783, n. 1, and xxi. Martii, p. 713. Appendix, cap. iv.

<sup>16</sup> Loarn, in Scotland, is supposed to derive its name from him. However, Hector Boece and other Scottish writers do not include him among the kings of Scotland. On this matter, too, the reader is referred to a more clear and intelligible account, in William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland," vol. i., book i., chap. v., pp. 226 to 230.

<sup>17</sup> According to O'Flaherty, in his "Ogygia." See Scotiæ Regum Catalogus Chronologo-Generalogicus, p. 470.

<sup>18</sup> Colgan had in his possession, a Catalogue of the kings of the Scots of Albania, or of the Dalriedii, from their first King Loarn, to Malcolm, the son of Dunchad, who began to reign A.D. 1057, and under whom the Scoto-British author states he lived. This Tract affirms what is related in the text.

<sup>19</sup> The "Opuscula," attributed to St. Ængus, states: "Pompa filia Loarni filii Erci, mater fuit S. Carnechi S. Brecani et S. Ronani filiorum Sarani."—Lib. iv., cap. 19.

<sup>20</sup> She is so called, by Seluacius, or Selbach, in his Irish Metrical Genealogies of the Saints; and, he distinguishes her, as the mother of St. Ronan, the son of Saran, descended from the Colla Dacrioch. St. Brecan and St. Carnech were two brothers of St. Ronan, Bebona, the daughter of Loarn being the mother of these three saints. Chapter ii. Her name denotes "a good" or "a benign woman."

<sup>21</sup> After him, his brother Fergus reigned for twenty-seven years. See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxviii. Martii, nn. 2, 3, p. 783.

<sup>22</sup> Muiredhach was son to Eoghan Mac Neill Naoighiallach.

<sup>23</sup> The account in Dudley Mac Firbis' Book tells us, that Muiredach's female companion married again, after his demise. "After the death of the son of Eoghan, Feargus, the son of Conal Gulban espoused Earc, the daughter of Loarn:—

"Four sons had Fergus by Erc,
The same were worthy;
Fedhlimidh, and Loarn, Brennainn and Seudna."

—Irish version of Nennius. Additional Notes, No. xxii., p. cii. This account also accords, with what we find in O'Flaherty's sister Pompa,<sup>24</sup> or Babona, and by this latter, it is said, he had five sons. Four only are named in the legend, viz.: Luirig, Cairnach, Dallain and Caemlach. This account of Pompa's sons by Sarran, is quite different from that given, by Colgan and O'Flaherty. These writers tell us, that she had three sons, named Garnech, Ronan, and Breacan, or Becan.<sup>25</sup> In the account, taken from the Manuscript of Dudley Mac Fribiss, it would seem, that after her marriage with Fergus, Erc felt remorse for her former crimes; and, in order to give some public example of penitence, she set out from Tory Island, on the north-western coast of Donegal. She directed her course, most probably on foot, towards the palace of Aileach, near Derry, where St. Cairneach then dwelt. It is said, that in token of penitence, she knelt at every second ridge on the way, and that blood oozed from the ends of her fingers, when she came into her nephew's presence. St. Cairneach received her with the following prophetic words: "I hail thee, O Earc, and thou shalt go to Heaven; and, one of every two worthy kings, who shall reign over Erin, shall be of thy seed; the best women, and the best clerics, shall be theirs; success in battle and combat shall be upon them." He then absolved her, from the former sins she had committed. In anticipation of her approaching end, she wished to leave some testamentary bequests to her nephew, and to his successors.<sup>26</sup> From her eight noble sons, she had received a territory, and free from all claim.<sup>27</sup> This was to depend, on the descendants of Earc's sons, in Tir-Connell. The sons of Fearghus had given her, likewise, a place called Druihm Lighean, or Cruachan Lighean, now Drumleene,<sup>28</sup> on the western bank of Lough Foyle, near Lifford. It is still the name of a townland, in the barony of Raphoe, parish of Clonleigh,<sup>29</sup> or Clonlaoth, County Donegal. It was remarkable for its convenient situation, between Tir Eoghain and Tir Conaill. This fine territory she bequeathed to the venerated Cairneach, her sister's son.<sup>30</sup> We are informed, that after Cairnech, Massan<sup>31</sup> and Cassan<sup>32</sup> were the two Coarbs, who gave Druihm Lighean away freely, on condition of receiving Cairneach's tribute.

"Ogygia:" "Erica Loarni regis filia bis nupta; primo Muredacho Nielli Magni ex Eugenio filio nepoti filios edidit Murchertum Regem Hiberniæ, Anno 513. & 14, regum Hiberniæ Satorem, Feradachum Suwnei R. Hiberniæ avum, Tigernachum, & Moenum: secundo nupta Fergusio Conalli Gulbanii filio, prioris mariti patrueli genuit Sednæum novem Hiberniæ regum progenitorem, Fedlimium S. Columbæ utriusque Scotiæ Divi tutelaris patrem, Loarnum, & Brendanum."—"Scotiæ Regum Catalogus Chronologico-Generalogicus," p. 471.

<sup>24</sup> This name is held to express "a proud woman."

<sup>25</sup> "Pompa Bebona altera Loarni Regis filia Sarano conjugi, qui Fiachrium Cassan Colla Huasii Anno 327. R. Hiberniæ ex fratre nepotem abavum prætulit, enixa est SS. Carnechum, Ronanum, et Breacanum."—O'Flaherty's "Ogygia." Scotiæ Regum Catalogus Chronologico-Generalogicus, p. 471.

<sup>26</sup> So it is stated, in the poem, beginning with the translated words: "Enna, the pupil of hardy Cairbre."

<sup>27</sup> In the Irish Poem, it is fiúe fall, a Brehon law term, nearly equivalent to our fee-simple.

<sup>28</sup> It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Donegal," Sheets 62, 63, 70, 71.

<sup>29</sup> A monastery was founded, by St. Columba, at Clonleigh. See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. i., p. 435, num. 53.

<sup>30</sup> The poem, as translated, continues:—

"Her horses, her gold, her apparel,
Her parents of many heavy hundreds,
And that he be entertained at banquets,
For her by the sons of Muireadhach.

"Her suit of apparel every year,
As if she were alive by strict injunction,
And an hundred of every kind of cattle
To Cairneach from the seed of Eoghan.

"The seed of Eoghan paid the tribute
During Cairneach's life without murmur,
And they paid it—noble deed—
After him, for the term of twenty years."

<sup>31</sup> Colgan has a conjecture, that eliding the M for mo, this may be the St. Assanus, whose feast occurs, at the 27th of April.

This was paid, by the prosperous Clann Neill, free of expeditions or of hostings,<sup>33</sup> although, as the poem states, they might have kept it without reproach. And, subject to this tribute, Fearghus, son of Muirheartach, with his sons, took Drúim Lighean. Hence, they were called Uí Ethach Droma Lighean, the descendants of Eochaidh of Drúim Lighean, or Feara Droma Lighean, the men of Drum Lighean.<sup>34</sup> The substance of the foregoing poem is given, by Colgan, in his Acts of St. Carnech; and, moreover, he says, that the author of it lived at a remote period, from that time, when his own work had been written.<sup>35</sup> After Erc's bequest, and when she had been absolved, she was called away to a life of bliss. Her nephew blessed that spot, where she died. It was afterwards called Ceall Earca, i.e., "Earc's Cell." Cairneach left Criodan, a Bishop, in charge of this place.<sup>36</sup> Colgan is of opinion, that after these liberal bequests, Cairneach founded two churches, in the territory of Cruachan, or Drúim Lighean, either building not being far apart from the other. It is thought, that over these he exercised the rule of an Abbot, with Episcopal jurisdiction.<sup>37</sup> One of the churches was named Domnach-Mor, of Magh Íth, towards the west; the other was named Cluain Loadh, now Clonleigh, towards the north. Our Hagiographers generally state, that St. Carnech was a bishop, but they do not mention the name of his See. Some suppose, that he only enlarged or improved a church, founded by St. Columkille, at Clonleigh. Little more can be stated, regarding St. Cairnech's acts, at least, as having been connected with Ireland; for, the legend which follows may refer, in part, to this country, or to Britain, without our being able to decide with certainty, from the obscure character of its narrative.<sup>38</sup> Sarran may have reigned, over the Saxons and Picts, it is thought, towards the beginning of the sixth century. We are told, that he died, "after triumph in the house of Martin;" by which we may infer, that he died a monk, either in the city of Tours, in France, which he is thought to have conquered, and to have bestowed the bishopric thereof on his son Cairneach; or, perhaps, in some other place, where a monastery had been dedicated to St. Martin of Tours. There were two places in Cornwall, named after St. Martin; and, before the Benedictine Rule was established, nearly all Irish monks are said to have followed the Martinist foundation. However this be, Lúirig succeeded his father, and extended his sway, over the Saxons. It seems, that Muirheartach Mac <sup>32</sup> Colgan thinks, he may be the St. Cassanus, who is venerated, at the 20th of June.

<sup>33</sup> The successors of St. Carnech, it appears, preferred the tribute to the land, which was at that time burdened with the charges of expeditions and hostings, the maintenance of troops, and also the obligation of serving personally in the wars, from which the ecclesiastical character of the owners did not protect them.

<sup>34</sup> See the genealogy of the O'Donnells, who were the chiefs of the Fir Droma, in the Appendix to, Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. vi., p. 2426.

<sup>35</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxviii. Martii. Vita S. Carnechi, cap. iii., iv., p. 782.

<sup>36</sup> To such information, as was given in the Manuscript, we find added the following sentence: "This is from the copy of the Book of Lecan Maic Firsigh." And, in a note on Criodan, it is said: "Perhaps this is the same whom Colgan mentions as a disciple of St. Petroe, or Pereuse, Abbot of Padstow (i.e. Petroestowe), in Cornwall, who died about A.D. 564. Of Criodan, Colgan says: Cridanus . . . . Colitur in Lagenia, in ecclesia de Acadh Binnich, die 11 Maii."—"Acta Sanctorum," p. 586, nn. 11, 12, 13.—"Irish Version of Nennius," Additional Notes, No. xxii., p. ciii.

<sup>37</sup> Such is Colgan's opinion.

<sup>38</sup> These foregoing particulars appear to be all of an authentic character, that can be related, regarding our saint. What follows, in the text, would seem referable to another saint, bearing the like name, and a contemporary. He is called, "Antistes Tulensis in Media," and he is said to have flourished, about the year 450. He is said to have been a Briton, by race, and to have been son to a king of Ceretica, a Cambro-Briton. His feast occurs, at the 16th of May, according to John of Teignmouth and John Capgrave.

Erca, who was a prince of violent passions, having previously killed some Crossans, in Ireland, had been banished from the island, and he took refuge in Scotland. Here, having slain his grandfather Loarn, he was again expelled that country. He then fled to the King of Britain, and having had his arms consecrated, by his cousin Cairneach, according to a custom of the time, he offered to this latter king his military services, which were eagerly accepted. Before this time, Luirig had built a fort, within the precincts of his brother Cairneach's monastery, without his consent being obtained, and much to his annoyance. When the consecration of Muircheartach's arms took place, Cairneach is reported to have said to him: "Thou shalt be king of Eri and of Britain, forever, and shalt go to heaven after, provided thou canst but prevent Luirig, from exercising his power against the Church." Muircheartach reported this speech to Luirig, who thereupon cried out: "As God is my judge, I think more of the power of the pet wild fawn he has, than of his own power, or of the power of the Lord God whom he adores." Muircheartach told the result to Cairneach, who, moved with indignation, exclaimed: "My prayer to my Lord, to my God, is, that this very fawn may be the cause of his death, and by thy hand, O Mac Erca!" The person addressed, already familiar with deeds of violence, looked upon these words of Cairneach, as a sufficient warrant for an attempt on Luirig's life. He sought the monarch's presence, at a time when he was surrounded by his guards and nobles, as also by women, representing his household. At this moment, a wild fawn<sup>39</sup> rushed out from the mountain, and all the king's guards started forth in pursuit, leaving Luirig alone, with those women and Mac Erca. The latter, having reproached him with injustice towards St. Cairneach, drove his spear through the king's body, and then brought Luirig's head to the bishop, as a trophy, betokening the successful issue of his unnatural deed. To complete this wicked act, it is said, that he forced the French king, after many conflicts, to yield his daughter, who had been previously married to Luirig. By her, he is said to have had four sons, viz.: Constantine and Gedal Ficht, from whom the British kings and those of Cornwall claim descent; Nellenn, from whom the race of Nellenn is derived; and Scannal, from whom the posterity of Scannail draw their origin. These two last races belong to Ireland. St. Cairneach is said to have been present, at a Council, held in Tours, at which Euphronius, Bishop of Tours, and eight other bishops, assisted. This Council was convened, at St. Martin's church, on the 17th of November, about the year 566 or 567. In the legend of our saint's life, it is stated, that he afterwards set out on a pilgrimage to Lien—probably Lyons—accompanied by many bishops; and, that this pilgrimage was undertaken, for the sake of Mac Erca and Muiredhach. It is said, that he afterwards returned to Cornwall, in which part of Britain he ruled as bishop; and that, afterwards, he became bishop, over the Clann-Niall and of Tara,<sup>40</sup> in Ireland, where he is supposed to have died. He is called first martyr, and first monk of Eri, and, likewise, first Brehon, or judge. These extravagant and incoherent relations are passed over, in silence, by the learned Colgan. The feast of St. Cearneach, Bishop, was held, on the 28th of March. We find, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>41</sup> the name of Cairnigh, Bishop, without any other description, at this date. Again, Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire, calling him bishop, commemorate him at the same day, but they do not designate the <sup>39</sup> Meaning, of course, the wild fawn already spoken of, for otherwise the prayer of St. Cairneach would not have been fulfilled.

<sup>40</sup> This must mean, over the diocese or ecclesiastical province, in which Tara had been situated, place, where he was venerated as patron.<sup>42</sup> According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>43</sup> on this day was celebrated a festival in honour of Cairnech, Bishop.<sup>44</sup> Before or about the year 530, Colgan assigns for the death of St. Cairneach. This date, he endeavours to establish, from the circumstance, that Fergus, the son of Murchertach, possessed Cruachan's farm, after twenty years from Carnech's demise, about the year 550. Fergus and Domhnall died, A.D. 561, according to the Annals of the Four Masters, after they had jointly reigned over Ireland, for three years. If such be the case, that our saint died before, or about, the year 530, and, if we admit a statement, that another saint, bearing a nearly similar name, and called Carantoch by the Britons, flourished about A.D. 450; we shall have still greater difficulty, in reconciling those latter actions, regarding our saint, as recorded in the Irish version of the Historia Britonum, with authentic history. Regarding what has been related of his actions, in Britain and in France, especially his assisting at the Council of Tours, and afterwards returning to Ireland; we can hardly reconcile it with a date, which assigns his birth to the middle of the fifth century, unless, indeed, we should be willing to allow his having attained an extraordinary age, and a date of departure, much later, than that given by Colgan. The name Carnechus, and the designation Episcopus, are all we find in the Bollandists,<sup>45</sup> at this particular day.

<sup>41</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, the entry of this saint's name is Cairnig Epaf.

ARTICLE II.—ST. CONALD, OR CONALL, BISHOP OF KILSKYRE, COUNTY OF MEATH. [Ninth Century.] The servant of Christ, Conall, or Conald, is said to have been son to Fiachna, Prince of East Meath,<sup>1</sup> and of the blood royal of Ireland.<sup>2</sup> The latter was son to Maelduin, son of Colman, son to Aedh, son of Libren, son to Dallen, son of Endeus, son to Loegaire, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages.<sup>3</sup> Colgan has entered some notices, in which an effort is made to investigate matters, serving to illustrate this saint's biography.<sup>4</sup> The Bollandists barely notice him, with doubts of his claim to a legitimate cultus.<sup>5</sup> We are told, that Conall was at first Bishop of Kilskeyre, or Kilskeer. This old church is now a ruin, measuring eighty-two feet, by twenty-seven feet, three inches.<sup>6</sup> The body is completely desolated, for the windows, doorway, and east wall, have disappeared. The western end terminated, in a triple belfry. Within the chancel, there is a sepulchral cross, which originally marked the grave of an ecclesiastic. Kilskeyre was plundered and burned, on more than one occasion; and, after the English Invasion, a parish church merely remained.<sup>7</sup> It is now a parish, in the barony of Upper Kells, and county of Meath. Conall was the only bishop we meet with in that place.<sup>8</sup> Thence, it would seem, he went to the Great Island of

<sup>42</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxviii. Martii, n. 14, p. 784.

<sup>43</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, p. 89.

<sup>44</sup> The Calendarist observes, that there was a Cairnech, son of Saran, and sprung from the race of Colla-da Chroich, son of Eochaidh Dounhlén.

<sup>45</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxviii. Among the pretermitted saints," p. 709.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Colgan states, that it was the district Hi-Loegaire, or belonging to "the posterity of Leogaire."

<sup>2</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xxi., sect. xiii., p. 323.

<sup>3</sup> Thus does his pedigree run in the "Sanctilogic Genealogies," chap. iii., while Seluacius, or the compiler of another Genealogy, is of accord.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxviii. Martii. De S. Conallo sive Conaldo, p. 784.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 709.

<sup>6</sup> An interesting account of Kilskeyre is given, in Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. xxvi., pp. 147 to 149.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., p. 148.

<sup>8</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical His-

Aran. Here, he is said<sup>9</sup> to have taken up his residence, at a place now known as Teampul an cheathruir aluinn, Anglicised, "the church of the four beauties," or of "the four beautiful saints." Only a few fragments of the walls now remain.<sup>10</sup> It is related, that there St. Furseus<sup>11</sup> spent several years, in solitude and prayer, before he set out on the mission of founding his establishment at Perrone. His memory has not departed from the minds of the Araners ; for, the people of those islands greatly venerate this extraordinary saint. They still relate many cures effected, through intercession of the same holy man.<sup>12</sup> St. Brendan of Birr<sup>13</sup> was another of those popular heroes, as also St. Berchan,<sup>14</sup> with the present St. Conall,<sup>15</sup> according to the author already quoted. During the reign of Aidus Finliath,<sup>16</sup> who obtained such advantages over the Danes,<sup>17</sup> St. Conall died, A.D. 865,<sup>18</sup> or 866,<sup>19</sup> and tory of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xxi., sect. xiii., p. 323.

Church of the Four Beautiful Saints, Aranmore.

<sup>9</sup> By Rev. Anthony Cogan, in his "Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. xxvi., pp. 147, 148. I cannot discover, on what authority this statement is made.

<sup>10</sup> The accompanying illustration, drawn on the wood by William F. Wakeman, was from a sketch, by Howard Helmick, Esq., Dangan Cottage, Galway, and furnished to the writer, in 1877. It was engraved, by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>11</sup> See his Life, at the 16th of January.

<sup>12</sup> Such is the account I have received, from Rev. John A. Concanon, P.P., of Aran, in a letter, dated Arran Islands, January 15th, 1877.

<sup>13</sup> His feast occurs, on the 29th of November.

<sup>14</sup> I cannot discover the date for his festival.

<sup>15</sup> It is by no means certain, however, that he was the same as the Aran saint, so called.

<sup>16</sup> He was King of Ireland, from A.D. 861, to A.D. 876, according to the Four Masters. He died A.D. 879, after a reign of sixteen years, as stated in Moore's "History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xvii., p. 39.

<sup>17</sup> See the account, in Dr. Jeffry Keating's "History of Ireland," part ii., pp. 436 to 488, Duffy's edition. There, however, the reign of this monarch is referred to the close of the ninth, and to the beginning of the tenth, century.

<sup>18</sup> At this date, his death is recorded, in Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 502, 503, and by Duaid Mac Firbis, in "Proceedings of the on the 28th day of March. The "Chronicon Scotorum,"<sup>20</sup> however, has his demise at A.D. 867. His record is found, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>21</sup> at the 28th of March. Marianus O'Gorman and Maguire commemorate him, in like manner, and style him a bishop. On this day, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>22</sup> we find mentioned the name of Conall, Bishop, as having veneration paid him. St. Fursey, with Brendan of Birr, Berchan, and the present Conall, as we are told, were buried in the cemetery of the same church, and their bodies were deposited in the same tomb.<sup>23</sup> It seems possible, that after our saint's time—the number being completed—that old church got its distinguishing appellation, of belonging to "the four beautiful saints," and this name it still bears. According to Colgan,<sup>24</sup> the Translation, or some Festival, of this saint was kept, at Trim, on the 17th of February, when many holy persons are commemorated, on that day, and at the same place. He thinks, several of these were related to the present St. Conall; but, the matter is altogether doubtful, so far as he is concerned.

ARTICLE III.—ST. CASSAN, OF IOMDUAL, OR IMDUAIL, AND SUPPOSED TO BE OF DONAGHMORE, COUNTY OF MEATH. It is thought, that the present saint flourished, at a very early period. Thus, Colgan endeavours—but very imperfectly—to evolve his identity of name and place, from among the various saints, whose names are similarly written.<sup>1</sup> It is thought, that after St. Patrick<sup>2</sup> had baptized people, at a place, called Donaghmore, in the plain of Echnach, he committed to the present St. Cassan, his disciple, and a Presbyter, the charge of a congregation.<sup>3</sup> It was predicted, also, that the church here should be diminutive in size, and poor in structure; yet, great and celebrated in honour and veneration. In after times, the relics of St. Cassanus were there preserved, and held in great respect, by the people.<sup>4</sup> Miracles were wrought, at the place, and many pilgrims to his shrine recovered bodily health, or obtained various spiritual favours.<sup>5</sup> Donaghmore, anciently called Domnach-mor-muighe Echnach, or "the great church of the plain of Echnach," is said to have been situated, on the northern bank of the Boyne, about a mile from Navan, and in the barony of Lower Navan, county of Meath.<sup>6</sup> The original church has long since disappeared, and on its site was erected a parish church, in the twelfth century.<sup>7</sup> A beautiful Round

Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 98, 99.

<sup>19</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. xxvi., p. 147.

<sup>20</sup> See William M. Hennessy's Edition.

<sup>21</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. The entry of this name, in the Franciscan copy, is very illegibly written.

<sup>22</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>23</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxi. Martii. Appendix ad Acta S. Endei, cap. vii., num. 10, p. 715.

<sup>24</sup> See ibid., Martii xxviii. De S. Conallo sive Conaldo Episcopo, p. 784, and n. 11.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxviii. Martii. De S. Cassano, Episcopo et Abbate, pp. 779 to 782.

<sup>2</sup> The reader is referred to the account, already given, in his Life, at the 17th of March, chap. x.

<sup>3</sup> On this matter, the reader may consult Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Sexta Vita S. Patricii, cap. xciii., p. 86. In a note appended, however, Colgan refers this St. Cassan's feast to the 4th of June. See n. 104, p. 113.

<sup>4</sup> See Mr. and Mrs. Hall's "Ireland: its Scenery, Character," &c., vol. ii., p. 384.

<sup>5</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, pars. ii., cap. ix., x., pp. 130, 131, and n. 33, p. 174.

<sup>6</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," for an account of Donoughmore, chap. xxii., pp. 128 to 131.

<sup>7</sup> See "Irish Penny Journal," vol. i. Also, William F. Wakeman's "Hand-Book of Irish Antiquities," part ii., chap. v., p. 102.

<sup>8</sup> Colgan places his feast, at the 12th of November.

<sup>9</sup> It is a parish, in the barony of Delvin,

Tower of the tenth century rises to the height of one hundred feet. It is said, likewise, that St. Cassan was the master, to whom St. Patrick committed the charge of St. Lonan's<sup>8</sup> education. He was afterwards venerated, in the church of Kill-Huailleach, now said to be Killulagh,<sup>9</sup> in the county of Westmeath.<sup>10</sup> Besides the Cassan of Iomdhual, venerated on this day, there were three other holy persons bearing a similar name, viz., Cassan, a Priest, commemorated on the 4th of June,<sup>11</sup> Cassan of Cluain-Raithe, venerated on the 20th of June, and another Cassan, whose feast occurs on the 3rd of December,<sup>12</sup> besides another St. Cassan, son of Nemen, whose commemoration has been assigned to the 1st of March. However, it is thought, by Colgan,<sup>13</sup> that all of these may not have been different persons; since, the same saint might have been venerated, on different days, as in divers places, although there are certainly three different Cassans<sup>14</sup> distinguished, in our Genealogies, as belonging to separate families. The Bollandists<sup>15</sup> merely allude to Cassanus de Imdual, at this day. On the 28th of March, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>16</sup> appears, also, the name of Cassan, Imdual.<sup>17</sup> Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire have entries of this feast. This day is recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>18</sup> the name of Cassan, of Iomdhual. In addition to this notice, the Calendarist adds, that there is a Cassan, son of Athracht, and descended from the race of Laeghaire, son to Niall. Indeed, it may be said, that little is known, regarding the present saint.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. SILLAN. The simple entry, Sillan, is found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at this date. It is also an entry, in the Bollandists' work,<sup>2</sup> and, on the same authority.

ARTICLE V.—FEAST OF ST. MARY MAGDALENE. In the Irish Church, and it is described, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheets 8, 13, 14, 21. The townland proper is on Sheet 13.

<sup>10</sup> See Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. ii., chap. xviii., p. 412, and vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 574.

<sup>11</sup> According to some accounts, in Domnach-Peduir, or the "church of St. Peter."

<sup>12</sup> See the "Martyrology of Donegal," as edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, at these respective dates.

<sup>13</sup> See his observations, in "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxviii. De S. Cassano Episcopo et Abbate, cap. v., pp. 780, 781.

<sup>14</sup> One of these is St. Cassan, son of Etract, son to Liberius, son of King Laoighaire, according to the Sanctilogic Genealogy, chap. iii., and a scribe in Lusk Monastery. His death is recorded, in our Annals, at A.D. 695. A second sprung from Eochod, son of Mured, as the same Genealogy states, chap. xxii. A third, the son of Moenach, with seven holy brothers, were descended from Lugad, surnamed Mac-Con, King of Ireland. See ibid. Last chapter. Colgan conjectures, that the present saint was not one of the two foregoing; but, that he may have been the son of Nemen, or perhaps, the son of Moenach. If he were the son of Nemen, he was probably, a holy man, contemporaneous with St. Brigid, and with St. Finian of Clonard, as mentioned in the Acts of the latter. If he were the son of Moenach, he may have been the Cassidus, or Casidanus, noticed, in the Acts of St. Senan of Iniscathy, according to Colgan. See ibid., cap. v., vi., vii., viii.

<sup>15</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxviii. Among the pretermitted saints, pp. 709, 710.

<sup>16</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, I find Cappan Im-dual.

<sup>17</sup> The only place, corresponding with that name in Ireland, and now known, is Imdel, a townland in the parish of Drumballyrone, in the lower part of Upper Iveagh barony and county of Down. It is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 41.

<sup>18</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xix. In the Franciscan copy is written, Sillan.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 709.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> The following extract,

according to the Feilire of St. Ængus,<sup>1</sup> the Festival of St. Mary Magdalene was kept, on the 28th of March. The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> also remark, that her feast is set down, in the Martyrologies of Tallagh, and of Treves, in Germany; but, they refer her chief commemoration, to the 22nd day of July.

ARTICLE VI.—REPUTED FEAST OF ST. FULARTACH, BISHOP OF CLONARD. [Eighth Century.] Under the head of Disert Fulartaigh,<sup>1</sup> Duaid Mac Firbis enters, Fulartach, son of Brec, Bishop of Clonard, in Meath, and from Disert Fulartaigh, in Offaly.<sup>2</sup> His death is referred to A.D. 778, and March the 28th is added. We think, however, his commemoration is more in place, on the day succeeding.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. KORTILLUS, OR KORTYLA, BISHOP OF VERDEN, AND MARTYR. In the Catalogue of our Irish Saints, furnished by Henry Fitzsimon,<sup>1</sup> the name of St. Kortillus, Bishop and Martyr, occurs, at the 28th of March. He cites the English Martyrology,<sup>2</sup> as authority for his statement, as does Ferrarius, likewise; yet, the Bollandists,<sup>3</sup> who passingly allude to him, at this date, remark, that he was regarded as a Scot, and the sixth bishop of Verden, in succession, while little more could be said regarding him, save that his festival was referable to the 30th of April. He is generally classed among our Irish saints, the term Scotus not invalidating his claim to be so reckoned. At the 28th of March, as a Scottish saint, Dempster<sup>4</sup> enters Kortila, Bishop at Verda, the sixth who possessed the See.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. CHRONANUS. In the anonymous list of our national saints, as published by O'Sullivan Beare,<sup>1</sup> at the 28th of March, we find the name of St. Chronanus. I suspect, however, that it is a mistake for St. Cronan,<sup>2</sup> Abbot of Roscrea, who is venerated on the 28th of April.

ARTICLE IX.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. GUTHBERTUS. In the anonymous list of national saints, published by O'Sullivan Beare,<sup>1</sup> we find the entry of Guthbertus, at the 27th of March. This appears intended for St. Cuthbert, whose Life will be found at the 20th of March; nor there do we find any corresponding date, for such a commemoration, as has been entered for him, at the present day.

from the Leabhar Breac copy, with its English translation, was furnished by Professor O'Looney:—

C. u. kl. Donnógna donnógna
Sech pianna donnógna Máiría donnógna in mop magdalena.

“May she invite us, may she save us
From pains may she protect us;
May Mary magnify us
The great Magdalena.”

<sup>1</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 711.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See “Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy,” Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 106, 107.

<sup>2</sup> According to William M. Hennessy, the place is now known as Dysert, in the barony of Carbury, and county of Kildare.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> See “Catalogus Aliquorum Sanctorum Iberniae.”

<sup>2</sup> Mart. Angl. Another Saint Kortillus (?) is noticed at the 28th of April.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxviii. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 710.

<sup>4</sup> See “Menologium Scoticum.” Bishop Forbes’ “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 194.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> See “Historiæ Catholice Iberniae Compendium,” tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50.

<sup>2</sup> See his Life, at the proper day.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See “Historiæ Catholice Iberniae Compendium,” tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50.

Twenty-ninth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. FULARTACH, OR FULARTUS, BISHOP OF CLONARD.

[EIGHTH CENTURY.]

SOME account of this holy bishop is to be found, in Colgan,<sup>1</sup> with a very succinct notice, in the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup> From the former, we learn, that St. Fulartach, or Fulartus,<sup>3</sup> as he is sometimes called, was son to Brec, or Brecus, and he was descended from an illustrious family, in Ulster, as may be collected from the names of his progenitors. Thus, Brec was son to Scandal, son of Boedan, son to Eochod, son of Cella, son to Coelbad, son of Crunn Badhra,<sup>4</sup> according to the Genealogies of the Irish Saints.<sup>5</sup> It is probable, he was born in the province of Ulster; but, in what year has not transpired. He built an oratory, in Hy-Falgia territory, and, at a place, which derives its name from the founder, having been called Disert Fulartach. Here, it is said, he lived an eremitical life, for a time. Nearly all our ancient records state, that from this place, he was translated to the See of Clonard. This he governed, with distinguished merit and virtue. However, the Rev. Dr. Lanigan appears to think, that St. Fulartach, of Disert Fulartach, may have been a different person from the bishop, as some writers have made a distinction between them.<sup>6</sup> Accordingly, the Annals of the Four Masters specify, that Fulartach, son to Breac, an anchorite, died in the year 755;<sup>7</sup> while, Fulartach, Bishop of Clonard, departed A.D. 774.<sup>8</sup> However, it is remarked, by Colgan, that the Annals of the Four Masters do not state expressly, the former died in 755, as they do, regarding other persons named with him; hence, they may have only intended to indicate, that he flourished in such year, and that, subsequently, he became Bishop of Clonard, after obtaining which dignity, he died in 774,<sup>9</sup> a date assigned by our Annalists for the death of the prelate of this See.<sup>10</sup> There are two festivals, in honour of St. Fulartach: one of these was celebrated, on the 29th day of March. Fulartach mac Brice is the only entry concerning him, as found in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>11</sup> at this date. Cathal Maguire and Marianus O'Gorman have a like entry; the latter with the remark, that he was Bishop

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxix. Martii. De S. Fulartacho sive Fularto Eremita, pp. 787, 788.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 766.

<sup>3</sup> By Irish writers, this saint is called Fulartach. In Latin, he is called Fulartus, or Felartus. The same may be observed of a homonymous saint, whose Acts will be found, at the 21st of December.

<sup>4</sup> Hence, it would appear, that our saint belonged to the same race as St. Fergusius, Bishop of Downpatrick, whose Acts are found on the following day—30th of March.

<sup>5</sup> Chapter xxiii.

<sup>6</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. xvi., p. 202.

<sup>7</sup> In Dr. O'Donovan's edition of the "Annals of the Four Masters," at A.D. 755, the terms (oecc), and (died), are thus supplied, within brackets, being wanting in the original Irish page, and, of course, in the literal English translation, as applied to Fulartach, the Anchorite.

<sup>8</sup> At the year 755, we read: "Fulartach, son of Breac, an anchorite, [died.]" And at the year 774: "Fulartach, Bishop of Cluain-Iraid [Clonard], died." — Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 358, 359, and 378, 379.

<sup>9</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxix. Martii. Vita S. Fulartachi, p. 787.

<sup>10</sup> See Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. ii., pp. 15, 21.

<sup>11</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. The Franciscan copy has Fulartach mac Brice.

of Clonard,<sup>12</sup> while the commentator adds a more eulogistic notice.<sup>13</sup> This day, we find, set down in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>14</sup> the name of Furlartach, son of Brec, Bishop of Cluain-Eraird, and of Disert Furlartaich, in Ui Failghe. The Calendarist adds, there is found a Furlartach, son of Brec, and descended from the race of Irial, son of Conall Cearnach, according to the Naoimhsenchus. In the table appended to the Donegal Martyrology, a commentator adds, in a marginal note, this saint had another festival, at the 21st of December.<sup>15</sup> To that date, the reader is likewise referred. However, there were two distinct saints, bearing the same name; both of whom are treated of, by Colgan, on this particular day. This writer is of opinion, that the memory of each saint belongs to a different day; but, he is unable to assign for either individual the date of his own peculiar festival.

ARTICLE II.—ST. FERGHAS, SON OF ENDA, OF INIS-CAOIN, LOUGH ERNE. Ferghas, son of Enda, of Inis-Caoin—now Iniskeen—in Loch Eirne, is set down, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>1</sup> as having a festival, at this date. The place, with which he was formerly connected, was on an island of moderate dimensions, and this was situated a few miles from the town of Enniskillen, on the beautiful Lough Erne. That glorious sheet of water, including the River Erne, of rare beauty and magnificence,<sup>2</sup> has a wide and winding extent of shore, in the counties of Cavan, Fermanagh and Donegal. From various surrounding hills and mountains, its panoramic splendours are exhibited to the gaze, and in every possible novelty of colour and grouping. Over two hundred islands break the water surfaces. The Erne flows in a north-west course, almost centrally through the county of Fermanagh. It is supplied with many tributary streams, along the forty miles of its tortuous channel; being divided into the upper and lower lake. About midway on an island in the Erne, the elegantly-built and thriving town of Enniskillen<sup>3</sup> stands, two handsome bridges, having five arches each, connecting this borough with the mainland. The romantic scenery both above and below this town is unrivalled. The upper lake has numerous indentations along its margin, on either side, and so thickly are its islands grouped, that at first sight it would seem a matter of extreme difficulty for a pilot, to find the proper channel. Its course gives the tourist a general idea of an inundated country. The islands are usually very fertile and verdant, while many are richly wooded. Projecting headlands on the river banks are often covered with fine timber, rising with stately trunks and branching tops,

<sup>12</sup> "Episcopus de Cluain-eraird." See the Bollandist entry.

<sup>13</sup> Thus we read: "S. Fulartachus auro appretiundus, filius Breci, Episcopus de Cluain eraird; et de Disert Furlartaich in Hi falgio." See Colgan's note 6, p. 788.

<sup>14</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>15</sup> See ibid., pp. 422, 423. "Ita citata Martyrologia ad eundem diem: ad quem singula notanter appellant Furlartachum Breci filium; sed non ambigo S. Fulartachum sive Fulartum Episcopum Domnacensem in Connacia, et S. Patricii discipulum alterutro die coli; cum fuerit celebratæ sanctitatis: et nullo alio die videam ejus Natalem a Martyrologiis observatum."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxix. Martii, n. 7, p. 788.

VOL. III.—No. 16.

ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>2</sup> Alluding to the scenic beauties of the Erne, William Allingham portrays some of its features, in the ballad, known as "The Emigrant's Adieu to Ballyshannon." Describing the local objects, he adds—

"far upon the southern line, to guard it like a wall,
The Leitrim mountains, clothed in blue, gaze calmly over all,
And watch the ship sail up and down, the red flag at her stern:—
Adieu to these, adieu to all the winding banks of Erne!"

<sup>3</sup> The accompanying illustration is from a sketch, drawn on the wood, by William F.

from the low and often marshy grounds. Herons and aquatic fowl breed along the rush-lined shores. Nothing can exceed the variety of landscape features here introduced. Swelling hills and more distant mountains frequently give a grand, and, an undulating, outline, to the prospect. The lower lake has a greater expansion of water, unimpeded by islands; although the latter are found to be not less numerous, while descending its stream.<sup>4</sup> When St.

Enniskillen, from the East Bridge.

Ferghas lived in Iniscaoin cannot be discovered; but, in the table, which is added to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>5</sup> its compiler remarks, there is a parish church of St. Fergus of Iniscaoin, without cure of souls, because its rectory was secular or improper. The Bollandists barely allude to this holy man, as Fergusius, son of Ennius, of Inis-Caoín, in Lough Erne, and quote the Martyrology of Tallagh, as their authority;<sup>6</sup> yet, neither in the published work, nor in the Franciscan copy of that record, do I find any corresponding entry.

ARTICLE III.—SAINTS EITHENE, ETHNE, OR ETHNEA, AND SODHEALBH, SODELBBIA, OR SODELVIA, VIRGINS, OF TECH-INGEN-BAITHE, NEAR SWORDS, COUNTY OF DUBLIN. [Sixth Century.] These holy virgins lived about, or after, the middle of the sixth century. Colgan writes concerning them, at the present day.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists<sup>2</sup> notice their feast, likewise, at this date, while they remark, that the 2nd, and also the 15th, of January, were assigned for their commemoration. However, those writers preferred waiting, for the Wakeman, who resides there, and the engraving is by Mrs. Millard. This represents the site of the Catholic church, the convent building and grounds, as also the Protestant church, with its tower and spire.

<sup>4</sup> See "Legend Lays of Ireland," by Lageniensis, No. xii. A Legend of Lough Erne, note 1, p. 82.

<sup>5</sup> See ibid., pp. 414, 415.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 766.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxix. Martii. De SS. Virgini-bus Eithena et Sodelbia sive Sodelvia, pp. 785, 786.

possible recovery of their Acts, or for better proofs of their celebration being found. Whether such records had perished, in the lapse of time, or whether they have not yet been published, is a matter undetermined. We find it stated, by Colgan, that Cathald Maguire, about A.D. 1490, seems to have read their Acts, and this is inferred, from some quotations made, regarding our pious virgins. They are usually called the daughters of Baithe; but, as this term, in the Irish language, has an equivocal signification, it is supposed to be only a metaphorical designation, personal to themselves, and meaning, "daughters of fervent," or "ardent love."<sup>3</sup> This may have been applied to them, because they exhibited, in all their exterior actions, that internal flame of Divine ardour, which caused them to have their souls constantly filled with love for their true Spouse, our Lord Jesus Christ. However, it is possible, that the present holy women may have been the Saints Ethnea and Sodelbia, of Kill-Nais,<sup>4</sup> the daughters of Corbre, the son of Corbmac, son to Ailild, son of Dunlong, son to Endeus Niadh, as laid down, in the Genealogies of the Saints of Ireland.<sup>5</sup> With the present pious women, their sister St. Cumania is named. According to our Annals, their great-grandfather Ailild, or Oilill, died, A.D. 526;<sup>6</sup> their grandfather Corbmac departed this life, in the year 535;<sup>7</sup> while the death of their father is referred to A.D. 546.<sup>8</sup> If such a conjecture be well founded, all of the foregoing virgins were venerated, in the plain of the River Liffey. This may have been the case, notwithstanding the connexion of those two sisters—probably a subsequent one—with another place, and circumstances appear to favour a similar view. Ethna, or Ethnea, was a well-known ancient name, among Irish females; while, Soidh-elbh is Latinized Pulcheria, or "beautiful." They are thought to have flourished, in the sixth century, and to have lived, within the bounds of Lagenia, now the province of Leinster. It must be remarked, however, that the ancient writer of St. Maidoc's Acts<sup>9</sup> seems to make both those holy sisters, not the daughters, but the nieces, of Corbre, and by him, they are styled the daughters of Aidus.<sup>10</sup> By him, too, we find a very remarkable miracle related, and this is attributed, by Colgan, to the united merits and virtues of St. Maedoc, Bishop of Ferns, together with those of the holy virgins, who are here commemorated. These holy women lived at Surd,<sup>11</sup> now known as Swords, in the parish so called, and in the present county of Dublin. The history of this place has been given, by Colgan.<sup>12</sup> In the commentaries added, by Cathald Maguire, to a copy of the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, it is stated, that Christ our Lord appeared, in the shape of a beautiful infant, to recline on the breast of those chaste spouses.<sup>13</sup> This seems rather confirmatory of Colgan's hypothesis, regarding their patronymic. When, or how long they lived, at the place indicated, does not appear, from

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix. Among the pretermitted saints, pp. 766, 767.

<sup>3</sup> Colgan tells us, that Baithe, Buithe, or Buidhe, signifies "fervent love," and joined with Ingena, the terms might be Latinized, "filiae ferventis seu ardentis dilectionis."

<sup>4</sup> This place does not seem to have been identified; but, it may not be improbable to suppose, it was identical with the modern town of Naas, in the county of Kildare.

<sup>5</sup> Chapter xx.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 174, 175.

<sup>7</sup> See ibid., pp. 178, 179.

See ibid., pp. 184, 185.

<sup>9</sup> See his Life, at the 21st of January.

<sup>10</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae," Januarii xxxi. Vita S. Maidoci, cap. xxxiv., p. 212, and n. 32, p. 218.

<sup>11</sup> See the Manuscript Volume of Extracts for the County of Dublin, formerly belonging to the Irish Ordnance Survey, p. 130, where a notice of their festival occurs.

<sup>12</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. vii., p. 509.

<sup>13</sup> The legend is thus related, in the Leabhar Breac copy: "Christus uenit in forma infantis esse in sinu earum et osculabantur eum, et baptizavit eas, etsi Apostoli praedicauerunt illis tamen plus ab ipso acceany known source. There is an elegant drawing of Swords church, county of Dublin, by Mr. Gandon, Junr., A.D. 1791, and it was engraved for Grose's Antiquities of Ireland.<sup>14</sup> A history and description follows it. But, another alternative has been offered, by a commentator, on the "Feilire" of St. Ængus, that their place may have been rather in Uib Failge, also known as Offaly.<sup>15</sup> However this may be the case, it must be inferred, that Saints Ethnea and Sodelbia were daughters of the same father and mother; united in their pursuits, desires, and mode of life; but, whether they departed together, on the 29th of March, may be questioned. As we have already seen, the daughters of Baith, or Bath, were venerated, on the 2nd of January.<sup>16</sup> Again, at the 15th of the same month, there is a festival, for the daughters of Cairbre, entered in our Martyrologies.<sup>17</sup> No fewer than six different Irish Martyrologies record the feast of these holy virgins, in the church of Tegh-Ingen-Baithe, at this day. Thus, the "Feilire" of St. Ængus commemorates "the festival of Baith's daughters, the passion of a great host with modesty."<sup>18</sup> Again, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>19</sup> at the 29th of March, we find them entered as Ingen, or the Daughters of Baite; their names are set down as Ethne and Sodelbia, while it is remarked, that they were constant worshippers of Christ. In the Calendar of Cashel, we find, also, a distinctive commemoration.<sup>20</sup> Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>21</sup> and Cathal Maguire, likewise, have their respective notices of them. We find the names, Eithne and Sodhealbh, recorded in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>22</sup> on this day. They were the two daughters of Bait. The Calendarist remarks, that they lived, by the side of Sord Colum Cille. At the 29th of March, or 4th of the April Kalends, the Calendar of Drummond<sup>23</sup> informs us, that in Hibernia, the Holy Virgins, the daughters of Baite went to Christ.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. LASAR, LASSAR, OR LASSERA, VIRGIN. [Sixth Century.] A very brief allusion to St. Lassara occurs, in the Bollandists' Collection,<sup>1</sup> at the 29th of March. Entering more into particulars, Colgan notices her festival, at the same date;<sup>2</sup> and, he undertakes, also, to solve her genealogy. She is said to have been of royal origin; her father being Fearguss, son of Fethleimid, son to King Laoighaire, son to Niall of the Nine Hostages.<sup>3</sup> She was niece to St. Fortchern,<sup>4</sup> who became one of St. Patrick's earliest converts, in Ireland.<sup>5</sup> It is thought, that her earliest lessons perunt fidem quam ab illis." See "Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy." Irish Manuscript Series, vol. i., part i. On the Calendar of Oengus. By Whitley Stokes, LL.D., p. lxxv., note 29.

<sup>14</sup> See vol. i., p. 11.

<sup>15</sup> See the note of Dr. Whitley Stokes, already quoted.

<sup>16</sup> The reader is referred to this date, at Article v.

<sup>17</sup> See, at that day, St. Darerca, Virgin, Daughter to Cairbre. Article vii. Also, the Life of St. Ita, at the same date, chapter v., note 13.

<sup>18</sup> See Dr. Whitley Stokes, "On the Calendar of Oengus," at p. lviii., in the work already quoted.

<sup>19</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, we read, after ingaene baith, ethne agus sodel b., with some defaced letters added, and comments over the lines, which are illegible to the writer.

<sup>20</sup> "Sanctæ filiae Baiae de cella filiarum Baithe in Finnegallia ad Surdum in Campo Bregh."—Die xxix. Martii.

<sup>21</sup> He says: "Festum candidarum filiarum Baithe Ethneæ et Sodelbiæ ad latus Surdi S. Columbæ."

<sup>22</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>23</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 9.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomos iii., Martii xxix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 766.

<sup>2</sup> See, "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxix. Martii. De S. Lassara, Virgine, pp. 786, 787.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid., nn. 2, 3.

<sup>4</sup> By some, his feast is placed, at the 17th of February, and, by others, at the 11th of October. The reader is referred to the latter day, especially, for notices of him.

<sup>5</sup> See vol. iii., Life of St. Patrick, chap. x.

of virtue and of culture were given, by her holy relative, while her name, Lassair, in Irish-signifying "a flame," was happily typical of that Divine ardour, which warmed all her affections. Her parents desired for their daughter a suitable marriage, but, being resolved on a life of celibacy and retirement, she wished to leave their home. So eager was she, that her youth should belong to a heavenly spouse, a name, in Irish, Algasach, and Latinized Desideriosa, was added to her former appellation. In St. Brigid's Acts, there is mention made of a St. Lasrea,<sup>6</sup> and Colgan seems to think, her commemoration fell on this day.<sup>7</sup> Already have we alluded to her, in connexion with the renowned Abbess of Kildare.<sup>8</sup> However, she seems to have been a person, altogether distinct from the present Lassara, who flourished a little after her time. Before and about the middle of the sixth century, St. Finnian,<sup>9</sup> Abbot of Clonard, had a great school opened, in his monastery; and, the noble virgin was placed under his charge, to be instructed, in all science, religious and mundane. To St. Kieran,<sup>10</sup> afterwards Abbot of Clonmacnoise, was especially committed the care of her education; for, St. Finnian had an inspiration, that she should become a very distinguished saint, and preside over a community of pious virgins. As an instance of the extreme circumspection and care, manifested for the young princess, while residing at Clonard; she lodged and boarded with a virtuous widow, who lived near the monastery. And, we are told, that neither did St. Kieran presume to gaze on her features, nor did his young pupil dare to look in his face, during the whole course of her instruction. She learned the Sacred Scriptures and the Psalms, through him.<sup>11</sup> Another extraordinary occurrence is related, that an Angel brought St. Lassara from St. Finnian's patronage, and placed her in the convent of his sister, St. Rioghnach, or Regnata.<sup>12</sup> Here, she seems to have remained for some time, until feeling desirous of returning to her own part of the country, St. Finnian was consulted as to her guide. He replied to Regnacia, that the same heavenly messenger, who brought her away, should also conduct her homewards. Accordingly the Angel, raising her in the air, like another Halbacuc, bore the virgin to her own country. Here, greatly abounding in sanctity, this chaste spouse of Christ built a church, at a place, called Doire Mac Aidhmechain.<sup>13</sup> At this place, she wrought many miracles, but the year of her demise is not found on record. The simple name, Lassar, is set down, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>14</sup> at the 29th of March. The published Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>15</sup> mentions, however, that veneration was given to Ailgasach, at this date. As we have already seen, this is only another designation, applied to her. Marianus O'Gorman, and Cathal Maguire commemorate her, in like manner, at the 29th of March. A saint, thus described, as Lassar, Virgin,

<sup>6</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga." Tertia Vita S. Brigidæ, cap. xlv., p. 531.

<sup>7</sup> See ibid., n. 21, p. 543. See, also, Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 270.

<sup>8</sup> See Life of St. Brigid, vol. ii., chap. v., at the 1st of February.

<sup>9</sup> See his Life, at the 12th of December.

<sup>10</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of September.

<sup>11</sup> For the foregoing particulars, Colgan refers to the Acts of St. Kieran, chapter xvi.

<sup>12</sup> Her feast occurs, at the 18th of December.

<sup>13</sup> According to Dr. Lanigan, this place

may be interpreted "the oak-wood of the sons of Aidmécain." The place does not appear to be known; although in Colgan's Index Topographicus, to the "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," it is placed in Meath. See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. x., sect. xiv., p. 77; and n. 261, p. 80.

<sup>14</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. The Franciscan copy has Λαργαί, as if separated from the title which follows.

<sup>15</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. The Franciscan copy seems to have Δλγα—the remaining letters being undecipherable to the writer.

is mentioned in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>16</sup> and as having been venerated, on this day, in accord with the authorities of an earlier date, on the subject of Irish saint history.

ARTICLE V.—ST. EUSTACE, OR EUSTASIUS, ABBOT OF LUXEU, FRANCE. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] This celebrated disciple of a renowned master was remarkable for his great zeal and sanctity, as also for his services to early monasticism. His Life,<sup>1</sup> written by Jonas, has been published by the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup> According to some writers, Jonas was an Irishman; but, the Bollandists assert, that he was born at the fort of Mount Cenis, one of the Alpine range, in Segusium, or Susa, and, consequently, that he was an Italian.<sup>3</sup> However this may be, the Preface to the Life of St. Eustasius was written, by some anonymous author, two hundred or more years, after the time of Jonas, and it abounds in various errors.<sup>4</sup> The proper biography of our saint, as published by the Bollandists, is comprised in three chapters, forming a continuation of the Acts of St. Columbanus,<sup>5</sup> and taken from a Manuscript, said to be coeval with Jonas himself.<sup>6</sup> Another version has been published, by Surius,<sup>7</sup> who took his wonted liberty of re-arranging sentences, and of changing the style. An account of St. Eustace will be found, in the work of Rev. S. Baring-Gould,<sup>8</sup> as also in that of the Rev. Alban Butler.<sup>9</sup> In Monseigneur Paul Guerin's valuable collection, we find, likewise, a Life of St. Eustace, Abbot of Luxeuil, in Franche-Comté.<sup>10</sup> The birth of St. Eustace has been referred to Burgundy, by the anonymous author of the Preface, to which allusion has been already made; notwithstanding, it is thought, by many other writers, that he was born, in Ireland, although his name does not appear—at least under its present form—among the twelve companions<sup>11</sup> that set out with St. Columban, when he left Ireland, about the year 584, or 585, for his French mission. He may have followed these companions, notwithstanding, and, perhaps, at a later period. We are told, St. Eustasius was of gentle birth. It is probable, he first saw the light, about the middle of the sixth century. He seems to have joined St. Columban, as a disciple, at Luxeu, before the close of this age. With his great master, St. Eustace passed some time, at the castle of Oppigny, which belonged to Count Cagneric. This was situated, about two leagues from Meaux. The daughter of this Count, St. Fare,<sup>12</sup> had made a vow of virginity, received by

<sup>16</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> It is said to have been compiled, A.D. 664.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix. De S. Eustasio Abbate Lvxoviensi, Ordinis S. Colymbani. There is a previous commentary, in five sections. Vitæ Prefacio, auctore anonymo, ex MSS. The Life itself is in three chapters, and in seventeen paragraphs, with notes, pp. 784 to 790.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid. Commentarius prævius, num. 2, p. 785.

<sup>4</sup> These are shown, in appended notes, by the Bollandists, as also some plagiarisms from previous writers. Thus, the very opening sentence is taken from St. Jerome's Prologue to the Life of St. Hilarion, written before the close of the fourth century. The feast of St. Hilarion occurs, at the 21st of October. See, likewise, notes (a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i, k.) Ibid., p. 786.

<sup>5</sup> His Life will be found, at the 21st of November.

<sup>6</sup> The Bollandists state: "nos primogeniâ phrasi damus ex MSS. Bertiniano et Treurense S. Maxaminiani, quæ etiam ex MS. Vltraiectino S. Saluatoris habemus, sed passim contracta."

<sup>7</sup> In his work, "De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis," at the present date.

<sup>8</sup> See "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 29, pp. 498 to 501.

<sup>9</sup> See "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other Principal Saints," vol. iii., March xxix.

<sup>10</sup> See "Les Petits Bollandistes, Vies des Saints de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament," &c., tome iv., xxix<sup>e</sup> Jour de Mars, pp. 47 to 51.

<sup>11</sup> Their names were, Gall, Deicola, Columban the Younger, Cummin, Legisbert, Lua, Neemias, Eccouan, Kilian, Henoch, Florentin, and Domitil.

the illustrious Patriarch. Afterwards, despite the protest of his daughter, Count Cagneric wished her to marry, and he had actually affianced her. The holy woman was so troubled in mind, that her eyesight was lost, through excessive weeping, and her health greatly declined. When Brunechilde,<sup>13</sup> and Thierry,<sup>14</sup> King of Burgundy, had driven<sup>15</sup> St. Columban from the government of that monastery,<sup>16</sup> Eustace succeeded him in station, A.D. 611.<sup>17</sup> He became exceedingly popular, whilst faithfully presiding. Under his gentle rule, the monks were consoled, for the loss of their first superior; and, all their austerities were borne, with great cheerfulness, in their solitude, so holy and prudent was Eustasius. In consequence of this, he soon had the pleasure of finding six hundred religious under his happy direction.<sup>18</sup> In the year 610, when St. Columban was about to embark for Ireland, at Nantz, he had written to St. Eustacius, then in charge of the monastery, at Luxeuil, words to the following effect: "If there be one among you, who holds different sentiments from the others, send him away." By order of Clothaire II.,<sup>19</sup> Eustasius travelled into Italy, to recall Columbanus, who had predicted his accession to the sovereignty of the whole French monarchy.<sup>20</sup> This happened in the year 613. The king most earnestly desired, that the illustrious Abbot of Bobbio should come to his court. Clothaire told Eustasius, moreover, that he might take any of the nobles to vouch for the monarch's good intentions, and that all his expenses should be defrayed from the public treasury. Eustasius undertook this journey—probably in 614—and he found Columbanus, as it has been thought, at Bobbio, where his great monastery had been so lately established.<sup>21</sup> The two saints had the happiness once more of falling on each other's necks, in a fraternal embrace,<sup>22</sup> according to the monastic usage. Columban detained his guest, for some days; and, during this time, Eustace received excellent advice, regarding the discipline of his monastery, and the government of his brethren. Columbanus having refused to return, Eustace went back to the king, with an apology from his former Abbot. He explained St. Columban's reasons, for declining to comply with the royal request; while he bore a message of supplication, that Clotaire should extend his protection to Luxeu. He was even the bearer of a letter to the king, in which, with his usual freedom and candour, Columban administered some wholesome reproofs, regarding certain irregularities of life, which required reformation. This advice was kindly and humbly received, by the monarch.<sup>23</sup> While on his way to the court of Clothaire,<sup>24</sup> on a certain occasion, after returning from Italy, Eustace passed once more the castle of Oppigny, where St. Fare<sup>25</sup> had suffered so much. Her father Chagneric

<sup>12</sup> Her festival is kept, on the 7th of December.

<sup>13</sup> She is called, likewise, Brunehaut. See Du Pin's "Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteriers Ecclesiastiques," &c., tome vi., p. 5.

<sup>14</sup> Also called Theodoric.

<sup>15</sup> This happened in 610. See Rev. John Alzog's "Manual of Universal Church History," vol. ii., Period 2, Epoch 1, part i., chap. i., sect. 157, p. 75. Dublin edition.

<sup>16</sup> When he had ruled over it, for about twenty years.

<sup>17</sup> See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 89.

<sup>18</sup> See Mgr. Paul Guérin's "Petits Bollandistes," &c., tome iv., p. 47.

<sup>19</sup> The events of this monarch's reign may be found, in L. P. Anquetil's "Histoire de France." Première Race dite des Méro-vingiens, sect. iv., pp. 50 to 52.

<sup>20</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xiii., sect. xiii., p. 294.

<sup>21</sup> See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome viii., liv. xxxvii., sect. viii., p. 223, and, also, Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xiii., sect. xiii., p. 295.

<sup>22</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 29, p. 498.

<sup>23</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xiii., sect. xiii., p. 295.

<sup>24</sup> He lived then, on the extreme confines of Gaul, near the ocean, and his wife Leodegunda was also then and there living.

<sup>25</sup> Being a native of Burgundy, she is called, likewise, by ancient writers, Burgun-endeavoured to excuse himself, when reproved by his visitor; but, soon Eustace found out his dissimulation, as Fara signified her constant purpose, to dedicate herself entirely to God. She even told him, that on the night preceding his arrival, she had a vision regarding his appearance, while a voice proclaimed, at the same time, she was to observe whatever he should command, and that she should be healed from her loss of sight. Kneeling down in prayer, then rising and making the sign of the cross over St. Fara's eyes, Eustace had compassion on her, and offered her consolation. He even wrought a miracle, by restoring her sight, and by removing entirely the fever, which consumed her.<sup>26</sup> Then, commending her to the care of her mother, he promised, on returning from the court of Clotaire, to give her the religious veil. But, Chagneric still wished to oppose the decree of Heaven, even after her convalescence. Taking counsel with a female companion, who agreed to fly with her from home, Fara escaped to the basilica of St. Peter. Soon her father sent young men, to drag her thence by force, and they threatened her with death. Fara declared her willingness to die, in the fixed resolution of preserving her virginity for God's sake. However, Eustasius had returned, at the critical time; when, reproaching her father for his prevarication, the Abbot's influence prevailed, on behalf of St. Fara. In fine, the obstinacy of her parent was overcome, and she obtained permission to become a nun.<sup>27</sup> Gondoad, or Gundobald, Bishop of Meaux, gave her the religious veil, when this happened, in 614.<sup>28</sup> A religious house was afterwards erected at a place, called in Latin, Eboriacum, or Evoriaca, supposed to have been derived from an original Celtic name. It lay between the conflux of the Rivers Aubetin and the great Morin. Here arose the celebrated religious house of Faremoutier,<sup>29</sup> and, subsequently, the forest near it got the same appellation. The monastery was founded double, and St. Eustasius sent from Luxeu St. Cagnoald,<sup>30</sup> there to have ecclesiastical charge. Eustace still continued his rule over the celebrated Abbey, of which already he had charge; while Clotaire took it under his protection, and liberally endowed it. He set apart an annual income for its support, and he gave a grant of land to the Abbot, which enabled him to extend its bounds. A great number of monks resorted thither, to learn the discipline and practise the rules of St. Columban. Meantime, Eustace began a course of instructions and missions, for the people living around his monastery; while he had the happiness of gaining many sinners, to the service of Christ. A Council was held at Bonneuil-Sur-Marne, at which some bishops assisted.<sup>31</sup> This was convened, at the express desire of Clothaire II., and Eustace was nominated to preach the Gospel, among people, not yet subjected to its influence, and especially were the Bavarians objects of his solicitude.<sup>32</sup> Among these was a tribe of pagans, known as wood-worshippers, and otherwise called the Varasques,<sup>33</sup> who indofora. See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome viii., liv. xxxvii., sect. xv., p. 243. Jonas has written her Life. The Bollandists assign her feast, to the 3rd of April.

<sup>26</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus i., lib. xi., sect. ix., p. 304.

<sup>27</sup> See "Les Petits Bollandistes, Vies des Saints," &c., tome iv., Mars, 29, p. 47.

<sup>28</sup> See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. xii. December vii.

<sup>29</sup> Du Plessis supposes, that there was then as in his time a bridge over the river, at the spot, and that originally the Abbey was called Brige, from a Celtic word, signifying "a bridge." Hence, the county south of the Marne was called Brie.

<sup>30</sup> In 620, he was appointed Bishop of Laon. See Rev. Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. xii. December vii. Life of St. Fara, V., Abbess.

<sup>31</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 29, p. 499.

<sup>32</sup> See what has been related of them already, in the Life of St. Rupert, Bishop of Saltzbourg, at the 27th of March.

habited the banks of the Doubs, near Baume. Others there had embraced the heretical opinions of Photin and Bonose, who deemed Jesus Christ as a mere man, and the Holy Ghost, not as a person, but as the virtue of God. The holy missionary travelled among the Boii, or Bavarians, at the extremity of northern Gaul, for St. Severin<sup>34</sup> had not entirely brought this people over to Christianity.<sup>35</sup> He preached successfully among those people, and he converted many to the Christian faith. Some have thought, that when returning from this mission, he inaugurated in his Abbey that institution of perpetual praise, of which St. Bernard makes mention.<sup>36</sup> Soon, however, he was obliged to return for Luxeuil, as this establishment could not well dispense with the services of its estimable and energetic Abbot. But, he made provision, notwithstanding, for all the wants of the newly-established Apostolate, by sending wise and zealous men to labour there. When returning to Luxeuil, he came to the house of a certain man, named Gundoon, or Gundoin, who lived in a villa, called Mosa, because it was on the banks of the river so denominated. Gundoin was distinguished for his rank and riches. Eustasius asked to see his children, after he had been gratefully received by the owner, and two of his sons were presented.<sup>37</sup> But, the Abbot enquired if he had other children, and then the father acknowledged, he had one daughter, named Salaberga,<sup>38</sup> who had lost her sight. When our saint had seen her, he asked, if the young maiden aspired with all her soul to the love of God; and, on her replying in the affirmative, he asked her to fast for two days, and to prepare her mind, by an act of Faith. Afterwards, when St. Eustasius applied holy oil to her eyes, Salaberga received the gift of vision. Thenceforward, in gratitude for this cure, and owing to her naturally pious dispositions, the holy woman led a most pious and exemplary life.<sup>39</sup> One of his companions, while preaching among the Bavarians, was St. Agilus,<sup>40</sup> by the French called, likewise, St. Aile,<sup>41</sup> who subsequently governed the monastery of Rebais, in the diocese of Meaux. St. Eustasius cured him from a violent fever. The patronage of Clotaire II., and of the Frankish nobility, was extended to the great monastery of Luxeuil, during the ten years it remained, under the government of St. Eustacius; for, the monarch had learned greatly to respect St. Columban and his disciples.<sup>42</sup> Besides the honour, which our Abbot brought to literature, by his preaching, and through the care he bestowed, in forming a great number of renowned scholars; he rendered an important service to ecclesiastical and general science, also, by writing himself, and in employing several of his monks, to copy excellent books of antiquity.<sup>43</sup> This was a period, when Luxeuil became most flourishing, and when it had attained the highest degree of reputation. Lyons, Autun, Langres, Châlons-sur-Marne, and Strasbourg, sent young men there, to receive a secular and religious education. It was a school of virtue and of wisdom. It was also fruitful, in

<sup>33</sup> The name, as Latinized by Jonas, is Warasci.

<sup>34</sup> His feast is held, on the 8th of January.

<sup>35</sup> See "Les Petits Bollandistes," &c., tome iv., Mars, 29, p. 48.

<sup>36</sup> In Vita S. Malachie Episcopi, cap. vi., num. 12.

<sup>37</sup> These were Leuduinus, the Elder, who afterwards became a monk, and then Bishop of Tullen, and Fulcuf, the younger, having the cognomen Bodo.

<sup>38</sup> His feast occurs, on the 20th of September.

<sup>39</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus i., lib. xi., sect. xii., pp. 305, 306.

<sup>40</sup> His father was Agnoald, one of the principal lords at the court of Childebert II., King of Austrasia and of Burgundy.

<sup>41</sup> His feast is kept, on the 30th of August.

<sup>42</sup> "Le roi des Franks continua de protéger ses disciples, et dota de vastes possessions le monastère de Luxeuil."—Henri Martin's "Histoire de France depuis les Temps les plus reculés jusqu'en 1789," tome ii., liv. x. Gaule Franke, p. 128.

sending forth great servants of the Church, such as St. Cagnoald,<sup>44</sup> Bishop of Laon; St. Achaire,<sup>45</sup> Bishop of Noyon; St. Rachanarius,<sup>46</sup> Bishop of Autun;<sup>47</sup> St. Audomar,<sup>48</sup> Bishop of Therouanne; St. Donat,<sup>49</sup> Bishop of Besancon; with many other holy Abbots and missionaries. The disciples of St. Eustace flourished, like the seed of Abraham; lilies grew where thorns had sprung; reeds and rushes were replaced by myrtles; a sweet odour of virtue and of civilization perfumed the desert spots, cultivated by laborious hands and by pure souls living in it.<sup>50</sup> This house had a happy influence, moreover, in regulating the discipline and practices of many other monasteries, into which relaxation of order had been admitted. After the example of their great master, the missionary spirit moved many of his disciples, to spread that institute, in still more distant lands. However, among the dangers, which threatened this monastery, was one introduced by a brother, named Agrestin. This man had been Secretary to King Thierry, the former persecutor of St. Columban. He had entered the monastery, and had bestowed his possessions upon the community. After a while, he appears to have become dissatisfied with the monotony and austerity of monastic life.<sup>51</sup> Being of a restless turn, he desired to engage, on the more active exercises of the mission. At first, Eustace sought to divert him from this purpose, for he had an intuition, that Agrestin had not the requisite qualities, to procure success as a missionary. He set before the aspirant, the humility both of Moyses<sup>52</sup> and of Jeremias,<sup>53</sup> who, although specially called by God to the work of the ministry, yet wished to avoid a responsibility, which was so great.<sup>54</sup> Urged, however, by his importunities, at last, the Abbot gave a reluctant assent. Agrestin entered Bavaria, likewise, but he was most unsuccessful there, in calling the people to the reformation of their lives; and, as the tall plane tree, he bore no fruit, although his words, like its broad leaves, were loudly echoed by the vagrant winds.<sup>55</sup> Thence, Agrestin went to Istria<sup>56</sup> and to Aquileia.<sup>57</sup> The latter was formerly a rich town, near the Adriatic Sea, but, at present, it is reduced to the condition of being an insignificant village.<sup>58</sup> In the province of Lombardy, he embraced the schism of the Three Chapters,<sup>59</sup> which about this time disturbed greatly the peace of the Church. Moreover, he endeavoured to influence St. Attala,<sup>60</sup> who had succeeded St. Columban, as second Abbot of Bobbio, by urging him to embrace similar opinions. In this, however, he was unsuccessful; although he wrote a special letter to

<sup>43</sup> One of these Manuscripts, then written at Luxeu, was afterwards to be seen, in the church of St. Peter, at Beauvais. See "Historie Literaire de la France," &c., tome iii., Siecle vii., p. 537.

<sup>44</sup> His feast occurs, on the 6th of September.

<sup>45</sup> The 27th of November is his festival day.

<sup>46</sup> His festival has been assigned, to the 14th of February.

<sup>47</sup> He is thought to have left it for the See of Basle.

<sup>48</sup> His feast is kept, on the 9th of September.

<sup>49</sup> His feasts are on the 23rd of July, and on the 7th of August.

<sup>50</sup> See "Les Petits Bollandistes," &c., tome iv., Mars. 29, p. 48.

<sup>51</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 29, pp. 499, 500.

<sup>52</sup> See Exodus iii.

<sup>53</sup> See Jeremias i.

<sup>54</sup> See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome viii., liv. xxxvii., sect. xxvi., pp. 262, 263.

<sup>55</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix. De S. Eustasio, &c. Vita auctore Iona, cap. ii., num. 8, pp. 787, 788.

<sup>56</sup> A country of Italy, within Illyricum, and reduced to the condition of a Roman province, B. C. 175.

<sup>57</sup> It was formerly the capital of Lombardy.

<sup>58</sup> It was reduced by the Huns, during the Lower Empire.

<sup>59</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus i., lib. xi., sect. iv., pp. 299, 300, and sect. xxxii., p. 317.

<sup>60</sup> His festival occurs, on the 10th of March.

<sup>61</sup> In A.D. 614, he succeeded his father Agilius, and he reigned for twelve years.

Attala, which he sent through Aureus, Notary of Adaldoaldus,<sup>61</sup> King of the Lombards. Having read this letter, which Attala deemed to be supremely ridiculous, he gave it to Jonas, who possessed it for many years, in a secret place ; but, he acknowledges it to have been lost, through want of care, at the time he wrote about Eustasius. Afterwards, Agrestin returned to Luxeuil, where he made an effort to disturb his former companions. The holy Abbot tried every charitable effort, he could devise, to reclaim the delinquent, from the error of his ways. This was all in vain, when St. Eustace, remembering the words of St. Columban, commanded Agrestin to leave the community, which he did, but still retaining vengeful and malicious feelings at heart. This expulsion naturally irritated Agrestin ; and, he began to spread calumnious imputations, against the holy Abbot, while even he took exception to the rules and discipline of his religious institute. In such an unhappy frame of mind, he endeavoured to seek out such persons, as might sustain his peculiar views. Among those, who lent a favouring ear to such slanders, was Abellinus, Bishop of Geneva.<sup>62</sup> Besides, he influenced other prelates to share his prejudices ; and thus, a party was formed, in favour of Agrestin, who was his near relation. An effort was made, to bring the monarch Clothaire over, to their way of thinking ; but, he would not readily accept charges, made against the holy institute of St. Columban, its Abbot at Luxeuil, and his spiritual sons. He was willing, however, to take the advice of the bishops, on this matter. Accordingly, a Council was convened, at Macon,<sup>63</sup> and Clothaire II. invited the prelates of the Burgundian province to attend it.<sup>64</sup> Among the chief adversaries of the holy Abbot was one Warnacharius.<sup>65</sup> However, on the very day appointed for that Synod, he was removed, by a sudden death, from the man, whose cause he espoused, and this lessened the influence of Agrestin. The accuser was called upon, to prefer his charges against the institute, at Luxeuil, and the Abbot Eustace was summoned to hear them. From all we can learn, the plaintiff had little reliance on the strength of his case ; while his powers of mind or of speech were very mediocre, and his own authority influenced few persons. Commencing to open the case, Agrestin said : " I have discovered, that Columbanus has established usages, which are not those of the whole Church." But, his charges, for the most part, were insignificant and groundless. Thus, the plaintiff accused his former companions of heresy, by making the sign of the cross on their spoons, when eating, and by asking a blessing, on leaving or entering a monastic building. He was asked, if he had any objections, more deserving the Synod's attention. He then accused the Columban monks of multiplying collects and prayers at Mass, thus distracting the faithful, who were accustomed to other observances. But, the Abbot was enabled to defend those practices, and he had little difficulty in procuring a favourable verdict from the bishops, who were assembled ; for, he replied, with dignity and effect, as also with a familiar knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures, and in a style, very different from that of his intemperate accuser. However, the latter would insist on further charges. He complained, especially, that the Irish tonsure was an innovation, which should not be tolerated in France, as it consisted, in shaving the crown from ear to ear, thus differing from the Roman tonsure, whereby only the top of the crown was shaved, and from the See Paul the Deacon's work, "De Rebus Longobardinis," lib. iv., cap. 43, 44.

<sup>62</sup> See Rev. S. Baring-Gould's "Lives of the Saints," vol. iii., March 29, p. 500. The Bollandists think the Latin word, in the text, "Genuensis," applicable to Genoa, which they rightly deem to be incorrect, as this city of Liguria was not subject to King Clothaire.

<sup>63</sup> In Mre. L. Ellies Du Pin's List of Councils, for the Seventh Century, this one is omitted, as it is in many other Histories.

<sup>64</sup> See "Les Petits Bollandists, Vies des Saints," &c., tome iv., xxix. Jour de Mars, p. 49.

Grecian practice, which required the whole head to be shaved. When Agrestin repeated such charges, the Abbot then replied: "In presence of these bishops, I, the disciple and successor of him, whose institute thou condemnest, cite thee to appear before him, within a year, at the tribunal of God, to plead thy cause against him, and to learn to know the justice of God, whose servant thou hast attempted to calumniate." The solemnity of this appeal had an effect, even upon the prelates, who leant to the side of Agrestin. They urged him, to be reconciled to his former Abbot. The latter, who was gentleness itself, consented to give him the kiss of peace. But, this goodness did not benefit Agrestin. Hopeless of succeeding, at Luxeuil, he was urged, by a species of madness, to rage still more against the institutes of Columban. He sowed revolt and calumny, in other monasteries, which had proceeded, like Luxeuil, from the colonizing genius of Columbanus, as at Remiremont and Faremoutier. At the former place, St. Amatus<sup>66</sup> was the first Abbot; and, he was succeeded, by the holy Romaric.<sup>67</sup> The youth of St. Amatus had been spent, in the exercises of the monastery, at Aganum, until he was called to preside over Remiremont, or Romberg, in Lorraine. This was in the diocese of Toul. St. Romaric had been a noble, at the court of Theodobert; but, he entered the Columbian institute, at Luxeu, where he lived under the rule of St. Eustace. With consent of his Abbot, Romaric had founded a convent for holy women, on his patrimonial lands, and these nuns followed, likewise, the rule of St. Columban. Having neglected some matters, which Eustasius deemed to be of importance, both Amatus and Romaric had been reproved by our saint. Therefore, Agrestin thought he should be able to influence them, against the holy Abbot of Luxeu, and, he partially succeeded, by the force of his persuasions. He desired, likewise, to have St. Fara on his side; but, this Abbess wisely rejected his calumnies, for she knew too well the great virtues of Eustasius. However, various manifestations of an extraordinary character were visited on those, who took part with Agrestin; and, a visible mark of God's displeasure was soon inflicted, on the unfortunate delinquent. Shortly before the expiration of that year,<sup>68</sup> he was slain, with a blow of an axe by his servant, whose wife it was reported, whether truly or not—Jonas does not commit himself to decide—he had intended to dishonour. Amatus and Romaric then sought reconciliation with our saint, while the Gaulish bishops began to favour the Columbian institute. Foremost among these was St. Eligius,<sup>69</sup> Bishop of Noyon. The term of pilgrimage on earth was now approaching for St. Eustace, and while he was still actively engaged, in founding houses of his Order, the infirmities of his body increased. He told the disciples, that his desire was to leave behind him the sufferings of this life; and, then directing all his aspirations towards Heaven, he received the Holy Viaticum, with great devotion, and bade a last adieu to the monks, who stood sorrowing at his bed-side. He foretold the day of his death, and, thus, he passed away resignedly, to the bright rewards of the blessed. St. Eustasius died, on the 29th day of March,<sup>70</sup> A.D. 625,<sup>71</sup> and, he was succeeded, by St. Wandelbert,<sup>72</sup> in the government of his Abbey, at Bobbio. The relics of St. Eustace, were preserved, in the Benedictine Abbey of Vergaville, in the

<sup>65</sup> The Bollandists remark, that this name was a common one, in the seventh century.

<sup>66</sup> He was venerated, on the 13th of September.

<sup>67</sup> His feast occurs, at the 8th of December.

<sup>68</sup> Probably A.D. 623.

<sup>69</sup> His feast occurs, at the 1st of December.

<sup>70</sup> See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome viii., liv. xxxvii., sect. xxvii., p. 265.

<sup>71</sup> See "Circle of the Seasons," p. 89.

<sup>72</sup> His feast occurs, at the 2nd of May.

diocese of Metz, until its destruction, A.D. 1792.<sup>73</sup> It had long been the custom, for pilgrims to resort thither, while many possessed and demented persons were known to have been healed at his shrine. The relics had been removed therefrom, when the religious quitted their monastery; nor were they kept, without considerable risk, owing to the infidel spirit of that time. They were carried away, and concealed, by the last Abbess, Madame de la Marche, in the house of M. Labrosse, Curé of Suriauville, where they remained for many years. They were surrendered by him, in 1804, on the return of security, to Mgr. Antoine Eustache Osmond, Bishop of Nancy; and, they were perfectly authenticated, by the curé's testimony, and by that of other witnesses. The relics of St. Eustace were placed, in two shrines, in the Benedictine priory of Flavigny-sur-Moselle, in Meurthe, A.D. 1824; but, at present, there appear to be some doubts entertained, regarding those portions, which in reality belonged to our saint. However, the following are enumerated, viz.: first, the chief bone of the body; secondly, that of the left groin, but incomplete; thirdly, the lower part of a thigh-bone; fourthly, the upper part of the right femoral-bone; fifthly, the left shoulder-bone; and sixthly, the left shoulder-blade. In 1670, the bones of St. Eustace and of St. Walbert<sup>74</sup> were exchanged, between Luxeuil and Vergaville. At the latter place, no remains of our saint now exist, but the old Abbey has been levelled to the ground.<sup>75</sup> The feast of St. Eustacius is kept, on the 29th of March. This is not to be found, indeed, in the genuine Martyrologies of Venerable Bede, nor of Usuard. However, besides the insertion met with, in the Roman Martyrology; we are able to ascertain, that it was entered, in many very ancient Calendars. Among others may be quoted, that of Ado<sup>76</sup> and the edition of Usuard, edited by Greuen, by Molanus, and by others. A Manuscript copy of Florarius has doubtfully entered the statement, about his presiding over six hundred monks, or over two hundred. Notker enters this festival, and he states, that our saint was of Burgundy, and belonged to the monastery of Luxovium. For this latter word, Bellinus has incorrectly substituted "Lugdunensis Monasterii," and Petrus de Natalibus<sup>77</sup> has "Lima-ciensis monasterii." The feast of Eustasius is entered, likewise, by Galesinus, Maurilycus, Felicius, Canisius, Trithemius,<sup>78</sup> Wion, Menard, Dorgain, Bucelin, and by the author of Kalendarium Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti.<sup>79</sup> At Luxeu, on the 29th of March, St. Eustasius, Abbot, who followed St. Columbanus from Scotia, according to Dempster<sup>80</sup> and happily ended his life in Burgundy, had a commemoration.<sup>81</sup> He is classed by the writer quoted, among the Scottish saints.<sup>82</sup> In like manner, the Martyrology, for the use of the Church of Aberdeen,<sup>83</sup> places his festival, at the 4th of the

<sup>73</sup> See "Les Petits Bollandistes," &c., tome iv., Mars. 29, p. 50.

<sup>74</sup> Also called Waldebert.

<sup>75</sup> See "Les Petits Bollandistes," &c., tome iv., Mars. 29, pp. 50, 51.

<sup>76</sup> He says: "Depositio S. Eustasii Abbatis, discipuli S. Columbani, qui patre ferme sexcentorum extitit monachorum, et vite sanctitate conspicuus, etiam miraculis claruit."

<sup>77</sup> Lib. iv., cap. II.

<sup>78</sup> "De Viris Illustribus Ordinis S. Benedicti," cap. 70.

<sup>79</sup> He follows Petrus De Natalibus, who supposing Eustasius to be another person, has it, that he died, on the v. of the October Ides. See lib. ix., cap. 2.

<sup>80</sup> In "Menologium Scoticum."

<sup>81</sup> After enumerating the foregoing authorities, the Bollandist commentator adds: "At Burgundum fuisse S. Eustasium mox ex Actis constabit. Concludimus hunc Commentarium cum disticho hoc Wandelberti:

Eustasius quartâ virtutis laude coruscat, Abba Columbanno nituit qui rite Magistro."

—See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix. Commentarius prævius, num. 4, 5, p. 785.

<sup>82</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>83</sup> It states: "Ipsa die depositio Sancti

April Kalends, while it has a feast of St. Columban, at the same day.<sup>84</sup> However, while citing two old authorities, viz., Ado,<sup>85</sup> and a Manuscript Calendar of the Breviary of St. Waldetrude, for a similar statement, the Bollandists<sup>86</sup> yet consider, that owing to some error, the festival of the master, which in reality belongs to the 21st of November, had been placed on the feast of his disciple, St. Eustasius, which belongs to the 29th of March. This, indeed, seems to be the proper explanation. The "Circle of the Seasons"<sup>87</sup> notes it at this date. In an eulogy, pronounced on the illustrious Eustace, and prefixed to his Life, by Jonas,<sup>88</sup> we are informed, that he never ceased exhorting and preaching to his disciples, to make their election sure, by the performance of good works, and especially, by those of mortification, and denial, while despising all earthly things. Under his guardianship, his monks were not depressed by sorrow, nor were they elated by excessive joy. Love and respect were blended together, towards their holy superior; for, his wholesome doctrine fortified their souls, with words of wisdom and moderation, while his own candour was communicated to those spiritual children, who always prepared their hearts, in a spirit of humility, penitence, and charity, to receive the best gifts of God, sought from earnest and devout prayers.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. AEDAN, OR AEDHAN, OF DERRYBRUGHAS, COUNTY OF ARMAGH. The Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> on the authority of the Martyrologies of Tallagh and of Marianus O'Gorman, place the festival, Aidanus de doire Bruchaisse, at the 29th of March. Aedan Dairi Brucais is now known as Derrybrughas,<sup>2</sup> alias, Killyman,<sup>3</sup> in the County of Armagh; and, at his church, which seems to have existed from the seventh century, the present saint was venerated.<sup>4</sup> An entry occurs, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>5</sup> at the 29th of March, Aedan Dairi Brucais. St. Edan, Bishop and Confessor, was venerated, at the 29th of March,<sup>6</sup> and, formerly, he had an Office of nine Lessons, as we learn, from an old Kalendar.<sup>7</sup> We read, in the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>8</sup> that on this day was venerated, Aedhan, of Doire Bruchaisi, or Doire Bruchuse.<sup>9</sup>

ARTICLE VII.—FESTIVAL OF ST. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUM. At the 29th

Eustacij abbatiss monasterij Luxouiensis. Item Sancti Columbani."

<sup>84</sup> See "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," vol. ii. Edited by David Laing, Esq., F.S.A. Scot., p. 263.

<sup>85</sup> "Coenobii Leodiensis ad S. Laurentium."

<sup>86</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 768.

<sup>87</sup> See p. 89.

<sup>88</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix., p. 786.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxix. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 766.

<sup>2</sup> This townland is in the parish of Drumcree, and barony of Oneilland West. It is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Armagh," Sheet 5.

<sup>3</sup> See an account of this parish, in the "Parliamentary Gazetteer of Ireland," vol.

ii., pp. 493, 494. A portion of this parish is in the barony of Oneilland West, and this is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Armagh," Sheets 1, 4; while another portion is in the barony of Middle Dungannon, and this is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 46, 47, 54, 55.

<sup>4</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 294, 295, and n. (e.) Ibid.

<sup>5</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, we read, Aedhan Doire bruccas, at this date.

<sup>6</sup> Or Kal. iv. Aprilis.

<sup>7</sup> In the Manuscript, classed B. 3. 12, among the Codices of Trinity College Library, Dublin.

<sup>8</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

<sup>9</sup> I find the following memorandum, also, in William M. Hennessy's copy of this work, of March, we find, in the Feilire<sup>1</sup> of St. Ængus, a commemoration of the festival of the great St. Gregory of Nazianzum. The Bollandists,<sup>2</sup> likewise, citing the Manuscript Martyrology of Treves, of Saints Martin and of Maximinus, have his festival at this date; although, they state, that the 9th of May is set apart, for his chief feast.

ARTICLE VIII.—ST. MAC LUBHNAIN, PHYSICIAN. On the 29th of March, the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> enters the name of Mac Lumani Liaich. Quoting the foregoing authority, together with that of Marianus O'Gorman, the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> enter a festival, for Maclubnanus Liaich, at the same date. The Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> at this day, records the designation, with Mac Lubhnain, as Physician, having veneration paid to him.

ARTICLE IX.—FEAST OF A REPUTED ST. LERRA, VIRGIN. In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> as published by the Rev. Dr. Kelly, there is a St. Lerra,<sup>2</sup> Virgin, entered at the 29th of March. But, in the published Martyrology of Donegal, I find no such notice.

ARTICLE X.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. BALDRED, PRIEST AND HERMIT, IN SCOTLAND. [Seventh and Eighth Centuries.] Some of the Scottish historians and Calendarists, such as John Major, Hector Boece, Camerarius, and Lesley, have entered the festival of this holy man, at the 29th of March. John Wilson<sup>1</sup> and Ferrarius<sup>2</sup> have a similar notice, at the same date.<sup>3</sup> Already have we given his Acts, at the 6th of this month. After the death of St. Kentigern, about A.D. 530, St. Baldred, his suffragan, became famous, in Laudonia. At the 29th day of March, a St. Baldred, Confessor, and Bishop of Glasgow, who had great authority and favour among Dynasts and princes, is commemorated.<sup>4</sup> Worn out with extreme age, he is said to have died, in the house of the parish priest of Aldhame. The place of his interment was concealed, by a miraculous phantasy.<sup>5</sup> This saint is called<sup>6</sup>

"Airudh brosga, Derrybrusk, County Fermanagh."

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> From the Leabhar Breac copy, Professor O'Looney has furnished the following stanza, with the English translation:—

o. iiii. kl. La litch ingen mbairt pair rluais moir co feli
 i feil rir co nuag
 Siugoir nagnem.

"At the feast of the daughter of Buite
 The passion of a numerous host,
 who had been chaste,
 On the feast of a pure perfect man,
 Gregory of Nazarene (Nazianzum)."

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms iii., Martii xxix. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 767.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, we find, Mac Lumnan, at this day.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms iii., Martii xxix. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 766.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 88, 89.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See p. xx. The Franciscan copy seems to read, Laarra uir, at this date.

<sup>2</sup> It is probable, this entry has reference to the Virgin, Lassar, already commemorated, at this date.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> In his "Martyrologium Anglicanum."

<sup>2</sup> In his "Catalogus Generalis Sanctorum." Yet, in his notes, Baldred, at this date, is distinguished from Baldred, of the 6th of March.

<sup>3</sup> See the Bollandists' "Acta Sanctorum," toms i., Martii vi. De Sanctis Anachoretis Balthero Presbytero et Bilfrido Aurifabro, in Scotia et Anglia, sect. iv., num. 18, p. 452.

<sup>4</sup> See Scottish Entries in the Kalendar of David Camerarius. Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 236.

<sup>5</sup> See Breviarium Aberdonense. Pars Hyemalis, fol. lxiii., lxiiii.

Baltherus.<sup>7</sup> At A.D. 756, Simeon of Durham, gives the date for his death. We cannot be sure, however, that this Celtic saint was an Irishman by birth.

Thirtieth Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. TOLA, ABBOT AND BISHOP OF DISERT TOLA.

[SEVENTH AND EIGHTH CENTURIES.]

THAT the present pious servant of Christ was a useful worker, in his Master's vineyard, can hardly be doubted. Colgan has collected some particulars, with a view to supply his Acts, at the present date.<sup>1</sup> The Bollandists merely notice him, also, as Tola, Bishop of Disert Tola, surnamed The Devout.<sup>2</sup> His Acts had escaped the researches of Colgan; and, hence, very few circumstances, concerning his life, are recorded. However, that writer had no doubt, the Acts of our saint were extant, in his time, although he had been unable to procure them. For, not only his festival day, but his race, the places in which he had been venerated, and the year of his death, had been recorded, by our early Martyrologists and Annalists.

The father of this saint was named Dunchad. He was son to Ernin,<sup>3</sup> son of Garuan, according to the Psalter<sup>4</sup> and Calendar of Cashel. The latter even more fully traces his family line.<sup>5</sup> Thus, it informs us, that Garuan was son to Senan, son of Muredach, son to Failguin, son of Brogan, son to Corbmac Galengi,<sup>6</sup> son of Tadge, son to Kien.<sup>7</sup> The pedigree of St. Tola is drawn from the race of Kien, son to Olild Olum, and he descended from the illustrious Galengi family.<sup>8</sup> This tribe, according to the supposition of Dr. Lanigan, inhabited some of those districts known as Galenga, or Gallen. There was a Gallen, or Galien, which comprised a great part of Carlow and Kildare counties, with some of the Queen's County. As the situation of that place, where our saint commenced his career, was not far removed from this latter district, according to the same authority, it is not improbable, Tola had his birth within that territory.<sup>9</sup> It is likely enough, that he was born, after the middle of the seventh century. For many years, our saint led the life of a hermit, at a place called Disert Tola,<sup>10</sup> or Tola's Desert. According to the

<sup>6</sup> In Fragmentum Historiæ de Pontificibus Eboracensibus.

<sup>7</sup> See Mabillon's "Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti," pars. ii., p. 508.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii. De S. Tola, Abbate et Episcopo, pp. 793, 794.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 796.

<sup>3</sup> According to Rev. Anthony Cogan, this holy man, whom he regards as Bishop of Clonard, was son of Dunchadh, of the Galengi family, and a "worthy soldier of Christ." See "Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., pp. 15, 20, 21.

<sup>4</sup> Colgan attributes its authorship to Cor-mac, King and Archbishop of Munster.

<sup>5</sup> At chapter vii.

<sup>6</sup> From him descend the Galenga tribe.

<sup>7</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii, n. 3, p. 794.

<sup>8</sup> The O'Clerys state: He belonged to the race of Corbmac, son to Tadhg, son to Cian, son of Oilíoll Olum.

<sup>9</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. viii., n. 106, p. 173.

<sup>10</sup> Alluding to this place, in Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Kildare," at p. 382, we thus read: "Allemande placeth Desert-Tola in the county of Tipperary instead of the county of Meath; but he is guilty of a worse error in putting it in Colgan's mouth to say, that this St. Tola, founder of the Abbey of Desert-Tola, had been before Tola the Abbot of Ardbreacain, which Colgan expressly

Calendar of Cashel,<sup>11</sup> that place was situated in Meath; but, other authorities place it within the Dalcassian territory, in the northern part of Munster.<sup>12</sup> It was supposed<sup>13</sup> to have been, in Dealbhna,<sup>14</sup> or Delvin, and situated in the present Garrycastle barony, King's County. The true site, however, is said to have been at Dysart Taula,<sup>15</sup> in the parish of Killoolagh, barony of Delvin, in the county of Westmeath.<sup>16</sup> At this place, he lived an eremitical life, for some years;<sup>17</sup> and, according to one account, he built a monastery, in the eighth century.<sup>18</sup> Such was the fame of his sanctity, that many disciples were attracted thither; and, over these, he exercised the rule of Abbot. The site of this old church is still pointed out, but its walls have been uprooted. It is assumed, that a monastery was at the place; while this, and the ancient cemetery, have been sacrilegiously profaned.<sup>19</sup>

Afterwards, St. Tola was assumed to a higher dignity, having been called upon to preside over Clonard see, in Meath.<sup>20</sup> Apparently referring to this holy man, it is said, in Harris' Ware,<sup>21</sup> that Tola Mac-Dunchad was Bishop of Clonard and of Kildare. However, it may be admitted, that Kildara<sup>22</sup> has slipped in,<sup>23</sup> instead of Disert-Tola.<sup>24</sup> Hence proceeded the mistake of Harris, who made him bishop, not only of Clonard,<sup>25</sup> but, likewise, of Kildare.<sup>26</sup> Elsewhere, we do not find the latter place mentioned, in reference to our saint.<sup>27</sup> Although, perhaps, a contemporary with Tola, Bishop of Ardbraccan, in Meath, who died A.D. 760, our saint was a different person. He also lived at a time, posterior to that, when flourished Tolua, or Tolan, denieth, and saith that our Tola was not Abbot of Ardbreccain, but another Tola, who died in the year 760."

<sup>11</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii, nn. 4, 5, p. 794.

<sup>12</sup> The Rev. Dr. Lanigan remarks, that it lay, perhaps, at the boundary of both provinces. In former times, Meath and Munster met each other, in what is now called the King's County, which has been made up of districts, that belonged to both of those provinces.

<sup>13</sup> By Rev. Dr. Lanigan, who thinks, that this may be deduced from the circumstance, related by the Four Masters, at A.D. 1034, about Carten, Lord of Dealbhna, having been killed by some of his subjects, when entering the church of Disert-Tola. "This Dealbhna was, in all probability, the one surnamed Eathra, the M'Coghlan's country or barony of Garrycastle."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. viii., n. 107, pp. 173, 174.

<sup>14</sup> Harris enumerates seven territories in Ireland, which were called Dealbhna, usually Anglicized, Delvin. To distinguish them, there were different other names affixed. See Harris' Ware, vol. ii., "Antiquities of Ireland," chap. vii., sect. i., pp. 48, 49.

<sup>15</sup> It is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Westmeath," Sheet 13.

<sup>16</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., chap. ii., pp. 15, 20, 21, and vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 560.

<sup>17</sup> See ibid., vol. ii., chap. xviii., p. 412.

<sup>18</sup> See L. Aug. Alemand's "Histoire Monastique d'Irlande," p. 68.

<sup>19</sup> See Rev. A. Cogan's "Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 560.

<sup>20</sup> Colgan doubts not, but that his name had been venerated in Clonard church, over which he presided, although no mention of this circumstance occurs, as he states, in our Irish records.

<sup>21</sup> See vol. i., "Bishops of Meath," p. 139.

<sup>22</sup> Again, in the very minute Catalogue, which Colgan has, in "Trias Thaumaturga," p. 629, of the bishops, abbots, &c., of Kildare, from the beginning down to the thirteenth century, at Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Brigidæ, cap. ii., no St. Tola is reckoned among them.

<sup>23</sup> In that passage, where Colgan enumerates the Bishops of Clonard, at the 23rd of February, when treating about S. Finian. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," p. 407.

<sup>24</sup> But, regarding such statement, Dr. Lanigan remarks: "In Tola's Acts at 30th March, in which Colgan collected everything he could find concerning him, Kildare is not even mentioned."

<sup>25</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Meath," p. 139. Again, at "Bishops of Kildare," p. 382.

<sup>26</sup> Sir James Ware has no such account, in "De Præsulibus Lageniæ," when treating about "Episcopi Darense," at p. 42.

<sup>27</sup> See "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xix., sect. viii., n. 108, p. 174.

<sup>28</sup> The death of the last-named of these

Abbot of Clonmacnoise, in Meath, who died in the year 609.<sup>28</sup> The death of our saint must be placed, at an intermediate period, to both these dates.<sup>29</sup>

The faithful servant of Christ departed this life, during 733,<sup>30</sup> in the fourth year of the reign of Aidus, who was son to Fergal, and King over Ireland.<sup>31</sup> The Annals of Ulster place his death, at A.D. 737. After the typographical error, in Colgan's work, Harris has fallen into the mistake of placing his Natalis, on the 3rd day of March.<sup>32</sup> However, his memory was revered, at Disert Tola, on the 30th of March—the assumed date for his death. According to no less than six different Martyrologies,<sup>33</sup> this account has been given. Besides St. Mochua of Balla, the Feilire<sup>34</sup> of Ængus commemorates St. Colman of Land Ligach, and St. Tola, at the 30th of March. The Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>35</sup> enters the name, Tola; and, Bishop of Craibidhgh follows this designation, at the 30th of March. The Calendar of Cashel,<sup>36</sup> and Marianus O'Gorman<sup>37</sup> commemorate him.<sup>38</sup> The Irish Genealogist, Duald Mac Firbis,<sup>39</sup> enters Tola, bishop, from Disart Tola—said now to be Dysart O'Dea, county of Clare<sup>40</sup>—in Upper Dal-Cais, at March the 30th. Again, on this day, the Martyrology of Donegal registers, Tola, Bishop, of Disert Tóla, in the upper part of Dál Cais, in Thomond.<sup>41</sup> In Scotland, also, he was commemorated. Thus, the Kalendar of Drummond<sup>42</sup> states, at March 30th, or iii. Kalends of April: In Hibernia, the Holy Confessors Mochua, Colman, and Tola, went to Christ. There was a St. Teloc, a disciple of St. Patrick. Colgan thinks it possible to identify him, either with saints is [thus recorded, at the year 609: "St. Tolua Fota, Abbot of Cluain-mic-Nois, died."—Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 234, 235. In a note, on this passage, the editor explains Tolua Fota, as "Tolua the Tall." The Annals of Ulster record his death, at the year 613. This Tolua or Tofa was successor to Aelithir, the third Abbot of Clonmacnoise, who was living in the year that St. Columkille attended Druimceat Synod. See n. (l.) Ibid. At the year 760, we read: "Tola, of Ard-Breacain [Ard-braccan], died." Ibid., pp. 364, 365.

<sup>29</sup> See, Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii. Vita S. Tolæ, pp. 793, 794.

<sup>30</sup> According to his usual custom, Dr. Lanigan undertakes to correct this date, by making it 734.

<sup>31</sup> At the year 733, we read: "St. Tola, son of Dunchadh, bishop, a worthy soldier of Christ, died."—Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 330, 331.

<sup>32</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Meath," p. 139. Again, at "Bishops of Kildare," p. 382.

<sup>33</sup> We read, according to his printed text, that Tola died, on the 3rd of March, in Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Februarii xxiii. Appendix ad Vitam S. Finiani, cap. v., p. 407. This must be a typographical error for 30, whereas Colgan states, that he has taken from the Calendars of all the obituary days, the Natalis of the several saints, whom he names, in this part of his work. Now, all the Calendars referred to by him, at p. 793, have Tola's name, only at the 30th of March.

<sup>34</sup> From the Leabhar Breac copy, Professor O'Looney has furnished the following rann, with the English translation:—

e. iii. kl. sluaio mochuia balla bolg co n-ponas anbhich Colman o lano ligach la feil tola chraibidhgh.

"Commemorate Mochua of Balla,
A casket abounding with ardent dignity,
Colman from Land Ligach
With the Feast of the pious Tola."

<sup>35</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In Colgan's version, we find: "S. Tolæ Episcopi devoti." In the Franciscan copy, I read, tolai eap. epibidhgh.

<sup>36</sup> It states: "S. Tola de Disert Tola in Media." Afterwards follows his genealogy, drawn from the people of Galenga.

<sup>37</sup> We thus find his account, in Colgan: "S. Tola Episcopus colitur in superiori plaga Dalcassia."

<sup>38</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxx., n. 7, p. 794.

<sup>39</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," vol. i., part i., pp. 106, 107. Irish MSS. Series.

<sup>40</sup> According to William M. Hennessy's note.

<sup>41</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

<sup>42</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 9.

<sup>43</sup> See "Trias Thaumaturga." Septima

the present St. Tola, or with Telleus of Tehelly, venerated the 25th of June.<sup>43</sup> But, the chronology cannot accord for the present holy man. A miracle, which took place, in the year 1034, is ascribed to the merits of St. Tola. Coirten Ua Maelruain, Lord of Dealbhna, was killed by some of his clansmen, on the threshold of Disert Tola church.<sup>44</sup> In punishment for this sacrilegious and unnatural murder, the perpetrator of the crime was massacred, within that very same hour he perpetrated the treacherous act.<sup>45</sup>

ARTICLE II.—ST. FERGUS OR FERGUSSIUS, BISHOP OF DOWNPATRICK. [Sixth Century.] The brief notices, contained in Colgan's work,<sup>1</sup> are all we can find, referring to Fergus, or Fergusius. This saint appears to have been a distinguished person. Fergusius was son to Ængus, and he descended from Coelbadh, King of Ireland, who died, in the year 357.<sup>2</sup> Ængus was the son of Chrimthann, son to Eochod, son of Colla, son to Coalbad, son of Crunn Badhraí.<sup>3</sup> Our saint was born, probably in the early part of the sixth century. He built a church, or cell, at a place, called Killmbian.<sup>4</sup> This name, which might be Anglicised Kilbean or Kilmean, is thought now to be obsolete. Without authority, Colgan states, that a monastery was at this place,<sup>5</sup> the situation of which was unknown;<sup>6</sup> although Archdall places it in the county of Down. However, it is natural enough to suppose, that Killmbian was in that part of the country.<sup>7</sup> Here, too, Harris conceives, that he presided, as an Abbot.<sup>8</sup> Although distinguished Irish writers have believed the identification of his place to be unknown; yet, still it is asserted,<sup>9</sup> that the cemetery of Cill-bian is still known as Killybann,<sup>10</sup> in the townland of Barnamaghery,<sup>11</sup> parish of Kilmore,<sup>12</sup> barony of Upper Castlereagh, and not far from Crossgar. From the church of Killmbian, Fergus was called to pre-Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. lxxxiii., p. 141, and n. 135, p. 180.

<sup>44</sup> Referring to this place, Mr. O'Donovan appends a note: "Disert Tola: i.e., St. Tola's desert or wilderness. There are two places of this name in Ireland; one in Thomond, now Dysart O'Dea, in the barony of Inchiquin, and county of Clare; and the other in Westmeath, which is the one above referred to in the text. This is now called Dysart-Tuala, and is a townland situated in the parish of Killoolagh, in the barony of Delvin, and county of Westmeath. The site of St. Tola's church is still pointed out in this townland, but no portion of the walls are now visible, and even the graveyard has been effaced by the progress of cultivation." See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., n. (o), p. 696.

<sup>45</sup> See ibid., pp. 828, 829.

ARTICLE II.—See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii. De S. Fergusio, p. 794.

<sup>2</sup> "The Age of Christ, 357. After Calbhadh, son of Crunn Badhraí, had been one year in the sovereignty of Ireland, he was slain by Eochaidh Muighmheadhoin."—Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 124, 125.

<sup>3</sup> The "Sanctilogium Genealogicum," cap. 28, thus traces his pedigree.

<sup>4</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (d), p. 211.

<sup>5</sup> This statement, also, is followed by Archdall, in his "Monasticon Hibernicum," p. 123.

<sup>6</sup> See the Rev. Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix A, n. (c), p. 144.

<sup>7</sup> "But I find no reason for introducing a monastery there, unless we are to believe that every church, to the name of which Kill is prefixed had one added to it. Now Colgan has heaps of names so beginning of places, to which he assigns merely churches, while as to others with similar names he does not forget to mark such monasteries as were annexed to them."—"Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xii., sect. i., n. 11, p. 185.

<sup>8</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Down," p. 195.

<sup>9</sup> See an Article, written by Mr. John W. Hanna, of Downpatrick, in the Ulster Weekly Examiner of June 8th, 1872, where the statement following is found.

<sup>10</sup> This denomination is not to be found, on the Irish Ordnance Survey Maps of Down.

<sup>11</sup> This is noted, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Down," Sheet 23.

<sup>12</sup> This parish is partly in the barony of Upper Castlereagh, and partly in that of side over the church of Downpatrick.<sup>13</sup> It is called, likewise, Dromlethglas,<sup>14</sup> for which several old writers have Dun-da-leith-glas.<sup>15</sup> Sir James Ware commences his list of the Downpatrick bishops, with St. Cailan. From having been Abbot of Nendrum, Cailan<sup>16</sup> was made Bishop over the church of Down, about the close of the sixth century.<sup>17</sup> For this statement, he refers to Acts of St. Cailan, cited by Usher.<sup>18</sup> It is thought, that St. Fergussius must have been first bishop of Downpatrick,<sup>19</sup> by a learned Irish Church historian, who supposes, there are no sufficient proofs to show that Cailan, or Coelan, was his predecessor, as some writers maintain.<sup>20</sup> But, according to Mr. John W. Hanna, those who maintain such an opinion have overlooked the true conclusion to be derived from the dates, which show, that whereas Mochoe, Abbot of Nendrum, died 496, it was quite consistent, that another Coelan should be elevated to Down, in 499. Besides, Ussher, who possessed Kinelarty. See ibid., Sheets 22, 23, 29, 30, 37.

Struell Wells, County of Down.

<sup>13</sup> See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Down," p. 195.

<sup>14</sup> In the "Annals of Ulster," &c.

<sup>15</sup> See Rev. Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xii., sect. i., n. 10, p. 185.

<sup>16</sup> Mochoe is said to have been another name for him. His feast is held on the 23rd of June, when he died A.D. 496, according to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 158 to 161, and n. (h.) Ibid.

<sup>17</sup> Or about A.D. 499. See Harris' Ware, vol. i., "Bishops of Down," p. 194.

<sup>18</sup> See "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," cap. xvii. See, also, the "Index Chronologicus" of Ussher, p. 527, at A.D. DXX. Ibid.

<sup>19</sup> "The first Bishop, and, indeed, the first minister of Down of whom we have any certain account, is Fergus, whose death is recorded in the various collections of Annals, and is placed at the year 583. * * * * * Whether there was any Bishop before St. Fergus, and whether there was an uninterrupted succession after him, are questions which, in the absence of record, must be judged by general reasoning."—Dr. Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix A, pp. 143, 144.

<sup>20</sup> See Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. ii., chap. xii., sect. i., p. 183, and note 12, pp. 185, 186, where he says: "Had there been any Bishop of Down, prior to Fergus, it should seem odd, that he is the first mentioned in both the Annals above referred to; and that, nothis "Life and Acts," could not have been deceived.<sup>21</sup> Near Downpatrick are the celebrated Struell Wells, which seem to have been resorted to by pilgrims, from times very remote, and where numberless miraculous cures have been effected. The place itself is only a poor village, containing a few straggling houses, inhabited by Catholics, who take charge of the springs.<sup>22</sup> These are for the most part protected by roofs.<sup>23</sup> The house of the "bathing well" is the largest of three; and, to the height of gable, it is 29 feet, being 30 feet by 22 in area. The higher part, with three small windows, is roofed with stone; but, the lower part has no roof,<sup>24</sup> and here the bathing takes place. Another spring is called the "eye-well,"<sup>25</sup> and a third is called the "drinking well."<sup>26</sup> Immediately behind this latter are the remains of an old church.<sup>27</sup> It runs east and west, its length is 64½ feet, its breadth 25 feet. In the eastern gable, there is a Gothic window, 9½ feet high, in the northern side-wall. There are no windows in the opposite one. There are three windows and a door, and also one, on the western gable. A short distance from this old building, and about mid-way up a steep hill—immediately overlooking the wells—is St. Patrick's chair,<sup>28</sup> which appears to be a mass of rude stones, now greatly displaced. It is supposed, that St. Patrick often resorted to Struell,<sup>29</sup> for penitential purposes, and to sing Psalms while in retirement at Downpatrick, from which it is only a mile or two distant.<sup>30</sup> That see St. Fergus governed, with great prudence and sanctity, until the day of his death, which took place on the 30th of March, A.D. 583,<sup>31</sup> in the sixteenth year of the reign of Aidus, King of Ireland, according to the Annals of the Four Masters,<sup>32</sup> and, likewise, to those of Ulster. The latter have it noted again, under A.D. 589. The Annals of Tighernach have his decease recorded, under A.D. 584.<sup>33</sup> The Annals of Boyle place his death, so early as A.D. 557. The withstanding Colgan's frequently alluding to Down and naming several persons called Cailan, see ex. c. Ind. tert. ad Tr. Th., he has no Bishop of that name in said See."

<sup>21</sup> See an Article, in the Belfast Weekly Examiner, of June 8th, 1872.

<sup>22</sup> The accompanying illustration was drawn on the wood, by William F. Wakeman, from a photograph, prepared by Rev. Bernard M'Cann, C.C., Saul. The engraving is by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>23</sup> The information here given is from a letter of Rev. Bernard M'Cann, C.C. of Saul, and dated therefrom February 14th, 1880.

<sup>24</sup> On the eve of June 24th, it is temporarily covered with leafy branches.

<sup>25</sup> It is 120 feet from the former well, and its roof is about 7 feet high; the building is nearly square, being 6 feet by 5½ feet. On the western side, there is a little door 4 feet 8 inches in height.

<sup>26</sup> It is nearly in a straight line with the wells already described. From the second, it is situated at a distance of 83½ feet: the height of roof is about 8 feet.

<sup>27</sup> On enquiry, Father M'Cann had been told, it was the first church, which was erected, after the storm of the penal times had passed over. It appears, that the landlord on whose property it stood was a member of Parliament, and on being chided by a brother-member, that he was permitting a Popish chapel to be built on his estate, at once he gave orders to discontinue the work; so it remains, as appearing in the illustration, to the present day.

<sup>28</sup> It is a matter of regret, that this chair was partly destroyed, by the Orangemen, and this wanton outrage has caused intense chagrin and regret to the Catholics of the place, as the writer was told at the locality, which he visited, in the month of May, 1874.

<sup>29</sup> It seems to be the fountain, called Slán, in St. Fiach's Hymn on St. Patrick. His commentator places it, at Saul, which is near; and, we are told, that the Ulidians filled it up, on account of annoyance caused by crowds frequenting it.

<sup>30</sup> Dr. O'Doran, writing on the 23rd of September, in the year 1753, to his agent in Rome, says: "I have it to add that I would be glad if I could get those indulgences of Crumdugh extended to Struel, for on that Fryday the Christians visited Struel as well as Mount Donert."—Rev. James O'Laverty's "Historical Account of the Diocese of Down and Connor, Ancient and Modern," vol. i., pp. 248 to 250.

<sup>31</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii, n. 3, p. 794.

<sup>32</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 210, 211.

<sup>33</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore." Appendix A, n. (e), p. 144, and Calendar LL, p. 377.

Martyrologies of Tallagh,<sup>34</sup> of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Maguire, have the festival of this saint, at the 30th of March. But, although they call him Bishop, they do not name that see, over which he presided. In like manner, Ferghus, Bishop of Druim-Lethglaisi, is recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>35</sup> as having a festival at this date. Again, under the head of Druim Lethglaisi, Duaid Mac Firbis enters, Fergus, bishop, quievit 583, at March 30th.<sup>36</sup> At this day, likewise, the Bollandists<sup>37</sup> have a brief notice of Fergus, although doubting if a cultus were due to him.

ARTICLE III.—ST. PATTO, ABBOT OF AMARBARIC, AND BISHOP OF VERDEN, IN SAXONY. [Eighth and Ninth Centuries.] We find that Colgan<sup>1</sup> and the Bollandists<sup>2</sup> treat of St. Patto, at the 30th of March. He is said to have been a Scot,<sup>3</sup> by birth;<sup>4</sup> and, owing to the application of the term, in that early period, we are most probably to understand, that he was an Irishman.<sup>5</sup> Likewise, he is stated to have been descended, from a noble family.<sup>6</sup> He soon became renowned for his many and great virtues, and for his zeal, in desiring to spread God's kingdom among the heathens. It is remarked, however, by Albert Krantz,<sup>7</sup> that more ancient writers had left very scanty memorials of this noble missionary, who had abandoned his native country, and who travelled to Saxony, then subdued by the Emperor Charlemagne,<sup>8</sup> a monastery being here established,<sup>9</sup> for the Scots, or Irish, at a place called Amarbaric, near the city of Verden. It is said, Potto, or Patto, was the first Abbot, who ruled over it, for about forty-three years, being distinguished for his zeal in preaching the Gospel, and in resisting the encroachments of heresy.<sup>10</sup> As usual, Colgan mistakes Amarbaric, for Armagh, in Ireland. The English Martyrology states, that Verden was in the territory of Cleves; but, Colgan asserts,<sup>11</sup> on the authority of Albert Krantz, that it was situated rather, between the cities of Minda and Bremen, on the River Lemus, in Old Saxony. Over Amarbaric, our saint was Abbot,<sup>12</sup> but it is a subject of discussion,<sup>13</sup> if the persons holding this appointment, in the early years of foundation, were to be regarded as ruling over the see of Verden, at the same

<sup>34</sup> The edition, published by Rev. Dr. Kelly, enters "Gobani oculus Fergus Eps.," at p. xx. The Franciscan copy has Gobai agur feargus.

<sup>35</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

<sup>36</sup> See "Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy," Irish MSS. Series, vol. i., part i., pp. 108, 109.

<sup>37</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted feasts," p. 796.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxx. De S. Pattone Episcopo Verdensi, Ex variis, pp. 794, 795.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. De S. Pattone Episcopo Verdensi in Saxonia inferiore, p. 844.

<sup>3</sup> Albert Krantz calls him "Scotus natione," in his "Historia Ecclesiastica Saxoniæ."

<sup>4</sup> At the 30th of March, Ægidius Gelenius commemorates him as St. Patto, a Scot.

<sup>5</sup> This may be presumed, especially when no distinction is made, that the person was a British Scot. This notice, also, Venerable Bede is always careful to introduce, in his "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum," as in lib. i., cap. 34, and lib. v., cap. 23, when alluding to the Scots of North Britain.

<sup>6</sup> According to the English Martyrology, at the 30th of March.

<sup>7</sup> See "Rerum Germanicarum Historici Clarissimi, Ecclesiastica Historia, sive Metropolis," lib. ii., cap. 21.

<sup>8</sup> About the year 786. See Capefigue's "Charlemagne," tome i., chap. x., pp. 158 to 180.

<sup>9</sup> According to Mabillon, this fact is related under A.D. 796, and St. Swibert—whose Acts are already related, at February 16th—was the founder. See "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus ii., lib. xxvi., sect. liv., p. 324.

<sup>10</sup> See Arnold Wion's "Lignum Vitæ," lib. ii., cap. 54.

<sup>11</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii. De S. Pattone, p. 794.

<sup>12</sup> See Albert Krantz's "Metropolis," lib. i., cap. 21, 22.

<sup>13</sup> Especially between Cointius and the Bollandists, period. Thus, St. Patto<sup>14</sup> is said to have succeeded St. Suibert, its first bishop, in that See, about A.D. 718.<sup>15</sup> The Bollandists,<sup>16</sup> however, seem to doubt, whether our saint had been Bishop of Verden; they maintaining, that Tanco<sup>17</sup> was the immediate successor of St. Suibert,<sup>18</sup> or Suitbert,<sup>19</sup> said to have been an Englishman.<sup>20</sup> He ruled over Verden for twenty-one years, and he died A.D. 807, when he was succeeded by the second bishop, St. Patto Scotus, Abbot of Amarbaric.<sup>21</sup> Without citing any authority, or having any foundation for his assertion, Dempster says, that our saint wrote a book on the Pentateuch, and that he lived, in the year 810. Bale<sup>22</sup> has a similar statement, and Bishop Tanner<sup>23</sup> follows these accounts. On the authority of the English Martyrology, at the present date, Henry Fitzsimon enters Paton, Bishop, in his Catalogue, as published by O'Sullivan Beare.<sup>24</sup> We also find, at the 30th of March, the simple record of his name. On the very same day, the English Martyrology,<sup>25</sup> Arnold Wion,<sup>26</sup> Philip Ferrarius,<sup>27</sup> Hugh Menard,<sup>28</sup> Demoraches,<sup>29</sup> Molanus,<sup>30</sup> Dempster,<sup>31</sup> and many others, record his festival. It is supposed to have been the date for his departure. Various accounts are also given, regarding the year of our saint's death; most writers assign 760<sup>32</sup> or 762, 763;<sup>33</sup> some 810, or even later, as dates for his departure; while Dr. Lanigan maintains, that all the Amarbaric Abbots and Bishops of Verden, flourished after A.D. 786,<sup>34</sup> when this see is thought to have been first founded.<sup>35</sup> Arnold Wion says, that our saint

<sup>14</sup> Among the early Bishops of Verden, Gaspar Bruschius calls Patto solely by the title of a saint. See "De Germaniæ Episcopis."

<sup>15</sup> According to Arnold Wion. However, this appears to have been a mistake for St. Swibert, Apostle of the Frisons, whose feast is at the 1st of March, and who died A.D. 713.

<sup>16</sup> At the 30th of April, when treating about St. Suibert.

<sup>17</sup> See his Acts, at the 16th of February.

<sup>18</sup> His festival has been assigned, to the 30th of April.

<sup>19</sup> "Erat autem primo Suitberto Verdensi Episcopo proximus successor, Patto natione Scotus, Abbas pridem Amarbaricensis in sua provincia, pro Christo peregrinatus, eum audisset Saxoniam tam diu contumacem Christo, et ejus Evangelio, nunc armis coactam a Carolo, ut ascultaret veræ Religionis, Catholicæque veritati, cumque versaretur in provincia, et verbum Dei strenue Gentibus prædicaret, delectatus ejus zelo Carolus Ecclesiæ Verdensi præfici jussit Pontificem."—Cranzius' "Metropoli, sive Historia Ecclesiastica Saxonie," lib. ii., cap. 21.

<sup>20</sup> He "must not be confounded with St. Willibrord's companion, the Bishop Suitbert, who died in 713."—Dr. Lanigan's "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," vol. iii., chap. xx., sect. iv., p. 219, and n. 26, p. 220. Ibid.

<sup>21</sup> Or, as the Chronicle of Verden has it, "Abbas Ambarbanus Ecclesiæ."

<sup>22</sup> See "Scriptorum Illustrum Majoris Brytanniæ," &c., tomus ii., cent. xiv., sect. xxxiv., p. 204.

<sup>23</sup> See a notice of the present holy man, as classed among his ecclesiastical writers in "Bibliotheca-Britannica-Hibernica," p. 581.

<sup>24</sup> See "Historiæ Catholicæ Ibernæ Compendium," tomus i., lib. iv., cap. xi., p. 50, and cap. xii., p. 56.

<sup>25</sup> It has "Verdæ in Territorio Clivensi depositio S. Pattonis, ejusdem sedis Episcopi et Confessoris," &c.

<sup>26</sup> He writes: "S. Patto Scotus, Monachus, et Abbas, Amarbaricanus in Scotia, et Episcopus Verdensis secundus, creatus anno Domini circiter 718, vir in Evangelica veritate enuntianda ac hæresis pravitate convellenda, studio ac zelo præcipuus, præfuit annis plus minus 43, et in bona senectute ad patres suos depositus, est circa annum Domini 760, die tertio Calendas Aprilis."—Arnold Wion's "Lignum Vitæ," lib. ii., cap. 54.

<sup>27</sup> He has, "Vuerdiæ in Saxonia Sancti Pattonis Episcopi."

<sup>28</sup> In the Benedictine Martyrology.

<sup>29</sup> Demoraches, "De Sacrificio Midæ in Catalogo Episcoporum Vuerdensium."

<sup>30</sup> Molanus, in his Appendix.

<sup>31</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xv., num. 1000.

<sup>32</sup> See Father Stephen White's "Apologia pro Hibernia," cap. iv., p. 44.

<sup>33</sup> The English Martyrology.

<sup>34</sup> The Bollandists quote a Chronicle of Verden, which assigns the foundation of that see to 786, in the nineteenth year of the Emperor Charlemagne's reign, Adrien I. being Pope. This account was communicated, by the Jesuit Father Hermann Crombach, from the local archives. See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx., sect. i., p. 844.

attained a good old age, at the time of his death.<sup>36</sup> After his first deposition, the relics were exhumed, in common with those of other saints interred; and, it is probable, at Konende, the place where the episcopal see was originally constituted.<sup>37</sup> His remains were formally buried, in the church of Verden. When Francis William, Bishop of that see, made some considerable repairs in his cathedral church, in the year 1630, the body of our saint, and the remains of six other holy prelates of the city, were removed<sup>38</sup> from the places, where those lipsanæ had been deposited.<sup>39</sup> These relics were placed, in conspicuous positions, within the church, where they were held in great veneration. They became the occasion, afterwards, for many miracles being wrought, in favour of divers persons.

ARTICLE IV.—ST. MOCHUA OR CRONAN, ABBOT OF BALLA, COUNTY OF MAYO. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] Among the saints of Connaught most venerated by its people—especially in Mayo—may be ranked the present holy man. The Bollandists<sup>1</sup> have—in six chapters and twenty-one sections—the Acts of St. Mochua, or Cronan,<sup>2</sup> of Balla, at the 1st of January. These were translated into Latin, from an Irish collection, and they were transmitted by Philip O'Sullivan Beare, from Madrid, in 1634. Not knowing the natal day of the present saint, these Acts were published,<sup>3</sup> on the first day of the year. There are only a few verbal differences, between this and the version of it, as introduced by Colgan,<sup>4</sup> in his work, at the present date.<sup>5</sup> To this legendary Irish Life,<sup>6</sup> he has added some additional comments of his own, together with separate notes, illustrating the subject of his text. The father of our saint is called Becan, or Beggan, son of Barr, son to Nathi, son of Lugad,<sup>7</sup> son to Dalann, in Ultonia, according to the Sanctilogium of the Irish Saints.<sup>8</sup> His mother is called Commâ—or according to another Manuscript Cumnea—the daughter of Conamal, son of Machtan, or Machadan, and she belonged to the Dalbuanican tribe. Besides two elder brothers, she <sup>35</sup> See Abbé Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome ix., liv. xlv., sect. xx., p. 454.

<sup>36</sup> See "Lignum Vitæ," lib. ii., cap. 54.

<sup>37</sup> Colgan concludes his account of our saint, by observing: "Longe enim ea Diæcesis procurrit in Orientem per terram ditio-nis Luneburgensis usque in Marchiam Brandeburgensem. Nec plura occurrunt de eo observanda, nisi velimus ea minus exacte ab aliis tradita, repetere, quam quod ejus natalem hac 30 Martii. Tradunt cum Crantzio supra. Tradunt alii communiter martyrologi celebrari."—"Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii. Vita S. Pattonis, p. 795.

<sup>38</sup> This Translation took place, on the Sixth of the Ides of March—or 10th of this month—during the year named in the text.

<sup>39</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. De S. Pattone Episcopo Verdensi in Saxonia Inferiore, sect. 4, p. 844.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus i., Januarii i. De S. Mochua Bal-lensi sive Cronano, pp. 47 to 49.

<sup>2</sup> He is to be distinguished from another saint, remarkable for his learning and family descent, as noticed in the "Patricianæ Decadis" of O'Sullivan Beare, lib. x. He belonged to the celebrated community of St. Comgall, at Bangor.

<sup>3</sup> Some particulars, regarding the Mill of St. Fechin, were omitted by the Bollandists, as those details were to be inserted, in his Acts, at the 20th of January.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxx. Vita S. Mochuæ sive Cronani Abb. Ballensis. Ex Hibernicis MSS. interprete P.H. Osuilleuano, pp. 789 to 792.

<sup>5</sup> To Colgan's version was prefixed a text, taken from St. Matthew's Gospel: "Homo quidam, peregré proficiscens, vocavit servos suos, et tradidit illis bona sua," cap. xxv., v. 14. Thus it appears to have introduced the particulars of the saint's life, as if these were intended to be a sermon, or eulogy, pronounced on his festival, before some assembly.

<sup>6</sup> Its differences from the Manuscript translation of O'Sullivan Beare are pointed out, in the notes of Colgan. He thinks the original to have been written, by some Abbot or monk of Balla.

<sup>7</sup> From him descended the celebrated Irish race of Lugad, and he was father to St. Cannech, Patron of Kilkenny, whose Life will be found, at the 11th of October.

<sup>8</sup> Chapter ii.

had three sisters, Brusecha,<sup>9</sup> Luchada, and Tudela. Somewhat more uncouth,<sup>10</sup> sickly, and lame,<sup>11</sup> than their other children, the parents of Mochua formed a low opinion of his mental attainments, and they assigned to him the humble position of a shepherd. But, the Almighty, having regard to the virtues and future miraculous gifts of his servant, had other wise designs, which were destined to call him from his despised station, and to enrol him among the greatest men. Accordingly, when the justly-renowned Abbot and founder of Bangor, one day had entered Beccan's house—a vision of Angels flying over it attracting his attention—St. Comgall<sup>12</sup> asked how many sons were in the family. The head of it replied, that only two boys were deserving of his notice, and two girls, while Mochua, then very young, was engaged in tending sheep. The Abbot desired to see him, nevertheless, and having a Divine intuition regarding his future sanctity, Comgall predicted, that Mochua should be promoted from his humble rank, to become a shepherd of men. Wherefore, the Abbot declared he should be transferred to the religious school of Bangor, and there he was brought up in a knowledge of sacred literature, and in a holy course of discipline. He wrought many miracles, likewise, as stated in the Irish Life. Among other favours granted, he prayed for a childless mother, and, soon afterwards, the conception of a holy son, called Dabius,<sup>13</sup> took place. While at Bangor, St. Mochua was greatly distinguished for his austerities, for his works of charity, and for his vigorous resistance to all the assaults of Satan. When thus tried sufficiently, Comgall ordered him to seek another place,<sup>14</sup> and there to build a church and a monastery.<sup>15</sup> Mochua asked his superior to indicate its proper site. Legendary, no doubt, is the statement, that St. Comgall pointed to a well, which was near, and directed that it should move to the spot, where Mochua was to establish his religious house; and, where it stopped, there it seemed to the holy Abbot, the Almighty should be pleased, if his disciple dwelt. Having selected a colony of monks, and adopting the advice of St. Comgall, Mochua took leave of Bangor.<sup>16</sup> The well seemed to rise in the guise of vapour, and to accompany the band in upper air, as if threatening to rain, while the atmosphere around was very bright and serene. The pilgrims stopped on their way, until the cloud preceded them. Mochua told his companions, they should follow it, and that they should only stop, wherever it rested. Accordingly, the cloud led them to the town, called Gœlia,<sup>17</sup> which was in the territory of Ferros. There Gabrenus,<sup>18</sup> the Bishop,<sup>19</sup> and

<sup>9</sup> Colgan remarks, that a holy virgin, bearing this name, is venerated, at the 29th of May; but, as some authorities call her the daughter of Crimthann, he thinks her to have been a different person, from St. Mochua's sister.

<sup>10</sup> The Life relates, "Ipse puer, capillis ob arearum morbum caput inficientem fluitibus, deformior," &c.

<sup>11</sup> According to Rev. Dr. Todd's and Dr. Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 90, 91.

<sup>12</sup> His Life will be seen, at the 10th of May.

<sup>13</sup> He is said to have been venerated, at the 22nd of June.

<sup>14</sup> It is related, in another Manuscript copy of the Life of our saint, that owing to the envious disposition of Coman, a chaplain to the King of Ultonia, who was named Boedan, Mochua was obliged to part from his master, St. Comgall.

<sup>15</sup> See Rev. Dr. Todd's and Reeves' "Martyrology of Donegal," pp. 90, 91.

<sup>16</sup> This must have occurred, before A.D. 600, or 601, when St. Comgall, Abbot of Bangor, died, according to the Irish Annals. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 224, 225, and n. (c.) Ibid.

<sup>17</sup> Its location is not explained.

<sup>18</sup> There are two saints, bearing this name, in our Irish Calendars: one of these is venerated, at the 24th of June, and as no account of his race or place is to be found, Colgan deems him to be the person here designated; while the other is called son to Dubtach, and Abbot of Kill-toma, who was venerated, at the 14th of November.

<sup>19</sup> One Manuscript has it, that he was of British race.

<sup>20</sup> The legend has it, moreover, that while the fellow-disciple of St. Mochue, lived. He was a most faithful friend,<sup>20</sup> ready to resign his place to the visitor. But, because the cloud did not come down there, Mochua deemed it ineligible. Guided by the aerial sign, our saint next came to Fore, in Westmeath, where the celebrated Abbot Fechin<sup>21</sup> then dwelt, with a great number of monks. The position of their monastery was beneath a dry hill, where a mill had been erected, by some workmen, while no water was found to turn it. It had just been finished, when Mochua arrived, and St. Fechin with other priests there thought, that through their visitor's merits, water must be supplied. After some consultation, it was resolved, that all should repair to Lough Lene,<sup>22</sup> about two miles distant from the place. The architect, who had constructed that mill, was present, and he remarked, they had undertaken to accomplish a very arduous work. "To men, indeed, it seems difficult," said Mochua, "but to God, it is very easy." Then Mochua, with the end of his baculus, slightly bored the ground, near the banks of the lake, while Fechin and the priests present acted in like manner. Immediately, the water began to pass through a subterranean channel, and under the adjoining hill, until it rushed out, with great force, on the opposite side. Thence, the stream was conveyed to the mill-wheels, which put in motion, both the upper and the lower grinding-stones.<sup>23</sup> However, Mochua had an intuition, that he must leave St. Fechin, and he then proceeded towards the Shannon river,<sup>24</sup> which he crossed. There he was in the province of Connaught, and in the territory of Omania, or Hy-Many. There, too, he was very hospitably received by the queen, called Ballgela,<sup>25</sup> and by her chiefs. They asked him to take up his residence with them, but he was obliged to visit Kellach,<sup>26</sup> son of Ragallus, or Ragallach,<sup>27</sup> who was King over Connaught, and who dwelt near the Lake Raminium. At this time, the king was engaged in the sport of hunting a stag, which driven to extremities bounded from a steep precipice, on the shore of the lake, and swam to a rock, which was surrounded by its waters. A singularly wild legend is then related, regarding a man, who, having heard from the lips of Mochua, that the Almighty could preserve from death, whosoever might swim after the stag;<sup>28</sup> he, with the concurrence of the king, plunged into the water, swam towards the rock, and killed the quarry. Afterwards, returning to the king, with his captive, the man was devoured by the lake monster,<sup>29</sup>

Mochua continued there, a copious shower of milk fell on the earth, near this place.

<sup>21</sup> His Life is already to be found, at the 20th of January.

<sup>22</sup> The position of this lake, in reference to Fouré, is shown on Rev. Daniel Augustus Beaufort's "Parochial Map of the Diocese of Meath," published A.D. 1816.

<sup>23</sup> In the Life of St. Fechin, at the 20th of January, chap. iii., this wonder is alluded to, and attributed to the merits of that holy man.

<sup>24</sup> In another Manuscript Life of our saint, it is related, that before he crossed this river, he came to the church of Tegh-Telle, situated in the country of Durmagen, and that when he saw the cloud did not settle there, he pursued his course towards Connaught.

<sup>25</sup> Otherwise, we do not hear of her place in history.

<sup>26</sup> Having been elevated to the position of King over Connaught, he afterwards retired from the cares of state, became a monk, and died A.D. 703, or 704. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 306, 307, and n. (w.) Ibid.

<sup>27</sup> According to Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," this king died A.D. 645. See vol. i., pp. 258 to 261, with nn. (s, t, u, w.) But, Colgan is of opinion, that neither he nor his son ruled over that province, during the lifetime of our saint.

<sup>28</sup> Even to a comparatively late period, deer were very numerous among the wild mountain tracts of Connaught, as may be seen, by reference to Roderick O'Flaherty's "Chorographical Description of West or H-Iar Connaught," edited with notes and illustrations, by James Hardiman, M.R.I.A., pp. 121, 122, n. (c.)

<sup>29</sup> This is an illustration of the popular belief yet prevailing, about the Peistha, which is regarded as an immense dragon, floating under the surface of many of the Irish lakes.

<sup>30</sup> The River Robe anciently formed the southern boundary of the territory of Ceara, that was a cause of dread to all swimmers. The king reproached Mochua, on account of the prediction he had given ; but, the saint, betaking himself to prayer, the monster vomited forth unhurt that man he had swallowed, and thenceforth, no other person was ever known to have fallen within his jaws. The king and his attendants, greatly astonished at this miracle, gave thanks to the Almighty ; and, thenceforward, Mochua was held in reverence and love, not alone by that ruler, but also by his successor, Kennfaela, the son of Colgan. After leaving this place, he passed the river Rodba, or Robe,<sup>30</sup> and came to the province of Kearsa.<sup>31</sup> He was now in his thirty-fifth year, and he stopped at a town named Nemus Darbrechum, or Reo-Dairbrech.<sup>32</sup> No longer did he observe the guiding cloud in the air, so that his anxious companions and himself began to look for the promised fountain, in that locality. While thus engaged, a rustic met them, and they were informed, that not far off, a well—never before discovered—had lately sprung up ; and, as the Latin version has it, “Cinctum Balla, id est, lorica,”<sup>33</sup> got as a new name Balla,<sup>34</sup> or Mochua Ballensis.<sup>35</sup> Now it is known as Ballagh, or Ball,<sup>36</sup> in Mayo County. Here, the saint and his companions recognised the subsiding well, which had moved from Bangor, in Ultonia, and giving thanks to God, they resolved on founding their monastery. However, the chieftain of Ofiachra, or Hy-Fiachra, and who is called Eacha Minnechus, was resolved on disputing his right, and with that intention, one hundred of his best men approached. But, while on their way, a multitude of beautiful Angels were seen flying over a grove, so that when they beheld the venerable Mochua himself, they were moved by his pious exhortations, and they willingly bestowed, not only the grove, but the adjacent fields, on God’s holy servant, thus confirming the grant of King Kellach.<sup>37</sup> There, Mochua caused a church to be built, and it was consecrated by three bishops. This place is distinguished, for the remains of a round tower, the upper part of which, although wanting, shows a measurement of fifty feet in height. The ruins of a small church are near it. The building stone and workmanship appear coeval with the tower. In one of the walls, an inscription of great antiquity is shown.<sup>38</sup> At Balla, or near it, our saint wrought many miracles. One of these was in favour of a woman, who complained that she was childless. Soon afterwards, she conceived and bore two sons : one was called Lukencaria<sup>39</sup> and the other was named Scanlan. Another of his miracles caused four salmon, chased by although it does not bound the modern barony of Carra, which retains the old name. See Dr. O’Donovan’s “Genealogies, Tribes, and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach,” &c., p. 150, n. (d.)

<sup>31</sup> Now represented by the barony of Carragh, in the county of Mayo, according to Archdall’s “Monasticon Hibernicum,” p. 493, and n. (a.)

<sup>32</sup> So stated, in a MS. note to Wm. M. Hennessy’s copy of the Donegal Martyrology. As an authority, he quotes the Book of Lismore, 83 a.

<sup>33</sup> Most probably, by this is understood the well-known mediæval term, the Termon of Balla, to which allusion is made in the “Genealogies, Tribes, and Customs of Hy-Fiachrach, commonly called the O’Dowda’s Country,” edited with a Translation and Notes by John O’Donovan, pp. 196 to 199, with nn. (k, l, m.) Ibid.

<sup>34</sup> This parish is shown, on the “Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Mayo,” Sheets 79, 80, 90, 91. The town itself is marked, on Sheet 90.

<sup>35</sup> According to the Scholiast on St. Ængus, Balla may be Latinized, “Scaturigo Fontis, quæ a Benchor usque in regionem Keram derivata est.”—“Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 795.

<sup>36</sup> It is a market-town and parish, in the barony of Clannorris, and county of Mayo. See a notice of this locality, in Lewis’ “Topographical Dictionary of Ireland,” vol. i., pp. 101, 102.

<sup>37</sup> It would thus seem, the clan had to be consulted and satisfied, before the provincial king could dispose of lands, within his jurisdiction.

<sup>38</sup> See Lewis’ “Topographical Dictionary of Ireland,” vol. i., pp. 101, 102.

<sup>39</sup> Colgan thinks, he was identical with Lunecharia, and a Catalogue of Elphin sea-calves, to approach the nets of fishermen, who laboured in vain at their calling, before the arrival of our saint. Most of the miracles related are evidently of a legendary character, and could hardly deserve place in a serious narrative, save for some incidental statements, by which they are accompanied, and which have references to names of places and of persons, as also to old manners and customs. Thus, the use of his staff in drawing a line to separate sheep from their lambs, and his releasing from a ludicrous position the thief, who had stolen a great quantity of his wheat, and who had placed it in a sack on his back, but who could neither move a step, nor throw down his burden, may be instanced. Again, we are told, that Mochua had sent a messenger to one Felan. He was obliged to pass a long and narrow winding of the sea, having high and rocky precipices around it. Two fierce women, named Beca, daughter to Cuchorag, and Lithbena, daughter to Attreph, had each a basket, suspended by ropes, to intercept travellers passing one way or the other. Those viragos caught the letter-carrier<sup>40</sup> of Mochua in their basket, about the middle of the recess; and then, they hauled it up from the ground. Being supernaturally admonished, regarding this misadventure of his servant, Mochua went thither to effect his release. For a time, the saint remonstrated with those women, and at last he redeemed the man from durance, Beca demanding his hood as a reward, while Lithbena did not require any price. The saint's exhortations, moreover, had the result of bringing those women and their fathers to a better course of life. There was an island, called Inis Amalgaidh,<sup>41</sup> Latinized, Insula Amalga, in the principality of Mogia,<sup>42</sup> and this the holy man desired to enter, yet no boat was at hand. Praying to God, the land swelled to such a degree, that he was able to pass over with dry feet. He healed many persons, and among the rest, in the name of the Holy Trinity, he expelled a demon from a man long possessed. From Lathlech, son of Kennfaela, he removed a great and disagreeable tumour, which was transferred to his bell, and the man was healed. The yellow jaundice, or a great superabundance of bile in the system, was at that period a sort of plague, among the people of Muregide.<sup>43</sup> The medical skill of all Ireland was tested, but without avail; wherefore, it was resolved by them, to implore the Divine aid, through the prayers of Mochua. No less than two thousand five hundred infected persons flocked to Balla. Their holy intercessor prayed; health succeeded, and the marked colour of their faces disappeared, having been transferred to the baculus of the saint. Thenceforward, it was known as "the pale staff."<sup>44</sup> In token of gratitude, the Muregide and their posterity placed themselves under the protection of Mochua, in memory of their wonderful preservation and cure. A man paralysed was brought to the saint, who invoking the powerful name of Jesus restored him to the use of his limbs. Even Mochua is said to have brought to life a youth, who died, when he had prayed to the Almighty. Having wrought these and other great wonders, in the sixty-fifth year of his age,<sup>45</sup> the holy servant of God was called away, to enjoy the eternal reward of all his merits. His death is recorded, at A.D. 637,<sup>46</sup> according to the Annals of Clonmacnoise.<sup>47</sup> Those of the Island and of Senat Magh Nensis diocese states him, to have been venerated, on the 7th of June, in a chapel of that see, Kill-Lunechar by name.

<sup>40</sup> The Latin word is "tabellarium," which bears this meaning, but it may be rendered, also, "a scrivener," or "a notary."

<sup>41</sup> According to the original Irish Manuscript.

<sup>42</sup> Perhaps Mayo is meant.

<sup>43</sup> This locality is not otherwise indicated.

<sup>44</sup> No doubt, this relic was preserved, at Balla, after our saint's death.

<sup>45</sup> However, Colgan is of opinion, debating the chronological incidents gleaned from the Life of St. Mochua, that perhaps a mistake here occurs, and that seventy-five should be substituted, which might resolve agree,<sup>48</sup> in reference to the year. The Bollandists<sup>49</sup> have a brief notice of Mochua de Balna in Kera regione de Conacie, at this date, as found in the Martyrology of Tallagh; while, they observe, he is called Mochua Balla primo Cronanus, by Marianus O'Gorman. In the published Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>50</sup> we find, at the 30th of March, Cronan Balna, i Ceara, i Connachta. But, in the Franciscan copy, hardly so much remains legible, in connexion with his name and feast, at this date.<sup>51</sup> St. Ængus in his Festillogy commemorates St. Mochua of Balla; so does the Calendar of Cashel;<sup>52</sup> so does Marianus O'Gorman,<sup>53</sup> and Cathal Maguire;<sup>54</sup> and, all are agreed, in assigning his festival to this date. At the 30th of March, the Martyrology of Donegal<sup>55</sup> records the feast of Mochua, Abbot of Balla, in Ceara, Connaught. This is all that can be related, and of an authentic character, regarding the present holy man.

ARTICLE V.—ST. REGULUS, OR ST. RULE, PATRON OF ST. ANDREW'S, SCOTLAND. [Said to be of the Fourth Century, but, probably, he lived at a later period.] There appears to be considerable doubt entertained, regarding the acts and origin of the holy man, whose name and festival introduce this Article. His place in history and his national belongings have been confused, by tradition, and are not, as yet, sufficiently removed from the domain of controversy, or from critical investigation. The Kalendar of Arbuthnott,<sup>1</sup> at the 30th of March, or iii. of the April Kalends, enters St. Regulus, a Bishop and Confessor, having an Office of Nine Lessons.<sup>2</sup> Again, in the Kalendar attached to the Breviary of Aberdeen,<sup>3</sup> we find St. Regulus called an Abbot, at the same date, and having an Office of Nine Lessons. Now, it happens, likewise, on this very day, the Bollandists<sup>4</sup> and Tillemont, as the Rev. Alban Butler<sup>5</sup> shows, commemorate a St. Regulus, or Rieul. He is said to have been originally from Argos,<sup>6</sup> a city of Greece, to have been of a noble family, and to have flourished, in the first and second centuries. He was so ravished with the sanctity and miracles of St. John,<sup>7</sup> whom he found at Ephesus, that he renounced paganism, and received baptism, at the hands of this beloved disciple of Christ. He then distributed all his goods upon the poor, and attached himself to the holy Evangelist, until the persecution all the difficulties of calculation, to be found in the narrative. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii. Vita S. Mochuæ sive Cronani Abb. Ballensis, cap. xxi., pp. 790, 791.

<sup>46</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 254, 255.

<sup>47</sup> See ibid., n. (2), p. 256.

<sup>48</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxx. Martii, n. 20, p. 792.

<sup>49</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 795.

<sup>50</sup> As edited by Rev. Matthew Kelly, in his Calendar of Irish Saints," p. xx.

<sup>51</sup> I can only make out distinctly Cronan balli.

<sup>52</sup> It has "S. Mochua de Balla in Conacia."

<sup>53</sup> He says: "Mochua Balla in regione Kera in Conacia, fuit Abbas; et alio nomine Chronanus dicitur."

<sup>54</sup> The entry from Maguire is that of the Scholiast on St. Ængus, and already quoted.

<sup>55</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 98.

<sup>2</sup> We find added, o. 1m.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid., p. 114.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. De S. Regulo Episcopo Silvaneis in Gallia. There is a previous commentary, in two sections, and in ten paragraphs, with a Vita, ex Codice MS. Andomarensi, in eight paragraphs, with notes. Again, is it followed, by Vita Alia, ex pluribus Codicibus, MSS., in five chapters, comprising twenty-nine paragraphs, with notes, pp. 816 to 827.

<sup>5</sup> See his "Fathers, Martyrs and other principal Saints," vol. iii., March xxx.

<sup>6</sup> The St. Omer Manuscript has "Argolica derivatus;" but, the Bollandist editor thinks, that Gallica might be used for Argolica.

<sup>7</sup> His feast occurs, at the 27th of December.

of the Emperor Domitian<sup>8</sup> separated them. Afterwards, he went to Rome, where Pope St. Clement had appointed St. Denis, the Arcopagite, to become the Apostle of France, and where St. Rieul, with other holy men, received appointment as missionaries under him. St. Rieul was stationed at Arles, as its first bishop; there, he laboured with great zeal and success. Having had notice, in a vision, regarding the martyrdom of St. Denis, and of his two companions, Rusticius and Elutherius,<sup>9</sup> St. Rieul left the charge of Arles, to a bishop, named Felicissimus, and he immediately went to seek their sacred relics, at Paris. This he fortunately effected, and having ministered to the faithful there, for a time, he consecrated a priest Malon, as their future bishop. Rieul wrought a remarkable miracle, by which he converted many pagans to the true faith. Having been invited to Senlis, he preached there with great fervour, he baptized many persons—some of great distinction—and he wrought numerous miracles. Here, he established a church, and a cemetery, which subsequently were called after him. He laboured much, and he converted the country, about Senlis, to the true faith. This is said to have happened, at the time, when great danger of death was apprehended in France, by missionaries, who had the courage to announce the name of Christ, throughout this Roman province. However, St. Regulus became the first Bishop of Senlis, and he laboured earnestly, during forty years, on his several missions and visitations.<sup>10</sup> He died, in peace, and in the midst of his flock, A.D. 130, during the reign of the Emperor Adrian. He was buried, in the church of St. Peter and St. Paul. This, afterwards, bore his name, and a great number of miracles were effected, at his tomb, and owing to his intercession.<sup>11</sup> According to the Martyrology of Usuard. St. Regulus, Bishop and Confessor, was deposited at the camp or castle Silvanectensis.<sup>12</sup> The first Christian king of France, Clovis, had a great reverence for this holy man. This king rebuilt and endowed that church, in which Rieul had been interred, while he had a gold shrine prepared to encase the saint's relics. The Cathedral of Amiens<sup>13</sup> possessed some of these, while they were saved from desecration in 1793, and kept by M. Lejeune, until 1802. They were authenticated, in the years 1816 and 1829.<sup>14</sup> However, we suspect the foregoing saint and his festival, to have been confounded with another holy person, bearing a like name, in Scotland; where, besides this day, a St. Regulus, or Rule, is said to have had the 17th of October, dedicated to his honour.<sup>15</sup> Nor, is it very clearly established, that he was distinct from a Celtic saint, venerated in Ireland. Now, it is remarkable, that St. Riaghail, Abbot of Muicinis, in Lough Derg, on the Shannon, was commemorated, at the 16th day of October,<sup>16</sup> according to the Feilire of St. Ængus,<sup>17</sup> and the Martyrology of Donegal. Regulus, or Riaghail, is said to have been one of <sup>8</sup> This Emperor died, on the 17th of September, in the forty-fifth year of his age, and the fifteenth of his reign, A.D. 96. See Fleury's "Histoire Ecclesiastique," tome i., liv. ii., sect. liii., p. 272.

<sup>9</sup> Their festival is celebrated, on the 9th of October.

<sup>10</sup> One of his eulogists, or a writer of his Acts, was an Irishman, named Coelestinus, as mentioned by the Bollandists, in their previous Commentary, sect. i., par. 4. Nothing more seems to be known regarding him.

<sup>11</sup> It is to be regretted, that a great fire broke out, at Senlis, in the ninth century, which destroyed the Cathedral church there, and its archives, thus obliterating the earliest acts of the present saint.

<sup>12</sup> "Apud castrum Silvanectensium, depositio Sancti Reguli episcopi et confessoris."—Soller's edition, p. 180.

<sup>13</sup> See M. l'Abbé Corblet's "Hagiographie du diocese d'Amiens."

<sup>14</sup> See "Les Petits Bollandistes Vies des Saints," tome iv., Mar. 30, pp. 58 to 63.

<sup>15</sup> "Quoniam in quadrigesima de eo non fuerit servitium, omnia sicut in alio festo, sed differtur in crastinum."—"Breviarium Aberdonense." Pars Estiva, Fol. cxviii.

<sup>16</sup> There is usually a confusion in festival celebrations, on these two days, when the 16th day of the month is also the 17th day those ecclesiastics, who met St. Columkille,<sup>18</sup> at the time, when he founded a church at Drumcliffe, a little to the north of Sligo. Probably, Regulus—so greatly venerated in Scotland—may have been the same; for, his history, as there understood, has been involved in much obscurity.<sup>19</sup> There is an objection, that Riaghail of Muic-inis was an accredited saint, in the Martyrology of Tallagh, about A.D. 788; whereas, criticism makes the advent of St. Regulus from the East to Scotland, as occurring in the eighth century, thus giving a very short time for public acknowledgment, if not for formal canonization.<sup>20</sup> There are two separate editions of a legend, referring to the foundation of St. Andrew's: the older is a document of the twelfth century,<sup>21</sup> while the second form of the story is longer and more elaborate, and it emerges, at a somewhat later period, from St. Andrew's itself. The Regulus legend, as believed in Scotland, occurs, in the Colbert Manuscript of the National Library, in Paris. There is also one, in the Harleian Manuscript of the British Museum, which seemingly belongs to the early part of the fourteenth century. The last mediæval form of it is that, contained in the Breviary of Aberdeen. According to the legend of St. Regulus, as handed down in Scotland, he lived at Patras, in Achaia;<sup>22</sup> and, there, he was custodian of St. Andrew's relics, in the year 360. There, likewise, this Apostle, after having preached the Gospel of Christ to the northern nations, the Scythians and Pictones, had settled. There, too, he was crucified, and his bones remained, until the times of Constantine the Great, and of his sons, Constantius and Constans, for about 270 years. In a Manuscript, belonging to the Priory of St. Andrew's, it is stated, that in 345, Constantius collected a great army to invade Patras, in order to avenge the martyrdom of St. Andrew and to remove his relics.<sup>23</sup> But, an Angel appeared to St. Regulus, the Bishop, and ordered him, with his clergy, to proceed to the Sarcophagus, which contained his bones, and to take a part of them for concealment, viz.: three fingers of the right hand, a portion of one arm, the pan of one of the knees, and one of the teeth. On the following day, Constantius entered the city of Patras, and carried off to Rome the shrine, which contained the rest of St.

before the Kalends of the next month, as Mr. Skene remarks; and thus, St. Patrick is commemorated, at Auvergne, on the 16th of March, while his day, in the Irish Martyrologies, is the 17th of that month. "It seems, therefore," adds Mr. Skene, "to be a reasonable conclusion, that the Regulus of Muicinis, commemorated on the 16th of October, and the Regulus of Muicross, on the 17th of that month, were the same person, and that the historic Regulus belongs to a Columban church founded among those which Columba established among the southern Picts during the last years of his life, and at the same time when Caineach of Achaboe had his hermitage there; and to those older foundations must be appropriated the churches dedicated to Regulus, or St. Rule."

<sup>17</sup> Thus, Ṛiaghail naith aghnamh, or, "Riaghail, gifted was his career;" and this is glossed, i. riaghail muicnori fa loch Derg, i.e. "Riaghail of Muicinis in Loch Derg."

<sup>18</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>19</sup> On this subject, the reader is referred to William F. Skene's "Celtic Scotland: A History of Ancient Alban," vol. ii., book ii., chap. vi., pp. 261 to 277.

<sup>20</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 437.

<sup>21</sup> It bears for its title: "How it happens that the memory of St. Andrew the Apostle should exist more widely in the region of the Picts, now called Scocia, than in other regions; and how it comes that so many abbasies were anciently established there, which now in many cases are by hereditary right possessed by laymen."—"Chronicles of the Picts and Scots," vol. i., p. 138. Edited by William F. Skene.

<sup>22</sup> According to the Breviary of Aberdeen.

<sup>23</sup> It is the opinion of William F. Skene, that a fictitious and an artificial antiquity has been given to this removal, and to the Scottish veneration for St. Andrew, which did not commence before the eighth century. He argues, likewise, that those relics were brought immediately from Hexham, founded A.D. 674, by St. Wilfrid, who dedicated it to St. Andrew. His successor Acca, who was bishop from 709 to 732, was driven into Scotland this latter year; and, probably, he brought St. Andrew's relics to the church,

Andrew's bones. He also laid waste the Insula Tyberis and Colossia. Thence, he removed the bones of St. Luke and of St. Timothy. These he carried, with the relics of St. Andrew, to Constantinople. While some of the English Annalists<sup>24</sup> place the transferring of St. Andrew's relics to Constantinople, at A.D. 350, Dempster, who assigns the festival of St. Regulus to the 17th of October, has an observation, that the Scottish accounts are different.<sup>25</sup> The Breviary of Aberdeen relates, that after the occurrence related, the Angel once more appeared to St. Regulus, and desired him to remove that portion of St. Andrew's relics, he had concealed, to the western region of the world, where he was destined to lay the foundations of a church, in honour of the Apostle. According to Dempster,<sup>26</sup> Regulus was called Albatus, having been a Grecian, from Achaia. Wherefore, following the Angel's directions, the pilgrim sailed with St. Andrew's relics towards the north, having been forewarned, that where his vessel should be wrecked, there he was to build a church, in honour of St. Andrew.<sup>27</sup> St. Regulus voyaged for a year and a-half, among the Islands of the Greek sea, and wherever he landed, a church in honour of St. Andrew was erected. After two years of travel, he reached the shores of Scotland.<sup>28</sup> He is said to have landed, at a place, called Muckros, or Muicross,<sup>29</sup> afterwards Kilrymont,<sup>30</sup> in the land of the Picts. Here his vessel was wrecked, and here he set up a cross, which he had brought from Patras. Having remained there seventeen days or nights, Regulus went<sup>31</sup> with the relics to Forteviot.<sup>32</sup> There, he found the three sons of King Hungus,<sup>33</sup> namely, Owen, Nectan and Finguine. Their father was then engaged on an expedition, in the district of Argathelia; and, his sons were anxious about the life of their parent, so that they gave a tenth part of Forteviot to God and to St. Andrew. Then they went to a place, called Moneclatu, and afterwards Monichi. There, Finchem, the queen of King Hungus, was delivered of a daughter, called Mowren. She was buried, afterwards, at Kilrymont, and the queen gave the place to God and to St. Andrew. They then cross a mountain, called Moneth, and reach a place, named Doldancha, afterwards known as Chondrochedalvan. There, King Hungus was met, returning from his expedition. He prostrated himself before the relics. Then, he gave the place to God and to St. Andrew. They returned across the Moneth, to Monichi, where a church was built, in honour of God and of the Apostle. Thence they went to Forteviot, where, also a church was built. King Hungus afterwards went with the clergy to Kilrymont. There, a great part of that place was given, to build churches and oratories, and a large territory was marked off, for a parish. The boundaries of this parish can still be traced, and these contained that part of founded by a Pictish king, between the years 736 and 761.

<sup>24</sup> Such as Matthew of Westminster, "Flores Historiarum," at anno Gratiae, cccl., p. 136, also, Florence of Worcester.

<sup>25</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xvi., num. 1037, p. 552.

<sup>26</sup> See "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum," tomus ii., lib. xvi., num. 1037, p. 551.

<sup>27</sup> Such is the story, in the old legend of St. Andrew's.

<sup>28</sup> In a Chronicle, although not a very early one, it is related: "The zeire of God sewynn hundir lxi. ye relikis of Sanct Androw ye Apostle com in Scotland."—

"Chronicles of the Picts and Scots," vol. i., p. 387.

<sup>29</sup> Rendered "the promontory of swine." So it is called, in the second legend of St. Regulus, alluded to by Mr. Skene.

<sup>30</sup> In due course of time, it was known as St. Andrew's.

<sup>31</sup> He had previously entrusted to the seniors and brothers, Damian and Merinach, the care of that place.

<sup>32</sup> A parish, with a village, so called, in the south-east of Perthshire. See an account of it, in the "Imperial Gazetteer of Scotland," vol. i., pp. 680, 681.

<sup>33</sup> According to Mr. Skene, the lists of the Pictish kings show no Angus, or Hungus, son of Fergus, until we come to the Fife, lying to the east of a line, drawn from Largs to Naughton. Within this line was the district, called the Boar's Chase, containing the modern parishes of St. Andrews, Cameron, Dairsie, Kemback, Ceres, Denino, and Kingsmuir. In the parochia were included, likewise, the following parishes, viz.: Crail, Kingsbarns, Anstruther, Abercromby, St. Monance, Kelly, Elie, Newburgh, Largo, Leuchars, Forgan, and Logie-Murdoch. It seems impossible to doubt, that there is a historic basis of some kind for this part of the legend, as the circumstantial character of the narrative is not likely to have been invented.<sup>34</sup> When Regulus arrived in Scotland, he entered a place, called in the Latin legend, "Nemus Porcorum."<sup>35</sup> There he built a church, and he preached to the people, far and wide. Hungus, King of the Picts, saw a company of Angels over St. Andrew's relics. With his army, he then came to Regulus, who baptized him, and all his servants. Then, he received a grant of the land, and it was set apart to be the chief seat and mother church of Scotland. It was known, afterwards, as St. Andrew's,<sup>36</sup> owing, no doubt, to the circumstance, that there a portion of his relics had been deposited. If we are to believe Dempster—and he quotes the Scottish Annals of Hector Boece<sup>37</sup> and John Lesley<sup>38</sup>—St. Regulus wrote many things; but, of these, he states, that there remained, Epistola ad Patrenses, Lib. i., or as Joannes Campusbellus has it, Monita Divina de transferendis S. Andreae Reliquiis in Albionem, Lib. i. However, we can depend very little on the authorities, that writer so frequently quotes, nor on his own care and critical acumen, in hazarding many of his statements.

ARTICLE VI.—ST. COLMAN, SON OF RONAN. The Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 30th of March, records the entry of a St. Colman. The name of this saint appears twice repeated, in the published version.<sup>2</sup> This is not the case, in the Franciscan copy,<sup>3</sup> preserved at the Convent, Merchant's-quay, Dublin. According to the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> likewise, on this day was venerated, Colman, son of Ronán, son to Loarn. He descended from the race of Conall Gulban, son to Niall. We know little more regarding him.

ARTICLE VII.—ST. GOBBAN. On the 30th of March, we find entered, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> the name of Goban,<sup>2</sup> who is called a bishop.

powerful king of that name, who reigned from A.D. 731 to 761.

<sup>34</sup> "The place beyond the Moneth or Grampians, called Chन्द्रochedalan, is plainly the church of Kindrochet in Braemar, which was dedicated to St. Andrew. Monichi is probably not Monikie in Forfarshire, as that church was in the diocese of Brechin, but a church called Eglis Monichti, now in the parish of Monifieth, which was in the diocese of St. Andrew's, and Forteviot was also in the diocese of St. Andrew's."—"Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," Sessions MDCCCLX-LXI—MDCCCLXI-LXII., vol. iv. Notice of the early Ecclesiastical Settlements at St. Andrew's, by William F. Skene, Esq., F.S.A., Scot., pp. 305, 306.

<sup>35</sup> The reader will observe some remarkable similarity in this name of a place, and Muicinis, of the Irish St. Riaghail.

<sup>36</sup> There is a very interesting article, intitled, "Notice of the early Ecclesiastical Settlements at St. Andrew's," by William F. Skene, Esq., F.S.A., Scot., in "Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland," Sessions MDCCCLX-LXI.—MDCCCLXI—LXII., vol. iv., pp. 300 to 321.

<sup>37</sup> In his "Historia Scotiæ," lib. vi., p. cv.

<sup>38</sup> In his "Historia Scotiæ," lib. iii., p. cxxvi.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid.

<sup>3</sup> There we find, Scí Colman.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. The Franciscan copy has Gobban.

<sup>2</sup> Colgan has some conjectural allusion to Another saint is there placed, in conjunction with his name. Again, we meet St. Gobbán, registered in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> as having been venerated, on this day. There is neither reference to his rank, nor locality, in the latter record. The Bollandists,<sup>4</sup> at this date, merely enter his name.

ARTICLE VIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. ATTALA, ABBOT OF BOBBIO, ITALY. [Sixth and Seventh Centuries.] As we have already stated, at the 10th of March, this holy man was a native of Burgundy.<sup>1</sup> At Bobbio, Attala, Abbot, is set down, with his feast, at the 30th of March, by Dempster,<sup>2</sup> who claims him as a Scottish saint.<sup>3</sup> If this were at all true, he should be regarded as an Irish Scot, as he was a disciple of the great St. Columban,<sup>4</sup> and he died, A.D. 627.<sup>5</sup> The Bollandists<sup>6</sup> give his feast, at this date, on the authority of Dempster; but, they refer the reader to his Life, published on the 10th of March.

ARTICLE IX.—ST. FIACHNA. The Bollandists briefly notice this holy man, and they quote the authority of Marianus O'Gorman, who has inserted his name, at this day, in his Calendar of Irish Saints.<sup>1</sup> In the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>2</sup> there is a Fiachra, set down, at the present date; and, scarcely can there be a doubt, but this name is intended to represent that of Fiachna.<sup>3</sup> He was, perhaps, descended from the race of Eoghan, son of Niall, remarks the writer in the Donegal Martyrology. Whether he can be identified with Fechno Sapiens,<sup>4</sup> otherwise called Fiechnaus<sup>5</sup>—a disciple of St. Columkille<sup>6</sup>—may be questioned. Much uncertainty prevails, regarding the identity of the person here set down for commemoration. The Martyrology of Donegal<sup>7</sup> states, that on this day was venerated Fiachna.<sup>8</sup> There is another Fiachna, observes the Calendarist, at the 29th of April. It is probable, to one of them Cuimin of Coindeire gave the character, that he never pronounced a bad word, but always an expression, which was pleasing to God.<sup>9</sup> If this holy man were the disciple of St. Columba, he must be regarded as the St. Fechno, or Fiachna, surnamed the Wise, who was a monk,<sup>10</sup> in the monashim, as if he were brother to St. Sedna, or Sedonius, venerated at the 10th of March. There he is called Mo-Gaban, or Goban. See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii x. De S. Sedonio Episcopo S. Senani Discipulo, nn. 2, 3, p. 573.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

<sup>4</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 796.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> According to Jonas, who has written his Life.

<sup>2</sup> See "Menologium Scoticum."

<sup>3</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>4</sup> See his Life, at the 21st of November.

<sup>5</sup> See Mabillon's "Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti," tomus i., lib. xi., sect. lvii., pp. 334, 335.

<sup>6</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 795.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 796.

<sup>2</sup> Edited by the Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx.

<sup>3</sup> In the Franciscan copy, this can be legibly made out, Fiachna.

<sup>4</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Quarta Vita—Adamnan's—St. Columbæ," lib. i., cap. xxx., p. 345, and n. 75, p. 378.

<sup>5</sup> See Quinta Vita—O'Donnell's—S. Columbæ, lib. ii., cap. xliiii., p. 417. Ibid.

<sup>6</sup> See his Life, at the 9th of June.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

<sup>8</sup> Colgan has Fechanus, or Fiachna Sapiens, among those who lived or died on the Island of Hy, and a feast assigned for the 30th of March. See "Trias Thaumaturga," Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ," cap. iii., sect. v., n. 502.

<sup>9</sup> It is thus he speaks:—

"Fiachna loved true devotion,
He instructed all to follow it equally.
He never said a naughty word,
Nor aught but what was pleasing to his Lord."

<sup>10</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga."

tery called after Lunge, a plain in the Island of Ethica. At the 12th of March, there is a saint, who is variedly called Fethchinn, Fetchuon, Fiechnon, Fethuo, Fethchuo, Fiechno, Fetno, Fethchu and Fiechna—supposed to have been a missionary among the Picts and Scots, in the sixth century. For some notices of him, the reader is referred back to that date.

ARTICLE X.—ST. FERDACRICH, OR FERDACHRIOCH. An entry, Ferdacrich, occurs in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 30th of March. It is quite likely, with the present designation—apparently meaning, “the man of the two places”—some other name should be supplied. Marianus O’Gorman has an entry of his feast, likewise, as Ferdachrichus, and at this date, the Bollandists observe in their work.<sup>2</sup> On the present day, as we read, also, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>3</sup> a festival was celebrated, in honour of Ferdachrioch.

ARTICLE XI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. MARITHA, VIRGIN, OF COLOGNE AD GRADUS. We find such an entry, in a Manuscript copy of Florarius, according to the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> who think she may have been one of the Ursuline virgins, although not entered in the Cologne Festivals, recorded by Galenius, nor in Hermann Crombach’s Catalogue. The Bollandists state, that at the 21st of October, the matter might further be investigated.

ARTICLE XII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF CLAUDIUS, A BISHOP, AND FOUNDER OF THE UNIVERSITY OF PARIS. At Auxerre, on the 30th of March, was venerated Claudius, Bishop, and founder of the Academy of Paris, according to Dempster,<sup>1</sup> who makes him a Scottish saint.<sup>2</sup> However, this account is irreconcilable with facts, as may be seen, where we have already treated of Clemens, sometimes called Claudius Clemens Scotus, at the 20th of March. The Bollandists<sup>3</sup> have a notice of him, at this day, on the authority of Thomas Dempster, as Claudius Episcopus Antissiodorensis, fundator Academiæ Parisiensis; while they refer the reader to the 20th of March, as also to the 5th of March, when he is noticed, by David Cameraarius.

ARTICLE XIII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. CRONAN. Veneration was given at the 30th of March to Cronan, as we read, in the Martyrology of Tallagh.<sup>1</sup> But, whether he was distinct from the St. Mochua—also called Cronan<sup>2</sup> and already entered at this day—may admit of question.

ARTICLE XIV.—ST. LIBER, OF LETHDUMHA. In the Martyrology of Quarta Appendix ad Acta S. Columbæ, cap. x., num. 56, p. 490.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. I can only make out fear Da Crich, on one line, in the Franciscan copy.

<sup>2</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 796.

<sup>3</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

ARTICLE XI.—<sup>1</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 796.

ARTICLE XII.—<sup>1</sup> In “Menologium Scoticum.”

<sup>2</sup> See Bishop Forbes’ “Kalendars of Scottish Saints,” p. 194.

<sup>3</sup> See “Acta Sanctorum,” tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 796.

ARTICLE XIII.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx.

<sup>2</sup> In the Franciscan copy is the entry, Cronai.

ARTICLE XIV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr.

Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> there is found an entry, Liber, Leth Dummai, at the 30th of March. Where his place was situated must afford a subject for conjecture. A St. Liber, a priest and a disciple of St. Patrick,<sup>2</sup> was placed, by the Irish Apostle, in conjunction with St. Glassicus, over the church of Kill-glais, in the diocese of Down, and territory of Dalaradia.<sup>3</sup> Colgan conjectures this present saint may have been the same. This day, we read in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>4</sup> concerning a St. Liber, of Lethdumha, having been venerated. The Bollandists<sup>5</sup> give a notice of him, likewise, at this day, as Liberius Lethdumhensis.

ARTICLE XV.—NATALIS OF ST. COLMAN OF LINN HUACHAILLE, OR OF MAGHERALIN, COUNTY OF DOWN. [Seventh Century.] Some account of St. Colman,<sup>1</sup> Abbot of Lann, or Linn, will be found, in Colgan's work, at this date, and a brief notice,<sup>2</sup> in the Bollandists.<sup>3</sup> His name is entered, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>4</sup> at the 30th of March, as Colman Linne (i Casan Linne) duachill. This, we are told, was the name of a demon. We are informed, likewise, that his monastery was known as Lann Mic-Luachain, and that it was situated, in the present barony of Delvin, county of Westmeath.<sup>5</sup> According to the Annals of the Four Masters, this saint's Natalis occurred, on the 30th of March. His death is assigned to the year 699.<sup>6</sup> His Acts will be found, at the 30th of October; or, perhaps, more correctly, at the 17th of June. At both days, however, further notices, regarding him, will be given. The festival of Colman, of Linn-Uachaille<sup>7</sup>—sometimes called Lin-duacall, Lann-da-Cholmoc, or Lann-Mocholmoc,<sup>8</sup>—on the brink of Cassan-Linne, in Ulster, is set down, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>9</sup> as having been celebrated, on this day. In the year 1122, at Lann Mic-Luachain, the shrine of this saint was found in a tomb—a man's cubit in the earth.<sup>10</sup> This discovery was made on Spy Wednesday.

ARTICLE XVI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. OLAF, OR AULAF KYRRE, KING OF NORWAY, AND MARTYR. [Tenth and Eleventh Centuries.] According to some authorities, the feast of St. Olaf, Olave, or Aulaf, was held on this day; but, the 29th of July is more usually set down, as his principal festival. Tradition has it—even in northern Europe—that he was either born in Ireland, or descended from Irish parents. That he was in Ireland, Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, we find Liber Lethoum.

<sup>2</sup> See the Life of St. Patrick, at the 17th of March, chap. xv.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's "Trias Thaumaturga," Septima Vita S. Patricii, lib. ii., cap. cxxxi., pp. 146, 147, and nn. 207, 208, pp. 182, 183. Also, Quinta Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, cap. xxiii., p. 267.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

<sup>5</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 796.

ARTICLE XV.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxx. De S. Colmano Lannensi sive Linnensi Abbate, pp. 792, 793.

<sup>2</sup> "Colmanus de Lann-Huachuille juxta ripam Cassainlinn in Vltonia."

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii.,

Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 796.

<sup>4</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, I can only read Colmai Linn Oua, with Caytan Lin, and some other undeciphered letters, over and above the line.

<sup>5</sup> See Rev. Anthony Cogan's "Ecclesiastical History of the Diocese of Meath, Ancient and Modern," vol. iii., chap. lxxiv., p. 580.

<sup>6</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 300, 301.

<sup>7</sup> In a Manuscript note, William M. Hennessy writes, "Luan Mocholmog, Maralin, Down."

<sup>8</sup> See Rev. William Reeves' "Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Down, Connor and Dromore," n. (l), pp. 110, 111, and Calendar LL, p. 377.

<sup>9</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

when very young, seems incontestable, as the following narrative shows. In the twentieth year of his age,<sup>1</sup> A.D. 990, King Aulaf Tryggvesson was engaged on a plundering expedition in Ireland, when he collected a great herd, of cows, sheep and goats. While driving them to his ships, a poor Irishman begged of Aulaf, to give up his cows and sheep, so that he might drive them home. "How can I do it," said Aulaf, "since neither you nor anyone else could separate them from such a great herd?" "Only let me send my dog in," replied the poor man, "and he will find them out." "If your dog can do it, you may send him in, but mind, that he does not delay us long." Having obtained such permission, the man made a sign to his dog. In about half-an-hour, this animal collected the cattle, for their former owner. Astonished at the extraordinary sagacity of the dog, Aulaf asked for it, and that poor man immediately complied with the chief's request.<sup>2</sup> Whereupon, Aulaf gave him a heavy ring of gold,<sup>3</sup> and they both parted as friends.<sup>4</sup> That he was specially venerated in Scotland, on this day, is manifest, from the Scottish Martyrologists, Breviaries, and Histories extant. In the Kalendar of Arbuthnott,<sup>5</sup> we have, at the 30th of March, St. Olave, King and Martyr, ix. Lect.; while a similar entry is to be found, in the Kalendar of the Aberdeen Breviary,<sup>6</sup> at the iii. of the April Kalends. Adam King<sup>7</sup> has, at the 30th of March: S. Ole King of norwege and mart. vnder henrie ye crowkit. The Bollandists<sup>8</sup> state, that a Manuscript copy of the Martyrology of Ado, has the feast of Olaus, King of Norway and Martyr, at this date, although his Natalis is properly referable to the 29th of July. To this latter day, we direct the reader's attention, for further particulars, regarding this illustrious historical character.

Thirty-first Day of March.

ARTICLE I.—ST. MELLA, ABBESS OF DOIRE-MELLE, COUNTY OF LEITRIM.

[EIGHTH CENTURY.]

NOTHING can prove more advantageous to the interests of religion, than for parents to impress the tender minds of children with high and holy purposes. Some account of this holy woman is given by Colgan,<sup>1</sup> and by the Bollandists.<sup>2</sup> St. Mella flourished, about the middle of the

<sup>10</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. ii., pp. 1014, 1015, and n. (r.)

ARTICLE XVI.—<sup>1</sup> See "The Scandinavian History of Dublin," by Charles Hølliday, with some notice of the author's life, by John P. Prendergast, p. lxiv.

<sup>2</sup> We are further informed, that Vigi, in Latin Vigius, was the name of this dog, the most sagacious of all others known, and Olafus was his master, for a long time. See Rev. James Johnstone's "Antiquitates Celto-Scandicæ," pp. 74, 75.

<sup>3</sup> Perhaps this account may serve to throw some light on the torques of gold, or ring money—as it has been called—representing so many precious deposits, in the Royal Irish Academy.

<sup>4</sup> See "Scripta Historica Islandorum," vol. x. Historia Olavi Tryggvii filii, cap. xiii., p. 234.

<sup>5</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 98.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., p. 114.

<sup>7</sup> See his Kalendar. Ibid., p. 148.

<sup>8</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxx. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 796.

ARTICLE I.—<sup>1</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Martii. De S. Mella, Abbatisa. p. 796.

eighth century, in the northern parts of the Connaught province.<sup>3</sup> This has been inferred, from the circumstance of her son St. Tigernach's<sup>4</sup> death, having been recorded, at A.D. 805.<sup>5</sup> The devout matron, by God's holy decree, was the happy mother of two sons, whose names are found on record, in the pages of our Irish Martyrologies. These are named respectively, St. Cannech,<sup>6</sup> a Priest, and St. Tigernach, an Abbot.<sup>7</sup> Having been deprived of her husband, by death, she afterwards formed the resolution of embracing a religious life. St. Tigernach erected a religious house, near Lough Melve, —now known as Lough Melvin,—in the county of Leitrim, and within the diocese of Killmore.<sup>8</sup> He left this establishment, in favour of his mother; and, he then retired to another monastery, named Kill-Acaidh, or "the church of the field," the situation of which is unknown. St. Mella presided over a community of holy women, at the former place; which, from her, took the name of Doire-Melle, which signifies, the "oak grove of Mella." We are told, it had been situated in Rossinver parish, county of Leitrim, although the name is not known, at present.<sup>9</sup> It is said, she ruled over her nunnery for many years; but, little more has transpired respecting her. She is supposed to have died, before the year 787,<sup>10</sup> as her name occurs, in the Martyrology of Tallagh. In it<sup>11</sup> we find inserted, Mella, at the 9th, and Doire Mella, added, at the 31st of March, to the same etymon. In the Martyrologies of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Cathald Maguire, there is a Mella, belonging to the church of Cluainai, set down, for the 19th of March. But, she may have been a distinct person.<sup>12</sup> The Martyrology of Donegal gives her this title of Doire Mella, on the 31st of January,<sup>13</sup> when alluding to her son Caineach; but, at the present day, it has no record of her feast. By her influence and authority, St. Mella awakened in the souls of her religious, as of her own two sons, the love and fear of God. This she effected, likewise, in the spirit of gentleness, forbearance, and true charity.

ARTICLE II.—ST. MACHABEO, OR GILDA MACHAI-BEO, ABBOT OF ARMAGH. [Twelfth Century.] Although the oak-tree's trunk cease for a time to put forth branches and leaves, its roots do not fail to grow vigorously, while they extend in the earth. So when religious life appears diminished to the gaze of men, its hidden workings do not present less effective results, in the sight of God. St. Machabeo, or, as he is sometimes

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., xxxi. Martii. Among the pretermitted festivals, p. 898.

<sup>3</sup> See Colgan's note 1, p. 796.

<sup>4</sup> His feast occurs, at the 4th of November.

<sup>5</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 414, 415.

<sup>6</sup> His feast has been referred, to the 31st of January.

<sup>7</sup> In the attributed "Opuscula" of St. Ængus, we read: "Mella mater fuit Cannechi Præbyteri et S. Tigernachi de Dore Melle."—Lib. iv., cap. viii. Colgan is of opinion, that the Cannech here named was identical with St. Cannech Præbyter, the son of Uchil, commemorated at the 31st of January, in the Martyrologies of Tallagh, of Marianus O'Gorman, and of Donegal. See n. 2, p. 796.

<sup>8</sup> In Lewis' "Topographical Dictionary of Ireland," it is said, the ancient and ruined church of Rossinver is supposed to have been that of the nunnery of Doiremelle, founded by St. Tigernach for his mother. See, vol. ii., p. 537.

<sup>9</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., n. (g), p. 415.

<sup>10</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Martii. De S. Mella, p. 796. This assumption of Colgan may be questioned, as also his argument, in support of it. We know, that the Martyrology of Tallagh includes the names of its reputed compilers, Saints Mælrúan and Ængus, as also saints, who lived long after them. See Introduction to this work, sect. ii., vol. i.

<sup>11</sup> See the copy edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, pp. xviii. and xx. In the Franciscan copy, at this date, we find mella doire mell.

<sup>12</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxxi., nn. 7, 8, p. 796.

<sup>13</sup> Edited by Rev. Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 32, 33.

called, Gilda Machai-beo,<sup>1</sup> means, "servant of the living Mochai;" and, Colgan, who has given an account of him, at the 31st day of March,<sup>2</sup> supposes the name to have been imposed,<sup>3</sup> in honour of St. Mochai, Abbot of Nendrum,<sup>4</sup> who is related to have lived one hundred and fifty years, in Heaven, and in a state of repose. The present saint was born, in the year 1104,<sup>5</sup> as we collect from the Irish Annals. He embraced the monastic profession, in the city of Armagh,<sup>6</sup> and, in its former monastery, consecrated to St. Peter and St. Paul. He was probably a student, with the great St. Malachy O'Morgair,<sup>7</sup> and under the tuition of that holy Abbot, Imar O'Aedhacan.<sup>8</sup> It is also probable, that our saint succeeded this latter, by governing the monastery, after his death, in the year 1134. The office of Abbot he exercised—if this opinion be well grounded<sup>9</sup>—during forty years, with the greatest sanctity. According to our ancient Martyrologies, he was the tower of Devotion and of Mildness in his time, the Ark of Wisdom and of Science, of Labour and of Prudence.<sup>10</sup> He is also one of the latest saints, recorded in the Martyrologies of our country. He died, on the 31st of ARTICLE II.—<sup>1</sup> Marianus O'Gorman and the Martyrology of Donegal have both appellations applied to him.

Cathedral, as restored, at Armagh.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxxi. De S. Machabeo Abbate Ard-machano, pp. 795, 796.

<sup>3</sup> See ibid., n. 1, p. 796.

<sup>4</sup> His feast occurs, at the 23rd of June.

<sup>5</sup> See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., pp. 12, 13.

<sup>6</sup> The accompanying illustration of the old Cathedral, as restored in our own times, was drawn by William F. Wakeman, and transferred to the wood-block, engraved by Mrs. Millard.

<sup>7</sup> See his Life, at the 3rd of November.

<sup>8</sup> His feast has been assigned to the 13th of August.

<sup>9</sup> This supposition is further confirmed by the circumstance, that we do not find the death of any Armagh Abbot recorded, in our ancient Annals, between that of Imar O'Aedhacan and of Machabeus. Yet, our Annalists, about this period, were in the habit, not only of recording the deaths of Archbishops and of Abbots in Armagh, but even the year when Scribes, Chronographers, and Prefects of its schools, died, with others of inferior rank, distinguished by piety and learning.

<sup>10</sup> Such is the eulogy, pronounced on him, by Blessed Marianus O'Gorman, Abbot of March, in 1174, having attained the seventieth year of his age.<sup>11</sup> We find mentioned, on this day, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>12</sup> Machabeus, i.e., Gilla Mochaidhbeo, Abbot of the Monastery of Peter and Paul at Ardmacha. The Bollandists briefly notice him, at this date,<sup>13</sup> but they print, incorrectly, MCXXXIV., as the year for his death.

ARTICLE III.—ST. COLMAN, OF CAMACHADH. The brightest and fairest flowers bloom in solitude and soon wither, while they still perfume nooks, in which they grow, with delicious odours. So have bloomed and have been forgotten the localities and memory of many holy persons. Thus, when introducing his commemoration of the three saints, Colman, Foilan, and Fethadius, at the 31st of March, Colgan remarks, that he united their names, because he found little of a distinctive character, in their Acts; indeed, he observes, that although the Irish saints, venerated on this day, were not few in number, as many of our domestic Martyrologies proved, yet, very few records of their lives were to be discovered.<sup>1</sup> We prefer, however, to distinguish those saints; and, hence, we begin with St. Colman's name, which occurs, in the Irish Martyrologies, at this day. However, Colgan confesses himself unable to discover the exact location of Camachadh, with which place, St. Colman appears to have had connection. There was a church, in the diocese of Ossory,<sup>2</sup> which was called Camchluain;<sup>3</sup> as, also, another in that of Derry, named Cambos, and Camus,<sup>4</sup> in our Martyrologies. At this latter church, a St. Colman was venerated, on the 30th of October; but, whether he was a distinct person from our saint, Colgan had not been able to determine. Another church stood, in the region of Clannuadach,<sup>5</sup> in Connaught, and it was named Cammagh,<sup>6</sup> while its ruins are yet to be seen.<sup>7</sup> Colgan conjectures this name to have more nearly resembled Camachadh, in sound and signification, than any of the former denominations. He interprets Camachadh, or Cammagh,<sup>8</sup> by the Latin words, "campus procurvum," and Louth Monastery, in the diocese of Armagh: "S. Machabeus, qui et Gilda-Mochaibeo, abbas monasterii Divorum Petri et Pauli, Armachæ, Turris Pietatis et Mansuetudinis, Arca Sapientiæ et Scientiæ, arx Piorum et Prudentiæ, &c."—Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Martii. Vita S. Machabei, p. 796. The Martyrologies of Donegal and of Cathal Maguire have a nearly similar panygeric, at the 31st of March.

<sup>11</sup> His death is thus recorded, at the year 1174: "Gilla Mochaibeo, Abbot of the Monastery of SS. Peter and Paul at Armagh, a diligent and faithful servant of the Lord, died on the 31st day of March, in the seventieth year of his age."—Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., pp. 12, 13.

<sup>12</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

<sup>13</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxxi. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 897.

ARTICLE III.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Martii. De SS. Colmano Foilano et Fethadeo, Confessoribus, pp. 799, 800.

<sup>2</sup> Among the Patron saints, as given in the "Statuta Diocesis Ossoriensis edita Kilkenniæ, in Synodo Diocesana. Die 8 Junii, 1873," I do not find any St. Colman, referable to the present day.

<sup>3</sup> Now known as Camcloon, in the parish of Offerlane, and barony of Upperwoods. It is marked, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the Queen's County," Sheet 23.

<sup>4</sup> This parish, in the barony of Lower Strabane is shown, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Tyrone," Sheets 4, 5, 10. The townland is on the latter Sheet.

<sup>5</sup> This was the territory of the O'Fallons. It was situated, in the barony of Athlone, and county of Roscommon. In Irish, it is written, Clann uíalach, and, it will be found so represented, on the Ancient Map, prefixed to "The Tribes and Customs of Hy-Many," so judiciously edited by the late Dr. O'Donovan.

<sup>6</sup> Now, probably, the townland, known as Cammoge, in the parish of Elphin, and barony of Roscommon. It is noticed, on the "Ordnance Survey Townland Maps for the County of Roscommon," Sheet 22.

<sup>7</sup> The church was formerly called Camach Brighdi, and at present Camma, in the diocese of Elphin. It lies about eight miles, it is Anglicized, "the very crooked plain."<sup>9</sup> The year of our saint's death has not been recorded, nor even the age, in which he flourished. However, it must have been at a rather early period, since in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>10</sup> at the 31st of March, we find, Colman am (cam) Achaid. Also, Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire commemorate him. Colman, of Camachadh, occurs, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>11</sup> on this day. The Bollandists briefly notice this saint, at the 31st of March.<sup>12</sup> It is likely, this pious man sought an asylum in a solitude, which the proud and ambitious so much disdain, but which furnish tranquillity and enjoyment to the truly religious.

---

ARTICLE IV.—ST. FAOLAN, OR FOILAN, SON OF AEDH. The name of Faolan, son of Aedh, is found in the Martyrology of Tallagh<sup>1</sup> at the 31st of March, as also in that of Blessed Marianus O'Gorman.<sup>2</sup> In like manner, Colgan places the festival of a St. Foilan, at this day<sup>3</sup> He is supposed to be identical with that St. Failan, a notice of whom occurs, at the 4th of June,<sup>4</sup> and who is called the son of Aedh, or Aidus,<sup>5</sup> being descended from a royal stem, belonging to the Munster province. The festival in honour of Faolan was celebrated, on this day, according to the Martyrology of Donegal.<sup>6</sup> The Bollandists<sup>7</sup> have entered a notice of this saint, at the 31st of March.

---

ARTICLE V.—ST. FETHAIDH, OR FECACIUS. An entry is found, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>1</sup> at the 31st of March, of St. Fethaidh. At the same date, Colgan presents a few unsatisfactory notices, regarding St. Fethadius, or Fecacius.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists<sup>3</sup> merely notice Fethadius senior Mur-Mugensis, said by the Irish Martyrologists to have had a festival, at this date. We are to presume, however, that T has been substituted for F, in the first letter of the name. It has been remarked, by Colgan, that he is called senior of Murmagense, which is interpreted, in Irish, Murmagh, which signifies, in English, "the maritime plain." This locality, he thinks, may be identified with Mag Murthemne, the maritime plain of Conall Murthemne, in Ultonia, north-westwards from Athlone. See "The Tribes and Customs of Hy-Many," n. (d), pp. 78, 79.

---

<sup>8</sup> This coincides with the name of a parish church, in the barony of Athlone, and county of Roscommon, dedicated to St. Bridget. The small village of Tober Brighde, generally called in English Brideswell, is in it. We learn from a tract, preserved in the Book of Lecan, fol. 92, treating of O'Kelly, and his people of Hy-many, that all the Hy-Many were baptized here. See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. iii., n. (x), p. 258.

<sup>9</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Martii. Acta SS. Colmani, Foilani and Fethadii, p. 799.

<sup>10</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, we find, Colman cam achaid.

<sup>11</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

<sup>12</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxxi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 898.

ARTICLE IV.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr

Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, we read, ſelam ſilii, the rest obscure.

<sup>2</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xvi. Januarii. Appendix, cap. i., p. 104.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Martii. De SS. Colmano, Foilano et Fethadio, p. 799.

<sup>4</sup> See, at that date, the account of St. Faithlenn, son of Aedh Diamhan.

<sup>5</sup> According to the Genealogies of the Irish Saints, chap. xxxiv.

<sup>6</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

<sup>7</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxxi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 898.

ARTICLE V.—<sup>1</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. In the Franciscan copy, we have ſecharoe.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Martii. De SS. Colmano, Foilano et Fethadio, p. 799, 800.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxxi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 898.

in which Lughmagh, or Louth, had been situated. And, as among the other holy men, who died, A.D. 784,<sup>4</sup> we find mentioned the demise of Feadhach, son to Cormac, Abbot of Lughmhadh,<sup>5</sup> Slaine and Daimhliag;<sup>6</sup> so it has been conjectured, that the latter may have been identical, with the present saint. Marianus O'Gorman and Cathal Maguire, who mention his name, at the 31st of March, throw no further light on his age and locality. Separated by a line, and as if it were a distinct entry, we read, in the Martyrology of Tallagh,<sup>7</sup> that Senior Murmaige's feast was celebrated, at this date. Moreover, on this day, we find recorded, in the Martyrology of Donegal,<sup>8</sup> Fethaidh.

ARTICLE VI.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. REGULUS, OR ST. RULE, SCOTLAND. We have already alluded to the feast of this holy man, at the preceding day; but, the Bollandists,<sup>1</sup> citing a Manuscript Martyrology, belonging to Prague, as also a Kalendar of the church at Aquileia,<sup>2</sup> and a Manuscript Kalendar of a Breviary, used about the Rhine, have a brief allusion to St. Regulus, Bishop and Confessor, at this day. In the Kalendar of the Breviary of Aberdeen,<sup>3</sup> we find at the 31st of March, or Pridie Kalendas Aprilis, St. Regulus, Bishop, with a Double Office.<sup>4</sup>

ARTICLE VII.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. PATTO, BISHOP OF VERDEN, SAXONY. At Verda, and as a Scottish saint, Dempster<sup>1</sup> enters Patto, second Bishop of that See, at the 31st of March.<sup>2</sup> The Bollandists merely allude to this entry.<sup>3</sup>

ARTICLE VIII.—FEAST OF THE HOLY ANISSUS, AND OF HIS COMPANIONS, MARTYRS, IN AFRICA. As in many of the old Martyrologies, the Feilire<sup>1</sup> of St. Ængus contains the celebration of St. Anissus, and of his companions, who suffered death for the sake of Christ. There can be no question, but that these were the holy African Martyrs, who are commemorated at this day, in the ancient Martyrology, attributed to St. Jerome,<sup>2</sup> as See Dr. O'Donovan's "Annals of the Four Masters," vol. i., pp. 390, 391.

<sup>5</sup> Now Louth.

<sup>6</sup> Now Duleek.

<sup>7</sup> Edited by Rev. Dr. Kelly, p. xx. The Franciscan copy has Senop—a part illegible—and, afterwards, maige.

<sup>8</sup> Edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, pp. 90, 91.

ARTICLE VI.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms iii., Martii xxxi. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 897.

<sup>2</sup> It states, he had an Office, containing Three Lessons.

<sup>3</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 114.

<sup>4</sup> This is added: "Si festa' Sanctorum olavi martyris et reguli abbatis infra passionem do. contigerit seu oc. pas. transferri debent videlz dies olavi usque ad quartas. Kl's augusti quo die passio ejusdem celebratur et sancti reguli usque ad crastinum michaelis de morte tumba nisi in ecclesiis de eisdem dedicatis."

ARTICLE VII.—<sup>1</sup> In "Menologium Scoticum."

<sup>2</sup> See Bishop Forbes' "Kalendars of Scottish Saints," p. 194.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," toms iii., Martii xxxi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 897.

ARTICLE VIII.—<sup>1</sup> In the Leabhar Breac copy, the following stanza is found—its translation has also been given to us by Professor O'Looney:—

f. xii. kl. Cpoch minach anirri
Co cleir bair bair anichu
Do bair bair tpe bichu marpa for rluas raigchiu.

"The vehement cross of Anissus.
With pure clerics who were vigilant
They put a (concluding) crown for ever
Upon the troopful host of March."

<sup>2</sup> In apographo Lucensi et Blumiano. However, in other copies are to be found some changes or omissions of names.

also in other old Calendars, and the Bollandists<sup>3</sup> record them, as Anesus, Felix, Diodolus, Portus, Abda, Cornelia and Valeria, without being able to furnish details of their glorious passage through sufferings, to the happy rewards of the Blessed in Heaven.

ARTICLE IX.—REPUTED FEAST OF ST. CAIDOC, AND OF ST. FRICOR, OR ADRIEN, APOSTLES OF THE MORINI. Both of these saints, with their Acts, so far as he could collect them, are placed by Colgan, at this day.<sup>1</sup> He gives no satisfactory reason whatever, for this arrangement, which is purely arbitrary. The rather doubtful authority of Dempster, and of other writers, following him, have induced me to place their Acts, at the succeeding day, the 1st of April. The Bollandists,<sup>2</sup> also, have a brief note of allusion to the foregoing arrangement of Colgan, but deferring the Acts of those saints to the day succeeding.

ARTICLE X.—REPUTED FESTIVAL OF ST. DARIA, MOTHER OF ST. URSULA. The name of Daria—a peculiarly Irish appellation—is said to have been that given to the mother of St. Ursula;<sup>1</sup> and it is found, among the entries of Camerarius,<sup>2</sup> at this date, as the Bollandists<sup>3</sup> observe. They promised, that more might be given, regarding her, at the 21st of October, which day commemorated the Martyrdom of St. Ursula and of her companions.

In closing his invaluable volume with the month of March, our great Irish Hagiologist has observed,<sup>1</sup> that the purpose he had in view was to record only those saints of Ireland, regarding whom previous writers had been able to state some particulars, illustrating their race and family, their period, their pious labours, the religious offices they exercised, or the miracles which they wrought. Those saints, whose festival days, or place for celebration, could solely be found, in the Calendars or Martyrologies, without additional memorials to establish their place in history, he has intentionally omitted, and left to others the duty of commemorating. To this resolution he adhered, from the outset of his labours, although he might have offered suggestions and observations, in relation to the latter class of holy persons; but, he deemed it better, to pass them over in silence, rather than speak of them with doubt or uncertainty. Even modestly distrusting his own opinions, when placing these as such before his readers, and loving historic truth so much, that he could not venture upon assertions or conclusions, which might serve to discolour its outlines; he left for others the responsibility, of treating about the more obscure personages and circumstances, likely to involve the investigators of our history and antiquities in difficulties and perplexities, which he candidly and admirably acknowledges were beyond his reach. While thoroughly appreciating and respecting the motives, which guided his judgment in reference to this plan, and while urging on our readers the

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxxi. De Sanctis Martyribus Afris Aneso, Felice, Diodolo, Porto, Abda, Cornelia et Valeria, in three paragraphs, pp. 905, 906.

ARTICLE IX.—<sup>1</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," xxxi. Martii. De SS. Adriano et Caidoco, Apostolis Morinorum. Ex Alchuino, Jacobo Malbranco, et aliis, pp. 797, 798, 799.

<sup>2</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii.,

Martii xxxi. Among the pretermitted saints, p. 898.

ARTICLE X.—<sup>1</sup> See the Acts of St. Ursula and of her companions, at the 21st of October.

<sup>2</sup> In his Scottish Martyrology.

<sup>3</sup> See "Acta Sanctorum," tomus iii., Martii xxxi. Among the pretermitted feasts, p. 899.

<sup>1</sup> See Colgan's "Acta Sanctorum Hiberniæ," Martii xxxi., p. 800.

necessity of cautiously weighing the evidence adduced, for any of our past or future statements ; it will be found, that the number of Irish saints and festival days here introduced is largely in excess of Colgan's Catalogue and Acts. It has been a cherished desire, to place upon record, so many names or biographies, as fairly fall within the scope of our national hagiography, and as have come to our cognizance from all accessible and accredited sources. Some years have elapsed, since the writer promised to publish the Acts of over five hundred principal Irish saints, including their Festivals and Commemorations. That should give little more than one Biography or notice, however, for each day of the year. Our plan and work have grown to dimensions, not then contemplated ; and now, at the close of our Third Volume, nearly one thousand special Articles—many of these comprising several pages—have been presented to the public. More Articles, than double the latter number, are still in process of correction and arrangement for publication ; while more than a third part of our whole work, on the Irish Saints, has been now issued. Our succeeding Volumes may be considerably diminished, in size and amount of pages, relatively to those which have already seen the light ; yet, it is to be hoped, their subject matter shall possess, at least equal and sustained interest, for all lovers of Irish Hagiology.

END OF VOLUME III.

DATE DUE

[illegible]

DEMCO 38-297

